The Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) talked about the fishery aspect of the environmental concerns. As the Member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Belsher) pointed out, the economic impact on British Columbia is important; that cannot be denied. I am not sure whether this qualifies as a megaproject, but it is big and there are jobs involved. At a time when unemployment is high that cannot be passed over lightly. The transportation issue is involved. We need to move our goods to and from the coast in a much more economic and efficient manner than we have so far.

There is another issue which is easily forgotten and passed over. That is the rights of the aboriginal people, the first citizens of Canada. Those rights cannot just be glossed over quickly. We cannot try to convince the House that it will all be looked after. The Indian leaders who appeared before the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development on numerous occasions have too much bad history to relate to have any confidence in us. I will return to that point later if time will permit me.

Members of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development joined members of the Fisheries Committee to hear the testimony. There are two committees involved in this. The Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development supports this motion. At the last meeting the Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) asked that this report be appended to our own minutes of proceedings and evidence. That was agreed to unanimously. There are two standing committees of the House of Commons that support this report.

No matter what kind of bureaucratic arguments we put on a piece of paper, Indian people are going to be affected. We can argue about how many reserves, how many bands or how many nations, but it does not matter. The alliance of the three nations involved have given very telling testimony about the impacts that they see upon them from this twin-tracking project. It is not that they want to stop it. They have said that these concerns are so vital that they need a little more time. From having spoken with their elders they know about the past grievances. They know that when the first railway track was built those grievances were never satisfactorily settled. We want to build a second track while we have outstanding grievances from the time the first track was built. In many cases the acquisition of rights of way proceeded in an irregular fashion without approval of the bands and without fair and adequate compensation.

Hydro-Québec said that it had a big project in northern Quebec which could not be delayed because billions of dollars and jobs and the future of Canada was involved. The Cree of northern Quebec went to court and said that they were being run over by a roller and needed some time. They got a sympathetic Justice who said that he would impose an injunction on the project until there was a proper settlement. That led to the James Bay and northern Quebec agreement. That could very well happen in this particular case. Mr. Speaker, if we do not pass this motion. If we do not arm the Ministers who are concerned—the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) are deeply concerned—with this motion to get such a moratorium, then perhaps the courts will do it for us.

The Hon. Member for Fraser Valley East in looking at the motion was concerned that it was too vague. He told us, for example, that the second paragraph which states that a twin-tracking project has social and environmental impacts on the 36 Indian bands was much too vague. Let us see how vague it is. Let us talk about the social and environmental impacts. This is a resumé from the testimony received from the alliance of the tribal councils to which I referred earlier. These are just some of the land-related impacts. These land-related impacts are based on historical documents and on oral accounts that were passed on from the elders to the Indian leaders living today. Here are just a few of them:

> Loss of fields, gardens, orchards, timber, irrigation flumes, and ditches due to the construction of the CNR. Desecration of graveyards, heritage sites, sacred sites and village sites by the CNR.

Let us elaborate on one, the desecration of graveyards. Supposing in the City of Toronto you want to build a spur line and it just happened to go through a graveyard. What do you suppose the CNR would do, Mr. Speaker? Can you just imagine what the CNR would do? Can you imagine the meetings with Metro Council and the Toronto City Council? Can you imagine the millions of dollars they would be prepared to spend? Can you imagine the public relations program they would introduce? It would be something to behold, Sir.

Here is how the CNR deals with Indian people. This is from a document dated 1913. The Department of Indian Affairs informed the CNPR, the Canadian National Pacific Railway, about the desecration of graveyards on the Ashcroft reserve. Let me read from the document. It states that the Chief of the Ashcroft Band reported that in consequence of extending the slope of the railway grade at their old graveyard at Ashcroft, a large number of bones of deceased Indians were exhumed and left exposed along the grave. This was reported to the engineer in charge who informed the Indians that he was not going to pay for the burying of any more Indian bones, that the Indians could take them away if they wanted to, but he would have nothing more to do with it. Apparently it was necessary to desecrate the old Indian burial ground. Under these circumstances it is thought that the remains should have been treated with common decency.

Something should be done or compensation should be made to satisfy the reasonable complaint of the Indians. The document goes on to state that cases of the above nature with railway companies have been allowed to drag along at great length, allowing a large amount of apparently useless correspondence. We read also: "I should be much obliged to you if you will cause each case to be gone into and settled as soon as conveniently possible."

In response, the CPR right-of-way agent informed the Department of Indian Affairs that this complaint has been settled with the Indians finally and, I believe, satisfactorily to them.

I can quite imagine with the second tracking that there will be witnesses from the Canadian National Railways appearing before one committee or another saying: "We had our meetings. We had our negotiations. We paid attention to all the concerns and they were all satisfactorily settled". Do not believe it for a moment, Mr. Speaker.

Here are some of the other impacts: the disruption of drainage patterns and flooding of farm land; fragmentation of limited reserve land base; discouragement and displacement of settlements adjacent to tracks. Some specific places are referred to. The list of impacts includes: quality of life disrupted due to noise, pollution, vibrations and dangerous crossings; loss of lives and livestock along rights of way; restrictions placed on the irrigation of reserve lands by CN Rail, allegedly because of wash-out problems; loss of traditional fishing stations.

You can see, Mr. Speaker, that this is going to take some time. If there is in fact an active CN committee, it will have a lot of work to do. Bureaucrats say: "Everything is okay; trust us. We will work it out. Don't worry; leave it in our hands". I tell you, worry, Mr. Speaker, worry. We have lots to worry about. We need time and that is why we have to support this motion. We need the time.

Mr. Thacker: You are spawning Crown corporations faster than fish.

Mr. Penner: The committee which the Hon. Member for Fraser Valley East spoke about needs the time. This motion must be concurred in.

I imagine there are quite a few Hon. Members who are gathering and want to speak. I think we should debate this issue at some length. I do not think that we should have to call it quits at six o'clock. We can go on for a while. We are all concerned about this issue. We are prepared to stay here, to debate it and to hear all the points of view. We do not want to cut the debate off and we do not want to introduce any closure.

I would like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider, pursuant to Standing Order 8(4)(a), that we extend the hours and debate further this important motion to concur.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Penner moves, seconded by Mr. Caccia, to extend hours pursuant to Standing Order 8(4)(a).

In putting the question on such a motion, the Speaker shall ask those Members who object to rise in their places. If 25 or more Members rise, the motion shall be deemed to have been withdrawn; otherwise the motion will have been adopted. All those who object to the motion please rise?

And more than 25 Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost. I declare the motion withdrawn and lost.

Mr. Riis: I have a question, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Gurbin) has the floor.

Mr. Blaikie: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Taylor: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Sorry. I regret that there are questions and comments after the Hon. Member's speech. Therefore, I will recognize the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) on a question.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my question—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I see the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Nickerson: I distinctly heard you say, Mr. Speaker, that the motion had been lost. That is not my understanding of the event that took place. My understanding is that, pursuant to the Standing Orders, by virtue of the fact that more than 25 Members objected and rose to do so, the motion was deemed withdrawn. It was not lost.

• (1740)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is what I said. I corrected myself and said that it was withdrawn. Therefore the questions and comments are on the Hon. Member's speech and I recognize the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) for that purpose.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I should first like to make a short comment. Regardless of what the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) had to say, what needs to be made perfectly clear is that members of the NDP and Liberal Party were hoping to have a vote on this motion tonight.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. According to the rule I believe that the opportunity for questions and comments has to be relevant to the speech of the person who has just spoken, not comments which he might want to make about motions that have passed in the House or have been deemed withdrawn.

Mr. Blaikie: On the same point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The point is well taken.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Could I just finish one, please?

Mr. Blaikie: Don't finish it until you have heard Hon. Members on it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Would the Hon. Member please let me finish? The point of the Hon. Member is well taken. The Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap has a question and comment on the speech of the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner), and I would like the House to direct itself accordingly.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner). In terms of the excellent points which he was making and in terms of making a case as to why this motion should come to a vote today to stop the advance of the plans of CN in terms of environmental concerns, the concerns of native people and of the fishery, which were articulated, like so many other of his points, so extremely well, is my understanding of the result of the vote we have just had correct? The Conservatives voted unanimously in the House, with two exceptions. This means that this motion will not come to a vote and will die on the Order Paper at six o'clock. Am I correct that it was the Conservatives who made it impossible for us to continue this critical and important debate as it touches on environmental issues, native issues, fishery issues and economic issues generally?

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An Hon. Member: What are you afraid of?

Mr. Dick: I am not afraid of anything, but I should like to tell the Hon. Member, if he does not realize it, that there was no vote taken. It was a matter of standing in our places; there was no question for the yeas—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate, not a point of order.

Mr. Riis: The Tories voted against it; the CN flacks voted against it.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I think it should be pointed out that the matter does not die but goes back on the Order Paper and may be called again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You have made your point. The Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior wishes to answer the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, it occurred to me that if Canadians are watching parliamentarians at work, this is an issue to which they would want to pay close attention because it is not a simple issue. In fact, most decisions which are made are complex and have many aspects to them. It seemed to me that this was a good opportunity for all aspects to be expressed by Members who are concerned. Let them take only one aspect and say that it really bothers them. Let us hear more about the economic impact. We have not heard enough about that today. For goodness sake, why should such an important motion come, as the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) told us, at the eleventh hour, regretfully? Why should we stop at six o'clock and say that that is the end of it? Nothing has been given to the Government to arm it to raise its concerns with the railway and to respond legitimately to the testimony received by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. This is why I thought it was important for us to go beyond six o'clock, to continue the debate and hear everything.

Mr. Riis: We can't now, is that right?

Mr. Penner: We cannot now unless Hon. Members agree at three minutes to six that we will not say anything more and we will let the motion be concurred in. That would be the honourable thing to do.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Penner: That is the way in which we could say to the Canadian people that the reform of Parliament is not something which will come about when the committee on parliamentary reform has reported. We could say to them that parliamentary reform has begun in this House today because this Parliament is being responsive to one of its committees.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) who has served many years in the House. Does he remember even one occasion upon which his Government permitted such a motion to come to a vote? He is an experienced Member and knows that the committee has done a lot of good work. At the same time he knows that the dynamics of the committee are somewhat different from the dynamics of Cabinet which has to make the final decision on all sort of bases that the committee might not have considered. He knows that that process is ongoing.

What did his Government do in terms of ever letting such a motion come to a vote? What did he do and what did the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) do when he was Minister of the Environment? It was their Government which spawned Crown corporations like fish.

Mr. Penner: The Hon. Member is really flattering me way beyond anything I deserve because he is asking me to repeat the first part of my speech. What I am telling him and other Hon. Members is: for goodness sake, let us not get ourselves stuck in the past when Governments did not respond to the work of committees. The Party opposite went to the Canadian people and said that it was time for a change. Who can deny that we want to see changes? But where are these changes supposed to be? Are they supposed to be in some far off place? Why not let those changes begin here? The change we could adopt very easily is that we could begin to listen to standing committees, special committees and task forces of the House.

I am not happy with the past. I said to all Hon. Members of the House that if the previous Government had listened more to its Members, it might still be around governing. If this Government listens more to its committees, it might last a lot longer than I would like it to last. I will put all that aside because I think it is more important to the country, not who governs which political Party, to have good government. We cannot have good government unless we have parliamentarians working along with the Government to give us the best kind of legislation possible.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. I just want to clarify something. There was a suggestion made by an Hon. Member on the other side—I am sure it was not with any malice—that all Conservatives had risen—

Mr. Riis: Except two, I said.

Mr. Fraser: Except two. I just want it recorded, for some reasons which—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please.

Mr. Fraser: It is not a speech, Mr. Speaker; it is a point of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is not a point of privilege if you are going to keep on talking the way you are right now. That is not privilege. Is the Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) rising on a question or comment? He has exactly two minutes.

Mr. Brisco: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I listened with interest and appreciation to the concerns expressed by my colleague across the floor. I should like to put a question to him. There has been an examination of this matter by the standing committee. The debate today, by and large, on both sides of the House has been supportive of the concern which was brought before the House. We know that there are those Members on this side who understand and appreciate his concern and have addressed it. He is of the view that we are a Government with a Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who is not going to listen and not going to act on what was said, and with a Minister of Transport who will not act on what has been said today, as well as a Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who will not act on what has been said today. Is that his view? If that is not his view, then I ask the Hon. Member why he is so exercised over the fact that the matter is not coming to a vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is a great comment, but I would say that comments and questions are now terminated.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think that was a very worthy question and to be just left hanging in the air seems unfair. I would like unanimous consent to respond briefly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the Hon. Member have unanimous consent to respond briefly?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Because it is myself that is being referred to, I want to make it clear that I indicated that the committee chairman and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans did not support—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. It is now debate.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this has been a very interesting afternoon. Up until an hour or so ago, I thought that we were having a level of debate in the House of Commons that I have not had the opportunity to enjoy on very many occasions. Beginning with the intervention of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) it rapidly deteriorated, and it has been deteriorating very quickly since that time.

Mr. Blaikie: Sorry I asked for action. I'm sorry it bothered you.

Mr. Gurbin: There are several major points. It is not a question of where Members' minds are at or what action they ask for. It is a question of honesty of action and whether or not they are consistent in their positions. That applies to Hon. Members on the other side as well as this side of the House. It flabbergasts me to sit here and listen to some of the interventions that can be made.

So many times I hear Members of the Official Opposition making comments to us that they would not appreciate from us and I hope we will never be guilty of perpetuating it the same way they did year after year after year.

Mr. Blaikie: You just have.

Mr. Riis: You have muzzled Parliament.

Mr. Gurbin: Here we go again with the NDP. If it were not for the mindless interventions of the NDP, such as the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill, we would not have had the last five years of Liberal Government that ended up with this and so many other problems with which we have had to deal. They do not know where their head is at. They do not have to take the responsibility. They continue, even this afternoon, to refuse to look for ways to accomplish things. Instead—

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member who is speaking said that it was only the NDP that were against this matter coming to a vote. He should know that two Members of his own Party—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that that is debate.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I do not have a lot of time left.

Mr. Riis: That is your decision.

Mr. Gurbin: That is unfortunate. Something happened this afternoon and it is getting worse all the time. Somebody asked a while ago what somebody watching television would think. If I had been watching TV, I would have turned it off. At this point in time one of the interesting things—even the NDP might be able to understand this if they will be quiet for a minute and think about it—

Mr. Riis: Aren't you wonderful, aren't you superb?

Mr. Gurbin: If they would take the time to read the motion that is before the House and see what it says and what has been accomplished through the interventions of the chairman of our committee—

Mr. Riis: Why didn't you support him?

Mr. Gurbin: —and through the other people who have been discussing what the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans—

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In terms of enforcing the rules of the House, I wonder if it might be possible for the Chair to consult the Hon. Member and ask him if he is merely talking this motion out in order to prevent the House from taking a vote?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I am only embarrassed to have to deal with these people, not embarrassed to be here. The point I was trying to make, if they would care to read the motion, is that even if the motion had sat there without being debated this afternoon, the committee, and I give full credit to the chairman in particular for this—

Mr. Riis: Why didn't you support him?

Mr. Gurbin: Here we go again. The committee has accomplished a very considerable end.

Mr. Blaikie: Why did you betray your own committee?

Mr. Gurbin: The substance of the motion as it stands before us now refers to the advisability of the Government considering postponement. Those things have been in process ever since the committee brought the motion forward. They will continue on in spite of some of the things that have happened in between. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) who made an excellent intervention this afternoon, and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) have lent their support to trying to seek as reasonable as possible a resolution to this matter.

There is something Hon. Members opposite should understand. They are hung up. One of the primary foci of the first intervention this afternoon was on the Order in Council. Yes, there is a legal obligation for the Minister of Transport to sign an Order in Council, but the Order in Council is only offering the opportunity for CN to do things. That is a legal obligation.

Mr. Riis: That is exactly what we are worried about.

Mr. Gurbin: That by itself does not result in the consequence of one piece of rock falling into one drop of water anywhere along that portion of land. I think, from what we heard from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, that there has to be, particularly because of this motion and the work of the committee, an honest effort on the part of the Government to resolve the situation that did occur, unfortunately and regrettably because of the lateness of the introduction of the EARP process as a result of difficulties that there have been historically. I am not going to waste any time or spend any time on that.

Mr. Keeper: Let's vote.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I have been on my feet now for maybe ten minutes, and for about five minutes of that I have been listening to catcalls from the other side.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. We must see if the Hon. Member has a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I regret taking a moment of the Hon. Member's time, but I think this is important. It is two minutes before the hour, for those who are watching this debate or who read it later—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please.

Mr. Gurbin: In the final several minutes that I have left, if anybody is watching now and doing anything but laughing at the NDP and the Liberals, I would like to—

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If the NDP did not waste so much time, we could have voted today.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, in the final moment I have left, I want to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the Hon. Member for Skeena has a point of order, or are you just fooling around with the Chair?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope not. In any event, I regret to say that I cannot hear a point of order because it is now six o'clock.

It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bissonnette that Bill C-23, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

Mr. Norman Warner (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak on Bill C-23, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. It is also a pleasure for me to speak for the first time in this House on any Bill.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Warner: It's very nice to get the applause before the speech. I would also like to thank my electorate who sent me here last September to be part of this new and dynamic Government.

The riding of Stormont-Dundas comprises the entire counties of Stormont and Dundas and almost the entire township of Charlottenburgh in the County of Glengarry. It stretches along the St. Lawrence River some 80 kilometres from Lancaster in the east to Iroquois in the west. It extends north of the St. Lawrence River approximately 40 kilometres to include Winchester, Chesterville, Morewood, Crysler and Moose Creek.

The City of Cornwall is the only city and the largest community in my riding, with a population of approximately 46,000 people. The rural area has some 1,900 farms, of which 42 per cent are dairy operations. Cornwall and other communities in the constituency are among the oldest settlements in Ontario and Canada, having been established over 200 years. Last year Cornwall, along with other communities in my riding, celebrated its bicentennial.

The mother tongue of the residents of the constituency is approximately 72 per cent English and 25 per cent French. Unemployment in our area is quite high. Of course, we are most concerned with positive and progressive developments in our area. We are expecting a few new companies to locate in Cornwall in the immediate future. We are doing all we can to encourage other manufacturers and businesses to locate in Stormont, Dundas and Charlottenburgh as well.

We are quite fortunate to have access to excellent transportation facilities with highways, railways and the St. Lawrence Seaway all running through our area. We are also very fortunate to have the least expensive hydro-electric power rates in Canada, some 28 per cent less than the surrounding areas. I invite all Members to visit the people of my area. We are located within a one-hour or one-and-a-half-hour drive from Ottawa. Hon. Members would be very warmly welcomed by all of the people there.

The majority of the discussions on Bill C-23 have been very positive and supportive. The Bill is recognized as basically housekeeping and modernizing the Act which has been so popular in the past. In the last five years the activity in this area has more than tripled. In 1978 the amount of loans written was approximately $176 million, while in 1983 the amount increased to $691 million. At the same time the number of loans increased from 7,300 to over 25,000.

This activity certainly indicates the popularity of the Act and the very useful purpose that it has for small business across Canada. There were only two areas that seemed to have created very much controversy and those were the areas of the administration fee and the concept of participation in losses. The 1 per cent administration fee on loans made after April 1 will be imposed on the banks and will certainly help to defray some of the costs of the program. It is also a provision of the Act that this charge will not be passed on to the borrowers.

Also effective April 1 the federal Government will absorb 90 per cent of the losses as compared to the full 100 per cent of the losses which had been absorbed in the past. In 1984 losses or claims on this program amounted to some $43 million and it seems to be only good business practice that the underwriters of these loans participate to a certain extent in the absorption of losses and also pay a reasonable fee for the insurance protection that they are receiving.

I feel quite strongly that our financial institutions in Canada are the most appropriate vehicles for the Government to be using to distribute its programs. They are the most simple of vehicles and have the greatest lack of bureaucracy. Those small-business people who have dealt with such companies or concerns as the Federal Business Development Bank know what bureaucracy can be, particularly when they are trying to get a loan through quickly to solve an immediate problem. I would hope that in the future, if the Federal Business Development Bank is not going to be active in this area, we will see fit to further expand this Act so that the amounts of loans will be greater. As well, we would certainly hope to encourage more participants.

It was quite encouraging to see that in 1983 the number of lenders had increased to 1,860 in addition to the chartered banks. Of course, with the great number of financial institutions that are eligible as lenders, I believe they only need be encouraged in order to see the great benefit that this Act has for the small businesses in their communities. I would hope that in the future some of the caisses populaires and credit unions that have not been active in the past will see fit to provide this very essential service for small businesses.

This Act will certainly provide some of the assistance that is required for small businesses. I am certainly not going to say that this is the be all and end all for small business, but it will certainly be an integral part of the Government's program to assist small business in the great future that we see for it in the next few years.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to make a relatively brief contribution to the debate on Bill C-23, which concerns small business loans. A number of Members in my Party have spoken to this subject, and I would now like to offer a summary of the Liberal Party of Canada's position before the Bill is referred to committee, which we expect will be done today.

First of all, we think the Small Businesses Loans Act is an excellent piece of legislation. The loans program is a very good one and has been extremely popular. Applications under the program have continued to increase over the years, which proves that Canadian small business is very appreciative of this legislation, especially since most jobs in Canada are created by small- and medium-sized businesses, in other words, by those businesses that are eligible for loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act.

As a general rule, the Liberal Party of Canada supports Bill C-23, especially since the legislation which Bill C-23 is intended to amend was passed by the previous Liberal Government and received with great enthusiasm.

I would like to start by reviewing two of the measures proposed in Bill C-23 which I think are excellent, and which are in fact why we intend to give our consent that Bill C-23 be read a second time and referred to a standing committee of the House.

First, the ceiling or aggregate amount of funds that may be lent to small businesses under the program has been raised from $1.5 million to $1.8 billion. We think this is a very wise step because demand has already outstripped the funding available under this program.

Bill C-23 will also amend the definition of a small business by raising the maximum gross revenue for small businesses to be eligible for loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act from $1.5 to $2 million annually. This will open the program to a larger number of small businesses, and we believe this is a very sensible decision.

However, while Bill C-23 seems to be making the loans program available to a larger number of businesses as a result of the two measures I mentioned earlier, namely, the increase in the aggregate amount of loans that may be offered and the change in how small businesses are defined, we wonder why the Bill also proposes restrictions that will make it much harder for small businesses to obtain loans. First of all, why did the Government decide to reduce the guarantee provided to financial institutions under the program so they will not have to shoulder the entire risk burden, from 100 per cent to 90 per cent? Bill C-23 as it is now stands provides that the program will not guarantee more than 90 per cent of the loan, and financial institutions will be asked, in fact obliged, to take 10 per cent of the risk. This will certainly reduce the amount of money being lent by financial institutions, especially since the institutions are also asked to pay, as of April 1, 1985, a fee of 1 per cent of the amount of the loan.

So the Government is now telling the financial institutions that they are going to take on a greater share of the risk than before, and on top of that, they will have to pay a 1 per cent fee, thus reducing the profits an institution can make on a loan, because although interest rates may fluctuate, according to the legislation they are set at prime plus one.

If we ask financial institutions to pay a 1 per cent fee every time they agree to make a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act, we are reducing their cash flow.

Those are the two aspects of the legislation we are most concerned about. We believe the Government would be ill-advised, while ostensibly broadening the availability of such loans, to introduce other measures that would actually reduce that availability.

That is why, when the Bill is referred to a standing committee of the House of Commons, we expect our Members on the committee to make a contribution towards improving the proposed legislation, especially by removing the two measures I have just mentioned, that is the 1 per cent fee and the obligation on the financial institutions to share part of the loan liability.

Furthermore, we must not forget that under the provisions of this Bill, the Minister has the power to change the rules of the game in various ways. For instance, the maximum rate which is now set by legislation could be changed by the Governor in Council, in other words, by the Minister with the approval of Cabinet.

As I mentioned earlier, it has now been proposed that the guarantees be shared by the Government and the lending institution—90 per cent and 10 per cent respectively. Here again, the sharing formula can be changed by order in council, so that the Minister will not have to come before Parliament to ask for amendments.

Similarly, the ceiling on the over-all amount of the loan under the program can be changed.

In my opinion, that is enough to create uncertainty among people who might benefit from this program. How can anyone seeking a loan repayable over a term which might run to ten years not be concerned over the possibility that the loan conditions may be changed while it is still outstanding?

I suggest that the Government, by creating such uncertainty, is going against its own policy, which is to favour the private sector.

Yet it would seem that the Government has given up about job creation, relying instead on the private sector to pick up the ball. It is rather strange that the Government has chosen to limit the benefits available to small business—the major source of new jobs in Canada—under the small businesses loans program.

To sum up my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I can say that we agree to have Bill C-23 referred to the committee because we feel that it does have a few good points. However, we will try to improve this measure and delete those provisions which we think will not serve the interests of small business in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, those are the few remarks I wanted to make on behalf of my Party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Stevens, seconded by Mr. Hnatyshyn, moves that Bill C-23, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Oil Substitution Act

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-24 provides for the termination of the Canada Oil Substitution Program or, in the jargon of this place, "COSP", on March 31, 1985, and for the phasing out of the Canadian Home Insulation Program, or "CHIP", by March 31, 1986.

It is essential, Mr. Speaker, that Parliament should weigh the issues involved when such programs are created and it is also essential that Parliament should weigh the issues involved when the time comes for such programs to be withdrawn. I do not believe that anyone has worked harder to establish this principle than the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Andre). You may not remember, Mr. Speaker, though many in this House will, that four years ago the Hon. Member for Calgary Centre, now Minister of Supply and Services, challenged an attempt by the Liberal Government to escape Parliament's scrutiny of these very programs. At that time he obtained a landmark ruling from Madam Speaker that these two Acts, and eight other spending items, had been brought improperly to the House as part of non-debatable appropriations. As a result of the ruling, the Government of the day was forced to introduce separate Bills to create COSP and to extend the life of CHIP. I am pleased to be acting in the spirit of that decision by introducing legislation so that the amendment of these Acts can be properly debated in this House of Commons.

The Government's intention to make these changes was announced by my colleagues, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret), last November 8. Since then we have all had the chance to assess the reaction to these plans. I think it is quite clear that the people of Canada, as well as those involved in providing materials, equipment and services for residential oil substitution and energy conservation, acknowledge that outright consumer grants for these purposes are something this Government of Canada can no longer afford. A large potential exists for further oil substitution and energy conservation in the residential sector, and the pursuit of that potential remains an important priority for Canada. But at a time of restraint the Government must find less costly ways to support these objectives. I will return to this subject later in my remarks.

Under the off-oil program introduced in 1980, taxable contributions of up to $800 were provided towards the cost of converting oil heating systems to natural gas, electricity and propane, as well as to wood and other renewable energy resources. The existing legislation provided for a termination date of December 31, 1990 for the program. The amending Bill changes this date to March 31, 1985. The Minister has provided a limited exception which will allow applicants a further three months, until June 30, 1985, to complete their conversions if they had signed contracts prior to the November 8 announcement and if they faced difficulties in getting the work done by March 31. She has also waived the need for inspections to be completed by March 31, in recognition that backlogs of inspection requests may incur in some areas.

We in the Ministry of Energy, Mines and Resources have received a number of representations proposing that three or four or five extra months be allowed to complete conversions in respect of commitments signed by applicants before March 31 of this year. It has been argued that it is impossible to convert to natural gas between November and April, or in any event more costly to do so than during warm-weather months. Both gas and electrical utilities have expressed concern that the pressure to get the work done by March 31 may adversely affect work quality. In some cases, because of limited inventories of equipment, less than optimal systems may be installed.

We were sympathetic to these concerns and gave serious consideration to an extension of the period for eligible conversions into the summer. The Minister concluded, however, that a general extension could not be permitted in view of the additional program costs involved. For example, a minimum useful extension of three months only, to June 30, would increase cost outlays in the 1985-86 year by up to $35 million. I think that is a relatively conservative estimate. This would reduce by more than one-third the program savings that the Minister has pledged in respect of COSP toward the deficit reductions announced by the Minister of Finance and President of the Treasury Board.

I would now like to comment on the CHIP program. That program provided taxable contributions of up to $500 towards insulating and draft-proofing measures in existing homes. It was announced in 1977 and the Act provided for its termination date at the end of 1987. The amending Bill provides for a two-stage phase-out under which the Government's share of eligible costs is reduced to 33⅓ per cent from 60 per cent effective January 1, 1985, and the program comes to an end on March 31, 1986. I emphasize that in these final 15 months of CHIP, the maximum contribution is unchanged at $500. The Minister has provided an extra year for CHIP beyond the termination date for COSP, in recognition of the fact that suppliers and installers of residential conservation materials across Canada need the time to prepare for the withdrawal of CHIP.

The end of the program has been anticipated for some time by industry and government. For example, the reduction of the contribution rate to 33⅓ per cent is a natural and important step which follows an earlier reduction of the rate for materials to 60 per cent from 100 per cent.

Moreover, homes have been admitted to the program sequentially on the basis of their date of construction. The process is now in its final stage. The last group to become eligible, the 1.3 million homes built between 1971 and 1977, will have had two years to use the program by the time it concludes next year. That further period will also be helpful to the many small contractors across Canada who are working in trade that is still relatively young. They have rarely had notice of changes in CHIP and this phase-out period gives them some time to expand scope of the conservation work they can do and improve their ability to explain the advantages of conservation to householders.

In this respect we are indebted to the National Insulation and Energy Conservation Contractors Association, which represents insulation installers across Canada, for its advice and support. The Association recognized early last fall that CHIP might have to be discontinued and volunteered options for an orderly conclusion of the program. Its suggestions were very helpful to the Minister in preparing recommendations to her Cabinet colleagues. The Association was later able to identify the likelihood that backlogs of orders for work and material would arise in advance of the change in the contribution rate on December 31. The Minister was pleased to accept the modification which permits applicants to sign for the work by December 31 but have it performed in the first three months of 1985 at the 60 per cent rate. More than 80,000 applicants have taken advantage of this provision.

Let us look at the budgetary savings because this is important. We estimate that CHIP and COSP expenditures in the current fiscal year will total almost $350 million. The termination of COSP and phasing out of CHIP will provide continued savings from the appropriation levels for the two programs of $180 million in 1985-86 and $315 million in 1986-87. These are major and necessary contributions towards reduction of the federal deficit. Our decisions have been made not just because we must address the deficit. Our decisions recognize that the market-place has changed and that the Government's role with respect to oil substitution and energy conservation must change with it.

COSP was introduced in October, 1980. We all remember that at that time OPEC dominated the world's view of the future for oil. It was expected to control world supply and push world prices much higher. Almost 40 per cent of Canadian homes were heated with oil. Most of those home owners had little knowledge of oil substitution. Residential oil substitution was identified as a priority and a large consumer grant was introduced as the instrument to make it happen.

It is difficult to establish how much of the activity which has taken place since 1980 can be credited to COSP. Almost one million units have been converted under the program representing oil displacement of some 32,000 barrels a day, which is a very significant amount. Over this period the financial benefits of oil substitution have become more familiar to home owners. A trend has been established toward installation of medium and high-efficiency natural gas furnaces which are being made available at steadily declining and more competitive prices. Dual energy systems such as plenum heaters and heat pumps are offering savings and comfort to home owners and advantages in load management to the utilities.

A broad range of controlled combustion wood-burning systems are now available. Hundreds of thousands of homes across rural Canada use wood as their only source of space heating and obtain their supplies at a very low cost. To preserve a share of the residential market, oil dealers and manufacturers of oil heating equipment are marketing new high-efficiency oil furnaces and retrofit packages for existing oil furnaces. Everyone is getting in on the conservation game and we applaud that. In this mature and competitive environment I anticipate a continuing rapid decline in the residential use of oil after COSP is withdrawn.

CHIP has provided assistance toward conservation measures in more than 2,500,000 homes. Significant energy savings averaging some 17 per cent have been achieved in the homes that use CHIP. An evaluation of the program has established that CHIP played an important part in achieving those savings. It is estimated that the equivalent of 28,500 barrels of oil a day are being saved as a result of work done under CHIP. Between CHIP and COSP we are talking about some 60,000 barrels of oil. As with oil substitution, the benefit of energy conservation and reduced heating bills and increased home comfort are much more fully understood by Canadians now than seven or eight years ago. Installation specialists now certify their work to accepted national standards.

However, there remains a significant gap between understanding and action on the part of both consumers and industry. Consumers still lack confidence in the quality of work and the advice that they are offered. They see conservation and heating system technologies as being complex and doubt their own ability to sort it all out. Major technical issues remain to be solved and the work standards now in place need to be refined, expanded in scope, and backed up by the installer training program. These are very real problems, but they are not resolved by a Government grant, as I think everyone understands.

Reducing the use of oil and energy in Canada remains a very important national objective of the Government. Very large potentials for savings exist, not only in the housing stock but in other sectors as well, including commercial and industrial buildings and processes, buildings operated by various institutions, and the federal Government's own buildings and operations. We know that in many cases it can be less costly to invest in conserving energy than to bring on the same amount of new supply. In the existing housing stock the average potential for savings from cost-effective conservation measures has been estimated at 30 per cent. For millions of Canadian households it will be a very attractive investment, with a rapid return of dollars spent, to insulate, to draught-proof, and improve or convert their heating systems.

We cannot and should not continue to expect the public treasury to use borrowed dollars for the payment of consumer grants to try to ensure that this energy investment takes place. A more limited and balanced role for Government is clearly preferable, sensitive to the information needs of energy users and suppliers, to the technical problems still unresolved, and to opportunities for further development of energy use today.

The legislation before the House today is therefore a necessary step, but only a first step in reorienting government programs in these sectors. The Minister has also directed that all other programs of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in the areas of conservation and renewable energy are to be thoroughly and critically reviewed. She has directed her officials to conduct a parallel review of these program areas with provincial Governments in order to identify instances of waste and duplication of effort. Meetings have already been held with all provinces and territories.

Officials, the Minister and I have also been actively soliciting industry views on energy use in all sectors and on the respective roles that should be played by government in the private sector. We look forward to further discussions with provincial Ministers. The Minister will be bringing recommendations to her Cabinet colleagues for future program directions. We intend to review federal-provincial teamwork in energy programs and activities. We will work in co-operation with the private sector and achieve a more selective, disciplined and effective deployment of resources to effect energy use in Canada.

I want to go into some detail about the very substantial public expenditures involved in these programs to date. Over the past five years, CHIP has paid out over $530 million in grants to consumers. The gross cost of CHIP to the federal Government over the past seven and one-half years has been over $855 million. The total budget expenditure to the end of the calendar year 1984 is some $1.4 billion, of which perhaps $300 million has flowed back to the federal and provincial Governments in the form of tax on those grants. At present, rates of program activity grants under the two programs represent a gross annual cost to the federal treasury of some $300 million.

COSP has mainly been an oil substitution program contributing half of the eligible material and labour cost of converting space heating and water heating systems from oil to non-oil energy sources. The maximum grants for single family units and non-residential buildings is $800. The sliding scale of grants results in smaller amounts per unit for conversions of apartment blocks and other multi-family dwellings.

In Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, the Yukon and Northwest Territories, COSP grants can be used for off-oil measures as well as insulation, draught-proofing, and furnace improvement measures in recognition of the fact that there are few reasonably priced alternatives to oil.

COSP has paid grants toward conversion or conversion measures in about 900,000 units, including 880,000 housing units. The oil savings which have resulted from that activity are estimated at approximately 30,000 barrels per day, which is equivalent to the output of a Syncrude plant. When it is put into those terms, it is quite significant.

Electricity accounts for 41 per cent of the units which have received COSP grants and gas accounts for 35 per cent. Some may have thought it would have been the opposite. Surprisingly, wood accounts for 20 per cent and the remaining 4 per cent represents propane, a very small number of conversions to other sources and conservation measures.

Provinces have been invited to limit the alternatives to oil eligible under COSP so as to conform with provincial energy-use policies. In most cases provinces have been prepared to let the program operate on a neutral basis.

In Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, the provincial Governments have tilted the application of the program toward natural gas, which appears to conform with public preferences. In these provinces conversions to gas have represented 62 per cent of all conversions. It should be noted that past policies of federal and provincial Governments, together with the low price of natural gas and its public acceptance, led to significant conversion to gas in the west even before the introduction of COSP. In Alberta, urban and even rural gasification was almost complete by the end of the 1970s, as my colleague sitting to my right knows.

Manitoba may have made the greatest progress in the course of the 1980s to adopt gas and electricity for home heating. It is estimated that 24,000 of the 54,000 Manitoba homes on oil in 1980 have converted since then.

But COSP was aimed mostly at Ontario and Quebec, which in 1980 accounted for 73 per cent of residential oil use and for 73 per cent of the estimated realistic potential for conversion from oil. In fact, 75 per cent of the units converted under COSP have been in these two provinces. While these provinces represent by far the greatest potential for oil substitution in this decade, there are marked differences in the energy preferences of these populations. Gas has been preferred to electricity in Ontario by a margin of three to one. In Quebec, electricity is preferred four to one over gas. Moreover, total conversion activity has been significantly higher in Quebec where both electric and gas utilities have offered non-taxable cash grants for conversions in addition to COSP grants.

Only 11 per cent of COSP grants over the past four years has gone to the Atlantic Provinces, although they represent 15 per cent of the eligible housing stock. The region lacks access to natural gas, and for home owners in most areas electricity is at least as expensive for home heating as oil. The conservation assistance offered by COSP in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island has had rather limited take-up, and while conversions to wood have been popular, demand now is approaching saturation.

With respect to the experience under CHIP, the program has provided grants up to $500 per unit toward insulation and draught-proofing measures in about 2.5 million units. That represents about one-third of the eligible housing stock built before 1977. The program has been dominated by attic insulation activity and an installer force has grown up specializing in blowing insulation into attics by mechanical means. As demand for this measure has approached saturation, the industry has begun to diversify its service by including a comprehensive caulking and weather stripping, insulation of basements and to some extent insulation of walls. Energy savings attributable to work done under CHIP are estimated at the equivalent of 28,500 barrels of oil a day.

The take-up of CHIP by region reflects the length of time homes in various provinces have been eligible and the pattern of energy costs. On both counts, this has resulted in the most extensive use of CHIP in Atlantic Canada. The homes covered by CHIP represents 61 per cent of the eligible housing stock in Newfoundland, 89 per cent in P.E.I. and 91 per cent in Nova Scotia. The figure drops to 35 per cent in Ontario, 29 per cent in Quebec and 31 per cent on average for the western provinces.

Activity under COSP and CHIP has been significant. The critical issue is how much of the activity can be attributed to the existence of the incentives and how much would have taken place anyway. These are important considerations but extremely difficult measurements to take. A formal evaluation has been taken of CHIP, establishing that the incrementality of the program, the extra activity for which it can take credit, was 29 per cent of total activity.

This is an impressive figure and puts the Government's investment in a favourable light compared with costs of tax concessions or grants devoted to the development of new oil or gas sources. However, the measurement was made when the grant consisted of 100 per cent of the costs of materials to a maximum of $350 and one-third of labour costs to a maximum of $150. This grant structure was fraught with a variety of problems and was changed in 1982 to 60 per cent of both material and labour costs. The incrementality of CHIP has probably declined since that time.

These programs were introduced at times when the progress to reduce energy and oil use was unacceptably low and the savings to home owners poorly understood. In Canada and other industrial countries, conservation is now a much more popular concept and the public is much better informed. Substantial progress has been made in the technology and installers have begun to expand their services to cover a more comprehensive range of conservation measures.

Similarly, public understanding and acceptance of the advantages of oil substitution are now much higher than they were in the 1970s. Competition for conversions between gas utilities and suppliers of electrical systems has been spirited. We need only look at the advertisements by electrical and gas utilities today to see that free entreprise is working well.

Canada must continue to make progress in both conservation and oil substitution: let me make that very clear to the House and the people of Canada. In the residential sector, this past decade has seen the average consumption of energy per household decline by 16 per cent. It is estimated that there is another 30 per cent to go—a 30 per cent reduction in energy use for the average home from such readily available measures as comprehensive draught-proofing, basement insulation and efficiency improvements in heating systems. These future savings would provide good pay-backs for the householder in reduced heating costs and, for the country, total energy savings equivalent to a further 60,000 barrels of oil per day.

A further substantial amount of residential oil substitution will also make sense for the country and individual households. It will help preserve domestic supplies of oil; that is very important. The major alternative sources—natural gas and electricity—are in abundant domestic supply. Their increased use is supported not only by the federal Government but by the Governments of the provinces where the resources have been developed and whose industries and taxpayers benefit from their consumption. Wood has become another important alternative which will endure as a primary source of space heating in rural areas where supplies can still be obtained at low cost. Exciting new advances have been made in the efficiency of heating equipment, and this new technology is largely Canadian.

Conversion from oil will be practical and attractive for perhaps a further million homes in Canada. Even without a government grant it will offer savings in operating costs which justify the costs of converting. I think that is an important factor.

The over-all impact of COSP has been beneficial and it has obviously helped bring Canada closer to oil self-sufficiency. However, any massive intervention of this kind brings with it problems and distortions. We have heard that from all sectors. From the start there were areas of Canada where alternatives to oil did not provide cheaper home heating. It was no favour to home owners in these areas to encourage them to go off oil. By offering assistance only toward conversion, COSP discouraged the option of oil furnace retrofit in circumstances where it might make more sense than conversion. COSP has set up oil substitution in a kind of competition with conservation for attention and for the home owners' investment dollar, when home owners should be considering both actions as part of a planned approach to home energy management.

Much more can be done to foster such a total perspective to the household energy bill. It is up to suppliers and governments to provide better information on the full scope of conservation and off-oil measures, the sequence and timing for undertaking them, and the cost and savings involved. Conservation and conversion can be among the best household investments available, yielding savings in heating costs which can pay the investment back rapidly and go on providing savings year after year. They can be significant investments, amounting to several thousands of dollars for some home owners. In present circumstances there is no prospect that governments can afford grants or other incentives large enough to cover investments of this size or to pay for a share large enough to guarantee action by home owners.

Grants are not the answer in future, nor should they be necessary. Better alternatives are at hand. We can help ensure that householders, wherever they live in Canada, enjoy access to objective and comprehensive information on what to do about saving energy and how to do it. The more specific information can be made to individual household needs the better. We can continue to pursue solutions to technical problems, refine and expand work standards, and assist industry to improve insulation techniques and marketing. All these things can be done at far less expense than CHIP and COSP, and all of them can be done in co-operation with industry and provincial governments. This is being done now.

Surely this is the direction we should be taking—away from massive interventions and government hand-outs which can so easily prompt arbitrary decisions and invite abuse, toward better quality of work and better decisions by householders to reduce the use of energy. This is to what we are committed. I ask the House for its support of Bill C-24.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary for his applause. I hope he will listen intently to what I have to say and hang on to every word, so to speak.

I do not think there have been many programs offered by the federal Government which have been of more general help to low-income, unemployed and fixed-income Canadians than CHIP and COSP. They have been of tremendous benefit. These are two of what the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources refers to as direct action programs, and they are in four categories. The first is energy conservation, that is, CHIP. The second is development of renewable resources. The third is the development of alternative fuels; and the fourth is the off-oil substitution program or COSP.

I will say a little more later about the second and third ones, the development of renewable resources and the development of alternative fuels. However, I want to deal first with the two direct action programs and how they are affected by Bill C-24. These programs are aimed directly at the final consumer. In that regard it makes them very special programs. They are aimed at Canadian families and Canadian home owners. When we talk about cancelling programs such as these, we are talking about taking away direct money from the federal Government to the ordinary Canadian family in the ordinary Canadian home.

We have to look at the ramifications of that. What would be the ramifications? First I will refer to CHIP, grants to home owners who invest in residential energy conservation. It provides up to $500 for home owners who wish to invest in home energy conservation. That is extremely important. As of the summer of 1984 it assisted 1.5 million Canadian householders in making their homes more energy-efficient. In 1983 alone it resulted in a reduction in home heating costs of close to $500 million. It has been a tremendously successful program.

The other program, COSP, has been encouraging home owners to convert off oil. It is very important as well. Oil was once an extremely expensive fuel. It is still expensive but not as it once was. It has the potential to be every bit as expensive as it was during the dark days of the energy scare or to be much more expensive than it was then. More than 425,000 Canadian families have benefited from grants up to $800 since the program was introduced in 1980. It has resulted in a redirection of oil consumption of 10 million barrels per year. The number of households heated by oil declined from 42 per cent to 31 per cent in the three years before the summer of 1984.

These two programs along with the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, which was cut by 25 per cent on November 8 in the economic and fiscal statement, have formed the backbone of assistance to Canadian families through funding to households. I think the Government is missing the tremendous importance of these programs. This is extremely unfortunate both for Canadians and for the Government.

Let us look at the $500 which went to each family under COSP. We realize they were tremendous. Each home owner received those amounts under those two programs. It cannot be left there. The benefits of these two programs went well beyond the grants, mainly because the federal Government sponsored the programs. In this case, the Canadian Home Insulation Program and the Canadian Oil Substitution Program do not deal with members of boards of directors of the multinational oil companies. You are not dealing with people who work in the energy industry day in and day out; you are dealing with average Canadians who are concerned with what energy will cost them for their homes and automobiles in particular. This is tremendously important to keep in mind. They want to know how they can reduce their energy costs.

With a growing number of unemployed and a growing percentage of our people over the age of 65 on fixed incomes and the wage settlements in this country falling behind, it is becoming more important how people can redirect these energy costs to other tremendously important costs, such as rent, food and clothing for themselves and their children. That is tremendously important.

Look at this program other than just from the funding aspect. How was this program delivered? It was delivered by the federal Government with a tremendous amount of information. It provided information not only on the expense of oil, but on the cost of competing fuel sources. Most important, it supplied confidence to the Canadian consumer because the federal Government was involved in it. The federal Government provided brochures. It provided information and other sources. Very important, it provided a toll-free telephone inquiry service so that the average Canadian could call the federal Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and get information.

I do not think there are too many Members of this House who have not come in contact with Canadians who have taken advantage of this program. As Members of Parliament and before they became Members, there were a lot of problems that came into play. Most important were people trying to take advantage of this program. The Government required, for example, that furnaces be CSA approved. An awful lot of people came to me who said: "I bought this furnace from so-and-so because he assured me that it was a great furnace, and now I find that I cannot collect the $800". That is a tragic situation. The person literally could not afford to pay that $800.

That person went into the program on the strength of what he or she had read and the fact that the Government provided information. Their attention was drawn to it because they were going to get $800. What kind of attention is the ordinary Canadian going to give to literature that does not have that very important carrot of the $800? This is a devastating opportunity for the average Canadian to be taken advantage of with regard to oil and energy conservation now that the Government has backed out of these two very important programs.

What will happen? The Government says everything will be all right, that people will still be able to convert without these programs. Anybody can convert, if that is all there is to it. They are free to convert, but what will be their financial position? What will be their knowledge of the possibilities about which we have been giving information over the past seven and a half years with regard to the Canadian Home Insulation Program and the Canadian Oil Substitution Program? What will be the situation?

The Government says that the people of Canada are sophisticated and they know the options with regard to conservation. A lot of people do. The reason they know is because they took advantage of both these programs. Those who have not taken advantage of the programs do not have the same information. The people who have taken advantage of the programs have the information, but not those who have yet to take advantage of them. That is a tremendously important factor of which we must be cognizant.

The Minister said that both CHIP and COSP, the Canadian Home Insulation Program and the Canadian Oil Substitution Program, have served their purpose and are no longer needed to encourage people to become energy conscious. I do not agree with that. The facts do not indicate that. If any Ontario Members are interested, they can call Consumers Gas in Ontario and get the facts.

Between October 1, 1983 and February 28, 1984, 4,814 people took advantage of the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. Between October 1, 1984, and February 26, 1985, 17,912 applications have been received by Consumers Gas in Ontario. They have to try to put in these gas systems before March 31, 1985. Within one month they have to put in these systems. Of those 17,912 applications, 8,889 came in January alone. That is the highest number of applications that has ever come to Consumers Gas in Ontario in any one month period.

The Government says that people knew the program would end and that is why there is this rush. That is true to a certain extent. Word got around and that increased the number of applications. But these people are left hanging because of the way the Government is doing things. The Government has not taken into consideration very important factors. It has reduced the amount of the Canadian Home Insulation Program from 60 per cent to one-third as of January 1. That alone is damaging enough to low-income Canadians who cannot afford that difference. Now it is going to take away the whole program if a person did not make his application before November 8, 1984; or, if he made the application after November 8, if the system is in place before the end of March, 1985.

What have we done? Consumers Gas now has 50 to 55 crews working seven days a week trying to service these requests. They are trying to put gas lines in frozen ground covered by snow. If a deadline is going to be set, it should be set in the summer or fall when gas lines can be installed in unfrozen ground that is not covered by snow.

Not only that, during these months the suppliers of furnaces are not making furnaces. They are making air conditioners for the summer season. How are you going to get the gas furnaces that you need to service these applications? You cannot. A lot of the suppliers of furnaces have tried to retool and manufacture furnaces, but there is complete and utter confusion. They still have to make the air conditioners for the summer season. By putting this deadline at the end of March, it completely frustrates the gas suppliers and Canadian home owners who want to take advantage of these programs. Those who could get systems in the summer cannot get them now because of the difficulty in installing these systems at this time.

I would very seriously and strongly request that the Government extend the deadline for the Canadian Oil Substitution Program by six months. This will give people who now want it a chance to have the system put in. It will give the installers and suppliers of gas and equipment the chance to instal this equipment properly at a time of year when it can best be done. If the Government does not do this, it is just twigging the noses of Canadians. Obviously this matter has not been thought over by the Government. I think this is a tremendously tragic situation. There is going to be a very cruel April Fool's Day joke played on Canadians when they find out that they are not able to benefit from this program.

Letters are already being drafted by Consumers Gas. Consumers Gas has to be able to notify some of these people beforehand that it cannot possibly service these applications. What will the cry be from Canadians who wish to take advantage of this program when they receive a letter telling them they cannot possibly get this system because it cannot be installed by the end of March of this year? That will be a most unfortunate situation. I think the Government will be hearing a lot more about that from Canadian home owners.

The Government does not seem to be giving any consideration to the average Canadian or to the direction in which the country is going regarding energy policy. The Government has completely laid waste the alternate energy program and the concept of renewable fuels. The Government has laid off 540 people at Atomic Energy of Canada in Mississauga and Montreal and this will effectively mean the end of the Candu reactor program other than sales of reactors to possible clients of which the AECL already has knowledge. There will be no meaningful drive to recruit new markets for these Candu reactors because AECL has only 50 per cent of its staff. It lost 600 people in 1982 and now it is losing another 540.

Mr. McDermid: Your Government laid people off too.

Mr. MacLellan: Sure, we know who laid them off. I have a calendar. However, we must think of the industry.

This is an example of where the attention of the Government is directed. Before the layoffs in 1982 there were 177 managers for 2,500 employees at AECL. In 1985 there are 223 managers for 1,800 people. The workforce has declined by 600 people and the number of managers has risen by about 50. The consideration of the Government is not for the ordinary working Canadian at all but for the big brass in the Crown corporations.

I do not think that any aspect of energy funding suffered more than alternative energy. The entire Energy Division of the National Research Council is to be phased out as rapidly as contracts within industry will allow. Within the National Research Council's Energy Division, 61 person-years, of which two-thirds are professional and one-third are support staff, are involved. In about two years' time there will probably be only five people working in that division. Many of these people being laid off are professional people who have been with the National Research Council for 20 or 25 years.

Much of the alternate energy program is in jeopardy because the Government is saying that the private sector can take it on. The private sector cannot take it on because the private sector is comprised of about 500 small to medium-sized companies which do not have the capital to take on this program. What will happen to the program? It will disappear.

Where is the thinking for the future? I am not saying that we are experiencing an energy scare right now but for heaven's sake, we should take advantage of this time to look at the possibilities for the future. We should take the time to study and make sure that Canadians are well served by this Government. We should take the time to look at the other possibilities.

I can mention a few statistics. I think these are important not for the figures themselves but for the trend that they show. With regard to crude oil, Canada supplies about 1.2 per cent of the world's crude oil but it produces 2.6 per cent of the world's crude oil. The ratio of production to supply in terms of years is about 14 years. I admit that that does not take into consideration frontier oil which does not have a supply and delivery system, nor does it take into consideration the oil sands and heavy oils. As well, it does not take into consideration that other oil supplies will be found. At the same time, this should not give the Government the confidence that it can do away with the possibility of finding competing fuels for the future. We need about 50 years to implement an alternate fuel structure. We need about 50 years to do the work, the studying, the research and the testing. That is a long period of time. That is a tremendously important factor which the Government has disregarded.

The 1985-86 cuts at the National Research Council will mean a reduction of $20 million in contracts to the industry. Not only will this affect industry cash flow but it is estimated that it could result in a direct loss of about 1,000 jobs in the country. Small firms only have so much available capital. If they are faced with the need to do R and D at this time when interest rates are rising and if they are faced with choosing between doing R and D and dealing with the long-term financial feasibility of their businesses, what option will they take? They must look after the financial strength of their businesses. They cannot afford to take on an additional financial burden.

In addition, what about the possibilities of alternate energy systems for underdeveloped nations? Some countries in the world have to start thinking about the problems of underdeveloped nations. With the hunger that is being experienced in these countries, how can they continue to pay the price of oil indefinitely? We should be thinking about them. There are certain alternate energy systems that are adaptable to these countries and those that are not now adaptable will be adaptable within a few years if attention is paid to this program. However, we are completely ignoring this option.

As well, we in this country are going to lose very valuable technology. Without R and D, the experimentation will not be done in Canada but in other countries. We will fall drastically behind in our knowledge of these alternate fuels and the renewable resource aspect of energy.

The economic returns in the solar sector exist in the flat plate solar collection systems. This is an industry in which, prior to 1980, the majority of the small Canadian solar thermal market was served by imported equipment. As a result of the determined effort of the former Liberal Government, not only has a solar industry been created in Canada which supplies close to 100 per cent of its own growing domestic market, but this industry had export sales in 1984 of $6.8 million. That will be completely thrown away.

Mr. McDermid: Why?

Mr. MacLellan: Because the Government just does not care. It says it is trying to create jobs. It will lose more jobs through these cuts and it does not have any kind of programs designed to save jobs in the country. This industry has about 500 small and medium-sized companies, employs 9,000 people, and had sales in 1984 of $530 million; $30 million of which was in the export field.

• (1220)

I would like to return to the Canadian Oil Substitution Program and the Canadian Home Insulation Program. I think it will be tremendously difficult for Canadians to accept the scrapping of these programs. I do not think the Government has given proper consideration to the needs of Canadians. I do not think the Government understand that Canadians had a great deal of confidence in these programs and that that confidence went well beyond the grants which were issued. Once again, it is the low-income, the unemployed and the fixed-income Canadian who will suffer.

What is the reason? It is to reduce the deficit. There is no doubt that the deficit is a serious question, but why are these cuts taking place at the expense of the people? Action was taken almost immediately. It was the easiest thing the Government could do. It is a tremendously unfortunate situation because these are two programs which are delivered directly to the homes and the consumers of Canada.

Again, I would ask the Government to extend the Canadian Oil Substitution Program for a period of six months to allow the people of Canada who want to take advantage of the program to be able to do so. The program should be extended so that Canadians will not be hindered by the difficulties of tyring to instal equipment in the winter when the ground is frozen, and to allow them to buy furnaces at a time when furnaces are being produced in the summer and fall, not at a time when air conditioners are being produced by the suppliers. I think the extension of this program is extremely important.

The Government says that Canadians will be able to conserve without these programs. I believe the Government will create a lot of problems as a result of the scrapping of these programs. In taking away these programs, and in reducing RRAP, the Government will find that there will be a very severe backlash. It is tragic because it did not have to happen. The Government should have given attention to cuts which would not affect the Canadians who are in most need of assistance.

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of being the first speaker on this Bill for the New Democratic Party. At the outset I would like to make our position clear. I regard Bill C-24 as being a short-sighted, ill-advised and unfair piece of legislation. In exploring the Bill and its implications, in considering what these programs have meant to Canadians in the past and what the continuation of these programs could mean for the future, I want to demonstrate why I think it is a mistake for us to consider the passage of Bill C-24.

In a couple of short pages the Bill proposes the early termination of two energy conservation programs. The Canadian Home Insulation Program was established in 1977 and it was expected to run until the end of 1987. However, it will now be ended a year and nine months early, on March 31, 1986.

The Canadian Oil Substitution Program was established in 1980, although the legislation did not pass until 1981, and it was expected to run until the end of the decade. That program will now terminate on March 31, 1985, which will be five years and nine months early. Indeed, for COSP that is a very early termination. The Parliamentary Secretary indicated earlier that that program was of very real importance to Canadians. In my later comments I want to question whether the hopes which have been placed on the continuation of industries that have been encouraged by these programs will be justified.

I would like to examine these programs. First, I would like to talk about CHIP, which was established in 1977. CHIP was to pay 60 per cent of the eligible costs of labour and materials involved in insulating or draught-proofing homes, up to a maximum grant of $500. Of course, the eligible homes were those which were constructed prior to September 1, 1977. Under government policy, the grants which are now available have already been reduced. In the past the reimbursement was up to 60 per cent, but because of a change in regulation which was made by this Government and not debated in the House, the grant was reduced to a reimbursement of only 33⅓ per cent, although the maximum grant of $500 will remain. Applicants who registered for the program before December 31, and who complete the work by the end of March, will receive 60 per cent, and the lower rate will go into effect for the short period which remains after that date.

The Parliamentary Secretary commented on the positive evaluation which CHIP received from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would like to comment on that positive evaluation. Originally, the program had very ambitious goals set for it. There was the hope of reducing by a full 30 per cent the consumption of energy used for space heating of existing dwellings in Canada, as well as the goal of upgrading the housing stock of the country by 70 per cent. In fact, the target which was set for CHIP was to improve the insulation of 4.9 million residences in Canada. The evaluation which the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources carried out indicated that the first goal had been unrealistic. Hoping to reduce heat consumption by 30 per cent could not be achieved, although it is significant that energy consumption for these purposes has been reduced by 17 per cent in the homes which were insulated with the help of CHIP. Of course, the result has been a significant saving to those Canadians who participated in the program.

The Parliamentary Secretary has stated that it is a good investment. The key point is whether people will continue to make this investment without encouragement from the Government. I am by no means as certain as the Parliamentary Secretary is on that point. There is a substantial reduction, although the reduction did not meet the targeted reduction for energy consumption.

What about the other target, the goal of reaching 4.9 million residences by 1987? It is significant to note that by the end of 1984—which is over halfway through the tenure of the program—approximately 2.5 million homes had taken advantage of CHIP. Given that the program is being axed at an early date, that particular goal of having 4.9 million Canadian homes better insulated will not be achieved. But the program was moving along not too far below the target which was set.

It is very significant to appreciate, as against the argument which some Hon. Members have made, that it is middle and upper-income Canadians who were the prime beneficiaries of this program. They were persons who could in fact come up with the money to carry it through and to reap the savings in fuel consumption. The evaluation by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources contradicted that particular assessment of the situation because in fact 24.3 per cent of the CHIP dollars went to 21.1 per cent of eligible home owners who were earning less than $15,000 annually. One could say, therefore, that there was quite appropriately a somewhat more than proportionate use of the program by home owners who had quite limited incomes and were hard pressed in their household budgets from week to week. They were able to take advantage of the program and make good use of it.

Mr. McDermid: That was five years ago.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Over the length of the program, not just five years ago.

Mr. McDermid: If it was the survey you were talking about, it was done five years ago.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): A further question which faces us on this issue, Mr. Speaker, is whether in fact the private sector will continue with this program once the encouragement of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has been removed. The evaluation which was carried out at the time suggested that that was not going to be the case. Over the period from 1977 to 1982, 43 per cent of all the retrofitting of homes which was being done was carried out under the CHIP program. It was stated by those persons surveyed that almost two-thirds of the insulating activities which CHIP encouraged would not in fact have occurred had the program not been in place, which means that only 35 per cent of those Canadians who took advantage of insulating programs for their homes would in fact have done so if there had been no CHIP program.

That particular fact leaves one intensely suspicious and anxious about the assertions made by the Parliamentary Secretary on behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) about the way in which Canadian home owners and the private sector will carry on without this program. No fewer than 37 per cent of those who took advantage of the CHIP program said that they would not in fact have insulated their homes if the program had not existed. Of course, that meant that 75 per cent of all dollars spent by CHIP users would not have been spent without the program. All of this, of course, relates to an encouragement to industry and to the creation of employment in this country which is of significance to us.

Before I get to those particular consequences of the program, I would like to say something about the Canadian Oil Substitution Program, which is being ended very early in the program, this spring, according to the Government. I should say precisely that it will finish before the end of this winter. The program has been in operation only five years. It had an expected life of a decade but here we have an obviously shortsighted termination of the program.

The program was designed, as has been recognized by others, to provide financial assistance for the conversion of heating systems in residences and commercial and industrial buildings. It was designed to encourage conversion from oil to various types of heating, whether natural gas, electricity, propane, wood, wind, or solar power. Among those possibilities, of course, one can readily select natural gas. On a relatively short time frame it is a sensible choice for many people and certainly in my constituency the conversion to natural gas has been a popular decision. Conversion to electricity is perhaps a good choice in some circumstances, although as we reach the end of our hydro resource possibilities and as we become, particularly in the Province of Ontario, so dependent on nuclear power, I am much more equivocal about that particular option.

The possibility of moving to solar energy, as far as wood is concerned, there as well one hesitates. If this is scrub wood and not merchandiseable wood we are talking about, I suppose one might not hesitate, although our concern about forests suggests that we should be somewhat hesitant about conversion to wood. The possibility of wind and solar energy is a very important possibility. The lack of encouragement in these areas, combined with the decision of the Government to reduce research at a time when solar power, at least in the United States, is becoming competitive with all the other possibilities, is particularly to be lamented and fits in all too well with the early termination of the Canadian Oil Substitution Program in Bill C-24.

In considering the nature of this program, we have to recognize that its original goal was to reduce the use of oil by residential, commercial and industrial users to 10 per cent of the energy consumption in Canada. In order to do that, when the program was established it was projected that more than two million conversions of heating systems would have to occur. At the time, in fact, the home heating sector was dependent by 37 per cent on oil in Canada.

The COSP program has had a good deal of success in meeting this goal even in the first five years of its operation. According to departmental figures, the target of 1,981,300 residential units for the decade has been covered by about one-half. To date, 925,600 units have been converted and the plan to convert over one million units before the plan ends seems quite possible, particularly given the rush which has happened over the last month. About half of the decade target has been achieved at the midpoint. That is quite in line with the original projections of the plan and significantly reduces the consumption of crude oil for heating purposes in Canada.

Since Canada is a consumer of 1.45 million barrels of oil a day, a reduction of 42,000 barrels—15.3 million barrels per year, thanks to the COSP program—is an energy saving of 2.8 per cent which can be directly attributed to the program. Of course, if the program were to be continued, there would be some substantial reduction in the use of crude oil in residences, and for commercial and industrial heating. That is a significant saving from a program which has enormous significance at a time when not just Canadians but all of us around the globe have the best of reasons to be concerned about energy resources.

It might be noted, of course, that the COSP program was very efficiently administered and certainly does not raise any concerns on that score. Since the program began, $549 million has been distributed in grants. A portion of that, no mean portion, came back in taxes. As a result, the program, over very close to half of its life, has cost the Canadian taxpayer about $420 million. Administrative costs have been about $5 million annually. This means most of the expenditure has gone to home owners and then to industry.

That, of course, is closely related to the question of employment which I think is not to be ignored in considering the significance of these programs. It is particularly because of that that this is shortsighted action. The Parliamentary Secretary's observations about the importance of energy conversion and the value of these programs, together with the pious hopes he expresses that the private sector will pick this up and continue it after the Government has axed these programs, suggests to me that while the Government was desperately looking around for ways to meet its ideological commitment to deficit reduction last October and November and looked to this program as one means of doing so, it was expressing the ideological conviction that the deficit had to be reduced. It quite lost sight of the fact that if we are doing constructive things in the country, if we are making investments which save energy, and the Canadian Government is involved in reducing the cost of imported crude oil, it is perfectly legitimate to do that with borrowed money. But a Government which has this ideological commitment to reducing expenditure by any means will undertake just the kind of shortsighted action we see here.

I want to explore briefly the question of job creation because that is of enormous importance to us. The present Government and its leader campaigned on jobs, jobs, jobs, and then became involved with deficit reduction to create confidence in the pious hope that would lead to employment somewhere down the road. Here we have programs which were effective in creating employment. Between 1977 and 1980 the CHIP program created 44,150 person-years of employment. Every million dollars spent under CHIP produced 53 person-years of employment. However, the expenditure of $1 million in funds under CHIP actually created 108 person-years of employment because of the private expenditures it encouraged. That works out to $9,260 a year of Government expenditures for each year of employment. That is quite comparable with employment costs in other areas and suggests that in the CHIP program we have a perfectly good means of creating employment in the country. Always recognizing, of course, that the point of the program was not first of all employment of Canadians but, rather, energy conservation and cost reduction for consumers and taxpayers.

Under COSP we see very similar things. We find that for every million dollars spent on the Canadian Oil Substitution Program we have 30.5 person-years of employment created. Between 1981 and 1985 some 16,750 person-years of employment were created. If you add the home owner contribution, the total employment creation reaches 50,250 person-years. Again, no mean figure. It is interesting to note that the CHIP program has been stronger for Canadian employment because it was largely based on domestic production of insulation, whereas the COSP program tended to produce a fair measure of imports. As a result, there was no substantial effect on employment in Canada resulting from those public expenditures. If one draws that kind of a distinction, then the CHIP program was clearly preferable.

On the other hand, if you look at the extent to which CHIP and COSP expenditures produced spending by Canadians, for every dollar the Government contributed under CHIP, an additional 80 cents of expenditure by home owners was created, whereas under COSP, $1 of Government expenditure produced $2 of private expenditure. So on that particular score there was an advantage on the side of the COSP program.

What we have seen, then, in CHIP and COSP, is significant activity in energy conservation for Canadians and significant generation of employment all across the country, particularly in areas of slower economic activity. The CHIP program is obviously of very great interest to people in the Atlantic Provinces where heating costs run so very high. In this public encouragement of investment we see dramatically the way in which government can create employment. It is that kind of real investment which needs to be underscored. To axe these programs as the Government has done so early in its mandate, before it has had adequate time to consider the whole matter, suggests quite a false understanding of the program. In fact, I think there is a division in the Conservative Party on these things which one can illustrate quite nicely in terms of an older wisdom and perhaps newer ideology creeping in.

The COSP Bill came before the House in 1981. Speaking for the Conservatives was the Hon. Member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). He has a venerable place in the formulation of national development programs for the Conservative Party in years past and for the Government particularly between 1957 and 1963. What did this Member have to say about COSP? Speaking on June 30, 1981, as reported at page 11099 of Hansard, he said:

> I do not think there is any question that the House in general understands and supports the purpose of the oil substitution program—
> It is a good philosophy to get as many people in the low technology systems as possible to move away from the consumption of oil.
> It is particularly good, if the alternative is cheaper not only than the present price of oil but the future price as well.

At the end of his comments he added:

> I want to conclude by congratulating the minister again for bringing this legislation forward . . . I hope he will consider the suggestion that I have made to improve the legislation and make it available to all Canadians. If so, we could achieve this conversion from oil to other energies more rapidly than this bill can by itself.

That is an example of good sense prevailing, free of the kind of ideological convictions and pious hopes which characterize the economic policies of the present Government.

What do we have in contrast to that? When the House was barely in session back in November and the fiscal and economic statement had not even been presented, the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) said the following:

> Mr. Speaker, under the National Energy Program there are in existence two expensive and, in my view, totally redundant programs which represent a serious drain on the treasury and in reality are a transfer from government to the relatively affluent.

I might say that the information on the CHIP program contradicts that kind of judgment. It was not only the relatively affluent but all Canadians who took advantage of the CHIP program. He said that he was speaking about COSP and CHIP. In his concluding observations on November 7 he said:

> All forms of energy in Canada, Mr. Speaker, are now in surplus. World oil prices are falling, and producers are being directed not to produce. Indeed, they are being pro-rated. Why then spill out literally millions of taxpayers' dollars to those well enough off to own their own homes in order to encourage them to do what they ought to have done in the first place, to insulate; or to bribe them to buy new furnaces, heat pumps, and such devices. Surely there can be no justification for these programs.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there are good justifications for those programs. The most incredibly shortsighted thing for anyone to assert is that out of this short-term surplus of natural gas and crude oil around the world there is any basis for drawing optimistic conclusions. At the moment, due to a serious world recession from which very few parts of the world have dramatically recovered, consumption is down and OPEC finds itself under pressure to control output in order to keep its prices up. Surely there is no basis there for any kind of optimism about the 1990s and the twenty-first century. It is incredibly shortsighted for anyone to forget the fact that oil and natural gas will disappear one of these days.

As one particular gadfly in the industry suggested before a committee not many days ago, we may in fact face oil and gas rationing within the next decade, particularly with crude oil. The declines in production which are likely to come, even in the Middle East, make it incredibly stupid to end the Canadian Oil Substitution Program in the middle of the 1980s and to not take advantage of every opportunity to reduce our consumption of oil in the country which serves so many purposes other than home heating. We should ensure that we have as much crude oil as possible as a petrochemical feed stock for the driving of vehicles.

I would like to speak about a particular aspect of the early termination of the Canadian Oil Substitution Program which applies to my constituents in Thunder Bay-Nipigon as well as to many people in northern Canada. Winter conditions in Canada present a problem in trying to act on this program by March 31. Gas service cannot be installed in the north during the winter months, primarily because the ground is frozen. Many contracts entered into after the November 8 announcement of the program's termination cannot be completed by the deadline of March 31. This restriction effectively precludes many northerners from taking advantage of the program during the last five months of its effect.

I have written the Minister about that expressing concern and asking for a possible extension. I listened with care to the Parliamentary Secretary when he was responding to my and other communications on this issue. I gathered that the answer was negative. That is simply not satisfactory to my constituents, particularly if the concern is only to avoid an outflow and to somewhat reduce the deficit on the budget. I do not accept that answer. I will continue to exert pressure on this matter.

My main concern, Mr. Speaker, is that the Government's cancellation of COSP is done with openness and forthrightness. I would not like to think that the March cut-off date was set with knowledge of the restriction it represents for northerners. If such knowledge was present, I would suggest that the Government has been dishonest with Canadians in the north who are especially disadvantaged by high and increasing energy costs. The Minister must respond sensitively and favourably to the needs of people in northern Ontario who cannot act by doing what applicants in southern Ontario and the lower mainland in British Columbia are doing. They have been flooding Consumers Gas and B.C. Hydro with applications on which work can go ahead. There is not any possibility of installation of natural gas lines in northern Ontario until next June. The Parliamentary Secretary may have some information for me which I trust will be favourable. However, in the meantime my constituents have been approaching me with the problem they face. That is part of the unfairness of the early deadline in Bill C-24.

We had two programs which were of very great value in advancing energy conservation in the country. They produced potential reduction in costs for individual Canadians. That may still encourage some Canadians to go ahead with these endeavours aside from the program. The fact that CHIP in particular was taken advantage of by lower income home owners makes very questionable the possibility that these endeavours will continue once the program is ended.

The Minister was desperate to realize savings in her area, as practically all Ministers were expected to do. She settled on programs that were of value for energy conservation, efficiency, strengthening our country, and safeguarding the lives of people around the globe in the twenty-first century.

Mr. McDermid: Check the new Estimates.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): The programs were of enormous value for those purposes. This early termination was a mistake. The Parliamentary Secretary tells me to check the Estimates. That suggests to me some second thoughts about this whole program. I do not want second thoughts of that sort. We want this Bill withdrawn or defeated so that the programs can continue and we can press on with the work of energy conservation to ensure that Canada can be world class in this area as well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TWIN-TRACKING IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the whole afternoon was taken up with an important issue that affects fishermen and the lives of our native people in the Fraser River Valley. We debated the unanimous motion which was passed by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry recommending to the House of Commons that there be a one-year postponement of the CN twin-tracking project while the social and environmental impact on the 36 Indian bands most affected by this project are assessed, and that the economic justification for the CN twin-tracking be made available to the Alliance of Tribal Councils and others.

During the debate the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) expressed sympathy for, if not agreement with, the committee's motion. It was also noted that the final decision rests with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) who has the authority to sign the necessary Order in Council.

Tomorrow, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) is expected to be in British Columbia to meet with the affected Indian communities in light of these developments. As a member of the standing committee, I urge the Minister of Transport to accept the unanimous request by the members of the Fisheries and Forestry Committee that the project be suspended for one year to allow the native people, the fishermen, and all other parties, to have their concern made known and taken into account before the final decision is made.

ADMINISTRATION

PERFORMANCE OF MINISTERIAL MEMBERS OF QUEBEC

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, for days and even weeks, the Liberal Opposition has been baiting Government Members from Quebec about their so-called silence in this House.

Mr. Speaker, Quebec Conservative Members certainly do not have to be told how to behave by the Liberal Members from Quebec in this House. Today I want to ask the Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre), the Hon. Member for Montréal-Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) and the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) where they were in 1982, when their Government unilaterally patriated the Constitution without seeking Quebec's agreement, when only the Right Hon. Joe Clark and the Hon. Roch La Salle were truly defending the interests of Quebecers. Where were they when Pétromont's request for $15 million was turned down? Where were they when their Government wanted to pass Bill S-31, the purpose of which was to abolish the Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec? They were, as usual, either hiding under the rug or following their shepherd like 74 sheep.

Mr. Speaker, we really do not need the Liberals to tell us how to behave, and I think the performance of our Members in this House is remarkable, compared with that of our predecessors.

FORESTRY

FEDERAL FUNDING FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, during the election campaign Progressive Conservatives convinced many voters in British Columbia and across Canada that forestry was high on their agenda for federal funds. An amount of $200 million per year was promised for B.C. and, to date, no Conservative has denied that pledge. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised a full Cabinet position and a Ministry of Forests. We have only a Minister of State hidden away in Agriculture Canada, with a budget that is 15 per cent smaller than that given by Pierre Trudeau. Pierre Trudeau even offered $60 million to British Columbia for reforestation last year.

Now we find the Conservatives in collusion with Bill Bennett, offering at most $30 million in federal dollars per year for British Columbia. That soon may be slashed to $15 million. At least $300 million per year must be spent to replant the 600,000 hectares of good and medium backlog in British Columbia. These sites are close to our mills and communities and will return over 10 per cent value of investment per year, according to Canadian Forest Service estimates.

British Columbians are not amused that the promises of last September have been watered down from $200 million to $30 million per year, and perhaps now to $15 million per year. Our forests are our future and the jobs of our children. The public has been sadly misled by many Progressive Conservatives on their promised support for forestry in Canada.

ADMINISTRATION

THE NEW GOVERNMENT

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, the last survivors, the last 40 Members of an organization that is about to become extinct, have been crying out about the performance of Progressive Conservative Members in this House. This is the ultimate hypocrisy, Mr. Speaker. On September 4, the Canadian people made it very clear what they thought of the performance of the Liberal Members.

S.O. 21

Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to this House that our 211 Progressive Conservative Members have become very active participants in the business of Parliament, by their speeches and various debates on legislation, through their participation in the various standing committees of the House, and their activities in the national and regional caucuses and the subject caucus where they help evaluate Government programs.

Finally, and this is very important, Mr. Speaker, while 74 wishy-washy Members from Quebec had practically made people forget Canada as a nation by their intellectual absence from Ottawa and their physical absence from their ridings, Progressive Conservative Members are present in their ridings and through them, Canada is again becoming visible to and appreciated by all Canadians. Through that presence, Mr. Speaker, Progressive Conservative Members are going to remove any doubts as to the existence of a Canada A mari usque ad mare.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ELIGIBILITY OF SINGLE PERSONS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montréal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to answer back—

An Hon. Member: Where were you 20 years ago?

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, Conservative Members think this is the mutual admiration period.

Mr. Speaker, this House is the forum for expressing our views and defending people.

Speaking on a much more serious note, several months ago, I took it upon myself to inform and convince various groups from all across the country of the need to stop this Conservative Government's continuing discrimination against single persons aged 60 to 64.

Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Hon. Members to please listen—

Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention here some of the groups who supported the suggestion I made to the Prime Minister that he extend the provision to all single persons in need, without discriminating against those who are single, separated or divorced. They are: the Association québécoise pour la défense des droits des retraités et des pré-retraités; FADOQ, the Fédération des clubs de l'Age d'or du Québec; the Fédération des familles monoparentales du Québec; the Fredericton Voice of Women, in New Brunswick; the YMCA of Halifax, Nova Scotia; the Saskatchewan Woman Institute; the Widow Talk Association of Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario; the Business and Professional Women's Club, Summerside, Ontario; the Mature Women's Support Network, Vancouver, British Columbia—

S.O. 21

Mr. Speaker: Order, please! I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

DOMTAR RELATED INVESTMENT—QUEBEC

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, encouragement and strong support is needed with respect to the proposed $1.2 billion investment by Domtar in the Eastern Townships, because it is essential to the long-term survival of the mill, essential if it is to be competitive on international markets, and essential to better the company's productivity and competitiveness. It is essential as well to the survival of the town of Windsor, essential to my riding's wood producers who supply the company and to the economy of the Eastern Townships and Quebec as a whole.

Along with my Liberal colleagues in the House today, I am glad to see that the company management, the provincial authorities and our Government are getting together to see what must be done to make sure that this investment becomes reality.

The outcome of the last election shows that this is the way Canadians want their country to be administered. They look askance at irresponsible promises which might spell national bankruptcy and they are unfavourably impressed by the approach taken in recent days by some Liberal Members who bleat openly like lost sheep without a leader. It is through consultation with the various parties and serious consideration of all possible avenues—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to inform the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

IMMIGRATION

FAMILY REUNIFICATION—EFFECT OF NEW REGULATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, given the large number of immigrants who have come to Canada in recent years, it is not surprising that there has been an increasing number of applications for permission to bring family members to Canada. Most Canadians favour the principle of family reunification. However, recently the Department of Employment and Immigration increased the income required by landed immigrants to bring relatives to Canada. In some cases the annual income required now ranges between $26,000 and $30,000, an income which many landed immigrants, and indeed most Canadians, have not achieved.

Spokesmen for immigrant groups have expressed their dismay and dissatisfaction with the new income levels established by the Department, and have made it clear that these will have very serious adverse effects on family reunification.

In Winnipeg, in the last three months, 87 of 558 requests to bring family members to Canada were refused because the sponsors did not earn enough money. Similar situations exist in most other cities in Canada, including Montreal, Toronto, and Vancouver. I call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) to review personally the income increase imposed by her Department which is causing so much grief to new Canadians.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the least that can be said for them is that the Hon. Members opposite have not lost their voices.

In my opinion, when a tame member of the Quebec Liberal caucus has the audacity to become indignant about the decision of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens), he shows once again how badly he understands Canadian politics.

When the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) speaks about weaknesses, inertia and indifference in the Progressive Conservative Party and recalls the initiatives of his own Party, he is maliciously misleading the people of Canada and of Quebec about the sad facts which this Government must face.

If this Progressive Conservative Government cannot meet the request of the Domtar company, it is precisely because of the indifference and the wasteful spending of the previous Liberal Government; we are therefore to deal with a record deficit which leaves us without any freedom of movement.

Mr. Speaker, the Quebec caucus will always support the Prime Minister in promoting a reasonable approach and a dialogue with the main participants—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please! I regret to inform the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, people from across Canada have been calling my office accusing the Government of being a Government of destruction. This Government has no respect whatsoever for the Canadian people. Someone from the Tory ranks should advise the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) that he has not been elected President of the United States and that our system is not the American one. It is time for the Prime Minister to stop acting as if he were the President.

This man, who accused the previous Government of every sin under the sun, then turned around and increased the operation budget of his office by 57 percent and increased his staff by 31 per cent. He preaches restraint to the Canadian people, and hands over a ridiculous increase to senior citizens. This is the man who says he is proud of Canadians, and then turns around in Fortune magazine and dumps all over the people and businessmen of the country. This is sickening. The Prime Minister should apologize to the workers of Canada, Canadian businesses, and Canadian people for his disgraceful performance.

LEVEL OF FARM INCOME

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is important for obvious reasons that we do everything possible to maintain a healthy primary agriculture industry. Having said that, I cannot for the life of me understand why anyone stays in farming, or would take up farming for a living. As a former country veterinarian for many years, I know of what I speak. Farming is not only a seven days a week job, but there is very little return or profit to be made.

Last year net farm income was $3.8 billion. The number of farmers in Canada is estimated at 350,000, which averages out to less than $11,000 per farmer, well below the poverty line. Since 1981 the return on assets has been negative due to the cost price squeeze and a decline in the value of farm assets.

While interest rates have dropped they are still too high, and will likely remain high because of our massive debt. Right now farmers collectively have a $20 billion debt burden which is soaking up 17 per cent of farm operating expenses. Many farmers have declared bankruptcy, and thousands more are in dire financial straits.

We can no longer cound on band-aid solutions to the problems of agriculture. Future action has to be carefully planned and executed to have lasting long-term effects. It is my hope that actions taken by the Government so far, as well as future actions, will restore a renewed hope, greater confidence, and viability to agriculture and its producers. It is imperative that we get behind our farmers 100 per cent. If we do not, all of us will be in deep trouble. We can do without a lot of things in this world—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HAVE-NOT REGIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

First I wish to congratulate him on enhancing Canada's image in the Caribbean, and more recently, in Jamaica. But let us get back to what is happening in Canada.

Recent events, especially in the Domtar affair, have shown that the Government's current policy does not altogether favour regional economic development.

The main estimates tabled by his colleague have shown a substantial reduction of $112 million in aid to less advantaged regions.

My question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister is as follows: Is the Prime Minister telling our less advantaged regions that they can ask for Ottawa's help to set up beaneries but if they have any big projects like Domtar that would create thousands of jobs, they should not count on Ottawa?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my Right Hon. friend was wrong in his reference to beaneries, because like other governments, we have made investments each worth several million dollars and hundreds of thousands of dollars, which have had a very positive impact on regions in Quebec and elsewhere.

As far as Domtar is concerned, the Leader of the Opposition and his fellow Members are asking us, and rightly so, to act with caution in order to bring down the federal deficit. My Hon. friend knows perfectly well how the previous Government's legacy has affected Canada. He has spoken on the subject at length, and he is right.

That being said, it is extremely difficult for the Government to consider requests that would have a federal Treasury that is well nigh bare inject $100 million into a project for a Quebec company that is in very good shape financially and which has a very sound and impressive record.

That is more or less why we have taken the position that in the circumstances, we cannot go ahead and write a cheque for $100 million.

That being said, I may add that we are having talks with Domtar, and I hope to discuss the matter further with the Premier of Quebec next week, and we shall probably be getting some interesting proposals either from the Government or the company about ways in which we could help the Eastern Townships and Quebec realize this important project.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my problem here is to try to ascertain what is the position of the Government. I have listened to the Prime Minister. He has said that he is reopening a dossier in response to his caucus from Quebec yesterday, but a day earlier his Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion said, and I quote him, "the Government has decided not to provide financial assistance for new plant establishment or expansion of capacity in the forest products industry". That is his release. If that is not bad enough, the Minister of State for Forestry said yesterday that he didn't know what was going on. I use his words: "I'm surprised. I don't understand that". I think the Prime Minister could understand in the circumstances that we would appreciate a statement from him on what the policy of the Government really is.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my right hon. friend asks a legitimate question. What can the policy of a Government be when it has inherited a $35 billion deficit from its predecessors? What can the policy be?

For example, on Monday—and I say this with no malice—we receive requests from the BCNI, from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and from the finance critic of the Opposition, with good reason, saying: "Please cut your deficit", and on Tuesday somebody walks in and says: "Write a blank cheque for $100 million". I think my right hon. friend would agree that that would be difficult to accommodate no matter how legitimate the objective.

We have said that we will not grant a $100-million blank cheque out of borrowed money. The Government of Canada would have to borrow that money. We are already borrowing to pay the interest on the debt we were left. The Government of Canada would have to borrow the $100 million to give it to a private company. While the financial posture of the Government is, unfortunately, not such as to enable us to do that, we will be meeting with the company to see if we cannot be helpful in a job-creation project which is of value to the Eastern Townships and the people of Quebec and Canada.

FORESTRY

NEGOTIATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA AGREEMENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question again relates to forestry. I am not getting very far in trying to get any precision from the Prime Minister as it relates to Quebec. I would like to turn to the forestry situation in British Columbia.

There are reports out of Victoria indicating that the federal Government intends to propose to the Government of British Columbia a ten-year rather than a five-year agreement for the $300 million. In my view, this does not meet the approval of the people of British Columbia nor of the Government of British Columbia. Indeed, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, while in Vancouver yesterday, expressed dissatisfaction with this arrangement. In light of the contradictory expressions made by members of the Government, will the Prime Minister tell us what his position is with respect to the forestry agreement with the Province of British Columbia?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what we will try to do in British Columbia is what we attempted to do in Newfoundland, and that is to conclude an agreement, something that apparently escaped the capabilities of the previous Government. We are going to be as fair to the people of British Columbia in regard to the forestry commitment as we were to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador in regard to offshore oil. I know my friend would agree with that.

MAIN ESTIMATES

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has spoken of the financial posture of the Government and of the issue of fiscal restraint. Everyone in Canada, and certainly most Members of the House, including Tory back-benchers, must be asking themselves why the Prime Minister is writing himself a blank cheque for an additional $2 million to cover expenses in his own office. I know it is a tiny amount in the view of the Prime Minister, but it works out to approximately $8,000 to $10,000 for every working day, or $1,000 per hour as we sit here during Question Period. We have not had an explanation of what these additional 30 people are going to be doing. Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, you will recall—

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Johnston: The question is this, Mr. Speaker. We know by looking at the Estimates that this expenditure is not because of the disappearance of the central agencies. What in God's name are these 30 political aides going to be doing? Will the Prime Minister at least guarantee that no more aides will be taken on by way of contract and that the limit will be 120?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I acknowledged in regard to this matter that it was our intention to reduce that number, and in point of fact it has already been reduced from that which it was on the day of the printing of the Estimates. Having said that, I acknowledge that there are 120 people in the Prime Minister's Office. By way of comparison, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry, when he was Minister of Transport, had 85 people on his payroll, and he was only pretending to be Prime Minister.

ESTIMATES FOR 1986-87

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that we are really interested in what other people have done.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: Yesterday it was Mr. Pearson and Mr. Trudeau. It will be R. B. Bennett and Mackenzie King tomorrow. The people of Canada are interested in seeing what kind of an example this Prime Minister will set. He told us that this increase would be temporary. He has already indicated today that there has been some slight reduction. If it is to be temporary, could we please see the spending plans of the Prime Minister's Office for next year? Interestingly enough, those spending plans were not published with these Estimates as they were in our Estimates. Could we have those plans for the year 1986-87 tabled in the House, so that we can all satisfy ourselves that this increase is indeed temporary?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to see that the finance critic, the Hon. Member for Westmount—

Mr. Johnston: Saint-Henri-Westmount.

Mr. Mulroney: The Hon. Member for Saint-Henri-Westmount—have you decided which area you live in yet?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: It has to be Westmount because the people of Saint-Henri did not vote for you. We won every poll in Saint-Henri, but we lost the top of the mountain.

An Hon. Member: In the big houses.

Mr. Mulroney: That is right. I was right there next to the family of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: With great respect, the remarks of the frontbenchers are getting longer and longer today. I wonder if we could all agree to shorten it up.

Mr. Mulroney: I will be happy to provide the information to my hon. friend as best I can. We will provide the information just as quickly as it becomes available.

BANK OF CANADA

INTEREST RATE INCREASE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I have just learned that the Bank of Canada announced another major increase in the bank rate of more than one-half of a percentage point. This is the fifth week in a row in which interest rates have risen. It has been estimated that, for each full percentage point increase in the interest rate, we lose 25,000 jobs. That means that in the last five weeks 50,000 jobs have been negatively affected because the Government continues to pursue the same old Liberal high interest rate policy. Why is the Government pursuing this high interest rate policy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are not following the same policies as the previous Government. Many commentators have indicated that we are not doing so and that they support the approach that we have taken.

Mr. Broadbent: Which commentators? Leave Bouey out of this.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Let me remind the Hon. Member again that we are in a very, very unusual situation here with the extremely strong performance of the United States dollar. If I could, I would like to read two sentences from a press release that was issued by the Bank of Canada about 20 minutes ago. They read as follows:

> To attempt to avoid any decline in the exchange rate in this period would have required very much higher interest rates. To attempt to suppress any rise in interest rates would have led to an intolerable fall in the Canadian dollar.

What we and the Bank of Canada are trying to do is to follow a balanced policy in order to try to inject a degree of stability and confidence into the market so that we can, in due course, get interest rates down from these levels to the point at which I think both of us agree they should be.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister sat on this side of the House, he used to hear Marc Lalonde say the same thing as the Minister said this afternoon. We now have Liberals in blue suits on the other side of the House. That is the only difference.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Since the Minister's boss, the Prime Minister, said during the summer that if he had to choose—

Mr. Dingwall: Is that a Coppertone tan, Ed?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member is entitled to put his question. Order, please. All Members putting questions are entitled to be heard.

Mr. Broadbent: Obviously the Liberals are a little sensitive about these things, Mr. Speaker.

During the summer, in the context of an election, the Prime Minister said that if he had to choose between a dropping dollar and increasing interest rates, he would accept the dropping dollar. I would ask the Minister of Finance, if it made sense to have that policy during the summer, and we believe it did, what is the difference between now and then? Is the only difference the fact that members of the Conservative Party are now on that side of the House? Why does the Government not pursue a consistent policy and keep interest rates down?

● (1430)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Hon. Member has the appropriate amount of understanding of what is going on in the exchange markets today, or else he would not have asked the question. We have not seen in history the type of exchange markets that we have had in the last three weeks. That is a significantly different point which I think the Hon. Member must take into account. We are trying very hard to develop a balance wherein some of the pressure will be on the exchange rates and some of the pressure will be on interest rates. I think the commentators who are watching this are saying that the balance which we have struck is very appropriate.

EFFECT OF INTEREST RATES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, they are the same commentators and the same experts who said the same thing about Marc Lalonde when he was Minister of Finance. He, too, was pursuing their policy.

Since the high interest rate policy is affecting farmers, who are in one of the worst debt crisis situations they have been in for years, and since it negatively affects exporters in forestry products—

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What is that again? The low dollar affects—

Mr. Broadbent: No, we are talking about interest rates.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Could the Member please put his question, and could others let the Member put his question?

Mr. Broadbent: The Minister of Finance will understand clearly that since the low dollar positively affects farmers with the export of grain, forestry workers with the export of forest products, automotive workers and steel workers, and since it would positively affect almost everyone who is looking for a job in Canada, why does the Minister not let the dollar seek its own level and keep interest rates down so that we will prosper?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one point. Marc Lalonde never had to deal with the type of interest rate and exchange rate situation which we are faced with today, as is every other industrialized country.

I have said it in the House before, and I will say it again. We are not happy that interest rates have gone up. I would also say to the Hon. Member that I cannot sit in my office on Parliament Hill, pull big levers, set interest rates, and say that they will be a certain level. Interest rate and exchange rate decisions are made by thousands of investors in Canada and in other countries. We try to moderate the impact of those decisions, but we cannot establish them. The Hon. Member knows that, because he is too smart not to know it.

DOMTAR—QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister let the cat out of the bag when he revealed another reason why his Government was refusing to subsidize the Domtar project. He said that the fact the Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec and the SGF held 45 per cent of the shares had been a factor in turning down the request for a subsidy of $100 million for the project.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, first of all, how the presence of Quebecers through their institutions could have affected his Government's analysis of the merits of the Domtar case and second, whether the Government's anwer would have been any different if the Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec and the SGF had not been involved?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that has no connection with the case. We in the Progressive Conservative Party are the ones who defended the Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec against an attempt by the Liberal Government to kill this opportunity for Quebecers to participate in the province's economic growth.

The fact is quite simply this: the Government of Quebec is the principal holder of Domtar shares, so it is entirely normal that I should discuss expansion programs with the Government of Quebec. That is all there is to it.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS CONCERNING REFUSAL OF SUBSIDIES

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister himself referred to the holdings of the Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec and the SGF yesterday to justify his Government's refusing to pay a subsidy of $100 million, saying it would be a direct transfer to the Province of Quebec. And if he wants to bring up Bill S-31, our caucus took a stand against that Bill, not like a group of yesmen over there who are afraid to get up and defend Domtar.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he now intends to set new standards for companies whose sharesholders include the SGF, the SDI ou the Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why my hon. friend is trying to deny any responsibility for Bill S-31. You people instigated Bill S-31, which would have killed this attempt by Quebec Francophones to become actively involved in the economic expansion of Quebec and this country. That is what you would have done with Bill S-31, and that is why we fought the Bill, and fortunately for Quebecers we did.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Considering the fact that the Government of Quebec controls the largest block of shares, it is very important that I discuss this matter with the one who owns those shares, in other words, the one who can make the final decisions. That is the only connection with this case.

INTEREST RATE INCREASES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. He will be well aware that last month's unemployment figures realized the largest increase over the last five years. He has explained carefully the continuing softening of the Canadian dollar. Today we find that interest rates have increased again by over half of a percentage point and, of course, further uncertainty has been built in. Is the Minister of Finance prepared to give a signal to the people of Canada that there is a limit to which he will accept the increases, and that we do not have to be afraid of the Liberal 18 per cent and 19 per cent interest rates? Is there a limit?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no sign at all that we are going to get back to the extraordinarily high interest rates which we saw under the Liberal Government in 1981-82. The underlying strength of the Canadian economy, the record high surplus in trade, the level of inflation, and productivity improvements all indicate a clear degree of strength and stability in the Canadian economy. We are faced with an extraordinary situation in international money markets, over which we have no control. That is affecting Canadian interest rates, as I am sure the Hon. Member will understand. We are trying to mitigate the impact of the exchange rate movements on interest rates, but we cannot control them. Once we have a degree of stability in the markets in Canada, I am quite confident that interest rates will come down.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance will know full well that because of his passive position there is a growing sense of uncertainty in the country. No one is prepared to make long-term or even short-term investments with these conditions. Week after week, for five weeks, interest rates have gone up and the Minister has told us to be patient and not to jump to conclusions. For five weeks interest rates have gone up, and there is every indication that they will continue to do so. Will he now say, as Minister of Finance, that he will not be the bankers' batboy? Will he show that he is a strong leader and not a passive Finance Minister? He should stand up and say that there is a limit, and that the limit is what the rates are today.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the rhetoric of the Hon. Member is not going to fool anyone. I want to draw to his attention that the socialist Government of France, in 1981, tried to follow the same policies which he would have us follow today. What happened? Capital flowed out of the country in record amounts, the French franc went down twice in substantial devaluations, interest rates went up, unemployment went up, and France had a disaster on its hands. We do not want that to happen here.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

REQUEST TO PRIME MINISTER TO EXAMINE FACTS SURROUNDING THOUSANDS OF LOST JOBS IN QUEBEC

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. the Prime Minister.

Keeping in mind that he decided yesterday to take his Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion to task—or so it seemed—and to re-open the Domtar file, and considering that he then took pride in the fact that he had helped other Quebec companies, would he ask his Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion to hand over his files on the Quebec black list, namely those of Wabasso, Melchers, Pêcheries Cartier, Tupperware, Phillips, Carbures, VIA Rail and Dominion Engineering, companies that have closed down over the past three months?

Having told us that he does not want to help Domtar because the company is in a sound financial situation, would he take the time to consider cases where thousands of jobs have been lost in Quebec in recent months?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): If Canadians outside Quebec want to know why the Liberal Party was so soundly trounced by the electors of Quebec, here is the classical example—the arrogance and conceit of the Liberal Party. Quebecers have had their fill of that and they know full well that the outgoing Government left us with a significant number of plant closure files.

That being so, I must say that we have begun the serious task of setting the local and regional economy on an even keel, and to cooperate with the companies and the Quebec Government with a view to restoring a climate of prosperity.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I did not ask an aggressive question to the Prime Minister. I asked a question.

We have here a very important list of cases where thousands of jobs were lost in ridings whose residents thought . . . I am asking a question.

An Hon. Member: Ah, stop it!

Mr. Chrétien: I asked a question . . .

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Calm down!

Mr. Chrétien: I want to understand.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Calm down!

Mr. Chrétien: Thousands of Quebecers have lost their jobs in Trois-Rivières, Berthier, Shawinigan, Cowansville, the Gaspé area and elsewhere. They have made representations to the Department of—

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Member have a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I would ask the Prime Minister to tell us whether he will go to the trouble of examining those files and try to re-create the jobs lost in the Province of Quebec since November. And the list I gave him is incomplete to boot.

Mr. La Salle: That was your doing, Jean!

Mr. Mulroney: Naturally, Mr. Speaker, we examine every possibility of creating jobs in Quebec or elsewhere. We will examine such cases in a Canadian context as well, for we firmly believe that the prosperity of any province is linked with national prosperity. That is why we want to be fair with all regions of Canada, not only with one province or one region of a province, as was the case in the Saint-Maurice region under previous Governments, where even some ridings in the centre of Quebec claimed that preferential treatment had been extended. I never shared that opinion, never! But I can tell you that we are going to show honesty in our efforts to promote all regions—

An Hon. Member: Schefferville!

Mr. Mulroney: He mentions Schefferville, and he is right. The electors of Schefferville gave me a strong majority in the riding of Manicouagan, precisely because they were fed up with you people.

APPOINTMENT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL PRESIDENT

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday I believe the Prime Minister surprised the Hon. Member for Outremont by replying that he would today be announcing the name of the President of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. I wonder if the Prime Minister is now in a position to advise the House of the bilingual, energetic, and knowledgeable woman who will head this Council?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will be pleased to learn that today the Government has appointed Sylvia Gold to be the President of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, effective April 1. May I say in commenting, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deans: No, you may not. You have given the answer.

Mr. McLean: —in terms of concerns expressed in the House, and in terms of her capacity and knowledge of women's issues, her language, and her acceptability on women's issues—

Mr. Speaker: With great respect to the Minister, the Minister has the option to make a statement under motions.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DECLARATION OF MINISTER

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have another question concerning the Domtar Corporation which I direct to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has just told us that the control of the Government of Quebec and the Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec, over Domtar has nothing to do with the refusal to extend a grant to Domtar.

How does the Prime Minister explain the announcement made in November 1984, by his Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, to the effect that corporations controlled by provincial governments no longer would qualify for federal grants?

Which is the Government's policy, the Minister's expressed ideology or the Prime Minister's statement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would of course have to examine the circumstances of the statement you just quoted. It should be placed into its context.

But I can say, as I told my friend for Granby, that the fact that the Caisse or the Société générale de financement owns shares is important as a matter of fact, strictly because the connection leads us to the Quebec Government. It is important in such a transaction that we should be able to speak with those who take the decisions. That is all.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister know whether the ideological biases of Bay Street, as voiced by his Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, are to set government policy and whether the Government will be concerned about the true economic needs of Quebecers?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that the only Quebecer who is biased in favour of Bay Street interests is the Hon. Member for Shawinigan, who represents them.

FORESTRY

NEWFOUNDLAND FORESTRY CENTRE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. On July 11, 1984, the Prime Minister, as Leader of the Opposition, sent a telex to the Mayor of Corner Brook indicating that if elected to government he and his Party would not cancel the decision already made to relocate the federal forestry centre from St. John's to Corner Brook. On November 8 his Minister of Finance cancelled that move and announced a savings of $3.5 million for the fiscal year 1985. In light of the fact that I hold in my hand—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Order.

Mr. Tobin: —a copy of his letter to the Mayor of Corner Brook, will the Prime Minister tell this House, and through this House all the people of Canada, after committing himself to the forestry centre, if his word is worth the paper it is written on?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hold in both hands a pair of glasses through which I would be happy to look at the document to which my hon. friend refers. But the Hon. Member knows full well that, along with other important matters, this one, unfortunately, had to be rolled over and deferred—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: —pursuant to November 8.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Roll over, Mulroney.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend knows full well that, while we are unable to accommodate this particular one at this time, we have concluded the Atlantic Accord, which is the most historic and beneficial program for the development of Newfoundland and Labrador since Newfoundland entered Confederation in 1949.

CONTENT OF COMMUNICATION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for his melodious nonsense, but the people of my riding want a straight answer. I weigh my words carefully, Mr. Speaker, and he shall see this document, as shall everyone else in this House. Is his word worth the paper it is written on? Or will the Prime Minister tell me and the people of Corner Brook, is he a liar?

Mr. Mazankowski: Order.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Member wish to rephrase his question?

Mr. Tobin: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to ask the question again. The people of my riding want a straight answer from the Prime Minister. He wrote this document, he signed it, we are simply asking if this document was an honest statement of intention. Did he mean it when he wrote it, or is he a liar?

An Hon. Member: It is a question.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The Leader of the Opposition laughs. Shame!

Mr. Speaker: Let me make it simple for the Hon. Member. Language which is unparliamentary cannot be simply introduced by way of a question. Is that clear? Therefore, does the Hon. Member wish to rephrase his question, for the last time?

Mr. Mazankowski: Withdraw.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Withdraw.

Mr. Tobin: I am trying to rephrase it, Mr. Speaker. The rules of the House—

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Member wish to rephrase his question? Otherwise, I will simply rule the question out of order.

Mr. Tobin: I am trying to.

Mr. Speaker: I rule the question out of order. The Hon. Member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

USE OF METRIC AND IMPERIAL MEASUREMENT

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. For the past few years western Canadian grain producers have received their sales information in tonnes only. Can the Minister assure producers that in future Canadian Wheat Board final payment statements will provide information in bushels? Can he also encourage the elevator companies to provide similar information on the grain delivery cash tickets?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his question. I know this is of concern to a lot of farmers in the country. I have had discussions with the Wheat Board regarding final and interim payments and they have assured me they will be looking for ways to put bushels on final payment stubs.

It is my understanding that grain companies are free to communicate with their customers in whatever measure they choose, imperial or metric. So it is up to the grain companies. Bearing in mind that the grain companies, in western Canada at least, are largely owned by the producers themselves through co-operatives, there should be no problem if the producers wish to see that they have information available to them in bushels as well as tonnes.

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR—ROLE OF SPECULATORS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. He indicated, in response to my Leader, that speculators were the root cause of some of the problems regarding the level of the dollar and high interest rates. Is he aware that many of those speculators are the chief financial officers of Canadian corporations who are driving down our dollar and benefiting from high interest rates at the same time? Is he prepared to allow those speculators to benefit from their actions here in Canada and in the U.S., over and against protecting the public of Canada who have to foot the bill?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I never used that expression in the answer to his Leader, and he knows that. What he should recognize is that the activity in the exchange market is a result of thousands and thousands of decisions, sure, by people in corporations, but also by individuals, as well as people outside the country. The Minister of Finance cannot control those, and I am not going to try. What we can do is try to moderate the influence of those decisions, to try to lean against the movement in both interest rates and exchange rates, and try to introduce a degree of stability back into the market and get interest rates down.

REQUEST FOR ACTION AGAINST SPECULATORS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Finance not aware that the average Canadian does not care and is not in any way immediately affected by a lower Canadian dollar, but he is most definitely affected by higher interest rates? Why will the Minister not move now to say to the speculators: "You cannot benefit both ways here in Canada", and then take steps to protect the average Canadian from high interest rates?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are taking steps to protect Canadians from the impact of high interest rates. As the press release of the Governor of the Bank of Canada said earlier today, if things had not been done the way they had been done in the exchange and interest rate markets, interest rates would have been higher today. We cannot control rates, and I am not going to try to control rates like a big lever, which the Hon. Member would like to have us do. This is a free market we live in, and we should appreciate the reason we live in a free market is so we can enjoy the freedoms which have made this country, and other countries like it, great.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EXPENDITURE LEVELS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. He will recall that during last summer's election campaign the Progressive Conservative Party produced a pamphlet regarding national defence entitled, ironically enough, Honour The Commitment. It promised greatly increased defence spending. Last Tuesday the President of the Treasury Board stated that cuts in the growth of defence spending could be made "while meeting our international commitments". I ask the Minister of National Defence: Where is the honour? Where is your commitment?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Careful what you say now, Erik.

Mr. Nielsen: I always am.

The Hon. Member's very important question deserves an answer in some detail, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure he would be the first to recognize that it is only reasonable to expect me to meet with some of the officials in the Department, and obtain briefings from them, before attempting to answer that sort of question in any detail. I will get back to him just as soon as I can next week, in response.

PREPARATION OF ESTIMATES

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I know the Minister will have to meet with his Department, but having been a member of the Planning and Priorities Committee of Cabinet for several months now, how can the Minister sit idly by while his Party's commitment to 6 per cent real growth in defence spending is ignored? He was on that committee when these estimates were talked about. You have simply made defence another sacred trust, and I ask you where is that trust? You were there.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is totally unlike the Hon. Member, who is usually calm and a gentleman in the House, to be so uptight. All I am suggesting to him is that as soon as I have had the opportunity to look into his very important question I will get back to him and give him the answer that this question deserves.

DAMAGE CAUSED BY RING-BILLED GULLS

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The Municipal Council of Downie Township in Perth County, which is my riding, and many others in the farming areas of Ontario, have voiced concern with respect to the massive population of ring-billed gulls and the damage and bother they cause. Would the Minister tell this House how her Ministry will deal with the farmers' problems?

[Translation]

Hon. Suzanne Blais-Grenier (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the problems the ring-billed gulls cause farmers and, with the officials of my Department, I have taken action so that by telephoning our offices, the farmers will immediately learn what to do to chase away these birds which damage their crops.

TWIN-TRACKING IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. He may know that yesterday Conservatives in the House thwarted the unanimous will of two Standing Committees of this House with respect to a recommendation that the twin-tracking being done by CN in the Ashcroft subdivision be stopped. Given the Prime Minister's interest in parliamentary reform, and his desire to increase respect for Parliament and the judgment of committees and Members of Parliament, will he undertake to have the Minister of Transport respect that unanimous decision by two committees of this House, and have the CN stop twin-tracking in that particular area of British Columbia?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to that very important question. I was unable to be in the House yesterday for the debate because I was attending a conference of provincial Transport Ministers, but I have read most of the speeches in the House yesterday. I would like to inform the Hon. Member that the Minister of Fisheries and myself will be meeting with the Allied Tribal Council of British Columbia Indians in Vancouver tomorrow to deal with this issue—I hear some yapping from the Liberal benches—and to straighten out a mess which the former Government created. I hope I have the support and confidence of at least the members of the NDP, to try to resolve this matter in a satisfactory way which will look after the concerns and wishes of the Indian people which were trampled by the Government of that Party.

REQUEST THAT PROJECT BE SUSPENDED

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with the Minister of Transport that this mess was given to us by the former Liberal regime.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaikie: That does not prevent him from being able to act, and I hope that he will act. Will the Minister assure the House and the committees that made that decision that he will not allow CN to proceed until such time as he has arrived at an agreement which is satisfactory to all the people concerned with this, the fishermen and the native people in particular?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish the Hon. Member had listened to my answer. The reason I am going out there is to meet with the Indian people. We will be meeting with Fisheries, the Department of Indian Affairs, and all interested parties to try to resolve the issue. I note that the New Democratic Party indicated its support for the increase in rail capacity, something that the former Minister of the Environment now faces with some ambivalence. I do not know how he could have stood up in his place yesterday and played such a role of a hypocrite after presiding over this issue before.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mazankowski: You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Speaker: Order. For some reason it is impossible to get the House to pay attention to anybody today. I must ask the Hon. Minister of Transport to withdraw the word "hypocrite". He knows it is unparliamentary.

Point of Order—Mr. Deans

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the word, but I still want to say that I really have difficulty accepting the double standard of the former Minister of the Environment.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I do not know what everybody did this morning.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

CLERK OF PETITIONS' REPORTS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petitions presented by Hon. Members on Wednesday, February 27, 1985, meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

POINT OF ORDER

WITHDRAWAL OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE BY MR. MAZANKOWSKI

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) has a point of order.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, would you consider reading the response by the Minister with regard to your direction to withdraw the word he used? My understanding of the rules is that you must withdraw unequivocally words that are offensive without explanation. It is becoming a habit now that people are replacing the words that they used which were inappropriate with explanations to satisfy their own end.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): What do you mean, it is becoming a habit?

Mr. Deans: It is becoming a habit.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Give us some evidence.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will understand that I am in a moderate quandary because he is right, but to allow comment on the matter would be equally improper. Perhaps Members will read the rules on the matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Government House Leader to give us the program of business for the next several days.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Queen's Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House Leader for the Official Opposition. If the House Leader for the New Democratic Party would only give the same sane advice to his own Leader with respect to parliamentary language, this place would be a lot better off.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the proceedings to ask the President of the Privy Council to stay within the bounds of the question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the House will continue consideration at second reading of Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act.

Tomorrow the first item of business will be the Bill which is to be introduced later today by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, an Act to amend the Indian Act. There have been discussions between the Party representatives and I believe there is an inclination to complete second reading and send the Bill to committee for study tomorrow. Depending upon when debate is concluded on that bill, Mr. Speaker, the second order of business will be Bill C-24.

On Monday, if Bill C-24 has not previously been passed, I will once again be calling it for debate. The back-up Bill will be an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act which will be introduced by the Minister of State for Finance later today.

I would like to designate next Tuesday at the fifth allotted day in the current period of supply. On Wednesday next the business will be the same as I have just announced for Monday.

Pursuant to the order of the House passed earlier this week, the House will not sit next Thursday in order that the Secretary General of the United Nations may address a joint session of the House and Senate at three in the afternoon. As always, Mr. Speaker, we will monitor the progress made and announce changes to the business of the House as may be required.

LABOUR, MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

PRESENTATION OF FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, today I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the first report of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. The report concerns a change in the name of the committee and I intend to move concurrence in this report later today. I think you will find at that time that there is unanimous consent for that action.

[Editor's Note: For above report, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Speaker: I must rise to advise the House of a reservation I have with regard to this report, having heard the content.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Not until I am finished. The report proposes a change of name for the committee, a recommendation procedurally itself innocuous, but one which nevertheless proposes a change in the Standing Orders. For this reason the recommendation may, in my view, be beyond the terms of reference of the committee. I doubt, therefore, that it would be in order to proceed on a motion for concurrence in the report of a committee which has gone beyond its terms of reference. I draw this matter to the attention of the House so that further consideration may be given to it.

I gather that the Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) would like to rise on a point of order to make comment prior to my making a ruling as to whether a motion for concurrence would be in order. Since he has indicated to me that he wishes to speak on a point of order to the possibility of such a ruling, I therefore reserve the ruling for the moment and hear the Member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the action taken and the decision to report this matter to the House was taken unanimously in committee. We have searched the precedents, Mr. Speaker. In the preceding Parliament on November 27, 1979 there was a change in the name of one of our committees to its current name of Communications and Culture. The mechanism chosen at that time was Standing Order 43. There was unanimous consent for that action, so the two principles were there.

We now operate under provisional rules. I would first point out that the mechanism of Standing Order 43 is no longer available to us, but that one of the reasons we have provisional orders, and that they are provisional, is that we can begin to explore the possibilities and difficulties which a change in the rules might present. The elimination of Standing Order 43, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, presents a slight difficulty to the committee.

I will now proceed to the second precedent I would like to bring to your attention. On July 3, 1980 the special committee of this House presented its first report, asked for unanimous consent and moved concurrence in the decision to change its name to the Committee for Employment Opportunities for the 1980s. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the precedent of a committee report asking for a change of name existed on July 3, 1980, and was granted by the previous Speaker.

May I further point out, Mr. Speaker, that another aspect of that decision at that time was the fact that the House granted unanimous consent for the action. The granting of unanimous consent is central to this issue because the House is indeed master of its own destiny. I would suggest to you that on this issue, which has been considered by the committee in the previous Parliament and again in this Parliament, we have found it difficult to find an efficient mechanism that would be clearly in accordance with all past precedents and all procedures that lie within our Standing Orders.

I suggest that this is the most acceptable and quickest way to resolve this issue. You may want to set a precedent today by allowing this kind of report and this type of action. However, if not, you could fall back on the principle of unanimous consent for the House to do what it deems advisable. May I suggest that such a ruling would not set a precedent that you would find difficult to live with. We should be allowed to move by unanimous consent, if that is the will of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member is making an interesting argument. First, he argues that if we had Standing Order 43 the Member would have proceeded by way of Standing Order 43. Without Standing Order 43, he argues therefore that this procedure would be in order. That is illogical.

His other argument is that the House can do whatever it wishes by unanimous consent. That may well be true; nevertheless, that does not make a motion to concur in a report which cannot be presented to the House in order. Unanimous consent may allow the House to change something it wishes to change, but it cannot make the report itself in order.

My dilemma is that the Member is proposing a motion to concur in a report which cannot, of itself, be in order. Therefore, I cannot simply admit an inadmissible motion by unanimous consent. That is how I understand the procedure.

Therefore, having heard the argument, I must rule that a motion to concur in the report would itself be inadmissible.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have more than a passing interest in this matter because, as chairman of that standing committee—

Mr. Speaker: Is the Hon. Member rising on a separate point of order?

Mr. Crosby: Yes. I wanted to take the opportunity to explain that I have more than a passing interest in this because, as chairman of that standing committee in 1979, we made an attempt to change the name and it was believed it would be under Standing Order 43.

Is it permissible for a Member simply to ask for the consent of the House, in the absence of Standing Order 43, to make a motion and with that unanimous consent—

Mr. Speaker: What is the point of order?

Mr. Blenkarn: He is putting a motion.

Mr. Speaker: We are not on motions. I have ruled on the point of order that was brought before me. If the Hon. Member is asking me to give a hypothetical ruling on a matter that has not arisen, I cannot do that.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I have unanimous consent of the House to move a motion?

Mr. Speaker: With great respect to the Hon. Member, one cannot seek the floor on a point of order and move a motion. It cannot be done procedurally.

Mr. Blenkarn: He is asking for consent of the House.

Mr. Speaker: It cannot be done on a point of order.

I am quite certain that someone will seek the floor when I call for motions.

NATIONAL HYMN ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-224, an Act respecting the National Hymn of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the said Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to rise and present this Bill which will provide for a bilingual national hymn for Canada. I look forward to the debate, at which time Members can find the unique authorship by Dr. Ken Hicken of the University of Lethbridge. I will provide cassette copies to each of the House Leaders so Members can listen to the cassette. This Bill clearly fills a void in our national life.

LABOUR, MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

MOTION TO CHANGE NAME OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House I would like to move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That Standing Order 69(1) be amended by deleting paragraph (j) and substituting the following therefor:

"(J) Labour, Employment and Immigration;".

If you were to put the question, Mr. Speaker, I think there would be unanimous consent to pass the motion quickly.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Member have unanimous consent to introduce the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Shall I dispense with the reading of the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Hon. Member what the French version of the name would be? Does it remain as it is presently—Travail, Main-d'œuvre et Immigration? Or is it changed to Travail, Emploi et Immigration?

[Translation]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there has been a change. I think that it is "Travail, emploi et immigration". This will be the new French name of the Committee.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, does the tabled document also include the French version?

Is it included in the document and has the Hon. Member introduced a Bill to change the name of the Committee? I would like to know whether this is what is contained in the document tabled in the House. If not, I think that it would be better to postpone it.

• (1520)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I understand what the Hon. Member is trying to get at. The report has been received by the House. It contains the recommended motion. The Hon. Member is now seeking unanimous consent to introduce the motion under his own name and the document contains the change in both languages.

Ms. Copps: Is the motion both in French and in English? Is the motion introduced in the House both in French and in English? The motion! I am not referring to the report, but to the motion.

Mr. Hawkes: Yes.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member is presenting a motion referring to the document which is in both languages. His motion does not have to be in both languages. I am missing the Hon. Member's point. The Hon. Member is arguing that the motion is out of order because it is not presented in both languages, is that right?

Ms. Copps: No.

Mr. Speaker: What is the Hon. Member arguing, then? I am missing the point.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: I would like to know whether the motion asking for the unanimous consent of the House to change the name, is in both languages. Are the translation and the report, with the names in French and English, included in the report as tabled in the House?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Yes. The Hon. Member has sought unanimous consent for the introduction of the motion and has received it. Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The matter is adopted, I take it unanimously.

Motion agreed to.

RECEPTIONS FOR HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN AND PRIME MINISTER OF FRANCE

Question No. 133—Mr. Malépart:

1. Did the Prime Minister host a reception and a farewell dinner for Her Majesty the Queen on October 6, 1984, at the Winnipeg Congress Centre and, if so, what were the guests' names and addresses?

2. Did the Prime Minister host a reception and a dinner for the Prime Minister of France, His Excellency Laurent Fabius on November 7, 1984, at the Westin Hotel in Ottawa and, if so, what were the guests' names and addresses?

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. Yes. The individuals who were invited included Members of Parliament and of Legislatures, Privy Councillors, and persons of various functions, drawn from the Order of Precedence of Canada. The objective was to include citizens whose role in the communities of Canada would reflect the interests of Her Majesty in meeting her people.

2. Yes. The individuals who were invited included Members of Parliament, Privy Councillors, persons of various functions drawn from the Order of Precedence of Canada, members of the French Delegation, and representatives of the community. The objective was to allow the French Prime Minister's delegation to meet people with involvement in that country.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES

Question No. 157—Mr. Orlikow:

Has the Department of Agriculture cut any projects in its science and technology programs in order to absorb the reduction in its expenditures required by the economic statement made by the Minister of Finance in the House on November 8, 1984 and, if so, what are they and what are the projected costs?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): No. However, reductions will be applied to research conducted for the Department by industry and universities, which has been funded by research contracts and extra mural grants. The savings will be implemented by not accepting any new proposals rather than by cutting currently approved activities.

AID TO NICARAGUA AND CHILE

Question No. 191—Mr. Stackhouse:

Is Canada giving aid to (a) Nicaragua (b) Chile and, if so, in each case (i) since what date (ii) in what amounts (iii) for what purposes?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations): In so far as the Canadian International Development Agency is concerned, the answer is as follows:

(a) Canadian aid to Nicaragua: Bilateral aid. In 1975, following the earthquake which destroyed much of Managua, the capital of Nicaragua, Canada loaned the country $1.9 million to purchase heavy equipment to remove the rubble from the centre of the city. The loan has been used and $1,887,600 has been paid out.

In 1982, CIDA financed a technical assistance project worth $655,000, in the form of a grant-in-aid, for the development of a food strategy. The project has been completed.

In January, 1984, Canada extended a line of credit of $13.4 million for the provision of fertilizer, farm equipment and Holstein heifers ($13 million loan and $400,000 grant-in-aid). To date, about 50 per cent of this line of credit has been used.

In September, 1984, Canada extended a line of credit of $7.5 million ($7 million loan and $500,000 grant-in-aid) for the provision of equipment for the drinking water sector. This credit has not been used to date.

Other forms of aid: Canada also provided aid through CIDA's other co-operation mechanisms. During the last four years (1980-81 to 1983-84) Canada has contributed over $24 million to support projects in Nicaragua through the mission administered funds, non-governmental organizations, institutional co-operation and development services, and industrial co-operation programs. In addition, emergency food aid in 1981-82 and 1983-84 was provided for humanitarian reasons.

(b) Canadian aid to Chile: Chile has not received any bilateral aid from Canada since 1973. However, Canada provided aid through several of CIDA's other co-operation mechanisms. During the last four fiscal years (1980-81 to 1983-84), Canada contributed $3.7 million to support projects in Chile through the mission administered funds, non-governmental organizations, institutional co-operation and development services, and industrial co-operation programs.

Question No. 214—Mr. Howie:

For the fiscal year 1983-84, based on the accounting practices currently used by the Government on each of a public accounts and a national accounts basis, what was the government's (a) spending (b) revenue (c) interest cost and what was its gross debt and net debt?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): For the fiscal year 1983-84, the spending, revenue, interest cost, gross debt and net debt of the federal Government were as follows, on a public accounts basis and a national accounts basis:

	Public Accounts Basis (1983-84 Public Accounts of Canada)	National Accounts Basis (Statistics Canada, Catalogue 13-001, 13-002)
	($ Millions)
(a) Expenditures	88,915	97,254
(b) Revenue	56,326	72,162
(c) Interest and other public debt charges	18,146	18,072
Gross debt as at March 31, 1984	196,861	160,836
Net debt as at March 31, 1984	157,011	108,419

DOT—FEMALE EMPLOYEES

Question No. 216—Mr. Howie:

As of the last date for which information is available, what proportion of the employees of the Department of Transport were women?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): 20.6 per cent.

NATIONAL FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING COUNCIL

Question No. 222—Mr. Howie:

As of January 1, 1985, how many persons were employed on the National Farm Products Marketing Council and what was the salary range allocated to each position?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): As of January 1, 1985, National Farm Products Marketing Council employed 25 persons.

Position Title	Salary Range
Chair	$81,890–96,300
Executive Member	54,710–64,390
Director, Economic Advisory Services	48,948–53,885
Business Development Analyst	37,073–42,323
Economic & Statistics Analyst	42,109–48,179
Commodity Officer	43,536–55,768
Commodity Officer	43,536–55,768
Commodity Officer	43,536–55,768
Market Development Officer	35,522–50,323
Chief Administration & Executive Secretary	37,083–41,356
Head, Administrative Services	27,622–30,920
Manager, Marketing/Production Statistics	30,930–33,687
Statistics Officer	28,332–30,903
Information Officer	36,626–41,225

EMPLOYMENT IN CANADA AUGUST, DECEMBER 1984

Question No. 223—Mr. Howie:

(1) How many persons in Canada were employed in (a) August, 1984 (b) December, 1984?

2. In each of the months above, how many persons were employed in temporary or term positions?

3. In each of the months above, how many persons did Canada Employment Centres place in (a) permanent full-time jobs (b) temporary or term full-time jobs (c) part-time jobs?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Total employment (Canada, seasonally adjusted) revised January 28/85:

December, 1984	11,141,000
change	+97,000

2. Statistics Canada's Labour Force Survey does not provide data on temporary employment nor on term positions. The closest proxy measure is part-time employment.

Part-time employment (Canada, seasonally adjusted) revised January 28/85:

change	−16,000

Comment: Between August and December, 1984, while total employment in Canada grew by 97,000; full-time employment grew by 129,000. (Figures do not add up because each is seasonally adjusted separately.)

3. Placements by Canada Employment Centres

	August, 1984	December, 1984
Regular placements	62,397	37,119
Casual placements	10,201	8,173

A regular placement results when the job is expected to last longer than five working days.

A casual placement is expected to be five working days or less.

Note: Part-time work is not separately identified and placements in part-time jobs would be included in the above totals.

Mr. Dick: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining few questions be allowed to stand.

Oil Substitution Act

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Bill Tupper (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased this afternoon to rise on behalf of the residents of Nepean-Carleton to speak to Bill C-24. The Bill before the House provides for the termination of the Canada Oil Substitution Program, or COSP, on March 31, 1985, and for the phasing out of the Canadian Home Insulation Program or CHIP by March 31, 1986.

The Government's intention to make the changes as noted this morning by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. McDermid) was announced last November by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret). Since then we have all had a chance to appraise the termination of these plans. Furthermore, all Canadians have had considerable advance warning and if they were interested in taking advantage of those programs have had ample opportunity to do so.

Speaking specifically at the moment to COSP, the off-oil program introduced in 1980, it has provided taxable contributions of up to $800 toward the cost of converting oil-heating systems to other fuel systems, that is, to natural gas, electricity, propane, solar power and other sources of renewable energy. The existing legislation provided a termination date of December 31, 1990 for the program. The amending Bill changes this date to March 31, 1985. Furthermore, as the Parliamentary Secretary noted this morning, the legislation provides for a limited exception which will allow participants a further three months, that is until June, 1985, to complete their conversions if they have signed contracts prior to the November 8 announcement and if they have faced difficulties in getting the work done by March 31.

COSP, the off-oil program, was introduced in October, 1980. At that time OPEC dominated the world's petroleum supply and pricing mechanism. Through a cartel-like arrangement it was expected that OPEC would push world prices dramatically higher. Equally at that time almost 40 per cent of all Canadian homes were heated by oil and Canada was consuming more petroleum products than it was producing. In other words, we were highly dependent or becoming more highly dependent on imports for our supply of petroleum products. Residential oil substitution was then identified as a priority, and a grant system was introduced as a vehicle to lower our petroleum consumption.

The basic grant was one-half the eligible cost of materials and labour for conversions of oil-fired space heating and water heating systems, to a maximum $800 per individual unit. Over the past four years COSP has paid out more than $530 million in grants for the conversion of some 900,000 housing units across Canada. It is estimated that some $125 million has probably been returned to the federal and provincial Governments in the form of taxes.

Members of the House should be aware that the program did not have good regional balance. Three-quarters of all activity was in Quebec and Ontario. COSP was not needed much in the Prairie Provinces because they were already largely off oil. They had already moved in large part to home heating by natural gas. It was not much help to the Atlantic Provinces because they did not have alternative supplies or alternative opportunities for cheaper fuel consumption other than the availability of wood.

In 1981-82 gas conversions represented 48 per cent of that year's COSP activity, electricity was 36 per cent, while wood represented 14 per cent. In 1983-84 gas conversions had decreased to 25 per cent of all activity and electricity had risen to 55 per cent. This decline in gas conversions is partly accounted for by a decline in conversions in the Province of Ontario. In 1981-82 conversions in Ontario accounted for 43 per cent of all conversions in that year. By 1983-84 Ontario's share declined to 20 per cent. Furthermore, within the province gas conversions accounted for 63 per cent of activity in 1981-82, but it dropped to 43 per cent in 1983-84. From the beginning of the program until the end of December, 1984, Quebec led COSP activity with a total of 400,000 units converted off oil. By comparison, Ontario had 277,000 units converted off oil. COSP has paid $235 million for grants in Quebec, representing 44 per cent of the funds disbursed under the program across the nation. Quebec Hydro, at the same time the national grant system was in place, provided a parallel program of non-taxable grants in the amount of $650 for conversions to dual energy systems using both electricity and oil. The complementary nature of the two programs proved very attractive to consumers in the Province of Quebec.

Electric conversions in Quebec accounted for 73 per cent of all electric conversions in Canada. Collectively, electricity accounted for 41 per cent of all conversions, natural gas for 35 per cent and wood for 20 per cent. The remaining 4 per cent represents propane and a very small number of conversions to other renewable energy sources, such as solar energy and other conservation measures.

COSP grant applications have been slowing down rapidly in the last nine months, except for the period starting in December following the Minister's announcement. Apart from conversions to electricity in Quebec, which have accounted for 50 per cent of all COSP activity in the last nine months, the level of conversions nationally has dropped by 45 per cent from its height in 1982, except for the last three months.

It is extremely difficult to assess the real impact of COSP on energy conservation and petroleum consumption in Canada. Some 900,000 units have been converted from oil. This represents a possible displacement of some 32,000 barrels a day, by itself a significant amount of consumption and a great deal of conservation.

In my own riding of Nepean-Carleton, my impressions are that most of the constituents who took advantage of the program were those in the middle- and upper-income brackets. Very, very few of the lower-income people in my riding were in a position to take advantage of it. In addition to the inequitable distribution across Canada, possibly there has been inequitable distribution of the use of this program across the income groups. However, a trend has been established toward installation of medium- and high-efficiency natural gas furnaces. Some of these furnaces burners now achieve an efficiency as high as 90 or 95 percent, all of which are being made available at declining or at least much more competitive prices. Dual energy systems, such as plenum heaters and heat pumps, are offering savings, comfort to home owners and advantages of load management to utilities. A broad range of combustion wood-burning systems are now available. They are much safer, much more efficient and it has been a boon to many, many hundreds of thousands of rural residents across Canada who have access to reasonable and abundant supplies of wood. Equally, such safer wood-burning space heaters, furnaces and combination furnaces are now available on the markets across the nation.

To preserve a share of the residential market, oil dealers and manufacturers of oil-heating equipment are now marketing much more highly efficient oil burners for retrofit purposes. These efficiencies have moved from the order of 55 to 60 or 65 per cent where some of the burners are now capable of delivering as much as 80 per cent efficiency. In this mature and competitive environment, one would anticipate retrofit for more efficient oil burners to continue and, with that, an ongoing rapid decline of the household consumption of petroleum, regardless of what may happen to COSP.

COSP helped utilities' become permanent customers for gas and electricity. They may be interested in providing conversion grants of their own in this particular market arrangement. Oil substitution is a competitive business in the key central Canada markets. Massive campaigns are being mounted for both utilities and manufacturers to promote conversion. This will probably continue and should be encouraged.

Turning my remarks to the CHIP program, CHIP was provided as taxable contributions of up to $500 of insulation and draught-proofing measures in existing homes. It was introduced in 1977. The CHIP Act provided for its termination at the end of 1987. The amending Bill provides for a two stage phase-out under which the Government's share of eligible costs is reduced to 33 per cent from 60 per cent, effective January 1, 1985. The program comes to an end on March 31, 1986. One would also like to stress, as the Parliamentary Secretary did this morning, that in the final 15 months of the CHIP program, the maximum contribution shall remain unchanged in the amount of $500.

The end of the program, therefore, has been anticipated by all sectors of Canadian society, by industry and by Government for quite some time. Homes have been admitted to the program on a sequential basis related to the date of their construction. That process has been for some time in its final stage. The last group to become eligible, the 1.3 million homes built between 1971 and 1977, will have had two years to have taken advantage of the program by the time the program is phased out or concludes next year.

Over the past seven and a half years, the period in which CHIP has been in place, more than $855 million in grants for insulation measures in approximately 2.5 million homes or housing units, representing about one-third of the eligible housing stock built before 1977, have had the insulation or draught-proofing capabilities improved. Approximately $200 million has flowed back to the federal and provincial Governments in the form of taxes. The energy savings attributed to work carried out under the program are estimated to be the equivalent of 28,500 barrels of oil per day.

Significant energy savings averaging 17 per cent had been achieved in homes that used CHIP. An evaluation of the program has established that CHIP played an important part in achieving those savings. It is good for this House to understand that CHIP has been used in a very even way all across Canada, equally in Nova Scotia, Manitoba, and British Columbia. At the same time, the other great advantage of CHIP was that it was widely used by all income groups, in particular by the lower-income groups.

As with oil substitution, the benefits of energy conservation and reduced heating bills, and increased home comfort, are now much more fully understood by Canadians than they were seven or eight years ago. Insulation specialists must now as well certify their work. During its period of operation, the program has twice been significantly restructured by changes to the contribution formula. The original formula, which called for grant payments toward the cost of materials only, was amended in April, 1979 to include contributions toward labour. In November, 1982, the contribution towards material costs was reduced to 60 per cent. As part of that decision to phase out CHIP by March 1986, the contribution was further reduced to 33.33 per cent of total eligible costs.

Policy changes to the program reflect the strong concern of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources about the quality of retrofit in Canada. Prescribed standards of workmanship and materials ensure that the energy savings achieved will last throughout the life of the household unit in which the insulation moves had been taken. Programs of research, standards of development, technology transfer, industry support and education, quality control area all directed by the conservation group within Energy, Mines and Resources toward the total home energy program that exists.

Most CHIP applications, however, only used the grant for installing insulation in attics. While helpful and while probably the easiest and the first step in home insulation, this single conservation measure is not enough to realize the full potential of energy conservation in the typical or average Canadian home. Current home programs in the area of home owner awareness and education are directed towards the encouragement of total home refit and total home energy conservation.

Reducing the use of oil and energy in Canada remains a priority for this Government. Very large potentials for savings exist not only in the present housing stock, but in other sectors as well. In the existing housing stock, the potential for savings for cost-effective conservation measures have been estimated at 30 per cent, still quite a remarkable figure. For millions of Canadian householders, it will be a very attractive investment with a rapid return on dollars spent to insulate, draught-proof and improve or convert their heating units. A balanced role for government is most desirable as is one sensitive to the information needs of home owners and the needs for improving the efficiency of oil burners, gas burners and various other types of utilities.

Since the mid-1970s when we slowly started to realize that we had limited petroleum resources in Canada, there we were consuming more oil than we were producing and that we were probably faced with ever-increasing petroleum costs to OPEC, those realizations, together with the decisions of the Government of Canada and almost every provincial Government, to add additional taxes to the consumer of petroleum products forced all Canadians to enter slowly what I like to call the conserver society. In that period of time, we became aware of the importance of our non-renewable energy resources. At the same time, we became aware of other environmental effects that were related thereto.

In responding to our entry into the conserver society, we built much lighter and more efficient automobiles. We created much more efficient gas-conversion units and efficient oil-conversion burners. As well, we made our homes more energy efficient. Collectively, all of these things have added up.

In the period since the mid-1970s, on a relative basis, we have cut our consumption of petroleum products by about 25 per cent. This is an ongoing activity. It is also an ongoing activity throughout much of the world and most noticeably in western Europe and the United States. As a result of these collective developments, OPEC lost control of the marketing of petroleum products throughout the world to a considerable degree and petroleum prices started to fall.

There is no question that COSP and CHIP contributed to our entry into the conserver society. We became more informed and took advantage of the programs. I am convinced that Canadians all across Canada will continue to be conservers of energy and will continue to retrofit their homes in order to improve efficiency. Utilities as well will be competing with one another to help us down this path. We no longer need grants to maintain our momentum in the conserver society. The legislation before the House today is, therefore, a necessary step.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the Hon. Member's very interesting speech. I would like to read to him from the remarks of one of the Conservative caucus members, the Hon. Member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), who said that he did not think there was any question that the House in general understood and supported the purpose of the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. He congratulated the Minister for bringing this legislation forward and went on to say that he hoped the Minister would consider the suggestion that he had made to improve the legislation and make it available to all Canadians, and that if so, we would achieve the conversion from oil to other energy more rapidly than this Bill could do by itself.

I appreciate that the Hon. Member indicated that it was a good program, but he indicated that it was no longer needed. In other words, he indicated that Canadians would continue to make this change on their own. What evidence would he have to support that position? As encouraging and positive a position as it may seem, does he have evidence to suggest that at a time when our economic recovery is at an all-time low, unemployment levels are at an all-time high and interest rates are skyrocketing again, people would be able to accomplish this without some encouragement from the Government?

Mr. Tupper: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member did not provide me with the date of the comments he read.

Mr. Riis: If the date would help, it was 1981.

Mr. Tupper: That is four years ago, but that is immaterial.

Mr. Riis: Has the world changed in four years?

Mr. McDermid: Yes.

Mr. Riis: Yes, it is worse today than it was four years ago. There are 1.5 million unemployed.

Mr. Tupper: I thought I had clearly acknowledged that I believed the off-oil program was a good one and that most Canadians welcomed it at the time. Furthermore, if I was listening carefully enough, I thought the Hon. Member mentioned that the off-oil program was not available to all Canadians. It was my understanding that it was, although perhaps all Canadian home owners were not able to take advantage of it.

Mr. Riis: With help they could.

Mr. Tupper: It is my feeling, and I am repeating myself, that Canadians have entered into the conserver society philosophy. We do not have grants to encourage us not to buy gas-guzzling automobiles. In our purchases, we are naturally flowing toward lighter and more efficient automobiles. Much of our research is directed to that area. I feel that with the current prices of hydrocarbon products and the understanding that petroleum products are not a renewable source of energy, this momentum will carry on without any need for government grants.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I am a little confused about the current figures that were used by the Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton. I would have thought that being from Ontario, he might be a little more knowledgeable about the petrochemical situation. I understood him to say, and perhaps he can correct me if I am wrong—

Mr. McKenzie: He is from Nepean-Carleton.

Ms. Copps: Nepean-Carleton? That explains it. Perhaps the Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. James) would be more knowledgeable about the petrochemical situation.

The Hon. Member stated in the House that one of the reasons why the program should be terminated is that the take-up was primarily from the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec while in fact statistics show that in 1983-84, the take-up from the Province of Ontario was 20 per cent. Does the Hon. Member feel that a 20 per cent take-up means that there was too much of a take-up from the Province of Ontario? If not, why did he state that as one of the reasons for supporting the decision to terminate the provisions of the Act?

Mr. Tupper: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the Hon. Member was listening to me carefully enough. The point I was making was that since the inception of the program, it was not used equitably all across Canada and that the great bulk of its use was in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

The point is that in western Canada, and I am repeating myself, much of the conversion to off-oil or off-fluid petroleum products had already taken place. They were already in large part using natural gas in the prairie provinces. In eastern Canada, there were no other less expensive fuel sources available other than fluid hydrocarbons and possibly fuel wood. Natural gas was not available to them. In Atlantic Canada, electrical energy is extremely expensive. The point I was trying to make as part of my argument is that the program was not used equally all across Canada.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, in fact, according to the documents from the Department dealing with the program, the take-up has been highest in the Provinces of Manitoba and Quebec. I would like to ask the Hon. Member if he feels that Manitoba is not part of western Canada.

Mr. Tupper: Mr. Speaker, I clearly regard Manitoba as being a part of western Canada. Her source of information must be much different from mine. I have been chatting with officials from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in the last 10 days on that very topic, and I am thoroughly confident that my data is correct.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member indicated that the people he felt were taking advantage of the program were not the poor in his community but the relatively affluent, that is, the people who own their homes and can afford to insulate those homes and perhaps spend $1,200 or $1,500 and receive a $500 rebate. For the people who wanted to convert their furnaces and heating systems, which would cost $2,000 or $3,000, the $800 grant was only an extra. He has said that to some extent the assistance program was for the affluent. In other words, it would help perhaps not the greedy, but certainly not the needy. Could he elaborate on that further? The impression which I received was that the program tended to be used by those who could well afford to do it with their own money.

Mr. Tupper: Mr. Speaker, I prefaced my remarks by saying that to my knowledge there have been no in-depth studies done by either the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They were the two organizations which were, in large part, responsible for the administration of the program. There was no analysis done by those organizations as to who was using the program and who was benefiting from it.

I think my hon. colleague heard me correctly when I said that my impression in the greater Ottawa community, and particularly in my own riding, was that for the most part those who could afford to make the conversions on their own—energy conscious people who are fairly knowledgeable about the markets—took advantage of the program. Clearly, it was not the low-income people. The supplementary point I would like to make is that I firmly believe those people would have converted from oil anyway, regardless of the grant.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, is the Member suggesting that low-income people are somehow less energy conscious than high-income people?

Mr. Tupper: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the point I am making.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, again my question deals with the issue of the facts which have been laid before us. In the document of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, which analyses the three-year program, it states that cost targets in Saskatchewan and Alberta were reflecting oil use in hard to reach rural and remote areas. Could the Member reiterate what he said to the House that hard to reach rural and remote areas which took advantage of the program are, in fact, the high-income users about which he speaks?

Mr. Tupper: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I am not speaking at cross purposes with my colleague. We must recognize, when looking at the statistical data on the program, that targets were set across Canada for the use of the program. Of course, the targets were differnt in different parts of the nation. The targets reflected local needs and concerns. Those targets were achieved in varying degrees. Some of them overachieved their targets in certain years and others underachieved. In balance, across Canada, I think most of the targets were achieved. But I would repeat that in my own riding, I have been able to observe what was going on firsthand, and without the knowledge of the thoughtful research work which has been done across the nation, my impression is clearly that it was upper-income groups which, for the most part, took advantage of the off-oil program. That is not taking away from CHIP, in which people from all income groups participated and from which they benefited.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period allowed for questions and comments has now expired. On debate, the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps).

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be in the position of resuming debate, because if government Members are tabling information upon which they are basing their decisions to terminate these programs, it is unfortunate that they do not have the facts before them.

In fact, the major take-up on the Canadian Oil Substitution Program over the three-year period was not in the Province of Ontario, but in the Provinces of Quebec and Manitoba. The Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Tupper) made the statement that somehow the take-up was high in Ontario in Quebec. First, I do not agree that that is a reason for eliminating the program. I think the Member should fight for the residents in his riding and not say that because the take-up is high the Government is going to cancel it. Second, the Hon. Member should be aware of all the facts before he supports the termination of a program which he indicated was working.

The Hon. Member will know that the targets were being achieved. He will also know that COSP was expected to run until 1990. As a result of the termination of the program five years early, thousands upon thousands of home owners across the country will not be able to take advantage of the program. For example, we could examine the potential take-up. Had the program not been terminated, in Newfoundland, in 1985, some 4,705 home owners would have taken advantage of the program had it been available. Yet this Tory Government is going to terminate it.

Mr. McDermid: It is available.

Ms. Copps: It is available, but the Bill which is before the House is a Bill designed to terminate its availability. Government Members should be aware of what they are voting on. Every government Member who has spoken today has said what a tremendous program this has been and what a boon it has been in reducing our dependence upon non-renewable resources. At the same time, those Members are agreeing to sound the death-knell for this program.

The Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton said that the people across the country who would take advantage of the program were primarily from Ontario and Quebec. How many families in Nova Scotia—which is not exactly the richest area of this country—would have taken advantage of the program? There would have been 4,665 families who would have taken advantage of it, most of whom will no longer have that opportunity.

I visited Halifax recently and I can tell the House that the people in the City of Halifax are in a desperate housing situation. Any assistance that the Government could provide, through COSP and other programs, in upgrading and making available energy efficient housing across the country should be supported rather than negated as is currently the case.

In New Brunswick, we see that over 6,000 homeowners would have taken advantage of the program if it had been continued. Mr. Speaker, all Progressive Conservatives agree on this program. They agree like the yesmen from Quebec who all agreed that Domtar should be given subsidies, and agreed as well when the Government cancelled the subsidies. The same applies to the Bill before the House at this moment.

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Tupper) said earlier it was a fantastic program that had reduced our dependence on non-renewable energy sources. If it was such a good program, if a third of Canadian homeowners who need this program today because they are still using non-renewable energy sources to heat their homes . . . But why do we not continue this program since the Government is introducing in the House an over-all program to deal with the energy issue in industry, homes and other areas?

● (1600)

I find it amazing, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members of the Government are lauding the benefits of this program and the effect it has had in encouraging Canadians to get off oil—which was in fact the original intention of the program—and pointing to figures which show that Canadians are becoming more energy efficient, at the same time as they cut the jugular of the very programs which have been at the forefront of this energy consciousness raising which we have seen happening over the last three years. I cannot understand why the first program which is to be cut by this Government is a program to help home owners.

Home owners perform a yeoman's service in this country. They develop the economy and create jobs. In fact, Mr. Speaker, they are the backbone of our economy. But, unfortunately, this Conservative Government, the Government of the small business person and the home owner, in its very first few months in office, has done more than its share to destroy the hope of young Canadians of ever owning their own homes. Government has cut off COSP, cut off CHIP, and has currently doubled the cost of mortgage insurance under CMHC. With one fell swoop of the pen the average home owner in Canada is going to have to pay another $3,000 over the life of his or her mortgage. This has been done by a Government which purports to support home owners.

Mr. McDermid: That is pretty cheap insurance.

Ms. Copps: We have seen the CMHC mortgage insurance increase, the decision to terminate the COSP program, the decision to let CHIP run out—

Mr. McDermid: You let the insurance program operate in the hole.

Ms. Copps: The Deputy House Leader for the Conservatives seems to be prone to blather on from time to time.

Mr. McDermid: I just got a promotion.

Ms. Copps: You got a promotion and I am happy. I just wish, though, for one moment, that the Hon. Member would get up and make a statement or comment about this particular Bill.

Mr. McDermid: If you sit down, I will.

Ms. Copps: If the Hon. Member did, he would echo the statements of his own colleagues. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, it is like the Domtar question. Government Members love to stand up in the House on Standing Orders 21, beating their breasts and saying to the Canadian people—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, this is just to give the Hon. Member a chance to collect herself and get back to the Bill before the House and contribute some fresh ideas instead of talking at random.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Hon. Member did not understand the analogy I drew between Domtar and the COSP. It is just like what happened when the Prime Minister made his promise in Newfoundland . . . Now we see it did not mean a thing and that the Prime Minister was not as good as his word.

Mr. Speaker, we know the same applies to the Domtar case. We now know that the same Members who rise in the House and tell Canadians that it was a good program and that it worked well and encouraged all Canadians to save energy—those very same Members are deciding to terminate the program.

Mr. Speaker, they have the same attitude towards Domtar. Hon. Members say it is a good plan, Quebec Members are saying they need a subsidy for Domtar and at the very same time the Government decides to cut or rather refuses to give the subsidy. Mr. Speaker, that is why the Domtar case raises the same questions as the oil substitution program, and so, all Canadians should now ask themselves whether they can trust the credibility of this Government. Do they really stand behind everything they say in the House or are they merely using the House to deceive Canadians about their real motives? Mr. Speaker, if all Members who showed tremendous support for these programs still support them, why are they dropping the program? Why are they dropping a program that in British Columbia, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

In British Columbia in 1985, if this program had not been terminated, 11,375 home owners would have been able to take advantage of it. Yet we see those same Hon. Members who said it worked denying to a potential 144,000 home owners across this country in one single fiscal year the chance to develop an energy efficient alternative through the Canadian Oil Substitution Program.

I am sorry if it hurts Government Members when I say that they are not fighting for home owners. I am sorry it hurts the feelings of those Hon. Members on the government side of the House who express frustration when I point out in this House that that single act of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation of doubling the cost of mortgage insurance will cost the average new home owner in Canada over $3,000 over the life of his or her mortgage. I am sorry if that hurts the feelings of hon. members of the Government. I am also sorry that this Government in its first few months in office, with an overwhelmingly solid mandate from the Canadian people, has not seen fit to fight for and promote the very issues which it talked about in the election campaign.

I look to the famous government promises book. The Government made 39 promises about energy. It dealt, for example, with setting up a special program to encourage the use of alcohol as a lead substitute for octane boosting. Consider the possibility of providing funds to help with the construction of a tidal power plant or providing funds for provincial utilities to investigate the feasibility of the construction of wind farms. How many of these alternatives, these renewable resources, have in fact seen the light of day since the Government, with its massive majority, took office? What we have seen is no move toward more conservation.

I think the Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Tupper) was right when he made the freudian slip by saying he enjoyed this move towards "conservatism". I believe what we have seen in this House is not a move toward conservation or the encouragement of conservation but a move toward the true Conservative philosophies which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) tried to hide from the Canadian people during the time of the election. The Prime Minister pretended to the Canadian people that he was going to respect universality. The Prime Minister pretended that he was going to encourage programs like the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. The Prime Minister pretended to Canadians that he was not going to hit out at the elderly by cutting back on their old age pensions, or the older workers. The Prime Minister and the Government throughout the election campaign told the Canadian people that they could rest assured—the Conservatives were like wolves in sheep's clothing—that programs which have been developed and built by Liberals are going to be safeguarded. The Conservatives said those programs were going to be kept because they believe in medicare, universality and off-oil energy substitution. In fact, the moment they were elected, they showed their true colours. Their true colours were to cut the Canadian energy conservation program. The only place—

Mr. Epp (Provencher): I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member obviously can enter into debate in whatever way she wishes. However, she cannot use this House to make statements which are not fact. When she said there have been cuts in social policies and that we are going to continue, that simply is not the fact.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the fact is that this Government has introduced a document which considers doing just that.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, this is what happened today in Question Period. You cannot change the wording and leave the same impression. The Member is doing the very same thing again. I say to her that we have not cut, there has been no intention to cut, and in fact there has been an increase in the spouses' allowance. They were the ones who objected to it.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but the facts belie the statement made by the Minister. The facts will show that the Govenent is currently considering abolition of the tax deductions available to people with families. If you do not consider that to be an anti-child and anti-family move, then I do not think you have the pulse of the Canadian people. If you think the Canadian people will stand by and allow this Government to do away with tax exemptions for people who have families, I think you are wrong. I think the Minister will recognize that a single person earning $40,000 a year should pay more in taxes than a family person supporting four or five children. I think that is a basic Canadian right and I think the Minister and his Government must in fact be tricking the Canadian people. On the one hand they issue a document which suggests a reduction or abolition of the child tax credit and at the same time they stand there with straight faces and tell people there is no change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. May I suggest to the Hon. Member that the issues being discussed for the past few minutes may not specifically concern the Bill we are debating this afternoon.

[Translation]

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) on a point of order.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) is responding to the comments made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I would suggest to the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) that I have no intention of inflaming the debate. The reason I stepped in is precisely to avoid discussions from both sides on a matter that is not relevant to the legislation as such, and I am doing this quite objectively, as much for this side of the House as for the other. The Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps).

Ms. Copps: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would simply point out to the House that I was referring to the Canadian Oil Substitution Program, when the Minister rose on a fallacious point of order to interrupt me. Therefore, if you are here to interrupt me on different matters, that is your right, but you are simply chopping up my speech.

[English]

I can understand why government Members are a little jittery. At the same time, the Government is moving to cut the COSP and CHIP programs, we look to the Prime Minister's Office to see what kind of an example he is giving to the Canadian people. He is saying, "You cannot benefit from COSP because we are going to terminate it. But I can turn around and increase my own office budget by 57 per cent". He then has the nerve to say that it is a small percentage of the over-all Budget.

Mr. McDermid: Don Johnston said that.

Ms. Copps: I am sorry that the Hon. Member was not in the House when his Leader said it was a small percentage of the Budget. I realize he says so many things in so many places that it is very hard for him to remember what he said to whom, but I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people feel that the activities of the Prime Minister and his Government are stretching credibility to the utmost. They tell the Canadian people to tighten their belts. They say, "We are chopping, we are cutting back on COSP and the child tax credit". They tell 55-year old Canadian workers, "We are cutting out your opportunity for unemployment insurance".

Mr. Epp (Provencher): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologize for always intervening, but the Hon. Member just used the words "child tax credit". I do not know if she knows what that credit is, but she will know from the consultation paper that there is an increase, and I wish she would stay with the facts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I regret that a couple of minutes ago I listened perhaps at too great a length to certain points of order. This is obviously a question of debate, and there will be a question and comment period after the speech made by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps). The Hon. Minister may participate in the debate at that time.

Mr. Taylor: How about talking about the Bill?

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I have been talking about the Bill for the last 20 minutes. What I have been saying is that this is another indication of the bad will of this Government. This Government was elected with a massive majority on the basis of promises that it was going to ensure the kind of Liberal programs which, by the admission of government Members here today, have worked. The Canadian Oil Substitution Program has worked. I urge government Members to rethink their decision to terminate this program. In doing so they are stretching the credibility of this Government at the very time when their Prime Minister is raising his own budget by 57 per cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Questions or comments?

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will know that our Treasury bills today sold for 11.7 per cent for a three-month period. Does she also know that the savings to the Government on termination of COSP is $424 million between now and 1988? On the CHIP program, it is $376 million between now and 1988. Is it her view that we should increase the budget deficit and the burden on the children of Canada and their children as well as the home owners of Canada by darn near $1 billion in order to supply insulation and new furnaces for the relatively well off in this country? Is that the Liberal policy?

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I am really confused. The Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn)—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Copps: —exhibits an incredible ignorance of the intent of the COSP program if he is suggesting that the upfront cost of off-oil conversion is going to contribute to the deficit in the long term. On the contrary, the words of his colleague from Nepean-Carleton, and others who have spoken on this issue in the House, clearly demonstrate that this particular measure is going to save the Canadian taxpayer money in the long run. I am sorry if the Hon. Member can only see as far as the end of his fiscal nose for 1985. In the Liberal Party we are concerned with the long-term future of this country and our determination to live within our own means with our own resources with the kind of help that was given to us through the COSP program. If he cannot understand that, then he does not understand what conservation really is.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Government spent $1.4 billion of taxpayers' money on these programs to the end of 1984. The return from income tax was about $300 million. The net increase in the deficit and the burden on the taxpayer was over $1 billion. Would she have us continue to borrow and borrow and borrow to assist the relatively affluent to reinsulate their homes and substitute new furnaces for old?

Ms. Copps: First of all, there is absolutely no evidence to suggest that the people who took advantage of this program were the affluent. In fact, the Energy, Mines and Resources documents show just the opposite. The Hon. Member's Government has just tabled the highest Estimates in the history of this country. His Prime Minister can find funds to increase his own office budget by 57 per cent. How can the Hon. Member sit there with a straight face and talk about the track record of previous Liberal Governments when his own Prime Minister is a disgrace to the Canadian people?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to the Hon. Member because the more she talks, the more her credibility disappears. I know the Hon. Member would not want to mislead the House deliberately. I know she would not want to do that. I just want to point out some facts to her from what she said today to show that she was really flirting with the truth when saying that the Government is not interested in conservation, renewable energy, or housing.

Let us just take one item from the new Estimates, for example. There will be $4 million in support of super energy efficient housing demonstrations, the R-2000 Program. As shown in the 1984-85 Estimates, the former Government did not even participate in that program. It did not have anything to do with it. With regard to transportation energy conservation, there will be $50,000 for a task force this year. There will be $16 million in support of the development and demonstration of new technologies related to renewable and non-conventional resources of energy conservation and oil substitution by conventional fuels. That was not even in the Liberal Budget. They did not even pay any attention to that. There will be $3.7 million in support of industrial energy research and development programs. That was not even in the Liberal Budget last year.

I can go on. There is $17.4 million in support of Atlantic provinces to assist industrial and commercial establishments and institutions to finance a portion of the capital investment in energy conservation. Do you want more? There is $20 million, double what is was last year, in support of organization to stimulate the use of biomass residue as a fuel in place of conventional fuels and to cogenerate electricity and heat.

So the facts and figures that the Hon. Member has been laying before the House this afternoon are completely inaccurate. The assumptions that she is making that the Government is not interested in conservation and is not doing anything about it are totally wrong. The facts are presented in the Budget Papers, Part III, Expenditure Plans of Energy, Mines and Resources. I would suggest that the Hon. Member should take time from her very busy schedule to read this, absorb it, and understand what is going on in energy conservation in the country today.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if the Member does not agree with the statistics that are presented by this own Department. Everything that I have read here today—and I would be very happy to table the document in the House—has come from the Government on the basis of its own statistical provisions.

I cannot believe that the Parliamentary Secretary would stand up in the House and brag about $50,000 that he and his Government are spending on a task force. I realize that government Members must have something to do. I understand why a number of them who do not have parliamentary secretaryships are very very frustrated. For the Parliamentary Secretary to stand up in the House and brag about the fact that he is going to blow $50,000 of the taxpayers' money on a task force to look at energy conservation across Canada, when we know the problems and solutions, is absolutely ludicrous.

I can see one way where the Government can make some savings. It has promised certain research into wind conservation energy. I think that by merely shutting up the Parliamentary Secretary, we could probably make a great saving in the area of wind energy conservation.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the only comment I have is that the credibility of the Hon. Member is rapidly going downhill. She might have been able to play those games in Ontario when she sat on the back-bench there in opposition. I think she has been in opposition far too long. She is getting an extremely warped outlook on life. Her whole 20 minutes speech was a negative diatribe of clichés that she has been using for I don't know how many years since she has been an elected official. If she had any positive suggestions on renewable energy, she would not be spreading around the falsehoods that she was today.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. McDermid: Well, Mr. Speaker, I make the point that—

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I do not believe it is parliamentary for him to suggest I am spreading falsehoods, and I would merely ask him to retract that.

Mr. Taylor: That is exactly what you were doing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Would the Parliamentary Secretary for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. McDermid) consider maybe rephrasing the word used?

Mr. McDermid: Far be it from me to offend the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps), Mr. Speaker. I will certainly withdraw that remark about spreading falsehoods. She accused the Government of not being interested in housing and conservation. The facts were laid out by myself this afternoon showing that the Government is very interested in that. For her to go around saying that it is not interested is not true. That is the point I am trying to make. The facts were presented this afternoon in the House of Commons very clearly.

I think the Hon. Member will admit that programs which are brought in by governments cannot last forever. There must be a sunset clause in programs. One of the problems within governments in Canada over the last number of years is that programs have been brought in and then forgotten about. They have not been assessed to see if they are doing what they were created to do. The programs that we are debating today in Bill C-24 have accomplished what they set out to do. There is no question about that. They have helped Canada to become more aware. The role of the Government today is to educate the people on how they can save money by converting on their own. Taxpayers of the country do not expect to be bribed with their own money to convert when they know they will make savings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The period for questions and comments is now over.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When I asked the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to withdraw the words about the untruth of my statements, the Member for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce) made a comment to the effect that the reason I was allowed to make the statements is that I am a woman. I would like the House to know, first and foremost, that I am a Member of the House. It is a question of privilege when a Member suggests that another Member is allowed to say or do certain things because of their gender. I ask that that particular Member withdraw his comment.

Mr. McDermid: They warned me what she would be like. I cannot say it's a total surprise.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): If the Member for Duvernay said that, I in the Chair did not hear it. If he did say it, it is unparliamentary. I will therefore reserve my decision on this matter. We will now, if you please, resume debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Rossi: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi) on a point of order.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, knowing the Hon. Member for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce) as I do, if you were to ask him whether he did say that, I think he would withdraw the words like a gentleman.

[English]

Mr. Epp (Provencher): That's not the procedure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): No, no, no. Order please. We will not debate the decision of the Chair. We will now resume debate. The Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Edwards).

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to speak on Bill C-24. It has been remarked that Members on this side of the House may be jittery. Perhaps that is understandable after the last few minutes. We have been exposed, and I use my words carefully, Mr. Speaker, to a dubious cornucopia of half-truths, irrelevancies, and misrepresentations. I would call that speech a kitchen sink speech. I was intrigued with the Hon. Member's use of figures. It is astonishing that she was able to pause long enough to listen to people about their intentions about COSP. I will say nothing to criticize the Hon. Member's voting record which I admire greatly.

I do wish to say something about her use of words, and I think it is unfortunate that she is not here to absorb this. It is rather unfortunate that on the day on which the name of the new President of the Council on the Status of Women was announced the Hon. Member used the phrase "yeomen" when she described the householders of Canada. I think "yeowomen" would have been a much more appropriate use of the language.

I would like to offer to the House, Mr. Speaker, some actual figures on units converted under COSP so that the record may be set straight.

The provincial totals for units converted are as follows: Newfoundland, 26,500; Nova Scotia, 27,500; New Brunswick, 33,600; Prince Edward Island, 11,000; Quebec, 398,100; Ontario, 277,100; Manitoba, which the Hon. Member suggested was in the lead, was 24,400; Saskatchewan, 12,800; Alberta, 5,200 and British Columbia, 77,400. In the Territories there were 3,100 units converted.

It was suggested that the hard to reach areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta were and remain unserved by this program. I suggest that these areas have long since converted from liquid petroleum to either propane or natural gas, which is available in abundance even in the hard to reach areas of those two provinces.

Those of us who are long in the tooth, and remember the days of stoking a coal furnace are just delighted that natural gas is available in such abundance in this country as an alternative fuel. The original intention of the gas company of Alberta, Northwestern Utilities, which was the first to pipe natural gas to one of Canada's major cities, was that natural gas would be used only as a home heating fuel. There was no intention that it would be used industrially at that time, since it was long before the natural gas derivatives or the processes known to create the many byproducts from natural gas were developed.

I agree with my hon. friend, the Member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Tupper), when he remarked that energy conservation has become a matter that is now in vogue. At one time energy conservation was a technicality or a guilt trip as far as the Canadian consciousness is concerned. It has moved to the forefront of awareness, and I suggest that the major benefit of the two programs that are being terminated was to implant conservation in the consciousness of the Canadian public. Now it is time for Canadians to assume their responsibilities and realize their own economies and contribute to their own energy savings. Surely there is a great will among Canadians to do so.

I will return to the question of whether there is such a will and sufficient follow-through among our commercial and industrial users. Bill C-24 represents a substantial part of the Government's effort to reduce the monstrous deficit. Bill C-24 is an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Home Act. The thrust of the Bill is twofold: it provides for the termination of COSP on March 31 of this year and for the termination of CHIP on March 31 of next year by amending the two existing Acts.

In 1981-82, gas conversions represented 48 per cent of that year's COSP activity, electricity represented 36 per cent, while wood represented 14 per cent. In 1983 to 1984, gas conversions had decreased to 25 per cent of all activities and electricity had risen to 55 per cent.

Let me spend a few minutes evaluating the CHIP program. A major evaluation of the CHIP program, completed in August, 1983, showed that the program increased over-all conservation activity by approximately 30 per cent. Other findings were that about 37 per cent of CHIP users would have done nothing without the grant, and that the activity in each house had been cost effective, with an average of 17 per cent decrease in fuel consumption.

Unlike the COSP program, CHIP was used mostly by those who needed it most, that is, the poor, elderly and those heating with oil. The majority of those people have been reached by this program.

This evaluation also identified several operational problems in the computer system, monitoring and the application process for consumers. Those were subsequently corrected.

The volume of CHIP take-up varied sharply over its six and a half years of life. Many of the factors accounting for those changes included sharp fluctuations in international energy prices and public perceptions of both supply and price trends, the Government's deliberate changes in eligibility dates, program funding, the contribution formula and program criteria, as well as related moves by insulation contractors to promote CHIP, extending in some cases to excessively aggressive sales.

CHIP was approved by Cabinet in April of 1977 as an expansion of the earlier Home Insulation Program. The HIP program had been initiated in January of that year in the Provinces of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia to encourage home owners to reduce oil consumption for space heating as one means of offsetting the impact of higher electricity prices in those two areas. In October of 1980, the CHIP termination date was extended from 1984 to the end of 1987. Of course, on November 8 of last year, as part of the Government's deficit reduction exercise, CHIP's termination date was changed to March 31 of next year. CHIP and HIP were both delivered by CMHC since their inception. On April 1, 1981, full responsibility for finance, policy, promotion and monitoring was transferred to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. CMHC continued to process the applications, issue the cheques, provide inspection services for both quality and compliance control, and provide Energy, Mines and Resources with management information.

The delivery system includes a network of nine regional offices and a central management and application processing centre in Montreal. Energy Mines and Resources has been concerned with ensuring high quality work under CHIP and energy savings that will continue over the life of the dwellings in which conservation measures had been undertaken.

Programs of research, technology transfer, industry support, education and quality assurance were directed by the CHIP program within Energy Mines and Resources.

In 1983 and 1984, CHIP developed and implemented a new quality and program compliance assurance system. That included a new sampling plan in which inspections could be directed toward problem contractors, specific types of work and regions of the country along with new reports that allowed managers to review program performance. All inspectors doing CHIP work have been trained and tested to a recognized standard, and various inter agency management committees were created to oversee the performance of the quality assurance system.

I have mentioned that there were some requirements and needs in the commercial and industrial areas. One of the important vehicles of testing energy efficiency has been the energy bus program which has been performing in many of our provinces. In my Province of Alberta, for example, some 460 companies were surveyed and found to have some kind of insulation and conservation problems. However, the unfortunate gap is that they were not told how to correct these problems. There is a communication problem in this respect because these industries are very aware that their energy costs keep rising. However, they would like to have better information from government agencies precisely with respect to how those savings can be realized.

There is a program called the Consultant Advice Assistance Program. If that program were doing its job fully it would probably give some proper advice on how conservation could be carried out.

The momentum of which I spoke earlier is now behind the private sector to get busy and provide conservation measures in the commercial, industrial and residential areas. Private energy conservation consultant firms with extensive expertise in design, application and marketing of complete retrofit packages could have the proper input to formulate and guide the implementation of such programs after completing a study of the many and varied incentive programs currently producing positive results in other jurisdictions.

There are probably not a great many energy conservation consultants in the country. One argument often heard against the use of such consultants is: "We already know a lot more ways of saving energy at this plant than we have people or money to do something about". That argument is very real to many people—why heap up more money-saving ideas until something gets done about the ones we already know of?

The fact is that this argument really points out a pressing need for assistance. Priorities must be established and a defensible coherent program with clearly defined benefits needs to be sold to management of various private firms. Many plants and facilities need help, lots of help, in formulating energy conservation programs and expediting their implementation. The energy conservation consultant adds his special talents and qualifications to the abilities and skills of the people who have been working with the energy systems, processes and equipment for an extended time on a day to day basis. The energy conservation consultant is a professional and a specialist in the field of practical energy technology. He has participated in many plant energy studies and has developed unique and demanding skills. A good energy conservation consultant is also a good teacher. He will have no trade secrets. He will do his best to impart as much of his skills and knowledge as he possibly can to the clients with whom he works.

As well, there is the element of objectivity. Being from outside an organization, the energy conservation consultant is free to find and express the best solutions to the energy problem without deference to long established opinions, company politics or ingrained management philosophies. To consultant, to be effective, must be diplomatic and must consider the feelings of other people.

The next element is credibility. If an expert is paid a few to come in, look at a problem and give a solution, his solution will be believed far more readily than an identical solution expressed by a long-time employee.

The next criterion is the question of concentration of effort. With the possible exception of a plant energy manager, no plant employees are free to devote their full, undivided attention and efforts exclusively to energy conservation for an extended period of time. Both the individual consultants and the firm with which they are associated should be dedicated to the concept of true professionalism. Professionals are dedicated to providing a necessary specialized service and will place the proper and effective conduct of their work ahead of all other considerations. Also, there are the elements of reputation and record, understanding of clients' problems, soundness and credibility of proposals.

Some organizations have offered free or very low-cost energy studies. After they gain access to the plant, it is found that they are really sales people promoting the application of an energy related product or service. This type of survey or plant study can be legitimate and be of benefit to the plant or facilities if the firm offering the service clearly states the purpose and limitations of the work to be performed.

It is entirely possible that the momentum provided by CHIP and COSP, but CHIP in particular, will now give a consciousness to the people of Canada, plant managers and owners, as well as householders, to turn to private energy conservation consultants who efficiently, thoroughly and honourably can now tackle the conservation challenge before us. It is a substantial challenge. I submit that this is an area in which a tremendous number of jobs can be generated. I have had a study done as to what a $1 million investment could do over a period of six years. The returns over a six-year period, starting in 1985 and carrying through to 1990, on a $1 million investment would be in excess of $3 million. The value of exporting our products, the value of expenditure avoidance and the tremendous value of all the energy saved or consumption avoidance, translate to more energy and resources for the future. Such a program could remove 48 people from UIC or the welfare rolls, and to train them would cost approximately $1,680,000, plus the cost of finding employment. I submit that this would be a wise investment.

I should like to return for a moment to the question of COSP and whether it in fact achieved its objectives. Results among the provinces vary greatly. Some provinces show an extraordinary success rate due to such factors as aggressive marketing by the utilities. For example, Manitoba achieved 147 per cent of its three-year target. On the other hand, Nova Scotia reached only 59 per cent of its three-year target because the natural gas pipeline expected in the Maritimes had not been built. The Provinces of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, as well as Yukon and the Northwest Territories, were allowed special provisions because of the lack of alternatives to oil heating. In those areas, conservation measures such as insulation, draught proofing and the improvement of existing oil systems were eligible for grants under COSP. As a result, Newfoundland achieved 115 per cent of its three-year target, P.E.I. achieved 90 per cent, and the Territories achieved 100 per cent. All together, conservation measures account for approximately 5 per cent of national COSP activity.

The rate of conversion to the various alternative energy sources has changed throughout the program. In 1981-82, gas conversions represented 48 per cent of that year's COSP activity, electricity was 36 per cent, while wood represented 14 per cent. In 1983-84, gas conversions had decreased to 25 per cent of all activity, and electricity had risen to 55 per cent. This decline in gas conversion is partly accounted for by a decline in conversions in the Province of Ontario. In 1981-82, conversions in Ontario accounted for 43 per cent of all conversions done in that year. By 1983-84, Ontario's share had declined to 20 per cent. Furthermore, within the province, gas conversions accounted for 63 per cent of activity in 1981-82, but it dropped to 43 per cent in 1983-84. Interestingly enough, nationally wood has accounted for 22 per cent of all COSP activity. A great majority of those conversions were made in rural areas by householders with access to cheap wood fuel and with a lifestyle that accepted the extra tasks involved in heating with wood.

As has been said earlier in the debate, the key thrust of the amendments in this Bill is to wind up programs which seem to have achieved their initial objectives and which have given momentum to other initiatives that could be done by the private sector in years to come. Beyond that and overriding that consideration, the vital contribution of this Bill is to assist in reducing the greatest burden upon, as my hon. friend said, our children and our children's children, in other words, relieving the deficit which besets our nation.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Hon. Member on his speech and I want to ask him a specific question about Alberta, since he took interest in another subject matter before the House concerning Newfoundland and expressed his support for the proposal which the Hon. Member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception (Mr. Johnson) and myself were proposing as far as the CBC cuts were concerned.

Being from Alberta, the Hon. Member is obviously very concerned about the future of that province and the number of jobs in that province as they relate to the oil industry. When we look at the total output of refineries in the Province of Alberta, we see a steady decline over the last several years. That decline has led to conversions within those oil refineries to different types of products. Generally speaking, they are getting away from production of home heating fuels. Due to the policy of the provincial Government, we have also seen a drastic increase in the petrochemical industry in that province. Would the Hon. Member say that the energy conversion program had a considerable amount or a small amount to do with the requirement for heating oil and its incredible decline in Canada over the last several years? Does he think that they are both interrelated?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Hon. Member's comments and his question. As I understand the question, it is whether the conversions of the end products of the Alberta refineries and the emphasis on petrochemical priorities have to do with the reduction in supply of home heating oil and whether that somehow relates to this over-all question.

I believe that the reduction in the production of home heating oil out of Alberta refineries relates more to the decline in demand in the markets readily available to those refineries. If the Hon. Member and I were to check, I believe we would discover that the production of home heating fuel declined rather more rapidly in Alberta than it did in other refineries, for example refineries in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I believe there may indeed be some relationship of decline in demand in accessible markets.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The figures really do not lie as far as the output of oil refineries in Canada is concerned and the total consumption in each province of Canada and the products from the oil refineries. Does the Hon. Member see a steady decline in the production of refined oil in the Province of Alberta, as has been the case over the past several years, or does he agree with the recent report of the National Energy Board which stated that demand would reverse itself into a 1 per cent increase over the next several years? Does he think there is any end to the slide of demand for oil-related products out of the Province of Alberta and its refineries?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the thrust of that question. I understand from discussions that I have had the privilege of engaging in with representatives of the industry, the federal Department and personnel of the Alberta Government that there is general agreement with the predictions of the National Energy Board that there will be a reversal and that their projections of a gradual increase will, in fact, be borne out.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member to give us his assessment of the effect on the country's oil import bill and also his assessment of the effect on equilization payments to those provinces using imported oil that will be caused by the withdrawal of the COSP and CHIP programs.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, that information is probably available. I do not have it readily at hand. My belief, as I said in my remarks, is that there will be an increased momentum in off-oil conversion and there will be an increase in home insulation and commercial and industrial insulation because of the real and genuine economies that people are now well aware they can achieve by engaging in those conversions and in those retrofits.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Let me assure the Hon. Member that I did not expect him to provide numerical answers to the question about the oil import bill or the equalization payments bill. There is only one thing worse than those who merely spout statistics in this Chamber, that is, to alternate those who alternate between statistics and invective. Can the Hon. Member give me some examples of the effect which he predicts will take place, namely that by the withdrawal of a subsidy or economic stimulus activity will be enhanced? I would like to hear an example of a similar case in which that sort of thing happened.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I promise there will be no invective from this chair in the House. There may be some editorial comment, but no invective.

I rather expect that there will be some effect temporarily upon oil imports. There will be some effect temporarily on the question of equalization payments. However, I would not expect, and I concede this is guesswork, that there would be a lasting effect. Nor do I believe it would be very deep or severe.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I would just like to clarify to the Hon. Member that I certainly did not have him in mind when I made the reference to those whose speeches are composed of equal parts of statistics and invective, but rather the Member who just caught the plane out of here or will be doing so in a couple of minutes. I have a final supplementary for the Hon. Member. What effect does he think the withdrawal of these subsidies will have on employment in this country?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I'm sorry, but the period for questions and comments is now over.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 45, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—Canadian Security Intelligence Service (a) Size of budget (b) Service's accountability; the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker)—Energy (a) Federal Newfoundland agreement (b) Government position.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier in this session I introduced a Bill, now on the Order Paper as No. 59. I now seek the indulgence of the House to switch that with a motion of which I gave notice two weeks ago. The motion is No. 173. I would greatly appreciate the indulgence of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is there unanimous consent that the House proceed to Item No. 37?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

RIGHT HON. JOHN G. DIEFENBAKER

SUGGESTED ERECTION OF STATUE ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of honoring the memory of the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker by commissioning a statue of him to be placed on Parliament Hill.

She said: Mr. Speaker, each day in the House of Commons, Members of Parliament address issues which affect the administration of the Government of Canada. The future course of Canada is the business of this Chamber as elected representatives from all three Parties work together to build a better nation. However, it may be necessary from time to time to pause in our deliberations in order to look back and take action on an issue which may not be at the top of our agenda today but which nevertheless has great significance for Canada.

I rise this day to speak on such an issue and in so doing to attempt to correct a certain historial oversight which to some degree does not do justice to the memory of a man who was a giant in his time, a western Canadian with a truly national vision and the thirteenth Prime Minister of Canada, the late Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Browes: Mr. Speaker, it has been the custom of the Parliament of Canada to commission statues of great Canadian leader and to place the monuments on the grounds of Parliament Hill. As my colleagues here may be aware, no less than 11 monuments are located on Parliament Hill at present. These monuments are dedicated to the memory of great Canadians as well as one dedictated to our reigning monarch at the time of Confederation, Queen Victoria.

Other persons so honoured include Sir Louis Lafontaine and Robert Baldwin who as joint Premiers of United Canada formed the great Ministry of 1848 to 1851 which successfully established into practice the principle of responsible government in Canada. George Brown, publisher and founder of a national newspaper in Canada who was Reform leader in Upper Canada during the 1850s is also so honoured. He went on to play a leading role at the Charlottetown and Quebec conferences on Confederation.

Also honoured is Sir Georges Cartier who played a conspicuous role in the movement toward Confederation. He was joint premier in the Macdonald-Cartier administration of 1858-1862 and conducted the key negotiations by which French Canada accepted the federation proposals. As well, we have Sir John A. Macdonald the first Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada who worked to complete political unification and economic integration with the remaining territories of British North America during his many years in office.

There are others so honoured including Thomas D'Arcy McGee, a noted poet, journalist, politician and father of Confederation who unfortunately was assassinated at his home on Sparks Street in 1868. As well, Alexander Mackenzie is included. He was Prime Minister from 1873 to 1878 and formed the first Liberal administration of the Dominion of Canada. Also honoured is Sir Wilfrid Laurier, our distinguished Prime Minister from 1896 to 1911, who gave the new Dominion a respected and independent voice in the British Empire. He worked to transcend differences in race and religion as Canada welcomed waves of immigrants to its shores.

Included as well is Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister from 1911 to 1920. He was a devoted and courageous wartime leader who led Canadians to accept their new-found international responsibilities. Through his efforts, Canadian nationalism flourished as our nation sat as an independent power at peace talks and secured its rightful place in the League of Nations. Finally, Mackenzie King is also honoured. He was Canada's longest serving Prime Minister and led our nation through six long years of the Second World War. In so doing, he lay the foundation for Canada's post-war prosperity.

These distinguished founders and leaders of our nation are justly honoured with a permanent place on the grounds of Parliament Hill, the bronze image of each standing as eloquent testimony to a lifetime of achievement and dedication to Canada. No Canadian would deny these fine Canadians such an honour. Recognition of their achievement transcends partisan considerations. They are quite simply among the best leaders our nation has produced. I submit that to this history should be added the name of a certain contemporary leader of Canada, a man with vision equal to that of those 10 aforementioned individuals, a man whose life was Parliament and whose Government significantly advanced the cause of freedom and prosperity for all Canadians.

I ask that Members of Parliament join with me on this motion requesting that a statue on Parliament Hill be commissioned forthwith in rightful honour of Canada's thirteenth Prime Minister, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Browes: John Diefenbaker was Prime Minister at a time when Canada was on the threshold of emerging greatness. His initiatives were the force which propelled Canada to that greatness. His inspiration was a vision of Canada unique to the times: an understanding that Canada's strength lay in her richness of land and resources.

Among some Diefenbaker initiatives were the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam, the development of hydro-electric power in the maritime provinces, massive sales of wheat to China, and the introduction of the Roads to Resources Program designed to open new regions for the development of mineral and energy resources.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker reached the pinnacle of his career with the introduction and passage of the Canadian Bill of Rights in 1960. For the first time, a written statute set out the fundamental freedoms and rights of individual Canadians which must be respected under federal law. It was a crowning piece of legislation, the quality of which was an indication of the magnitude of the pride and dedication to duty of this late great man.

A mere listing of accomplishments, however distinguished they may be, is not an adequate indication of the significant force John Diefenbaker exerted over the collective character of all Canadians. It was the man's oratory, the power of his words, which captivated the imagination of the people of Canada and earned the respect of parliamentarians in this great Chamber. His words and speeches revealed great pride and strength of spirit.

Mr. Diefenbaker once said that there were three speeches of which he was particularly proud. The first was his denunciation in Parliament of the internment of Canadians of Japanese descent during the Second World War, in which he thundered:

> There are no hyphenated Canadians!

The second of these was his speech made at Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, in 1957, in which he outlined the greater issues of Anglo-Canadian-American relations. The third was his address to the United Nations General Assembly in 1960 in which he demanded freedom for Russian satellite countries in eastern Europe which were subjugated by the Soviets.

• (1710)

It is a telling measure of Mr. Diefenbaker that he claimed these three speeches to be his most memorable. He was a man for whom principle stood ahead of all else. He was a national leader for whom key international issues were the yeardstick of Canada's emergent stature in the world.

Dozens of notable quotations exist which give further evidence of the extraordinary character of this unique Canadian leader. "We have an appointment with destiny", he often declared in speeches during the 1957 election campaign. With this simple phrase, John Diefenbaker expressed his optimistic vision for Canada, as well as his own personal vision, to become Prime Minister and lead Canada to that destiny.

"There are more votes on Main Street than Bay Street!", was his rallying cry during the 1958 general election. It was John Diefenbaker's reminder that the interests of everyday Canadians should be a politician's first consideration.

He said:

> Bilingualism and biculturalism are facts of Canadian life that cannot—and should not—be hidden or avoided.

John Diefenbaker wrote that in 1964 with the sincerity and wisdom of a man who had served as Prime Minister of all Canadians, of all regions and of all provinces.

"I don't campaign, I just visit with the people", John Diefenbaker declared in 1965, reflecting the ease of manner by which he met and spoke with Canadians during his travels.

There are many more quotations, among which the following portray John Diefenbaker at his most basic and revealing self:

> "The secret of freedom is a brave heart." It was true when Pericles uttered those words and it is true today.
> Parliament is a place honoured by tradition and hallowed by the greatness of its history.
> My basic social philosophy is that governments should not forget the average man and woman.
> I stand today as I have always stood, for principle: Freedom and equality for all Canadians, however humble their lot in life, and whatever their racial origin. One Canada, One Nation.

Finally, from a speech in reference to the Bill of Rights, delivered in the House of Commons on July 1, 1960, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker intoned:

> I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to workship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and mankind.

It is fitting that these particular words should echo once more off the stone walls and high ceilings of this House of Commons. John Diefenbaker lived for this House, and he lived for the principles I have just quoted.

If his benevolent spirit should still occuppy this Chamber, let it bear witness that this Thirty-Third Parliament of Canada did act to immortalize in bronze the living image of our thirteenth Prime Minister, the Late Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has proposed a very interesting motion. In fact, there are statues of a number of our Prime Ministers on or near Parliament Hill. Sir John A. Macdonald, Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden and Mackenzie King all have statues near the Parliament Buildings. However, Louis St. Laurent, in keeping with his reputation as a great barrister and a great Minister of Justice, keeps watch outside the Supreme Court Building.

The rather compelling statue of Sir John A. Macdonald stands outside the Senate. It is unique in that he is depicted as holding his spectacles. I am told that the Department of Public Works is called upon from time to time to replace those spectacles, the disappearance of which is usually ascribed to over-enthusiasm by young scholars.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier looks down on Confederation Square. With the assistance of a hidden heating pipe tunnel, it is at his feet that Ottawa sees the first crocuses of spring.

The rather impressionistic statue of Mackenzie King is suitably placed near the Cabinet Room, in the Privy Council Chamber of the East Block, over which he presided and ruled as Prime Minister for many, many years.

Other statues on the Hill include George Brown, who was the first Liberal Leader. He would probably be distressed if he could read the present editorial line of the newspaper he founded. He is joined by Thomas D'Arcy McGee, who, like George Brown, was a Father of Confederation. Both of those gentlemen were tragically murdered because of the controversy over the roles they played in the public life of this country.

A number of years ago, a statue of the Conservative Prime Minister R. B. Bennett was commissioned, but it has never seen the light of day. I am told that this is because John Diefenbaker was once given the opportunity to view the work and his reaction was said to have been most unparliamentary. Perhaps one result of the Hon. Member's motion is that we will have a chance to look at the statue of Mr. Bennett and to apply our own judgment and see whether it is consistent with that of Mr. Diefenbaker.

There are a number of Prime Ministers who do not have statues on or near Parliament Hill; Mr. Diefenbaker is not the only one. Sir John Abbott and Sir Mackenzie Bowell were the only two Prime Ministers who served in that capacity as members of the Senate. Strangely enough, in view of the present controversy, both of those gentlemen were Conservatives.

There was also Sir John Thompson from Nova Scotia, who, before he entered Parliament, was the very distinguished Chief Justice of Nova Scotia. His sudden death in 1894 occurred dramatically at Windsor Castle, just after he had been knighted by the Queen.

As I previously said, none of these Prime Ministers are represented by statues on Parliament Hill. Also, there is not a statue of Mr. Diefenbaker's great hero, Arthur Meighen, nor of Mr. Diefenbaker's nemesis, Lester B. Pearson.

John Diefenbaker was unique as Prime Minister in that he remained in Parliament long after he ceased to lead his Party. He was never content merely to play the role of elder statesman. To the end, he was a very active protagonist. Indeed, he was always a great subject for political cartoonists. The last great cartoon when he was living concerned his impatience at the small role which was assigned to him in the 1979 general election.

I do not think he would be upset to hear it said that his career was essentially that of a parliamentarian, and only incidentally, but no less importantly, was it that of Prime Minister. Mr. Diefenbaker survived to live his own legend. Everyone who knew him well and listened to his yarns could almost predict which one would be next. Sometimes one knew that his stories were not always precisely accurate. But no one could ever dispute that they grew better in his telling. For example, when Prime Minister Trudeau asked Mr. Diefenbaker to share his private cabin on a plane to the Queen's Jubilee in 1977, the older man accepted readily, and after the trip when he was queried about how he could travel with a Liberal, he shot back, "Politics make strange bedfellows".

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Diefenbaker was a very distinguished Canadian. He deserves a statue on Parliament Hill. I would also call upon the Government to consider the advisability of erecting statues of all our Prime Ministers. Also, if we are to erect statues of Prime Ministers other than in the order in which they served, I think we should consider a statue of Mr. Diefenbaker's contemporary, Mr. Lester B. Pearson.

We do not do enough to perpetuate the memory of our great men and women, especially those who have served in public life. Statues are a tribute to those they depict. They also serve as a reminder to generations of Canadians of their past leaders and their contributions to the building of our country.

I support this motion, Mr. Speaker. I also hope that it will serve as a surrogate, as a reminder to the Government of the value of recognizing with statues on or near Parliament Hill the lives and contributions of all our Prime Ministers.

In supporting this motion, I am certainly pleased to join in its essential appeal, that of a request to recognize a great Prime Minister and a great Canadian, someone whom I had the privilege of coming to know in my earlier years in this House. This is a worthy motion. It deserves support not only for what it says about the need to recognize John Diefenbaker but the way in which it helps us to remember the importance of recognizing all our Prime Ministers, and in fact all the great men and women who have done so much to build our country for ourselves and for future generations.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise to speak on this motion. This is the first opportunity I have had to address this House at length and I want to say that it is a great honour and a thrill for me to be in this House, as well as to speak on a subject which has always been of interest to me.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the people of the riding of Niagara Falls. The riding of Niagara Falls consists of the City of Niagara Falls and the Town of Niagara-on-the-Lake. As many Hon. Members of this Chamber are aware, the Town of Niagara-on-the-Lake was the first capital of Upper Canada. Those of us who originate from that part of the country are proud that this is where many of our freedoms began. The late John Diefenbaker told me of my predecessors that Niagara-on-the-Lake was also the northern terminal for the underground railroad, so to black slaves who were escaping from the south, Niagara-on-the-Lake represented the place where their freedom could begin. In addition, Mr. Speaker, I am also very proud to say that I was born in the City of Niagara Falls, the world's most famous address and the number one tourist attraction in this hemisphere.

The Niagara Falls riding, Mr. Speaker, has a broad industrial base and is also the place where most of this country's tender fruit production originates. The late John Diefenbaker recognized the multicultural dimensions of this country. The riding of Niagara Falls is no exception to that dimension. Those who came and settled in the Niagara Peninsula continue to be very proud of their heritage, just as I, too, am proud to say that I am descended from Scottish immigrants who originally settled in Cape Breton Island.

In speaking to this motion, I am reminded of the fact that during most of Mr. Diefenbaker's tenure as Prime Minister and his term as Opposition Leader, Niagara Falls was represented by a distinguished Member of this Chamber, the Hon. Judy LaMarsh. Though she and Mr. Diefenbaker came from different political Parties and differed on many issues, I am sure that their commitments to human rights and equality ensured that they had at least a private admiration for each other.

I am also proud to say, Mr. Speaker, that I succeed two members of my own Party who also represented the constituency of Niagara Falls. I am referring to Mr. Joe Hueglin and Mr. Jake Froese, who served in the Twenty-ninth and Thirty-first Parliaments respectively. Both men have impressed me over the years with their dedication to Canada and I know they continue to be missed by their colleagues who served with them in this House.

My association with and admiration for the late John Diefenbaker goes back to the early 1960s when I was a small boy. My parents, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Nicholson Senior, and my teacher, Mrs. Dorothy Gordon, encouraged me to learn and be aware of the issues that were facing Canada. At that time I was struck by the sincerity of Prime Minister John Diefenbaker and his commitment to the farmers, the fishermen and the minorities of Canada. I was moved to the point that in 1963 at the age of 11, I wrote to Mr. Diefenbaker wishing him well and letting him know that I had started a fan club in his name. He replied with a letter of thanks and a picture, which presently hangs in my office. I am sure he might have been able to guess that at that moment a life-long Tory was born. From those initial impressions I had of Canada's thirteenth Prime Minister, I continued to take interest in his actions, his words, and his career. That man's lifelong commitment to human rights has compelled me to speak out on his behalf this afternoon.

It is appropriate, Mr. Speaker, that our present Government is concerned with the past internment of Japanese Canadians during World War II. It will always be to Mr. Diefenbaker's credit that he stood up to be counted among those who opposed that internment. Mr. Diefenbaker was an individual who from the earliest times of his career as a prairie lawyer opposed discrimination, among other things, on the basis of race or colour. It is little wonder, therefore, that in 1960, as Prime Minister, he concluded that this country could not support the reapplication to the Commonwealth of the Republic of South Africa. Writers at the time and since have credited his action for preserving the Commonwealth and continuing it as the great institution it is in Canadian life. I was very pleased, therefore, to observe in recent days our new Prime Minister's commitment to the Commonwealth through continued aid to our Caribbean partners. I am sure "the Chief" would have approved.

Mr. Diefenbaker's Government should be noted for the new ground it broke in a number of different areas. The appointment of Mrs. Ellen Fairclough in 1957 as Minister of Immigration was the first time a woman had been appointed to the federal Cabinet. Mr. Diefenbaker also appointed the first woman ambassador in this country's history in the person of Margaret Meagher. The appointment of Mr. James Gladstone made him the first native Canadian to be appointed to the Senate. I am also proud that it was John Diefenbaker who initiated the first appointment of a Canadian of French descent as Governor General. The fact that this Chamber became one which included simultaneous translation of French and English under Mr. Diefenbaker's Government is something from which we can all take pride.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nicholson: In addition, his Government took great strides forward in the area of voting rights. It is hard for me to believe that at one time in Canada natives residing on reservations were denied the right to vote. I would like to quote from Mr. Diefenbaker's comments in the Throne Speech of January 18, 1960:

> The other measure, the provision to give Indians the vote, is one of those steps which will have an effect everywhere in the world—for the reason that wherever I went last year on the occasion of my trip to Commonwealth countries, it was brought to my attention that in Canada the original people within our country, excepting for a qualified class, were denied the right to vote. I say that so far as this long overdue measure is concerned, it will remove everywhere in the world any suggestion that colour or race places any citizen in our country in a lower category than the other citizens of our country.

The measure that finally gave the right to vote to all Canadians without exception was proclaimed into law by amendments to the Indian Act and the Elections Act on Dominion Day, July 1, 1960.

It should be noted as well that Mr. Diefenbaker's commitment to freedom and human rights extended beyond the borders of Canada and the Commonwealth of nations. He had a deep faith in the United Nations and saw its potential for enhancing human rights throughout the world. In his 1960 address to that body, he told the world that freedom and democracy were not and should not be the exclusive property of countries as fortunate as Canada. Freedom, he said, belonged to the people of Eastern Europe as well. In campaigning for this office last summer I found it significant that so many people of Eastern European origin reminded me of Mr. Diefenbaker's commitment to their homelands.

Finally, I would like to discuss the document that I know Mr. Diefenbaker considered his greatest achievement, namely, the Canadian Bill of rights. This document was the expression of his lifelong commitment to freedom from the time of his election as leader of the Saskatchewan Conservative Party in 1936, until its realization in 1960. On introducing that legislation he said:

> The cynics will say it does not go far enough; it is a first step. As the Chinese say, every journey by mankind, even a journey over a thousand years, begins with just one step taken by some individual who sees the possibilities for the future and tries to make it possible to equalize the opportunities for those of his own generation. The Bill will not do everything, but I do think fairminded Canadians will agree that is a major step forward.

Fittingly, he moved second reading of the Bill on Dominion Day, and it became the law of the land on August 10, 1960.

I am reminded of an incident that occurred during my recent election campaign, Mr. Speaker. During an all candidates' debate, I had just completed my remarks when I was told by someone in the audience, in an accusatory fashion, "That's all well and good, but you have to remember, Mr. Nicholson, that you are a part of the same Party as John Diefenbaker". I told the truth then, Mr. Speaker, as I tell this Chamber the truth today: There are very few things in my life of which I am more proud than to say I am a member of the Party of the late John George Diefenbaker.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nicholson: I believe it has always been appropriate that we in Canada have honoured those Prime Ministers who have served their country well. I know Canadians were pleased when Toronto International Airport was renamed in honour of the late Lester B. Pearson. I known many Canadians can take pride in the fact that a statue to Louis St. Laurent resides at the Supreme Court of Canada. I also know this: there is no stamp that could be issued, no park that could be dedicated, no building that could be renamed, no honour that could be bestowed that would give the late John Diefenbaker more satisfaction than to have his statue erected here on Parliament Hill, outside the institution that he so loved and to which he dedicated his life.

I would ask that this House give unanimous approval to this motion, that we give to Mr. Diefenbaker the recognition and the expression of thanks for all that he has said and done in favour of Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, take great pleasure in rising on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party to support the motion in front of us today. I think all Members of this House, regardless of political Party, will recognize the tremendous contribution that the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker made to the history and life of this country and this House of Commons.

It is particularly important for me to rise in my seat since it appears that I am the only representative from the Province of Saskatchewan to speak this afternoon on this resolution. John Diefenbaker remains a hero in Saskatchewan. He is of a period of time which saw several political greats coming out of my home Province of Saskatchewan. The Liberal Party had Mr. Jimmy Gardiner, the Conservative Party had John Diefenbaker, and the New Democratic Party, or the CCF at that time, of course, had Tommy Douglas. Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Douglas particularly, were great orators and tremendous politicians. I would say that Jimmy Gardiner was also a great politician. It was a type of politics that was unique in its time and place. All three of these outstanding politicians had within them that prairie populism, tremendous oratory and tremendous parliamentary debating skills. They all had a good sense of humour. It was a type of politics which I do not think we see today, and I doubt if ever again we will see people of the calibre of the great men we saw back then.

When I rise in my seat in support of this resolution, I speak not only on behalf of my colleagues in the NDP, but I think I speak on behalf of all the people of the Province of Saskatchewan in urging the House to adopt this motion. We in Saskatchewan consider John Diefenbaker one of our own. His family moved to Saskatchewan in 1903. He must have been around eight or nine years old at that time and he lived in Saskatchewan all his life thereafter, mainly residing in Saskatoon. He attended the University of Saskatchewan, achieving his BA in 1915, his Masters in 1916 and his law degree in 1919. He saw service overseas and in fact became the first Prime Minister to have been on active duty with the Canadian forces overseas. He became an outstanding lawyer in the Province of Saskatchewan. Even today you hear stories from men and women in Saskatchewan who remember him dealing with court cases in our province.

Through that time he must have developed a tremendous sense of the importance of the rule of law and of fair treatment. He generally defended the underdog, and he was quite successful as a lawyer. He defended some 20 murder cases and saved quite a few men from the gallows. It is perhaps as a result of his experience that he became such a strong opponent of capital punishment. As a lawyer in Saskatchewan, he defended schools which were teaching French. At that time there was strong anti-French feeling in and about parts of Saskatchewan and he was a strong defender of those individual rights.

His political experience was at first not all that successful. He tried getting elected for some 15 years, running in federal and provincial elections, and was even defeated by a few votes,

I understand, when running for the office of mayor of Prince Albert. He was first elected in 1940 in the old constituency of Lake Centre. Just to add a personal note, Mr. Speaker, in the election of 1949 he ran in that seat defeating my uncle, Donald Arthur MacRae. My uncle's wife, Marguerite MacRae, was a cousin to my father, and it was that family which sponsored us to come to Canada. Arthur MacRae ran third for the Liberals and Mr. Diefenbaker won the election.

Of course I am sure all Members of this House know that in 1957 he formed the first Conservative Government in 22 years, and then in 1958 led the Conservative Party to a resounding and historic victory.

John Diefenbaker was a prairie populist. Someone even called him a prairie radical. He experienced the depressions and hardships that the prairie people experienced during the Great Depression. He was a great advocate for the little people, the common people. He saw how the vested interests of the country, particularly those on Bay Street, robbed the farmers and workers of their property and dignity. He was a great champion of those ordinary people. He had a deep sense of dignity and human justice and freedom. As such, we see the types of legislation that the Diefenbaker Government introduced. The Charter of Rights and some of the best social legislation in the country came from the Diefenbaker Government.

The Province of Saskatchewan has honoured John Diefenbaker in a variety of ways. The original sod homestead was moved and is now situated on the legislative grounds in Regina. There is a bust of the Hon. John George Diefenbaker in the rotunda of the legislative building. This was done by Saskatchewan NDP and Liberal Governments because we consider John Diefenbaker to be one of our own.

I think it would be fitting to have a statue of Prime Minister John Diefenbaker on the Parliament Hill grounds. I concur with the former speaker from the Liberal Party that we should also have statues of the other Prime Ministers, particularly that of Mike Pearson because he also made a tremendous contribution to Canada. I think a statue of John Diefenbaker on the grounds of Parliament Hill would be a reminder to present and future Members of Parliament and future Governments, whether Conservative, Liberal or New Democratic, that he was a man who stood four-square for certain basic principles of human dignity, human freedom and human justice. His concern for the unfortunate, the weak, and minorities should be a reminder in future years to Members of Parliaments and Governments yet to come.

I support this motion, Mr. Speaker. I think it is fitting for us to have such a statue. One often talks about the ghost of John Diefenbaker and how this man has affected so many people's lives, particularly in the Province of Saskatchewan. You cannot go anywhere in Saskatchewan without hearing a story related to John Diefenbaker. I too have my little stories and experiences of John Diefenbaker. I mentioned one. The person who sponsored my family to Canada was the unsuccessful Liberal candidate running against John Diefenbaker in the riding of Lake Centre in 1949.

I remember as a youngster listening to John Diefenbaker in 1956 and in the 1957 election campaign in the Regina stadium. I listened to his full oratory. Even though I was a committed CCFer at that tender age, I still went to listen to this great orator deliver his thunderous speech and his damnation of those damn Liberals and damn interests on Bay Street. I was impressed then and am still impressed, Mr. Speaker. I hope members of the Conservative Party are still impressed with those damn interests on Bay Street.

The other little item came later in life. I met the good woman whom I had the great sense to marry, Lynda Pallen, through the press officer in charge of the train that carried the body of Mr. Diefenbaker back home to Saskatchewan.

Even though I only shook the man's hand once after that rally in Regina during the 1957 election, his ghost has touched me. I was just an immigrant boy in the Province of Saskatchewan, having moved there in 1951. Yet his influence and personality touched me in different ways, even though indirectly.

It is an honour for me to rise on behalf of my Party and of the people of Saskatchewan to urge that this Parliament accept this motion and urge the Government to act on this motion so that in the very near future we will have a fitting statue in memory of a great Canadian Prime Minister, John George Diefenbaker.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with great pride and pleasure to speak for the first time in support of the motion before the House. I want to tell the House how proud and honoured I am to represent all the people in Saskatoon East. I chose to speak on this particular motion in support of my hon. colleague from Scarborough Centre (Mrs. Browes) because it is a subject of deep significance to me, both as a Saskatchewan native and as a Canadian.

In light of the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker's great contribution to Canada and Canadians, a statue in his honour is long overdue on Parliament Hill. I hope this will not be the last tribute we pay to this man because the country owes him a great deal. As the Member of Parliament for Saskatoon East, I have a strong affinity with Mr. Diefenbaker, as do the majority of my constituents. He was the only Prime Minister from my province, having been raised and educated there. As you know, he came from eastern Canada and settled in Saskatchewan in his early youth. He obtained his education at the University of Saskatchewan, as did I, which is the focal point of my constituency of Saskatoon East. He dedicated his whole life to representing the people of the Prairies in his legal and political career because he was, as is so often pointed out, one of us.

The people of Saskatoon East typify the multicultural makeup of the Prairies. These are people of many cultural heritages with a close affinity to the land and its diverse riches and with great pride in their ability to earn their living as they choose. They make their living in the agricultural sector, the potash mining sector, the small business sector and in major academic and research institutions which are located in Saskatoon. Also important in my riding are the aged who contributed so much to our history and the youth who represent the hope for our future.

Saskatchewan residents are not alone in their admiration and love for Mr. Diefenbaker. The things that he stood for and, even more significantly, that he accomplished on behalf of Canadians transcend regional loyalties to a native son. That was pointed out by the speaker who spoke prior to me. This great man holds a special place in the hearts of all Canadians. John Diefenbaker was passionately committed to human liberty. His great achievements in that realm have become fundamental to our Canadian way of life.

Mr. Diefenbaker instituted the Canadian Bill of Rights, as was mentioned earlier, so that every Canadian's right to fair and equal treatment and to individual freedom would be forever entrenched in the Constitution. Among other significant achievements, he brought Indian people the too long denied right to vote. He introduced the baby bonus. He took the first step on the road to universally available medicare with his federal hospital insurance program, and he increased the old age security pension. He also appointed the first Indian to the Senate, the first woman to Cabinet, and the first Ukranian Canadian as Minister of Labour.

One may ask why John Diefenbaker fought so hard for human rights in this country. I believe it was because he could not tolerate discrimination and he was determined to guarantee that Canadians, particularly new Canadians, would live free and equal in their country.

Today, we recognize that our cultural identity as Canadians is enriched, because we all have diverse backgrounds. We have Mr. Diefenbaker to thank for our recognition of and pride in that multicultural identity. He was the first Prime Minister of what he himself referred to as "mixed racial origin", being neither of pure British or pure French descent. That made him, in his own words, "a Canadian first and foremost". In recognition of this, he changed the Canadian census regulations so that we could say proudly "Canadian" in response to the question on racial origin.

In his maiden speech to the House on June 30, 1940, John Diefenbaker challenged his colleagues to "build up in this country an unhyphenated Canadianism that is dominant, proud and strong". These words were both prophetic and descriptive. As Prime Minister of Canada and through all of his nearly 50 years as a Member of Parliament, John Diefenbaker was dedicated to achieving his goal of Canadianism.

When we honour "Dief" by erecting a statue on the Hill, we must create a statue that epitomizes a dominant, proud and strong Canadian whose legacy to future Canadians demands permanent recognition. A statue to such a man is an absolute necessity and, as I said earlier, it is long overdue. I am in complete support of my hon. colleague's motion to pay tribute to the accomplishments of John Diefenbaker by placing his statue on Parliament Hill along with those statues that have already been erected.

A statue commemorates a man for his accomplishments. But what kind of monument can one build to commemorate a man's spirit? I like to think that Mr. Diefenbaker's spirit, embodied by his lifelong commitment to and profound belief in a multicultural Canadian society, lives on today. I am proud to say that the seeds for a monument in that spirit have already been planted in my constituency of Saskatoon East.

I must provide some history in order to explain. When the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker became Chancellor of the University of Saskatchewan in 1969, he announced his intention to bequeath to his alma mater his papers, memorabilia and personal library and his Sir John A. Macdonald collection of original manuscripts, books, artifacts and historic furniture. This intention was formalized in Mr. Diefenbaker's last will and testament.

The University felt that such a generous and important gift should be housed in an appropriate setting that would allow public access to the materials and would preserve them for the future. Thus the idea of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker Centre was born. It contains a working archives where the countless original documents and other papers accumulated by Mr. Diefenbaker during a lifetime in politics are available for research to students and professors from across this great country.

It is also a public museum displaying Mr. Diefenbaker's personal memorabilia as well as the many gifts presented to him when he was Prime Minister. These gifts are now the possession of all Canadians, through the Diefenbaker Centre.

In addition, the museum contains exact replicas of Mr. Diefenbaker's office in the East Block and of the Privy Council Chamber as it looked when he was Prime Minister in the late 1950s and early 1960s. The presence of these two rooms in the Diefenbaker Centre in Saskatchewan makes our federal system of government more relevant to western Canadians, because there are many Canadians who live thousands of miles away from Ottawa who never come here to visit and see the Chamber in which I am speaking today.

John Diefenbaker turned the sod at the site of the Diefenbaker Centre on the banks of the South Saskatchewan River on September 20, 1975. Construction of the Centre began in the spring of 1978, with money for the $3 million building coming from across Canada. Six provinces, one Territory and the federal Government made substantial contributions to the Centre's capital costs. Generous donations were also made by many individual Canadians as well as by organizations and clubs. The Diefenbaker Centre is a legacy to and from Canadians of every part of the country.

The Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker Centre opened to the public on June 12, 1980. Since then, Canadians from every province and territory as well as visitors from countries around the world have come to the Centre.

The Diefenbaker Centre at the University of Saskatchewan is an important monument to Mr. Diefenbaker's memory. However, it does not, at present, have a formal mandate to promote actively and to protect the ideas that Mr. Diefenbaker represented.

I have a vision of the Diefenbaker Centre as an institute dedicated to all Canadians. It should be a centre for Canadians to learn about their past and develop goals for the future. It should be a place for foreign visitors to learn about Canada and to enrich our lives and theirs through interraction. It should also teach the social as well as the economic importance of our multicultural heritage—a key to the future social and economic well-being in a changing and highly competitive world.

I urge Hon. Members in the House to support the motion placed before them this afternoon by my hon. colleague. A statue of John Diefenbaker on Parliament Hill will serve as a constant reminder to those of us who work here as well as to visitors of a great man who taught us the meaning of being Canadians. That is a fine beginning and I hope that this Government will recognize it as such, a beginning that can lead to other tributes so that we Canadians can actively share with our fellow citizens and world neighbours the legacy and spirit of this great man.

In view of the positive comments I have heard here this afternoon from members of all Parties, I would ask that we put the question to the House now.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Mrs. Browes, seconded by Mr. McDermid, moves:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of honouring the memory of the Right Honourable John G. Diefenbaker by commissioning a statue of him to be placed on Parliament Hill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Shall we call it six o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): It being six o'clock, the hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE—SIZE OF BUDGET. (B) SERVICE'S ACCOUNTABILITY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this afternoon to pursue a question I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) yesterday concerning the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. It concerned the fact that the proposed budget of this new Civilian Security Service was $116 million, despite the fact that the estimates of the RCMP were reduced by only $45 million. I asked the Prime Minister what it was that constituted a major new threat to the security of Canada sufficient to justify this apparently massive increase in the expenditures on a new Civilian Security Service. There was no response from the Prime Minister to that question.

In my supplementary question, I pointed out that the Prime Minister and his Party, when in opposition, were very strongly opposed to a number of the provisions of this proposed security legislation. They joined with the NDP and many other groups and individuals, including the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, the Canadian Jewish Congress, La Lègue des Droits et Liberté from the Province of Quebec, in condemning this legislation, including the dangerously wide powers, vague mandate and the lack of parliamentary accountability of the Security Service.

In view of the bitter opposition by his Party when they were the Official Opposition last year, and in view of the fact that they proposed a number of amendments which would have improved the legislation, I asked the Prime Minister what action he was prepared to take to amend this Bill, to ensure particularly that there was full parliamentary oversight of the operations of the new Security Service. I would note that the concept of parliamentary oversight is one which was supported by the Conservative Party when in opposition.

And I might add, Mr. Speaker, that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) was Leader of the Opposition, he wrote a letter to Mr. Gaétan Nadeau of the Ligue des droits et libertés concerning Bill C-9 whose purpose was to create the new security service. He then stated that the Progressive Conservative Party was bitterly opposed to the adoption of that measure by the House of Commons. He went on to commend the arguments of the Ligue and the support of well-known Canadians, and he said that the list of the numerous groups would be added to the file and be of great help in the fight against this Bill which was considered dangerous.

[English]

When the Conservative Party was in opposition, according to the then Leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister, this was a dangerous piece of legislation and the Conservative Party was opposed to it. Now that the Conservative Party is in government, what action is it taking to oppose this very dangerous legislation?

I questioned the Solicitor General (Mr. MacKay) in the justice committee on this and he said, "Well, we are going to give it a chance to work". In fact he said that the Conservative Party was not prepared to make any changes whatsoever to this legislation which constitutes such a threat to the civil liberties of Canadians.

I do not have the time to enumerate the many defects in the legislation, the extent to which it does in fact constitute a threat to civil liberties, but I would note, for example, that in speaking on the Bill a Conservative Member of Parliament, the Hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), said at third reading:

> Let me repeat the point made by others. My Party wants an overview committee consisting of Members of Parliament.

His Party is now the Government of Canada. It has a massive majority. It has the opportunity to implement effective parliamentary oversight. It has the opportunity to bring forward amendments which would significantly narrow the scope and the mandate of the new security service to ensure that Canadians, who break no law whatsoever but merely support liberation movements in Central America or South Africa, do not have their mail opened, their medical files read, their homes broken into or their telephones tapped. That was the position of the Conservative Party when it was in opposition, yet it has completely reversed itself now that it is in Government, and it is doing nothing whatsoever to implement changes to this important legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I should also point out that so far, I believe, the Prime Minister has refused to meet with the Ligue des droits et libertés. It has been seeking an appointment with the Prime Minister, and I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary will give us the assurance this afternoon that the Prime Minister will meet with the Ligue des droits et libertés.

The Ligue has stated that it considers this service as abusive and undemocratic, and that it shows no respect for the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms or the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Well, Mr. Speaker, now we know that the new security service spends the unbelievable amount of $116 million a year without any accountability to Parliament. That was unacceptable to us in the New Democratic Party when we were in Opposition in the last Parliament but, more important still, it is unacceptable to the Conservatives. They now have the opportunity and even the obligation to amend this legislation, but they refuse.

[English]

They are taking a position which is identical to the position taken by the Liberal Party when it was in government. That position was a threat to the civil liberties of all Canadians.

[Translation]

—a threat to the civil liberties of Canadians and Quebecers.

• (1805)

[English]

That position remains a threat to civil liberties today. I call upon the Government to bring forward amendments to this legislation and, in particular, to allow for full and effective parliamentary oversight.

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of replying to the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) this evening who questioned the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) as to whether to size of the CSIS expenditure signalled "major new threats to the security of Canada".

In responding to the Hon. Member, let me advise him that no inference should be drawn on the basis of a comparison between the RCMP budget and that of CSIS. Rather, the net additional amount of money required for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service relates to the standard capital and operating expenses most people in this House would reasonably expect would have to be incurred as start-up costs by any new agency of Government with a national mandate. There are additional expenses other than the actual surveillance and whatever else goes on in CSIS. As I said before, I cannot and will not discuss in public any specific expenditures relating to the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

The other subject which the Hon. Member questioned the Prime Minister about was the accountability of the service. Given the Prime Minister's response, which related to the appointment of Members to the Security Intelligence Review Committee, I would like to provide the following supplementary information.

In addition to appointing an overview committee composed of five distinguished members, including a very distinguished member of the New Democratic Party, the Hon. Sol Cherniak, the Act provides for the appointment of an Inspector General, responsible to the Deputy Solicitor General, whose function it is to ensure that CSIS operations conform to approved policy. I am pleased to report to this House that Mr. Richard Gosse, a highly respected lawyer, who until recently was the Deputy Attorney General of the Province of Saskatchewan, has accepted an appointment to this position. Additionally, the Act requires that all warrants to intercept communications of whatever kind, be authorized by a Judge of the Federal Court of Canada.

Finally, pursuant to Section 69 of the CSIS Act, a Committee of the House of Commons or of both Houses of Parliament will be required five years hence to conduct a comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of this Act and to submit a report on the review to Parliament, including a statement of any changes the committee recommends. The Member will thus appreciate that in addition to a very comprehensive system of oversight, there exists an opportunity to review the Act and to remedy any shortcomings it may have.

ENERGY—FEDERAL NEWFOUNDLAND AGREEMENT. (B) GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see a spokesman from the Government here this evening who, I am sure, will give an answer on behalf of the Government regarding its position as it relates to the very important question which I directed yesterday to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

I asked the Prime Minister about Section 54 of the Atlantic Accord signed between the federal Government and the Government of Newfoundland. That section of the Accord says that they will supply oil as existing feedstock to industrial enterprises in Newfoundland. The point is there is no industry in existence in the Province of Newfoundland today that takes oil as feedstock. We do have two closed-down oil refineries.

The second part of the section is the one that I dispute. It states that no new industry can be opened in Newfoundland to take that oil from the offshore unless it is in excess of the feedstock requirements of existing industrial capacity in eastern Canada. In other words, a legal interpretation of eastern Canada as far as the oil industry is concerned is, first and foremost, the Province of Quebec, then the Province of New Brunswick and then the Province of Nova Scotia, when looking at total capacity.

The Prime Minister responded by saying that he would perhaps look at that Section to see if there is anything wrong with it. To the second part of my question, he then gave me a rather political answer. He responded by saying that even the Liberals in Newfoundland were turning over to the Conservative side and that the Government of Newfoundland was overjoyed with the agreement. The point is that I am not overjoyed with that Section of the agreement. In fact, all in all, I believe it is a very poor agreement.

I am glad to see that the Parliamentary Secretary is here to give the Government's answer to this question. The point is that when we examine the existing industrial needs of eastern Canada as far as offshore oil is concerned, we discover that they are one-third of the total capacity of all of Canada. When we look at what is used, with the offshore operating at about 50 per cent capacity, and we consider the needs of all of Canada, on the basis of a billion barrels of oil in the offshore of Newfoundland it would take two and a half years to use up the oil that has presently been identified in the offshore. If we look only at the needs of eastern Canada, it would take some six years to use up the oil if it was all taken out of the ground at the same time. Knowing that the Government of Newfoundland will have a 20-year plan, we come to the stark realization that there will be no excess capacity in eastern Canada.

When I mentioned that one-third of the total Canadian capacity, production and usage was in eastern Canada, I was not referring to the mothballed refineries in Montreal and the Province of Nova Scotia. As well, I was not taking into account the 16 petrochemical industries in the Province of Quebec.

The way the Section is worded means that for all time, any resources taken from the Continental Shelf off Newfoundland must go to existing industrial needs in eastern Canada. In other words, we would receive monetary benefits in the short term from the offshore with a gradual reduction in equalization payments. However, once we are into year 9 or 10 of production, if it ever comes on-stream, there would be no benefits at all as far as equalization goes. It would balance out over a 20-year period and we would be back relying on equalization, although not as heavily as we do at the present time given the fact that the present figures as announced yesterday are $605 million per year to Newfoundland.

The other point I wanted to mention is that there is a way out for the Government of Newfoundland, and there is a way out for the Government of Canada. They could save a little bit of face and at least do something to give a smidgen of industrial benefit from oil to Newfoundland. This could happen if they were, for example, to reopen the Come-By-Chance oil refinery or to work with Ultra Mar on reopening the partially dismantled Holyrood refinery.

It is alarming to me to realize that Petro-Canada, the company that owns the refinery at Come-By-Chance, has been carrying out extensive renovations, expansions and improvements to its refinery in Montreal. It is also alarming for me to realize that Ultra Mar, the company that closed down the Holyrood refinery in June, 1983, was carrying out the same type of extension and expansion in a place called St. Romuald, Quebec, a plant which has a capacity of up to 19,000 cubic metres or about 140,000 barrels per day. Those same two companies that closed down oil refineries in Newfoundland were spending millions and millions of dollars to upgrade their refineries in the Province of Quebec.

The point is that this Section of the agreement has to go, because 15 years down the road when we have no monetary benefits from the offshore, a businessman will not be allowed to establish an industry in Newfoundland that will take advantage of offshore oil. That is important to future generations. I would not want in 15 years' time to have a song in Newfoundland which says, as far as the oil is concerned, "Poor old Newfoundland. They got the oil and we got the shaft." I am anxious to hear the official response of the Government, by the very able Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources Mr. McDermid to this very very important question.

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to my hon. friend from Gander-Twillingate. He has got a way with words. I will set his mind at ease as well as those in the Province of Newfoundland who may be concerned about Clause 54.

First, I should say that everyone in the House is very proud of the manner in which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) and the Government of Canada handled the formalization of the Atlantic Accord. It is a fine example of consultative federalism. We believe that the Accord establishes Newfoundlanders as economic equals within confederation, while at the same time it works toward other national goals. The agreement will generate tens of thousands of person-years of employment in the Province and it will transfer Newfoundland's status from a have-not province to a have province. That is very important.

I must say—not denigrating any other parts of this great country—that I always look forward with great expectation when I go to "The Rock", because of the hospitality, warmth, generosity and the genuine feeling of friendship I receive from the people who live there.

The Accord is intended to achieve a number of objectives. It will ensure that development optimizes the social and economic benefits to Canada, particularly Newfoundland. It provides for revenue-sharing between Governments on the same basis as if the resources were on provincial land. I think the Hon. Member would agree with that. It will constitute a stable and fair regime for industry to get on with the job, and it establishes a sound and enduring management regime which recognizes the equality of both Governments as managers and stewards of the resource. That is something the former administration was not prepared to do.

The federal Government has no desire to enforce any measure that would minimize economic benefits flowing from the Accord. The Hon. Member has voiced his concern over Clause 54, which he perceives as being discriminatory. He claims that the Clause would prevent an industrial refiner in Newfoundland from receiving Hibernia oil because the Province's feedstock requirements for new facilities must be "excess to feedstock required to meet the demand of presently existing industrial capacity in eastern Canada". He regards this to be a limitation and, therefore, a sell-out. I respectfully say to the Hon. Member that this is a misrepresentation of Clause 54.

As with the entire Atlantic Accord, this provision places Newfoundland on at least an equal footing with other provinces of this nation which are blessed with a rich supply of natural resources. Newfoundland will have full access to Hibernia output on commercial terms under any circumstances. In fact, the language of Clause 54 goes further to ensure Newfoundland this access, thereby providing a right of first refusal to the Province for the off-shore supplies. Surely, Members opposite would not advocate that the central Government should allocate crude supplies among regions. This agreement makes it clear that buyers, regardless of location, will bid on commercial terms for existing supplies.

Let me reiterate that Clause 54 does not place a limit on Newfoundland's present or future access to off-shore production. The Newfoundland Minister of Energy supports his view and recently stated that Clause 54 does not rule out the development—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

POLITICAL PARTIES

FUND RAISING BY PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, as part of the Conservative Party's fund raising efforts of last year, my constituents received appeals from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), the then Leader of the Opposition, to contribute sums of $50, $100, $150, or $350 to his campaign. In this appeal he criticized the Liberal Government for high unemployment, lack of foreign investment, and poor economic conditions in Canada. In November, 1983, he said:

> The purchasing power of the Canadian dollar has been diminished both domestically and in the world market . . . I believe your support for the Progressive Conservative Party today will be the base on which a strong and revitalized Canada can grow.

However, this revitalized Canada is not a reality. The very dollar he promised to save from its diminished state, has plunged even lower during his administration. As a matter of fact, it is the lowest it has ever been in the history of Canada.

The Prime Minister and his Party have not fulfilled the promises made in these fund raising letters. Therefore, on behalf of my constituents I am asking that the Conservative Party return the money.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

VERDICT IN HOLOCAUST BOOKLET CASE

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Zundel was found guilty yesterday of wilfully causing harm to racial and social harmony by distributing a booklet that claimed that the holocaust was a Jewish hoax. I wish to applaud the decision reached by the jury.

While we in this country pride ourselves on our basic freedoms, including the freedom of speech, thank God we have ways to deal with the vicious, outrageous, and harmful views of this man whose heroes are Hitler and Hess. While I was in Israel a few weeks ago, I visited the holocaust museum, Yad Vashem. I simply cannot imagine anyone doubting that the holocaust did indeed happen.

IMMIGRATION

INTERROGATION OF DETAINED IRANIANS

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, today The Globe and Mail reported that the Iranians who were detained near Pearson Airport were interrogated by unidentified police. We were not told on what authority they were detained nor who authorized the detention. We are given to understand that no lawyer representing the people being interrogated was present at the interrogation. This sort of thing could happen to any of us. It could even happen to Canadian citizens on Canadian soil. It may be the work of the secret police force that was established last June under Prime Minister Trudeau.

I call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) to broaden the inquiry she has undertaken so that it will examine all places at which those arriving in Canada may be detained, who orders such detentions, and under what criteria, and what provision is made for acquainting detainees with their rights under our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. With particular regard to The Globe and Mail story, the inquiry should find out who carried out the interrogation and who authorized the entry of the police into the detention centre. As well, it should determine whether or not those who were interrogated were informed of their rights under our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and whether or not they were given an effective opportunity to exercise their rights by retaining a lawyer to act in their interests.

According to The Globe and Mail, what is reported was based on affidavits, and constitutes a very serious danger to our rights and freedoms from this newly-minted secret service. It is important to—

ECONOMIC SITUATION IN BEAUCE REGION

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, in politics and in business, we cannot afford to be negative and pessimistic. With the advent of the Conservative Government, the situation has improved and attitudes are changing as a result of new perceptions of government. Federal-provincial relations are improving across the country. When optimism reigns, Canadians are happier, more productive and more inclined to invest.

In Beauce, the employment situation is improving and the number of jobless workers has dropped. According to the Director of the Canada Employment Centre in Beauce, in 1985 the employment situation will improve, mainly as a result of an increase in the number of jobs. I think it is important to emphasize the positive aspects of success, and consequently, I would like to give a few examples of what is happening in our riding and show what we are doing.

I would like to mention the remarkable performance by the CANAM MANAC group in Saint-Georges et Saint-Gédéon, whose production figures have increased dramatically to $130 million. There has also been a considerable expansion at the Systèmes Archimèdes construction company in Saint-Frédéric, which has been very successful on the export market thanks to a new concept in housing design. I may add that Culinar intends to invest $15 million in its two plants in Sainte-Marie.

As far as small businesses are concerned, my riding is in very good shape.

I agree with my industrial commissioners that there is a general feeling of confidence and optimism in Beauce, a riding that has often been considered as a barometer for the entire province of Quebec.

To the pessimists opposite, I—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

NET FARM INCOME

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, Canadian farmers are angry at the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). In fact they are furious at the White Paper he tabled in this House entitled Tax Issues in Agriculture, a document which alleges that farmers earn twice as much as the average taxpayer and only pay one-quarter as much in taxes. This ridiculous statement by the Minister of Finance comes at a time when tens of thousands of our youngest, most productive farmers are facing the worst debt crisis since the 1930s, and at a time when total farm income today is almost identical to what it was 10 years ago, while purchasing power has been cut in half by inflation.

The Minister of Finance thinks it is fair to compare the income of a farmer with the income of the average wage earner. I would point out to him that a farmer works 12 to 15 hours a day, throws in the labour of his family members to boot, and has a massive capital investment compared to that of the average wage earner.

The farmers of the country are getting fed up with the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) who says that he will not help them out of their debt crisis. However, they are totally frustrated by the Minister of Finance who wrote this misleading document on farm incomes, a document which totally distorts and misrepresents the really difficult situation faced by farmers in Canada today. With a Minister of Finance like this, it is little wonder that our country reached two of the worst economic records in Canadian history this week—the lowest dollar ever of 71 cents U.S., and the highest government spending estimates ever of $105 billion.

EXTERNAL AID

EXPRESSION OF GRATITUDE FROM BOLIVIA

Mr. William C. Winegard (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to say a few words about agriculture and the International Development Research Centre.

[English]

As Chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, I often hear of how Canada has helped other nations, particularly in the area of agriculture. Naturally this pleases me as one of the great agricultural institutions of the world is in my riding.

My point today concerns the International Development Research Centre and its splendid work with Bolivia in the field of genetic and agricultural improvements of the Quinoa plant, a most important source of energy and nutrition in the Andean region. I have been asked to extend the thanks of the Bolivian Government to the Parliament of Canada for the support which was given with good will and without self-interest. Accordingly, I do so, Sir.

CONGRATULATIONS TO NEW ADVISORY COUNCIL PRESIDENT

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I would like to extend my congratulations to Sylvia Gold, the new President of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. We are pleased to see the appointment of a progressive woman with excellent experience, a good understanding of women's issues, extensive labour experience, and outstanding leadership qualities. She has the support of women across the country.

However, one good appointment does not make a council. There are 13 vacancies. Competent women from across the country representing all regions, cultural groups, native people, the disabled, business and labour, must be appointed to this Council, and the appointments must be from all political parties. The effectiveness of the Council also depends on access to the Minister responsible for the Status of Women (Mr. McLean) and the political will of the Government to act on the recommendations made by the Council.

Too often in the past the Council's excellent research and recommendations were allowed to gather dust. Accordingly, we recommend that reports made by the Council not only be reported to the House, but also be referred to the appropriate committees for study and action. In order to accomplish that goal I repeat the recommendation which was made by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell), who is the NDP critic for the status of women, that there be a standing committee on women's issues. That would be a means whereby we could advance equality for women as we approach the date for equality, April 17, and the implementation of the Charter of Rights.

Once again, our sincere congratulations to Ms. Gold.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the Hon. Member that her time has expired.

CURRENCY

COMPOSITION OF PROPOSED DOLLAR COIN

Mr. Girve Fretz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, Members are no doubt aware that Canada should have a readily marketable and acceptable dollar coinage. Inco Limited, a company which is vital to the economy not only of my own riding but, indeed, of the entire Province of Ontario, has developed a gold-on-nickel material called nigold. The proposed coin would be multisided, slightly larger than a 25-cent piece, and would weigh less than half the weight of our existing silver dollar, which is not really silver.

The nigold dollar coin would have a three-micron thick plate of gold on a nickel base, which would result in a beautiful golden product possessing great durability. It is understood—and this has been shown by testing—that it will keep its original pleasing appearance for the life of the coin, which is estimated at 40 years.

I understand the issue of the dollar coin will be brought before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. I hope this Committee will give serious consideration to the Inco dollar coin. The existence of such a coin would make it easier for vendors who currently have to deal with massive quantities of coins of smaller denominations, and it would provide many jobs for workers at Inco who are currently laid off.

RATE OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland-Kent): Last September, Mr. Speaker, New Brunswick's ship of state was carried off on a huge blue wave and passengers were in a mood of euphoria. Early in November, however, on a black Thursday evening, the horizon disappeared behind a deep mist which, rather than lift as we had been promised, gradually turned into thick fog.

True enough, Mr. Speaker, the Party opposite had told us that the proposed restraints and many cut-backs would have very little negative impact—if any at all—on the Canadian economy.

It so happens that the number of unemployed is still at an unacceptable level. Unemployment in a riding like mine is a never-ending scourge. We simply cannot afford to have more people out of work—there are too many as it is—yet the unemployment rate has been inching up lately.

Mr. Speaker, that blue wave has carried us far off the coast and we are experiencing increasing difficulty to get back on the right course. I am wondering whether this Government is waiting for a distress signal before reacting.

Talking about challenging new policies, consultation and economic growth is well and good, but the words must have some meaning. To this day, however, all that rhetoric leads us to conclude that the words simply do not reflect daily realities.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW FIRMS IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO

Mr. Elliott Hardey (Kent): Mr. Speaker, according to Canadian Press, FIRA has given the go-ahead to five foreign-owned firms to establish auto parts manufacturing plants in southwestern Ontario, and to two other foreign firms wishing to refurbish and lease various types of vehicles in the same area.

The five firms are owned by West German companies; the other two are owned by companies in the States of Michigan and Indiana, in the United States.

• (1115)

This announcement is significant not only to the economy of my riding and southwestern Ontario but to Canada as a whole, because it appears to demonstrate the beneficial effects of the Government's policy of openness to foreign investment, and the restructuring of FIRA and the Act under which it operates.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

IMPACT OF INTEREST RATES

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my first question will be directed to the Minister of Finance. The dollar is down and interest rates are up. The Minister of Finance told us yesterday that this was unusual in the history of our country. It may be unusual and unprecedented, but we certainly have not seen any unprecedented or creative action taken to address this situation. In the words of Don McGillivray, the Government is "making a virtue out of indecision". Our weak and wavering dollar, I suggest, is simply a reflection of a weak and wavering Government which refuses to give a firm sense of economic direction to the country.

With respect to the obvious victims of increased interest rates, and I think particularly of home owners whose mortgages are coming up for renewal, and those people who are trying to get into the housing market, with respect to these victims of his policies, will the Minister undertake to introduce fiscal measures to address that situation in order to provide Canadians with a measure of relief and protect them against these increasing interest rates?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let the Hon. Member's preamble go by without commenting on the fact that a wide number of editorial comments are supportive of the policy we followed in response to the unprecedented strength of the U.S. dollar. It is the first time in history that we have had this sort of strength. I set out very clearly the economic policy of this Government in my statement of November 8. That is the policy we will be following through on in the Budget coming this spring. I would hope that the Hon. Member would refer to that on a regular basis before he asks these questions, because I think he will find that the direction is there to create the jobs, the confidence, and that sense of certainty which was missing over the past 10 or 15 years.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is beginning to rival the Prime Minister as the undisputed master of the sanctimonious cliche, which is all we are getting.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Question.

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF BUDGET

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. The last budget target date was set at April. I hope it is not receding into history. Will the Prime Minister get behind his Minister of Finance and ensure that a Budget is brought down in this House before the end of April so that the victims of higher interest rates will know what kind of protection they can expect?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to tell my friend what I think he already knows. The Minister of Finance will be bringing in a budget which will be helpful and consistent with his financial statement of November 8, which was designed to restore confidence and create jobs.

On the question of consistency, given the intervention of the Hon. Member for Saint-Henri-Westmount, I believe he should take cognizance of the fact that, having asked for a $100 million contribution to Domtar, it now turns out that the Leader of the Opposition is opposed to the $100 million contribution. Today in La Presse he is announcing that he is in favour of the statement of policy as set out by the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. There is the duplicity of the Liberal Party. That's why you were driven from office, and you deserve to have been.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, it seems the Prime Minister cannot answer the question because I asked on what date the Budget will be brought down. I asked for a commitment that the Budget will be tabled here in the House before the end of April.

I would like to add that I object to the fact that the Prime Minister still does not know the name of my riding which is Saint-Henri-Westmount. I realize he lives in the Westmount part, but it is Saint-Henri-Westmount, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

I would predict—talking about without precedents—that we are going to have the first Minister of Finance who will retire without ever having produced a Budget in this House.

MAIN ESTIMATES

GOVERNMENT SPENDING PLANS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): My supplementary question is directed perhaps to the Minister's colleague, the President of the Treasury Board. I was shocked to find that the Government has abandoned the reform recommended by the Lambert Commission of giving us spending plans beyond the current year. Are they telling us, Mr. Speaker, that they do not know what the spending plans are beyond the current year, or are they scared to tell us what those spending plans are?

• (1120)

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we have not abandoned the practice of giving spending plans for more than the current or coming year. In due course we will be very happy to give Hon. Members of this House an indication of the course of government spending over the years to come.

FINANCE

SMALL BUSINESSES AND HOME OWNERS

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. As the House is aware, the Bank of Canada rate has gone up from 10.95 to 11.52 per cent, so that we now have one of those rare times in history when the Bank of Canada rate is higher than the prime lending rate charged by chartered banks, Caisses populaires and credit unions on their corporate loans. The rate for one-year Treasury bills has now reached 12.5 per cent—13 per cent when issued—while the rate for private one-year mortgages is now around 11.5 per cent.

Now that the Government has decided to let interest rates rise, we must expect some changes in the market, and my question is as follows: What does the Minister of Finance intend to do to help small- and medium-sized businesses that are going to see the cost of money rise to about 13 per cent, and homeowners whose mortgage rates will rise between ½ and ¾ of 1 percent? What does the Minister intend to do to help these two sectors of our economy?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to the House on many occasions in recent weeks that what we are faced with here is an unprecedented international situation which is causing upward pressure on interest rates. I have indicated to the House that I am not happy with that upward pressure but it is something that is not totally within our control. The Hon. Member should be aware of the fact that there is a tremendous press of international capital going around, but it is not going to be a long-term situation. There is going to be some relief, I would expect, in the next little while. With that relief I expect we would see some decline in interest rates.

MAIN ESTIMATES FOR 1985-86

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, today again the dollar weakened compared with yesterday's level, but confidence does not seem to be recovering very quickly. In the Main Estimates, the average rate for the debt service charge was calculated on the basis of 10.7 per cent, while today, the Bank of Canada rate is at 11.52 per cent. This would have the effect—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member, but does he have a question?

Mr. Garneau: I certainly do. This increase in the interest rate will mean an extra $1.7 billion in Government spending. Does the Minister intend to correct the Estimates that were tabled last Tuesday?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no, I do not intend to correct the Estimates as tabled by my colleague. We are still in fiscal year 1984-85. The next fiscal year starts on April 1, 1985. I have indicated in my previous answer that I expect by that time we should have some decline in interest rates from the levels we have today. That projection for the balance of the year stands.

DOMTAR—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday he said that the federal Government can help Domtar but, outside the House, a department official said the opposite. According to him, the federal Government cannot help a company in which a Government has an interest, or which is even controlled by a Government. What is the policy of the federal Government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Government policy is the one I announced yesterday: notwithstanding the fact that the Quebec Government may be a majority shareholder through some of its own agencies, we still have every intention of trying to help the company launch a major project. As my colleague knows, I am saying today what I said on Monday and Tuesday, unlike the Leader of the Liberal Party and his supporters who led the fight in the House during four days. Yesterday, the people of Quebec were flabbergasted to learn that the Liberal Party spent the whole week arguing against any kind of assistance to Domtar, yet they kept making a fuss about it. Now we can see how hypocritical the Liberal Party has been with respect to this matter.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals certainly have problems with policies. Still, I might suggest that the policies of the Progressive Conservative Government are contradictory as well.

[English]

In the Estimates that were tabled earlier this week there is a clear declaration that since November Crown corporations or government agencies are no longer eligible for financial assistance from the Government. How can the Prime Minister now leave the impression with Members of the House, and more particularly with the people who are involved in the Domtar enterprise, that the Government may indeed provide some kind of financial assistance? Surely the Government cannot have it both ways. It cannot have a policy statement in the Estimates which excludes financial assistance, and then come into the House and say that they may indeed get such assistance.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I have already said so in the House, Mr. Speaker, and I fail to see where the contradiction is. Faced with an outright request for a capital injection of $100 million in favour of Domtar, I had said that we were not in a position to meet that request, regardless of its merits, because of the heavy $35 billion deficit left us by the Liberal Party.

Be that as it may, we do admit to some responsibility in regional development. The Quebec Government may very well intervene in a case through its agencies, but that does not deny the company involved the right to make representations to the federal Government so as to find a formula which would enable us to offer some kind of assistance.

EXCLUSION OF CROWN CORPORATIONS FROM FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the general phrases are not helping to clarify a very serious situation. In the financial operations of the Province of Quebec, la Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec plays a fundamental role and is a public enterprise. Will the Prime Minister explain how the Government could adopt a policy, which the Estimates state has been in existence since last November, that will exclude Crown corporations or other government agencies, even if they have simply effective control, from financial assistance from the federal Government? Does this policy not blatantly discriminate against Crown corporations all across Canada in favour of private sector activity only? Given the thrust of economic development in the Province of Quebec, does this policy not particularly discriminate against the Province of Quebec?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I fail to see the contradiction mentioned by my colleague, for he is right to refer to the fact that, last November in the House, the Liberal Government was on the verge of sneaking Bill S-31 through, which would have had the dire consequences you mention for all francophones in Quebec. The NDP and our Party closed ranks against the Liberal Government which was trying to massacre the francophones of Quebec through the Caisse de dépôt et placement. We fought together in this war against the Quebec Liberal machine which fraudulently attempted to harm Quebecers.

In any event, I do not think there is any contradiction between the policy you refer to and the legitimate desire of the federal Government to meet with its interlocutor, the Premier of Quebec, and try to find a formula under which Domtar might carry out its development project. Unfortunately, we simply cannot meet the original request, and that is that.

EXTERNAL AID

CIDA—ELIMINATION OF $25 MILLION PROJECT FOR AFRICA

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of External Relations. The Government's co-ordinator for aid to Ethiopia, Mr. David MacDonald, stated recently that Canada must do more than feed the starving. According to Mr. MacDonald, our aid policy will be useless unless the desert's constant advance can be stopped. However, CIDA is planning to cancel indefinitely a $25 million project that would have used advanced Canadian solar technology to bring water to the surface and stop the desertification process.

My question to the Minister is as follows: Does the cancellation of this project represent Government policy?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, we intend to maintain the programs that have been committed. We are now engaged in program review, and our main objective is to help development in developing countries.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, if that is the case, then how are we to understand a paper prepared by CIDA and dated February 5, which says the Agency intends to postpone indefinitely the regional program for new and renewable energy sources, partly because of budgetary cutbacks at the National Research Council? Is the Minister aware of the existence of this memo? If so, what were her instructions to her Department, and finally is the Minister prepared to promise before the House that the $25 million program will not be cancelled?

Mrs. Vézina: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister responsible for CIDA, my responsibility consists in planning programs and announcing them, and I do not think I have any obligation to announce them here in the House.

SUBSIDIZATION OF DOMTAR—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa-Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Prime Minister which concerns Domtar and the principle defined by the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, whose department, according to the Estimates tabled this week, will no longer provide federal subsidies for Crown corporations and corporations controlled by provincial governments. The Prime Minister has been saying that Domtar may get something, but departmental officials have clearly indicated that, according to their interpretation, Domtar would not be entitled to these subsidies. Is this Government policy or is the Prime Minister now saying that Domtar could get a subsidy, thus contradicting the Minister's statement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): You are probably correct in saying that is the interpretation given by the officials, but it is not my interpretation and it is not the interpretation of my colleagues. I would like to point out to my hon. friend that when his interpretation of the policy in question . . . perhaps I may quote from this morning's edition of La Presse:

> When reporters asked him whether he supported Mr. Stevens' new policy on regional development, the Liberal leader was even more evasive and even tried to put an end to the interview. Literally surrounded by four or five journalists who wanted an answer, he finally said: "I am not against it!"

The Liberal leader approuves the policy as stated. Personally, I would say that we in Cabinet have a more "liberal" interpretation.

SUBSIDIES—CROWN CORPORATIONS—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa-Centre): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister realize that the policy of the Leader of the Liberal Party and the policy of the party to which the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion belongs are not the policy of the New Democratic Party? We believe that Crown corporations should be entitled to accept subsidies. Is the Prime Minister prepared to change the Department's policy since, otherwise, the officials will continue to interpret that particular policy?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is well aware that the fact I already announced . . . I have been consistent since the beginning of this week. I have not turned my coat like the leader of the Liberal Party and the Member for Westmount, I beg your pardon, Westmount-Saint-Henri . . . Saint-Henri-Westmount. We have been consistent all this week, but when I returned to the House on Wednesday, I announced that I intended to meet with the Premier of Quebec to discuss the case further. This implied a desire on our part to be of some use and to try and make a valid contribution to the development of the region.

REQUEST FOR BAN ON ALACHLOR HERBICIDE

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It follows a question that I asked last week of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. If it is brought to his attention that Alachlor, a herbicide that is used in crop spraying, has the potential to cause cancer in humans, and that this herbicide has been found in shallow, rural wells in Ontario in concentrations which could significantly increase the risk of cancer in children and adults, would the Minister demonstrate that he is concerned for the health of Canadians and the quality of ground water by immediately implementing an outright ban on the use of alachlor?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I certainly share the concern of the Hon. Member. I want to assure him that my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I, have and will continue to have ongoing consultations. At the moment, though, I have not made that final decision.

PEST MANAGEMENT ADVISORY BOARD

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, when will the Minister announce the establishment of the Pest Management Advisory Board, which was announced by his predecessor in May of last year and confirmed by the present Minister as recently as October, 1984? When will he announce this board?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): The answer is very, very soon, Mr. Speaker.

MAIN ESTIMATES FOR 1985-86

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given the promises he made to Quebecers in an address to the Empire Club and the Canadian Club—$75 million for shipyards and $100 million to finance farm mortgages—why do the main estimates indicate $40 million less for shipyard building and $60 million less for the Farm Credit Corporation?

[English]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take that question as notice, speak to my colleagues, and return to the House with the appropriate explanation for both of those reductions.

FINANCING PROMISED TO QUEBEC VITAL INDUSTRIES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. What with all the protests in Quebec concerning Domtar, how can the Prime Minister justify what appears to be an outright withdrawal of financing promised to vital Quebec industries?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this must be the NDP's Quebec day. We do get those days every other month. I encourage you and I congratulate you. Now then, I have been trying for three or four days to indicate to my colleagues that we were forced to turn down a direct request for a $100 million grant to Domtar, which is a very prosperous undertaking, a company which has posted huge profits in recent years and which is structurally sound. The huge deficit we have inherited did force us to reject a direct $100 million grant, but it does not rule out the possibility of co-operating in other fields with a view to helping Domtar and its shareholders carry out a major job-creating project in Quebec. I am sure my colleague will understand that we are considering the file and the requests—that one and others—with some sympathy.

DOMTAR—DATE OF MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER LÉVESQUE

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister, but first of all, I want to say how surprised I am to see that he has decided, in an effort to hide his lack of involvement in the Domtar affair, to quote an inaccurate report to the effect that the Leader of the Opposition is now opposed to the Government granting the subsidy. Let us be honest about it. The Prime Minister knows that he has received a letter requesting Government assistance. The Leader of the Opposition asked him about it this week in the House. Members of the Liberal Party and his own Party are pressuring him to grant the subsidy—

Some Hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): The question is quite simple. When does the Prime Minister intend to meet the Quebec Premier so that this matter can be resolved? That is the key issue.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of this appalling attack on the integrity of the members of the Parliamentary Press Gallery, I would like to quote from the article published yesterday in the newspaper La Presse and written by an experienced reporter, Mr. Lavoie, who says the following: "This ambiguous position of the Liberal Leader removes a trump card from the hands of the Quebec Members of Parliament, who had unexpectedly found a new hobby-horse in the Domtar affair. Now that their own leader had sided with the decision made by Mr. Stevens, they will find it difficult to continue their fight on this issue."

You are obviously embarrassed because of the hypocrisy of the Liberal position and the fact that you have reversed your stand before the people of Quebec. The answer to the other question asked by the Hon. Member is that I am meeting Mr. Lévesque on March 8.

INQUIRY WHEN DOMTAR SITUATION WILL BE RESOLVED

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

I simply want to point out that I spoke to my Leader this morning and that this article is inaccurate. I can also add that the Government can gain nothing by trying to play politics on the back of the Liberal Party with this issue. When will the Government resolve the Domtar situation? This is what the people in Windsor want to know. It is not by casting aspersions on the Liberal Party that the Government can solve the problem of the people who fear for their jobs in that region.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): You are not being as logical in this affair as your Leader was in relation to the Senate issue when he said in this House that he approved the role of the federal Parliament and would oppose any obstruction by the Senate. He is now approving the action of the Liberal senators, which is costing millions of dollars to Canadian taxpayers. This is what is happening because of the flip-flop of the Liberal Party.

We shall work loyally and without hypocricy. As noted in the press, we shall co-operate loyally with the Quebec Government, the Domtar company, its employees and the social groups involved in this affair. Our co-operation will be sincere and not—

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

RELEASE OF TASK FORCE REPORT

Mr. Jack Scowen (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Communications, I will address my question to his Parliamentary Secretary. I understand the Government pays the bills for the CRTC and not the press. Would the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications explain to this House why a CRTC task force report was released last Monday to the press, and the report to the Members of this House was delivered yesterday afternoon?

Mr. Geoff Scott (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): I thank the Hon. Member for his question, on behalf of the Minister of Communications, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member should know that when the policy concerning remote areas was announced last December 20, the Minister of Communications asked for the collaboration of the CRTC, which reacted immediately by setting up its own task force. That task force, under the chairmanship of Mr. Paul Klingle, has reported to the CRTC. We are awaiting the reaction of the Commission to the recommendations, and once the Government has assessed recommendations of the task force the Minister will be getting back to the Hon. Member and to the House.

TREATMENT OF SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday two Members on the government side suggested that the private homes of senior citizens which have been bought and paid for should be taken into account when determining pension income, and that the imputed rental savings should be calculated when determining GIS payments. Would the Minister of National Health and Welfare advise the House whether in fact these two Members were reflecting government policy, or whether they were just reflecting the right-wing views in the Conservative caucus?

Mr. Broadbent: Or both.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Whichever comes first.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will know that the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs has been meeting on the consultation paper. We had another meeting this morning, and I have indicated to the Committee, as we have done before, that we are interested in the broad views not only of committee members but of Canadians generally.

I think it is important for all of us in this House to recognize that individual Members of Parliament can have views and they can express them. That has always been part of parliamentary form. As to the position of the Government and the position it will take on the consultation, that is quite another matter.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the Minister repudiate the views of these two Members expressed yesterday, and assure this House and the seniors in our country that it is not the intention of the Government to implement any kind of despicable policy such as was enunciated by them yesterday?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I say to the Hon. Member that that is not our policy. The Hon. Member used that word, and it should be clearly established that it is not government policy. He should remember, and I am sure he does, that in previous times when the Liberals were musing about that kind of imputed rent, it was our Party that opposed it. We oppose it. If the Hon. Member had been in committee this morning, the Hon. Member would also know—

Mr. Rodriguez: That has changed.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): —that I gave to the committee examples of costs, for instance, for Canadians over the age of 65, of rent and home ownership. We had a good exchange on that matter. If the Hon. Member goes back to the record of the committee today, many of his questions might be answered.

GOVERNMENT BONDS

MARKETING SYSTEM

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Commission fees for marketable Government of Canada bonds were recently lowered creating an annual saving, I understand, of about $10 million. Would the Minister comment on the merits of the system used in the United States whereby the U.S. Treasury sells all its debt through the auction technique, and thereby eliminates commissions altogether?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm that, about a month or six weeks ago, the Government did reduce the commission rates for government bond issues. It will amount to a savings in the order of $10 million, or about 15 per cent of the total cost of commissions on government bond financing.

With regard to the Hon. Member's question on moving totally to an auction format or a non-commission format, I can tell him that we have taken steps to move toward an auction format. There will be an auction this month, the month of March. We are experimenting with these opportunities, but we are not ready to go fully to the U.S. format at this point.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

ESTIMATED EXPENDITURES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns government advertising. Given the past criticism by the Tories of government advertising, and given that the Minister of Supply and Services, in a debate with me on CBC's The Journal in January, stated that the Conservative Government would reduce government advertising substantially, can the Prime Minister explain to this House why the Estimates for 1985-86 show an increase of $23 million for the information budget, and an increase of $5 million in the Estimates for the Minister of Supply and Services particularly?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, without for a moment accepting the premise of the Hon. Member's question, I will take it as notice and make sure an answer is given to him to assure him that the intention of this Government is to cut back on government advertising costs.

PRIVY COUNCIL

MAIN ESTIMATES FOR 1985-86

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. Could he tell us why, in his own department, the information budget has been increased by 300 per cent?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the previous question applies to this one.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAX AVOIDANCE—USE OF ADVANCE RULINGS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): My question is for the Minister of National Revenue. According to the Estimates tabled in the House on Tuesday, the Minister will be allocating 20 person years to assist large corporations in methods by which to avoid taxes. Is the Minister aware that a study by his own Department on tax avoidance stated: "It is the opinion of senior management that the focus of tax avoidance has switched from implementing objectionable schemes to obtaining departmental approval through the advance ruling process"?

• (1150)

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will give my answer in Fergus English to the Hon. Member. The Department never has and never will countenance tax avoidance. Tax avoidance is improper. Under no circumstances will we assist in it. What we have said, and what is a key part of the Declaration of Taxpayer Rights, which we unveiled yesterday, is that taxpayers, in dealing with five pounds of the most incomprehensible legislation known to modern man, the Income Tax Act, have the right to know how the Department interprets the legislation. That includes corporate and individual taxpayers alike. What we are determined to do is to tell taxpayers how we interpret that legislation.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DEPARTMENT'S INFORMATION SERVICES

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same Minister. Of course it is especially incomprehensible to small individual taxpayers. Is it fair for the Department of National Revenue to offer these increased services to the big corporate sector and not offer the same level of services to the small, individual, non-corporate taxpayers, who are surely the vast majority of taxpayers?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to tell the Hon. Member that we are stepping up our information services. One of the commitments that I make to him, and to all Canadians, is to ensure that my Department goes out of its way to provide factual information to all taxpayers, particularly to taxpayers in the low income scale, to ensure that they have the information that is necessary to comply fully with the laws. It is a commitment that we make. It is guaranteed in our Declaration of Taxpayer Rights.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EXPENDITURE LEVELS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Minister of National Defence a very straightforward question about the Conservative Party's election pamphlet entitled Honour the Commitment, which promised greatly increased spending in the Department of National Defence. The Minister had the unmitigated gall to say that he would have to consult with the officials of the Department. It was not the officials of his Department who made that election promise. It was the Conservative Party which made that election promise.

Mr. Speaker: With great respect, does the Hon. Member have a question?

Mr. Hopkins: I would simply ask the Minister where is the honour and commitment on the Treasury benches of this Tory Government, when the Minister himself has been sitting on the Planning and Priorities Committee of Cabinet since last September and obviously had a part in making the cuts in real growth in defence expenditures. He was on the scene.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, one commitment that I can give to the Hon. Member, and to all Members of this House, is that, unlike the last 16 years during which time the Armed Forces underwent erosion of a substantial nature, we will, under the leadership of the Prime Minister and the Conservative Government, ensure that we live up to our commitments to our allies and to NATO, to make Canadian men and women who serve in our Armed Forces proud once again to serve their country.

ELECTION CAMPAIGN PROMISE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, that is an interesting statement, in view of the fact that the Estimates tabled on Tuesday are $150 million less than the previous Liberal Government proposal. The Minister is chairing the Government's task force examining ways of cutting spending. Is he suggesting that his Party never had any serious intention of keeping its promise of 6 per cent real growth in defence spending, but rather intended to lower it to the bare minimum of 3 per cent or less, as tabled Tuesday, or is it that his Party made promises in the last election simply based on lousy research?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, obviously the Hon. Member is confused. That is probably the result of the departure from his usual calm, controlled actions in the House of Commons. The Estimates of the Department will be before the Standing Committee as soon as the steering committee decides how to deal with the agenda. I anticipate that will be within a week or two. He will have the opportunity of going into that detail at that time. I can assure him, with respect to the Estimates, that they will provide sufficient to enable us, unlike the previous Government, to live up to those commitments to our allies in NATO.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LUBICON LAKE INDIAN BAND

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is St. David's Day today. I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Last month the Minister appointed the Hon. E. Davie Fulton as his personal emissary to the Lubicon Lake Indian Band. The Lubicon people have been trying for 46 years to have a reserve set aside, and now they are fighting to try to prevent complete destruction of their lands by the oil companies. When the Minister appointed Mr. Fulton, why did he not at least notify the Lubicon people of his action? Can he inform the House of the terms of reference for Mr. Fulton's work, how much power he will have to negotiate a real settlement, and when his work is expected to be finished?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member agrees with me that it was a good opportunity to have the appointment of the Hon. Davie Fulton to such a task, because the matter which he outlined with respect to Lubicon Lake and some of the other communities is such a complicated one. As a consequence of that complication, after I had advised the band that I intended to pick an envoy, I advised that what I would do was work out terms of reference for the Hon. Davie Fulton. We are in the process of doing that. Mr. Fulton indicated that he would not be able to start until mid-March, and we are just on target.

POWERS OF MINISTER'S REPRESENTATIVE

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, will Mr. Fulton have any power to bring justice to the Lubicon people, or is he simply going to be given a mandate to do a further study, which will result in further delays, while the Lubicon Lake area is being further destroyed?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member realizes that after all these years, after waiting for Government after Government to do something, the Lubicon people are delighted to have Mr. Fulton do the job.

Mr. Manly: Will he have power?

Mr. Crombie: If the Hon. Member would listen, I would say to him that, wherever Mr. Fulton does the job, he does it with a sense of justice, and he will have the power to do so.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

PROPOSED SALE OF CANADAIR AND DE HAVILLAND

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister confirm that the Canada Development Investment Corporation is discussing selling Canadair and de Havilland to Messerschmitt of Germany? If that is correct, why is the Canada Development Investment Corporation chairman, according to a report in The Globe and Mail, not looking for a commitment for "a specific level of jobs"?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm any ongoing negotiations. As my hon. friend would know, having served in high government office, questions of this magnitude are negotiated and dealt with, with various proposals on the table. I do not think he would really expect me to confirm or deny whether there are any ongoing negotiations.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. If the reports are correct, and they are apparently based on a visit paid recently by the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion to the Premier of Bavaria, Mr. Strauss, the chairman of Airbus Industrie, I would like the Prime Minister to explain why the Government is not willing to keep Canadair and de Havilland, the technology they developed, and the jobs they provide under Canadian public ownership, but instead is willing to sell them to Messerschmitt of Germany, a company that has a substantial degree of state ownership, or to Airbus Industrie, a consortium of European companies, most or all of which are also publicly owned?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why my hon. friend would jump to the conclusion that he has, and assert that as a matter of fact when it is no such thing. In his first question he referred to it as an allegation in The Globe and Mail. In his second question, it is a statement of fact that the Government is confirming its intention to do so. There have been no such transactions concluded. Negotiations continue with a number of interested parties, Canadian, North American, and European. At an appropriate time, when the Minister returns and a proper evaluation has been made and submitted to Cabinet, we will be delighted to inform the Hon. Member and the House.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): CDIC has confirmed these discussions are under way—his own Crown corporation.

Mr. Mulroney: Not our own Crown corporation; your Crown corporation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

RIGHT HON. JOHN G. DIEFENBAKER

PROPOSED STATUE ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Last night I had the pleasure of speaking to a Private Member's Motion which was initiated by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Scarborough Centre (Mrs. Browes). I am very pleased to say that that motion was passed unanimously. The motion was for the raising of a statue of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker placed on Parliament Hill.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister when we might expect to see some initiatives taken on that motion. I would also like to ask that consideration be given to inviting a Saskatchewan artist to design that statue.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear of the unanimous passing of the motion proposing the establishment of that kind of a memorial to the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker, who served this House and country with such outstanding distinction.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I know that all Members of the House would want an appropriate memorial raised. Given Mr. Diefenbaker's background, a Saskatchewan artist would be appropriate. We will be happy to look into the suggestion and report back to the House.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Bud Bradley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 205, 211 and 230.

[Text]

MOVE OF CONSERVATION AND RENEWABLE ENERGY OFFICE

Question No. 205—Mr. Henderson:

Did Treasury Board approve the move of the Conservation and Renewable Energy Office from Summerside, P.E.I. to Charlottetown, P.E.I. on July 26, 1984 and, if not, on what date was it approved?

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Treasury Board approval was not required for the above-mentioned relocation and consequently none was given. The Department involved, Energy, Mines and Resources did however advise Treasury Board of the move, and as required under the government's Relocation and Decentralization Policy, the Board advised the appropriate bargaining agents of the department's intentions.

The move, which involved relocating 12 employees from Summerside, P.E.I. to Charlottetown, P.E.I., 65 kilometres away, was not expected to create any special hardships since most of the employees already lived in Charlottetown. In addition, those employees requiring a change in domicile were to be reimbursed for their relocation expenses. Most of the dealings of this energy office were carried out in Charlottetown, and this was the basic reason for the move.

On November 28, 1984, a communiqué was issued by the Department indicating that the move was being deferred to March 31, 1985 pending a review of the new location. By this time, three or four employees had already moved to the new location and services have since been maintained in both locations.

CALIBRATION OF RADIATION METERS

Question No. 211—Mr. Hovdebo:

1. In each year since the service was initiated, how many radiation meters have been calibrated by the Ottawa Radiation Lab?

2. How many Lab employees were involved in the calibration process and what was the total cost of the operation to the Lab?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of State for Science and Technology): In so far as the National Research Council is concerned the answer is as follows:

NRC has calibrated radiation instruments and sources for over 50 years; detailed records for the earlier years are no longer available. During this period, the types of calibrations have been changing dramatically. For example, 60 Co teletherapy sources are no longer calibrated routinely but about 1,500 were calibrated between 1954 and 1973. Similarly, in earlier times NRC calibrated over 28,000 radium needles for use in cancer therapy but the demand for these calibrations has almost disappeared.

The following table shows for several classes of instruments the number calibrated in each of the last 10 years. Even within a class, instruments are calibrated in, and so require the maintenance of, a variety of different radiation fields.

Frequently a calibration represents the first step in a long chain. For example, Ontario Hydro uses one NRC-calibrated high quality instrument to calibrate hundreds of their own instruments. Health and Welfare calibrates over 100,000 personnel radiation monitoring badges based on one or two NRC calibrations per year. A cancer clinic will calibrate many units and instruments based on one NRC calibration per year.

Year	Exposure and Survey Instruments for X-rays and 60 Co	Neutron Survey Meters	Irradiation of Personnel Monitoring Badges	Survey[1] Meters in a 7 MeV Field	Chemical[2] Dosimetry Service

PERSONS AGED 65-70 WORKING FULL TIME

Question No. 230—Mr. Howie:

From January 1, 1984 to January 1, 1985, how many persons in the age group between 65 and 70 inclusive, were working full-time?

Mr. Bud Bradley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Statistics Canada reports: It is not possible to derive estimates of the number of persons in the age group between 65 and 70 inclusive who were working full time. However, annual averages drawn from the monthly Labour Force Survey for 1984 show the following:

Age	Employed full-time both sexes Annual Average, 1984
70 years and over	45,000

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered.

Mr. Bradley: I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

INDIAN ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-31, an Act to amend the Indian Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, today I am asking Hon. Members to consider legislation which will eliminate two historic wrongs in Canada's legislation regarding Indian people. These wrongs are discriminatory treatment based on sex and the control by Government of membership in Indian communities.

In the early days of Confederation, Canada consisted only of the Maritime Provinces, parts of Ontario and parts of Quebec. The balance of the great land was the territory of the aboriginal people. At that time, the Parliament of Canada took upon itself to define through the Indian Act who it would recognize as having Indian status. As Canada took over those Indian lands, hundreds of thousands of people and their descendants fell unknowingly into a category of people whose lives would become dominated almost totally by the federal Government.

The legal definition of who was an Indian reflected the nature of Canadian society at the time. A woman followed her husband's status. He alone had civil and political rights and he alone could pass them to his children. This 19th century view was reflected throughout the Indian Act. An Indian woman would, parliamentarians of the day reasoned, be taken care of by her white man and therefore would no longer need to be an Indian. She was enfranchised, to use the terminology of the Act. For her, the price of marriage was her status as an Indian.

It is sad to say that these legal definitions continue to the present day. The result is a lengthy list of hotly debated issues. These include questions like who is an Indian, who determines who belongs to a band, who should be registered as having Indian status, what should be done with people who lost status unfairly and with their children, and what is enfranchisement and why do we still have it. All of these issues mean little to most Canadians but they are critical, urgent and important questions to Indian people. That is why the federal Government has been under pressure from many fronts for many years, both in and out of Parliament, to remove sexual discrimination from the Indian Act.

In the legislation which I am tabling today, that removal is being effected. If this was all that had to be done, it would be done simply. However, removing discrimination raises two other questions: what about those who have lost their rights as a result of discriminatory legislation, and who really should control the membership in the bands? To discuss these questions, I need to step back a moment and explain certain facts.

I might say parenthetically, Mr. Speaker, that you would find as I did, if you were to travel throughout Indian communities and deal with organizations that deal with matters related to Indian people, that the amount of ignorance which exists about certain facts with respect to these definitions is striking. That is why I wish to spend a short time dealing with them.

The Indian Act deals with three basic things: who is considered to be an Indian within the meaning of the Act; who can be a member of a particular Indian nation; and who can live on reserves. Status defines those individuals whom the federal Government wishes to include within the meaning of the Indian Act. It is the right of the federal Government to make that decision. As a result of certain government policies, these individuals who have status are eligible as individuals for certain programs, most particularly those in the fields of education and health.

Band membership is a qualitatively different matter. Band membership is a collective right because it gives access to the common assets and the decision-making process of the band. Residency on the reserve goes to the heart of the participation in the daily life of Indian people in Indian communities. That is why flowing to those resident people is access to housing and other community services. That is also why it has been clear to me for some time that the intimate decisions regarding membership and residency must be made by the people most concerned and most affected.

I know that some people have felt that the resistance of some Indian people to having discrimination removed from the Indian Act was nothing more than male chauvinism. I wish to take this opportunity to explain that in all of my hours and days of meeting with Indian people on this and other subjects, I have not found that to be true. Many First Nations have long preceded Canada in the creation of egalitarian, non-discriminatory societies, and the recognition of the rights of women. Many Indian women had strong political rights in their nations long before non-Indian Canadian women had the right to vote. Indian people have long been on record as being in support of the principle of sexual equality and have joined with others in condemning discriminatory federal actions which have deprived persons of their rights without their consent or without the consent of their communities.

Indian people have consistently objected to the federal Government intruding into the governing of their communities and nations. What greater intrusion can there be than the arrogance of assuming the right to tell another people of another culture and tradition who is and who is not a member of their community and who can and who cannot live on their own lands?

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has said that as a Conservative—indeed, I think this matter reflects the feelings of all Members of the House—there has been too much intrusion by the federal Government into the daily lives of Canadians. Indians have been a special target and victim of that heavy hand for over a century.

In removing the discrimination from the Indian Act we are starting a new relationship with the people of Indian First Nations. Walter Currie, an Indian educator, has commented on the old relationship upon which federal policy until now has been based. He said:

> Unhappily, for both the white man and the Indian especially, it is not working. I wonder what would happen if Canada would accept us, would be aware of us as Indians, would accept us as a people, would share with us pride in our heritage—for it is Canada's heritage also . . . If we cannot cure the ills of today, heaven help us tomorrow.

I have tried to cure the ills of today in this Bill. I have tried to do so in a way which accepts Indian people as people with a right to determine who they are. All of this is a part of a new awakening, both on the part of Indian people, and I think increasingly on the part of non-Indian Canadians as well. Times have changed. We have all come a long way in our thinking. I know my own thinking has changed from the time when I thought we could simply eliminate discrimination from the Indian Act by putting a bold black line through Section 12(1)(b).

When the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) was Attorney General of Canada over a decade ago, he had the responsibility to defend the legal situation of the day in the Supreme Court case of Jeannette Corbière Lavell, who sought relief from the discriminatory provisions of Section 12(1)(b). Yet I am sure that he would join with me today in supporting the principles upon which this bill rests.

It has only been recently that many in my own Party Have fully understood the need to respect the demand of Indian communities to determine their own membership. However, interestingly, John Diefenbaker foresaw today's legislation. In commenting the Lavell decision, he characterized the decision as unjust and retrograde. He said:

> I agree with the dissenting judges. In the years ahead, the dissent of today will be the cornerstone of the future.

In 1977, Harold Cardinal, a Cree political leader in Alberta, published an essay in his book entitled The Rebirth of Canada's Indians. In that book he said:

> Trimmed to the bare bone (our rebirth) means we must regain control over the basic decisions affecting our everday lives, our communities, our children, our futures.
> Parents must regain the right to make decisions about the lives of our children, their education, the values they grow up with, their preparation for life. We are talking about the right to make the decisions that will allow our communities to flourish—

He was making a declaration which most Canadians would regard as a given right. Surely, one of the ways in which Indian people can do that is to control the membership of their own First Nations and to be unburdened from the sexually discriminatory provisions of the Act.

In November, 1983 the Parliamentary Task Force on Indian Self-Government, made up of members of all Parties, made a unanimously accepted recommendation which stated:

> The Committee asserts as a principle that it is the rightful jurisdiction of each Indian First Nation to determine its membership according to its own particular criteria.

In the legislation I have tabled today, that has been done.

The legislation is based on certain principles, which are the cornestones that John Diefenbaker identified. The first principle is that discrimination based on sex should be removed from the Indian Act.

The second principle is that status under the Indian Act and band membership will be restored to those whose status and band membership were lost as a result of discrimination in the Indian Act.

The third principle is that no one should gain or lose their status as a result of marriage.

The fourth principle is that persons who have acquired rights should not lose those rights.

The fifth principle is that Indian First Nations which desire to do so will be able to determine their own membership. Those are the principles of the Bill.

It is clear that there is little disagreement on the first principle. Sexually discriminatory sections should be removed from the Indian Act. Where there is disagreement, it is on the question of reinstatement of those persons who have been affected in the past by the discriminatory provisions. Some say there should be no reinstatement in any way, shape or form. On the other hand, there are others who want reinstatement to revert to Confederation, giving Indian status and band membership to anyone with any degree of Indian ancestry.

This legislation achieves balance and rests comfortably and fairly on the principle that those persons who lost status and membership should have their status and membership restored. While there are some who would draw the line there, in my view fairness also demands that the first-generation descendants of those who were wronged by discriminatory legislation should have status under the Indian Act so that they will be eligible for individual benefits provided by the federal Government. However, their relationship with respect to membership and residency should be determined by the relationship with the Indian communities to which they belong.

This legislation also wipes out forever the concept of enfranchisement, which forced many Indian people to give up their status and band membership against their will. Incredibly, in the past some people lost their Indian status simply as a result of the fact that they enlisted in the Armed Forces, received a university education, or became a member of the clergy. When I told that to my neighbours in Toronto, they could hardly believe that this was the law of the land.

There is another very important matter which I should raise. That is the matter of determining resources which communities will need as a result of these legislative changes. No one knows how many people will apply for restoration of their rights or how many of those who do have their rights restored will decide to return to live in their communities. It is certain that the impact will be different from one Indian community to another from coast to coast to coast. The legislation does not contain a provision regarding resources simply because the entire question of resources is not addressed in the Indian Act.

I would like to say that currently, and speaking generally, existing levels of service and resources in Indian communities are already appallingly inferior to those received by Canadians in general. That is why I have been taking some vigorous, and I think even creative measures recently to achieve efficiencies within the spending of my own Department to try to free up funds in the next fiscal year from administration expenditures in order to move them to programs for Indian communities.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: I have also begun, Mr. Speaker, to implement policy changes which will allow Indian communities to have a much greater control over expenditures according to their own priorities or what they themselves refer to as "block" or "global" funding. The question of resources and lands will be part of a larger review within Indian First Nations to determine actions which should be taken by the federal Government in order to ensure there is sufficient land and fiscal resources to meet federal responsibilities and obligations for all the people residing there, including those who have been restored to membership in each community by this legislation. I am sure this House would not want me to proceed on a well intentioned attempt to redress injustices of the past which would end up inflicting an even greater injustice and irreparable damage upon the resources and people of the existing Indian communities.

Following the policy of my Government to consult fully, I have received advice and guidance on this legislation from individuals, from written submissions, women's organizations, Indian groups, bands and chiefs, non-status Indian groups, national organizations, from my Department and from my colleagues in this House. Following the policy of my Government to seek consensus, I have encouraged parties to talk to each other, to attempt to reconcile their differences and to accommodate each other's concerns. I have spent many hours trying to understand and develop a course of wisdom. I invite, indeed I encourage, those who may see better approaches to present them to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development for its consideration.

While there may be other ways to reach these objectives, I have to reassert what is unshakeable for this Government with respect to this Bill. First, it must include removal of discriminatory provisions in the Indian Act; second, it must include the restoration of status and membership to those who lost status and membership as a result of those discriminatory provisions; and third, it must ensure that Indian First Nations who wish to do so can control their own membership. Those are the three principles which allow us to find balance and fairness and to proceed confidently in the face of any disappointment which may be expressed by persons or groups who were not able to accomplish 100 per cent of their own particular goals.

This is a difficult issue. It has been for many years. The challenge is striking. The fairest possible balance must be struck and I believe it has been struck in this Bill. I believe we have fulfilled the promise made by the Prime Minister in the Throne Speech that discrimination in the Indian Act would be ended.

In conclusion, I would like to make one or two points of a general nature and which I believe are important. Decolonizing is not a painless process. No one comes out a 100 per cent winner. We can never go back to square one and start over. We have to begin with the realities we confront today. While we can celebrate the ending of a long-standing injustice, we can grieve that the injustice ever existed at all. Some persons have expressed to me surprise that the Government's approach has not been to claim partisan credit for this Bill. I have seen cases in the past where solutions to injustice died because of an effort to exploit them for political advantage. We in this House should refrain from doing so because no one should claim pride in doing something which common decency says should have been done years ago.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: We should refrain from doing so because the task of creating a new relationship with the aboriginal peoples of Canada is far from complete and because this legislation should be supported by all the peoples of Canada, male and female, Indian and non-Indian, and all political Parties.

I call upon all of those political Parties to support this legislation. In doing so, Canada can bring to an end sexist discrimination in the Indian Act and at the same time begin to bring to an end colonial intrusion into the affairs of the people of the First Nations.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Mr. Speaker, it was Doctor Samuel Johnson, the great literary figure of the 18th century England, who once said: "Of all the ills that human hearts endure, how small the part that laws may cause or cure". It is arrogant of me, I know, and I do hesitate to disagree with such an eminent English literary figure, but when one considers the misery which has been caused in this country by the various provisions of the Indian Act, it is very difficult indeed to accept the wisdom even of such a notable man as Doctor Samuel Johnson. The effects of the Indian Act have been alarming and disturbing in the extreme.

For thousands of years before there was European immigration to this country, there existed in North America many self-governing Indian nations. They had their various languages, their economies and their political systems. The Royal Proclamation of 1763, which is now referred to in the Canadian Constitution, formalized British colonial policy in North America. It affirmed this reality that Indian nations existed, interrelated, and this proclamation recognized Indian title and rights to land and placed very severe limits on the way that the colonial government could secure land for development. It was the source of the treaty-making process which, by the 1920s, had covered all of Canada with the exception of British Columbia and north of 60.

This original relationship was one to which the Minister has referred in his remarks; it was a government-to-government relationship. We should not idealize it too much; it had all sorts of faults. It was a colonial relationship but it was government-to-government at least. That was the way in which the Crown proceeded to deal with Indian nations.

However, that pattern was not sustained. Early Canadian policy attempted to assimilate and terminate Indian people. For example, the Indian people had no part to play at all in negotiating the Canadian Confederation. They were excluded. They did not have the smallest voice in the terms of the British North America Act of 1867. Yet that same Act, in Section 91(24), assumed legislative authority with respect to Indians and lands reserved for Indians to the federal Government. The federal Government used that section of the Constitution to erode Indian governments. Well, in fact to do away with them. In its place the Government imposed upon Indian nations a colonial regime, and then through the Indian Act of 1876 the Government consolidated its legislative control over the Indian people. Under the Indian Act traditional Indian governments were done away with and replaced with something known as band councils. This was not an invention of Indian people at all. It was not indigenous government but an imposed form of government.

What did these band councils do? They simply functioned as agents of the federal Government. They exercised a very limited range of delegated power, always under federal supervision. The chiefs and councils were given very little real power. All of the important decisions were made by the Department of Indian Affairs here in Ottawa and by the local Indian agent out in the field.

The situation today is not all that much different, Mr. Speaker. Many Canadians, as the Minister has pointed out, are not aware of that. The Indian Act, Sir, is not only paternalistic, not only colonialist in its nature and intent; it regulates fully and in precise detail virtually every aspect of the lives of Indian people living on reserves. The Indian Act is in fact totalitarian. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, with that very brief background in history, it should surprise no Hon. Member in this House that the Indian Act is discriminatory in many respects.

The Minister's Bill before us today deals with sex discrimination in the Indian Act. Parliament, through the Indian Act, took from Indian nations the right to determine their identity and membership. The Act took away Indian status from Indian women who had decided they were going to marry non-Indian men. That was done through the infamous Section 12(1)(b). Although surprisingly, Mr. Speaker, it permitted Indian men to transmit status to their non-Indian wives. Now, that is a federal statute; hard to believe but it is. The Act also took away Indian status from Indian people, as the Minister has already mentioned; from Indian people who joined the Armed Forces to serve their country, from those who wanted to improve themselves by attending a university and from those who became professional people, be they doctors, lawyers or members of the clergy. The Indian Act, no more and no less, played the role of God in the lives of these people and it was not a benevolent deity either. Not at all. It was an evil, whimsical demon creating Indians out of non-Indians and making non-Indians out of Indian women who married non-Indian men.

I would like to say to my hon. friends that it is not just Section 12(1)(b) which should cause us shame in this House, although sex discrimination wherever we find it is odious, offensive, totally distasteful and unacceptable. However, Section 12(1)(b) and the enfranchisement provisions of the Indian Act were all designed to assimilate or terminate Indians. It is the whole Act which is a disgrace, not just one section.

Members may wonder why, then, has the entire Act not been repealed. Well, there have been attempts in the past to improve it. I have often described it as a leaky, rusty old ship full of barnacles, ready to sink. You try to patch it up but it just does not work. All efforts by very dedicated Indian leaders working with senior Government officials and the most senior members of Cabinet have failed. I do not think you can ever work with the Indian Act and produce something which would be fair and just, no matter what we do to it.

Since the time of the coming of Europeans to this country, Indian people have attempted to obtain the proper recognition of their rights and their place in this country. They have tried to do it, for example, by way of the treaties they concluded with colonial powers. They are trying to do it today in the modern claims negotiations, but so far not very successfully. But I want to commend the Minister for undertaking a wholesale review of the way in which we proceed with the settlement of claims, both comprehensive and specific.

So all of these attempts to recognize the special place of Indian people within the Canadian mosaic have failed. All we have at the present time is this miserable statute called the Indian Act. The Indian people do not want it repealed because, as bad as it is, as little as it is, it is the only thing they have that gives them special recognition within Canada. When you cut off a person's legs at the knees it is not very helpful, Mr. Speaker, to say to that person: "We are now going to go a little further and amputate at the hips". That is in fact what we are doing when we say to Indian people that we should think about repealing all of the Indian Act without according them constitutional recognition of their right to self-government. That is the key.

Mr. Heap: You could have done it last year.

Mr. Penner: I wish we had. I want to talk about that in a moment and about why we did not succeed, because that is the key.

It is not further amputation that is called for, Mr. Speaker, but the giving back to Indian people of all of their legs and feet. It is we who have made them dependent wards, a situation which Indian people are demanding be changed and changed now. How will we do it? We will do it by recognizing in our Constitution, the new Constitution of Canada, their aboriginal right to govern themselves. When we do that, then the entire Indian Act, not just Section 12(1)(b) or the enfranchisement provisions but the entire Indian Act, then becomes unconstitutional.

Our good friend, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie), is certainly not in charge of the constitutional process. We all recognize that and we are not going to blame him for failures or for discouragement over the future process. We must work as best we can with the Bill which is before us. The Minister has been called upon to work in a very confined space rather than in the large constitutional process. In that very confined space is this dirty nest called the Indian Act. The Indian Act, among other sins, discriminates on the basis of sex.

Let us reflect on the actions taken by the Minister within the narrow parameters imposed upon him and ask how he has done. There are some pluses, to be sure. There are some negative features as well. To the Minister's credit, within the very severe and strict limits of the Indian Act he has quite remarkably recognized the right of Indian bands or Indian nations to determine their own membership, at least in a limited way. Bands must have a non-discriminatory membership code. They must have a mechanism to review decisions they make regarding membership. Those recommendations were contained in the report of the special committee. We are grateful that the Minister is aware of them and responded to them.

We should be aware that full control over membership does not come immediately. The Bill says that we parliamentarians are first going to clean up our own act as best we can. Clause 12(1)(b) is our creation. The Indian people did not seek a statutory provision to impose sex discrimination on their own people. The Minister was quite right in pointing out that in many ways the Indian people of the country have led the rest of us in dealing with sexual discrimination.

As I have said before, I encourage Hon. Members to attend an assembly of the Assembly of First Nations. That is the Indian Parliament of Canada. In many ways it is superior to our own institution, if you will forgive me for saying so and not call me to order, Mr. Speaker. In many ways they conduct their business in a better fashion than we do. There are far more women actively involved in the deliberations of the Assembly of First Nations than there are in the House of Commons.

Band control of membership in this Bill is for the future. The Government is saying that it will impose its will on the Indian people only one more time. It asks to be forgiven and understood because it will not happen again. The Government must clean up those droppings in its dirty little nest but is going to let those droppings fall on the heads of the Indian people.

Every political Party in the House is opposed to sex discrimination. Clause 12(1)(b) must be repealed. But I find the way in which we are forced to proceed distressing. Partly through necessity, we have chosen to be pilgrims in the slough of despond rather than to follow the more noble route of constitutional reform. So it has always been, Mr. Speaker: the high soul takes the high road and the low soul takes the low, and in between on the misty flats the rest drift to and fro. The Minister deserves no condemnation at all for that fact of life. He has done his best within the confines of an almost impossible task. He is seeking to repeal Section 12(1)(b) and the loss of status by unfair enfranchisement. The right to band control of membership is partially recognized. The by-law provisions of the Indian Act are strengthened.

I think the credit for that goes to the standing committee which worked with the previous Bill in the last Parliament. Working with the Minister's officials and the Justice officials we did our best to improve a Bill which was not very good to start with. Given more time, I think we could have improved it. However, time ran out on us, the guillotine fell with severity, and we brought into the House a Bill about which the Hon. Member sitting next to the Minister said: "We'll have to hold our noses and vote for it".

Discrimination remains within the Indian Act. The Bill still categorizes Indians as status and non-status. It still indicates those who are band members by action of this Parliament, and those who are not band members and must seek that status or will in some way be ineligible for it. As an example of how discrimination will continue to exist I will describe two different types of marriage unions. In one marriage union an Indian man marries a non-Indian. If they were married before the Act, both will have Indian status. Their children and their children's children will have status transmitted even if they marry non-Indians. However, if an Indian woman married a non-Indian man their child will have status, but that status will not be transmitted if that child marries a non-Indian. Therefore, we have not solved all our problems. We still have discrimination. That is the tragedy of trying to clean up an Act which really cannot be cleaned up. It is also reminiscent of a very mad play in which all the characters have become disconnected from reality.

What should we be doing? What could we have done? Where have we failed? I think we have failed in the constitutional direction. It is true that we must work this Bill now. We must make it as good as possible. On behalf of my Party I give my commitment to the Minister that we will do that. In the standing committee we will work with other members to make the Bill as good as it can possibly be. It is essential, however, for all of us in the House and for the Canadian people to recognize that what we are doing today is not all that progressive or noble at all. We have created heartbreak and misery through our intolerable meddling and tinkering. With this Bill we continue down that same wretched path. We want to feel good. I understand that. We intend to do our best. We want to remove the sex discrimination, but in so doing there are shortfalls and ill side effects.

We will console ourselves by saying that we consulted widely and did our best. There can be no argument there. However, Mr. Speaker, let all Members, the people of Canada, especially the women, and the provincial Governments know that we continue to fail the Indian people of this country. We will continue to do so until we recognize the right of Indian people to manage, direct and control their own affairs within the Canadian Confederation.

In drafting this Bill, the Minister has tried to do his best and he deserves all the credit for that effort. However, the answer to the dilemma lies elsewhere, which he knows full well. I say to him and to his Government and to all the Premiers of the provinces of Canada: let there be no more failure at the constitutional table because that is where these problems can ultimately be solved in a lasting way.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to speak to this Bill. First, I would like to extend my thanks to the Minister for his courtesy in ensuring that I, as critic for the NDP, received a copy of the Bill at least as early as the press. I would also like to say that I believe that Bill C-31 represents a major improvement over Bill C-47 that was before the last Parliament. Our committee was able to outline some of the failures in the previous Bill and I am pleased to see that improvements have been included.

Let me stress the importance of this Bill to a wide range of people. This Bill is important to those Indian women and men who lost status and membership in their band and now will have the opportunity to regain it. These people include women who lost status through Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act, their children who lost status through Section 109(2) of the Indian Act, people who were unfairly enfranchised when they were in the army or had to be enfranchised in order to seek employment. The Bill is important for those who were affected by the provisions that went back to the 1920s which enfranchised anyone who had a university education or a profession.

The Bill is very important to those who now have an opportunity to regain status. It is also very important to the children of these people who will have the opportunity to regain Indian status and the possibility of being accepted into band membership for the first time. The Bill is important to Indian bands because it recognizes their right to make basic decisions about their own membership. Finally, the Bill is very important to the Canadian people as a whole. Canadians have been embarrassed by the international attention that has been drawn to us because of the sexual discrimination that has been written into the Indian Act.

It is important that this Bill is drafted properly in view of the poor legislation that was drafted last spring. It is also important for us to be realistic about what we can and cannot do as legislators when dealing with this Bill. Let me use the Lubicon people in northern Alberta as an example. During the last four or five years a great deal of oil activity has been intruding into their trapping and hunting areas. What used to be a wilderness is now criss-crossed and honeycombed with roads, seismic lines, pumping stations and other activities. No matter what Parliament does to try to bring justice to the Lubicon people, there is no way that we can restore the pristine nature of their homeland. Similarly, we can look at Meares Island which is the home of the Ahousat and Clayoquot peoples. They are faced with the possibility that that area might be logged and we must realize that once the trees are gone no Act of Parliament can bring them back.

How much more is this the situation when we are dealing not just with land and the environment but with the history of a people? The discrimination against Indian people, particularly against Indian women, has a long and shameful history. All Canadians share in that collective shame. Section 12(1)(b) is the legal embodiment of a romantic myth which has some very real economic overtones. In North America that romantic myth goes back at least as far as Captain John Smith and his rescue by Pocahontas when he was about to be executed. It is said that Pocahontas laid her head upon his and saved him.

Many people are not quite so familiar with some of the other accounts of Captain John Smith's rather fanciful history of Virginia in which he tells the story of how Indian people brought food and saved the entire colony from starving to death. We tend to gloss over later accounts of how the colonists seized the land. John Smith actually proposed to make Indian people slaves.

The point I am emphasizing is that among many European males, a romantic attachment to an Indian woman also had a very real economic attachment to Indian land. This commercial attachment is something that Indian people were aware of as well. Indian people had their own view of what was happening and they wanted some means to protect themselves and their lands.

In connection with the Lavall and Bedard case before the Supreme Court, Harold Cardinal explained some of the concerns of the Indian Association of Alberta in his book entitled The Rebirth of Canada's Indians. I noted that the Minister also quoted from this book. On page 109 Mr. Cardinal wrote:

> We were terribly concerned over what effect such a decision would have on reserves as the collective home of Indian people. We did not follow nor did we want, a system of private ownership, because we felt that this would rip apart our reserve communities in short order.
> Another valid concern was that if the women were successful in their suits, our reserves would be opened for settlement by white men, allowing them, through marriage to Indians, to gain ownership of Indian lands. A number of other questions were raised:

1) Would individual Indians then be free to sell portions of Indian land? This could mean destruction of Indian reserves and the end of Indian land-holding.

2) Would communal band ownership of reserve land cease to exist, and be supplanted by individual ownership—subject to seizure? Would that entitle non-Indians, related through marriage to Indians, to inherit portions of Indian lands?

3) Would Indians be subject to some of the provincial laws which do not now apply?

He goes on to say:

Our alarm, which led to our decision to oppose the two women, was based on our belief that if the Bill of Rights knocked out the legal basis for the Indian Act, it would at the same time knock out all legal basis for the special status of Indians.

In committee we will have to examine how far the present Bill deals with these legitimate concerns that were raised by Harold Cardinal and the Indian Association of Alberta. However, whether or not Section 12(1)(b) ever provided any real protection for Indian people, we all know that it exacted a very heavy price from Indian women. By removing status and band memberships from Indian women who married a non-Indian, that section of the Indian Act robbed these women of their birthright. It robbed them of their right to belong to their own people and the right to live in the community where they had grown up, to inherit property left to them by their parents and even to be buried in ancestral graveyards. As has been pointed out by the two previous speakers, all of us know that there is no easy way out of this situation. There is no easy way to decolonize. There is no clean way in which we can get out of this mess. May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two p.m.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the House rose at one o'clock, the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) had the floor.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned for lunch I was simply pointing out that there was no clean way for us as parliamentarians to get out of this situation which we have inherited from our fathers and our grandfathers. Our mothers and our grandmothers really had very little chance to be involved.

The Bible refers to an old proverb which says:

The fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge.

This certainly applies to this situation where we are trying to shuck off this tradition of colonialism, sexism and racism. In spite of the fact that there is no perfect solution for the situation in which we find ourselves, we do have the obligation in our time to try and act in a responsible and just manner. It is in that context that the Minister had to bring forth his Bill and that we as parliamentarians have the obligation to look at it.

How adequate is the present Bill in dealing with the situation in 1985? The Minister has outlined three principles which he says are unshakeable and which he used as the basis for drafting this legislation. First, sections of the Indian Act which discriminate on the base of sex must be removed. Second, Indian bands must have the right to determine their own membership. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, this is an essential of Indian self-government, one that was underlined in the report of the Task Force on Indian Self-Government and, as the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) said, should be entrenched in the Constitution. Third, persons who lose Indian status through sexual discrimination or through unfair disenfranchisement must have the right to be reinstated to band membership.

These three principles do not always sit easily with one another, but I endorse them and so does my Party. But when the New Democratic Party passed a policy resolution on this subject at its 1983 Regina convention, it included not only these three principles but also a fourth. It said that the federal government must provide adequate funding and lands to meet the needs of increased populations. Unfortunately, that fourth principle has no place in this Bill. Perhaps that is why the Minister calls himself a Progressive Conservative. He enunciates some very progressive principles, but when it comes time to put money behind those principles he becomes very conservative.

In his speech the Minister acknowledged the problem but then he sloughed it off by saying there is no provision in the Indian Act for including financial resources. This is not an academic question, Mr. Speaker. The problems Indian people face we all know cannot be solved simply by making money available, but they cannot be solved without money.

There are three situations where the provisions of this Bill require that the Indian people should be given guarantees that money will be available. First, the Bill provides for the reinstatement of band members who once had status and lost it unfairly. A significant number of these people will want to return to their original homes and live once more on the reserve. But the fact is, as the Minister has acknowledged, that many of these reserves are already crowded and are also impoverished. Time after time over the past few years chief councillors have come before the standing committee. They have lobbied individual members of the committee and have told about the desperate state of housing on their reserves. For several years now we have had a backlog of some 10,000 homes that need to be built in Indian communities just to keep up with the present population. Neither the previous Government nor the present Government has made a serious attempt to meet this acknowledged need.

The Government must make a clear commitment to deal with that backlog and to make funding available for the homes of those Indians who will be reinstated by this Bill. There will be social chaos on many reserves if people who are reinstated come back to their home reserves and get housing in advance of present band members who have been on waiting lists sometimes for years.

If, on the other hand, people who are reinstated cannot come back to the reserve and have decent housing, then the entire reinstatement program is a cruel hoax. It is not just a matter of housing, Mr. Speaker, there will also be the need for additional water, sewage and road systems, to say nothing of the need for adequate land base and funding for economic development.

The Minister was aware of some of these concerns when he drafted the Cabinet document that was leaked this last week. It states in Section 40:

> On many reserves all available lands are allocated.... Some Indian groups have argued for a land "dowry" of up to 128 acres to be allocated for each such individual. This option would be extremely expensive and really goes beyond the scope of dealing with the effects of discrimination. The Minimum action required on this issue would be to allocate funds to provide additional land to meet the essential housing and infrastructure needs of persons restored as band members. This could be done in accordance with existing federal policy on additions to reserves. Funds for this purpose could be provided on a phased basis depending on their availability. No legislative amendments would be required to implement this system.

Whether or not this is an authentic Cabinet document, I cannot say, but it certainly accords with the way in which this Bill comes forward. What we have is the minimum action. In other words, there is no action being taken on the question of finances. All the Minister says is that funds could be provided on a phased basis depending on their availability. That does not begin to meet the needs of Indian communities, if there is going to be reinstatement of band membership.

In that connection, I would like to ask why is funding for economic development down by some $23 million in the 1985-86 Estimates when there will be more need of it than ever? The Special Committee on Indian Self-Government, in recommendation No. 22, stated:

> The Committee recommends the establishment of a specialized tribunal to decide disputes in relation to agreements between Indian First Nations and other governments. Its structures, powers and procedures should be jointly decided by the federal Government and designated representatives of Indian First Nations.

Given the financial needs of Indian bands and the increased pressures that are going to be placed upon them by reinstatement, there is a great need for some such tribunal where people can come together and reach some kind of agreement as to what will be available to them.

The second area where the Bill requires some funding guarantees is with respect to the estimated 52,000 people who for the first time will be eligible for Indian status. Through band control of membership, some of these people will acquire full membership in Indian bands, but others will not. Theoretically, they will be entitled to health and education services which are presently available to off-reserve Indians. The problem is that these services have been drastically cut back in the past few years.

It will be cold comfort for a non-status Indian in Regina or Winnipeg to acquire Indian status and then find that it does not mean a thing in terms of real benefit. In the past few years allowances for off-reserve high school students have been cut and it has become more difficult to get funding for post-secondary education. Where is the off-reserve housing program that used to exist a few years ago? What is there in the way of economic development funding for off-reserve Indians? Without some guarantee of federal dollars and some commitment to programs, this whole business of Indian status will be a cruel joke on first-generation children.

Third, there is finally the possibility of creating new bands. Considering the intransigence of present bands toward receiving reinstated members, this possibility needs to be actively provided for with some funding. This means funding for land acquisition from the provinces as well as funding for housing, infrastructure and economic development.

Perhaps some Members get nervous with all this talk about the need for money, but they should remember two things. First, we owe a long-standing debt of justice. Indian people have suffered from our imposition of unjust laws and our denial of a decent economic base in the past. We have a great deal of catching up to do. Second, nothing could be more uneconomical than the present waste of our human resources. Many Indian people, status and non-status, are trapped in the downward spiral of welfare-based poverty, yet we continue to pour millions of dollars into that system every year. If we recognized the legitimate needs of Indian people, it would turn to our long-term economic advantage.

I want to raise one question about a detail in the Bill because it involves an important principle. I refer to those clauses dealing with band control of membership. We agree with that principle, but I am concerned that the Bill does not specifically require that band membership provisions should conform to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Some people might claim that this conformity can be taken for granted, but everything that happens in Canada has to be in accordance with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We cannot take this for granted. There is some legal opinion that would hold that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms would not be applicable in this area. I would like to see that issue nailed down in this legislation.

We in our Party take a very positive view of the role of government. We believe that government can and should be on the side of people, but we believe that every level of government, whether it is federal, provincial or Indian government, should be acting in accordance with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I would like to see that tied down in this legislation. In the same way, there has to be some guarantee that the recognized rights of bands to determine residency will be done in accordance with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I have a couple of final comments about the time schedule. On April 17 the Charter of Rights and Freedoms comes into effect. I am not completely sure what the legal effect of April 17 will be on the Indian Act; I understand that some Justice Department lawyers are not completely sure of all the implications. We have heard that it could result in chaos if the Charter comes into effect and we have not dealt with this provision. At any rate, April 17 is a very important psychological date that all Members of Parliament have to work toward in order to have the discrimination removed by that time.

At the same time, we do not want to rush the job and botch it as we were forced to do the last time. I want to stress the importance of full committee meetings, the importance of the committee being able to hear all sides of this issue so that we can do a good job. I and other members of the committee will be giving a great deal of time in the next few weeks to hearing from different segments of the Indian community, hearing their views on this very important legislation. For that reason, we want to get it out of the House today and into the committee as soon as possible.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to begin by complimenting both the tone and the content of the speakers who preceded me, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie), the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) and the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly). That tone indicates not only their own interest but is also an indication of the seriousness with which this historic matter is taken by all Members of the House. Indeed, this is one of the few pieces of legislation to come before this House which can genuinely be described as being historic. It does not solve all the problems, as the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior made clear, but it is nonetheless an historic and important Bill.

The Bill ends a discrimination against certain women, a discrimination that all of us now find unacceptable. It marks a large step away from a colonial mentality that has scarred the relations between Indian and other Canadians and marks a step—just a step, but an important one—toward greater autonomy for Indian bands. It proceeds in a way that is simultaneously reasonable, tolerant and principled to resolve dilemmas that have been divisive at home and have been embarrassing abroad.

As the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development noted, this is not a Party matter. It is a uniquely profound Canadian question, rooted in the traditions and the rights of our original people, raising the principle of equal treatment, which is at the core of our free society, and resolved by reason, consultation and compromise.

I address these questions in several capacities, including my capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In this 40th anniversary year of the United Nations, I celebrate and commend legislation that brings the laws of Canada into harmony with the international covenant on civil and political rights.

In addition, as the House will know, I have had other incarnations in this Chamber. In October, 1979 I had the honour to include in the Throne Speech of that year a commitment to remove Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act. Then later, on November 20, 1981, I had the honour to move the adoption of the paramountcy clause, Section 28, of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In another capacity, my most important capacity as an individual Member of the House of Commons, more than a decade ago in the company of the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen), the present Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) and the former Member for Skeena and others, I was part of a parliamentary committee that for the first time in the life of Parliament achieved agreement between Members of the House of a definition and acceptance of aboriginal title.

The real reason I rise now to offer counsel to my colleagues here and my friends across the country is that those of us who know the emotions this question can arouse have a special obligation to bring balance and understanding to this debate, as all of the participants so far have done. This Bill is about more than an end to discrimination. It is also about a practical beginning to local band control of local band affairs and the challenge has been to respect the principles of equality and autonomy at the same time. It would be relatively simple to embrace one principle and abandon the other. It would be simple, dangerous and a betrayal of our elemental duty to bring Canadians together and to help all of our people understand the complexities of our country.

Questions concerning the equality of women are better understood today than they were a decade ago but there is not yet as wide an understanding of the special sense of community of our Indian people and the importance they place upon defining and controlling their own identity. In addition to suffering more than their share of disease, indignity and early death, they have for a century had their destiny controlled by others.

The children of the Eden Valley Reserve west of my home town were as free as I was to run, to ride and to be children. However, when we stopped being children, the youngsters of Eden Valley were not as free to be themselves as the youngsters of High River because to be Indian in the land which the Stoneys, the Blackfoot and the Cree discovered was to have your life run by someone else. There is somewhat more freedom now for the Stoneys, the Cree and the Blackfoot, but their memory and our legacy was of Ottawa running Indian lives, Ottawa setting Indian standards.

Against that background, Members of the House can understand why local Bands were worried about proposals to have Ottawa again change their traditions and define their members. To many Canadian Indians, the principle at stake was not the equality of Indian women but the autonomy of Indian bands. Our challenge in this Parliament is to respect both principles together, to end the discrimination that everyone agrees should end and to reinforce the autonomy and identity of communities that were treated like colonies for a century.

This Bill is the result of careful and sensitive consultation across the country. The Minister has invited Members to come to committee with proposals they might think better. On this question more than on most, Members who might find fault with the Bill should accept the responsibility of proposing practical remedies.

Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act, in its present form, contravenes international obligations that Canada has freely assumed. Some of these obligations were contracted in 1976, when Canada ratified the International Covenant on Civil land Political Rights, one of the UN's fundamental documents concerning the rights of the individual. Canada also agreed to be bound by the provisions of the Optional Protocol to the Pact which stipulates that the Human Rights Commission may examine claims filed by individuals who maintain that their rights have been violated by their own government.

The House will recall that in 1977, Mrs. Sandra Lovelace filed a complaint with the Committee that because of the existence of Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act, she had lost her Indian status in May 1970... French is occasionally a problem for the boys from High River and Eden Valley, especially figures. That is why I am the Secretary of State for External Affairs and not Minister of Finance... As I was saying, Mrs. Lovelace had lost her status when she married a non-Indian. She alleged at the time that she was the victim of a violation of certain rights laid down in the covenant.

Hon. Members may recall as well that, in July 1981, the Commission on Human Rights concluded that Canada had violated Article 27 of the covenant because Indian Act Section 12(1)(b) had prevented Sandra Lovelace from living on a reserve. Here is Article 27:

> In states where there are ethnic, religious or linguistic minorities, people belonging to those minorities shall not be deprived of the right to have, along with other members of their group, their own cultural life, to practice their own religion, or to use their own language.

In the summer of 1983, Canada advised the Commission concerning the steps it was taking to correct that violation. Specifically, our representative gave the assurance that Canada was committed to delete from the Indian Act any discriminatory provision related to sex. The Government is now about to honour that commitment.

It would seem that, on the occasion of the United Nations Decade for Women, we are finally going to do away with a provision which discriminates against women. One of the happier results of that decade is undoubtedly the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women which was ratified by Canada. Section 12(1)(b) contravenes a certain number of the convention provisions, particularly Article 10 which reads as follows:

> State parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women in all matters relating to marriage and family relations—

By having the House adopt this Bill, Canada will meet its obligations and eliminate that discrimination.

[English]

With this measure we have confronted one injustice, an injustice to Indian women and one that over the course of the last decade and a little longer has become well known nationally and internationally. However, as others in this debate have emphasized, there are fundamental injustices which we must still face and resolve. Indeed, while discrimination against women is an unhappy characteristic of many societies, the colonial treatment of the Indian people is a particular Canadian injustice. It is a scar on our society and on our conscience. We have talked about it for a long time.

In recent years we have begun to act more seriously to establish the self-respect and status of the people who were here before any of the rest of us. The work of the standing committee in the last Parliament was courageous, creative and constructive. I think it would not be improper to mention the particular contributions of the Hon. Members for Cochrane-Superior, Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands, Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) and Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid). The tone of this debate has demonstrated that this commitment to change, and to self-respect, reaches throughout this Parliament. If I may compliment a colleague, I think the fact that this Bill has been introduced so early in the life of this Parliament demonstrates the determination and the influence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the priority of this Government.

• (1430)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): My colleague from Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands quite properly raised the question of cost. That is a matter which will be dealt with by the Government, and of course by the parliamentary committee. It cannot be dealt with in legislative form in this Bill, as the House understands, because of the nature of the Indian Act. But the Government accepts and understands that the rules cannot be changed without helping the capacity of the Indian people of the country in responding to the changing rules. We accept that we must help to meet the implications of the changes which are under way. But we know also that the question of determining the cost, and determining the method of dealing with the cost, is one which will take some time and, by its very nature, can neither be anticipated nor applied as though there were no differences from reserve to reserve or from band to band. The Minister, his officials and the committee will be looking very closely at the question as to just exactly what must be done. I can say to the Hon. Member, on behalf of my colleague and the Government, that this Government will address this issue in a reasonable and sympathetic way to be as much help as we can to the Indian people in responding to this reality, which is sought not only by all of us, but sought and accepted—because they oppose the idea of discrimination—by most Indian people of the country.

I have been involved for a number of years in issues concerning equality for women. More Canadians have been involved in that issue than have been involved in the question of concern for Indian bands and Indian status. Indeed, sometimes in the development of this debate there has been the risk of an apparent conflict between those who were concerned about the equality of women and those who were concerned about the problems and the nature of Indian communities across the country. In fact, the issue at the base is the same. The issue is a determination to have identity respected and advanced. I think we have made a step forward in the House today, not simply with the tabling of this legislation, but also with the tone of the response by Members on all sides of the House.

If I may speak to one aspect, in concluding, of the challenge yet ahead of us, it has to do not simply with our colleagues in this House; it has to do with those millions of Canadians who over the last several years have become concerned about the question of equality for women. I hope that they too will recognize that there are other inequalities. I know they do, but I hope that in their recognition of the other inequalities that exist in Canada they will join with the Minister, the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior, the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands and others in the House to ensure that progress is made much more quickly than in the past in improving the status, the self-respect and the capacity to contribute to the future of Canada and the Indian people of our country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments on the speech of the Right Hon. Member? If not, I will recognize the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone) on debate.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I do welcome this opportunity to rise in such an important debate. I would first like to commend the Minister for his worthwhile efforts trying to reach unanimity on his redressing action. This is truly a complex situation, and I know he has travelled all around the country listening and learning. Sensibly, he has been listening to those groups that will be affected by the amendments.

In order to help us understand the reasons why these changes have to be made, I intend to make a brief historical review of the Indian Act as it has evolved since the 1860s. It is important that we should understand why it is not a well written piece of legislation. This discriminatory piece of legislation is but an attempt at assimilating our Indians into the "white" society.

Previously, there were many ways in which an Indian could forsake his rights as a band member and his status: by obtaining a university degree or by joining the Armed Forces or the Church, to name but a few. This loss of status or enfranchisement had nothing to do with the Indian culture and did not reflect Indian tradition.

The loss of status for Indian women who married non-Indians was one of the worst aspects of enfranchisement. Section 12(1)(b) discriminated against Indian women only. They would forsake their rights as band members and their cultural identity by marrying a non-Indian. There is no equivalent provision where men are concerned.

In my view, this new legislation will have three major consequences: enfranchisement will be abolished forever, sexual discrimination will cease to exist, and the status and the entitlement to membership in a band will be given back to any individual who may have lost them.

I therefore commend the Minister.

[English]

I listened most intently to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie), to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) who gave an interesting exposé of the historical background with respect to international law, to other Members of the House, and in particular to my colleague from Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) whose deep commitment and knowledge of the issues was most apparent. I learned even from him, from an historical perspective, of the complexity of the issue and the grave difficulties which were posed in confronting the realities of the impact of this very complex and nefarious Indian Act. The Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior and I have had many exchanges and I appreciate his taking the time to explain the issues to me.

I must say that Section 12(1)(b), and the removal of sexual discrimination with respect to women, was my first and primary goal when I came here, and I did learn to understand and respect it in the total context of a most complicated, historical error on the part of we, the settlers of this country. The role of the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior was very much appreciated and acknowledged. I noted that the Minister talked about that in his introductory remarks.

After listening to the historical perspective of how the white man has imposed upon the Indian, my conclusion is that the old saying that the "law is an ass" is amply demonstrated in this particular instance.

Notions of humanism, and individual and collective rights followed in the wake of the Second World War when the condition of Canada's Indians began to cause concern. In 1946 a special joint commitee of the House of Commons and the Senate, which sat until 1948, canvassed opinions on all issues with respect to the Indian Act. Originally, the joint committee had not contemplated accepting representations from Indians, which goes along with the history of how we had handled the issue from the very beginning. However, under pressure, the committee relented and during the course of the following two years representations were heard from Indian bands and associations from across Canada.

Only one woman was represented on the committee, Senator Iva Fallis, who at the very beginning of the proceedings brought up the question of Indian women losing their status. She questioned Robert Hoey, the Director of Indian Affairs, with respect to the inequities created by the enfranchisement of Indian women. From Hoey's evidence, it would seem that he saw the Indian Act as an Act which deprived the people of their human rights. I think he was perfectly right. Nevertheless, he believed that, given the existence of such discrimination, it should be based on blood quantum since, as he pointed out, an Indian could have a white mother and a white grandmother and still be legally an Indian. I believe it was called the double mother clause. This question has disturbed him, he said, and he questioned the moral authority of Parliament to deprive persons of 50 per cent or more white blood of their full rights of Canadian citizenship. He believed that a fairer definition would be "An Indian is a person with 50 per cent or more native or Indian blood".

With respect to an Indian woman who loses her status through marrying a non-Indian pursuant to the statute, Mr. Robert Hoey stated that a problem occurred when she returned to the reserve having been deserted by her husband or immediately following her husband's death. She is no longer an Indian in the statutory sense, nor is she the responsibility of the Indian Affairs branch. Indeed, it can be said that the money voted for by Parliament is voted on the distinct understanding that it is for the welfare of Indians and cannot be spent for the relief of white citizens. Senator Fallis, who sounds to me like an intelligent woman—I see we have a few of her followers in the gallery—said, and I quote:

> Am I correct in understanding from what you said a moment ago that if an Indian woman marries a white man, she ceases to be an Indian, yet she is not a white woman? If her husband deserts her, or dies, she is left destitute and there is no one to look after her? That does not apply in the case where an Indian marries a white woman. It seems unjust to the Indian woman who marries a white man because neither the white people nor the Indians want her.

Mr. Hoey described this as an "awkward problem" and went on to other matters. We were still going on to other matters until the Minister's Bill was tabled today.

With respect to the Indian testimony and representations made before the committee, almost without exception the Indian bands and associations called for the abolition of involuntary enfranchisement. Representation of such sentiment comes from the submission of the Indian Association of Alberta to the joint committee, and I quote:

> When the treaties were signed, the white man was content to leave it entirely to the discretion of the Indian chiefs and their councillors to determine who was to enjoy the treaty rights. It is necessary that those matters be determined by Indians themselves according to the customs and traditions of Indian bands.

The Native Brotherhood of British Columbia stated that a woman who lost her status through marriage, or was deserted or widowed, should be allowed to rejoin her band with her children. This Bill reverses a very serious blot on Canada's international human rights record—which was alluded to earlier—brought by the Sandra Lovelace case to the United Nations, and takes the necessary steps in restoring status to the Indian women who lost them as a result of Section 12(1)(b). It wipes out the concept of enfranchisement forever. It ends sexist discrimination, for the most part. But no legislative action, Mr. Speaker, can replace the emotional hardship and the loss of dignity and identity which resulted from enfranchisement.

I received representations from many Indian groups, both men and women. I listened to what they had to say and was deeply moved by much of the hardship and heartache which they have lived through over the past many years. My memory goes back to the early 1970s, to the key role played in bringing this issue, which was a non-issue, for the most part, to the fore by the late Senator Therese Casgrain—and I pay her due homage today—and by Mary Two-Axe Early, who should be named a senator, in my view. I only regret that Madam Casgrain did not live to see one of her major causes on flagrant discrimination against women wiped off the statute book. I rejoice with all of those Indian women leaders who must consider today a victory, even though imperfect.

I applaud the Minister's action in repealing Section 12(1)(b) but I cannot support his restoration of status to the women but not to their children. His effort to restore Indian identity is somewhat negated by his potential division of the family.

Let us look for a moment at the 1981 statistics on native women. According to the census there are 248,815 native women in Canada, of which 70 per cent are under 30 years of age. That is compared to 50 per cent for the non-native female population. I am sure that the Minister is aware of those figures. Perhaps the most important observation is the high proportion of single parent families headed by native women. Specifically, 17 per cent of native families fall into this category as opposed to just over 9 per cent of non-native families. It is this group which is most likely to wish to return to the reserve where they could get support from other family members and the community as a whole. The right of those children to return has been removed, leaving that decision in the hands of the band, as I understand it. If I am incorrect, I hope I will be corrected because I consider that matter to be very serious.

The Minister has not really permitted, as I understand it, the reintegration into the Indian culture and identity for this particular group of children except upon request by those children to the band and upon the band's decision to accept their request. No woman could really consider going back to her reserve without her children. This group is most likely to wish to return to the reserve. If I have not explained my concern in the fullest sense of the word, I would like to know about it.

I notice the Minister's concern about the existing levels of social services on the reserves which he described as "appalling and inferior". I am hopeful that the vigorous and effective measures which the Minister enunciated to free up funds will result in the situation being cleared up and we will see serious improvement of a substantive nature.

The Minister's proposals do go a long way to removing the discriminatory sections of the Indian Act. However, I wanted to ask the Minister if he has not now created three categories of Indians; those who live on the reserve, those who choose to live off the reserve and those who have status but may want to live on the reserve. In the past this has been a relatively small group, consisting of those Indians who were on the waiting list for access to band housing. This group is now going to swell to include the 22,000-plus women who lost their status and the 50,000-odd first-generation children of those women who have to make application. I am not saying that all these people are going to want to return but the problem of how to integrate them, even if it is only 10 per cent or 20 per cent, will have to be addressed by the Minister in a very concrete way.

The Minister has indicated that band membership will now be controlled by the bands themselves. While I support this basic principle, I do have some concerns that the women who wish to return to their bands will not be able to participate in the democratic process of establishing band codes. How can they participate in the decision-making if they are not residents on the reserves, which is one of the main criteria in being a band decision-maker? In certain instances that is not the case, but in other instances it is.

I am very positively predisposed to this Act. I am just highlighting some of the areas where I can see that the Minister faced a conundrum in how to resolve this problem. Decisions affecting women and children without their input could cause various concerns.

I understand with respect to the transmittal of status that women who lost their status will now have it back but their children will be treated differently from the children of an Indian man who married a non-Indian woman. Therefore, if I understand it correctly, one can be in a situation where first cousins who are of Indian ancestry will not have the right to claim that ancestry, which could put them into conflict. I hope that that problem will be resolved.

I want to add my voice, Mr. Speaker, to that of the women of the Indian lands and express appreciation for the fine effort which was undertaken by the Minister. He has made a bold move in introducing this Bill. I support the removal of discrimination in the Indian Act and the measures to abolish enfranchisement, and to restore status and band membership to those who lost it unfairly.

He also has made a significant move toward Indian control over their own affairs through the band membership provisions. Colonialism, sexism and racism have certainly been addressed and I congratulate him for the effort. I look forward to hearing in committee from the many interested groups and I certainly hope the Minister's wish that any improvement that can be realized will be realized and shall become a reality.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments? Since there are no questions or comments, I recognize the Hon. Member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Suluk).

Mr. Thomas Suluk (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to take part in the discussion of changes to the Indian Act. I would first of all like to congratulate the Minister on his excellent and rewarding speech, as well as all other Hon. Members who discussed the need to rectify many of the wrongs relating to native people in general. Although I have never been quite sure whether Inuit do in fact fall under the Indian Act, I will attempt to illustrate to Members of the House that there are still opportunities to avoid many of the things that are wrong with the Indian Act. Specifically, I would like to make some initial comments about what is happening with the same kind of issues that northern people are dealing with at the present time, or at this moment in history.

Although the Indian Act, Mr. Speaker, was created many, many years ago, and perhaps many of its contents may not have foreseen the problems that might develop such as the ones we are now dealing with, we are also dealing with many of the same kinds of difficult issues in the north through the land claims forum, the modern treaties as it were, which are being conducted between the Governments and other native peoples of Canada. I would just like to give some brief examples.

First of all, a few years ago the Inuit were discussing the problems that might be coming up as a result of any land claim settlement, and we were discussing at one time at what stage we would stop calling Inuit the Inuit in terms of their blood relationships. For example, would we stop calling someone an Inuit when it gets to the 25 per cent stage? That is where the child has only 10 per cent, 15 per cent or 25 per cent of native blood or Inuit blood. Many of these things were very technical and very disconcerting to many of the Inuit in my riding, especially in the Northwest Territories. I would hope that before agreements of this type are reached again with other native people in Canada, specifically those in the Western Arctic areas and in the Eastern Arctic areas, both the Government and the people negotiating on behalf of the respective Indian or Inuit side would foresee many of these problems that governments in the future might have to deal with.

I would just like to relate a brief story about how discrimination against Inuit women was dealt with by one community. It is not dealt with across the Territories but we have a very classic example in my own town of Eskimo Point, Northwest Territories. It concerns the Inuit ladies who are married to Kabloonat, as we call them. In much the same way as we are known as Eskimos to some southerners, we also refer to non-Inuit in the south as Kabloonat. It is not a derogatory term by any means, just a reference that we do have in the north. Inuit women who are married to Kabloonat, that is, not Inuit or, I think the term is, Caucasian or something, did not have the rights and were starting to complain because they could not hunt polar bears. Traditionally, only Inuit men hunt polar bears. However, the polar bear skin has quite a lot of value. In the north, where the economy is not all that great, you can get $1,000 or $2,000 for a polar bear skin, and then naturally it becomes a desirable thing to have. To go back to the story about the Inuit women who felt discriminated against, they raised a big issue out of it in the local press—well, there is no press, just the radio and public meetings and all that—and said that because their husbands are not Inuit and therefore could not hunt, they are being discriminated against.

It turned out that after a lot of discussions and a lot of talking back and forth and a few harsh words here and there, the situation was resolved to the point where the Inuit ladies ended up being allowed to hunt polar bear. Now, people did not raise eyebrows when those ladies went out hunting and perhaps their husbands, who may be non-Inuit, pulled the trigger, but at least for the sake of peace the issue was resolved. I think there is an opportunity nowadays to rectify a lot of things and avoid a lot of problems that are inherent in the Indian Act, especially Section 12(1)(b).

I understand that the amendments are going to remove the discrimination against Indian women and would also give the Indian bands the abilitty to determine who would be eligible, and I think that would satisfy both sides. It would not necessarily be to everyone's satisfaction, but in relation to what is happening in the Northwest Territories, at least they have something which they could sink their teeth into.

I would now like to discuss briefly what I heard many Members making reference to, and that is colonial governments and the need to avoid the same situation. There is in fact this opportunity in the Northwest Territories. For example, many of you may have read certain items in the newspapers since the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) announced that the Government would agree to the creation of two territories out of the existing territory if the boundaries could be resolved by the northerners themselves. The discussions about self government and the division of the Northwest Territories has been going on for the last eight years. However, charges of discrimination against non-Inuit, or specifically charges that northerners wish to create ethnic governments, have been advanced by people who generally oppose the majority of the Inuit population. In the proposed Estern Arctic territory people of Inuit origin, such as myself, would be in the majority by about 80 per cent.

I would like to raise a question here. One of the obstacles to the agreement by the federal Government to allow northerners to create two territories was that the Inuit were trying to create an ethnic government. In fact, we are willing to be assimilated. We are willing to take a colonial style territorial government such as now exists in our area, and mould it into our own. We will accept that. Earlier this week in one of the Canadian Press reports there was a reference once again to ethnicity. In earlier reports it was mentioned that the Inuit and Indians used to fight a long time ago. Mr. Speaker, we do not need to go through all these stories which do not apply any more. We are now in a modern situation. An opportunity exists in the Northwest Territories with another aboriginal group to exercise the modern ways of right and wrong.

I wanted to explain from the perspective of a native person that it is very encouraging to hear parliamentarians talking about the need to allow native people to make a contribution to the systems of government in Canada. I believe that we do have a lot of things to contribute to the Canadian system if we could only avoid the pitfalls which have dogged many of the discussions relating to aboriginal rights, such as the constitutional discussions, the land claims discussions and other discussions relating either to Indian or to native self-government. I would like to encourage Members here, especially the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to keep the dialogue going, because there are answers to the problems.

I would like to conclude my remarks by saying that I have had representations from Indian bands both for and against changes to Clause 12(1)(b). I have heard and can identify with many of the remarks made about problems that may develop as a result of these changes. I have also heard representations from women who are very concerned about the discriminatory clauses of the Indian Act. I think that the amendments which are now being proposed could satisfy both sides of the camp. We should accept the changes as they are being proposed, knowing that there will be other opportunities in the future to discuss these in a very gentlemanly fashion if we discover more things that do not work out.

Mr. John Parry (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I rise address Bill C-31 with as full a sense of responsibility for our work and deliberations in the House of Commons as I have had heretofore, and certainly with as full full a sense of that responsibility as I ever hope to have. As the Hon. Minister for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) observed, this is indeed a historic occasion in the life of this House. We are working today, and will be working in committee and at third reading, to attempt to correct a historic sequence of injustices, the perpetration of which began many years ago and has multiplied over the intervening centuries and decades.

We are here, unfortunately, to make decisions which determine the very fabric of the lives of a people and of nations which are not represented directly in this Chamber. I say that with no disrespect to the Hon. Member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Suluk) whom we just heard, but knowing that the Indian Act does specifically exclude the Inuit people and knowing that there are no Members of this present Parliament who claim Indian status. That places a great degree of responsibility on us because the decisions that we take, at least at the level of the House, will be without the benefit of the direct representation of Indian people. We will be determining their lives. We must remember that when we talk of Indian people we use a convenient, crisp, inaccurate term that comprises a people whose diversity and variety of cultures and heritages fully matches, if not actually surpasses, those of the heritages and cultures that we as Canadians of largely European Caucasian origin represent.

It is a pity in a way, and I doubt that I will ever feel it to be more of a disadvantage, that our rules do not allow us to hear from substitutes, but only from Members of Parliament within this Chamber. I know from my experience with native leaders in my riding that there are many men and women who could far better express the feelings of native people, be it in their language or in English, on the legislation that is before us. In my capacity as Member for Kenora-Rainy River, I have the privilege of representing more bands than any other Member of this honourable Chamber, and I dare say that, on a percentage basis or as a total population figure, I represent as many Indian people as any other Member of this Chamber.

At various times I have been a resident of an Indian reserve and have worked for Indian people. I have formed friendships with Indian people that endure and I know will grow stronger as the years go by. I have also worked for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but I will not say too much about that because it will play little part in the further regulation of membership and status.

I say those things and draw upon that experience, not in any way to suggest that my opinions are of greater merit than those of any other Member, but simply to say that having been able to experience firsthand some of the effects of the Indian Act as at present constituted, that still does not give me the uniquely valuable perspective of seeing the Act, the instruments it has formed and the divisions it has created, through the eyes of an Indian person.

Let me say that I and others on the committee plan to seek native representation on the standing committee for the period during which Bill C-31 is under consideration; because only at the committee level will we be able to derive the benefit of the unique historic, cultural and personal perspective that the Indian people can bring to the discussion of Bill C-31.

We have already heard the history of the Act presented in a, thorough, erudite and detailed manner. I will not attempt to compete with my colleagues in that regard. However, I will say that the effect of division, exclusion and the effect of federal government control, often exercised arbitrarily by those who had very little real interest in those whom they were controlling, has indeed had the impact of racism, sexism and colonialism that have been alleged.

My friend and colleague, the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) mentioned in his address that he felt that in many ways Indian political forums were better regulated and functioned more responsibly than this Chamber. I would also add that in many ways the politics of Indian people are much more interesting than our daily fare in this Chamber. I say that not in derogation of my colleagues or of the Government's legislative agenda, but simply to point out the effects of the Indian renaissance in the last decades in the forums in which Indian peoples have organized themselves to speak at the national level, albeit not with a single voice because there are divisions and differences of opinion that are held strongly. Being able to see from the periphery that process of renaissance, not in the sense of rebirth but of rekindling of the Indian peoples' belief in the strength, responsibility and the relevance of their own Governments and their own interband and intergovernmental processes, has been an exciting time indeed.

I believe that the Indian Act is comparable to the ancient legend of the Gordian knot that was so ravelled and tangled that it could not be undone. The Minister has attempted to emulate the act of Alexander in severing that Gordian knot in a single stroke. I believe that the legislation, even in its unamended form, does indeed go a long way to severing that knot and undoing the decades and centuries of discrimination, inequality and division that the Act perpetuated.

The amendments address the equality of men and women. They restore status and membership in bands, and the distinction between those two is crucial to an understanding of the Act and the amendments. They restore status and membership in the bands to those who themselves have been directly excluded from that status and membership by virtue of the operation of a discriminatory clause. They restore status to the first generation of descendants on application.

Perhaps what is most important to myself, representing as I do some 50 Indian Governments, is that the amendments recognize that in the future the membership in an Indian band must be under the control of that band. The odious process of enfranchisement, redolent as it was with overtones of colonial Anglo-Saxon superiority, which has no place in this century, is finally abolished. However, we can ask why indeed there should be any continuing provision for the relinquishment of Indian status unless that be at the request of those who have been consulted.

Finally, children will be treated as children and not as classes of children. We will see the provisions regarding adoption and illegitimacy eliminated, and thus those rights harmonized with those rights which exist in the wider society.

We will see the access to off-reserve programs restored. While that is good, I must reiterate my colleague's criticism of the paucity and irrelevance of most of those programs.

I have one major caveat of caution which I would like Members to consider. By the consideration of Bill C-31, we are indeed addressing a major issue for the Indian people of Canada. But we are are as far as ever from solving all of the problems of Canada's native people. The passage of Bill C-31 will indeed smash several major injustices. We must ensure that in the committee process as far as possible those major injustices are not replaced by fragmentary minor injustices, as so often is the case.

The time frame under which we will work is not the time frame that I would have sought, had I been in the Minister's place. While we recognize its compelling nature, the time frame is arbitrary, just as the time frame for the proposed proposed passage of Bill C-47 in the last Parliament was an arbitrary and unnecessarily restrictive time frame. I would offer a caution to the Minister in this regard. The Minister speaks of the consultation process which he has undertaken. I know it has been extensive in terms of the miles travelled, the hours worked and the numnber of bands that have been consulted. We must recognize, however, that there are groups that do not feel the consultation process has been fully extended to them.

One of the first lessons I learned as a district manager with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was that it was not good enough to talk to people and then say that a consultation process had occurred. It was necessary to specify, to arrange in advance, and to agree mutually that a certain discussion would be seen as a consultation. There will be the requirement for intensive discussion at the committee level, intensive examination of the ramifications and effects of this Bill. There will be the need for native representation on the committee to ensure that the final legislative product is something that will be fair to the Indian people of Canada.

As I sat in the House today listening to the Hon. Minister, I was more than pleased to see that among his audience was the nation's most famous expectant father. Then I thought of the prospects that his child might face compared to the prospects of an Indian child born at the same time. I do that in no way to single out the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) children. Were my wife expecting, I would use the example of my own child.

First, there is the difference in life expectancy, estimated now at a decade or more, between the two children. Second, there is access to the services which are required to raise and bring up a healthy infant. Third, there is the education, for one in his or her native tongue, for the other in a foreign tongue. Fourth, there is access to the services that you and I take for granted, Mr. Speaker. I am thinking of clean running water, sanitary sewage disposal, paved roads, a light switch that produces electricity when it is turned from the off to the on position, and, finally, housing of acceptable standards.

For many Indian children today, those amenities and those opportunities are not a reality. For many, none of those services are accessible.

The Bill which we consider today will accomplish much that is good, but much will remain to be done for the Indian people of this country. Some discrimination will be removed, and I hope that at the end of the legislative process we will be able to take pride in what we have done. Many problems will remain and some will be created as people seek to be repatriated to reserves where the land or financial resource base is really not adequate to support them. I am hopeful that the interest that is generated on this crucial matter of membership, the matter of necessary reforms to the Indian Act, will eventually impel us to reform not only that Act in its entirety but also to reform and to bring the condition of Canada's Indian people to a state of which we can all be proud.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would it be in order to ask a question of the former speaker, the Hon. Member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Suluk)?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We need unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Robichaud: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank Hon. Members for their courtesy. In listening to the Hon. Member for Nunatsiaq I heard him say, in the question of the division of the Northwest Territories, that the native people had some concerns. I would like to hear his comments on this question of division.

Mr. Suluk: Mr. Speaker, in relation to the native people, specifically the Inuit who would reside in the eastern half of the proposed new territory in the Northwest Territories, the Inuit were concerned that many reporters and many of the non-Inuit were concerned that many reporters and many of the non-Inuit in the western part keep making references to ethnicity, in particular that the Inuit would like to form an ethnic government even though it is a public government. These kinds of things tend to create some misconceptions about what is happening in the Territories.

Perhaps I will take this opportunity to add that there is a feeling of rejection by the East in the western part of the Territory. Perhaps it could be solved by suggesting that since the residents of the Yukon Territory and the residents of the would-be leftover territory in the west are predominantly of the same culture, that is Indian and others, they should join together and create the eleventh province.

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have been here today thoughout the debate and must say that I have enjoyed it immensely. One of the great privileges I have had as a parliamentarian was to be spokesman for the Progressive Conservative Party when we were in opposition in the portfolio of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In the past year leading up to the election, I have spent a considerable amount of time with the Indian people of our country, many of whom I am proud to say are friends.

I enjoyed my work with the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner), the Chairman of the standing committee, and with the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly). Although I do not serve on that committee now, but wish I did, there was a feeling on that committee, I believe there still is, to work together in as non-partisan a manner as was possible. There were times when partisan politics did come into play, but we tried not to allow that to happen. We in the committee last spring were faced with Bill C-47, amendments to the Indian Act. It was probably one of the most hectic six days that I have spent. I think that the Chairman and the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands will agree that it was quite an experience.

I do not want this to be interpreted as being critical of the former Government, because my remarks are not intended to be that, but we were not given a sufficient amount of time to listen to the representations, to absorb the representations or to amend the Act in the way we would have liked. There were some last minute amendments brought in and some great negotiations going on with the Minister. As we all know, the House was going down for the summer. If I can put in an aside, it was going down, period. It was going down for the summer and so we were rushed. If my memory serves me correctly, I believe the timing was something like six days or so.

The argument was that this discrimination had been around a long time and that it was time to get rid of it. I do not think there was a soul in the community that could disagree with that. However, there was still some conflict and some concerns were expressed by various groups, including the Native Women's Council of Canada, the AFN and other very interested groups.

There was at that time a compromise arranged through the Native Women's Association of Canada and the Assembly of First Nations which I think was very significant. It was very important for us as parliamentarians to see that type of agreement reached between two groups which in some instances had been at odds.

Needless to say, the Bill went through. The Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior quoted me accurately today when he said that I stated in the debate that we must hold our nose and pass this Bill. None of us were happy. We all felt very uncomfortable about it. We felt that this might be the last opportunity to have this Bill passed, so it was passed. History will show that the Senate did not pass it and that it died on the Order Paper.

I want to say a couple of things about the present Minister. He assumed his new responsibilities shortly after the election of September 4. I do not think there is another Minister who is working harder—I know there are some working as hard—on their portfolio than the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie). He has devoted a tremendous amount of time in trying to meet the various groups, organizations, associations and individuals who play a very important part within that Ministry and who, in the jargon of this place, are client groups. I do not like that terminology, but that is the way they are referred to, no matter what the Ministry is.

He has been doing an excellent job. Bringing in this Bill—although not perfect and there will be debate and representations in committee—he has gone a tremendous way to meet many of the objections that we heard last June on Bill C-47. That has been acknowledged today and that is fair enough. I congratulate the Minister for that work.

I want to encourage the members of the standing committee to study this Bill and to give fair hearing to those who want to make representation, but not to hold this Bill up for political purposes. This is such an important Bill that we cannot get into playing politics with it. That is very important. I know my hon. friend in the New Democratic Party, whom I enjoyed working with last year, my colleague from Cochrane-Superior and others who served very well on that committee feel the same way. If they do not, I guess I am not as great a judge of character as I thought I was.

I encourage all those who are associated with the Bill, including those who will be making representations, to treat this Bill in a very fair and open-minded way. It may not satisfy every individual's desire. Very few pieces of legislation that pass through this place do satisfy every special interest group connected with it. Neither does it probably satisfy at all times Members of Parliament who are on the government side. Politics is the art of compromise, and I am sure that when this Bill is brought back to the House for third reading, if there are amendments to it, it will be absolutely the best Bill that we can bring in to do with the removal of discrimination in the Indian Act.

The year leading up to the election was a rewarding one. I listened today to the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone) with great interest when she suggested that our good friend Mary Two-Axe Early be appointed to the Senate. I would like to say to my hon. friend from Mount-Royal that I would not want to inflict that on such a wonderful, warm, genuine person as Mary Two-Axe Early. There are far better fates for Mary Two-Axe Early. We can reward her much more significantly than by putting her in the Senate. She has been a wonderful friend to all parliamentarians. I know she was a great help to me when I was spokesman for the Party. She is the kind of person you cannot help but feel very comfortable and warm with. I too want to pay tribute to her, but I do not suggest that she be appointed to the Senate.

I wish to talk for a moment about some of the concerns that have been expressed in previous Bills and what is happening in this Bill. Some areas have been covered very effectively by Hon. Members today. Some bands, however, were very concerned about enfranchisements where individuals who were enfranchised received a fair-sized pay-out from an Indian band once they left the band. Some bands, although very few, have done extremely well with exploiting the resources found on their band properties. When individuals were enfranchised, they were very well taken care of. Some bands in Alberta, for example, were very concerned about this. They were greatly concerned about someone who had received a pay-out and was automatically brought back into the band without having paid back his or her share or given any accounting for the share he or she had taken out already when they were enfranchised.

The Minister has obviously taken that into consideration in these amendments and I congratulate him for that because now, according to this Bill, persons regaining band membership who previously had received the per capita pay-outs from the band capital and revenue accounts will not be able to benefit from current distributions of band funds until the amount forgone equals the amount they received earlier plus interest. As Hon. Members may know, in some instances that amounts to many thousands of dollars. The Minister has included that concern in the legislation. I think that is a very, very important part of this Bill.

There are other important parts of this Bill. A woman who marries a member of another band no longer automatically becomes a member of her husband's band. Transfers between bands will still be possible if the receiving band agrees. The band has control over its membership, and I think that is very important.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) mentioned earlier, one of the great debates we had in the past dealt with whether this was a women's issue or an Indian issue. I believe the Minister covered the matter very, very well and indicated that it is really both. I do not think there is any question about that. The attitude of the previous Government depended, I suppose, on who was appearing before the committee. The former Minister of State for Mines, the Hon. Judy Erola, insisted that it was entirely a women's issue and not an Indian issue.

Mr. Rodriguez: We know what happened to her.

Mr. McDermid: I know what happened to her. The Hon. Member who defeated her keeps reminding me of what happened to her. I thank him for that, although my memory is not that short.

That was one of the problems with which we were faced the last time we dealt with this issue. That understanding did not exist at that time. It was very difficult for those of us who had spent a considerable amount of time on the issue to try to educate those who were pulling the strings as to exactly what the issues were. In all fairness, I think that the former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development understood the problems but did not have the necessary clout or power within Cabinet to make the amendments to the Bill that the present Minister has been able to make. I think we must also commend the Minister for his work at that end.

I wish to congratulate the Minister. I would also like to congratulate the Government for bringing this Bill before the House. In conversations we had earlier today, the Minister assured me that there will be a fair hearing given to this issue at committee and that the committee will delve into the Bill to a great extent. The committee is looking forward to getting its work done. If I am not mistaken, I believe that there is an agreement that as of today, the Bill will be referred to the standing committee so that the committee can get under way with its very, very important and necessary work on Bill C-31.

May I close, Mr. Speaker, by once again appealing to all those associated with this Bill to come before the committee with open minds and a clear feeling of consensus in their hearts so that together, in a non-political way, we can remove this very distasteful part of our history and rectify it as best we can. Although the remedy will not be perfect, we can at least make a very, very honest and good attempt.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments? Since there are no questions or comments, I recognize the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having this opportunity to rise to say a few words regarding Bill C-31. I recognize that my colleague and other Hon. Members would like to say a few words. Therefore, I will keep my comments brief.

Having listened to the debate today and having heard from all parts of the House some very positive, powerful, thoughtful, compassionate and co-operative statements, I feel that this has been one of the days when I have been really proud to be a Member of this House. I listened to the spokespersons from all three political Parties indicate that this was indeed a very historic day for bringing justice to native people and for removing from our books a discriminatory clause in the Indian Act. The very thoughtful and constructive comments that individuals have made have put this particular Bill into a very appropriate context.

I am sure all of us are looking forward to examining the Bill clause by clause when it gets to committee. We are looking forward to scrutinizing every aspect of this Bill and to ensuring that the various groups will have an opportunity to have their concerns registered and, wherever reasonable and possible, to have their recommendations incorporated through amendments to this Bill.

I am very happy to say a few words today on this Bill. When I first became a Member of Parliament, within a matter of hours every Indian band in my constituency arranged a visit with me. As well as the major issue of self-government, they reminded me of the concerns that they had with Section 12(1)(b). Over time, 12(1)(b) has become a phrase with which I am very comfortable. I suppose it has almost come to symbolize this incredible Act called the Indian Act.

One of the previous speakers referred to the Indian Act as being a leaky ship with all kinds of rust and holes, a ship that is literally falling apart. It is almost impossible to save that ship. The only way to save it is to introduce self-government for Indian people. Today we are simply trying to plug one more hole in anticipation of the Act being thrown out as soon as possible to be replaced with Indian self-government.

This Bill deletes membership sections of the Indian Act which discriminate on the basis of sex. It reinstates people who lost status through marriage to a non-Indian or through the double-mother clause which took away status from Indians whose mother and whose father's mother were not status Indians. It reinstates people who lost status through enfranchisement of the husband or father, through the dispute of the status of the father in cases of illegitimate children, through enlistment in Canada's Armed Forces, through obtaining or maintaining employment, through attendance at a university or through the attainment of a professional degree. It also provides that first-generation children be granted status as Indians under federal law and that they would then be eligible for band membership according to rules developed by the band. It sets out a method by which the band can design and control membership criteria. It sets out a system of protest for people disputing a decision regarding the addition or deletion from the band list and gives band councils the power to decide residency rights.

The Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) indicated very clearly that one of the concerns we must address is the funding provisions for reinstated band members. We must address the incredible pressure this change may place on certain bands in terms of expanded membership, available land and the additional cost that will obviously have to be borne by that particular band. This must be recognized and dealt with as part of this legislation. I know that the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands has discussed many times over the past number of months the need for some type of review board which would assist the bands in obtaining proper funding and land settlements when there is extreme pressure brought to bear upon a particular band as a result of increased membership.

In addition, the fact that the appeal process does not cover residency rights is something which must be dealt with when the Bill goes to committee. Of course, the fact that there is no guarantee of services to off-reserve Indians is also something which ought to be addressed at that time.

I am pleased to play a small part in the debate this afternoon on this very historic day. I look forward to the Bill going to committee, and certainly I look forward to the third and final reading when discrimination on the basis of sex is removed from the Indian act once and for all.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to address this Bill today. First, I would like to say that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) has set a course, possibly unprecedented, and in six months has taken on an activity to return some fundamental feelings and activities which were lost during the many years of former administrations. I am extremely proud of the Minister and I have indicated to him that I will do everything I can to bring about the change which reflects the attitude of this Government. I am sure most Members of the House will do the same to give the Indians in the reserves the pride which in many cases they have lost.

I would like to address a few of the comments which were made today by opposition Members on the committee, whom I would also like to commend. It is the committee which will address the most important concern—the cost. No doubt when this Bill goes through the proper channels and into committee, people will ask what it will cost the Government. There have been some estimates from time to time which suggest that it might cost $30 million, $40 million, or that it might be in excess of $200 million. However, no one has asked what the cost was to those people who have lost their status over the years. What has been the cost in suffering? Can we put a dollar value on those who could no longer be classified as status Indians, as opposed to their neighbours, and were not recipients of the benefits of that status? What was the cost to families who broke up or lost their status because the moved, or to those who married someone who was not a status Indan? Who could put a dollar value on that? I do not think it can be done. I do not think there is enough money to replace that.

I recognize that the Bill will not please everyone, because all of the wrongs cannot be undone. However, I think the Bill goes far in helping to make a previous wrong as right as possible. When this Bill is brought to committee, I know my colleagues and members of the Opposition who are on the committee will suggest every possible way in which to ensure that we will go as far as we can in making it fair and that we will listen to as many people as possible who are affected.

Again, I would like to refer to the Minister in this regard. As my hon. colleague previously stated, the Minister has travelled and has worked as hard, if not harder, than any other Minister in this area. I am sure that if the Minister missed someone, it was not due to his attempt to accommodate everyone. However, my colleagues and I are helping the Minister in this regard. I think that is the bottom line. When this Bill is passed, we will know that we have done everything we could to consult with and listen to the people who are affected. I am very happy to be part of that process.

As a new Member of Parliament I find it exciting to be involved in such an important activity. I look forward in the next four years of this administration to many other dynamic changes which will be required, because the Bill will not restore economic needs and requirements, improve lower education or improve housing, which these people may need. The Bill does not address all of the issues, but it is a start.

Once again, I take my hat off to the Minister and commend all the speakers on this Bill who have given their support and advice. I look forward to debating this legislation further in committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Crombie, seconded by Mr. Hnatyshyn, moves that Bill C-31, an Act to amend the Indian Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent for the House to proceed to Item No. 40?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

TRUST COMPANIES

ADVISABILITY OF INSTITUTING PUBLIC INQUIRIES

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should order a public inquiry into the collapse of the Pioneer Trust Company of Regina, Saskatchewan and other trust companies, and should adopt a permanent policy of ordering such inquiries for any future collapses; and

That the Government should consider the advisibility of introducing legislation amending the Trust Companies Act to make such inquiries automatic.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the events in the last two weeks concerning Pioneer Trust Company has prompted me on numerous occasions to urge the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) to initiate a public inquiry into the collapse of the Pioneer Trust Company. Upon further investigation into the collapse of other trust companies, Mr. Speaker, I am more firmly conviced that a broad public inquiry, not only with respect to Pioneer, but to other trust companies, is needed. The millions and millions of dollars which have been lost because of trust companies going under, should surely give us a strong indication of the need for public inquiry and a new set of regulations governing trust companies.

● (1600)

The Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation was formed in 1967, following the collapse of the Atlantic Acceptance Corporation. The CDIC has been catapulted into a number of new functions with the collapse of several other trust companies. Originally an insurer, it is increasingly becoming a regulator in conjunction with other federal agencies. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it has a staff of only 12, a five-man board of civil servants and a part-time chairman. Over the last number of years, CDIC has lost some $1 billion because it had to bail out some ten different trust companies. I quote from the report of the Auditor General of March 31, 1984 as follows:

—sufficient information was not available at the time of our audit to determine whether the provision was adequate.

Meaning, Mr. Speaker, that there was not enough information for them to determine whether there was at that time some $650 million which was lost because of CDIC and whether something could have been done to have prevented those losses. Again, I quote from the Auditor General's report as follows:

As of December 31, 1983, the corporation had made loans to the eight troubled companies amounting to $942.5 million in order to fund payment of liabilities and operations. At March 31, 1984, the amount of loans outstanding was $1 billion.

Again I quote the following from the Auditor General's report:

However, the corporation anticipates heavy losses and has recorded a general provision for loss of $650 million at December 31, 1983.

The report continues:

Because of these circumstances, sufficient information was not available at the date of our audit to allow us to determine whether the general provision was adequate. Accordingly, in our audit report to the Minister of Finance, we stated that we were unable to express an opinion on the financial statements of the corporation for the year ended December 31, 1983.

Government policy regarding trust companies—and I say this with the support of the statement of the Auditor General—has really been ad hoc decision-making. We see, with the collapse of Pioneer, another policy decision being made by the Government on an ad hoc basis. The past government practice has been to assist in the arrangement of agency agreements, for example, with Greymac, Seaway, Crown and Fidelity trust companies. The agency's agreements virtually guaranteed all depositors and shareholders of those trust companies. But apparently the Government has now changed its policy. Two smaller western based trust companies, Pioneer and Northguard in Manitoba, were just cut loose, their assets sold off, and everyone has taken a beating.

The Government has changed its policies without announcing them publicly, without a public process of hearings or a public committee, and this change in policy might have misled investors and depositors with Pioneer. Certainly the investors and depositors in Pioneer did not know that the Government had changed its policy. So we feel, Mr. Speaker, that there is a need for a public forum to discuss these changes.

I would like very quickly, Mr. Speaker, to move to my major concerns. Those are the concerns I have with Pioneer Trust. On February 7 of this year, the biggest financial failure in Saskatchewan's history occurred. Pioneer Trust, a company which has been a constant money loser in its 11 years of operation, was forced to close its doors. There were many small investors, mainly from across Saskatchewan, who supported the company because they wanted to see a viable Saskatchewan financial institution. There are also some 1,800 uninsured depositors. Many of them were hospitals, municipal Governments, theatre groups, provincial government Departments, as well as many retired farmers and business people who will lose substantial sums of money. They kept their deposits with Pioneer because they wanted to support a Saskatchewan financial institution.

The collapse of Pioneer raises many questions: first, could it have been avoided? Since a special report of May, 1984 to the Minister of State for Finance warned of Pioneer's problems, there seems to have been sufficient time at least to reach an agency agreement. We want to know if any efforts were made to contact, for example, Co-Op Trust in Saskatchewan to take over Pioneer? We are concerned that both the provincial and the federal Governments did not do everything possible to protect the depositors and, in fact, aggravated an already serious problem.

The behaviour of the provincial Government is something which can hardly be believed. On November 21, Mr. Bob Andrew, the Minister of Finance for Saskatchewan, wrote to Pioneer Trust, and I quote from that letter:

Dear Mr. Klein:

Please be advised that the Government of Saskatchewan will guarantee the 27.5 million dollar preferred share offering of Canadian Pioneer Management Ltd. Details of the guarantee are now being reviewed by officials. You may expect the guarantee to be ready in time to allow your new equity to be placed prior to December 31, 1984.

That is a very firm commitment, Mr. Speaker, by the Minister of Finance of Saskatchewan to Pioneer Trust. We also have the Premier of Saskatchewan backing up his Minister of Finance on numerous occasions. I quote from an article in the Regina Leader-Post on January 11, 1985. If reads:

> But Devine said the Government has no intention of running the company, although it is prepared to support it with financial guarantees. "If I have to back it up I am prepared to say if it does go all the way to the wall, then obviously I'm going to have all that is necessary to make sure that Saskatchewan taxpayers are protected," he said.

The Premier of Saskatchewan and the Minister of Finance for Saskatchewan make this public and private commitment to Pioneer Trust, yet, Mr. Speaker, on February 7 the Minister of Finance publicly announces that the province will not proceed with the guarantee. His stated reason was that the province was not aware of how serious Pioneer's problem was. They made a bad situation even worse. In effect, they had offered a false sense of assurance to the depositors and shareholders of Pioneer Trust. Did the province not examine Pioneer's books before it made its commitment? It sounds incredible but it appears that the province made a $30 million commitment without even verifying the books of Pioneer. Indeed, its action bears out what former Ontario Premier Bill Davis is reputed to have said about the Devine Government, "Amateur night on the Prairies".

The Saskatchewan Tory Government, which prides itself on its business approach and expertise, is now being sued by Pioneer Trust. So much for those great free enterprisers, Mr. Speaker.

We are also concerned with the federal Government. On August 1 the federal Government had allowed the company to continue to operate under restrictions on the understanding that it would have to increase its liquidity by December 1, 1984, before its licence would be renewed. On December 31, the company's licence was renewed although it had not succeeded in raising more money to increase its liquidity. We want some answers, Mr. Speaker. Did the provincial Government give the federal Government a written guarantee? If not, why was the licence renewed? Obviously, Mr. Speaker, Pioneer Trust did not get its $30 million, yet its licence was renewed by this Government. This Government has to be held accountable for that action. What we are really seeing is mismanagement by both the federal Government and the provincial Government.

It is interesting, in pursuing the court documents which were filed in the Court of Queen's Bench, to note the total lack of evidence showing federal-provincial government communications. We want to know what consultation occurred before the company closed its doors. Did the federal Government make the provincial Government aware of the seriousness of Pioneer's situation before the province committee itself to the guarantee? Was there any discussion between the two Governments concerning alternatives such as an agency agreement, before Pioneer's collapse? It strikes me that both Governments acted incompetently. So much for this new era of federal-provincial consultation, especially between Tory Governments.

There are other questions that should be answered. For example, according to the preliminary audit filed with the court, there was some $36 million in uninsured deposits as of December 31, 1984. On February 7, when Pioneer closed its doors, there was only $24 million in uninsured deposits. What happened to the $12 million? Were there companies and individuals who had privileged information and used that information to make some timely withdrawals? We want to know. We also want to know if there was any unusual selling of shares by a few individuals before Pioneer's collapse. There are some very serious discrepancies, especially concerning the uninsured deposits in the amount of some $12 million that disappeared in a little under two months.

As well, there are rumours and reports that a Conservative Saskatchewan Cabinet Minister obtained a substantial undersecured loan from Pioneer last December without even declaring his conflict of interest when Pioneer was discussed at Cabinet meetings. Again I think this deserves a full public inquiry.

The events surrounding Pioneer and its demise raise many, many questions, Mr. Speaker. The concern we have is that politics indeed played an important part in the failure of this company. We have asked the Minister of State for Finance to institute a public inquiry. We believe the public has a right to know. We believe that before we see more trust companies going down the drain—and there are reports that several other trust companies are in an unstable situation—before the people of Canada pay out hundreds of millions of dollars more, it is time we reviewed the regulations concerning trust companies. It is time that we had an open inquiry.

It surprises me, Mr. Speaker, that despite the mismanagement by the Saskatchewan Government and particularly that Government's Minister of Finance, that same Minister of Finance calls for less regulation of the trust companies. In fact, he feels that part of the reason why Pioneer went under was that there were too many regulations. Can you imagine the gall? After the experience we have had in this country of so many trust companies going under, we know that in fact the problem is not enough controls, not enough regulations. Yet the Saskatchewan Minister of Finance calls for even less. I suppose what he wants is a return to the days of private financial buccaneers and pirates. Well, there are many of us who wonder whether indeed we will see an honest and open public inquiry set up by either the provincial or the federal Government. It seems as though there are too many things to hide. For example, I note with interest that very recently in the Globe and Mail, specifically on February 27, a statement was made by the head of Canada Trustco, Mr. M. L. Lahn. He said that he doubts if this present Government will indeed effect any changes in the regulations as to the ownership of trust companies. I quote him:

> Several of the trust company owners fall into the category of influential Conservative Party backers and fund raisers. It would thus be naive to expect an ownership restriction to be forthcoming.

I hope the Government and government Members will not talk out this Private Member's motion, Mr. Speaker, that indeed they will recognize that a serious problem exists concerning trust companies, not only with Pioneer but with many others. I hope they will recognize it is high time that a pubic inquiry system were instituted.

I have written to the Minister of State for Finance, and it is unfortunate that she is not in the House today to participate in this debate. We have all known since early last week that we would be debating my motion this Friday afternoon. But I have written to the Minister suggesting that a public inquiry be held. I have raised with her in my correspondence many questions similar to these and I hope she will answer some of them and that other answers will come in a public inquiry.

Again, for the sake of Canadian taxpayers, Canadian investors and Canadian depositors, I hope this Government will act and that we will have a full and public inquiry not only into Pioneer but into all of the regulations governing trust companies in this country.

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to hear that the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) regrets the absence of my Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall), but I will try to stand in for the Minister to the best of my ability, and I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion moved by the Member for Regina East. I am aware that the Hon. Member has already raised other aspects of the matter during this session, and we want to congratulate him on this thoroughness in seeking to have the issues raised by the closing of Pioneer Trust Company fully taken into consideration.

However, we must point out from the outset that we do not agree with the desired impact of this motion. We must make a distinction between the two proposals made in the motion as it stands. The motion proposes that a public inquiry should be conducted in all cases where trust companies go bankrupt. The second proposal is very specific, namely that an inquiry be ordered into the particular case of Pioneer Trust. In both cases, however, I think the approach proposed by the Hon. Member is not suitable in the present circumstances.

As far as this particular case is concerned, I assume the Minister of State for Finance has sent the Opposition Member a number of replies to questions he has already raised. Neither the Minister of State for Finance nor the other parties concerned have been reluctant to publish or disclose any relevant information. We must therefore conclude that the public's need to know has been amply satisfied. It is a fact that the media have fully and extensively covered the matter, and in articles published before and after this very debatable motion was put on the Order Paper they described clearly and in great detail the entire sequence of events.

In the circumstances, however, it would be preferable to take the time to recapitulate briefly what happened in this case. It will then be abundantly clear that the Government has been entirely open about the matter and that the other parties certainly did not cover anything up. Obviously, I am not in a position to obtain information that is not available to the general public, so that there will be nothing new in what I will have to say here in the House.

In May 1984, a report was sent to then Minister of Finance.

[English]

Officials of the federal department of insurance have undertaken a thorough study of the situation of Pioneer Trust and reported at that time that there was cause for certain concern as to the company's financial situation. In accordance with the law and the provisions for trust companies, this company was invited to respond and effectively did so at a hearing in June. After due consideration, the company's license was renewed in August, but subject to a number of specific conditions and a properly calibrated reduction in its authorized borrowing ratio. In accordance with the said legislation, the company was given up to December 31 of last year to comply with this reduction in its newly authorized borrowing ratio. In the meantime, between May and December, the department of insurance continued its investigations, and by November it became apparent that the company would not be able to comply with the directives without a substantial injection of capital.

When pressed for additional capital, officials of this company informed federal officials of their intention to arrange for that issue of cumulative redeemable and retractable preferred shares which would be guaranteed by the Government of Saskatchewan. When it became clear that the Government of Saskatchewan had decided not to proceed with this guarantee, the managers of Pioneer Trust themselves realized that the conditions for continuing its operations had not been met and they closed down the company's operations.

As soon as she was instructed of such a situation, the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) and the Superintendent of Insurance moved at once to protect the interests of all concerned by taking absolute and immediate control of the assets of this company. Subsequent proper legal proceedings have left matters in the hands of a court appointed receiver. Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation has taken action duly to pay off insured depositors within the deposit insurance legal limit of $60,000.

Questions have been raised as to why the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation has not made arrangements to pay off all deposits of all depositors, irrespective of the $60,000 insurance coverage, as was done in connection with the Crown Trust and Fidelity Trust affairs. The provisions of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act are such that this government agency has the authority to enter into the type of global arrangements that applied in similar situations only if it is convinced that allowing a troubled company to run its business in such orderly manner, with sufficient support from this agency to enable all depositors to be paid in full, would be effectively less costly than bluntly putting the troubled company into liquidation and partially paying off all depositors immediately only to the extent of the $60,000 coverage.

In the case of Pioneer, the particular circumstances were such that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation came to the conclusion that it would be less costly if Pioneer were put into liquidation and the depositors were paid off immediately up to the insurance coverage. In the face of this conclusion, Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation had no option but to proceed in this justifiable manner.

I have only highlighted the most important facts, Mr. Speaker, all of which are public knowledge now. These related facts appeared in the press all over Canada. I am led to believe that these articles are based on the affidavit filed in court during the court proceedings and that these facts, which are now available, demonstrate that the Government acted in the best interests of all Canadians and has not tried to conceal anything.

The Minister of State for Finance said in the House on February 12, which citations can be found on pages 2290 and 2291 of Hansard, that she was strongly convinced that a public inquiry was not essential at that time. No additional information has been brought foward to this date by the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong), or any others, to indicate that the situation has changed in any substantial way. More information may have been made public since that time, but none of it implies that a public inquiry is required.

We have noticed, with regrettable concern, certain tendencies in discussions pertaining to Pioneer Trust to intimate that the West would not be compensated as fairly as eastern depositors were in previous allegedly similar cases. As an MP from the east—and I am sure you do not doubt it from my accent—I want to emphasize in the strongest possible terms my deep concern for the affairs of the West as for those of any other part of Canada.

Here it is instructive to note that in the case of Fidelity Trust, for example, a company with its head office in Edmonton and with only two offices east of the Manitoba-Ontario border, the then western depositors detained two-thirds of the total outstanding deposits. We would also remind all Hon. Members that in Ontario in the Astra-Remor case, a situation similar to this, there was no federal investment in the payment to the uninsured depositors.

The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation's decision to guarantee deposits in excess of the insurance coverage in the failure of Fidelity Trust, as well as the Crown, Seaway and Greymac companies was made because the corporation believed it would be less costly to guarantee all deposits and let the company run its business in an orderly manner, than to force the companies into liquidation and hastily pay off all depositors to the insured limit.

In the case of Pioneer Trust Company, as I have already mentioned, on February 7, 1985 the Minister of Finance for the Province of Saskatchewan announced that the Government of Saskatchewan had decided not to proceed with the guarantee of a preferred share offering. This provincial decision was communicated to the company and, as a result, senior management at Pioneer Trust took the further step of ordering that the trust company's offices be closed as of 4 p.m. They deliberately closed their own door.

As Members of the House, we ought to know that other measures can be taken to respond to public concern, and it is up to us as Members to take the most important of those measures. On similar occasions in the past, we were able to discuss issues with the Superintendent of Insurance when the standing committee considered his estimates. I am sure that the federal Superintendent of Insurance would gladly accept any invitation to address the committee members. It would be the best way to deal with the case mentioned in the motion. Naturally, there being no new and obvious facts indicating that the measures taken are not in the public interest, there is no point in blowing the situation out of all proportion, as would undoubtedly be the case as a result of an inquiry now deemed unnecessary in light of the facts uncovered at this time.

Now I would like to deal with the wider aspect of the motion under study. As a general policy, we are being asked to endorse the principle of a public inquiry in each and every case of trust company collapse. In his motion, the Hon. Member advocates that such an inquiry first be made through an administrative decision, then by means of an amendment to the Trust Companies Act. In my humble opinion, this suggestion does not take into consideration the normal evolution of financial institutions. For instance, I am wondering whether Members of the Opposition realize that, even if Parliament were to pass such legislation, it would not necessarily cover the operations of all similar companies. It is definitely obvious that this vague motion does not seem to take that factor into account.

The Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) is no doubt aware that jurisdiction over trust companies is broadly shared. While nearly two-thirds of corporate assets are held by companies under federal jurisdiction, close to a third are not. For this reason the legislation would not apply in a number of cases and would therefore be useless. Besides, even though the motion now before us deals mainly with trust companies, numerous other types of financial institutions are just as exposed to the negative impact of economic conditions. We therefore do not believe it would be appropriate or fair to impose that extra degree of control on only one type of institution.

In fact, in our approach we must recognize that it is not proper to deal selectively with certain types of institutions in that financial area. There must be consultation with the industry involved and the provinces. We must wait for the results of studies now being made concerning various aspects of the legislation as it applies to financial institutions. By that I mean all financial institutions, rather than one specific group.

The mandate of the Wyman Committee comes immediately to my mind when I think of the work that has to be done before we can decide how we should deal with the closing down of the operation of a trust company.

The role of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation in the case of Pioneer Trust, as in other cases that have come up, is important for depositors. We should not legislate without knowing about the findings of the important Wyman Committee. Under the circumstances, I really wonder if it is in order to discuss the motion tabled in this House this afternoon. This motion provides for a partial approach which, in my view, is not advisable in principle. We know there will be other opportunities to look at the over-all problem, but it is not obvious nor is it substantiated that the amendment proposed is absolutely vital. The odds are very slight indeed that the chances to look at the over-all situation will be postponed indefinitely. We are therefore not as receptive to this proposal as we might be under different circumstances. We honestly do not expect a large number of such companies to go down. Having said this, we do not see why an examination of the details of this proposal by the House should be a matter of such urgency.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that we sympathize greatly with those who may have suffered financial losses because of this unfortunate situation. I hope that when all assets have been realized, those who have deposits or parts of deposits not yet insured will be able to recover most of their money. We also hope that there is no doubt in the minds of investors about the absolute honesty of our trust companies and other financial institutions.

It might be true that we have witnessed the disappearance of a number of trust companies in rather suspicious circumstances these last few years. However, we are certain that most Canadian financial institutions are quite healthy. The evidence available to us suggests that the Federal Superintendent of Insurance and our officials will do their best to guarantee that present regulations are strictly observed, certainly in the interests of the financial sector, but also in the interests of all Canadians involved. We are therefore convinced that it is preferable to try to improve the regulatory system applicable to these institutions so that there will be no need to determine what action should be taken in any future regrettable situation like that of Pioneer. We therefore believe that, without adding to the already heavy regulatory burden imposed on our financial institutions, it will be possible to eliminate any remaining uncertainties and to state that depositors will continue to be well-served by existing mechanisms designed to protect their interests.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak to the motion this afternoon but after listening to the debate, I had a certain feeling of déjà vu, having sat in the Ontario Legislature at the time of the demise of Crown, Greymac and Seaway trust companies. I was listening more particularly to the last words of the Parliamentary Secretary—

—when he said: "We do not foresee that many trust companies will go down." I found these comments quite interesting, Mr. Speaker, because I used to sit opposite people who made similar comments in Ontario.

[English]

We can all recall, after the Astra and Re-Mor companies folded in the Province of Ontario, that the government Members stood proudly in their places in the Ontario House and said that never again shall such a thing happen in the Province of Ontario. Some three or four years later, the greatest financial collapse in the history of our country took place with the fall of Crown Trust, Greymac and Seaway trust companies.

We still do not know how much the fall of these three trust companies in Ontario will cost the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation. That cost will ultimately go to the taxpayers of this country. The fact is that the premiums for the CDIC are a tax because most people use banking facilities of some sort. When people use banking facilities, they pay the CDIC premiums, and when a trust company or financial institution collapses, those funds are required in order to either bail out the company or pay a certain amount to the depositors in those trust companies. Of course, the premiums will have to be raised in order to replenish that pool of funds and, as far as I am concerned, it has the same effect as a tax. Because I view this as a tax measure, I believe that a public inquiry certainly would be in order.

Let me return to the fall of the Ontario companies. I recall meeting with some of the preferred shareholders of the trust companies. I recognize that depositors and preferred shareholders are not the same, but it is not always apparent to people who are depositing their money in a financial institution.

For example, if a farmer who wants to put away his funds after selling his farm walks into a financial institution which has a CDIC logo on the door, he would assume that the money would be safe. One of the Crown Trust preferred shareholders who was at Queen's Park was a gentleman who had sold his farm a number of years ago. He had deposited his money in another institution which had collapsed. I believe it was Astra Trust. He had managed to salvage approximately $100,000 from his investment of some $500,000.

Of course, this gentleman had vowed that he would never again make the mistake of putting his money into something that was unsure. Therefore, he went to Crown Trust Company, which had the reputation of being a stable trust company, and put his money into preferred shares of Crown Trust Company. It seemed there was no better investment than that and no way a person could go wrong by putting his money into Crown Trust. This gentleman had purchased preferred shares because it was more advantageous than simply depositing the money into an account. In view of the stability of the company and the fact that it was one of the largest companies in the country, he assumed that his investment would be safe. Although he had lost a considerable amount in the previous collapse, he would have been able to retire on what he had left.

When I met that gentleman, he was wearing a pair of old boots that were tied with strings. He admitted that he had no money left at all when, not many years before, he had been financially well prepared for the rest of his life, having worked hard on his farm and sold his assets in order to retire.

I do not know what happened to that gentleman. Needless to say, if he were standing in the House today he would want on every occasion to have an inquiry into the fall of any financial institution which could result in those things happening to the people of this country.

● (1640)

We are told by the Parliamentary Secretary that we do not need to burden our financial institutions with more regulations. I beg to differ with the Parliamentary Secretary in that regard. We have long had a reputation in this country of stable financial institutions. Because they have a certain stability, one assumes nothing can go wrong. Because one assumes nothing can go wrong, you retract many deposits in the manner to which I referred a few moments ago, such as buying preferred shares or even putting funds in excess of the limit, which was $20,000 until recently. That limit has now been changed to $60,000. Nevertheless, being as good as the bank, an expression we like to use, means you do not lose funds when you put them in a financial institution. On the other hand, if we fail to supervise properly, to audit properly, and view publicly situations where things go wrong, the changes are that our mistakes will happen again.

I commend the Hon. Member for Regina East for proposing this motion today and I would like to give it my own personal support.

Mr. Gary Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to continue discussion on the motion brought forward by the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong). At the outset, I would like to reiterate several things that have been brought forward thus far, particularly by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lanthier).

I was attracted to one of the comments made by the previous speaker. I wish to note that I am not necessarily drawn to him but, rather, to some of the comments he made. This had to do with his analogy to farmers. First, the farmer he was talking about and the succession of difficulties that he faced by investing in different companies, both of which had trouble, is, in one way a funny kind of comparison and in another a very serious comparison, but it establishes the background to this whole debate. In 1979 and 1978 there were farmers in my area and right across the country, who kept on farming who have ended up the same way. What this motion really speaks to in part is the fact that this company about which we are talking, in looking for a very specific inquiry to deal with its problem, has a generic background. This should be looked at more broadly. This company is in trouble because of financial distress as a result of many of the decisions the company itself got involved in. Its equity fell away as land prices deteriorated. These severe economic pressures were being faced not just by the company but by the country as a whole, and the domino effect is felt throughout the whole economy.

We have seen a company fail. Pioneer Trust is a company representative of a financial institution in difficulty. One of the points the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance brought out very clearly and which I think needs to be emphasized is that the Government at the present time is not just looking at a band-aid solution through an inquiry into this company and the difficulties it may have had, and obviously had because it closed its own doors. The Government is looking at the entire range of financial intitutions and the problems they face. The Government is prepared to deal with them. The Government is doing it in an open and consultative way, and is trying to deal with the broad problems, just as we are approaching the economic and the other problems that we face. I will leave it to the Hon. Member in his own mind to describe and explain how we got into this spot. It is very clear to almost every Canadian that we are not in a very good financial position. We have a litany of things; high unemployment, high deficit, and so on that we have to accommodate.

Mr. Boudria: The falling dollar and the rest of it.

Mr. Gurbin: The dollar is levelling out right now. It is being managed very well by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), extremely well compared to the historic management we have had of our economy and our dollar—

Mr. Boudria: That is why it has dropped 10 per cent since you have been in office.

Mr. Gurbin: —and particularly in the period of time that we have had to come to grips with the structural and fundamental changes that need to occur. The only comment we can have on the Minister's performance is one of recommendation and commendation for the excellent job he has done.

Let me come back to the fundamental differences, Mr. Speaker. What we have in the proposed motion is a sort of band-aid. We could go on putting inquiry on top of inquiry on top of inquiry, but we will not solve the problems. We have a situation where this company closed its own doors. The CDIC did what seems to me an amazingly open and reasonable job of looking at the situation. The provincial Government, as far as I understand it, and I stand to be corrected but I have done as much homework as I can on it, withdrew its support after giving initial support.

Mr. de Jong: They fumbled it.

Mr. Gurbin: Comments can be made why the provincial Government chose to do that. I am not in a position to comment. My understanding is that the provincial Government withdrew its support. On that fundamental point I think I am accurate. The company itself closed its doors. There has been no effort on the part of the company, this Government, or the CDIC, as far as I can determine, to hide anything in terms of the sequence of events or the situation as it exists. There is no denial of the fact that there are investors who have been significantly affected by what has happened. No one on htis side of the House has indicated any pleasure in the results or in the situation we are in today.

What we see very clearly, and what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister has indicated, is that we are trying to deal with this problem not in a piecemeal fashion, not as one problem, one solution, but by reviewing all of our financial institutions, and coming up with measures that will affect them all. To do otherwise can create almost as many problems as it can try to help solve, even though the intentions might be good. If there is uncertainty, we can influence things even by way of dollars, but the question of people and what they are prepared to do with their money in terms of an investment will go on and on.

It is important not to raise the spectre of insecurity, not to promote lack of confidence, but to try to do things in a manner and style that will engender confidence and in the end make the changes that are constructive that we will all admit are necessary. There is no argument or debate about the fact that the legislation should be changed. There are many parts, but those parts are not independent one of another. An individual change in one part may have a negative result on another aspect.

I am not here to explain nor do I have the capacity to explain all these things or even to understand them, but I know that in principle that is true.

The other major point, at least in preamble, that I would like to make is in terms of the East-West question. I do not want to impute any terrible motives on the part of the Member who provided the motion. I am sure there was no political intention in his comment. If the Member would care to look back in history at the different times that the Government has become involved in individual cases and really looked at the investors who have been involved in those cases, while he may not be perfectly satisfied, he would see that there are investors from all across the country who are affected in any of these individual cases. In fact, there were investors from the west who were involved in the eastern situation and investors in the east who were involved in the western situation. My understanding is that the ratio in this instance works out to something like one-third East and two-thirds West. I do not know all the figures. I do not know how that will work out exactly, but that is roughly the number.

I can understand the Hon. Member's point of view. I do not deny that in a similar circumstance I would want very much to try to protect the interests of people in my constituency or in my province to whom I am close. Those are not motives that I want to try to detract from. As far as I can understand, in this situation I would hate to see us try to promote some kind of aura about the activities of the Government.

The Government sat down for the first time in my recollection, I do not know whether it is the first time in history, at a First Ministers' conference in the west to try to promote solutions to the kinds of things that this country has suffered from for so long, those things that cost us so much in so many ways. I am sure that Members on this side do not want to leave the aura that a decision has been reached for reasons which I am very sure were other reasons.

The policy has not changed. The CDIC determination in this instance as compared to other instances left it with the impression that instead of letting the company go out of business in the fashion in which it has done in other circumstances, in fact the general interests of the CDIC were better protected in this fashion or better reflected by allowing the company to do what it chose to do in contrast to taking other measures. That is debatable. I am not denying it is. However, the policy has not changed.

If there was any change in policy, it is a question of saying honestly that there are legislative changes that are probably needed. We are looking at them in a broad and open way. We intend to continue to do that. I am not sure of all the formats, but I believe the Hon. Member will have the opportunity to make his representations so that in the future these kinds of things can be included in a proper way. That is there, and it is a policy change. Apart from that, and although it is debatable, there has been no conscious decision by this Government that it is going to do things this way or that way in contrast to what was there before.

A comment was made by another Member on this side of this House. I will not give it attribution because he may not appreciate it fully. It is a little in the context of the comments I have been bringing forward so far. He talked about this being a post mortem. There is an interesting analogy there. A post mortem examination is valuable probably to all of society in looking at a particular situation. Again, the analogy is most important if we are talking about post mortems and looking at what really has happened. If we had an epidemic, for example, we could be doing thousands of post mortems. That is all we would be doing. It would give us some information, but we would end up in a situation where we would be using all our energies on post mortems. We would not be using our energy to dedicating our resources to preventing these things or making the necessary changes. That goes all the way back to the basic economic things. They are not unrelated.

Mr. de Jong: It is an inquest I am asking for.

Mr. Gurbin: The Hon. Member who wants an inquest will have to take that up with the Hon. Member on this side who suggested there should be a post mortem. I do not think we will develop that theme any further.

In the United States, there are between 30 and 40 financial institutions which have failed in the recent past. The point we can look at in this country compared to theirs is the relative health. There are some strengths and weaknesses. This is another area where I do not have the expertise to expand fully, but the figure does indicate something. We have had some failures of financial institutions in this country, but compared to what is occurring at the present time in the United States, particularly in view of other things happening in their economy, we are probably relatively well off. It is not that we should not change or that this is an excuse, but we do have some comparative strengths if we look at the situation in other countries. One thing that is incongruous about that whole scene is the fact that their economy is performing spectacularly well at the present time. That is another level of debate for another time. Those things do not always seem to flow one with the other.

The bottom line of this debate is that the Government respects the motion that the Member has brought forward and his noble intention in doing so on behalf of his constituents and his province. It is a genuine concern on his part to prevent serious injury to people who have invested in that company. While respecting that and being fully motivated addressing the financial institutions and trying to prevent these things from happening, we need to do it in a comprehensive way that will involve the federal and provincial levels. The Hon. Member will know there is a shared responsibility in a way that will consider the whole range of financial institutions that will become involved once we start making these changes. In a way, it will benefit the whole Canadian scene and, as far as possible, will prevent this kind of thing from happening in the future. I thank the House for its attention. I would now like to call it five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe we still have a couple of minutes. I will recognize the Hon. Member for Oxford.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I know the time is short.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not sure if the Hon. Member realizes that by talking now, he will talk this matter out and prevent it from coming to a vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Oxford has the floor.

Mr. Halliday: Mr. Speaker, I have been interested in this debate this afternoon. As the Hon. Member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin) said, the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) is very sincere in presenting this motion before the House. As I read the motion, I have a little concern about passing it as it is. While it refers specifically to the Pioneer Trust Company, it also mentions other trust companies. That is a very vague term.

I would hate to see this House pass a motion that vaguely refers to a whole number of trust companies without identifying which ones we are trying to investigate. That is one of the difficulties in this whole problem. Second, I appreciate the sincerity—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Me too.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. John Parry (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak today on Bill C-24. However, it is a pleasure which I would rather forgo, because in a sense I am an alumnus of the energy conservation programs which were established in 1981. I lived in a house which had been reinsulated under CHIP by the previous owner. I also took advantage of the program to upgrade a second house. I have a warm feeling for the program which dissipates when I look at the proposal to eliminate these programs.

CHIP provided for the upgrading of insulation in homes. It was an effort to conserve the precious resources of oil and petroleum products which have done so much to contribute to the economic development of Canada, and to our comfort, both in the home and in the workplace. Of course, those resources have finite limits and must be conserved if our children and our children's children are to benefit from those resources.

The Canadian Oil Substitution Program is one of which I have not been able to take advantage. At one point my wife and I thought about taking advantage of the program, but we realized that an election would be held in a matter of months and, therefore, conserved our financial resources. Nevertheless, I feel in a sense that I am an alumnus of the program, the termination of which we are now debating.

What were the benefits of the Canadian Oil Substitution Program and the Canadian Home Insulation Program? According to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, Canada is saving approximately 42,000 barrels of oil per day, or 15.3 million barrels per year, as a result of COSP. That is enough oil to heat 650,000 homes a year. It represents an energy saving of approximately 2.8 per cent of the country's total oil consumption.

Under COSP, a household which converts from oil can expect a return on the investment in a period of two to three years. However, the benefits of COSP were not limited to the saving of oil. Naturally, there was a reduction in the oil bill, but there was a stimulative effect on the awareness, consciousness and understanding of people in the country with respect to energy conservation.

I must take issue with the Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Tupper) who seemed to believe that this particular egg preceded the chicken. I know from my own experience that until the federal Government established these programs and the financial incentives and information which were included with the application packages, I was not aware of the potential for energy saving which they have promoted and realized. Of course, it is all very well for those who were professionally engaged in that field to say that the knowledge always existed. However, the communication of the knowledge to the people who were making the decisions—in this case, the home owners of Canada—was crucial. That knowledge was given a real impetus with the introduction of COSP and CHIP.

The effects of the elimination of COSP and CHIP will be considerable. I was surprised to hear some Members of the House addressing this matter without raising the effects that the elimination of the programs will have on employment in Canada. In terms of 1979 dollars, for every $1 million spent on the Canadian Oil Substitution Program, 30.5 person-years of employment were created. As a result of the grants alone, 16,750 person-years of employment were created between 1981 and 1985. If that figure is combined with the expenditures by householders and home owners, the figure comes to over 50,000 person-years of employment for the same period. Officials at the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, have stated that if COSP had lasted for its planned duration through 1990, $650 million would have been spent on the program and a rough estimate of the employment lost in that period by the elimination of the program would be 59,000 person-years.

These figures, Mr. Speaker, are serious. They are serious in good times but they are doubly serious in times of rising unemployment when it is extremely difficult for youth to get their first job and the necessary training. One of the advantages of this program which I saw at first hand was that it enabled young people to work as assistants to retrofitters and upgraders and to learn some of the skills which were involved. By comparison with expenditures on oil exploration, the investment in the Canada Oil Substitution Program and the Canadian Home Insulation Program were vastly more productive in terms of the creation of jobs.

I am sure Hon. Members on the government side will say that I am suggesting that oil exploration should cease in Canada; far from it. We have to recognize that through such loopholes as superdepletion, the PetroCan presence in frontier areas and the subsidization and financing assistance given to some of the high rollers in that industry—which have now come a cropper—the federal Government was indeed heavily engaged in that area and certainly not to as good an effect as in the conservation programs which we debate today.

One of the things that concerns me most, and I believe should concern all Hon. Members of this House, is that the energy conservation and substitution industries in this country are being hit with a double-whammy by this Government. On the one hand, we have the elimination of the CHIP and COSP programs; on the other hand, what do we have in terms of the innovative alternative energy programs which were introduced during the last Government? We have the same picture, Mr. Speaker. We have the elimination of those programs so that those who are looking at this sector for their main means of employment and livelihood are going to find that the upgrading and retrofitting is being shrunk back and that it is far more difficult to get work in terms of alternate energy programs which were financed through the National Research Council.

I remember watching on television, I suppose, slightly over five years ago now, a former Minister of Finance of Canada saying that there was a necessity to inflict, or, shall we say, subject oneself to, short-term pain for long-term gain. By the elimination of the COSP and CHIP programs, we are indeed going to find ourselves in a position of accepting short-term gain for long-term pain. In my opinion, that is indicative of a reversal of policy by the Progressive Conservative Party over the years.

We must remember, after all, that oil is a finite resource; it isn't going to be there forever. We are taking it out of the ground and the more we take out the less there is left, no matter how fast we find it. We may indeed, Mr. Speaker, be reaching the end of what was known as the "elastic horizon". The observation was made as early as the 1930s in the U.S. Congress that every 10 years there was a cycle whereby the oil companies came to Congress and said that the reserves were running out and three years later the proven reserves had doubled. We have to recognize that, like the frog on the lily pad which doubles in area every second day, the lily pad will eventually cover the whole pond and the pool of Canadian oil reserves will eventually be depleted no matter how much is found through new exploration efforts. The National Energy Board, after all, predicts that production of conventional oil 20 years from now will have declined to 28 per cent of the current level.

Let us look at what that means. Does it mean, for example, that each of us is only going to do one quarter as much driving? Does it mean that we are going to heat our homes to an average of 45 degrees Fahrenheit instead of the average 68 degrees we heat them to today? Certainly there will be new oil discovered in the frontier areas and certainly we are going to see further technological advances in the upgrading of oil sands and heavy oil deposits, but in many cases the production costs of those resources are prohibitively high and they are located in highly environmentally-sensitive areas.

The Canadian Oil Substitution Program and the Canadian Home Insulation Program represented common sense investments by the Government in Canada's future energy security, and I think it would be a great shame if they were entirely eliminated. I would also like to mention a few of the effects of the deadlines set in the elimination of those programs. My belief is that those deadlines were set simply by a reference to a calendar and with very little consideration of what was going to happen to Canadians as a result. The deadline of March 31, 1985, for large parts of this country—not, of course, the most intensively inhabited parts but the large geographical areas of this country where many Canadians live—means it would be impossible for a person to do in-ground installation and get in the program under the deadline. If that was a calculation on the part of the Government, and I hope it was not, then it was a cynical move.

I wonder, in looking at the elimination of this program, how much of it is owned to the pressure and influence of Canada's oil-producing provinces. I wonder if indeed we are seeing the effects of powerful interests in the Progressive Conservative Party which view conservation as a competitor for the resources which fill their slush—I am sorry, heritage—funds, and which give them the funds to make their governments go the way they want them to. We should look at evaluating the effect of the elimination of these programs on the world energy supply situation. The beauty, of course, of refined petroleum products as an energy source is their portability, their extreme flexibility. They cannot indefinitely or infinitely be substituted for by hydro-electric resources which this country is better endowed with. Thus the need to conserve them, because, after all, the countries which can supply the shortfall which Canada will inevitably have can also supply the shortfalls that other countries are experiencing, and which they may be better able to finance than Canada as we begin the 21st century.

There was no evaluation done on the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. There have been suggestions that middle and upper middle-income Canadians benefited disproportionately from this program. The figures indeed suggest that that is not the case. The total CHIP grant money given to low-income households was higher than that given to middle and high-income groups; 24.3 per cent of CHIP dollars were given to the 21.1 per cent of eligible home owners earning less than $15,000 annually. Of course, when we consider the tax effects, we find that an even higher proportion went to eligible home owners in the low-income range. Therefore, it was certainly not a discriminatory program in the sense of favouring the wealthy rather than the less well off.

From 1977 to 1982 insulation activities under CHIP constituted 43 per cent of all retrofitting work done. It is said that 65 per cent of the work done would not have been done if it were not for CHIP and that 75 per cent of all dollars would not have been spent without the CHIP Program.

What will the effect on our country be if these programs are simply eliminated as the Government proposes? I think a large part of the effect will be what is known as the shuffle down, of which we have seen far too much in Canadian society over the past few years. This is where a program is instituted at one level of government, is abandoned, and the levels of government below the level which instituted it find that program to be so necessary that they decide to carry on a replica of the program at their own level of government.

I can see, for example, that with the elimination of this program many provinces, municipalities and utilities will bring in similar programs to encourage conservation. In the sense that the torch of conservation will not be dropped and extinguished, which this legislation envisages, that is good. In the sense that Canadians will end up paying, because of the fragmentation of the program, a higher price for the very laudable, legitimate and essential objectives of these two programs, that will be a loss to Canada.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be back in the House on a Monday morning and to start off our debate with the Member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Parry). I must deal with one of his comments about powerful influences in the Conservative Party and its impact on conservation. The Member may be new to the House, but I suspect he is not new to some understanding of the world-wide situation over the past decade as it affects oil and gas. The Member really should be aware of the fact that conservation, as it affects the use of oil, is clearly a function of price. World-wide patterns in terms of the consumption of oil show a very steady and clear decline in the world. That decline exists in Canada, the United States of America and around the world.

The clearest-cut indication of a reduction in the use of oil comes from Europe. In Europe, OPEC raised the price of oil. Furthermore, governments implemented punitive taxation so that the consumption of oil included not only the price of the product but the taxation. The effects were predictable: the consumption of that commodity dropped.

What did the Liberals and the New Democrats do in this country? When faced with that reality they regulated the price of that commodity so that it was less than the market value. The Hon. Member for Kenora-Rainy River says that he and his Party are concerned about conservation, yet his Party supported the abolition of a basic principle that would have led to conservation.

The most important principle related to the conservation of oil is the price, because if it is raised the use of oil goes down and the commodity is preserved. However, we sat in this Chamber during the last five and one-half years and watched the implementation of the National Energy Program, the basic principle of which was to regulate the price of oil at less than 75 per cent of the market price. If that is not a principle to encourage use, I don't know what is. Surely one would expect greater use of that product when it is subsidized to the tune of 25 per cent of its value. Moreover, Canada did not even produce enough of that commodity for our use at that time, which meant that its greater use encouraged the importation of oil from other countries. Of course, the importation of oil from other countries means the export of Canadian jobs. That is the substance of the program that was put in place.

At the same time that Canadian jobs were being exported, inflation was being caused.

Mr. Hovdebo: You voted for it.

Mr. Hawkes: The Hon. Member says that we voted for it. It will be a very frosty day when any Member of Parliament from the Province of Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia or Quebec votes for a program like that. It will never happen in his lifetime or mine.

Once the former Government set in place its national energy policy which exported Canadian jobs, increased inflation and the indebtedness of the nation, it then established the CHIP and COSP Programs. These were programs which gave grants to home owners who wished to convert from oil to another kind of energy. However, there was no money to finance these programs and the Government had to borrow money which ultimately must be paid back by our children and our children's children.

Were these programs made available to all Canadians? No. Studies conducted by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources show that only 29 per cent of the expenditures for the CHIP Program encouraged people to insulate their homes. What does that say, Mr. Speaker? It says that 71 per cent of the money spent did not even do that. The Liberals as a government must have said, because they had no money and had to go to the market-place to borrow to give to someone, that this was a priority, that we have made oil 25 per cent cheaper than it should have been to encourage its use, and then borrowed the money to give to people to insulate their homes so they would use less. It was a transfer from oil to some other kind of fuel so people might use less fuel.

Can I suggest to this House, Mr. Speaker, that at that time it was an insane package. It was absolutely insane. If Canada at that particular point in its history had been less interfering, had let the true value of a commodity rise to its true value, the differential cost for someone to heat his home with oil or transfer to some other energy commodity, of which there is an abundance in Canada, would have been so massive, the saving so enormous, that home owners could have quite easily gone to the bank, borrowed money, put in the insulation, made the transfer and had more money in their pockets. That was the potential reality of encouraging Canadians to transfer from this commodity called oil to something else called wood, electricity, coal, or whatever. That would have happened. It would inevitably have happened if one had simply left the market-place alone.

Mr. Boudria: How can you possibly prove that?

Mr. Hawkes: If a person were paying $500 to heat his home in the cold winter months, and that person found out he could heat it for $200 or $250, he would have an enormous monthly saving. It is certainly an adequate amount of money to enable a person to go to the bank, borrow and do the sensible economic thing. But no, Mr. Speaker, we had a government that did not believe Canadians were sensible people. Instead we capped the price of oil, exported the jobs out of the country to Mexico, Saudi Arabia or wherever, and borrowed money which our kids will have to pay back. And this was done to give to whom?

The Hon. Member for Kenora-Rainy River, by educational and economic background, is someone we would call a middle-income Canadian. He is probably on the upper edge in terms of income and on the upper edge in terms of educational level, yet he stands in this House today and says: "I like this program. I took two houses. I got two grants". That, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, is an anecdotal piece of proof positive of who benefited. That is the New Democratic Party. It was not one grant but two grants that he had. That makes the program twice as valuable.

Mr. Parry: No way. Read the blues.

Mr. Hawkes: He insulated two houses. Where does that money come from, Mr. Speaker? It comes from your children, and your children's children way into the future. That is borrowed money that was used to insulate the Member's two houses.

Mr. Parry: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My reputation for the ability to absorb provocation must have spread to the Government benches. If the Hon. Member cares to check the record, he will find that I purchased one house that had already been insulated under a grant and I insulated the second one myself.

Mr. Hawkes: I thank the Hon. Member for the correction, Mr. Speaker. He lived in two houses that were supported by federal grant money. He took advantage of it with lower fuel bills in two situations because of a federal Government program. It is incredible.

Mr. Keeper: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Member seems to be indicating that my colleague is the only person in this country who lives in a house that is supported by federal grant money. Does he not know that housing in this country—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member will have a chance to reply after the Member's speech.

Mr. Hawkes: We heard statistics from the Hon. Member. They boggled my mind. Canadian home owners were eligible for this program and I thought, from sitting in this House for five and a half years, that the New Democratic Party cared a lot about renters. We have a large number of renters. Were they eligible for COSP? Were they eligible for CHIP? No, Mr. Speaker. Were all the senior citizens who live in lodges and public housing of one kind or another eligible for CHIP or COSP?

Would the federal Government, if it went into the market-place to borrow funds, have given the funds to the Hon. Member for Kenora-Rainy River or to the senior citizens in my riding, some of whom live very near starvation without funds to buy sufficient food? That is the business of governing, Mr. Speaker. That is really what governing is all about. There is not enough in the way of resources for us to do everything that we think we would like to do. We must make the hard choices. I suggest to the House that the only problem with this piece of legislation before us today from my perspective is that the deadline dates we are putting in are too far into the future. I would like to see them shortened. I would like to see today as the day the programs are ended. I have a sense of certitude today that in the month of March, 1985, federal taxpayers are paying 36 cents out of every dollar on interest on the public debt. When I came here almost six years ago that amount was 17 cents. We had 83 cents to spend on useful programs for senior citizens, children, family and health care. Six years later we have 64 cents, because 36 cents goes to pay interest on the public debt.

I think it is close to a crime that we have borrowed that kind of money—

Mrs. Sparrow: It is a crime.

Mr. Hawkes: —to put into programs like this to enable middle-income, upper-income and the better educated Canadians to get a grant to do something that most if not all of them would have done out of their own resources and would have done faster. They might have even done it better if we had not interfered with the market price of energy. The basic principle of letting the different sources of energy compete is what brings about the adaptation for the individual and the adaptation for the nation that is required. The minute we get into the business of regulating the price of those commodities, to making artificial the determination of what those commodities should cost, we begin to distort the natural ebb and flow. Then we begin to make mistakes, and those mistakes pile upon mistakes. This one is particularly graphic because it is current and has caused so much anguish in the country. It has hurt us so much in terms of economic development.

• (1140)

I have spoken in the House before about the social costs of increased unemployment and the reality that a 1 per cent increase in unemployment will bring about an approximate 5 per cent increase in stress-related diseases, including suicide, alcoholism, spousal battery and child battery. These things come as the natural consequence of bad economic policy in a country. When we make a mistake in this Chamber, the ripple effects and the consequences of that mistake can be enormous for individual Canadians. We have made nothing but mistakes in the last five or six years in terms of energy policy, nothing but mistakes. I feel proud and comfortable just to belong to a political Party which is moving as quickly as it can to rectify those mistakes and to turn the situation around.

I look forward to an energy agreement in the next few weeks which will say clearly to Canadians that we are returning to market-based pricing. We must have market-based pricing for the commodity called oil. We must move as quickly as we can to that market-based mechanism for the commodity called natural gas and for all other commodities within the energy field. In different parts of the country it will make sense to heat homes with one kind of fuel and in other parts of the country with different kinds of fuel. However, if we move artificiality into that system, we distort the market, our productivity and the long-term potential efficiency of the nation.

I spent the weekend in the Town of Oyen near the Saskatchewan border. It happened to be the fiftieth wedding anniversary of my aunt and uncle. On such an occasion there is time for reflection. When one tries to celebrate an event of that kind which spans a 50-year period of time, one looks back. We were sitting out there on the Prairies, on the Saskatchewan border, in the heart of wheat country. We noticed the snow. People were happy about the snow because they have been close to a drought situation for a couple of years and the presence of a great deal of snow augurs well for the potential of a good crop. When one looks back over that period of time, one realizes that this couple was married in an era when they travelled by horseback and transported grain in horse-drawn wagons. Now, 50 years later, we have jet airplanes, cars and highways. It provides one with a chance to reflect on how far the country has come, how far that particular region has come, in a period of 50 years.

Then one stops for a minute and says that one thing which was different 50 years ago is that government did not think it knew best. We did not have so many experts. We let people make their own decisions. We did not raise taxation to the point where we were taking money, great amounts of money, out of the pockets of people and letting bureaucrats and politicians decide how to spend it. We let people decide in their own wisdom how best to spend it. When it comes to the elimination of these two programs, all we are really saying to the Canadian people and to the House is: let the people decide; do not bribe them to make a decision which is not really in their best interests.

Oil Substitution Act

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to correct some of the fallacies and allegations inherent in the Hon. Member's speech, but with only 10 minutes to do it I will be put under some pressure. The Hon. Member used the term "insanity"—and indeed, if we listened to some of the comments this morning we must admit that he had some justification—to describe the legislation which the Government now plans to repeal.

In view of the fact that the Act implementing the Canadian Oil Substitution Program was passed in 1981, with second reading in one hour, referred to Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent and inside an hour read a third time and passed, does the Hon. Member think that that insanity was endemic in his Party at the time or that it was simply an aberration? Is he using the term "insanity" in a clinical or colloquial fashion?

Finally, I should like him to comment upon the observation of the Hon. Member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), who said at the time: "I want to conclude by congratulating the Minister again for bringing this legislation forward". Let us hear what the Hon. Member considers insanity to be.

Mr. Hawkes: The insanity continues, Mr. Speaker. I hope the Hon. Member for Kenora-Rainy River will listen carefully. Some of his colleagues have heard this before. If we repeat it often enough they will begin to understand.

The minute the decision was made to implement the National Energy Program, to hold the true market value of oil at a minimum of 25 per cent below its value, it encouraged consumption of a scarce commodity which we could not produce in the country. The next thing the Government did was take away the cash which would have produced more oil in the country and chased out investment capital to the tune of $18 billion, which was destroying jobs and increasing the need to import oil. They increased consumption and had the need to import more because there was not enough; that was the basic insanity.

This program at that point was the only thing the majority Liberal Government was willing to bring into place which was partly in the direction of sanity. If we do all these other bad things, then we have to have something which will stimulate the economy as quickly as possible. That happened in the insulation industry and the energy substitution industry. They were chasing out a lot more than they were bringing in, but at least that created a few jobs and hopefully it would reduce to some extent the need to import oil.

In the midst of all that total insanity, this was the sanest piece of legislation to attempt to mitigate that massive insanity represented in the totality of the program. That is the context. I see from the nods across the way that maybe they are beginning to understand, hopefully.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to how the Hon. Member tried to weasel his way out of his previous statement, unsuccessfully I must say. Could he indicate to us what was the real policy of the Conservative Party at that time? Of course, we know that through some fit of insanity they seem to have voted for the original Bill. The Hon. Member has now said that the reason they voted for it was that it was slightly less insane than other insanities, or something like that. Could the Hon. Member indicate whether he would have been in favour of going to full world prices at that particular time, recognizing the fact that it would have probably bankrupted all the Maritime Provinces of Canada, perhaps the Province of Quebec and part of eastern Ontario? Is it the policy of the Conservative Party to bankrupt eastern Canada? Yes or no?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Conservative Party as it relates to Atlantic Canada is to give it a fair shake on Confederation after all these years to help it develop its own sense of industry and resourcefulness and to help it reach economic health rather than providing the subsidies which made it dependent on the centre of the country. I am proud to belong to a Party that signed an agreement with the Province of Newfoundland and will sign an agreement with the Province of Nova Scotia that will give those provinces control over the pace of development in their regions rather than telling them that people in Ottawa know best what is good for the people in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. That is the philosophy.

Mr. Boudria: What does that have to do with what happened then?

Mr. Hawkes: The Hon. Member asked what that had to do with what happened then. The Hon. Member is new to the House of Commons. In 1979 he would have seen that when it became necessary to convert the Atlantic region from oil to other heating sources, there was to be special assistance for the entire region.

Mr. Boudria: Oh no, you said it was insane. You said that was insanity.

Mr. Hawkes: I am talking about 1979 when we formed the Government. The Hon. Member is talking about 1980 when the National Energy Program destroyed the economy of the country. In 1979 we were moving toward assistance for electrical power generation in the Atlantic region. We were going to provide help in getting off oil for renters as well as home owners. This has nothing to do with COSP and CHIP and giving little grants of money to people in return for votes. That is an entirely different mentality from the mentality of using federal public policy to assist in infrastructure development in all regions of the country.

Mr. McKnight: Somebody voted against it.

Mr. Hawkes: Ultimately people got tired of these band-aids and indicated that it was time to change the major policies of the country so we could restore it to economic health. That is what we were elected to do. Like it or lump it, that is what we are going to do.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member about a few things. First, he made a case for market value of oil in order to encourage conservation and he indicated that he was opposed to the regulation of oil prices. Does he think that the oil prices that were determined by OPEC, an international cartel, were free market prices? Does he not understand that when regulation of oil prices was brought into the country, it was brought in as a response to the skyrocketing costs of oil, a response to prices that were rising as a result of an international cartel? Is that what he means by a free market? Perhaps the Hon. Member could explain to us what he means by a free market.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would encourage the Hon. Member to get into his car next weekend and drive across the border to a town in which the free market is in operation. While there, I would advise him to fill up his gas tank. The regulated price of gas in Canada is 75 per cent of world price, or of cartel price if the Hon. Member wants to call it that. It will cost him more to fill up his gas tank right here than it would across the border where the world price is in operation. I believe that that was the basic mistake that was made. By regulating prices, by holding them down, we indeed increased taxes at all levels and made the price higher for the consumers.

Was the Hon. Member here in 1979? I think he was. He might realize that back in those days the policy that was then forthcoming would have protected senior citizens. The 1979 Budget that his Party used to bring down the then Government was judged by the Canadian Welfare Council as being the fairest Budget to poor people in the 1970s. It was judged as being the fairest Budget to poor people in the entire decade. His Party brought down the Government on that Budget. Since that moment that Party has had no credibility when it comes to financial matters in the country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is now over. We shall resume debate.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased to participate in this debate on Bill C-24. We must remember why Bill C-24 was introduced. It was introduced as part of the expenditure and program review cut-back. Of course, the program review cut-back, or the first attack on the Canadian people by "Mike the Knife", as he should more properly be called, advocated a reduction of $95 million in one program and a reduction of $84 million in another program. That is the real reason why the Bill is before us today.

If we were to have a free vote on this Bill, we all know that the majority of Members would support the Bill. However, when threatened by "Erik the Dreaded" and "Mike the Knife", Conservative members do not always do what they wish to do. They are sometimes forced to vote for the kind of reprehensible legislation that is before us today. There is nothing they can do about that. They must toe the line and clap at the proper time when cued to do so. You will know, Mr. Speaker, being the truly objective and non-partisan person that you are, that that is exactly what happens.

The COSP and CHIP programs were indeed excellent programs brought in by the Liberal Government of the past.

An Hon. Member: That's right, the past.

Mr. Boudria: Should I describe it as the Liberal Government of the past and the Liberal Government of the future? That is what we will be after the next election.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: Let us look at some of the benefits of these programs. Over one-third of the housing stock of the country built prior to 1977 had benefited from these programs. The programs were indeed very successful ones. CHIP grants were provided to many homes across the country and, contrary to the popular belief of some Conservative members, it is not only rich people who own their own homes. As a matter of fact, I represent a constituency in which almost everyone owns his own home. Over 85 per cent of the population of my riding is comprised of people who live in their own homes. The average income of the people of my riding is considerably less than the national average. To me, that would mean that owning one's own home in my constituency does not mean that one is rich; it means that there are no apartments so a home is the only place in which one can live. That means that if one's salary is lower than the national average, one needs assistance in order to heat one's home.

In order to heat their homes in the past, my constituents were required to use oil. The majority of homes in my riding are heated by oil. There are one or two communities which happen to have natural gas. As natural gas was being installed in other communities, many people wanted to convert their heating systems and again, through financial constraints, were unable to do so. Through the COSP Program of the Government, for example, some people were able to convert their oil furnaces to natural gas or electricity in order to free themselves from being prisoners of a system which was ever causing prices of oil to increase and become less and less affordable.

In the national interest the Government recognized that if it was to keep a large portion of the population from being held prisoner by the need to purchase imported oil, it could do so by converting consumption to other forms of energy and by reducing consumption through energy conservation. These two programs achieved both of those objectives and indeed were excellent programs.

A chart which was produced in the last edition of The Financial Post indicates that in 1984 there was a net reduction of 8 per cent in fuel oil consumption in Canada. I think that is significant. We have an increase of 8 per cent in natural gas consumption. Inevitably, the programs which have assisted the people of Canada in converting their heating systems and conserving energy have been successful. I do not know why the Government wants to disband two programs which have been very successful. Perhaps it is for purely partisan reasons that the Conservatives want to abolish these successful Liberal programs. But Liberal programs were not only designed for Liberals, they were designed for the benefit of all Canadians. If the Liberal programs have been successful, maybe Conservative members should start to become more objective and less partisan.

The Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) told us that conversion and conservation only happened in concert with prices. In other words, if a product is priced out of existence, of course, people will convert to another product. Perhaps that is the policy of the Conservative Party, to increase energy prices so much that people will not be able to afford it and therefore, those people will have to convert to another product. But that was not the policy of the Liberal Party. The Liberal Party tried to keep those products affordable for Canadians. The Liberals did not want to bankrupt the Maritimes, Quebec, or threaten eastern Canada. Indeed, the program was very successful.

I see a Conservative member in the House who said the other day that the only people who were benefiting from the program were the rich people who were buying heat pumps with a government subsidy. Well, perhaps his constituents belong to that financial bracket, but mine do not. The people of my constituency have larger than average households compared with the rest of the country. The census document for my riding indicates that 89.6 per cent of all housing stock is single family dwellings. The people of my constituency, whether they are well off or poor, have their own homes. The poor people may have larger mortgages, but nevertheless they do not have a choice when it comes to paying their heating bills. That bill is there whether they like it or not.

My constituency also has very high unemployment. The people of my riding do not have money to pay exorbitant oil prices. According to the census, the average income of the people in my riding is close to $1,000 less per person than the national average. With this evidence, it is quite obvious that the people of Glengarry-Prescott-Russell do not want the program to terminate. It was a good program from which the people benefited.

The Hon. Member for Calgary West said that the legislation was insane. He and his colleagues in the Conservative Party unanimously supported a Bill which they now claim is insane. Perhaps he should verify his voting record in the House before making such a claim.

As part of the famous "Mike the Knife" Tory cut-back book, Canadians will realize a fuel price increase of 1.8 cents per litre. The people will have no assistance to free themselves from the price of heating oil. There will be no programs of assistance—again according to the wishes of the Government—for Canadians to conserve energy and add insulation to their homes. The Government says that is all right. It says that if Canadians do not have bread to eat, then they can eat cake. The Government says that conservation will still take place. Well, if conservation will take place, why did that not happen before this program was enacted? Obviously, incentive was required in order to achieve that conservation. The incentive which is required should be manifested in the leadership of the Government. But this Government has washed its hands of that responsibility. It tells us that the free market and the cartels widll take care of the situation.

For Conservative members who believe it is wrong for the Government to be involved in regulating oil prices, when faced with the alternative of letting the cartels and industry regulate those prices, one has to ask, "Who speaks for Canadians?" Is it the multinationals or is it the Government of Canada? Surely, the Government should recognize that it is its job to govern. The Government should not wash its hands of that responsibility and give it to multinational companies. The Government says that it does not want to be involved and that the multinationals should regulate oil prices. That is the Conservative policy. It is wrong. That is not why the Government was elected six months ago today.

The Government was elected to fulfil a long series of promises. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will remember those promises because, like us, you suffered by listening to the litany of 338 promises which the Tories made. However, I do not remember a promise which indicated that the Government would abolish assistance for the poor, or assistance for people who could not afford to change their furnaces. In my riding the Conservative opponent did not say that. I am sure that gentleman did not stand on the stage in Alexandria, Hawkesbury or Rockland, and say to the good people of those communities: "Vote for me and I will cut off your grant". I did not hear my Conservative opponent saying that. That is not one of the promises which was made. The Conservative promises were to give everything to everyone all the time.

Mrs. Sparrow: We promised to cut the deficit.

Mr. Boudria: I am glad to hear a Conservative member saying that the Conservatives promised to cut the deficit. It is interesting to hear that, especially in view of the fact that 113 promises would have increased the deficit, and five of the promises would have reduced the deficit. In terms of revenue generation, two promises would have increased the funds coming in and 26 promises would have reduced those funds. I am glad the Conservative member has indicated that that was the policy of the Conservative Party during the election campaign. Obviously, those were not the policies of the Conservative Party.

The Government has asked the House to support legislation which will reduce benefits for the people of my riding who can least afford it. I say that we should not abolish these programs. We need this kind of legislation. All Hon. Members recognize that it was a good Bill and it was supported unanimously in 1981. It was supported by the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) who is now shaking his head. He knew at the time that it was a good Bill and I would venture to say that he still thinks today that it is a good Bill, but someone is directing him with cue cards, and all of those other props the Conservatives use, to tell him to vote against this Bill.

Mr. Lewis: Cue cards?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: If he was a free-thinking Member as he sits in this House right now, he would not put up with that. I challenge him to stand and speak on behalf of his constituents.

Mr. Blenkarn: I will.

Mr. Boudria: I challenge him to speak for the people with low incomes who own their own homes and who need to free themselves from high oil prices, those who need to convert their heating systems. I challenge the Hon. Member to stand and speak for those people, Mr. Speaker; not just for the bagmen of the Conservative Party, not just for multinationals and the very large companies, but for average Canadians, because they are the ones who elected Hon. Members to this House. They are the ones who want fair and honest representation from all of us. They don't want that grant cut off. They don't want to see these very good Liberal initiatives abolished. I am sure that deep down inside all Hon. Members across from me and the book-ends on this side, Mr. Speaker, really want to see this kind of measure retained.

The Tories have always been able to use double-speak very effectively. They tell us that they can be all things to all people. But the true side of the Tories is shown up when they introduce these kinds of "let them eat cake" measures. I am sure that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald), who is very concerned about the well-being of the people of this country—

Miss MacDonald: That's right.

Mr. Boudria: —would stand in her place, if she could—but she can't—and speak on behalf of the people of Kingston and the Islands. She would speak on behalf of those voters because she knows that abolishing this kind of measure is a very sick joke indeed on the part of the Conservative Party. More particularly, it is a vicious attack by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). "Mike the Knife" is sticking it into the backs of all the poor people of this country when he introduces this kind of measure. I urge all Hon. Members to vote against it.

Mr. Blenkarn: The Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria) has indicated that this program is meant to assist the poor. I was wondering if he could describe in what way this program deliberately helps the poor over the relatively rich? It seems to me only those people who own homes are entitled to these programs. Any cultural study which is carried out across the country would indicate that the people who own homes are usually better off in the community than those people who do not own homes; for example, those people who rent. Could the Hon. Member enlighten us as to how this is a program to help the poor, the under privileged and the downtrodden? Or is it perhaps just a regular Liberal program which is designed to ensure the national debt gets larger, that our children have greater burdens on their shoulders and that the people are bought with their own money?

If it was such a good program, I wonder why, in terms of purchase of votes, the Liberal Party did not do as well this time in the election as it did the last time. Indeed, in 1979 the Liberals tried amending the program right in the middle of the election period in order to see if they could grab a few more votes. The Hon. Member will know that at that time the then Liberal Minister, the Hon. Alastair Gillespie, was running in Etobicoke Centre and that the now Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) represents the riding of Etobicoke Centre.

Mr. Boudria: I am very pleased to answer that question, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, if the Hon. Member had listened carefully to my speech he would know that 89 per cent of the people of my riding own their own homes, but not 89 per cent of the people in my riding are rich. As a matter of fact, I also described where the average annual income of the people in my riding, according to Statistics Canada is less than that of the people in the rest of the country. The average annual income in my constituency is $1,000 less than the income of the average Canadian and 89 per cent of the people own their own homes. So yes, a majority of poor people in my riding own their own homes. That is a fact.

Why is it that this program will benefit the poor rather than the rich? it is simply because the poor don't have any money. Perhaps that has not gotten across to the Hon. Member opposite. Rich people can convert their heating system to something which will be cheaper. They can do it without assistance. But the poor people cannot. That is why they are poor, Mr. Speaker. They need that kind of assistance. That is the basis of social programs. We help out the people who need it, not just the rich, which is something the Conservatives want to do.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, I very much enjoyed the speech given by the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria). The Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) is not here but it certainly does alarm me to find out how little Hon. Members opposite, and certainly the Hon. Member for Calgary West, understand Canada. That is really horrifying to me. The Hon. Member for Calgary West used half of his speech to talk about job creation in the country within the oil industry. Little does he know, Mr. Speaker, that—

Mr. Blenkarn: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member's question and comment should be made with respect—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Hon. Member wish to speak on a point of order?

Mr. Blenkarn: I think this time is for questions and comments on the speech of the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria), not on what was said or was not said by the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes). Surely that is not the question before us and the Hon. Member is misusing the time, I submit.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly rephrase my comment and say that Hon. Members opposite obviously don't understand what Canada is all about. My province of Prince Edward Island has the highest energy costs in Canada, the highest electricity, oil and gasoline costs.

Mr. Foster: And a Tory Government.

Mr. Henderson: Does the Hon. Member believe for one minute that people who are burning wood for fuel, a renewable resource, are not creating employment in this country? They may not be creating employment in downtown Calgary but they are certainly creating it in my part of the country. Poor people have obviously benefited greatly from the off-oil program; there's no question about that. Not only the poor people are benefiting, those who convert to wood, but also the suppliers of furnaces, chain saws, and skidoos, which most small woodlot owners use to take the wood out to sell. There is a tremendous spin-off and benefit, especially in an area which is depressed. We have a silviculture program which also is a follow up because there is good woodlot management in my area and, hopefully, also in New Brunswick and the other Atlantic Provinces. Sure, we may lose a few jobs in downtown Calgary if the oil industry fluctuates a bit, but we are creating jobs elsewhere. We are creating jobs with renewable energy resources which are just as important as, and probably more important than, oil. Oil is a non-renewable resource. The more that is used, the scarcer it gets and the higher the price.

I am delighted with the speech my colleague gave on this very important subject. I think Hon. Members of the House of Commons have certainly forgotten that they are looking after their own special interests when they deal with just one sector of the energy question. I believe in the ridings of all Hon. Members which are not fortunate enough to be situated in the heart of an industrialized city or province there is a great spin-off, a job-creation effect. Many of our poor people cannot afford to pay $2.20 a gallon for home heating fuel, the price in Prince Edward Island. The Hon. Member probably does not realize it, but for a 250-gallon tank of fuel you are talking about a price of over $500 in Prince Edward Island. Who can afford it?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I want to respond to the excellent comment made by my colleague here. I would just point out that in Prince Edward Island some 312 residential units participated in the CHIP Program with an average grant value of $10,048. In that same province, under the HIP program, some 29,643 residential units received grants of an average value of $9,903 each. So we can see the great benefit this program had in Prince Edward Island.

If I can turn very briefly to the COSP Program in Prince Edward Island, there were $4.4 million in grants. So again, both programs were very effective in Atlantic Canada, indeed everywhere else in the country, including my own riding of Glengarry-Prescott-Russell, and in Ontario generally where over one million homes were reinsulated under the CHIP Program.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any question that every program government has is of some benefit to someone to some extent. That is the case with these two programs we are dealing with here today. There is no question that somewhere along the line people receive something from government. The Hon. Member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson) said that people bought a skidoo and went off in the bush and hauled in wood. I suppose that was good for their health. It certainly gave me the thought that perhaps I could expense a skidoo as part of the cost of my heating. Perhaps I should go into the wood business as a means of writing off my skidoo. Perhaps that is what we can get from these debates as to how government expenditure can be used as a justification for all sorts of fun and games. But rather than fun and games I think we ought to talk seriously about where we should be going in this country.

One of the problems which has bedevilled us, Mr. Speaker, is the Bill which comes before this House all too frequently, the Borrowing Authority Bill. You will recall the impassioned speeches we heard on the Borrowing Authority Bill when it was before this House just a very short time ago. I have not looked up the record but when the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria) spoke eloquently about the burden of debt, how we were running up the national debt and what we should be doing, I am sure he did not speak in favour of more borrowing. Indeed, his Party negotiated vigorously and insisted the Bill be cut back. They said we were spending far beyond all reason. He did not say we should not spend it because, of course, he wants money spent in his own riding. He thinks it is important we spend the money there, but he thought the borrowing was beyond all reason.

Well, Sir, the borrowing is beyond all reason. We must come to grips with government programs. Therefore, I am very delighted that we have finally decided to come to grips with these programs. If these programs could be justified at all, they have now well outlived their usefulness.

When these programs were first initiated, Mr. Speaker, world oil prices were spiralling upwards. There was considerable concern that we would be looking at oil at $60 or $65 U.S. a barrel in 1985. It was absolutely necessary that people be assisted in converting their furnaces to burn something other than oil. In was absoltely essential that people be encouraged to do whatever they could to cut down their consumption of fuels. Hence the CHIP Program.

But, Sir, this is 1985 and Texas light crude is selling in world markets at something between $25.60 and $25.80 U.S. a barrel. That is a bench-mark price for top quality petroleum, but this country pays in excess of $29 U.S. a barrel for top quality petroleum. Indeed, I am told that certain Canadian oil companies with oil production in western Canada have decided that it is profitable for them not to sell in the Chicago market but to ship their crude to Vancouver, load it on a boat, send it around the Panama Canal, and sell it in Montreal at $29 and change a barrel.

Mr. McKnight: Same as we pay the Mexicans.

Mr. Blenkarn: They make a lot more money that way. Same as we pay the Mexicans, says the Minister.

Sir, the whole system has got out of hand. Indeed, we must revise the National Energy Program completely. The first stage is getting rid of these subsidized programs which are no longer valid. The price of oil is decreasing. Indeed, if we were to get rid of the subsidized programs today we would lower the price of gasoline and home heating fuels dramatically in this country. I do hope that the Minister, in her next effort, will be introducing Bills to terminate the programs whereby we pay those who import crude oil into this country more than world prices as part of some sort of national oil policy.

The situation is that we can no longer afford a program which subsidizes people, no matter their wealth, status, quality and kind of living accommodation, to convert their homes to something other than oil heating. For example, they buy a heat pump for $3,000 to $5,000 which enables them not only to save oil but has the added benefit of giving them air conditioning. That is the kind of thing which has taken place time after time in grants under the COSP Program. It was a fine program, but when we wind up with a program which is used to help the relatively affluent to enjoy a better quality of life which air conditioning might provide, or to save them a few dollars on their oil bill which means they might do the conversion anyway because it would save them money, we are in a sense misusing the borrowing, taxing and spending capacity of the country. We transfer money to the relatively affluent in the country, money which they have no call to receive.

It has been suggested by the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell that his constitutents were relatively poor. Even his poorer constituents lived in homes and they needed some assistance in acquiring new heating equipment. Well, that perhaps is so. There is every indication that the cost of the heating units that were promoted in some instances as a result of this program were bonused up to include part of the grant. We should all question to what extent improved heating units have been available because of the grant and to what extent contractors and producers have taken advantage of the grant for promotion purposes. I submit that if the grant had not been available, the number of conversions from oil to other forms of heating would have been very much the same. There is no evidence produced by the Ministry , or any other source, that indicates that some, a good part, or all of this work might not have been done without the expenditure of public funds.

When the program was brought forth there was an implicit worry that things must be accomplished in a hurry because of the worry of rapidly increasing petroleum prices. That has not turned out to be the case. Consequently, we do not have to continue with programs just because they were put in place at one time. Times have changed.

I will deal for a moment with the CHIP Program. That program has been in existence since 1977. It originally started off with relatively old homes. It was extended dramatically during the 1979 election campaign as the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tried to ensure for himself his own seat. He unfortunately could not do that; he is no longer with us. He got involved in other forms of energy in the east after the election. However, that is another matter. In any event, he decided to change the program during the course of that election. He was not successful in garnering many votes, but he changed the program.

At one point the program involved a grant of up to $500 and 100 per cent of the cost of materials. That became subject to astronomical amounts of fraud. I brought one case to the former Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, now the External Affairs critic in the Official Opposition, the Member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien). One of my constituents was taken in by an operator under the CHIP program. He had a mobile home and the operator decided that he would insulate the mobile home for $350. He came around one day with three tubes of caulking cement and proceeded to insulate the mobile home. The bill was $350. He had the invoice all prepared and wanted my constituent to approve it. My constituent decided he would not approve it. Eventually the cheque came from the Ministry for $350. I still have the cheque in my constituency office. My constituent would not pay the bill and the insulating company has yet to take my constituent to court. However, the former Minister, the present Member for Saint-Maurice, could not see anything wrong with the case. He did not think it was a case of fraud. We wanted the courts to decide it, but unfortunately no one wants to take that matter to court. There is no question that the CHIP Program created all sorts of activity in the insulation field whereby insulation contractors managed to skew their invoices in such a way that almost all of the work was billed as material, little was billed as labour, and the CHIP Program was abused and misused.

We all ought to consider realistically what services government should supply to citizens in the normal course. There are some things that people can do for themselves. Indeed, everything should be done by people for themselves as far as possible. It is the job of government to look after the sick, those incapable of looking after themselves, and the old. It is not the job of government to look after those in society who are well and capable of looking after themselves.

That is one of the principal objections to this type of program. This program is an attempt by government to tell people how to spend their money. On that philosophical basis this is a bad program because it does not ask people to look after themselves. It attempts, in the big brother fashion, to direct how people look after themselves, how they live, and how they handle their own affairs. That cannot be the purpose of government. Government has become too large in our society. The function of government must be cut back. This is a prime example of how government function can be cut back.

I commend the Minister for introducing this Bill because it is a first step in cutting back the size, purpose, and direction of government. Ours is not a government of big brother as expressed by the Liberal and New Democratic Parties. The job of this Government is not to tell people how to insulate their homes, what kind of furnace they should have, or how to spend their money. This Government expects people to look after themselves, to be prudent in their affairs, to earn their own money, and to spend their own money as they see fit. It should not be our job to do that for them.

This program, like a number of other government programs, must be eliminated. Even a government which is prepared to say that it has an obligation to look after people from the cradle to the grave would get rid of this program because the price of energy is falling dramatically. As the price of energy falls, the spending of money on energy conservation should fall as well. After all, why spend money trying to conserve something, the price of which is getting lower all the time? Even if a government believed in directing people how to live, why would it spend money on this program?

If a government had huge surpluses it might conceivably spend money on this kind of a program in a transfer back to home owners. That would be something similar to a state dividend. However, the December and January figures which have been circulated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) indicate that for this current fiscal year the Government is borrowing 38 cents for every dollar spent. This means that only 62 cents of every dollar we are spending is from the taxpayer while the rest represents borrowing.

These figures require us to look at every government program, not just the ones under discussion today. I include programs like the Federal Business Development Bank and others with respect to exports with which we are not being very efficient. It includes programs such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We must priorize our objectives in this country.

This particular subsidy program must be eliminated because it is no longer needed and causes undue interference in the way people live. It is a subsidy for relatively affluent Canadians. It is a waste of government funding that increases our deficit. For those reasons, I commend this Bill to the House.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief comment and a question. Why did the Conservative Party not raise its objection to these series of government programs during the election campaign if it is such an important issue to them? To my knowledge, all of their promises concerned offering more programs to Canadians, with relatively few cuts. If they are in favour of cutting programs, why was this not advocated during the election campaign?

The Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) said that I neglected to talk about the deficit during my speech. So as not to disappoint the Hon. Member, let me remind him of some deficit-causing promises made by his Party during the campaign. Hon. Members should recall that 139 Conservative promises would have increased the deficit while seven promises would have reduced it. I thank the Hon. Member for raising that point because it is important for all Members to know where the Tories stood on the deficit during the campaign.

The Hon. Member is of the view that the CHIP Program and COSP Program artificially boosted the prices of such commodities as furnaces. I suggest it is rather ironic that the same Member who says that the free market system does not work in terms of buying furnaces claims that it works well in terms of buying oil. I see that as a very curious contradiction. I find it puzzling that the Hon. Member, who is a right-wing Conservative, would advocate regulating the price of furnaces but not regulating the price of oil.

The Hon. Member for Mississauga South told us the sad story of a particular business operator who attempted to defraud a client. Need I remind him that the consumer protection legislation of the Conservative Government of Ontario is absolutely preposterous. It is no wonder that consumers are being gouped as a result of the lack of proper consumer protection in the Province of Ontario. I am glad that he brought that issue up as well and I hope he raises it with the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations of Ontario.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I am indeed disappointed at the poorly organized objection to my remarks made by the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell. I thought he would have paid better attention to the question of whether these programs did in fact abuse the market-place. He ought to realize that subsidies can lead to price increases that are beyond what is fair in the market-place. However, I understand that he is a critic and his job is not to add too much to the validity of the debate.

Does the Hon. Member sincerely believe that we should continue to have a deficit anywhere from $35 billion to $40 billion? Would he have us continue with these programs because it is the Liberals' attitude that no existing programs should be changed or eliminated no matter what the cost? If that is his Party's position, then there certainly will be some interesting debates in the House.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) was critical of the CHIP Program and the COSP Program because of their influence on how people will spend their money, that they interfere with the market-place and allow too much government involvement. Would he apply the same criteria for tax write-offs to corporations as he would to home owners with regard to grants for insulation?

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I very much agree with the Hon. Member that the use of the tax system to influence the attitude of business people is subject to some serious criticism. Indeed, I have written to the Minister of Finance, as I hope the Hon. Member has, setting out a number of propositions whereby changes might be made to the tax system that would bring more fairness to it and perhaps eliminate a number of propositions that are exceedingly unfair. I hope the Minister will pay attention to some of those suggestions.

I hope the Hon. Member's Party will make some suggestions with respect to particular tax expenditures that might be eliminated. Obviously there is something wrong with the tax expenditure program when it enables some people to use tax expenditures as a means to reduce their income totally. While people may use an expenditure program, I believe it is important to make sure that tax expenditures are not abused. The CHIP and COSP Programs are a direct grant expenditure and should be eliminated as well.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I had difficulty understanding the logic of the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). He seemed to suggest that saving a barrel of oil is not as beneficial as exploring and developing that resource, that only a few barrels of oil are saved. With respect to the COSP Program, 32,000 barrels of oil per day were saved; with respect to CHIP, it was 28,500 barrels of oil per day. These savings continue indefinitely.

I did not read anywhere in the Conservatives' campaign literature that they would either eliminate or reduce the life of the CHIP and COSP Programs. However, the Conservatives indicated that they would eliminate the PIP Program. According to the Estimates, there is $1.6 billion provided for the PIP Program—the program which the Conservatives promised to eliminate. The Conservatives did not say anything about eliminating the COSP or CHIP Programs but are doing so. It seems they are not doing what they said they would and doing what they said they would not do. I know the Hon. Member said that he is very concerned about big government and big spending. I was wondering whether he could identify closely with the article published yesterday in The Toronto Sun by Derek Hodgson which reads:

> Brian Mulroney seems to have an office structure built along the lines of a court of the Russian czars—
> Some malcontents say the only guy working on the third floor of the Parliament buildings is the jut-jawed chappie in the corner office. Everybody else is trying to line up a trip or hire an assistant.

In the operative clause relating to the Hon. Member it reads:

> With a burgeoning budget that has suddenly been bumped by a "tiny" $2.3 million and seen the staff numbers jump from 90 to 120, there has been a growth industry in renaming job titles. Mulroney staffers who short months ago were somebody's assistant are now getting their own office help.

I know the Hon. Member has been very active on the Public Accounts and the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committees, but does he agree with that increase of $2.3 million a year and an increase in the Prime Minister's office staff of 33 per cent, which was so ably described by Mr. Hodgson in yesterday's Toronto Sun?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The second part of the Hon. Member's comments are not relevant to the speech made by the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that I think we have to reduce government expenditures. If the Hon. Member will come to the committee and go after the Prime Minister's expenditures as they come to the committee, I am sure he will have ample opportunity to speak and perhaps we can get from his Party some advice as to what items in the Estimates should be cut back.

On the question of the oil programs, Mr. Speaker, I say to the Hon. Member that we have an enormous deficit. We have programs that are running away from us. What we have to do is have the co-operation of the House in order to reduce those programs. It seems to me that the Petroleum Incentive Program will be up for some pretty serious cutting back. Obviously that program is in place and a Bill has not been introduced to remove it yet. I suggest to the Hon. Member, as I am sure he will discover when he asks the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), that the Petroleum Incentives Program will probably be more seriously cut back than the Estimates would even begin to suggest when the legislation changing the National Energy Program is brought in in final form. The Hon. Member knows that there are negotiations going on with the provinces. He also knows those Bills are very, very complicated. I am sure he will find that before this year is out the promises with respect to that type of expenditure will be gone.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will now resume debate.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this Bill presents more than any other Bill the strange sense of priorities of this Government. We were promised during the election campaign two things. First was jobs, jobs, jobs. Second was the cutting of the deficit. The two might not always be compatible but we should look at them in the sense of promises made by this Government when it sought election last summer. The Government made the announcement two months after the election that it would cut these programs. This was immediately against promises the Government made that it would establish jobs.

One of the basic effects of programs such as the Canadian Oil Substitution Program, the Canadian Home Insulation Program, RRAP and others is that they are programs which are in a sense partly job-creation programs. There has not been any government program other than these three I have mentioned—and I include RRAP because it deals also with homes, as do the other two—that the Government has put before the people that has had a greater direct effect and indirect effect on job creation. If a person uses this grant program, $800 comes from the Government, and the individual in most cases making use of the program has to put in considerably more than that, perhaps as much as $2,000 or $3,000.

A good portion of the money was spent directly on jobs and the rest was spent on the purchase of materials, an indirect creation of jobs. The furnaces and the lines that were put in were in most cases made in Canada. It has been suggested that three times as much money was spent in these programs than was actually made in the form of a grant.

The announcement two months after the election that the Government was going to eliminate these programs indicates that the Government has no intention of making use of government funds for job creation. It is almost incredible that the Government would not recognize that this program is a better job-creation program than any of the money the Government has put forward in its so-called billion dollar programs that have been announced in the last few weeks. The Government could very easily have transferred these three programs to job-creation programs and made better use of the money it is spending than it is doing in its present job-creation programs. In fact, the Government could fulfil one of the main requirements which the Minister has been saying about job creation. We need to use the private sector in these programs. With the $800 grant for oil substitution, the total bill was more like $3,000. The private sector put in the extra money for job creation; job creation directly for the fellow who put in the furnace and job creation indirectly for the materials purchased in order to instal the furnace.

This applies even more so with the Canadian Home Insulation Program. As most Members will know, the Canadian Home Insulation Program paid for 60 per cent of the labour. There was already a requirement from the private sector of 40 per cent to be put into labour, plus all of the materials that were required, of which you could also claim a certain portion in a grant.

In the few minutes I have, I want to put before this House the proposition that the Government, instead of cutting off these programs, would do far more for the country if it extended them. The Government could move them to another department if necessary, but we should keep them and expand them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the Hon. Member that he has 14 minutes remaining this afternoon.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

SIX MONTHS' ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, six months ago today, the Canadian people gave the Conservatives an overwhelming mandate to govern the country. Let us take a moment to analyse what the Government has accomplished, or not accomplished, so far.

One of its first acts, on November 8 when it tabled its economic statement, was intended to put the axe to just about every good program the Liberals had established. Thanks to the Liberal Opposition, the universality programs remained untouched. The previously cancelled 1986 census was reinstated following pressures by Liberals, thus creating 40,000 jobs.

One Minister resigned. Another one or two should have resigned following their involvement in the Hatfield affair. Porkbarrelling has taken a new, undreamed of dimension, competence not being a criterion for appointment.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has adopted a dictatorship approach in running the country, increasing the operation budget of his office by 57 per cent, continuously overriding his Ministers whose role is now more or less that of puppets, and spending millions of dollars to change the uniforms of our Armed Forces, money that could have gone to the needy people of the country. We could go on and on speaking of the unkept promises of the Government. It would seem that the biggest accomplishment of the Prime Minister over the last six months has been his daily comedy session during Question Period. He laughs at his own jokes, spends his hard-earned money in Florida to boost the U.S. economy, and then ridicules Canadian industry in Fortune magazine.

GOVERNMENT AID TO DOMTAR—LIBERAL PARTY'S POSITION

Mr. Pierre H. Cadieux (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, last week we were treated to a new Liberal version of the about-face the Liberals were so fond of when they were in power and were governing by opinion poll.

Mr. Speaker, last week, we heard the worthy Liberal Members from Quebec, the silent and consenting majority on Bill S-31, protest the Conservative Government's realistic and wise decision to deny direct subsidies to a company as sound and profitable as Domtar. However, despite the indignant cries of the Quebec Liberal caucus, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner), when asked about the matter, did not support his worthy Members led by the bellwether politician from the riding of Bourassa (Mr. Rossi). What a marvelous example of Liberal logic and solidarity we were treated to last week!

This is all the more reason for us to celebrate our first six months of sound government.

FIGHT FOR EQUALITY

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, today is the first day of International Women's Week. It is a time to celebrate women's solidarity in our long struggle for equality.

[English]

As we approach the end of the United Nations International Decade for Women, can we say that progress has been made? When the wage gap between Canadian men and women is virtually unchanged, when the federal Government still refuses to enforce its own equal pay guidelines and when men continue to outnumber women on government boards and commissions, can we say that progress has been made?

When women are still fighting for control over their own bodies in the raging battle over freedom of choice on abortion, when 62 per cent of single, elderly women, and 42 per cent of families headed by women still live below the poverty line, when the Conservative Government has still not addressed the issue of technological change, when millions of women's jobs in the clerical and service sectors are expected to disappear by 1990, can we say that progress has been made?

When the women of the world who represent one-third of the official labour force, account for nearly two-thirds of all working hours, receive only one-tenth of world income, and own less than 1 per cent of world property, can we say that progress has been made?

Women everywhere are still second-class citizens. This week the New Democratic Party will be meeting women's groups across Canada to hear their priorities for action. We urge the Conservative Government—

Mr. Speaker: I advise the Hon. Member that her time has expired.

REAL ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE GOVERNMENT

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil-Papineau): Mr. Speaker, today our Government is celebrating the fact it has been in power for six months, and I want to take this opportunity to tell my constituents in Argenteuil-Papineau how proud and honoured I am to represent them in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, I was absolutely astonished to hear Liberal Members say in the House that this Government has done nothing of any consequence since it came to power. Allow me to recall the sad story of the Mirabel expropriations. The previous Government had wittingly and unnecessarily proceeded with the expropriation of 80,000 acres of the best arable land in Quebec, which led to one of the most violent protest actions Canada has known for many years. Unwilling to admit that their unrealistic project to make Mirabel one of the busiest airports in the world had failed because of poor planning, the Liberals maintained this confrontation with expropriated land owners so as not to lose face before the Canadian public.

An article published recently in the press pointed out how remarkable it was for a Government that had been in power for only four months to have been able to find a solution to a problem that the previous administration had been unable to resolve in 15 years. Now, Mr. Speaker, residents and expropriated land owners can start to live again.

I shall conclude by saying that the people of the riding of Argenteuil-Papineau are very pleased with the performance of this Government, and I might add, with respect, that I prefer my constituents' views to those of Hon. Members opposite whose speeches have reflected the general frustration of the Liberals since their crushing defeat last September 4.

CITIZENSHIP

THE CASE OF ERNST ZUNDEL

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak this afternoon about Ernst Zundel, who was convicted last week in Toronto in connection with the publication of defamatory material denying the holocaust. In doing so, I am taking account of the rule of sub judice. I have looked at the precedents this morning and have satisfied myself that, because a judgment has been rendered and because as yet no appeal has been launched, it is appropriate to comment in the House about the case.

I should like to remind Hon. Members that my Party has stood for the concept of fighting hate literature through the use of the Criminal Code. We introduced provisions to make it a crime to propagate hate literature. I know those provisions were not used in this case. I regret that and, as Members will recall, before the election we had amendments on the Order Paper to change the hate literature laws, to make them more open, and to make convictions more possible.

Having said that, I want to note also from what I have read that Ernst Zundel is not a Canadian citizen. If matters continue, as it appears they will, I want to indicate for my Party that we consider this a case in which recourse should be had to deportation.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TAXPAYERS' RIGHTS

Mr. William C. Winegard (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk about the Department of National Revenue. During the weekend, a number of my constituents spoke to me about the declaration of taxpayers' rights.

today is the six-month anniversary of our election victory, and this action by a Minister is an example of the Government's intention to follow through with the spirit of our election campaign. The Minister responsible for the statement is a neighbour of mine. I knew about his determination to return to the people of Canada their natural rights in the taxation area. I applaud and thank my friend, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Beatty). This was done in less than six months.

Perhaps I could explain why I am wearing a surgical collar at this time. When one sits in such a draft for five months, one is bound occasionally to get a pain in the neck.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are asking themselves whether it can really be six months since the Liberal Party of Canada was sent into the political twilight zone. On September 4 last the people of Canada voted for change, and the Tories promised a new beginning and eternal bliss. After six months Canadians are still at the altar, still waiting.

Certainly there has been a change of a sort. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) has given us change—it began as a dollar bill and now it is just spare change.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has shown some change as well. He has changed his mind about universality; in fact he has changed his mind a couple of times about universality. He has changed his mind about the rights of the Auditor General to have access to government documents and about parliamentary review of political appointments. He has changed his mind about the use of higher interest rates to prop up the dollar. He has changed his mind about openness in Government, by gagging civil servants. Yes, Mr. Speaker, he has changed Defence Ministers.

• (1410)

The Prime Minister has become known as a changeling. It was not long ago that our neighbours to the South were asking their politicians a simple question: where's the beef? After six months of the Tories, we have found the bull.

SIX MONTHS' ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Bill Gottselig (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, today marks the six-month anniversary of the Government's election to office with the largest majority ever given a political Party in Canada. All Canadians from coast to coast are now being represented in Government as well as having representation at the Cabinet level where we in Saskatchewan had no elected representation for almost a decade.

Much has been achieved in this short space of time. I point to the long awaited changes to the Western Grain Stabilization Act, voluntary metric so farmers will be able to have dual labelling on agricultural chemicals, the establishment of a drought assistance program with the prairie provinces, the signing of the Atlantic Accord with the Province of Newfoundland as an equal partner, the signing of the offshore development fund agreement with Nova Scotia, and the reforestation agreement with Alberta. Legislation has been passed to simplify tax procedures for small businesses. The concept of universality in our social programs has again been confirmed.

At the First Ministers' conference recently held in Regina, the change was most evident. There is a positive atmosphere of co-operation and consultation between the provinces and the federal Government as a result of the new direction taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). My constituents join with me in applauding the Prime Minister for initiating this new direction.

EXCHANGE VALUE OF DOLLAR

Mr. Carlo Rossi (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said repeatedly, when he was on this side of the House and throughout the election campaign last summer, that the value of the Canadian dollar was directly related to Canada's image abroad, and that the value of our dollar is directly proportionate to the confidence of foreign investors in Canada.

Considering the dramatic and historic drop of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the American dollar, I wish to inform the House and the Canadian people that for once I share the views of the Prime Minister. He is right. The dramatic drop in our dollar does indeed demonstrate the lack of confidence of investors in his party and his Conservative Government. Mr. Speaker, what is even worse is the attitude and behaviour of a Prime Minister who prefers to vacation abroad instead of dealing with a situation that is getting steadily worse, because while our dollar is dropping, interest rates are rising.

SIX MONTHS' ANNIVERSARY

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, anniversaries are a special time, a time to pause, to celebrate the achievements of the past, to gain strength from those accomplishments, and to look forward with optimism to the future. That is why it is a special privilege today for me to acknowledge and celebrate the six-month anniversary of the election of a new Government for our great country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Collins: It would take many minutes to put on record the accomplishments of these first six months, so in the 90 seconds allotted to me I will only point out my pride in our Government's commitment to consultation and co-operation. There has been consultation and co-operation with the provinces, as evidenced by the Regina conference and the Atlantic Accord, and there has been consultation and co-operation with all Canadians, as evidenced by the consultation papers on economic renewal, trade, housing, child and elderly benefits, tourism, and small business. Ministers and private Members have been meeting with groups and individuals from all parts of the country on these topics, listening and responding to their input and views.

This past weekend the British Columbia caucus spent two days in Burnaby, British Columbia, hearing from over 20 groups and individuals on a wide range of issues. They expressed their appreciation of the Government, a Government which listens and cares. It is in this spirit of co-operation and consultation that we shall continue to develop policies which reflect not only the knowledge of the experts but the views and feelings of Canadians across the land. We shall continue to fulfil our pledge: "Together, we can do it better."

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

CALL FOR OPEN HEARING

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, there has been a recent series of articles about how the Atomic Energy Control Board has failed to regulate the nuclear industry. It has allowed dangerous levels of operation for nuclear plants. It has allowed workers to be exposed to radioactive materials and to inhale radioactive dust. It has allowed radioactive material to be left in communities like Port Hope, and it has allowed the storage of nuclear waste where there are no safe facilities.

Last year in the House I asked the then Minister of Energy, the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), a number of questions about why AECB was increasing the allowable level of exposure for workers, and particularly for pregnant women. Hearings on the matter were held behind closed doors. It is obvious that AECB is ineffective in controlling the atomic energy field in Canada. It is obvious that we need open hearings at which we can discuss the role of the Atomic Energy Control Board, and that these hearings must take place now.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

IMPORT QUOTAS ON JAPANESE MANUFACTURED VEHICLES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to ask a question of the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, or the Minister for International Trade. However, the Minister of Finance will have to do.

Last week Statistics Canada reported that we had a very strong period of growth during 1984, with the exception of the period of time from the beginning of September until December. We know that that growth was driven in large part by major investments and sales in the automobile industry. That progress has now been put in jeopardy by the actions of the President of the United States who has removed any form of quotas on Japanese automobiles, thereby affecting the entire North American market.

I see that the Minister for International Trade is now in his seat. He may wish to answer the question. With that very important development made by the United States President, can we now have the Government present its position? Will the Government follow the Americans? Will it negotiate for new investments? Will it maintain the quotas? In other words, does the Government have a position, and will it put that position before Parliament before it is too late?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the Hon. Member that we are certainly aware of the President's decision. I had an opportunity to discuss it more fully with Mr. Brock this past weekend, while in Germany. Now that I have returned, I will be discussing the matter with my Cabinet colleagues, and particularly with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. We hope to arrive at a decision, certainly before the end of March, and we will advise the Hon. Member at that time.

REMOVAL OF UNITED STATES' QUOTAS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. We have heard a great deal about the alleged special relationship between the United States and Canada that has been developed over the past several months. Can the Minister tell us if President Reagan did in fact consult directly with the Prime Minister before this announcement was made? If so, did we make our concerns known at that time? What was the nature of those consultations? In other words, were we treated properly as partners under the Auto Pact before the United States went ahead and made its decision last Friday?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say specifically whether or not the President of the United States advised the Prime Minister of his decision prior to making it public. However, I can tell the Hon. Member that Mr. Brock certainly kept us involved as to their ongoing discussions, and we were fully cognizant of all the options they were considering. As well, I can tell the Hon. Member that, when Canada makes a decision, it will be a decision that will be in the best interests of Canada.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH JAPAN

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, that is the best news we have heard in the House for a long time. If the Minister was in fact in consultation with his American counterpart, and therefore knew that such a decision was forthcoming, why then has he not begun direct negotiations with the Japanese to procure the kind of agreements and trade concessions that the Americans have apparently gained in the area of wood items, and other areas as well, so that we would also be in a position to make sure that the best interests of this country were protected, both by increased Japanese investment in the automobile industry and by further trade concessions and arrangements with Japan?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to and I hope I did not mislead the hon. gentleman in any way. Mr. Brock certainly did not tell us in advance what would be the decision of the President. The Americans informed us that they were attempting to arrive at a decision and that there were a number of options.

I can also tell the Hon. Member that, when I was in Japan several weeks ago, I brought it to their attention that, if they wished to receive consideration from us, they should consider further investment in Canada.

EXPIRY OF QUOTA ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister for International Trade. There are approximately three and a half weeks left before the present Japanese quota arrangements expire. Why will the Minister not say right now that he and the Government will not allow Japanese automobile imports to swamp the Canadian market, which will wipe out tens of thousands of Canadian jobs and all the economic growth which happened last year, growth which, according to Statistics Canada, was mainly due to the progress in the Canadian automobile industry? Why will the Minister not give that clear signal right now to the Japanese, to show that he really wants to protect Canadian workers?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, again I can advise the Hon. Member that we are well aware of the concerns of the workers and the industries in Canada. My colleague, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, prior to his departure for the Far East, held a number of meetings with Mr. White, the auto manufacturers, and the parts manufacturers. We are well briefed on their concerns, and we will make a decision in due course, prior to the expiration of the voluntary restraints.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF QUOTAS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the first time all the major players in the Canadian automobile industry met with the Minister was two weeks ago. I do not think that is enough in the interest of this major Canadian industry. It is not a very good signal about consultation.

Will the Minister tell the Japanese right now that the quotas will have to be extended unless the Japanese enter into arrangements which are equivalent to those required of North American automobile manufacturers under the Auto Pact, for investment, purchasing, production and jobs in Canada, as recommended by the automotive task force which was set up by the previous Government, which represented a unanimous consensus of the workers, automobile manufacturers, and car parts manufacturers? Why will the Minister not speak up right now and make that commitment in the interests of the Canadian people and Canadian workers?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would not want the Hon. Member to think that we have waited until the last several weeks to discuss problems of this nature with the auto industry. Late last fall I personally met with Mr. Lavelle and the major auto manufacturers. In any event, it is the strategy and purpose of this Government, before making decisions, to discuss things properly, and to investigate all of the issues.

JAPANESE INVESTMENT IN CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister for International Trade. Does the Minister recognize that among almost all of the industrialized nations in the world Canada stands alone as being the only nation in which the Japanese auto industry has not moved to make substantial investment? Does the Minister not recognize that if we do give up the quotas we will not have a lever to use to extract from them the kind of investment in Canada which we need in order to balance investment in the North American continent? Why is it that the Minister is unable to tell us what the Government's policy is, given that he has known for six months that the issue was before him, that he has known the circumstances for the last six months, and that now, with three weeks left to go, he is still talking to his fellow Ministers about a solution?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can only tell the Hon. Member that we are well aware of the problem and the implications. We have been holding discussions. When those discussions are concluded and we have arrived at a decision, I will be more than pleased to advise him.

REQUEST FOR JAPANESE INVESTMENT GUARANTEES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, that sounds so much like the answers I received when I asked Liberal Ministers questions about the same problem two years ago. Will the Minister—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Well, the NDP has not progressed far either.

Mr. Deans: We are closer to you.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: Geographically.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Deans: In the interest of allaying the fears of those who are involved in the Canadian automobile industry, will the Minister state today that there will be no lifting of the quotas until there are substantial guarantees of Japanese auto investment in Canada?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, again I can only reiterate what I have already said. We are discussing the problem, and an answer will be forthcoming. When the decision is made it will be a solution that is in the best interests of Canada and not some other country.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GOVERNMENT'S OFFICIAL LETTER TO DOMTAR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, according to the media this morning, the Prime Minister personally met the President of Domtar, Mr. James Smith, in the middle of February to inform him that Ottawa had turned down the requested regional development subsidy. It will of course not be easy to obtain confirmation of this meeting, but meanwhile, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he would be willing to table in the House the Government's official letter to Domtar turning down the subsidy, so that we can see whether it alludes to other forms of government aid that might help Domtar renovate its facilities at its Windsor mill in Quebec.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, although the Hon. Member seems to think we could not confirm such a meeting, I can give him the assurance there was a meeting between the Prime Minister and the President of Domtar, but since I was not present, I cannot disclose what transpired. However, the meeting did take place, and I imagine that both parties explained their positions.

DOMTAR—NEED FOR QUEBEC TO BE REPRESENTED BY ANOTHER MINISTER

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, after an answer as vague as this one, I think I can ask the Deputy Prime Minister the following question: In light of the clumsy manner in which the Domtar case has been dealt with to date, does the Deputy Prime Minister not think it is high time there were some changes made in the Department so that a more responsible, stronger and more competent Minister can represent Quebecers on economic issues in this Government?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, all information submitted to the Government on the Domtar case has been examined. Looking at the sequence of events, the first issue was the subsidy itself. The Prime Minister, following the decision announced by the Government, made it very clear to this House that he was going to meet with the Premier of Quebec and that this subject would be on the agenda.

I would therefore ask my hon. friends opposite to wait until talks between the two first Ministers have taken place instead of jumping to conclusions the nature of which, for the time being, is not factual but political and as such, to no one's advantage.

INCOME TAX

TAXATION OF UPPER-INCOME GROUP

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, who is no doubt aware that this is the six-month anniversary of the election of the Conservative Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I did my best to set up the Government House Leader, as he needs all the assistance he can get.

Considering that the Government promised not merely new rhetoric but fairness, and considering that the Minister of Finance said on the weekend, according to the reports—and I know he corrects them from time to time—that there would be no increase in taxes, and that at the same time a report from Statistics Canada indicated that upper-income Canadians are still reaping immense tax advantages, will the Government at least re-establish the tax level of upper-income Canadians to what it was before the Liberals reduced their tax burden a couple of years ago to give them an immense advantage over the rest of Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Leader of the New Democratic Party has drawn to the House's attention that this is the six-month anniversary of our election to power. I just want to advise the Hon. Member and his colleagues that there have been quite a lot of things achieved during this period; the spousal allowance—

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is question and answer period. Statements come later.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I do have an awful lot of things here, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to get on the record.

Mr. Nielsen: He had time to put the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It will only take me about 15 minutes, but out of deference to your wishes, Mr. Speaker, I will forgo that long list and respond to the Hon. Member's question this way. The whole matter of tax reform is going to be dealt with in the Budget this spring, and I would hope that a number of the questions which the Hon. Member has raised over the past few months will be addressed. We have very much of a like mind about some of those things. You would be surprised.

Mr. Broadbent: It's not a question of having a like mind. It's a question of getting action. That is what the people of Canada want on this issue.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is why they rejected your Party so wholeheartedly.

EMPLOYMENT

FUNDING OF JOBS FOR WOMEN

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Another important aspect of fairness which the Government promised during the course of the election campaign was directed to the fate of Canadian women, particularly those in the workplace. My question concerns the reality that 42 per cent of the labour market is made up of women but they are receiving a much smaller percentage of the jobs which are directly funded by the federal Government. If the federal Government wants to deliver in a concrete way on a specific promise, will the Minister ensure that 42 per cent of the federally funded jobs go to Canadian women, who want nothing more, but nothing less than their share of employment opportunities?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear the question put forward by the Hon. Member. I would say to him that the Prime Minister announced in Regina that the Government of Canada had accepted in principle the principle of employment equity as outlined in Judge Abella's report. I will be giving the details of the Government's response later this week.

I might also remind the Hon. Member that, since the Government came to office, a number of other steps have been taken which have been of tremendous benefit to women. For instance, we have introduced—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Miss MacDonald: —the amendments to the spouse's allowance which will affect—

Mr. Speaker: With great respect—

Miss MacDonald: I can tell him a good many things which have been done in this regard.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say to the Minister, with all due respect, as one says in this place, that it is not the principles of the Prime Minister which concern me, it is his practice.

RATIO OF WOMEN IN LABOUR FORCE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I go back to my question specifically. The Minister well knows that, of the part-time labour force, for example, who are given a bad deal in terms of over-all benefits, 72 per cent are women. Most of the people affected by technological change are women. In short, more needs to be done if we believe in equality. Since women make up 42 per cent of the labour force, will the Government ensure that 42 per cent of the jobs directly funded by the federal Government go to women?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member of the New Democratic Party said that more needs to be done. I completely agree with him. It is for that reason today that I announced that there is an increase in dependent care allowance for children—

Mr. Deans: What has that got to do with 42 per cent of the money?

Miss MacDonald: —of parents—that is, single mothers—who are in training programs. For instance, a woman with two children who received $80 a week now will receive $150 a week—almost double—because we are concerned that women who are in the labour force, or who hope to get into the labour force, will get the breaks which they need. I would ask the Hon. Member to wait until later this week to hear the total response to the Abella report.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MULTICULTURALISM

ESTIMATES FOR DEPARTMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance said he could speak for 15 minutes about what his Government has done. We on this side of the House can spend two days telling him what it has not done.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We noticed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Marchi: Last June, in Toronto, the Prime Minister boasted that his Government would increase federal funding to the multiculturalism directorate. Last week's Estimates, however, revealed the real priority which his Government attaches to multiculturalism. That Ministry was cut by $2.2 million, which represents almost 9 per cent of its total budget. How can the Minister's Government justify promising ethno-cultural communities that it would increase the presence of multiculturalism within the federal Government, and then move to reduce seriously the financial life blood of multiculturalism? How can the Deputy Prime Minister explain this regressive flip-flop to the ethnic communities of the country?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister responsible for multiculturalism is absent today, and in view of the importance of the Hon. Member's question and the length of the response which would be necessary, I would be happy to take the question as notice and inform the Minister upon his return to the House.

Mr. Marchi: I would think that the Deputy Prime Minister would be important enough to answer, Mr. Speaker. The Estimates are there for everyone to see. They have been confirmed by the Government.

SIZE OF BUDGET

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): With respect to my initial question, given the fact that the Government has made a multitude of promises and commitments to the multicultural part of Canada, how can it now justify reducing the budget for multiculturalism to a substantial degree? How will Government approach these same communities now? How can it have that credibility?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there are many areas in which we have made progress during the last six months. The multicultural area is one of them. With respect to the details asked for today by the Hon. Member, I am sure that, in all reason, he would not expect me to be familiar with the Estimates of each and every single Department of Government. I would suggest that the reasonable course for the Hon. Member would be to wait until the Minister responsible returns to the House for the answer to the very important question he raises.

SMALL BUSINESS

WOMEN'S ACCESS TO CREDIT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the Minister of State for Small Businesses. It deals with the excellent record of women entrepreneurs in our society. During the election debate on women's issues the Prime Minister stated: "The problem for women is that they don't have equal access to credit with the lending institutions" and, second: "There must be very strong action by the federal Government as the regulator to ensure that those women involved in small business have fair and equal access to credit". Does the Minister agree with these statements? If so, where is the concrete action to ensure that women are given equal access to credit?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Small Businesses is absent today because, as I am sure the Hon. Member would be interested in knowing, he is on a tour across Canada and meeting with various groups to discuss—

Mr. Tobin: He was here this morning. He is here.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —a number of questions, some of which have been raised by the Hon. Member today. I am sure that the Minister of State for Small Businesses, when he returns to the House, would be very happy to respond specifically to that question.

CONTENT OF DISCUSSION PAPER

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister agree that, if women entrepreneurs were given the opportunity to participate on an equal footing, they would be able to do even better at providing jobs in our country? If he does agree, would he tell us why the Government did not include in the Small Businesses Loans Act, and in the discussion paper on small business, a concentration on women?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, unlike the Hon. Member's Party, we have great faith in the ability of women to get credit.

Ms. Jewett: Where have you been?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): One of the things which I have found out, in the many meetings which I have had with different groups across the country, is that there is a growing realization and understanding of the success of businesses which are run by women, and the success which they have had in creating employment over the last little while. This is recognized by people in the financial community, and they are responding now to the success performance of women in our country.

PUBLIC WORKS

EXPROPRIATION OF LAND AT MIRABEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil-Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works.

The Minister and all Members of this House have witnessed what I would refer to as the monstrous land expropriations at Mirabel. Could the Minister inform the House whether negotiations on settlement proposals with expropriated landowners, residents and the Town of Mirabel are about to reach a satisfactory conclusion?

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to inform the House today that a general proposal on the sale-back of land to expropriated landowners will be announced within a year, and also and I think all my colleagues will be happy to hear this—that ninety per cent of the consultation work and the work on the proposal that will be announced shortly has been completed.

I realize the Hon. Member is very interested in how the settlement is progressing, and I hope that with the co-operation of the expropriated landowners, I will be in a position to announce this general proposal before the end of this session.

PREMIER'S TRIAL—PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF MARIJUANA FIND

Mr. John Nunziata (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and concerns the Richard Hatfield marijuana case which was rendered a miscarriage of justice by the Conservative Government.

The Prime Minister has consistently refused to tell this House and Canadians when he was first made aware that marijuana was found in Premier Hatfield's luggage. One can only conclude that he is hiding something and is stonewalling. I would like to ask the Solicitor General when he first advised the Prime Minister that marijuana was found in Premier Hatfield's luggage. Was it on September 26 when he was informed by the Commissioner of the RCMP that the marijuana was found?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): The reason I am rising to reply, Mr. Speaker, is that I informed the Prime Minister the day before the charges were laid that charges were to be laid against Premier Hatfield. That is when the Prime Minister first heard about the matter. Naturally, he made no attempt to intervene or influence the course of events in any manner whatsoever.

DATE INQUIRY

Mr. John Nunziata (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of when the Prime Minister found out that a charge would be laid. What I am asking, for the umpteenth time, is when was the Prime Minister first made aware that the marijuana was found? Was he told by the Solicitor General, by Premier Hatfield, or was he told by Dalton Camp?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is so blind, deaf, and dumb to the requirements of justice that he cannot understand English. He was told the day before the charges were laid that marijuana was allegedly found in the possession of Premier Hatfield and that charges would be laid. That is when the Prime Minister was told. If I had thought of it, I might have told the hon. gentleman as well.

GOVERNMENT AID TO DOMTAR

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. I wonder whether he could give the House the assurance that the options considered by the Government for helping Domtar included purchasing securities that would make the Government of Canada a shareholder in this company. Could he also give the House the assurance that the policy announced by his Minister in November and denied by the Prime Minister last week, will not be used to discriminate against Domtar on the basis that it is a "branch" of a Quebec Crown corporation?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, to answer the question by the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre, I simply wish to recall what the Prime Minister said last week when he clearly indicated to the House that he intended to discuss with the Premier of Quebec various ways of helping Domtar. The Prime Minister also made it clear that the shareholding aspect was not a key factor in the decision made by his Government.

IMPORTANT ECONOMIC PROJECTS FOR QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the President of the Treasury Board. Since he has said that the Government has rejected the option of becoming a shareholder, since the Department's policy is to refuse to give subsidies to this company, and considering that all Quebec Cabinet Ministers have been kept out of this affair, how does the Government intend to pursue economic projects of any importance and scope for the province of Quebec in the future? Surely the Prime Minister can do something.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre is talking about assumptions as though they were facts. None of these assumptions has been supported by some statement made on this side of the House. We have clearly said that we were going to have consultations with the Government of Quebec. The Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Quebec will be meeting later this week to look into various options for helping Domtar. This, of course, in a situation where the present Government must cope with the tremendous burden of public debt and the cost of servicing that debt, a legacy from the previous Government which itself did nothing during the many months it was considering Domtar's application. We shall therefore be looking at what can be done.

AIRPORTS

TRANSPORTATION ACCESS TO VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Consistent with the spirit of consultation and co-operation which have been the hallmarks of the first six months of this Government's administration—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Author.

Mrs. Collins: —could the Minister advise the House of the outcome of his Department's consultations with the various groups interested in providing an upgraded, high quality transportation service to and from Vancouver International Airport, including a luxury cab and limousine service, so that such services can be available well in advance of the great influx of visitors to Vancouver to participate in Expo 86?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, I am sure, it was the intention of Transport Canada to call for tenders for limousine service out of Vancouver International Airport. However, there were some concerns expressed about the manner in which the tenders were being called and, as a result, it has been decided to postpone the tendering process pending further discussions between Transport Canada officials, representatives of the Cities of Vancouver and Richmond, and the British Columbia Motor Carrier Commission. Those discussions are taking place today, and they will hopefully provide the terms of reference for a public forum to resolve the matter fully.

POTATO INSPECTION FEES

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question concerning agriculture to the President of the Treasury Board, who is a partner in crime in this serious inspection fee problem we have with potatoes in the Province of Prince Edward Island. The Minister will know that for a number of weeks now officials of his Department and of the Department of Agriculture have been meeting with the provincial Government, the Potato Producers Association, and the Potato Marketing Board, to consider the proposed cost recovery increases, as the Minister calls them. As of Saturday, Mr. Speaker, Prince Edward island producers are selling potatoes at two cents a pound below cost. Will the Minister stand in his place today and tell the potato producers of this country that he will not impose any such fees on the backs of farmers?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to reply to the Hon. Member that I have had numerous representations on the issue. I understand well the concern of the potato producers in that province. The matter is under advisement and under very active discussion between myself and the Minister of Agriculture. I hope we will be able to reach a point where a specific declaration can be made very shortly.

REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the proposed increases are to go into effect April 1. There is dumping of potatoes in Prince Edward Island today because of those proposed fees. Will the Minister postpone any such increases until September 1 in the next crop year?

● (1450)

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Minister, in conjunction with the Minister of Agriculture, will ensure that whatever moves the Government takes are consistent with national interest and with the great need that we have, because of the poor administration of the previous Government, to bring our deficit under control.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EQUAL ACCESS BY WOMEN

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the President of the Treasury Board.

[Translation]

At the meeting last week in Montreal attended by the Leader of the New Democratic Party and the Fédération des femmes du Québec, the Fédération expressed its concern about the fact that the Minister responsible for the Status of Women in Canada had decided to abolish the committee on equal opportunities for women in the Public Service. Mr. Speaker, my question is as follows: Could the Minister now reinstate this committee on equal opportunities in the Public Service for Canadian women?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that the whole question of equal opportunities for women in the Public Service is not under review. This is a matter of the utmost importance to our Government. I think the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who is responsible for the Abella Report and who said earlier that she would be making a statement this week in the House on a number of measures that the Conservative Government intends to take, is handling this matter very well, and she has my full support.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. The Minister has yet to answer my question, and I shall repeat it. The Government now has a committee on equal opportunities for women in the Public Service, and the Minister responsible announced last week that he wanted to abolish this committee. Is the Minister prepared to reinstate this committee for Canadian women? It is a very important committee.

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, to answer my hon. friend's question, I can inform him that this Government intends to act quickly to establish a system that will provide fairer and more equitable recognition of the equality of women throughout the public service, Government's Crown corporations and agencies and all its activities, than was the case under the system established by the previous government.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

SIZE OF BUDGET—STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTER

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of State for Finance. The Minister of State was quoted this morning as saying that the Government may reduce the budget of the Canada Post Corporation, a statement which must have an unsettling effect on the delicate labour negotiations now under way. Is it Government policy that any salary increases now negotiated may in fact be rescinded through budget cuts after the negotiation process is concluded?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member should like to rephrase her question because that is not what my colleague said over the weekend. What she did say was in the context of the cost control exercise that the Government is going through, and will continue to go through. All elements of government spending are under review. That includes Crown corporations as well as the government services.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, if Ministers on the other side would say what they mean, we would not be constantly asking for clarification.

LABOUR NEGOTIATIONS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): In view of the fact that the Minister's unfortunate remarks were subject to the kind of interpretation I gave, will the Minister now confirm that there was no intention by the Government to derail what could be a satisfactory settlement which would avoid the severe economic costs of a postal strike?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are quite encouraged by the way the negotiations are developing between Canada Post and the union. We have no intention of trying to do anything to upset those negotiations. As the Hon. Member knows, they are in a very delicate state, but we are confident that the results will be quite satisfactory for all Canadians.

FOOD AND DRUGS

GENERIC DRUG NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Will he confirm to the House that negotiations which will restrict the production of generic drugs in Canada, and thus substantially increase the price of prescription drugs, have been going on between the Government, the Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association, and the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, to the exclusion of groups such as the Consumers Association of Canada, in advance of the publication of the Eastman Report which was commissioned to provide information on what is going on and what is needed?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the Hon. Member's question, I can inform him we have been advised that talks are being held by various groups of companies, including manufacturers of generic drugs and the pharmaceutical companies, for the purpose of reaching a compromise on this difficult issue of pharmaceutical products.

[English]

LICENCE APPLICATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister did not indicate whether his Department, or any other Department, is involved in these discussions. The Minister knows that the use of generic drugs has saved the people of Canada tens of millions of dollars.

Have applications for new licensing of generic drugs been frozen for 90 days? This action could mean the end of the industry and lead to tremendous increases in costs to the Canadian consumer.

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the Hon. Member that, in fact, no licensing applications have been frozen for any period of time whatsoever and that all applications are being processed as usual.

EXTERNAL AID

CIDA—PROGRAM TO RECLAIM DESERT LANDS IN AFRICA

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for External Affairs and the Minister of External Relations, I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday two of the Government's emissaries, Mr. David MacDonald and Mr. Stephen Lewis, returned from the Sudan and warned that the famine in that part of the world will take on even greater proportions if relief efforts are not renewed. In essence, they called on Canadians to contribute more.

Last Friday, in response to a question I put to the Minister of External Relations, she refused to promise that a CIDA program, destined to reclaim land from the desert in Africa, would not be cancelled. How can the Government justify even considering cancelling such a program which is designed to reclaim lands from the desert in Africa and, on the other hand, ask Canadians to contribute more?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we are very much concerned with the news that has been revealed by Mr. MacDonald recently and have that matter under active consideration. When any announcements are to be made, I am sure that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or the Minister of State, will make those announcements.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, that is the same kind of fuzzy answer that we got on Friday. At that time, and I think in contempt for this House, the Minister answered that she did not think she had any obligation to announce such a program in the House.

REQUEST THAT PROGRAM NOT BE CANCELLED

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Will the Deputy Prime Minister give his Government's commitment today that the $25 million project to irrigate the Sahel will not be cancelled and that Canada, through its Government, will continue its crucial work, using Canadian advanced technology, to combat starvation in Africa?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the efforts of Canada in the field of foreign aid are the private, personal preserve of any particular Member of the House or of any particular political Party. Canada can take pride in those efforts which it has exerted in the foreign aid field. Those who start programs which assist the underprivileged and needy people of the world surely should not be touted in a partisan way. I am sure that the history of the House of Commons will show that all Parties share a concern with respect to foreign aid.

• (1500)

Mr. Nielsen: With respect to the specific question—

ENERGY

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL OIL NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker I have a short question which is directed to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the six-month anniversary period. One of the unnoticed failures of the Government has been its failure to achieve an oil deal with Alberta. The real deal is with Alberta, not Newfoundland.

If one reads the Government's Estimates carefully, they show that the Minister expects to get more money at the expense of the industry and the producing provinces. Will he indeed bring down a Budget without having an oil deal with the provinces. I do not think he can. Does he intend to rely on those Estimates and bring down a Budget without an oil deal with the provinces?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to the long question is that the subjects which the Member has raised in the House today are under active negotiation with the provinces as we sit in this House.

AECL—INVESTIGATIONS IN ATIKOKAN AREA

Question No. 84—Mr. Angus:

1. Did Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. conduct investigations in the Atikokan area of northwestern Ontario and, if so, in which fiscal years?

2. For the same years (a) what goods and services were purchased by AECL or any firm acting on its behalf in the local area and from which suppliers (b) what hotel/motel facilities were used by AECL and how many bed-nights were purchased for each facility (c) what was the cost of public relations activities by AECL, including staff wages and benefits, purchased services, travel and accomodation?

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows:

1. AECL has been conducting investigations in the Atikokan area of northwestern Ontario since 1979.

2. (a) See table below listing goods and services purchased in Atikokan by AECL and its contractors. This list may not be comprehensive because AECL's accounting procedures do not provide such a fine breakdown.

Expenditures in Atikokan since 1979 amount to approximately $1.4 million and represent about 20 per cent of the total Atikokan research expenditures, excluding AECL salaries.

(b) AECL has spent approximately $290,000 in accommodation in Atikokan since 1979. This represents about 11,500 bed-nights with an approximate breakdown amongst the Atikokan motels as follows:

Radison Motel	—45 per cent
White Otter Inn	—35 per cent
Steep Rock Motel	—10 per cent
Atikokan Hotel	— 5 per cent
Pines Motel	— 5 per cent

(c) The total cost of public relations activities for AECL in Atikokan since 1979 is approximately $135,000. About $30,000 of that amount is for accommodation and local telephone and mailing costs. The remainder represents salaries for AECL's Public Affairs personnel.

DPW—AWARD OF CONTRACTS

Question No. 244—Mr. Boudria:

From September 4, 1984 to December 31, 1984, how many Department of Public Works contracts have been awarded or filled by suppliers or contractors, originating in part or in whole, from the constituency of Berthier—Maskinongé—Lanaudière and, in each case, what was the total value of the contracts and the names of the individuals or companies who were awarded each of these contracts respectively?

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Public Works): Seven contracts have been awarded from the Constituency of Berthier-Maskinongé-Lanaudière. The names of the seven contractors and the value of each contract are as follows:

Name	Contract Amount
Marinex Incorporated, Cap-de-la-Madeleine, P.Q.	$ 65,670

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): In so far as the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission/Department is concerned, the maternity benefits for women (i) 34 years of age or younger (ii) 35 years of age or older are as follows:

Maternity Benefits
($ 000's)

	34 years or younger	35 years or older	Total
1980-81	233,308	9,696	243,004

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, since December 6 a question has been on the Order Paper involving government patronage and renting cars. Another question has been on the Order paper since December 13 involving certain frivolous expenditures that were made in decorating this building. The Government refuses to answer those two obviously embarrassing questions. It is unfair to the House that the Government does not choose to be accountable for the actions it takes, however reprehensible—

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, when we broke for lunch I was explaining why these two programs and others, such as the RRAP Program, should not be deleted from the Government's programs but expanded to increase their potential for job creation.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With respect to Routine Proceedings, I understand that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) intended to be here to introduce for first reading a Bill related to fisheries. Would the House be inclined to revert to Introduction of Bills so that I could move it on behalf of the Minister, who was unavoidably detained, and so that first reading could be given and Members could have the benefit of this legislation? There is a possibility of being able to discuss the Bill later this week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to revert to Introduction of Bills under Routine Proceedings?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-32, an Act amend the Fisheries Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the Hon. Minister have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, if we are to believe the promises made by the Conservative Party in the last election campaign, these programs and others to create jobs across Canada would have been expanded rather than deleted. Today we are discussing two of those programs, the Canadian Oil Substitution Program and the Canadian Home Insulation Program.

At the outset of my remarks this morning I suggested that these programs, by their very nature, should be kept and expanded. Instead, according to this Bill, one program will be terminated immediately and the other will be terminated in one year.

Let us take a look at the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. Under this program a home owner was reimbursed for 50 per cent of the eligible costs of materials and labour or for conversion up to a maximum of $800. As I indicated this morning, that $800 was a minor portion of the expenditure made by the individual who was having his home upgraded. Therefore, it was probably one of the greater job-creation endeavours on the part of the Government. It will continue to be so until it is eliminated by the Government.

According to figures from Energy Mines and Resources, this program was targeted to cover almost two million houses. The program is being terminated half-way through. Approximately half of the targeted houses have been treated. If the program were continued, we could have over the next few years considerably more houses converted and eventually the program could hit the target of two million houses.

It is amazing to me and to the people of Canada that two programs which are motherhood programs, programs that create jobs and allow the conservation of gas and fuel oil, are being cancelled by this Government. I have a feeling that the decision to cancel these programs was made in a hurry last September and now the Government is finding itself in a position where it does not want to move away from them even if it does recognize that they are valuable programs for job creation and conservation. The Oil Substitution Program was aimed directly at conservation. It is the kind of program that, once it is put in place, it helps the home owner as long as he uses another and cheaper fuel. The industry in its wisdom has said in the last few months that possibly within the next decade we will be looking at a shortgage of fuels developed from crude.

I know we have not learned to trust the point which the industry has been trying to make regarding how much fuel we have, because the industry has been so wrong in the past. But it is logical that in the future, maybe not in the next decade, crude will become in short supply again. The price will probably increase, making it more expensive for home owners to heat their homes. The Oil Substitution Program which allowed home owners to use electricity, wood, or gas was a method of preparing for that time in the future when costs will increase.

The EMR report suggests that there was a saving of approximately $600 a year for those who made the change. It also indicated that 25 per cent of the people who had made that change were home owners who earned less than $15,000. The suggestion that it was a project only for the well-to-do does not hold true. It was of particular use at least in my part of the country with the assistance of a provincial government to help senior citizens prepare their homes so they could stay in them during retirement. Along with regular programs, such as RRAP and some provincial programs, thousands of Saskatchewan senior citizens remain in their own homes.

The second program being cut is the well known and probably the most popular across Canada with home owners, namely the Canadian Home Insulation Program. It provided financial assistance for the insulation and draught-proofing of homes. CHIP paid 60 per cent of the cost of labour and materials involved in insulating and draught-proofing a home, up to a maximum of $500. Again, that $500 is in most cases the minimum spent on a particular home because of the CHIP grant.

The Government has already changed the regulations under which CHIP operates. Since last Christmas the return has been changed from 60 per cent of the eligible costs to 33.3 per cent. It was not necessary to come to the House to make that change; it was done by a change in regulation. One of the main arguments which this Government has made for eliminating this program has already been dealt with by reducing the amount paid under these grants.

A number of the arguments Government Members have been making in this debate are debunked by the report on these grants. For instance, the report found upper middle-income Canadians did not get a disproportionate benefit from the program. More CHIP grant money was given to low-income households than to any other group. In fact, 24 per cent of CHIP dollars was given to the 21 per cent of the people who earned less than $15,000 annually. Those helped the most earned less than $15,000, and they are the ones at whom the program was aimed. Granted the program was used by anybody who was going to do work on a home, but it was used by those earning less than $15,000 more than any others.

The report also suggests than 65 per cent of the CHIP insulation activities would not have occurred had it not been for the CHIP grants. I think that is a very likely figure. Many people started renovations because they were going to get the grant and they then carried on doing other renovations. The report also suggested that 37 per cent of the CHIP users would never have insulated at all had the program not been in place. It also states that 75 per cent of the users would not have spent any money without the program. It indicates that the program created a lot of jobs. It allowed for a lot of conservation.

The Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) spoke this morning and made an impassioned plea to allow market forces to control the price of oil. However, when he was questioned he admitted that those prices were not necessarily market prices but cartel prices, unnatural prices established by OPEC. He must have missed reading the pools last month which indicated that 85 per cent of Canadian consumers did not think that the price of oil in this country should be set by OPEC. They felt that Canada should set the price on the basis of the cost of production.

I have been attempting to give some indication of what should be done about these programs. They should be kept because they are the best ones available for direct job creation. RRAP, CHIP and COSP have developed more jobs than any other direct expenditure of money. They are aimed at the conservation of fuel. That conservation is not only aimed at today, tomorrow or next week; it is aimed at people who make the original investment and it continues for those who will live in the homes in the future. Those are good reasons for keeping the programs.

We may in fact face a shortage of fuel, even to the extent of possible rationing of oil in the next few decades. I would not be a bit surprised if even before the end of this Government's term of office it will be looking at programs to conserve transportable fuel used in the heating of houses. Conservation is necessary; all of us recognize that conservation is a necessity. The elimination of programs which recognize conservation is a step backward by the Government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments on the Hon. Member's speech?

Mr. Waddell: Am I allowed to make a comment, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Well, the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has not been around for a while—

Mr. Waddell: I will make it objective.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I would like to recognize the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway. We have missed him around here.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I will be very objective and try to make my question a lot shorter than the one I asked in Question Period. Perhaps I will give a little preamble to it. Mr. Speaker, you come from the cold climate of Edmonton where there are warm people. Perhaps you, like many Hon. Members, have found that individual constituents have utilized these programs. Also you have probably discovered, as has been the case in my riding of Vancouver-Kingsway, that many small businesses have grown up around programs which make houses energy-efficient using insulation and so on. There are also companies involved in the fireplace business or converting oil furnaces to natural gas or electricity. We have an abundance of wood, electricity and natural gas in Canada. Of course, we are in a surplus position now as far as conventional oil is concerned, but according to the figures of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and of oil companies, we will be short by the end of the decade. Has the Hon. Member had a similar experience in his riding in Prince Albert? Has he had any experience with local businesses or constituents who have taken advantage of these programs?

Once I had the privilege of working on the Beaufort Sea and travelling in that area where some of the expensive oil and gas production is going on. The cost of some of the wells is $100 million. Sure, it employs people, but only a few of them. However, one small company in my riding employs eight people. It is doing work for $1,600 per contract. For $100,000 that company could keep the same amount of workers going as an oil rig over a one year period.

Did the Hon. Member have any experience in his riding with companies or individuals who took advantage of these programs and have shown that it is not really a capital-intensive industry but a labour-intensive one? In other words, it is a good value for government investment in the area and in terms of job creation.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the point the Hon. Member made in his question is exactly the one which needs to be stressed most often in this debate. For the $800 spent in COSP and for the $500 spent in CHIP, the resulting effect on business in the community is much greater. For the $800, it usually amounts to $3,000 and for the $500, it runs at a couple of thousand dollars. Local businesses which provide material and labourers who do the work are benefiting. No other program about which the Government has talked or has put in place acts more quickly in providing jobs than CHIP or COSP. The day the house owner is authorized to spend money, he finds someone to do the work. It is the quickest way of providing jobs in our communities. In the communities in northern Saskatchewan which I represent, these programs along with RRAP are the most popular.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to join in the debate on Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act. Surely this Bill along with the dismantling of the renewable energy program announced in the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) last November 8, represent a very drastic and violent change in energy plans for the country. I think they are very detrimental and harmful.

It has been proposed that COSP be terminated on March 31 rather than continued to 1990 and that CHIP be terminated on March 31, 1986 rather than continued to 1987. Surely this is a very serious and backward step for the country. The Parliamentary Secretary led off the debate by saying that the country could no longer afford these two programs. However, if we look at the Estimates the Government tabled in the House last Tuesday, we see that it has committed some $1.6 billion as opposed to a little over $160 million for the upcoming year. Nowhere in the Tories' campaign literature can we find a plan to discontinue the Canadian Oil Substitution Program or the Canadian Home Insulation Program. Yet in the same campaign literature, the Government indicated it would get rid of the PIP program. It seems to me that the Government should keep its promises rather than doing things which it did not promise.

The other aspect of this Bill that I find very unsatisfactory is that the Government is proceeding with the Distribution System Expansion Program by bringing natural gas to many areas of the country. At the same time, it is discontinuing the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. Those people who live in areas where natural gas is now being provided will no longer have access to the Canadian Oil Substitution Program, but the Government is spending vast amounts of money on providing natural gas pipelines. There are incentive programs for private companies to put in these natural gas pipelines. One of those pipelines happens to be in my constituency.

The North Shore natural gas pipeline runs from Sault Ste Marie to Blind River and Elliot Lake. It will provide natural gas to those communities and will be very beneficial to the uranium industry and to Eldorado resources. I believe that the building of that pipeline is one of the most important decisions ever made affecting the future competitiveness and opportunity for expansion of uranium industry. Surely the price of uranium is much lower now than it was in the mid-1970s. We may well need very competitive mining operations in the future in order to compete with mines in Saskatchewan and Australia.

When dealing with this Bill in committee, I would call on the Minister and the Parliamentary Secretary to extend the program in communities like Blind River and Elliot Lake until the people have had an opportunity to instal natural gas rather than extending it only to June 30 for people who had taken out applications prior to November 8. That would be the only way to be in harmony with the construction of new natural gas pipelines. I believe a similar situation exists in Drummond and some other areas of the country in which natural gas pipelines are being installed for the first time this year.

The discontinuation of this program will have an adverse effect on many of the poorer areas of the country. Natural gas pipelines are just now being extended to outlying areas in the north and to other communities which were not supplied with natural gas in the first two or three years of the DSEP program. I believe the economic statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) last November will have a very adverse effect on these people. It tends to be lower-income people living in rural and northern areas who are converting not only to natural gas but to wood or in some cases electricity or propane. The substitution program will no longer be available to them. In concert with that is the CHIP program.

It is interesting to note that in many communities throughout the country, the CHIP program, the Canadian Oil Substitution Program and the rural RRAP program all provided assistance to low and modest-income Canadians. It allowed them to improve their homes, to put in new heating facilities and to re-insulate and upgrade their homes. The RRAP program is being drastically reduced by some $29 million this year. That will have a very negative and adverse impact on many communities. I would hope that the Government would extend the Canadian Oil Substitution Program for at least another six months or one year so that these additional communities can be served with natural gas.

It is significant that when oil is substituted with natural gas, an investment is made in the future. Under the COSP program, some 32,000 barrels of oil per day are saved. Grants have been given to over one million homes. Under the CHIP program, we save some 28,500 barrels of oil per day. That program was made available to 2.5 million homes. Through those two programs together, we will save about 60,000 barrels of oil a day every day forever. That is the advantage of oil substitution in conservation.

Of equal concern is the fact that the economic statement made by the Minister of Finance last fall, with the same kind of cavalier approach to economic programs, cut back on the renewable energy programs of the Government. The entire Energy Division of the National Research Council will be wiped out. Some $41.482 million will be wiped out by the end of the coming fiscal year. Programs that involve heat pumps, fission energy, solar energy, bio-energy, wind energy, peat energy and hydrogen and energy storage and co-ordination will be wiped out by the Government through the economic statement. These programs have been recognized around the world as being in the vanguard of forward-looking energy policies. We know that the fossil fuels like oil and gas will ultimately be used up. Yet the economic statement essentially demolishes some $41 million worth of these programs. We had one of the most forward-looking energy programs and it is now being wiped out by the Government.

I would like to mention some of the programs that were wiped out. The development and commercialization of vertical access wind turbines and the exploitation of our forest biomass have been discontinued. Clearly those of us who represent areas of the country in which there are forestry operations know how much waste occurs in those operations. We know how valuable that source of energy can be. The passive solar research into the super-window is being cut out. The electrolytic production of hydrogen is being cut out. The application of energy conservation to building construction is being cut out. The tidal electric power production program is being cut, which amounts to $1.430 million. How many Atlantic Canada, and especially maritime Canada Tory Members have spoken about tidal power and the tremendous potential of the Bay of Fundy tidal area? That area has tides which rise to 45 feet. They are the highest in the world. There is enough electricity there to provide electrical power to all of Altantic and maritime Canada and much of the upper New England states. Yet, in spite of all the speeches which the Conservatives made in the last several years about developing tidal power, in this program of cost reductions, which was announced by the Government in the economic statement, we realize that the hydraulic energy research program, which is being carried by the National Research Council, has been totally wiped out. As well, 85 per cent of the program to study energy in buildings will be chopped by the Government. It is not only one small program relating to oil conservation and building conservation through oil substitution which is being wiped out; it is the entire renewable energy program which is being attacked by the Government. The renewable energy program has been recognized by the OECD and by many other countries and international agencies as being a model program for energy conservation and substitution.

If we look at the projected spending of government Departments we see that in 1984-85, $33.8 million has been committed to energy conservation. By fiscal year 1985-86, that budget will be cut to $18.7 million. If we look at the budget for renewable energy, we see that in 1984-85, $38.4 million was committed, however by 1986-87, that budget will be chopped to $6.1 million. If we look at the budget for new liquid fuels for 1984-85, we see that $35.9 million has been committed, but by fiscal year 1986-87 that budget will be chopped to $15 million. There are drastic cuts in the whole field of renewable energy.

Members who took part in the special task force on renewable energy have made glowing speeches about the whole question of hydrogen and energy storage research, but that program, which has a budget of $6.5 million, is being wiped out by the Government in its drive toward complete eradication of renewable energy research and development programs. Canertech was set up in western Canada to develop research and innovative design and to assist private entrepreneurs in getting involved in renewable energy research, and it is being wiped out. The budget for that program is some $30.6 million. It is a very important program for western Canada.

Those are some of the concerns which I have with the legislation. Not only are we wiping out the two programs of oil substitution and conservation, we are taking Canada backwards toward the 1950s, the 1960s and the 1970s in energy design. We are taking the emphasis away from renewable energy conservation and returning it back to a dependence on oil. With the North Shore natural gas pipeline, which I previously mentioned, the savings amount to approximately half a million barrels of oil a year. That is about one-third of the production of oil in Canada for one day. It is one small pipeline which happens to be located within my constituency. If we looked around the entire country, we would see that there are many, many oil substitution opportunities which could be made that would result in similar savings.

I know the Government is on the defensive about this legislation. It is obviously a very bad move. The Government knows that Canadians are opposed to it because Canadians not only want to save energy, they want to save money. When Canadians buy natural gas furnaces and convert 25 or 30-year old oil furnaces to natural gas, they do not only have new heating units in their homes, but, with these programs, they have better insulation in their walls and ceilings which effect a 30 per cent or 35 per cent savings in their heating bills.

These programs were forward looking and were designed to benefit the country and at the same time the consumer. The programs also stimulated a lot of investment by consumers. Even though the Government provided a $800 grant under COSP, often individual home owners would have to put an additional $1,500 toward the purchase of a furnace. If that person was in a high tax bracket of 45 or 50 per cent, the Government would recover half of the grant, so the net cost to the country was not very high. However, the net benefit was very high in the saving of oil. That is why, when the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources published its figures a couple of months ago on oil supply and demand in Canada, it showed that on a net basis Canada will be oil energy self-sufficient through to the end of the century. Much of the fact that we are oil self-sufficient only three years after the National Energy Program was announced is due to the fact that we have had the best oil conservation and substitution program of any country in the western world. I certainly think the Government is making a very bad mistake and I hope it will withdraw this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments on the speech of the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster)?

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I must say that the Hon. Member made a good speech. He piled up the evidence about conservation to show that we should look on the demand side to see if the amount of demand which Canadians have for oil could be cut by one of the oldest methods which is known to mankind, that is, conservation. I thought those were the basic things about which Conservatives were interested. Perhaps, we will hear from an old-time Conservative next and not from a yuppie-type Ontario Conservative.

I wonder if the Hon. Member could give some explanation as to his figures. He mentioned the figure of $1.6 billion and then said that the Government was spending approximately $160 million for the Canadian Home Insulation Program and the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. I gather that the $1.6 billion was for the Petroleum Incentives Program. I wonder if the Hon. Member could say whether that is right, or what that $1.6 billion was spent for and what he was contrasting it with. Second, the Hon. Member gave the figure of 28,000 barrels a day saving of energy. I just used my calculator and it comes out to something like $35 a barrel for oil. That is a saving by conservation of about $1 million a day. Perhaps the Hon. Member could comment on those particular figures?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, in response to the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), I mentioned that the savings in oil is around 60,000 barrels a day from both the CHIP program and the COSP program. I just pointed out that in fact the Government made no promise—and I can well imagine why—that it would wipe out either the CHIP or the COSP programs, because the Government knows they are very popular. At the same time, the Conservatives made a commitment in their election campaign literature that they intended to do away with the PIP program. I believe the Estimates which were tabled this week show that they were going to spend $1.6 billion on that program, which they said they were going to do away with but which they are keeping, and at the same time they are doing away with a program which they did not say they were going to wipe out. The savings are there and are obvious. I believe they are a really important aspect of the oil supply situation. We were up to some 1.8 million barrels of oil production back in 1972-1973, according to the latest figures of EMR. The demand now has dropped much lower. It is down around 1.4 million barrels. I believe that is due in great part to programs of oil substitution and conservation.

It is rather interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, in commenting on the figures provided by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources that in 1984, its total revenues were some $3.8 billion, or 17 per cent, due to petroleum revenue sharing. When the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) gets around to making the deal with the Province of Alberta, it would be interesting to see how much of that 17 per cent of the petroleum revenues the federal Government received in 1984 it is going to be willing to give up in order to provide greater incentives, both to the provincial Governments and to the industry itself.

The figures for 1984 indicated that the industry was going to get 52 per cent and the provincial Governments across the country were only going to get 31 per cent. We will just have to wait to see how much of that federal Government share of energy revenues will be given to the industry as incentive. I hope I have been able to explain to the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway the figures to which I alluded earlier.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make sure I understand. What the Hon. Member has said is that the Government has budgeted $1.6 billion to pay oil companies in petroleum incentive program grants to go to the frontier areas of this country where sometimes it costs $100 million a well in order to find oil which will be priced way beyond the world price. The Government is prepared to do that and at the same time it cuts out a $160 million program for home insulation and substitution of wood and electricity for oil. The Hon. Member says we are running out of oil. That is why, of course, we are going to the high Arctic. The Hon. Member also said that something like $1 million a day would be saved if we continued this conservation program. For the life of me, Mr. Speaker, I cannot see the logic in the Progressive Conservatives acting in this way. It is absolutely beyond me.

Mr. Foster: I just wanted to confirm, Mr. Speaker, that those were the figures which were provided in the Estimates. Of course, the daily saving of 60,000 barrels a day would be even larger if this program were continued and expanded and we had more than the 2.4 million homes under the CHIP insulation program and the 1 million homes under the Canadian Oil Substitution Program grants. When we look at drilling wells in the frontier areas, we are talking about $50 million or $100 million. This program, which is worth $179 million, that is being cut out by this Bill will only provide the Petroleum Incentive Program grant for a few wells, but it will continue to expand the COSP and CHIP programs and the savings which occur day after day, year after year. Every time we save a barrel of oil, we not only save it once but we save it every year forever.

One of the interesting things which has happened since the 1980s is that the supply of natural gas has expanded dramatically. We are at something like a 33-year horizon supply of natural gas. Naturally, the exploration for natural gas has dropped off some 65 per cent since 1980 because we would not go out to discover natural gas when there is a horizon of 30 years or 33 years. It is interesting to note the number of wells which were drilled in 1983. And I understand the 1984 figures are very similar. In fact, there was something like 53 per cent increase in the number of wells over 1980, which was a record year. So I believe those—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to inform the Hon. Member that his time has expired. The time for questions and comments is expired, and I recognize now the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) and the Liberal Party must think that the memory of the people of Canada is pretty short. I just cannot understand an Hon. Member of the Liberal Party rising to speak in the way the Hon. Member for Algoma did just a few moments ago. His Party was the one which brought in the PIP program. We told those Hon. Members then what was happening. But did that make any difference? No, they were determined to make sure that we did not discover oil or continue to search for oil in the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. It had to go to the Canada Lands. The Hon. Member did not stand up and support us when we tried to stop the National Energy Program.

Mr. Waddell: I said exactly that.

Mr. Taylor: The Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) did, but the Hon. Member for Algoma did not. Now that same Hon. Member complains because we are spending $150 million on drilling a well in the Canada Lands. We told you that four years ago but you would not listen. You were so determined to hurt Alberta and Saskatchewan and the West.

● (1600)

Mr. Halliday: And Ontario.

Mr. Taylor: Yes, Ontario, and the rest of Canada. Now he stands up and protests because contracts were let. If I had my way, the PIP program would have gone out the window yesterday.

Mr. Foster: You are in Government, why don't you do it?

Mr. Taylor: You know why! You started the program and contracts remain, and we do not believe in cutting contracts. You are the fellows who started it. The contracts were made. Now you say, cut the contracts. Big deal. No wonder the people of Canada threw you out on your ears!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Complete hypocrisy in the Liberal Party, that is all it is. They talk about how we are now short of oil and they talk about conservation suddenly having to end. Conservation is not going to end because the Government stops spending on one program. The Canadian people are not that stupid. The Canadian people believe in conservation and this Party believes in conversation. But removing one program built on the debt of the Canadian people is not going to stop conservation. Not a bit. We stood for conservation before and we stand for conservation now, not only in oil but in many other things.

They talk about a shortage of oil. Are they trying to kid the Canadian people? We are short of oil only because of Liberal policy in the last four years. We could have had a program under way by now where we had a sufficiency of oil had the Liberals listened to the Opposition four years ago. But no, they had to hurt Alberta and the West; Alberta must not keep on producing oil. They closed down the big oil production plants in the provinces and then encouraged people, by giving big grants of public money which they borrowed, to go up into the Canada Lands where they have to spend $150 million or $200 million on an oil well. Then the Hon. Member stands up and says the Government is spending some money on PIP. They invented PIP. They created it. Now we are left with the baby. Well, the sooner we get the baby out the window, the better it is going to be. But we have to honour contracts that were made.

The Liberals talk about the PGRT. They taxed the oil industry out of existence. They crippled the industry and then they stand up and say that we produced more oil after the NEP. That is nonsense. The producers were leaving the province in droves. Equipment, expertise and jobs were going down to the United States because of the National Energy Program. They crippled the industry. Now they say we are going to be short of oil. If we are ever short of oil, it is because of Liberal policies. That is what created the shortage. How can the Hon. Member for Algoma and other Liberal Members stand up and say this when they were the ones that created the conditions we are living under today? I do not think the memories of the Canadian people are that short. No wonder the Liberals are down to a rump and are even falling behind the NDP, the socialists of the country. They cannot even hold their own as the Official Opposition. The people of Canada are fed up with their talk in opposition, which is so completely contrary to what they did when they were in power. Then they expect us to undo in six months all the damage they did in 16 years.It cannot be done and the Canadian people know it.

What will this Bill do? The Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria) suggested this morning that this program must be wonderful because we voted for it. He does not know what happened four years ago. The Liberal Government brought in a stack of Bills, including the COSP and CHIP programs, so we could not debate them in principle. The Hon. Member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) put up a terrific fight, and the then Speaker of the House, Madam Sauvé, ruled that the Government acted improperly in bringing in so many Bills all in one. That is why we rang the bells for two weeks, to protect the people's right to debate issues in this House. We did not do it for the oil companies, we did it for the people. The Speaker supported what we did, so the Government finally brought in the separate Bills and we had a chance to debate the COSP and CHIP programs.

The big item then was conservation and the best program the Liberals could think of were COSP and CHIP. Naturally we supported the Bill when we had a chance to debate it. But we also pointed out a number of follies in the Bill, and I want to deal with one or two of those today. I am not going to say that those two programs have not done some good. They have. They have helped conserve oil. They have enabled some people who otherwise would not have been able to insulate their home or change their heating system to do so. But it also enabled a lot of people, who had the money to do it themselves, to take advantage of the program. We had no better example of that than this morning when the Hon. Member from the NDP said he took advantage of it. He was not poor. He took advantage of it, and he is not the only one. Hundreds of people did.

Many people have said to me they would not have converted but for the Government offering the $800. I was in one home where the wife said she was afraid of natural gas, she did not like it. Her husband said, "Natural gas is going to save us money, lady." That is what he called her, "lady". "So", he said, "I am going to do it". He was the boss of that house and so he did it. But he had the money to do it on his own if he had wanted to. But no, $800 was coming into his pocket out of government coffers. Of those people who accepted that $800 when they did not really need to, I wonder how many realize they were placing a debt on the young people of this country who will have to pay it for years, and years and years. They contributed to that debt. The Liberals talk about one little program but they forget that the people have to pay.

Another Liberal said, Mr. Speaker, that, "you're cutting it out", as if the Liberals never cut out a program. I would like to remind the Liberal Members who are here that a few years ago, when they brought in an excellent program, the first home ownership program, where they gave $3,000 to young couples who wanted to get a home for the first time, suddenly one week they cancelled it. The Minister extended it for a few days, but hundreds of people who had started their foundations were left out in the cold. The Liberals cancelled the program without debate, without notice. This Government is at least giving a little time for people who want to use the COSP or CHIP programs. They have time to insulate their homes with the use of this grant because we are not suddenly cutting it off. They have until March 31 under COSP. Members who have spoken either do not know what happened in the past or are trying to fool the people a little more.

I grew up in a coal mining area, Mr. Speaker. My dad and brothers were coal miners and I probably would have been too if they had not made me stay at school. We used coal for years. My mother said many times that she did not want natural gas. She was afraid of it because it explodes too easily.

She liked the coal so we hauled it from the pit and hauled out the ashes year after year and no one complained. We did not want a substitution program.

As the years went by, mines closed, oil and gas became more competitive, and coal couldn't keep up. At one time there would have been a revolution in the Drumheller valley if it had been suggested that we convert to gas. However, I saw the day when hundreds of former coal miners voted for a change to gas. They had to adapt to changing conditions. Now that entire valley is served with gas. I know what it means to change and I know that at times changes have to be made. However, the decision should be made in the home as much as possible.

There are a lot of new things happening today, Mr. Speaker. I received a letter the other day suggesting that we are not using our wind power. I have never been to Lethbridge when there has not been a wind storm. Consider the power they could generate. What about tidal power? I do not know very much about that, but I think it has great potential. What about solar energy? They laughed a few years ago when a chap was building his home and said that he was going to heat his home with the sun. He said that in a country which has 50 below zero weather he could build a house and keep it warm with the sun by conserving the sunshine. That home has no other power and they live comfortably in it winter and summer. That is conservation.

There are many ways to conserve. We should not be wasting oil and gas just because we have a lot of it. I had great faith in the Dean of Engineering at the University of Alberta. At one time he appeared before the Cabinet in Alberta and said that this good clean fuel, natural gas, is too valuable to be used by industry. He said that we should insist on industry using coal, the dirty fuel, and keep the nice, clean natural gas for the homes of the people. I thought that made sense. If we were short of natural gas, that would be the thing to do. However, we are not short of natural gas, and I do not think we are short of oil. We have the greatest reservoir of oil in the world in the tar sands of Alberta.

I was on a committee years ago to try to separate the oil from the sand. On my first trip to Fort McMurray I took a handful of sand and sqeezed it and found that there was oil all over my hand. Oil was oozing down the coulees. I thought that was a tremendous thing. We had a conference at which one of the professors of the University of Alberta said that he could separate the oil from the sand with a hot and cold water method. A pilot project was established with some public money and with the expertise of university professors. They found that they could separate the oil from the sand. Then others came forward with more modern techniques.

I remember standing in a plant in Fort MacMurray and seeing thousands of ton of beautiful white sand that people would love to have on a beach. From the other spout came the beautiful black oil that was going to go all over Canada. There are millions of barrels of oil waiting there to be separated if only we had the policy. However, the Liberal Government was too busy importing oil, closing up the sources in the country, discouraging exploration, and importing oil. In 1980, the price to import a barrel of oil was around $31. The price to produce it in Alberta was about $16.50. However, the Liberal Government decided it wanted to import oil. It moved the exploration up north and gave PIP grants. They let the people in Alberta and Saskatchewan go without jobs.

There are still all kinds of oil in the Province of Alberta. We need an incentive program to search for it rather than a discouragement program such as the Liberals introduced. They continued to pay $31 of Canadian money for a barrel of oil. The Liberals then decided on the petroleum tax to make up the difference between the price of Canadian oil and imported oil. I think it amounted to 85 cents a barrel at that time which the people had to pay. The people of this country have paid and paid for the faulty Liberal policies which have discouraged the production of oil in this country and encouraged the importation of oil. They now stand up and talk about a shortage of oil.

I admit that this program has done some good and that conservation will not stop, but a lot of the people who took advantage of this $800 or 50 per cent of the cost to convert could have done it themselves. A lot of people will do it on their own. And yet many people, whom I really felt sorry for, were left out of the program entirely. The people in the small shacks around the coal mines in Drumheller could not afford the $3,000 required to convert. In some of those places they still use coal. The $800 grant was not sufficient for them because the conversion would probably cost $1,600 or $2,000. Where would they get the additional money? They just do not have it. They are retired coal miners who spent their lives in the bosom of the earth bringing out coal. They did not have that kind of money and could not take advantage of the program. Thousands of renters could not take advantage of the program.

Conservation will not end, Mr. Speaker. In March of this year COSP will end and in April of 1986 CHIP will end, but conservation will continue. The debt load that is being placed on the backs of the people through this program will be removed and conservation will continue with the people's own money, which is a far fairer program.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of comments and a couple of questions. I will first say how much I enjoy listening to the Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). I do not agree with a lot of what he says, most of it as a matter of fact, but I enjoy hearing him. I have a great deal of respect for him because he has been around a lot longer than I have.

It is very impressive to hear the Hon. Member—who has a great deal of credibility—talk about actually seeing and feeling the oil in the tar-sands for the first time. I agree that the Liberals have short memories because our Party and the Conservatives, when in opposition, told them that the National Energy Program was a transfer of the exploration plays from the western sedimentary basin in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia to the North, to the Arctic and offshore.

The reason for this transfer is outlined in a new book entlitled Energy Politics in Canada, by Bruce Doehrn. It was simply a power play because the federal Government had jurisdiction in the Canada Lands and not in Saskatchewan and Alberta. I totally agreed with the Hon. Member when he said that this was a basic objective of the National Energy Program. We said so then and western Canada has paid for that transfer.

I agree with the Hon. Member that the Government must honour the contracts for the $1.6 billion in PIP grants. There are some questionable contracts, such as that with East Coast Energy Corporation, which must be phased out.

The Government stated its intention to replace PIP grants with tax incentives such as the superdepletion allowance and other tax rip-offs which helped the oil companies. If these only amount to PIP grants that are called tax breaks, I challenge the Hon. Member to vote against those tax changes. I believe the Hon. Member understands what I am saying and we will see what happens with the new schemes.

The Hon. Member also said that the Liberals taxed the oil industry out of existence. In 1982, the profits of Imperial Oil were $289 million. The latest report for 1984 shows that their profits are $533 million. Texaco went from $215 million to $423 million. Gulf went from $201 million in 1982 to $308 million in 1984. Shell went from $133 million in 1982 to $158 million in 1984. Given those figures which come from the business sections in the Financial Post and the Globe and Mail, could the Hon. Member explain how these companies were taxed out of existence? I do not believe that assertion to be correct.

The Hon. Member also said that Canadians would convert on their own to other forms of energy such as solar, tide and wind. I suggest Canadians will convert to other forms of energy only if they are paying too much for oil or if they are given an incentive to convert. Since I am in favour of providing an incentive for conversion, I suggest that these programs are justified. It makes sense to provide $500 when the home owner contributes $1,500. That is fair and it seemed to work well in the past.

Finally, one of the Government's first steps in dismantling the National Energy Program has been to eliminate the conversion measures in the program, that is, the off oil program and the insultation program. In my opinion, these were the only beneficial aspects of the National Energy Program. Would the Hon. Member, who is a sensible Canadian, explain why the Conservatives would dismantle, as its first step the only effective part of the National Energy Program.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, let me deal with the last part of the question. This Government has been in power for six months. We have yet to bring down a budget. Since we cannot accomplish all of our objectives in six months, we are doing so individually, and when we come to the end of our mandate in four years the Hon. Member will see that we will have kept every promise we made. The National Energy Program will be out the window and this country will be working because we will have alternative programs that provide incentives that do not come from tax money.

The Hon. Member asked me to explain why the oil companies have large balances. I am not a spokesman for oil companies like Imperial and Texaco. I was talking about the destruction of ordinary Canadians who were exploring for oil. The small oil companies were the ones who were put out of business because, unlike the multinationals who derive income from different sources and do not have to depend on one particular item, the small oil companies in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia did not have those different sources. They either went out of business, became defunct, or went to the United States to try to keep working. That is the industry which was crippled by the National Energy Program. No one who lives in the West would dispute that. Was there another part to the question?

Mr. Waddell: I believe the Hon. Member has answered my questions.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson)—Auditor General—Recommendation that audits be reported on completion date; the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper)—The economy—Economic statement (a) Impact on proposed Manufacturing Technology Institute (b) Background documentation; the Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin)—Energy—Hibernia oilfield (a) Environmental Impact Study (b) Content of report.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) is a good friend of mine and I appreciate hearing his arguments in debate. He talked about the shortage of oil. I would commend for the Hon. Member's reading a very interesting document published by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister (Miss Carney) which shows that since 1983 we have a net self-sufficiency in oil through to the end of the century.

He also talked about saving money. The Estimates show that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) will spend $2.3 million for his office operations and the employment of an extra 30 people. Would he not rather see that $2.3 million provided in CHIP grants to some 4,600 low income Canadians so they can insulate their homes, save money and meet their expenses? I am sure there are many such people in his riding as there are in mine.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time for questions and comments has now expired.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the effect of Bill C-24 will be to cancel a program and remove a potential $800 in grants toward the poor people of this country. Second, as a result of the action by the Government since it came to power, the heating oil prices have risen in this country. Another factor is that this Government, for the first time that I can recall in Canadian history, has developed a policy since January of selling oil cheaper to a foreign country than it is sold here. Since February 1, an oil company in the province which the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) was talking about, can sell a barrel of oil at the Chicago gate for about $5 a barrel cheaper than that barrel is sold at the gate in Toronto.

• (1630)

The other fact pertaining to this Bill is that people need that conversion grant in order to convert to alternate energy uses.

I think what I will deal with in my remarks is something that has not been dealt with adequately today in this debate, and that is, the conversion of oil to wood.

If you examine the statistics, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will find that the majority of conversions in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and in the northern parts of this country have been toward wood. When you look at these grants, COSP, CHIP, RRAP, the programs initiated by Liberal administrations, there is one thing that everybody should keep in mind. These programs put money directly into the hands of the home owner. You can talk about lots of government programs that operate indirectly for the benefit of individuals, but these were transfer payments as outlined in the Estimates, transfer payments, as outlined by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret), into people's pockets. These were the only grants people could get if they were living in a rural area and were below the poverty line. If they wanted to do anything at all with their houses, these were the only identifiable grants that put money actually into people's pockets, primarily into the pockets of the poor people in this country.

I am surprised to hear the Members in this Chamber talking about where this money went. We have heard speaker after speaker in the Conservative Party say that some of that money, most of it or almost all of it, went into the pockets of people who really did not need the money. That is a complete fallacy. There are people who, if they did not get the $800, could not have converted to an alternate energy source. For example, how could somebody on welfare in those areas that I named convert to wood without the $800? How could somebody living on a pension convert to wood if he or she did not get that particular grant under COSP?

There were advantages to that program beyond the actual placing of money in the hands of an individual. The benefits can be seen in the provinces that utilize the wood conversion mechanism in the forestry sector. I am referring specifically to people who got cutting permits from provincial jurisdictions to utilize this grant program to convert to wood. They would take the tops of trees left by the paper companies which were strewn around all over the place in the forests. They also took the hard woods in the forests in which the paper companies are not all that interested. We still have pulp and paper companies that utilize just the soft woods. It is criminal in some places to see a paper company take the wood that was not hard wood. In other words, they would leave the birch trees and the like to die over a period of time, and leave the fallen tops to rot or start forest fires. I would say that the greatest assistance to the forestry industry is to have more people utilizing wood as a fuel source than anything else.

We have paper companies today that utilize herbicides, aerial spraying of herbicides, to get rid of the hard woods they do not want. Surely there can be a policy to allow the people of Canada who want to utilize wood as a source of fuel to go on company lands and take it, since the paper companies themselves are not all that interested in it.

There have been other remarks made today in which Members said that the $800 was a giveaway. I think the point was made that when you convert to wood in the northern areas the $800 does not even come close to the total conversion cost. Poor people have to do with just the $800, and they did using their own intelligence, so to speak. They left the hot water heater still on the furnace. That was the only portion used in the home for oil purposes. Apart from that, people took the idea of the wood stove or the wood furnace and usually put it in the basement of the house. They had their own duct system that came up to the main floor of the dwelling. It was not permissible for insurance purposes to plug in the wood stove with the furnace duct system, and there was a restriction in the program that you were not allowed to do it. There had to be a separate duct system, if that is what you were using. Or if you wanted to put in a completely new system with a wood and oil furnace, then that would be permissible under the rules.

For the poor people living on pensions, on welfare, on works programs, or on unemployment insurance, the obvious advantages in the rural areas to that gentleman in the example was that he was able to instal a wood furnace with the $800. If he had not had that money, he would not have done it. He was able to utilize what materials he had in place in his particular dwelling. People normally had a chain saw. You would not use a buck saw these days and an axe. People normally had a chain saw and a snow machine to bring out the wood, a ski-do, as the Hon. Member for Prince Edward Island mentioned. In certain parts of the country they still have horses. A horse has even greater utility than a snow machine. First, a horse is cheaper to buy, although it costs more to feed. In certain areas of the country a horse is used as a means of hauling wood from the woods. Therefore, a person would save on the cost of a snow machine and a pick-up. People had a chain saw and transportation out of the woods. That is all they needed. They used their own muscles to supply themselves with heat. For what, Mr. Speaker? I will tell you. It was to save $200 a month. That is what they did it for, because that is what it cost in January, February, and March. When you look at ordinary people, say a widow with one son at home getting about $350 a month and having to pay out $200 a month to heat her home with oil, you can see what a saving it is to that person and how necessary it is.

The Hon. Member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson) mentioned that the ski-do or the snow machine was utilized in bringing in that wood for utility purposes. It is interesting that people in some parts of Canada actually believe that a snow machine is only used for recreation. Not at all, Mr. Speaker. It is used in conjunction with supplying the heating source in a home. That is the most important use of the snow machine. If the companies that build these machines would only look at that and keep producing the 12 horsepower and the 15 horsepower models, the best ones for that purpose, they would sell more snow machines.

The other point I should like to make is that the Government is saying that it is cancelling this program because it wants to cut back and because most people have utilized it. It is saying that there is no real need for the program and that it will be cancelled on March 31. There will always be a need for this particular program as long as we have people in the country who are relatively poor or live in areas where there is an adequate supply of wood. Thus we see the importance of this particular program.

The Government has turned around and cancelled COSP. It will also cancel CHIP and it has reduced the budget of other vital programs for home repairs which financially assist people. In particular, I am referring to RRAP, which goes hand in hand with the other two programs. It has been reduced to such an extent that in certain areas of the country it will be unworkable. We cannot have from 400 to 600 people on a waiting list for a program in which the delivery agent knows that probably only 50 of them can be approved because of substantial cut-backs. The general philosophy used by the Government in the cancellation of the program is wrong.

As I mentioned at the beginning of my intervention today, it is not good enough to have a policy of selling oil and reducing the charge to foreign countries. Since January 1 the charge went down 48 per cent for exported oil, heavy and light crude. The reason for this was obvious. The eventual product from oil was going into the United States at such low costs that the competition was too great for some of the oil companies in Alberta and Saskatchewan about which the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) spoke. To reduce the charge by 48 per cent to a foreign nation, to another country, without making the same reduction for refineries in Canada, is not good enough. To be able to sell a barrel of oil at $33.50 to an oil refinery in Chicago in the month of February and demand a charge of $39.50 for that same barrel at a refinery in Toronto is just not good enough.

There has been much discussion about the past Government and what it did, according to certain Hon. Members, to the oil industry, as well as about the foreign importation of oil to the East Coast. Mention was also made of the additional charges placed upon domestically consumed crude oil in Canada. The general philosophy behind this was to try to have some semblance of unity in the price of a barrel of oil, no matter if one was in British Columbia or in Newfoundland. That was the philosophy behind it, and it is a good philosophy. If we look at the refineries utilizing imported oil in eastern Canada, we find that there was always a mix of imported and domestically produced crude oil from western Canada which came via pipeline into Montreal. Those are the facts. Also there has been a declining demand for home heating oil in this country for the past three years to six years. The only increase in demand, if one looked at the figures, was in diesel fuel. Many oil companies in the country have made changes in their processes and are involved in different extractions and the building of petrochemical industries. All we have to do is to look at the enormous petrochemical complex at Sanford as well as the one at Sarnia, Ontario. We see a change taking place in the oil industry as far as what it does with oil and what is the demand at the other end are concerned. If we examine the entire industry, we will see that refineries have closed down in eastern Canada. Four closed in the Province of Quebec and three others in Atlantic Canada because the demand was not there for their product. At the same time we have seen a great increase in the number of petrochemical industries, especially in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. We are into ever changing times.

Let us look at the oil reserves to which reference was made earlier in the House. It has been said that they are good enough for Canada for about 14 years. No matter at what figures we look, normally they indicate that they are good for 14 years. If we go back 15 years, we find that they have always fluctuated—in the past they have been good for 14, 20, 15 and 10 years; now they are good for 14 years. However, that is not the important point. We have to look at the total production in Canada and wonder whether we are actually utilizing too much. Should we be exporting oil outside the country if we are in a tight squeeze? Should we be exporting oil out of Canada and charging refineries in Chicago less than we are charging refineries in Canada?

This month the federal Cabinet was supposed to make a decision, in fact it was to be last Thursday. It was to be a decision on what would be the export charge of oil going into the United States. I do not believe that decision has been made, but I understand that since the demand for Canadian oil is increasing in the United States—and it fluctuates considerably from month to month—the export charge will be increased by about $2. That would mean that, for the month of March, instead of there being a $5 or $6 difference between the oil being sold in Chicago and the oil being sold in Canada, there will be a $2 or a $3 difference. If it is the philosophy of the Conservative Government to sell oil cheaper in the United States than it is selling oil in Canada, I am afraid the Government is in very serious trouble. It will not wash with Canadians. There is no way Canadians will put up with it. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) can turn around and say that that had to be done for the first time in Canadian history because the only thing that could be changed was the export charge, that they could not change the charges on domestic oil because we needed the money. However, we also need the money on the export charge. It makes no difference what taxes are levied on the domestic; there is always a tax on what is exported out of the country. It just does not add up, for the sake of conservation, to be cutting back and encouraging Canadians to use oil. That will be the only result of the move to cut back on CHIP and to cancel COSP. It will encourage Canadians to use more oil. However, are they being encouraged to pay more for oil than United States refineries? If the Government feels that it must cut programs which benefit the ordinary and poor people of the country, the very least it could do is to maintain the section of that program that was most utilized by the poor people, and I am referring to the section relating to the conversion to wood. There are not many people who are making $100,000 per year who will put a wood stove in their house to keep their families warm.

● (1650)

I know my time has run out, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion, let me say that if this is to be the continued direction of the new Government, it will have to do something different in three or four years' time in order to maintain its credibility.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments?

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. The Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) thoroughly expressed the views of the people from rural areas of Newfoundland and of the people across the country who happen to live in rural areas. I would like to make an observation and then put a short question to the Hon. Member.

The Hon. Member spoke about the increase in oil and gasoline prices and about the selling of oil and gasoline out of the country at lower prices than in Canada. His constituency is similar to my own. The only exception is the Town of Gander in which wages may be a little higher. However, the outports in his constituency are similar to those in mine.

In 1964, I built my own home and installed an oil furnace. At that time, I was paying 18.3 cents a gallon for home heating fuel, and I still have the bills. Today, I am paying over $2.18 a gallon. Like me, the Hon. Member has many constituents who can be described as single parents who draw old age security and GIS and live in their own homes. These people have annual incomes of no more than $7,000. My electrical bill is $70 per month and, like most others, I have no extra frills or gadgets in my house. My oil bill in the month of February will run to approximately $400. I do not know if people understand the significance of that. We as Members of Parliament can afford to pay that amount because we are the fortunate people of the country. There are a great many people who are making a gross income of $7,000 per year and cannot afford to pay over $2,000 per year on home heat. Therefore, they have to convert to wood.

The provincial Department of Forestry in Prince Edward Island, aided and abetted by the previous federal Government and the present federal Government, has what I believe to be an excellent reforestation program. In Atlantic Canada, we have a problem with the spruce budworm. A great deal of wood is going to waste. The Department of Forestry cuts down the unwanted wood and puts it up for tender so these poor people can buy it at a good price. By converting to wood, their home heating probably costs between $400 and $500 per year. That is a tremendous saving. However, the Bill is taking that opportunity away from the ordinary Canadians who are striving to survive. The Government is trying to force these people into senior citizens' homes, thus costing the federal and provincial Governments three times as much.

As I see it, the Government is penny wise and dollar foolish. I wonder if the Hon. Member would comment briefly on that.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. The Hon. Member's point is well taken. There are many family units being run by widows or by the unemployed. These people get to the point where they cannot afford those exorbitant oil and gas prices that are mainly caused by differences in provincial taxes. It is a heck of a lot different to be living in the Province of Alberta than it is to be living in the Province of Newfoundland where we must pay a flat rate on the bottom line of 22 per cent provincial tax. Those people to whom I have referred will be placed in a position in which they will have to convert to wood somehow. This Bill will discriminate against those people because it will take away from them the opportunity that was given to their neighbours. That is simply unfair to the poor people of the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there any other questions or comments? If there are no other questions or comments, we shall resume debate.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to join in this debate on the Bill before us, a Bill that would effectively kill the conservation and off-oil program. I see that there are only a few minutes remaining to me. I wish to continue at a future time.

Perhaps at this time I could put on the record what I discovered while researching this topic. I went through the Senate hearings on energy and natural resources of June 1984 and I glanced through the submission made by the City of Whitehorse. At the end of that submission there are some figures regarding the costs of Canada for reducing our dependency on foreign oil. For example, it is stated that so far, according to Statistics Canada and the National Energy Program update, the Canadian Government has spent to the end of 1983 some $8 billion on new energy, some $3.4 billion on existing energy programs, and some $3.3 billion on the Oil Impact Compensation Program, making a total of $14.7 billion. In addition, as of June 1984, some $2 billion was committed beyond 1983 for the Western Canada Development Fund and some $.5 billion for the Atlantic Canada Development Fund, making a total of $17.2 billion committed to and spent on the National Energy Program. All of this created a total product reduction of some 6.7 per cent of 425,000 barrels, or a reduction of some 28,475 barrels per day. In other words, the submission indicated that after having spent some $17.2 billion, we reduced our dependency on foreign oil by some 28,475 barrels per day. However, so far the COSP and CHIP programs have reduced our dependency on foreign oil by over 60,000 barrels per day at a cost of only some $1.3 billion.

I do not understand the economics of the Government. I never understood the economics of the Liberal Government. It was willing to spend over $17 billion on reducing our dependency on foreign oil to the tune of only 23,000 barrels per day. The CHIP and COSP programs reduced our dependency on foreign oil by some 60,000 barrels of oil a day and only cost a little over $1 billion. However, it is the conservation programs that the Government wants to scrap. It is insanity.

I will continue my remarks when the Bill will be considered in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member will have 16 minutes remaining for his speech plus a 10-minute question and comment period when we resume debate on this particular Bill.

Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Constitution Act, 1982

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent for the House to proceed to Item No. 38?

THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1982

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE HUMAN FOETUS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe) moved that:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Constitution Act, 1982, should be amended in section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to include a human foetus or unborn human being.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there is no question that this country has split into two decidedly hostile factions since the Criminal Code was amended in 1969 to exclude from prosecution those abortions performed for certain specific reasons in hospitals which have therapeutic abortion committees.

Those who feel that easy access to abortion is necessary to protect women who are unwillingly pregnant, state that a woman should be able to terminate an unwanted pregnancy freely, and that abortion should be available to all women, regardless of age, marital status or income level. Those who disagree base their reasoning on a definition of human life which was given by members of a scientific conference in Washington, D.C., which is as follows:

The majority of our group could find no point in time between the union of sperm and egg and the birth of the infant at which point we could say that this was not a human life. The changes occurring between implantation, a six-week embryo, a six-month foetus, a one-week child or a mature adult are merely at stages of development and maturation.

It is difficult, if not impossible, for those us who accept this concept of life to find a common ground on which to meet those who choose abortion as a means of ending pregnancy. Because there can be no common meeting ground, emotions run high and a feeling of hysteria is always in the air.

We who oppose abortion do so because we believe in the right to life. We are depicted by those who are opposed as unconcerned with the reality of the 15-year old girl who is pregnant because she does not know any better, or the mother of five who can see no way to support another child, or the mother who is carrying a defective child. We are seen as forcing a theory of life on a world which is torn by suffering and personal torment.

"Individual liberty" and "freedom of choice" are catch phrases that are fast gaining control of our society. Peoples' feelings are for what they can see, not for what someone has told them exists. Their eyes and minds focus on the woman, not on the child she carries. The sympathy is for the suffering of those already born, not for the one who is waiting to be born. They care not for the right to life, but only for the lives that are apparent.

Some time ago I received information on the stand of the Canadian Association for Repeal of the Abortion Law. Added to the information were copies of letters which were sent to the Badgley Commission. Without going into detail or individual cases, I would like to quote part of one letter which illustrates exactly what I mean by society's misunderstanding of the stand which is taken by the right-to-life groups in the country. It reads:

> You are doubtless receiving many communications from anti-abortion crusaders. No one is asking them to have abortions. No one is denying them their right to believe that a fertilized ovum is a human person from the moment of conception.
> No one expects them to campaign for birth control clinics which are also against their beliefs. These are basic religious freedoms. But the essence of religious freedom is that it applies to oneself, and not that one should force one's views on those who do not share them.

I think it is statements such as this which confuse and dismay, more than any of the hysterical accusations which are levelled at the pro-life organizations. It seems to imply that to fight abortion is to put a woman into a state of perpetual pregnancy.

I am against abortion, but I do believe in birth control and the education of the public regarding the various means of preventing conception. The public has become confused by the fact that those who favour abortion, state that they believe every woman should have the right to decide whether or not to carry a child. To them, abortion is a matter of personal conscience, and no woman should be forced to carry her child or terminate her pregnancy.

Aside from the fact that women can and have been frightened or manoeuvered into having abortions, the destruction of the child is the main issue. As long as I believe that life begins at conception, I will do everything in my power to prevent the termination of that life. The Canadian Association for the Repeal of the Abortion Law states that Canada must be willing to join the 64 per cent of the world where legal abortion is readily available. Their reasoning for this is that it prevents illegal abortions, that it faces the reality of abortion as a major health issue, and that it preserves the physical, mental, social and economic well-being of the women concerned. If it does all those things, it is a hypothesis which has not yet been proved.

The ends envisioned can be met through other means. Proper education solves many problems, especially when that education gives complete understanding of birth control methods which are available and a thorough understanding of the value of human life.

Man must learn that the preservation and continued growth of the human race demands more than ensuring that the poor have the same rights as the rich. It also demands that the weak must be protected from the strong, and the unborn from the mature.

The attempt to guarantee that the poor have the same rights as the rich was the main reason for the appointment of the Badgley Commission. As I am sure everyone in this House knows, the Commission was to discover if the procedure was and is operating equitably across Canada. The terms of the Commission's appointment did not allow it to discover if the underlying policy was a just one, nor if the legal requirements to obtain an abortion were being met. By its very basic terms of reference, the Badgley Commission was destroyed as a forum for discussion of the abortion situation before it ever began. Those members of the general public and the medical profession who see abortion as the destruction of life could offer nothing to a commission which accepts abortion as a fact of life.

Finally, after intensive and prolonged research, the Commission discovered that the abortion law was not operating equitably across the country. The Commission pointed out that abortion is mainly available in major urban centres, and that many women still travel to the United States to obtain abortions because their hospitals do not have therapeutic abortion committees, or, if they do, the backlog is such that the child would be born before the abortion could be performed.

In addition, the Commission reported that there are also some hospitals with abortion committees which will not perform abortions just because a woman is pregnant. So the Badgley Commission proved that abortion is not offered equally across the country and that the rich and those who live in cities can obtain abortions almost on demand, while those who live in rural areas or small towns have much more difficulty, unless they are rich.

But one would think, in discussing a law, that an attempt would be made to gain justice for all and that the unborn child would be granted the same say as those who can speak for themselves. The concept of equality before the law demands that all participants be included, not just those who yell the loudest.

One of the means used by the Commission to discover if abortions were being granted equally was a survey of the hospitals in terms of total numbers, eligibility by provincial regulation, to have abortion committees, as defined and the number of those eligible which did in fact have abortion committees. It was discovered that of the 559 general hospitals across Canada which met the requirements for therapeutic abortion committees, only 271 or 48.5 per cent had done so.

Over half of the hospitals involved did not choose to have abortion committees. Their reasons for this included professional ethics of the staff, religious denomination, avoidance of conflict, and lack of demand for abortion. One of the staff members of a hospital responded to the survey by saying, and I quote:

● (1710)

> Under the present circumstances, there is no longer any medical indication to justify therapeutic abortion to protect the life or physical health of the mother.

Some doctors themselves are now admitting that there is no medical reason for abortion. Even the late Dr. Gattmacha, who was one of the strongest allies of the abortion movement, stated; and I quote:

Today in our modern society it is possible to take almost any woman safely through her pregnancy except if she has cancer or leukemia, in which case an abortion would not save her life, much less prolong it.

One of the most definite problems for those fighting abortion and the destruction of innocent life, is that while there is proof that life begins in the initial or very early stages of a pregnancy, people are willing to destroy that life, to make the social and economic status of the mother more important than the right to life of those who cannot speak for themselves. We are fast losing sight of the traditional western ethic which has always placed emphasis on the basic worth and equal value of every human life regardless of its stage or condition. Short-range utility is taking the place of a code of ethics which grants to everyone the right to live his own life to the best of his ability.

By destroying another life to ensure one's economic and social success, the human race is losing whatever dignity and honour it has worked to build for itself over the centuries. It is right and proper that the individual be protected, that he or she be granted their God-given life and the right to grow and learn at his or her own rate. Unfortunately, all individuals are not granted the same rights. The legalization of abortion would imply that the end justifies the means and that destruction is allowable if a certain quality of life is preserved for those who remain.

Self-interest is held, then, to be more important than the common good. Truth becomes lost as man learns to define himself in terms of what he thinks is useful and convenient. To place a utilitarian value on human life, to see each person only in terms of his economic worth, can and will lead to the destruction of human life and can and will lead to the murder of those already born who through mental or physical incapacity are not able to contribute to society what may be demanded of them by extremists.

These and any other attempts to negate life, to state that it has no value in itself must never be tolerated. Life is an automatic value and the handicapped child has the same right as any other person to develop his full potential as a human being. Abortion, infanticide and mercy killing have a tendency to follow one upon the other. To destroy life at any level is to accept that all life has only relative value. Can those who propose the complete legalization of abortion guarantee that it will end there? Can they guarantee that the legal murder of the unborn will not lead society in general to other forms of murder? I think not, Mr. Speaker.

Conflict of interest automatically arises when attempts are made to legitimate the value of life. The abortion law in Canada, as it now stands, opens the doors wide to those hospitals in Canada who want abortion on demand. Statistics show that the number of abortions have increased by leaps and bounds, creating a situation whereby those hospitals which choose a lax interpretation of the law are now experiencing difficulty in dealing with the backlog. Needed elective surgery is backed up and operating theatres are constantly tied up. The abortionists would like to force the other hospitals and doctors into accepting this backlog. That must be prevented at all costs. Never do I want to see individuals and institutions forced into the taking of life, forced into the murder of those who are classified as unwanted, unwanted by a society that cannot be bothered with the question, let alone try to find an answer. Unwanted does not describe the child, merely the reaction of society of which he or she is a part. It is a state of mind, not a state of being.

In most of the disagreements and arguments that have taken place between pro-lifers and pro-abortionists, the focal point has been the issue of contraception. Those who favour abortion state that pro-lifers want to put women into a state of continual pregnancy. I have said before, and I must stress now, that proper birth control methods must be made readily available to all, and sex education must be taught in such a way as to make all people understand those methods. Money can and should be spent on the education of all people, not just those attending high school or college. Once that is done, people will be able to make the choice concerning the birth of children. As it stands now, abortion is becoming a means of contraception. Many women are choosing not to make full use of contraceptives. It has become much easier to terminate an unwanted pregnancy than to take the time to use proper birth control methods.

Destruction of the unborn child has become the accepted means of ensuring that a sexual relationship is not based on artificial means. Even the Badgley Commission agreed that the number of abortions will continue to rise if some means is not found to ensure that women have contraceptive protection. Its statistics show that 25.2 per cent of the women questioned who had abortions, discontinued use of contraception some time before the pregnancy; 27.2 per cent had not used contraception at any time. Those are definitely not hopeful statistics for the future children of Canada.

For those who do not want children, contraception is proper and necessary. For once conception takes place there can be no more contraception. Once a life has begun, it has the right to reach its natural end. That life has the same right to protection under the law as has its mother or any other of society. The right-to-life movement must be willing to show the people of this country that it does care. We must show that we are aware of the problems of illegal abortions and of the pregnant woman who needs assistance and guidance before, during and after her pregnancy. The public must learn what really we are trying to do, not what the pro-abortionists say we are trying to do.

Governments and the medical profession must be willing to offer assistance and explain exactly what that assistance is to women who are pregnant. The men cannot be forgotten either. The development of women's rights does not demand the end of male responsibility. A sexual relationship demands responsibility on both sides in the understanding and use of contraceptives and in the care of any child who may result from that relationship.

The legalization of abortion must be averted and the type of abortion available now must be ended before there will be any change in the values of Canadian society. To ensure that the intrinsic value of human life supersedes the monetary values of this nation, we must be willing to fight to prove that there are no fast, easy solutions to social problems. The pregnant woman and society must learn that killing the unborn child is not going to solve problems. The social problems which lead to unwanted pregnancy must be attacked at their base, through education, assistance and compassion. To insist that abortion be legalized because illegal abortion and maternal death will result if it is not, is much the same as saying that homicide should be legalized because murder will take place whether it is illegal or not.

The legal murder of the unborn must be stopped. Once that is done, all levels of society can join together to attempt to solve the social problems which are its cause. The sure way to do this, Mr. Speaker, is through this House, and that is, by amending the Constitution Act, 1982 to recognize the undeniable fact that unborn human persons have the same rights as other human beings, which is the right to life, liberty, and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof. Hopefully, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of all unborn children who cannot speak for themselves, we will see this happen in the not too distant future by taking the necessary steps to amend the Constitution and prevent the wholesale murder of unborn babies, which now exceeds some 80,000 lives per year from one end of our country to the other.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to take part in this debate on what is obviously a very important and sensitive question, indeed, one of the most difficult questions which faces this Parliament.

In approaching the motion of the Hon. Member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) who has just spoken, I feel it is important that we look carefully at the substance of that motion. The Hon. Member has suggested that the Constitution Act be amended in Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to include a human foetus or unborn human being. That is the motion of the Hon. Member. In analysing that motion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it is only appropriate that we look at the substance of Section 7 of the Charter of Rights. That section, under the heading "Legal Rights", reads as follows:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

In his remarks, which I listened to with care, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Grey-Simcoe quoted from Section 7 of the Charter, but in doing so he omitted the final words of that section. I am sure that was just an oversight, but the fact is that the Hon. Member's motion would permit the deprivation of life, liberty and security of the person in circumstances which accord with the principles of fundamental justice. I suggest to the Hon. Member that if his objective is to end all abortions in Canada today—and while I respect the view of the Hon. Member I disagree fundamentally with it—then he will not achieve that objective through the motion which is before the House today. Far better, surely, to come before the House with a motion which would repeal those sections of the Criminal Code which permit therapeutic abortion and, presumably, return to the days in which all abortions in this country were illegal.

Having said that, I think it is only appropriate that I note that the position taken by the Hon. Member for Grey-Simcoe is fundamentally different from the position taken by members of his caucus in 1981, including the seconder of his motion, the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). Perhaps a bit of history on this matter would be in order. In November of 1981, the official spokesperson for the Progressive Conservative Party, then in opposition, moved the following motion. The Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) moved:

> That the proposed Constitution Act 1981 be amended by adding after Clause 31 of Part 1 the following new clause:
> "32. Nothing in this Charter affects the authority of Parliament to legislate in respect of abortion."

The argument, made with considerable persuasiveness by the Hon. Member for Rosedale in November of 1981, was that there should be no amendment made to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which would deny Parliament, as the ultimate representative of the people, the right to legislate on the very difficult question of abortion. However, the motion before the House today would do precisely what the Hon. Member for Rosedale said this Parliament should not be doing. Indeed, it would entrench in the Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms certain rights of a foetus or an unborn human being. That flatly contradicts the position taken by the Hon. Member's colleague, including the Hon. Member for Bow River and the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) in November of 1981. I want to remind the House what those Hon. Members said in 1981. The Hon. Member for Rosedale said:

> In my view, all sides of the House and, indeed, Canadians across the country, want to ensure that Parliament has the right to legislate if any changes are deemed necessary with respect to the law on abortion. The difficulty for a great number of Canadians is that conflicting legal difficulties throw that matter into doubt. We want to make it clear that Parliament's freedom to legislate on this matter is unimpaired.

Surely the Hon. Member who put forward this motion today and his colleagues who support it must recognize that it would do precisely what the Hon. Member for Rosedale suggested should not be done. It would indeed entrench in the Charter a specific provision on the question of abortion. The Hon. Member for Rosedale went on to say:

> It took 350 years to establish the parliamentary system where legislation governing our actions with respect to life and death would be determined not by those appointed by the state but, rather, by those elected by the people themselves.

Members of this House applauded those sentiments, presumably including Members now on the Government side. He went on to say:

> None of us disagree on that: not the Liberals, not the New Democrats, not the Conservatives, not Pro-Life, not Pro-Choice, and not anyone in the middle. We all agree that Parliament must have the freedom to decide. The purpose of this amendment is simply to make sure and to make clear to all that that is, indeed, our intention.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, that amendment was supported by Members of this House on the other side, so it was with considerable surprise indeed that I read the motion of the Hon. Member for Grey-Simcoe, which represents a complete reversal of the very reasonable position taken by his distinguished colleague from Rosedale.

Mr. Lewis: This is Private Members' Hour.

Mr. Robinson: There are some Members on that side who will be given an opportunity to speak and, presumably, indicate if they oppose this motion, as they apparently did in 1981. I will look forward to hearing from those Members.

Certainly it is interesting to note this reversal of position, at least on the part of the Hon. Member for Bow River, who now supports a motion which flies directly in the face of the motion he supported in 1981.

As to the substance of the question, there are Members of this House who, in good conscience, believe that the Criminal Code should make no provision whatsoever for therapeutic abortion. I want to make it very clear that my position and the position of the NDP is that the provisions of the Criminal Code which deal with the question of therapeutic abortion should be repealed and the abortion decision should be one made by the woman in consultation with her doctor, that is, in terms of the provisions of the Code itself. However, we recognize as well that this is not just a legal question by any stretch of the imagination. It is essential that there be a whole series of other measures undertaken by Governments, both federal and provincial, to support women who are too often faced with the very difficult decision as to whether or not to give up a child because of economic circumstances. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is fundamentally wrong that the level of support for single parents in our society today is so appallingly low that there are still women, particularly single parents, who feel they cannot afford to have a child. That must be a concern of all Members of this House.

As well, we must support, indeed encourage, the funding of programs which enhance an awareness of sex education and family planning. We must also support the availability of safe contraceptive devices. I was pleased to note that the Hon. Member for Grey-Simcoe also supported that particular suggestion. When we talk about contraception, it is, I think, important that we recognize that contraception should not be solely the responsibility of women. The Ministry of National Health and Welfare should be undertaking research to deal with the whole question of contraceptive devices for males as well as for females. It is also important that family life programs and sex education programs be made a part of the regular school curriculum at both primary and secondary levels, and that this item be placed on the agenda of conferences between the federal Secretary of State (Mr. McLean) and his provincial counterparts.

It is fundamental to this issue that if we were to return to the days in which abortions were illegal in this country, that would not put an end to abortions. Rather, it would mean abortion would continue to be carried out in conditions which are often unsafe and, indeed, hazardous to the woman involved. The evidence shows very graphically that a woman who is desperate enough to want an abortion will have that abortion. Whether it be at the hands of a backstreet butcher, a self-induced abortion in conditions which are unsafe and hazardous, or whether she be forced, if she can afford to, to leave the jurisdiction and go to another province or outside the country, a woman will take the necessary steps if she is desperate and if abortions are made illegal. This has actually happened in other jurisdictions. For example, in Romania during the 1960s that country decided that because of certain demographic issues it wanted to tighten up considerably on its abortion law. The statistics showed that the number of abortion-related deaths increased markedly. To return to the days in which abortion was entirely illegal in the country would be an ultimately regressive and harmful move.

I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that we look very seriously at significantly increasing the funding made available to the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada and other organizations which are attempting to promote awareness of safe contraception and attempting to educate young people, adolescents in particular, about the importance of sex education.

In that regard, I would like to quote from a speech that was given in 1980 by the President of the Canadian Medical Association. It was a very thoughtful speech by Dr. W.D.S. Thomas. In that speech he urged the Government to repeal the present abortion law so that this would be a decision between a woman and her doctor, a position which the Canadian Medical Association has espoused since 1971. He urged that the Government increase, rather than cut, its funding for family planning programs. He went on to say the following:

> I know that the best sex education program in the world will not eliminate unwanted pregnancies, it will not eliminate the need for therapeutic abortion, but it will help.
> We need an educational program that will not only transmit the necessary information to teenagers, but one that will alter the basic value structure of our society. If we talk about conception control in isolation, isolated from other basic issues and values of society, our advice will fall on deaf ears. We have to deal with feelings and emotions, we have to talk to them about relationships, about decision making, about short term and long term effects of decisions, we have to talk to them about respect, what it is, how you get it, and how you show it. We have to be honest and open with them about sexual exploitation, about peer pressure for sexual gratification and its effects on a person's behaviour. We have to help them to clarify and adhere to their own personal values, we have to teach them that they have the right to say no, not just to sexual advances but to other things as well. We have to teach them about the different ways of showing affection and the advantages and disadvantages involved.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, he said:

> More importantly, we must do a better job of teaching them how to build personal relationships, to understand the mental and emotional needs of themselves and others. With these foundations in place, with the proper attitudes, if teenagers are sexually active they will use birth control because of self respect and a sense of responsibility.

Many of us recognize that indeed there are too many abortions in Canada today. However, rather than repealing the provisions of the Code which allow for safe therapeutic abortions, albeit flawed provisions that discriminate between women in rural areas and other areas, and making all abortions illegal, we should consider the steps which I have indicated as being more appropriate in order to reduce the number of abortions. We must study sex education, consider better awareness and availability of contraceptives, and consider economic support for women who desperately want to keep their children. In some cases, as a result of the pathetic levels of human resources payments for women who are single parents, those women occasionally make the decision to give up their child.

I would like to applaud the steps which have been taken by the Government of Manitoba. That Government has recently embarked upon a very important funding program which enhanced the availability of contraceptives. It also expanded obstetric and gynaecological services at a number of Winnipeg hospitals. The Government of Manitoba funded a program of education and counselling on family planning as well. All these steps are very important and I would encourage other provincial Governments to look at them seriously.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, it would be a fundamental mistake for Parliament to accept the motion which has been put forward by the Member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) and to entrench these particular rights in the Constitution itself. Some representatives who appeared before the constitution committee, of which I had the honour to serve as a member, urged that we entrench the concept of reproductive rights in the Constitution itself. Both sides were heard from on that issue and in the end Parliament decided that neither of them would be entrenched.

The logic of the Hon. Member for Rosedale was very compelling in 1981. It was so compelling that Members on that side of the House voted in virtual unanimity for the proposal that was made. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that logic is just as compelling today as it was in November of 1981.

In conclusion, I would urge that this Parliament recognize that Canadians, through one of the bulwarks of our criminal justice system in the country, that is the system of the jury, have sent a very clear message to parliamentarians. That message has been sent now by four juries in Canada in the case of Dr. Henry Morgentaler. That message surely must be recognized by Members of the House. That message is that the fundamental decision on abortion must be left to the woman in consultation with her doctor.

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Hon. Member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges), in introducing this motion to entrench constitutionally the rights of the unborn, feels very strongly about this issue. I always have admiration for people who have strong feelings about issues. His comments contribute to the public discussion on this debate, as have the comments of the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). From listening to the comments of both previous speakers it is evident that, despite our differing views on the motion before us, we all believe that there must be further public recognition and public involvement in the prevention of unwanted pregnancies. We must ensure that all people take more responsibility in this area. If we had a motion which suggested the advisability of the Government considering further work with the provinces and other groups in our society to increase funding and accessibility of information on those topics, we might indeed have all-Party agreement on it. That is the fundamental problem that we face.

Being a mother of teenagers and working with young people, I know that they are faced with such a barrage from the media and other sources in our society about their sexual involvement that sexual identification is extremely difficult. There is very little available to them with regard to the things that the Hon. Member for Burnaby brought forward. I remember one other time in the past six months when I agreed with the Hon. Member for Burnaby, and I do again today. I would like to have the quotation which he made from that doctor, because that expresses my feelings about what the thrust of our efforts should be and the direction that we as responsible parliamentarians should take.

The motion before us today does not address that issue. It is asking for the entrenchment of the rights of the unborn in the Constitution. I personally disagree with the motion, and I also think that it is an inappropriate way to bring about change on this issue. Whether the matter is abortion or dealing with constitutional change, it is one of the most serious issues facing Canadians.

I would like to address the subject of the appropriateness of trying to bring about change, first, in a Private Members' motion and, second, through constitutional reform. As Hon. Members know, I have my own Private Members' motion coming up next week with respect to that issue.

I believe that we need more time than available in Private Members' hour to discuss a major issue such as entrenching the rights of the unborn in the Constitution. We are all aware of how sensitive this issue is as a result of the barrage of viewpoints we received about this issue in our constituencies. I do not believe that there is a clear consensus in any part of the country.

There was a case in the United States. We should note what was said by Mr. Justice Blackmum of the United States Supreme Court in Roe versus Wade. He said:

> We forthwith acknowledge our awareness of the sensitive and emotional nature of the abortion controversy, of the vigorous opposing views, even among physicians, and of the deep and seemingly absolute convictions that the subject inspires. One's philosophy, one's experiences, one's exposure to the raw edges of human existence, one's religious training, one's attitudes towards life and family and their values, and the moral standards one establishes and seeks to observe, are all likely to influence and to color one's thinking and conclusions about abortion.

I think it is evident here today that this is not an issue that divides on Party lines. Rather, it is a reflection of many of our own personal experiences. Having been involved in the women's movement in this country in many ways, I suppose that my own views are coloured by the kinds of experiences I have seen and been involved in. Certainly, I respect Members who hold different views on this issue.

The Hon. Member proposes to extend the rights in Section 7 of the Charter to a human foetus or an unborn human being. Section 7 guarantees to everyone the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The issue of whether or not the Charter protects the rights of the unborn is already before the courts in at least two cases. They are very well known and publicized cases.

In the Borowski case, opponents of the present abortion provisions of the Criminal Code have argued that Section 7 of the charter does protect the rights of the unborn after a very thorough analysis of whether or not a foetus is a legal person. The trial court ruled that the term "everyone" in Section 7 did not include the unborn. That decision, as we all know, has been appealed.

In another case, Dr. Morgentaler argued that the restrictions on abortion in the Criminal Code conflicted with the mother's right to life, liberty and security of the person as guaranteed in Section 7 and with other provisions of the Charter. The Supreme Court of Ontario rejected this argument and held that the abortion provisions of the Criminal Code did not conflict with the Charter.

I am sure that we will hear more about the rights of the unborn under the Charter. Personally, I do not think that the fundamental controversy surrounding our abortion laws should be solved in the courts. I believe the issue is far too important. The courts have already indicated their discomfort at being placed in this position. After reviewing the history of the abortion laws in Canada in the Borowski decision, and noting that the present law had not had the effect of placating individuals or groups with an interest in the issue, Mr. Justice Matheson concluded in the Borowski case:

> —it is the prerogative of Parliament, and not the courts, to enact whatever legislation may be considered appropriate to extend to the unborn any or all legal rights possessed by living persons. Because there is no existing basis in law which justifies a conclusion that foetuses are legal persons, and therefore within the scope of the term 'everyone' utilized in the Charter, the claim of the plaintiff must be dismissed.

Clearly, the question of rights for the unborn and whether or not abortions should be permitted and under what circumstances is an issue that concerns and divides Canadians. It is a very unfortunate division and something which I believe worries many of us. We need only to have watched our television in the last few weeks to see marchers and supporters and adversaries and opponents of abortion marching in Toronto in front of the Morgentaler clinic to put forward their views of our present law. As well, the polls which have been taken indicate that Canadians are seriously divided in their views as to what the law should be. As we are all aware on almost a daily basis, it is an issue on which those who do hold definite views are very reluctant to accept any compromise. In my opinion now is not an appropriate time to make a change in the law as such until we are able to develop a greater understanding and consensus among the public.

These are some of the reasons why I believe that Private Members' hour is not a suitable place to consider the issue of whether or not protection for the unborn should be put into the Constitution. We must make sure that we provide a full examination of all the issues.

If the Hon. Member is serious about changing the law, we should go about it in a different and proper way. First, we must make sure that we know what we mean when we say that we want to provide protection for the unborn. Second, we must be aware of what it means to add "human foetus" or "unborn human being" to Section 7 of the Charter. We are still at a very early stage of the interpretation of the Charter, and the provisions of Section 7 are being considered by our higher courts. We must also carefully assess the advantages and disadvantages of keeping our laws with respect to abortion in the Criminal Code.

I believe we should also keep in mind that there is an established process for amending the Constitution. Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, provides that amendments must not only be approved by the Senate and House of Commons, but by resolutions of two-thirds of the provinces having at least 50 per cent of the population. This is a process which calls for close consultation with the provinces on the nature of the change to the Constitution and the impact it would have. If changes were proposed for Section 7 of the Charter to ensure protection of the unborn, this could have important implications for the provinces, especially in the area of family law. I do not believe that issue has been addressed by the Hon. Member.

Most important with respect to this issue, we must provide Canadians with an opportunity to make their views known on what the law should be. I do not think we can do that properly until we have done some of the things I have talked about at the outset and the other two speakers have talked about. We must make those kinds of fundamental changes in assisting young Canadians to become more responsible, to have a greater understanding and to have access to information and services. We should put the emphasis on the prevention of unwanted pregnancies rather than on having to deal with the growing number of abortions, many of which are related to the socio-economic conditions of the women involved who have not had access to appropriate information. Perhaps they have been reluctant to have access to that information. I think birth control information should be more publicly accessible to young women rather than in under-the-table discussions with girlfriends. I feel strongly about that, having a young daughter of my own.

Our Government believes in consultation and co-operation, a Government which consults before it makes fundamental changes in our laws. We take pride in involving Canadians in decisions on social benefits, housing and equality issues. We are proud of that record and it is one that we want to continue to maintain.

If we were going to consider changes in our abortion laws and to consider the Hon. Member's suggestion of enshrining protection for the unborn in the Constitution, we would have to make sure that individuals and groups with views on this issue could come forward to make those views known. This is an area in which we need consensus. I honestly believe that any legal changes that we might propose will not work. Potentially we would be in an even worse mess than we are today.

The Badgley report, to which the Hon. Member referred earlier, indicates that the present system is not perfect. It indicates that abortions are not available equitably across the country. We know that the present law does not work perfectly for people of either point of view.

While debate in Private Member's hour may touch on some of the issues and give us a better idea of what is involved, that is not the place to solve one of the most complex social issues facing Canada today. We must be sure that if we move to change our laws with respect to abortion, to protecting the unborn, we have the support of as many Canadians as possible. Without this we may be causing more problems than we are solving. In this forum we lack the time and the collective capacity to assess the complex issues involved in this one hour. We also need to ensure that we know as much as possible about the impact of any constitutional amendment in this area.

I urge all Hon. Members in this House to consider that whatever point of view they have on this issue, this is not the motion that is most urgently before us. We should be working together to solve the basic issue and working toward the greater awareness of Canadian men and women to ensure that there are no more unwanted pregnancies and that we bring a true sense of responsibility to our own sexual activities. If that were the direction we were to take, Mr. Speaker, we could all be very proud and optimistic about the results.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak in the debate today. I know it is an issue that will come forward at other times and in other forums. Through the opportunity to debate this issue and discuss some of its implications, we can learn about our different views, an interesting aspect to Private Member's hour. Perhaps in the next four years we will be able to reach some new approaches, new understandings, and new recognition on this whole issue of women and the unborn.

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join in the debate this afternoon on this very significant motion put by the Hon. Member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges). The motion reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Constitution Act, 1982, should be amended in section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to include a human foetus or unborn human being.

Having said that, I want to make it quite clear at this stage that I agree very strongly with that principle. I believe life does start at conception. I believe what we need is something to enshrine that principle in the law of the land. What better law can there be than the Charter of Rights?

Because this is such a very important principle, it is disappointing to me to see, notwithstanding the fact that there are snow storms swirling around us, that there is really just a handful of people in the House this afternoon to take part in this important debate. It is a debate that has had the attention of the country focused on its subject for a long period of time. Looking back to the election campaign, I think that along with the issue of unemployment and capital punishment this had to be one of the main and principal issues during that time. This was an issue without any grey area. It was a black or white issue as far as the people of my riding and, I suspect, people across the country were concerned. They saw the issue as a matter of right or wrong. They did not see the issue as a question of maybe or compromise. It was strictly a matter of principle.

I think it is clear that there is a great gulf and a great difference of opinion between people in this country. While I do not share the ultimate opinion of the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mrs. Collins) on the principle we are debating here today, I do share a good many of her views and the concerns she has raised, particularly with respect to the whole concept of further debate, further discussion, and the further refining of this issue. I believe that if we go on from here, we will be on a collision path. A great many people have strong views on this issue.

I think probably those views have best been demonstrated recently in my own City of Toronto in the Dr. Henry Morgentaler case. The issue received a full court hearing and review, but at the same time it left a strange feeling and a strange concern in the minds of a vast number of people, particularly on the issue of jury selection. I think it surprised a lot of people that there could be an organization whose main purpose was geared to advising on jury selection to produce a jury, if at all possible, that shared the views of one side or the other to such an extent that perhaps it could tip the balance in the case. When people learned there was a professional body that gave advice on the selection of a jury, and that in selecting the jury anyone who had strong religious feelings or convictions was not acceptable as a jury member, people in the City of Toronto and across the country felt there was something wrong with a judicial system of that sort. That although Dr. Morgentaler was acquitted on the charges, there was grave concern that the kind of jury selection we had was not really and truly a trial by Dr. Henry Morgentaler's peers. It is that feeling that has put in sharp perspective the conflict between the different points of view that we are dealing with in this significant issue.

If we proceed with an amendment at this time, I do not think there is very much doubt in the minds of those who feel very strongly one way or the other, as I do, that we will have a great confrontation, a confrontation that would probably put the whole prohibition issue of a number of years ago to shame. It could turn that issue into something very insignificant in comparison with this and in comparison with the kind of confrontation we could walk into if we take precipitous action.

I think this motion is a good one in that it starts to define the issues. It encourages debate and it does that not only on the streets, on television screens and on the radio, but in the House of Commons, the place where the debate will ultimately have to take place.

I believe we will have to have a lot more public debate before it is an appropriate time to deal firmly and once and for all with this issue. There are a number of problems. The Hon. Member for Capilano touched on some of them that are involved in this issue besides those raised by the mover of the motion, the Hon. Member for Grey-Simcoe. Some of those concerns and problems have not, as yet, been addressed properly, in my view. One concerned the whole question of whether we enshrined this as a constitutional question.

● (1800)

I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that you are indicating that my time has drawn to a close. I would like to have a future opportunity to expand on my views on this subject. I hope this debate will inspire the Government to bring forward further legislation. This will give all of us an opportunity to expand on our views in the House of Commons.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

AUDITOR GENERAL—RECOMMENDATION THAT AUDITS BE REPORTED ON COMPLETION DATES

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, on December 11, I asked a question of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) concerning the issue of the Auditor General being empowered to report more frequently to the House of Commons on a completion date basis rather than on an annual basis. I should like to discuss this issue to a little greater extent.

The Minister indicated that he was open to making the change. He referred to having had a meeting with the Auditor General, but he did not refer to the many recommendations of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. I should like to give a little history.

In July 1980, the Public Accounts Committee recommended that the Auditor General use more often his power to make special reports so that the Committee would be able more often to examine current issues. When a legal opinion was sought about these powers, the opinion was that in fact Sections 7 and 8 of the Auditor General Act did not contemplate regular, interval or completion date reporting and limited the Auditor General to reporting annually to the House of Commons, except in cases of special importance or urgency.

The legal remedy proposed was the insertion of the words "at least" in Subsection 7(1) and various consequential amendments to Subsection 7(3) and Subsection 8(1). Those changes were discussed at the time, and the President of the Treasury Board was in agreement, as was the then House Leader of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party caucus. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Lewis), who I assume is answering this evening, is familiar with this matter since he as former chairman of the Public Accounts Committee put forward many of the recommendations to which I am referring.

In June 1984, in its fifth report to Parliament, the Public Accounts Committee again recommended the reporting of comprehensive and other audits on a completion date basis. Then on March 31, 1984 the Auditor General referred to the issue in his report.

The present situation is that the Public Accounts Committee very often deals with matters which are rather old because the Auditor General reports to Parliament in December on issues which have been audited by his staff many months before. In the case of a comprehensive audit, it is practice to allow Departments an opportunity to comment and for their comments to be included in the Auditor General's report. The constant recommendations for reporting on a more frequent basis were with the idea that the Public Accounts Committee could have before it matters which were more current.

If I may quote the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary, in his previous role as committee chairman, he once said:

> By the time the Public Accounts Committee reviews the comprehensive audit or the audit notes our review may be nothing more than a confirmation of the Auditor General's Report, rather than a useful exercise by a Parliamentary committee to reinforce the concerns of the Auditor General and make a public and departmental impact.

That was nicely said.

If the present President of the Treasury Board is willing to introduce a Bill which makes this simple amendment, the advantages of completion-date reporting as against waiting 12 to 18 months to get all the issues together would include the following. The subject matter of each release would be current in that it would have been recently completed and finalized by the Auditor General and his staff. The Public Accounts Committee would be more likely to review the matter thoroughly and enthusiastically because it was current. It would be more likely that a review would increase the effectiveness of the Auditor General's Report. The Public Accounts Committee would be able to plan its work better and the workload of the Auditor General would be distributed on a more even basis throughout the year. For all those reasons, I trust that the Parliamentary Secretary can tell us tonight that we will soon see this amendment to the Auditor General Act.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as Past Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee and as Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board, it is my pleasure to reply to the Hon. Member. I might add that she is my successor as Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee and I compliment her on the job she is doing with the committee.

I am still aware and supportive of the comments contained in the Fifth Report of the previous Public Accounts Committee. I know that I and the President of the Treasury Board

(Mr. de Cotret) are supportive of the question of strengthening the ability of the Public Accounts Committee to perform its important responsibilities on behalf of the taxpayers of the country and to see that the Government, no matter which Party is in power, is operating with due regard for economy, efficiency and effectiveness.

The Hon. Member will know that at the present time the Auditor General has testified that he feels he can bring his report forward in October rather than December. I believe this is something which will enable the Public Accounts Committee to set its agenda earlier. It will be closer to the completion date of the audits in question and will allow the committee to plan its work for the entire year.

Second, the Hon. Member will know that the Parliamentary Committee on Reform of the House of Commons is actively working and hearing views and briefs on what can be done to improve the efficiency of the Parliamentary Committees. I believe that its report should be taken into account before any changes are made.

I note, as does the President of the Treasury Board, that the Public Accounts Committee has gotten off to a quick start and is doing some viable work in reviewing the Auditor General's Report. At the same time, the Government has embarked upon a heavy program of consultation and legislation, both economic and social, which we feel is designed to address the problems we found when we came into Government.

At the present time, amendments to the Auditor General Act are up for discussion but we do not want to impair the effectiveness of the Parliamentary Committee on Reform, or the Public Accounts Committee, by suggesting that their current reviews are being stale dated. I believe that this is a subject for discussion and I can tell the Hon. Member that it is the intent of the Government to deal with this matter at some time.

THE ECONOMY—ECONOMIC STATEMENT—IMPACT ON PROPOSED MANUFACTURING TECHNOLOGY INSTITUTE. (B) BACKGROUND DOCUMENTATION

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I raised a question in the House last November 13 with regard to the closure of the Manufacturing Technology Institute in Manitoba. I want to make a few comments today and I hope that the Government will take them into consideration in its long-term plans.

• (1810)

When the Government Party was running for office it promised tens of thousands of jobs overnight. It promised to replace confrontation with consultation and co-operation. It also promised that it would have a place at the Cabinet table for the West. It promised to bring western Canada into Government.

When we examine the specific instance of the handling of the Manufacturing Technology Institute in Manitoba, and when we examine the performance of the Government now that it is in office relative to its promises during the election campaign, the Government gets very low marks. I am not only concerned about how it is rated in terms of its performance, I am concerned about its performance because that performance affects people in Manitoba.

The Government cut the Manufacturing Technology Institute last November, along with the many other cuts which were made in public spending. The Government cut that institute in spite of the lack of consultation which it promised when it was running for office. In spite of the fact that they promised consultation and co-operation during the election campaign, the Government cut that institute without any consultation with the people or the Government of Manitoba. The Government only met with the people of Manitoba concerning the question of funding for the Manufacturing Technology Institue after the question was raised in the House and pressure was put on the Government to meet with the people of Manitoba. Even though the Government then met with the people of Manitoba, the consultations were largely meaningless because they had no real impact upon the direction of the Government with respect to the Manufacturing Technology Institute.

The Government cut the institute in spite of the fact that it would have meant assistance to the private sector. It would have meant more secure jobs in Manitoba. When the Conservative Party was running for office, it promised to use the private sector as a means of job creation. This was an ideal opportunity to marry activity in the private sector with activity in the public sector and produce employment for Manitobans. However, the Government chose to cut back on this activity for some strange, inexplicable reason. It makes me wonder whether the Government sees no role for the public sector in assisting the private sector to grow, develop and provide employment. I wonder if the Government has such ideological blinders that it sees no role whatsoever for the public sector in encouraging private sector growth.

The Manufacturing Technology Institute was established to help manufacturers deal with new technologies—robotics, computer-aided design and computer-aided manufacturing—and the changes which are ongoing throughout the economy in relation to the new technologies. In spite of the fact that adjusting to new technologies is crucial to employment in Canada, the Government cut that institute. It cut an institute which would have had a positive impact on productivity. Rather than simply blaming our lack of productivity on wages, here was an opportunity to do something on the capital side of the equation to ensure productivity and continued employment.

The Government cut the Manufacturing Technology Institute in spite of the fact that there are a couple of Ministers from Manitoba who sit at the Cabinet table. It was the promise of the Conservative Party when it was running for office that there would be effective representation for the West at the Cabinet table.

Mr. Lewis: Three Ministers.

Mr. Keeper: I am sorry, I have been corrected. There are three Manitoban Ministers at that Cabinet table. In spite of the fact that that trio sits at the Cabinet table, Manitoba got hit harder than other provinces in relation to public spending. There were other institutes of research which continued in the Budget, even though Manitoba's was cut. What is the use of having a voice at the Cabinet table if it is not effective in terms of protecting the interests of Manitobans? It is not only with regard to the Manufacturing Technology Institute that Manitoba is being hit hard. All Manitobans are familiar with the fact that the Government, in terms of equalization payments, has cut very deeply into the money which goes to Manitoba. There is some $72 million which needs to be rectified.

• (1815)

In spite of the fact that there were no meaningful consultations, in spite of the fact that this Manufacturing Technology Institute would mean jobs in Manitoba, in spite of the fact that there were Manitobans around that Cabinet table who would have spoken up for Manitoba, this Government chose to cut that institute.

Not only did the Government choose to cut it, it chose to do so without any adequate analyses of the impact that would have. The Government acknowledged that. The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Siddon) said it was a question of philosophy rather than a question of analysis. We need to bring the facts to bear upon decisions of Government.

I would hope that the Hon. Member, as he speaks today, will give us some solid reasons why the Government is proceeding in the direction it is with respect to the Manufacturing Technology Institute. I hope he can hold out the promise that the Government will reinstitute this program which means so much in terms of jobs for Manitobans.

Mr. Bernard Valcourt (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated before in this House, the decision to end the ongoing funding of the institute was not an easy one for the federal Government. Nor were we pleased to take the course. However, as with many of the difficult decisions which were announced on November 8, the Government is confronting the unpleasant fact that we cannot afford to do everything we would like.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party has said that the deficit should be treated as a long-term problem and should not colour our actions today. This statement ignores the fact that our actions today will have a long-term impact on the national debt. For example, the ongoing operating costs associated with the institute in Manitoba would have been in excess of $20 million per year.

Last November 13 the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) referred to the negative impact of the decision on the institute. Today he has said the same thing. In response, I would point out again that it would be difficult for anyone to credibly ascribe a specific impact to the decision. I say this because those involved in this very institute were still struggling to define the type of research and kinds of equipment the institute should have, and they did not even know then what to do with it.

As the Hon. Member will know, the previous Government was criticized by the Wright task force, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Senate Committee on National Finance. This institute was often cited specifically as a concern by those who criticized the policies of the previous Government. It was in this context that the November 8 decision was taken. Immediately, an effort was launched to find a more productive use for the IMT building. As the Minister said in Winnipeg last November, the building offers considerable potential and the Government is determined to see it put to productive use, notwithstanding the financial restraint which is facing the country.

In this regard, the Minister invited the private sector and the provincial Government to participate in the staffing and operation of the facilities. The Government believes that the private sector is more likely to take an interest in research and use it if it has a financial interest in the activity. It is for this reason that we are optimistic about the initiative of the Minister in relation to the Winnipeg institute. The Minister has already received several substantive proposals on the use of the facility. In February last he went to Winnipeg to continue consultations with the provincial Government and other interested parties. I can report that he was encouraged by the co-operative attitude and constructive recommendations which were presented to him. The Minister is actively considering these proposals now. Nevertheless, the federal Government welcomes further input and representations by interested Hon. Members of this House.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 62—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

That this House condemns the Government for its negligent and irresponsible approach to the protection and management of the environment, for its cuts of wildlife, meteorological and parks services, for abandoning Canada's past initiatives on the national and international levels to combat acid rain and to restore the water quality of the Great Lakes, and for thereby jeopardizing the health, economic well-being and the heritage of the present and future generations of Canadians.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion speaks for itself. We on this side of the House regret the performance of the Government on environmental matters and it has forced us to put forward today this motion of non-confidence.

As you may recall, Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) boasted about the long list of achievements on the part of his Government. He did not have the environment in mind, I am sure, otherwise he would not have indulged in self-congratulatory sentiments, as he did. We live, on the one hand, in a country where its citizens want the environment to be given priority, and this we have learned from public opinion polls. On the other hand, we have a Tory Government which pays lip service to the concerns about the environment which have been expressed by Canadians and delivers what, Mr. Speaker? What has this Government really delivered with respect to the environment in the past six months? That is the question.

Has this Government given the environment the high profile which Canadians expect? The answer, regretfully, is no. Has this Government created jobs in the environment? The answer, regretfully, is no. Actually, it has created unemployment through the cuts announced to the wildlife service and the National Research Council, through the interpretation centres, as well as other initiatives. Has the Government, through the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier), met with the United States Environmental Protection Agency in order to discuss the quality of the water of the Niagara River and the Great Lakes? The answer, regretfully, is no. Has this Government strengthened the environmental protection measures which were developed since the inception of Environment Canada in 1972 by successive Liberal Governments? And I would, of course, recognize with due respect a fine Minister for the environment, the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser). The Government has not strengthened the environmental protection measures which it inherited from the Liberal Government.

Has the Government strengthened the support Canada gives to finding a solution to global environmental issues? Here again, regretfully, the answer is no. Sadly enough, this Government has reduced Canada's contribution this year to the United Nations environmental program.

Has the Government celebrated Parks Canada's centennial by way of new park acquisitions or by way of a bold new program for its second centennial? The answer, regretfully, is no, certainly not. It has reduced Parks Canada's budget by $13 million.

Has the Government strengthened our future in renewable resources of energy so as to reduce our dependency on fossil fuels? Here again, regretfully, the answer is no, certainly not. It has disbanded the fine scientists and technicians working in this field at the National Research Council and increased the number of unemployed scientists and technicians in this country by wiping out the entire soft energy research unit in the NRC.

Has this Government accepted the plea by native people and fishermen along the Fraser River Valley who asked for a postponement of one year in the construction of double tracks proposed by Canadian National? The answer here, regretfully again, is no, certainly not. It has rejected their plea because this Government has not got the guts to act as it preaches.

Has this Government told the United States administration that we do have in Canada a program in place between 1980 and 1990 to reduce our sulphur dioxide emissions which contribute to acid rain by 25 per cent, and that parallel to that we have a unanimous commitment by federal and provincial environment Ministers to cut it by 50 per cent by 1994 by way of a plan for modernizing our non-ferrous industries? Certainly not, Mr. Speaker. This Government has neglected the unanimous federal, provincial and public support for these measures and actually thrown away our bargaining position, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) did last December, perhaps with a pathetic intention of currying favour with the Reagan administration.

Has this Government reached out, Mr. Speaker, to environmental groups and administrations? Has it sought their views before making these cuts, given them its long-term vision and generated a climate of confidence? Well, the answer here again is no, certainly not. I am told there are many letters written last fall that are still to be answered. The morale among the non-governmental organizations and interested people is low. Their confidence in this Government is seriously damaged.

Well, Mr. Speaker, because of time limitations I have to stop here in this analysis, but we should ask ourselves at this point why is it that this Government is treating the environment in such a way despite last summer's promises? Is it because it does not understand the crucial importance of the relationship between the environment and the economy? Is it because it does not understand the crucial relationship between the environment and health? Is it because it understands the environment in isolation, like a luxury item? Is it because it sees the environment as a commodity which can be traded, sold, exploited at will? Is it because it is incapable of conceiving the environment as a common good which belongs to us all, be it water, air, soil, fish, all of which have to be managed carefully because we want to preserve it for future generations of Canadians? Is it because it is incapable of seeing and considering the environment as the foundation of our health and the foundation of our economy?

There is evidently a conceptual deficiency on the part of the Government that makes me conclude that the future of the environment in the next few years looks very bleak indeed. Add to this the unfortunate fact that the Prime Minister has chosen as a Minister a person who gives the impression of considering the environment a bore, a nuisance one has to live with, rather than the exciting, meaningful and fascinating world that it is. It is a wonder consisting of the interaction of air, water, soil, flora and fauna, the coming together of living forces each with a role and a meaning from the amoeba to the sea lion, composing that wonderful and dynamic totality we commonly call nature.

We still have, thank God, a terrific Department called Environment Canada to which my colleagues and I would like to pay tribute today. It consists of fine and dedicated civil servants, men and women committed to the well-being of our economy and our health through a sound management of the environment. The only problem with Environment Canada today is the poor judgment of the Prime Minister when he appointed the present Minister, and his insensitivity to the necessity of correcting his mistake. Every day that goes by without bringing in a new Minister, the Prime Minister demonstrates his lack of commitment to the promises he made during the election to environmental groups and Canadians at large. What a sham!

The Prime Minister bears the main responsibility for the fact that the state of the environment has deteriorated in the past six months. He has chosen the wrong person as Minister. He has downgraded Canada's role at home and abroad in combating acid rain, an issue which is so close to the hearts of Canadians. He has given away Canada's bargaining position with the U.S. administration. He also bears the responsibility for sending out the wrong signals by allowing cuts in the industrial and regional development fund where the dollars are to be found for the modernization of our non-ferrous smelters.

The Minister of the Environment has allowed cuts in the environment programs of the Canadian Wildlife Service and the interpretation centres, without consulting the provinces, despite the promises made in the Speech from the Throne, and without consulting interested organizations. The Minister has failed in the important role of building bridges with non-governmental groups and environmentally interested individuals. They are reporting that they feel abandoned by the Government. The Minister has not yet addressed the crucial and complex issue of water, particularly in the Great Lakes. She has yet to meet with the Environmental Protection Agency in the United States.

So far the Minister of the Environment has not made a speech of substance for the public record, except for replies in the House and one ceremonial speech last week. There has been no intellectual, political contribution on her part to the environmental issues of our times. There has been not one ounce of contribution to issues such as South Moresby and Meares Islands, which are sensitive issues for millions of Canadians today who want these areas preserved for future generations. There has not been one ounce of contribution, intellectually or otherwise, to water quality and quantity and what water means to future generations of Canadians.

There has not been one ounce of contribution on the issue of herbicides and pesticides as they are used in agriculture and forestry today, and the search for alternatives. There has not been one ounce of contribution on the long-term but important issue of the greenhouse effect on our climate. There has not been one ounce of contribution on the issue of nuclear winter, which is the ultimate environmental issue. There has been no contribution on issues between the environment and health and the environment and our economy, which is based on natural resources and therefore must rely on a properly managed environment. There has not been one ounce of contribution to the Canada Parks centennial and the future of parks extensions, with respect to the future of the North and the great potential there for parks before the land is locked up.

There has not been one ounce of contribution with respect to whether Lancaster Sound should be used for tanker routes. There has not been any contribution on Canada's role in UNEA and our global role in the environment to sustain the fine reputation that we as a Government, as a nation and as Canadians have earned over the last decade.

Last week in the House, the Minister of the Environment gave no visible support for her colleagues, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie), who were visibly distressed in their efforts to postpone the CN double tracking in the Fraser River Valley for one year, as recommended unanimously by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

In conclusion, in this litany of misery our country is without a Minister of the Environment. At best, it has a phantom or a Minister that never was.

The Prime Minister has not backed up his words with action. While he has been great on public relations, he has done nothing of substance so far with respect to the environment. He has shown poor judgment by appointing the present Minister of the Environment. He has given away the store in our bilateral relations with the United States on acid rain that are coming up this month in Quebec. Not only has he disappointed them, he has angered Canadians from coast to coast. Therefore, we have moved our motion of non-confidence because the record of the Tory Government over the past six months is simply a sham.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member. Is he rising for questions and comments?

Mr. Blaikie: I am rising to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there questions or comments prior to resuming debate?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) is overreacting. Quite often he implied that the Government seems to have lost its bargaining tool with the U.S. administration. I do not know how he can say that because the President of the United States will be in Quebec City on March 17 where he and the Prime Minister of Canada will discuss at length the question of acid rain and possible future controls and co-operative agreements. I think the Member for Davenport should bear in mind that the President and the Prime Minister will be discussing this matter in the near future and should take that into consideration in the very negative comments which he made in the last few minutes.

• (1125)

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) for his words of encouragement. I urge him to raise his voice in his caucus.

Mr. Nunziata: He is just a book-end.

Mr. Caccia: He has 12 days and I urge him to speak on behalf of his electors and Canadians at large, who I am sure he wants to represent. I urge him to impress very firmly on his leader and the Cabinet that Canadians have high expectations from this meeting of March 17 in Quebec City for the very reasons he knows, we know, and everybody in this Chamber knows.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier wishes to ask a question or make a comment.

Mr. Gauthier: First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate my colleague from Davenport (Mr. Caccia) on an interesting and extremely relevant speech.

Here is my question: Earlier this morning the media reported that the United States will tighten up controls on leaded gas emissions in an attempt to eliminate lead from gas by 1988. As former Minister and our party's critic in environmental matters, could the Hon. Member tell us what he thinks of that objective and what measures Canada might take to do away with leaded gas in the not too distant future?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. Speaking for myself, and I am at one with everybody else on this issue, I heartily welcome the decision made by the American Environmental Protection Agency. That decision will go a long way towards reducing gasoline lead content to what may be the lowest level worldwide. And what did we do in 1983? We took the necessary steps to match the American performance by 1986 with respect to leaded gas. Last May, when the American Government announced its intention to reduce gas lead content further still, I strongly supported this initiative and I hope that the commission mandated by the previous Liberal administration to set future target levels after 1986 will draw inspiration from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's latest decision. It means that, in two stages, we might reduce gas lead content to the same level as the Americans, perhaps later even though our common goal is to protect our children's health.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I am a little concerned about this matter of removing lead from gasoline. Does the Hon. Member realize that there are thousands of farm machines in this country that were made to use leaded gasoline? If we ever get to the point where all lead is removed from gasoline, there will be a monetary burden on the shoulders of our agricultural community. Those machines are there. They should be good for 10 or 12 years. We should not simply nullify the investment of our farmers and ignore the fact that they need lead in gasoline to operate their equipment. I am a little concerned when I hear people saying that we will remove all lead from gasoline by a certain date. We should have some consideration for those people who bought machines which can only be fueled with leaded gasoline. I should like to have the Hon. Member's comments.

• (1130)

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to comment. It is the voice of cavemen which we have just heard. I will try to elucidate a little on it. This is an issue where a choice has to be made between lead and health. There is a point when health has to come first on the farm as well. The utilization of gasoline which has a high content of lead in the long term is not good for farmers. It is not good for the produce of farms because lead deposits find their way into the soil.

I appreciate the fact that there is a difference in urgency between rural and urban because of volumes and densities of consumption. The volumes of gasoline burned in the city and therefore the depositing of lead at the street level has certainly led to great concern in terms of the health of children in many capitals of the world. The fact is that the content of lead in blood of children in a city like Mexico City where there are no restrictions on lead content is very high compared with the situation in Tokyo where gasoline is lead free and where traces of lead are not found in the blood of children.

Any pathologist could prove and demonstrate that the presence of lead in blood, particularly in the early life of a human being, leads to disturbances, cerebral disadvantages and health conditions which we would not want to generate in children anywhere in the world, whether they are in cities or on farms.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, the record indicates that the amount of damage which would be done in rural areas is minimal, if any at all. I do not think it is right or fair to say that we will let farmers pay the bill again. Let us get some expert advice on this matter before we start saying that every ounce or every gallon of gasoline will have no lead. There is a place for lead. These machines were made for leaded gasoline. A small amount, pathologists have told me, in a rural area does not amount to a hill of beans. I think we have to give some consideration to the farmers of the country for a change.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, if the Progressive Conservative view is that machines come before human health, I will leave the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor)—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: I didn't say that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) has the floor.

Mr. Caccia: That is implicit in the Hon. Member's remarks. If he cannot take the heat, he should not make such remarks in the House. Evidently he feels that health on the farm is not important, that machinery comes first and that the health of children and adults should not be safeguarded.

Mr. Taylor: I didn't say that at all.

Mr. Caccia: I do not know how many in his own Party would subscribe to that notion. Quite frankly, I think I have answered the question.

Mr. Taylor: You have not answered the question at all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Unfortunately, the period for questions and comments has expired. We will now resume debate.

Debate. The Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier).

Hon. Suzanne Blais-Grenier (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to recall what has been done by this Government and my Department since we came to power.

The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) has taken his Party's usual somber, dramatic and strident approach in having us believe that this country is at death's door. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is setting himself up as the saviour of humanity, of Canada, of wildlife, of the health of Canadians, and as an expert on acid rain and hazardous products. He knows the pressure groups, which are friends of his, and he is going to tell us he would have done a much better job.

Mr. Speaker, we in the Progressive Conservative Party have always been very clear in our choice of words. We said that we were here to undo the harm done by the previous Government's extravagant spending, a Government that made us live on credit for 15 years and which emptied the coffers of all the departments before we came to power. I have some examples in my own Department, of contracts that were signed between September 4 and September 17. There was a rush to empty the Treasury, and since that time they have been complaining loud and clear because the present Government has been obliged to make cutbacks. However, Canadians have realized it was time the Government stopped living on credit. Canadians have a lot of sense—a lot more than the Hon. Member for Davenport.

Mr. Speaker, I am very proud of what I have accomplished in my Department, and despite all the somber remarks by my colleague, I can inform the House that after my swearing in, I was in my office at 8:30 the next morning, having talks with my officials. Two weeks later, I met Canadian Environment Ministers at a federal-provincial conference in Newfoundland, and I asked their support for the major plans and priorities I was setting up for the Department. Unlike the Liberals, however, I did not feel obliged to tell any reporter who wanted to listen what I was going to do in the months to come. All these decisions will be announced in due time. Mr. Speaker, I therefore met with the Ministers of the Environment who were assembled in Newfoundland, and we set up a common action plan to deal with the most pressing problems confronting Canada's environment. Unlike the former Government, we sat down together, we developed strategies, we talked, we understood each other and we shared responsibilities. Can the Hon. Member for Davenport say as much, after he told people on American television, and I shall quote him in his own language so he will understand me clearly:

[English]

Keep your garbage in your own country.

• (1140)

That, Mr. Speaker, is typical of the attitude of the previous Government which is criticizing us today for taking the time to sit down with representatives of our clients, for taking the time to consult and to reach an understanding with the provinces instead of getting carried away by all kinds of action plans that are totally useless. In fact, the only thing my hon. colleague produced during his mandate as Minister is a lot of grand statements. In this Government, we do not make grand statements, Mr. Speaker. We act.

At the beginning of October, I met with my federal and provincial colleagues and we sat down to set up a strategy. At the end of October, with my colleague, the Minister for External Affairs, I signed the Skagit Agreement between British Columbia and the State of Washington. This agreement has been in the works for 42 years. Mr. Speaker, that is one accomplishment. After only six weeks, a Minister is still new to the job, but this Minister, after six weeks, signed an agreement that had been in the works for 42 years. Because it had not been feasible to conclude the agreement, Mr. Speaker? Not at all! Because the previous Government did not feel like helping the provinces solve their problems.

Finally, in October I met with the Habitat Foundation and shed some of the responsibilities of my Department, entrusting them to a private organization which has since made tremendous progress at a far lower cost than would have been the case if it had been the federal Government. I can also assure you that I have frequent and entirely cordial consultations with the Habitat Foundation.

In early December, I met with representatives of Canadian steel mills. They told me it was the first time a Minister of the Environment spoke to them and sat down with them to try and assess their problems. It was the first time a Minister said: Let us solve the acid rain problem together!

I have also met with representatives from the mining and chemical industries to discuss the control of hazardous and toxic products. Furthermore, I went to London to prepare for the Economic Summit. With my Environment colleagues, we got together to try and set up and prepare the subject matter that will be discussed by the Prime Ministers and representatives of the countries taking part in the Bonn Economic Summit in May.

And that is not all. While my colleague spent days with newspaper reporters telling them that I was unable to perform as a Minister, I was setting up a federal-provincial conference—again with the Ministers of Environment—to hammer out an agreement on acid rains. Throughout Canada, this has been hailed as a historical agreement which, for the first time, will enable the provinces and the federal Government to set their own acid rain reduction standards. That is what we have accomplished in six months, not to mention some other things. In January, for instance, I was in Toronto to attend a meeting of wildlife Ministers, the first time ever for a federal Minister.

Well, as my colleague points out, here is someone who does not understand Canada's wildlife problems, who could not care less and who supports the Department of Environment as something that must be supported since there is no other option.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the rhetoric of my colleague on the other side of the House no longer fools Canadians. That is why they voted for an open Government on September 4, a Government which has little use for empty talk but which takes action and tells them: We do have problems in this country. We are overburdened by the deficit, but we will pull through by working together. That is the kind of language they have not heard in 22 years, Mr. Speaker.

It was with all those considerations in mind that I took over the Department of Environment and targeted five major priorities during my term in office. That is more than my colleague has ever done.

Within and without Canada, I stress the fact that an unpolluted environment is the prerequisite of economic growth. That is why I convened for March 11 a conference on environmental and economic issues where environment specialists and businessmen will sit at the same table for the first time in an attempt to solve problems rather than create conflicts by distorting situations beyond recognition.

Mr. Speaker, that national consultation on the economy ought to broaden future perspectives and is our response to Canadians who have told us in a recent poll that they are quite prepared to reach for their wallet if that will help solve environmental problems. According to the poll, most of them would readily contribute between $5 and $15 per capita to come to grips with what everyone knows are very complicated problems.

During the same time, Mr. Speaker, I cut departmental staff by some 405 person-years, but no one has ever mentioned the 6,000 public service jobs eliminated by the Liberal Government between 1979 and 1981. But they did try to turn those 400 person-years into an issue, making quite a fuss about it and claiming that Canada's environment and wildlife were in dire straits. What about those 405 person-years which represent about 300 public servants? The number is steadily going down. Here is the situation: All positions have been filled, except for 35 to 40. That is what my Opposition colleague and some newspapermen following his trail kept repeating throughout the fall to describe what they termed the dangerous situation of wildlife in Canada.

The Department still has several thousand employees and a budget of $800 million. I think that Canadians are in favour of our withdrawing as much as possible from very costly programs which can be taken over by volunteers and innovative private sector interests, and I suggest that the Wildlife Habitat Foundation is the best example of that.

My colleague claims that I have shown no concern for water resources, Mr. Speaker. We did show concern for water resources and settled some outstanding issues about five weeks ago. We renewed the water agreement with Ontario, we looked into the situation of the Great Lakes and we are now busy setting up monitoring facilities. I have had several conversations with the Chairman of the commission of inquiry on water management in Canada and we are looking forward to receiving his report and recommendations in the near future. I can assure my colleague that I will implement the Pearse report recommendations to the extent permissible by my departmental resources. The Chairman of the Pearse Commission is already quite pleased with our support and the discussion I had with him.

We want to cooperate with the people instead of taking unilateral decisions in our Ottawa ivory tower. Consultation does take time and I intend to take all the time necessary to make the process work. I will unveil very important decisions in the next few days and I am convinced that the Canadian public is quite satisfied with the Government at this time. Canadians realize that 22 years of inertia in federal departments cannot be eradicated overnight, that it will take some time. The economy must be handled very rationally and very carefully, and the Canadian public is certainly not complaining, unlike our hon. friends opposite. In poll after poll, Canadians have shown they are happy to see a Conservative Government of our caliber leading the country.

They say I have done nothing about acid rain. Might I remind the House of the Montreal agreement with the provinces and the action plan we promised and which is still being pursued. That is one of the promises we made during the election campaign. We are preparing for the Bonn Summit. An agreement is to be signed with Sweden in early April and another agreement under the auspices of CITES in Brazil at the end of April, and at the OECD in June, and all these decisions require a tremendous amount of research and planning. When people complain that I am hiding in my office, Mr. Speaker, I am indeed in my office, but I am preparing strategies for action and discussing problems with my colleagues and making decisions, and obviously, I do not spend my time sitting at the door of the Press Club on Wellington Street. Besides, it is a bit cool for that sort of thing these days, although I might consider doing so next June.

I make a habit of working in my office with my departmental officials and not announcing decisions until they have been finalized and can be made public. I am very happy and proud to be Minister of the Environment, and I promise my hon. friend opposite that my mandate at Environment will be a very fruitful one and that it will not compare in any way with his own mandate.

• (1150)

[English]

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Minister if she would explain to the House why she has not reconstituted the parliamentary committee on acid rain.

[Translation]

Mrs. Blais-Grenier: With pleasure. In fact, I would like to see the sub-committee re-established. At my request, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans tried to meet with the Hon. Members opposite to seek their approval for re-instating the sub-committee, and he told me that it had been impossible until quite recently.

[English]

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I would like to verify that reply, because it is total news to us.

Would the Hon. Minister explain to the House why she has cut the Canadian Wildlife Service by 25 per cent?

[Translation]

Mrs. Blais-Grenier: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend who is so concerned about the Canadian environment had the same concern for these matters, he would have attended the committee meeting this morning and would know about the information I am giving him at this moment.

[English]

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, would the Hon. Minister explain to the House why she did not consult with the provinces before she undertook the cut of 25 per cent?

[Translation]

Mrs. Blais-Grenier: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I will consult 26 million people before deciding to re-allocate priorities in my Department, because the funds at my disposal are restricted as a result of uncontrolled spending by the previous Government for which management was of no concern at all. Today, I must reserve the person-years and funding available to my Department for essential matters such as hazardous products management, management of Canada's water supply, acid rain and a number of other very costly projects.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the minister mentioned how it would be her disposition on enviromental matters to take her time, consult, and that we would have to wait to see the quality of her decisions, rather than announcing her every move to the press. If that is her philosophy, I wonder if she could explain why she took absolutely no time for consultation with respect to the cuts in the Canadian Wildlife Service, why those cuts were made so swiftly, and why the Deputy Minister is quoted as saying that swiftness and secrecy with respect to the cuts in the Canadian Wildlife Service were of the essence when it concerned those particular cut-backs?

[Translation]

Mrs. Blais-Grenier: Obviously the Hon. Member is very close to certain people who are currently striving to protect redundant jobs at any cost. Knowing he is from the New Democratic Party, I do not hold that against him, I would say this is a rather normal thing. I will certainly not consult with the Canadian people once more before assuming my responsibilities as a Minister and a manager within my Department. I think we have arranged those cuts so they could be presented to Canadians as an integrated scheme and Canadians have remarkably well accepted the results of our review. So much so that the polls that followed gave the Progressive Conservative Party a stronger showing than the election polls carried out last summer.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, am I to understand the Minister correctly? She used two words in her speech. She used the word "extravagances" as it related to past Liberal extravagances. I know there were some past Liberal extravagances. I know there were some past Liberal extravagances, but I wonder if the Minister could tell us whether the services which she cut in the Canadian Wildlife Service were what she regarded as examples of those extravagances.

A few minutes ago she used the word "redundant", and said that I, as a New Democreat, had styood to defend redundant jobs. Could she tell the House if she regards the work which was being carried out by the Canadian Wildlife Sevice—and which was cut by her—as both extravagant and redundant? That seems to be the tone of her remarks.

Mrs. Blais-Grenier: Mr. Spearker, this is exactly the kind of speech we have been hearing day after day in this House. If Hon. Members opposite would do their homework rather than quote things we never said, it would be much better.

I have spoken of the previous Government's wastefulness, and even my colleague from the NDP has to admit that there has been tremendous wastefulness. I do not think he would have the guts to rise in his place today and say it has not been so. I was absolutely not referring to any program in my Department.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, if there were extravagances, why did this Government not cut those extravagances instead of cutting other programs which it now does not have the nerve to define as extravagant? Yet that is exactly what we are led to believe from the remarks of the Minister. She has not made an effort to defend or justify the cuts, except in terms of the over-all fiscal policy of the Government. If she is going to do that, she must tell us why these particular items were cut and why other items were not cut. She has not done that today. She had an opportunity to make her case in the House and she has failed miserably to do so.

[Translation]

Mrs. Blais-Grenier: Mr. Speaker, not only have I justified all the cuts I allowed, but I justified them before the Standing Committee of the House on Fisheries and Oceans. The Hon. Member was in attendance. I am therefore amazed that he should pretend not to know and to be shocked, since he was there. That was at least three months ago. I justified each and every cut, Mr. Speaker. I have no intention of withdrawing any of them, because I justified all of them in the context of our federal mandate and the integration of the private sector's and the voluntary sector's efforts with the Department's efforts, something that had not been done before because there was no concern for consultation.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the Minister of Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) for her excellent speech. I would like to ask her a question concerning the March 11 conference between her Department and the people concerned with the environment, especially industrialists. Could she provide us with further details on that conference?

Mrs. Blais-Grenier: Mr. Speaker, I used the word "conference", but I think it would have been more accurate to describe that as "consultations". There will indeed be representatives from the business community, the financial sector, environment protection groups and officials from my Department. Together we are trying to clear up the situation and come up with a strategy for putting our resources in conmmon, in order to solve the most urgent environmental problems. But those problems are very costly and complex, and we will have to rely indeed on all the abilities and the energies that exist in Canada in order to solve those problems.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not want to put words in the Minister's mouth, as she suggested. However, on November 13 the Minister announced via a press release that 416 government jobs in her Department would be terminated. Today in her speech she said that 405 positions had been eliminated. Further on in her speech she said that 300 public servants would lose their jobs. Far be it for me to put words in the Minister's mouth, but I would like some Tory translation of these three conflicting statistics. In Tory language, how many people lost their jobs as a result of the Minister's cuts?

[Translation]

Mrs. Blais-Grenier: Mr. Speaker, the figures that appeared in Hansard referred to person-years. However, a person can occupy a position for three months or six months or nine months or twelve months. So there are more person-years than persons because there may be temporary jobs.

For instance, there were about 300 persons involved. I do not have the figures before me, and I apologize for any mistake I may have made, if it was 305 instead of 300 person-years. However, I am not too worried about that. I did not bring all the figures with me. What I can say is that all the individuals who lost their jobs have been redeployed elsewhere, except for between 35 and 45 employees. In fact, we are confident, as I said to the two presidents of the unions in question, that we will be able to find jobs for these people by March 31. I am not making any promises. I am just saying that we are confident.

Finally, I think some Hon. Members would have us believe this is a very dramatic situation, while in fact only a few units are concerned. I might remind the Hon. Member opposite that the Liberal Party, his Party, cut 7,000 positions in the Public Service of Canada between 1978 and 1981, and nobody mentioned the fact, especially not the Liberal Party.

● (1200)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has now terminated. We will resume debate.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I am beginning to learn the meaning of the word "hysteria". I would like to thank the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) for giving us the opportunity to debate the approach of this Government to the protection and management of the environment. If there is one area where this Government has clearly failed, where it has clearly stumbled since its election, it is in the area of the environment.

The Government has failed in two ways, Mr. Speaker. First, it is doing things which it does not have a mandate to do. At no time during the election campaign did the Government indicate it would take the attitude it is now taking towards the environment. Second, the Government is making many mistakes in what it is doing and these will come back to haunt us for years to come.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) sees fit to leave the House in the midst of a debate on the environment.

Mr. Nunziata: It shows how much she cares.

Mr. Hawkes: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) rises on a point of order to say, I presume, that the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) should not allude to the fact that the Minister has left the House. I believe the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill knows that.

Mr. Blaikie: The fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that this is further evidence of a continuing unwillingness on the part of the Minister, with the exception of the one time she appeared before the committee on December 20, to engage in a dialogue, either with Members of Parliament or with the public, as to the advisability of the cuts she has made.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, this Government has failed and stumbled with respect to the environment and I would like to go over a few of those areas. The first area has to do with the cuts to the Canadian Wildlife Service. In the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to which the Department of the Environment reports, we have heard testimony after testimony, evidence after evidence and witness after witness to the effect that the cut-backs which were made by the Minister to the Canadian Wildlife Service are a very serious error and will damage not only the environment but the ability of the Canadian Government to manage the environment by causing itself to lose the expertise of so many people.

Rather than quoting over and over again what witnesses have had to say in front of the committee, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to call the attention of the House to an article in the magazine Equinox for March-April, 1985, which I just received yesterday. It is entitled "What Price Wildlife?" The sub-title reads: "Venerated at Home, Respected Abroad, the Canadian Wildlife Service becomes an endangered species". I commend this article to those Hon. Members in the House and to those of the public who may be interested in the effect of the cut-backs to the Canadian Wildlife Service.

Even though I have been paying attention to the issue, obviously, as the environment critic for my Party, I hadn't quite realized just how ridiculous and absurdly stupid some of these cuts are until I had the opportunity to read this article, which pointed out the full human and environmental dimensions of some of the work which was going on. I will not say much more about the Canadian Wildlife Service cut-backs except to quote the last paragraph of this article, which I think puts it extremely well. It paraphrases what Tony Keith, a biologist in the Canadian Wildlife Service, has to say:

> What Keith is saying is that sooner or later, some prairie slough will fill with the floating carcasses of ducks, killed by untested chemicals from a cropduster that accidentally overflew a field. Anthrax and brucellosis will cause bison to totter and fall to the muskegs of northern Alberta, and there will be no wildlife veterinarian to treat them. National park wardens may even come across the bloodied body of a camper, the victim of a grizzly attack that might have been prevented with another season's research into bears' feeding habits. And the public outcry may then be so loud that the politicians who are today making the cuts will be forced to rehire the very biological expertise they now dismiss as surplus to departmental requirements. Canadians will have learned the hard way about the true costs of casting out decades of accumulated ecological knowledge for the sake of quick-fix adjustments to one year's federal budget.

That is the kind of short-sightedness, Mr. Speaker, which these cuts represent. It is the kind of short-sightedness which I am still hopeful will be condemned by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry itself. That committee has shown some leadership in this House by unanimously recommending to the House some time ago that the double-tracking of the CNR in the Ashcroft subdivision be put on hold because of the environmental consequences as well as the question of the well-being of the native people. I am hoping that that committee will show the same kind of leadership with respect to the cut-backs to the Canadian Wildlife Service. No one has come before the committee to say a good word about the cuts and any committee worth its salt, after it has heard this unanimous evidence, must then say itself that these cuts ought to be reserved by the Minister, and soon, because many of them are about to take place.

What else has the Government done with respect to the environment? It has already been noted that it cut back on its contribution to the United Nations environment program, which was embarrassing internationally. It is just further evidence of the way in which this Government is falling into line behind the United States and its attitude toward UN programs. The Minister of the Environment celebrates the hundredth anniversary of national parks in Canada by going ahead with a $13 million cut to our national parks and by rambling on about the privatization of them.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that I first raised the issue of the further $13 million cut in this House just before Christmas and no one paid much attention then. But we see the cut-back coming now to our national parks. That is the way the Conservatives celebrate the centenary of our national parks, and it is now talking about privatization. Is there not a Tory in the crowd, an Hon. Member sitting opposite, who knows that at the very least our parks are public? We can argue about other areas of economic activity but I thought we had come to the point where we did not have to talk about whether parks should be privatized or not. Yet that is the sort of ideological silliness and extremeness which we find on the part of certain Hon. Members opposite, and the Minister of the Environment in particular.

What has the Government done with respect to renewable energy and the environmental benefits of developing that energy option as opposed to many of the other options which we have concentrated on for so many years? It almost wiped that option out completely while going ahead with the uncritical attitude towards the nuclear option which was so characteristic of the previous Liberal Government.

What has the Government done with respect to double-tracking and the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and, by the way, the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, with respect to that action? We still have no assurances as yet that that double-tracking will not go ahead until all of the concerns of the native people, the fishermen and the people who are concerned about the salmon habitat have been met. In fact, we witnessed a debate last week in which a Conservative majority on the other side of the House prevented a vote from taking place and prevented a debate from being extended. I must say at the same time that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) and the chairman of the committee abstained from that obstruction, and that is to their credit. There we had one afternoon where Parliament almost seemed to be working. It almost seemed as if some independence was going to be exerted by Parliament and its committees over the Government with respect to this important environmental issue. But where was the Minister of the Environment? She was not even around for that.

Another environmental failure by this Government was the decision taken with respect to the herbicide Allachlor and the way in which the Department of Agriculture has been allowed to continue the policy established over the Liberal decades of letting the users, that is to say Agriculture and Transport, have the final say over what is used instead of the people who are making recommendations from a health or environmental point of view, being the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of the Environment. That is a question of structure and the low priority given to environmental concerns in the bureaucracy or the hierarchy of ministries, if you like. This has to change if we are to be able to address some of these issues. I had hoped we might be able to see some of that change if we had a strong Minister of the Environment. Instead, we have hardly a Minister at all. So I am not very hopeful on that score.

With respect to Canada-U.S. relations and the whole question of acid rain, Great Lakes water quality and so on, what have we seen? We have the Shamrock Summit coming and we still have not seen any action by this Government with respect to an announcement that it will move to reduce auto emissions to the standard pertaining in the United States. Are we going to get that announcement before March 17? That would have been something the Minister could have talked about. We still do not know. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), instead of having to make a private telephone call to Mr. Reagan as the paper reported this morning, then might have something to show. He might be able to say that we have come up to scratch with respect to auto emission standards and now we expect them to come across. We then would not be in the position of having to acquiesce to the argument that I am sure the President will make, as he has done time and time again, about the need for more research.

The United States has really not accepted that this is a problem. As an article by David Suzuki in The Toronto Star on Saturday says, Mr. Speaker, the demand for absolute proof is a polluter's cop-out excuse. That is exactly what is going on with respect to acid rain in the U.S. That is why I welcomed the Prime Minister's remarks some months ago about having to go to the bargaining table with clean hands. If that was not just sort of a preliminary for not doing anything, then we need to see some action to indicate the Prime Minister was serious. One of the ways he could show us he was serious would be by making an announcement about nitrous oxide before March 17.

We could have full reinstatement of the herring gull program instead of one out of six people in the program being reinstated. That would be a sign that we were serious about at least monitoring Great Lakes water quality, if not doing anything about it. But instead the Minister announced that she was reinstating the program, and a month or two later we find out that one person out of six has been reinstated. That work is not being done.

Mr. Fulton: It is called fraud.

Mr. Blaikie: I agree. It was a fraudulent announcement, meant to mislead people and take the heat off the Minister for a little while. Maybe it did in an insignificant way, but people have come to know that the program has not been reinstated.

But that is one of the things the Minister could do and which the Prime Minister could do if he wanted to sit down with clean hands at the bargaining table on March 17.

Again with respect to the herring gull program, we see an article on the front page of The Globe and Mail yesterday about the inadequate registry of birth defects we have in this country. That is something, of course, that we cannot immediately dump on the lap of the present Government. That inadequacy belongs to previous Liberal Governments. But if the Government was serious about trying to move in that environmental area, it would take steps to make adequate its registry of birth defects. It would take steps to make adequate environmental monitoring programs like the herring gull program and then we could have some confidence. Part of the problem is that you listen to the Minister but you never get one squeak of passion about the environment. Not so much as a murmur or a moan. Nothing. You would hardly even know she was the Minister of the Environment. She could at least have the decency to get up and sound as if she regrets the fact she had to make these cuts. But you do not even get a sense that she regrets it. That is the thing that causes us real despair. If the Minister could get up and say this is the burden of necessity and she wished she did not have to do it, that is one thing. But instead she gets up and talks the fiscal language game and implies these programs are extravagant, redundant, a luxury which can be sacrificed. This is what causes despair as much as the cuts themselves. The Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) says the Minister is Canada's answer to James Watt. I am afraid that is so true.

The Americans do not have any problem standing up for their interests. They are trying to put the heat on President Reagan now to take a message to Prime Minister Mulroney concerning our laws on generic drugs. Why can our Prime Minister not take the same kind of firm message to the United States at the Shamrock Summit?

I am not just sure how much time I have left, Mr. Speaker, but I have a few more things I want to comment on and then I would like to move an amendment. I would like to spend a little more time on acid rain because this is a question of maturity, of how we relate to the U.S. As I said before, the U.S. does not have any problems sticking up for itself. We just had an experience in Manitoba where, because Manitoba and Canada and the people were firm on the Garrison River diversion project, the North Dakotans are saying that they are going to prohibit the import of Canadian electricity. I guess that is what you call a mature response!

That is the kind of mature relationship that the Minister wants with the United States. Or is it, of course, because I say that with tongue in cheek? On the other hand, a Bill has been introduced in Congress saying that if Canada does not clean up its act on acid rain, they are going to ban imports of Canadian electricity. So on the one hand we are getting it because we are environmentally sensitive, and on the other hand we are going to get the same penalty for not being environmentally sensitive. So sometimes our neighbours to the South do act irrationally. What I am saying is that if the Prime Minister is serious about having a mature relationship with the U.S., then he needs to go to that table, hopefully with clean hands, and then he will be able to be firm with the President over acid rain and other issues.

I mentioned before the question of renewable resources and the need to develop them and the fact that funding for them has been wiped out. But they never were given a very high priority when you compare the hundreds of millions of dollars which have been poured down the drain in the nuclear industry in this country as a result of technological vanity and the refusal to criticize that industry, which was so characteristic of the previous Liberal regime.

I have an amendment which I think would add a great deal to this motion and would put the environmental picture more in balance if it were to be accepted by the House. Therefore I move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), that after the words "Great Lakes" the following words be added:

● (1220)

—for continuing the long established bias toward the environmentally dangerous option of nuclear power over alternative and renewable energy sources,

If I have any time left, Mr. Speaker, I will speak to the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the proposed amendment. With the permission of the House I would like to take the proposed amendment under advisement before I rule on its admissibility. In the meantime I suggest we continue the debate on the main motion with the Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), who has two minutes left.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could say a word about the issue of nuclear power versus other sources of energy. To myself and a lot of Canadians who are concerned about the environment, this is the central or paradigmatic question. How you view the role of nuclear power determines your understanding of environmental issues. As long as we continue to pour inordinate amounts of money into that particular energy option while we spend trifling amounts or nothing at all, as will be the case under this Government, on renewable energy sources, we are committed to a technological world view that ultimately will be destructive of the environment which we all say we care about. That is why this amendment is important and why we ought to debate it.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, earlier today the Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) talked about lead in gasoline. I do not think it is difficult for Members of the House to understand that that is an important health consideration in the City of Toronto. His response to the Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) seemed to indicate that he thought the environment in western Canada on the Prairies has identical health hazard implications with regard to leaded gasoline. I suggest he might want to visit the Prairies.

The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill is from the west. Does he think that the Department of the Environment and the Minister of the Environment, because of a health hazard problem in Toronto or Montreal, should put forward regulations which govern farming on the Prairies? Is that the way national policy should be developed? The Liberals always did it that way. Does the NDP support the Liberals in that, or should we have different policies across the country because the environment is different across this country? This is a big country with a lot of differences.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill does not have to answer the question because I believe it relates to the speech of the Hon. Member for Davenport. However, if he wishes, he may.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I understood the second half of the question to be directed to me. I would like to take issue with the view expressed by the Hon. Member that it was the Liberal way to have the Department of National Health and Welfare make a recommendation and then apply it uncritically right across the country. In fact, the Liberal record is that the Department of National Health and Welfare did not have much say at all. It made lots of recommendations, most of which were not heeded. I do not think the Hon. Member was paying attention all those years while he was watching the Liberal Government. If he had been paying attention he would have seen that it was as I said it was. The Departments of National Health and Welfare and the Environment did not have much clout. It was the Departments of Agriculture and Transport which made the decisions. The quality of those decisions, and whether those decisions with respect to health hazards ought to take into account certain realities, is another matter. The Member has the Liberal way all mixed up.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I thought the Member made an excellent speech. Because of the pressures of time there were two items which he did not deal with at any length. He did not really talk about the Liberal record in this area. We must recognize that the problems we are facing at this time are not new. These problems did not occur after September 4. Acid rain, the lack of progress in negotiations with the United States, and the problems we face in so many fields, are a result of many years of Liberal Government. We must remember that it failed to protect the environment. I would like to hear the comments of the Member on that.

The other item which I think is important and which has become public recently is that the Atomic Energy Control Board has completely failed to control and regulate the nuclear industry in the country. There is information that workers have been forced to inhale radiodactive dust, that radioactive materials have been left in towns because there is lack of adequate storage, and that the Atomic Energy Control Board refused to listen to its own research staff when making its decisions. I have called for an inquiry into the role of the Atomic Energy Control Board and the nuclear industry in the country. I would like to hear the Member's view on that.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the first point the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) made is a good one, but I would like to spend most of my time on the second point with respect to the nuclear industry. Over the years the Liberal Government had a totally uncritical commitment to the nuclear industry and the nuclear option. Any attempts to have a critical review conducted ended up in an internal departmental review. There were no public hearings or public discussions on what was involved in a continuing commitment to this option.

The Conservatives were different in 1979. One of the first things they announced in 1979 was a parliamentary inquiry into the nuclear fuel cycle. What happened to that, Mr. Speaker? All we get now is an odd statement from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) about the possible commercial benefits of nuclear power or, even more frightening, ramblings from the same Minister about the commercial benefits of Canada becoming a radioactive garbage dump for the rest of the world. I can show you the comments of the Minister in a letter to the town council of Gimli in that respect, Mr. Speaker.

The Government has a totally commercial view of the nuclear industry. That means that we will not get an inquiry or debate. Canadians will not be invited to talk about the kind of energy future they want. It will be full speed ahead, business as usual, just like the Liberals when it comes to nuclear energy. That is very unfortunate, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. Member for Davenport asked me a question informally and I would like to put it on the record. He asked, "What about uranium mining in Saskatchewan?" In this House in 1980 I stood up in the course of a debate on a Private Member's Bill of mine calling for a moratorium on nuclear power and said that I was against uranium mining in Saskatchewan, no matter who mines it and no matter who happens to be in power. I still take that position. Fortunately, that is now the position of the Saskatchewan and the federal New Democratic Party. There is complete unanimity within the Party with respect to uranium mining and the need to phase it out.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, it bothers me that the Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) on the one hand asks the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) why she is cutting research. On the other hand, when he talks about the President of the United States, he says he wants research. Is the Member for research or against research in the environment?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, that is about the dumbest question I have been asked in a long time, but I will try to answer it. We do not need more research on acid rain. We know we have a problem and we must act. We must continue research on the consequences of pesticides in sloughs in prairie Canada or other things which are working their way into our environment, because we must learn how to act. The only straw man that the Member sets up is himself.

• (1230)

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hills seemed to attack the cuts and ask for their rescission. Given that there is limited money and that we want to help senior citizens in this country, which of these cuts should be rescinded in preference to using the same money for senior citizens?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the self-righteousness of the Hon. Member for Calgary West knows no bounds. Why does he not talk about the increased budget for the Prime Minister's office? Why do we not hear about that when he sheds crocodile tears for the senior citizens of this country? He has his nerve, getting up and falsely making us choose between helping the environment and helping senior citizens. Why did we not hear about the Prime Minister's office? Why did the Hon. Member not mention the 57 per cent increase in the Prime Minister's office?

Incidentally, when the Conservatives were in opposition they continually criticized the Prime Minister's office as being the source of all evil in the country and the tool that was destroying Parliament and democracy. Now that the Conservatives are in power we see a 57 per cent increase in the Prime Minister's office. And the Hon. Member for Calgary has the nerve to get up and say that we must make difficult choices between senior citizens and the environment. We must make difficult choices all right, but it is not between the environment and senior citizens.

Mr. Hawkes: Could the Member deal with the specifics of which cuts should be rescinded because they are more important than aid to senior citizens, for example? Which of these cuts is more important than aid to senior citizens?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I made it quite clear that I think all of the cuts to the Canadian Wildlife Service should be cancelled. However, the Hon. Member and his Government has not given us an honest answer yet with respect to the other side of the spending question concerning tax expenditures. When the Government comes clean as to the $30 billion to $50 billion that it is spending in the form of tax expenditures, we will be able to get an accurate picture of what is happening. At that time we will know all of the ways in which the public treasury is being drained of money, not only through spending on programs but through spending in the form of revenue that is never collected. We have yet to get such a statement from the Hon. Member or his Government. Once we have that statement we will know that the Government is serious about fiscal responsibility and is not just looking for ways in which to pursue its own ideologies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is ready to rule on the proposed amendment. The Chair must rule the amendment out of order because it would add to the main amendment. I cite Beauchesne Fifth Edition, page 168, Citation 482:

> On an allotted day, during consideration of the business of Supply, an amendment must not provide the basis for an entirely different debate than that proposed in the original motion.

The Chair is of the opinion that if the proposed amendment was accepted it would in fact lead to a different debate. For those reasons, the Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With respect, might I point out that in speaking to the motion, the Member who moved the motion spoke about the fact that the Government had cut funds for renewable energy resources as part of his rationale for moving the motion. As far as the amendment and what it speaks to is concerned, it was part and parcel of the over-all argument for the advisability of the main motion.

I suggest it is obvious to anyone who thinks about it that the whole question of how we manage our energy future and whether we invest in something which has long-term environmental uncertainties, like the disposal of radioactive waste or whether we invest in solar energy, is clearly a question of the management and protection of our environment. I cannot understand why you would see fit to rule my amendment out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The decision has been made. The text of the motion is the pertinent part, not the speeches of Members. We shall resume debate with the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Gurbin).

Mr. Gary Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Members—

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I apologize to the Parliamentary Secretary. On Opposition days it is customary that the rotation system be applied whereby, after a round of speeches is completed, the speaker from the Party that moves the motion is recognized first on the second round. I respectfully submit that you might want to continue this fine tradition.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, having been in the House for approximately six years, I believe there is a great deal of variation. It was not abnormal to move from the Government side to the Opposition side, always starting with the Opposition. That seemed to be the precedent that was established today. The second speaker was from the Government, so that the fourth speaker and sixth speaker would be from the Government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will take the remarks of the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) into consideration. However, for the time being the floor is given to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Environment.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to continue debate and try to deal with some of the questions that have been raised. It is my opinion that some of these issues which have been introduced into debate are red herrings. I am accustomed to hearing debate from the Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) and the Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) and have been impressed by their generosity, understanding and sincerity. However, in the last two or three months it has been difficult to maintain that impression due to their inability to understand and apply constructive criticism to the Government's efforts on behalf of the environment.

Let there be no mistake that our Government intends to provide the action that is needed in order to ensure that our environmental scene will benefit all Canadians and protect our future heritage.

The Hon. Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) wishes to apologize to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill for being unable to listen to his comments. She had other obligations which required her to be elsewhere and it was difficult for her to rearrange her schedule because the motion was introduced as late as possible yesterday. However, she will read the Hon. Member's speech in Hansard.

Let me try to explain the position of both Opposition Parties with respect to environmental issues, as I understand it. On November 8, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) gave the clearest indication ever of the conditions under which the Government must operate. We opened the books as much as possible to explain the economic situation we faced. Many of the departments did their best to reduce their expenditures in the short time they were given. This included the Department of the Environment which, after considering its full range of programs, had to decide which programs could appropriately and reasonably be cut back.

In spite of the positive advances that we have made which I believe all Canadians support, Members opposite have for some unexplained reason decided to approach this issue on a personal basis, as is evident from the comments made by the Member for Davenport. I think they have lost sight of the objectives and requirements with respect to the environment of Canada.

One of our first steps, even as an Opposition Party, was to support a new park for Canada in this centennial year of Parks Canada. The Minister stated as recently as several weeks ago that under the Conservative Government and her Department there is a definite and increasing future for national parks in Canada. I cannot guarantee that it would be established on the exact terms of reference with which all Members would be completely content but that commitment has been made and I believe it will be honoured.

The background alluded to by one of the questioners of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill, the background to this whole situation with the environment, is one that cannot be discussed without ascribing some responsibility, particularly to the Member for Davenport. If there is one piece of testimony that says it all and one that should not be viewed as politically partisan, it would have to be a document that was produced and released at the end of last year called "Time Lost". The committee was chaired by the former Member for Sault Ste. Marie. Members from all Parties served on that committee. There were those who distinguished themselves, such as the Hon. Member for Vancouver South, the Minister for Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser), and the Hon. Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling), who is well known to all people concerned, especially on the acid rain issue. What this committee which had been reconstituted from 1980 to 1984 found was that there had not been any accomplishment. The Minister in the previous Government had really not been able to accomplish anything, although he had brave words, passionate statements and press releases almost every day from his Department. But if you come right down to the nitty-gritty, Mr. Speaker, what he really ended up with was an empty hand. He was not able to produce. It may not have been all his fault. It may have been the disposition of people with whom he had to work in the Cabinet, and for that I can only offer him my sympathy.

Mr. Blaikie: Now you know what it is like.

Mr. Gurbin: The Hon. Member opposite reacts and responds quickly. He says "Now you know what it is like". This Government has been in place for six months.

Mr. Caccia: Far too long.

Mr. Gurbin: Commitments have been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). I believe statements made in the past few weeks by the Prime Minister repeated very clearly and soundly that we intend to fulfil our commitments. He has recognized the difficulty in dealing honestly and effectively with the President of the United States and in accomplishing the needs that we have on our own domestic scene to reduce the terrible environmental burden of continuous air pollution, particularly as a result of acid rain.

The Hon. Member has asked about auto emissions. In contrast to what occurred before, there were hearings which took place in 1984 which brought all of the interested parties, all of those affected and concerned, together to consider all of the specifics that one must consider when one talks about controlling auto emissions. We have a very bad record in the control of auto emissions. I do not think the previous Minister who was criticizing us today has much room, if he is honest with himself, for standing in the House and affronting the Minister of the Environment after three or four months, a period that has been filled almost continuously with consultation and efforts to address in a serious way the problems we have to face. The commitment has been made for action, Mr. Speaker. We will be judged on the basis of whether we can produce that action.

The background for this debate is also around the centennial year for Parks Canada. Parks Canada started out 100 years ago with several individual Canadians, actually two people, who did not like what was happening. I think the CN was involved at that time.

Mr. Blaikie: One hundred years ago, it was not the CN.

Mr. Gurbin: I think so.

Mr. Blaikie: The CN did not exist. You must mean the CP.

Mr. Gurbin: Excuse me, I apologize, it was the CP.

The interesting point, and the point that I raise now, is that this is a reflection of something we need to get back to. It is one of the things that this Government and this Minister has been trying to do and which will be shown in the future to be very effective. It is to listen and to work with individual Canadians, be it private enterprise on an individual basis with voluntary organizations or whatever, to try to develop, protect and maintain environmental standards and conditions in the best interests of all Canadians.

The most specific and recent example is the Creston Valley Wildlife Interpretive Centre. During the budget cuts announced on November 8, it is clear that the Wildlife interpretive Centres, five of them across Canada, face closure. In working with a local group in British Columbia, that particular interpretive centre will now remain open and will continue to remain open partially with support of the provincial Government and the Minister of the Environment of British Columbia, Environment Canada and the Minister of the Environment, and private voluntary groups. That is an example we hope will be repeated, perhaps not in exactly the same way but in a similar way in Wye Marsh. This is an example that can be repeated right across Canada.

In the same vein, hearing the criticisms of the wildlife cuts, there has always been a disposition that this is the only way, that there is disaster and everything will fall apart because the cuts have been put in place. Members are not happy with some of the restored programs.

Mr. Blaikie: They have not been restored. That is why we are not happy.

Mr. Gurbin: Always there is a sense that it cannot or will not be done because the same program has not been replaced in the same way.

Mr. Blaikie: Restore them and we will be happy.

Mr. Gurbin: If we talk about the herring gull program to which there has been reference today, one person out of six from that basic program was restored. He is now working out of a separate place with other support systems. Maybe that whole program is not back in the same way, but that program, the parts of it that we feel are very important for longitudinal studies, we have every right to believe can be maintained in an effective way for the purposes intended.

The notion I am trying to communicate is not so much a question on any specific, but to argue that because we did things in a particular way, because we collected tax dollars and hired certain people to do a certain job in a certain way, that is not to say there is no other way that we cannot accomplish a similar or a better end. It has been pretty impressive to see some of the communications and to witness some of the discussions that are now under way to try to address some of the problems we all accept are there. I am speaking not only of programs that have been cut but of programs that we have not yet considered, and perhaps of chemicals that may yet be discovered to be dangerous. This whole area of organizing, funding and supporting that type of activity is something that does need, not just another person here or there, but rather a constructive approach. It needs a unified, organized approach, although there are other ways. I have no doubt about this, in which we could probably be more successful. I want to point out to Members opposite that not only have we not neglected this area, but I think in the end we will be in a better position than we have been historically.

There is another area, almost another level, that I think Members who want to address the environment have to be able to work with. There have been some comments back and forth about our need to engage the United States in a meaningful agreement in order to solve our own problems. I do not think there is any debate on that point. The approach we had been taking over the past several years in attempting to accomplish that has been very impressive. Time after time the comments made by the Hon. Member for Davenport only antagonized, polarized positions and resulted in making it more difficult to achieve that very important goal. Not only were we not doing our own homework or cleaning up our own backyard, but we were polarizing the international situation in a way that made it very difficult to reach a successful conclusion.

We have entered a new era of co-operation. I think we have a new capacity to achieve a very important and successful agreement on issues ranging from acid rain to toxic chemicals in the Great Lakes and to things which affect the environment in total, even in terms of wildlife and migratory birds and the agreements which are necessary. In the past three or four weeks we have done a number of positive and constructive things. With that as a background, we can expect to see the Minister of the Environment and the Department of the Environment fulfilling the mandate all Canadians expect and want them to fulfil. I am sure they will serve the interests of Canadians.

I am not sure how much time I have remaining, but I should like to make a final point. An idea which has been advanced in the past six or seven months concerns budget cuts, deficits and our international relationships. It started out last May and June with an OECD economic summit in Paris dealing with the environment. I attended that meeting with the then Minister of the Environment. We had a long series of discussions. The funny part is that he now seems not to recall the important discussions which occurred at that time. They indicated that we would have to consider very seriously the environment in relation to the economy, not just the cost of clean-up but the whole range of economic activity in which any modern nation is involved and the impact it will have on the economy. In fact, the conclusion reached—and I think it will be proven in the future—is that clean air is cheaper. If we do it right, most efficiently, most effectively and probably most economically, in the end we will all benefit in a large number of ways. It is not like the hard-nosed economic sense which most people would associate with things like productivity and efficiency; it is in the whole range or gambit of things which affect our daily lives, which very much affect our quality of life and the environment of the whole globe.

I should like to leave Hon. Members opposite and the House with the assurance that I for one—I may have some advantage over Hon. Members opposite in being a little closer to it—have no question that the Government at the end of its mandate will have proven that in fact it is capable of doing what Canadians want done in the environment in a whole range of areas, from acid rain to auto emissions. We will be judged at that time. I hope Hon. members opposite in judging us will give us credit, if it is earned, when the time comes.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member who just spoke. With respect to the cuts in the wildlife service, time and again when people appeared before the committee they were asked whether there was any other way to do these things, particularly on the research side. It was not necessarily on the wildlife interpretive side but on the research side. They were asked whether there was anyone in the private sector, in the university sector or in any sector whatsoever who would pick up this work. The answer was always no. Does the Hon. Member not recall that evidence being given before the committee? He is acting now like he was not even there.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, the problem was that I was there.

Mr. Nystrom: Was that a problem?

Mr. Gurbin: The confinement which I am trying to help Hon. Members opposite get around—the two of them who have spoken so far—is that they are not hoisted on their own petard yet but they are caught in their own box. The short answer is that it is entirely possible that others can do this work. I will readily admit that I did not know for sure. There have now been serious discussions which allow me to answer that it is possible for others to do the work, even in research. I think that is the important question. Even wildlife groups think it is quite possible for interpretive centres to function properly. Both the Canadian Wildlife Federation and the Canadian Nature Federation have suggested that that was entirely reasonable, that they should be able to function.

The research part is the one with which we have been having trouble. There have been discussions now which lead me to be able to answer very honestly and very directly that yes, it is possible. We are working on it.

Mr. Blaikie: I have a supplementary question for the Hon. Member. I notice that he was unable to cite any witnesses who claimed that this kind of work could be done in the private sector or in the university sector. I stand by my original claim until I have real evidence to the contrary, not just the optimism of the Hon. Member, an optimism which is clearly in his own self-interest to promote.

Will we have an announcement with respect to nitrous oxide emissions before March 17? I addressed that in my speech, and I would like to know whether or not the Prime Minister will have that announcement in his hot little hands, so to speak, when he goes to the bargaining table with the President?

Mr. Gurbin: On the first part of the question, I accept fully the comments of the Hon. Member that it is in my self-interest to suggest it would be possible. I have no hesitation in doing that. I would not like to do that and expose myself if I thought it might cost me too much in the future.

The other point which I think is important to include in that is that interested wildlife federations almost unanimously suggested—I have one reference here and I remember another one from another group—that cuts were possible. They felt that they were fully possible, maybe even more cuts in the wildlife services. It was very clear from their point of view that additional cuts, if they were to be made, should be done in a certain way. However, each of them indicated that they thought that was entirely reasonable. They thought we could be more efficient and manage ourselves better. I just wanted to put that on the record, to make sure it was clear.

In answer to the second part of the Hon. Member's question, the only thing I can tell him is that the Minister of the Environment, obviously in co-operation with the Prime Minister, is working as hard as possible to achieve a satisfactory conclusion to the commitments we made as the Conservative Party during the election campaign and since. I hope he will not be unhappy with the results.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary was present when the witnesses appeared before the committee. Perhaps he could address himself to a particular point. The Government had all kinds of opportunity to bring other witnesses before the committee, if it had wanted to, to stand and say what kinds of cuts should take place. It could have had people from the Department and so on. The Minister did not really back up the cuts. None of her officials really backed them up. Every witness said that those were the worst possible cuts. They said that if there were to be cuts in Environment Canada, they could cut in certain areas, but that the areas cut were areas which were not extravagant and not redundant. Would the Parliamentary Secretary now agree in the House, on the basis of the evidence heard by the committee, that those cuts were the worst possible ones which could have taken place in Environment Canada and the Canadian Wildlife Service?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to reply to that question after the daily routine of business this afternoon.

It now being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PREMIER'S TRIAL—PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF MARIJUANA FIND

Mr. John Nunziata (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. MacKay) to tell the House of Commons when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) was first made aware that marijuana was found in Premier Hatfield's luggage. I have asked the same question on numerous occasions, but the Government has consistently refused to answer. Why? What is it hiding? Is the Prime Minister afraid to admit that he was improperly involved in the case? This stonewall of silence would make Richard Nixon look life a rank amateur.

Yesterday the Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie) rose to babble on, as he usually does, when I asked my question again, notwithstanding that my question was directed to the Solicitor-General. It was interesting to see the Minister of Justice come to the defence of the Solicitor-General when, only two weeks ago, he stabbed the Solicitor-General in the back by calling for his resignation, and calling him politically incompetent.

Yesterday the Minister of Justice said that the Prime Minister was told that marijuana was found the day before charges were laid, that is, October 25. That is absolute and utter nonsense. The marijuana was found on September 25. The Solicitor-General was told on September 26. It was national news on October 20. How then can it be said that the Prime Minister did not know until October 25?

To suggest that the Prime Minister did not see a newspaper or hear a newscast between October 20 and October 25 is ludicrous and misleading. It is a deliberate misstatement of fact. Surely the Prime Minister became—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the people from the Beauce area and the rest of Quebec are already reaping the benefits of the decision they made last September 4 when they elected a Progressive Conservative Government which has now been in office for six months. Yesterday, we celebrated its anniversary. A change in attitude and a more human approach to problems are two elements which should be noted enthusiastically and emphatically. Our attitude toward the provinces is also noteworthy. We have recognized the legitimacy of the duly-elected Quebec Government and we shall continue to promote co-operation.

As mentioned by Raymond Giroux of the newspaper Le Soleil, the Canadian Government wants to prove that dialogue and exchanges are preferable to constant efforts to destroy everything.

Mr. Speaker, things have changed over the last six months; people are no longer treated with contempt, arrogance and a complete lack of consultation. We have cleaned up the political atmosphere. Things are starting to work at every level. People realize that we want to listen to them. They have claims and grievances, and we are attentive to them.

As the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said recently, we are fortunate enough to live in a rich country, not only in terms of material resources level, but also human resources, because we have a free, rich and diversified society where everyone enjoys the unique privilege of building the life he wants to live as he pleases. As a Government, we shall have to make decisions which are likely to be difficult. We must show confidence in the future and those who govern the country. Together, we shall continue to build a Canada which can meet the aspirations of the people from Beauce, Quebec, and the rest of Canada.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

TIRBUTE TO WORK OF WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, in British Columbia we have seen a 25 per cent reduction in public sector jobs, cuts in legal aid and rent subsidies, a freeze in welfare payments, and the withdrawal of funding for women's programs. The Socred practice of restraint has been particularly disastrous for women who have lost both the services and the jobs which existed to deliver those services.

Women are the primary beneficiaries of social services, legal aid, subsidized housing, minimum labour standards, and of a number of other programs denounced as excessive and unnecessary by the executors of restraint. In spite of all this, there exists the ongoing efforts of women in British Columbia to meet the ever-increasing economic, social, and supportive needs in their communities. I speak for my own riding of Kamloops-Shuswap which reflects much of this aftermath of restraint.

I would like to go on record in praise and support of the Kamloops Women's Resource Centre, the Kamloops & Salmon Arm Women's Emergency Shelter, the B.C. Native Women's Society, the Rape Crisis Centres, and all other services in my constituency that continue to address the burdens of women, burdens augmented as a result of economic restraint.

Women should not be expected to carry the major responsibilities for correcting inequities. It is clear that equality for all of us, in every sense of the word, requires major changes in our economy. This can only happen when all sectors of our society share the responsibility. The Government of Canada can play its rightful role in this regard by funding those groups and organizations serving the needs of women and which support the basic principle of equality for women.

TRADE

EFFECT OF WORLD PRICES ON SUGAR PRODUCERS

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, I rise to inform Parliament about the current world sugar situation and how 1,500 Canadian sugar beet producers in Quebec, Manitoba, and Alberta are being affected.

The world cost of producing cane and beet sugar is about 15 cents per pound. Eight-five per cent of world sugar trades at guaranteed domestic prices which range from 22 cents in the U.S.A. to over 40 cents a pound in Cuba. The EEC subsidy alone is 15 cents a pound. This price is guaranteed by quotas, tariffs, and subsidies. In Canada we face a situation where some 15 per cent of the world surplus determines our price, which is 4 cents per pound U.S. and, as such, we will surely lose our producers.

Canadians consume about 1 million tonnes of sugar, of which 90 per cent is imported. The amount of money leaving Canada for that sugar this year is about $80 million U.S. However, in 1980 when the price of sugar was 43 cents per pound, the cost was $800 million. Therefore, a healthy domestic sugar industry is good for consumers as protection against unstable world prices, for our foreign exchange account, for our manufacturers of machinery, and for our producers.

I strongly urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) and the Cabinet to make a short-term investment in this industry to ensure its survival, followed by the development of a long-term national sugar policy to put us in step with the rest of the world.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

STATUS OF WOMEN

ECONOMIC EQUALITY

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, during the last election campaign, the Prime Minister promised to increase to 30 per cent the number of women sitting on various boards, commissions, Crown corporations, decision-making committees and regulatory agencies, although he did not deem it necessary to promise an increase to 52 per cent, which would have reflected the percentage of women in society.

However, the Prime Minsiter has yet to appoint more than a very few women to key positions. We can now see that the commitments made by the Conservative Party as regards positive action programs in the public service, public agencies and crown corporations and the elimination of obstacles of economic equality between men and women were more the result of a desire to please the voters than of a willingness to make room for women at the various decision-making levels.

All these promises are along the same lines as the recommendations of Judge Rosalie Abella, whose report does not seem to provide much inspiration to the Conservative Party. This is regrettable.

Needless to say, women's status should not be a partisan issue. The Prime Minister should therefore act quickly to give Canadian women the equality they deserve.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH STATION IN TÉMISCAMINGUE

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the determination, dynamism and undeterred confidence of socio-economic groups in my riding will soon witness the fruitful outcome of their efforts.

A major agricultural research station is now under consideration in my riding. The probable establishment of such a station in Témiscamingue will meet an urgent need of the agricultural community and it has the unanimous support of all social and political interest groups. This is an important issue for the economy of my riding, since the proposed agricultural research station is estimated at close to $8 million and would create hundreds of jobs.

The first step towards this worthwile endeavour has been made possible through the co-operation of Agriculture Canada which will soon hire two scientists who will take up residence at and be affiliated with the University of Quebec at Rouyn with a view to making surveys and launching the agricultural research station project.

Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to commend Agriculture Canada for its support and co-operation in this project.

Mr. Speaker, the project will have significant economic fallouts throughout the Abitibi-Témiscamingue region and make my riding one of Canada's leading agricultural development centres. At long last will Témiscamingue see the concrete outcome of its agricultural calling.

S.O. 21

ECONOMIC EQUALITY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, this week is the International Women's Week and I noticed in the annual report of the Department of Employment and Immigration that Canada Employment Centres last year allotted 32 per cent of all jobs in Canada to women. Only 32 per cent of the jobs went to women, although women account for 42 per cent of the labour force in Canada. Why the discrepancy? Even Mr. Edwards, the Assistant Deputy Minister of Employment and Immigration stated on December 5 before the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and I quote:

To the extent that our job creation programs have a smaller proportion of women than their share in the labour force, that will have a depressing influence.

Even the Assistant Deputy Minister is frustrated, Mr. Speaker.

Before Christmas, we also had Mr. Justice Abella's report, which was replete with recommendations to change or correct that discrimination against Canadian women. There were many recommendations on affirmative action, justice, equality between women and men in Canada. Six months have already gone by since the new Tory Government was elected, and they had ample opportunity to make their studies. Let them act now!

COMMITTEE STUDY OF TAX ISSUES

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, some in the farm community have expressed concern over the contents of the discussion paper Tax Issues in Agriculture. The paper starts with a description of the economic environment in which tax policy must be considered, and then discusses, in turn, the three issues of tax deductions of losses by part-time farmers, taxation of capital gains, and the concept of agribonds.

It is unfortunate that many of the statistics which are quoted in the paper date back to the 1981 agricultural census and 1982 Revenue Canada figures. The conclusions which could be drawn from these data would clearly be erroneous in light of the urgent situation facing agriculture.

Fortunately, tonight marks the first meeting of the parliamentary committee which will study these important agricultural tax matters. Thus, while the discussion paper has provided a useful background for consideration of these issues, it is important that the input of the agricultural community be secured through the committee's hearings.

The evidence presented to the agricultural tax committee will provide more up-to-date information on the present status of the agriculture industry. The mandate of the agricultural tax committee is to listen to the briefs presented, and to report expeditiously to the House. It is hoped that the recommendations concerning Section 31, capital gains and agribonds, will constitute an important and vital contribution to the budgetary formation process.

CONGRATULATIONS AND ENCOURAGEMENT

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic): Since this is International Women's Week, and with all due respect for the Chair, I feel I must inject a bit of humour into the proceedings. Ten years ago, we had International Women's Year and a year later, March 8 was designated as International Women's Day. From 1976 to 1978, the only Member of this House to mention the fact was Mr. Stanley Knowles. I wish to congratulate him on his openmindedness. He was ahead of his time.

In 1979, the House sat only two months, from October to December, as veteran Members will recall. In 1980, the House started its session in April, so of course no one had a chance to make any special reference to International Women's Day. In 1982, we had the bells episode, which we are not likely to forget, and in 1983-84 everything was back to normal. There was a reference to the good work done by our Government. In fact, this day has always been used to congratulate the Government on its good work and its effort to improve the status of women.

Today, I would like to make an exception, Mr. Speaker. I wish to congratulate the women of Canada. In ten years, the number of women in the House has tripled, from nine Members in 1975 to our present number of 25. This augurs well for the next generation of women Members. We have also proven that competence is not a matter of age, since we cover two generations here in the House. I therefore wish to extend my congratulations and words of encouragement to the women in this House and to the women of Canada. Keep up the good work—we are on the right track!

ABORTION

VIDEOTAPE OF ABORTION PROCESS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, if a nuclear bomb were dropped on Ottawa probably 50,000 humans would die, and every newspaper and every government in the world would call it a disaster. Yet, every year in Canada, some 50,000 human babies are murdered and it is barely newsworthy. Perhaps it is because we do not really realize what happens when a baby is aborted.

Modern technology has enabled Dr. Bernard Nathanson to use a sonogram videotape to picture a 12-week old child in the womb being aborted. A hollow plastic tube with a sharp tip is inserted and, using suction from a vacuum, the feotus starts to be torn apart. The baby retreats helplessly to the far side to escape the device, but it pulls off her legs and disembowels her. She struggles, her head falls back, and her mouth opens in agony. Then a pair of forceps crushes the brain, and another child is murdered.

The sonogram proves beyond a shadow of a doubt that the feotus is alive. It is a human being. He or she cringes and tries to escape death. We can watch and see the gruesome picture of a child being brutally murdered. The mouth opens in a cry for help. Can't you hear that silent scream?

ATLANTIC ACCORD—TERMS OF CLAUSE 54

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. During a recent visit to Newfoundland several people, including people in the media and the Public Service, brought to my attention a concern regarding Clause 54 of the Atlantic Accord which was recently signed by the Prime Minister and the Premier of Newfoundland.

In answer to a question from my colleague, the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate, on February 27, the Prime Minister said that he would be willing to look at that particular clause which, as it is now written, would effectively prohibit the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador from developing a refinery capacity to use offshore oil. Will the Prime Minister give us his undertaking that he will, in consultation with his colleagues in Newfoundland, reopen that clause?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the entire agreement was negotiated with the view to being of assistance in developing the economy of Newfoundland and Labrador, clearly we would place an appropriate construction, and a helpful and positive construction, on any clause which might be so interpreted by some people. I can tell the Hon. Member that is not the view of the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador in any official manner, nor is it the view of this Government. We believe very strongly that this document reflects an important instrument of growth and new prosperity for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador.

INTERPRETATION OF CLAUSE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. In reading that clause, the use of Hibernia oil is only available to facilities which are already in place on the day the legislation implementing the Accord is proclaimed. There are no facilities currently in place in Newfoundland. Therefore, Clause 54 would mean that offshore oil would have to go to refineries in Quebec and the Maritimes. Despite the interpretations he may have been given, would the Prime Minister, together with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, look at this matter again? I urge him to renegotiate that clause.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is not the interpretation which I would give to Clause 54, nor is it the interpretation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and her provincial colleague. Having said that, inasmuch as the entire thrust of the negotiations was to be helpful to Newfoundland and Labrador in getting this tremendous resource developed—it having been neglected for 13 years by the previous Government—clearly any doubt in a matter such as this would be resolved in favour of the Province of Newfoundland.

COME-BY-CHANCE OIL REFINERY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we hope that is so, but that is not the advice I have, nor is it our interpretation in reading that particular clause.

Would the Prime Minister be prepared to table in the House, if it exists, a study that would substantiate claims which are being made by both Petro-Canada and the Government of Newfoundland that it would be cheaper to build a new refinery rather than de-mothball the current refinery in Come-By-Chance? The Prime Minister should understand that, under Clause 54, the scrapping of Come-By-Chance would, in effect, scrap any future prospects for Newfoundland for refining of its own products and building a petrochemical industry.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Hon. Member that the situation which he describes is not the intent of, nor will it result from the Atlantic Accord. I believe the Government of Newfoundland has other plans for the facilities which he mentioned and, therefore, it would not be appropriate for us to comment on that without first holding consultations with Newfoundland.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL PROVIDE INTEREST-FREE LOAN TO DOMTAR

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Last week, he tried to evade the issue by giving different answers every day when questioned about the Domtar case and by varying his reasons for rejecting the subsidy request. We now know that his Minister, supported therein by the Prime Minister, will not give Domtar the requested grant. Other options such as a tax credit where mentioned, but we now know that Domtar is already applying the maximum amount of tax credits to which it is entitled under the present legislation. We know that a loan guarantee will not change Domtar's risk ratio for the $1.2 billion project. Could the Prime Minister inform the House whether he is now prepared to consider a third option, namely, an interest free loan, to help Domtar carry out its project?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to the Hon. Member that my Government intends to work together with the Government of Quebec and Domtar to find a formula for helping the company. I think that has been our position since the very beginning. Furthermore, there will be talks, on Friday I believe, with Mr. Lévesque, and I expect that the Domtar case will be on the agenda. I do not think anyone questions our desire to offer our sincere co-operation. As the Hon. Member is aware, we were obliged to turn down a request for a grant of $100 million, but that does not preclude some form of co-operation in other areas.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND MR. LÉVESQUE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister may be stalling for time when he refers to discussions that will take place this Friday, since he knows as well as I do that Premier Lévesque has no authorization from Domtar to settle this case Friday with the Prime Minister of Canada. He knows perfectly well that Premier Lévesque cannot act on behalf of Domtar shareholders.

My question is therefore: What is the Prime Minister going to negotiate with Mr. Lévesque Friday, on the backs of Domtar employees? What does the Prime Minister intend to negotiate, when he knows perfectly well that Mr. Lévesque is not authorized to negotiate on behalf of Domtar?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is saying that Mr. Lévesque has no authorization. Of course not. He controls the company.

An Hon. Member: Wake up, guys!

Mr. Mulroney: I think I should add, for the record, that the Domtar request was made under the previous Government. A request for $100 million was submitted to the previous Liberal Government on April 19 last year, and the Liberal Government refused to act on it.

I think I should mention in this connection that we received a document from the Canadian Pulp and Paper Producers Association, stating their philosophy and recommendations. The main one is as follows, and I quote:

[English]

The advisory committee is deeply skeptical of the wisdom of Government making major capital grants for the expansion of manufacturing capacity in pulp and paper. We believe that expansion should occur only in response to market forces.

That is the document that was submitted to us, signed by Mr. R. R. Pinard, Executive Vice-President and CEO of Domtar Inc.

THE SENATE

CABINET CONSIDERATION OF REFORM

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I think the Prime Minister would agree with me that the Minister of Justice from time to time has a colourful and direct way of stating the truth. Since the Minister of Justice said yesterday, referring to the august body of the Senate, "I can't see that the Senate performs any really useful function"—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Minister of Justice is clapping. Considering that this useless body costs Canadians almost $1 million a week, would it be correct for me to assume that the proposals which senior Ministers of the Cabinet decided upon this morning to circulate to the provinces for reform, include the direct abolition of the Senate?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice said that the Senate performs absolutely no useful function.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: That is because he is not Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I understand.

Mr. Mulroney: I can think of one useful function that the Senate fulfils. I want to tell my hon. friend that we have received, as usual, the complete and brilliant advice from the Minister of Justice this morning in this regard. We will be consulting with the provinces and, as soon as I have something, I will be back to my hon. friend.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER PROPOSE ABOLITION OF SENATE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, given the views of the Minister of Justice—I am trying to be very temperate—on this institution, and the well known views of the Deputy Prime Minister and, I dare to say, hopefully half of the Cabinet, not to mention 80 per cent of the people of Canada who correctly see the Senate as being useless and costly simultaneously, and since it takes the same section of our Constitution to abolish the Senate as it does to provide any other amendment of substance, will the Prime Minister give us his assurance today that he will propose to the provinces the correct, democratic action, which is to abolish this abominable institution?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I would give that assurance to my hon. friend if the Leader of the Opposition would stand up right now and say he seconds that motion.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are so many Hon. Members rising, I cannot figure out who is rising to ask a question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, to paraphrase the Prime Minister: "There is no hack like an old hack".

REQUEST FOR ACTION ON ABOLITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I had thought that the only issue that separated the Liberals from the Conservatives in the recent election campaign was the issue of patronage. It is clear that the only difference between them is that the Prime Minister wants Conservative patronage instead of Liberal patronage.

I put this very serious question to the Prime Minister. Considering that the Prime Minister made a serious issue of patronage during the election campaign, which the people of Canada took very seriously, and considering that this Party will support him all the way on its abolition, will the Prime Minister do the correct thing and try to mobilize the people of Canada and the provincial Premiers to abolish the Senate?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the issue, unfortunately, is rather more complex than my hon. friend suggests. We cannot, unfortunately, use the kind of procedure which he recommends without running into a veto by our friends in the other place. It was for this reason that I requested the support of the Leader of the Opposition in this regard. If that support is not forthcoming, I can assure the House that, in co-operation with the New Democratic Party, we will make moves to clean the place up, notwithstanding the opposition of the Liberals who are clearly led from the Senate on some major issues. We are trying to support the Leader of the Opposition as best we can.

● (1430)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am a bit appalled by the attitude of the Prime Minister. He is the Prime Minister and, if he wants to abolish the Senate, he has enough Members to do it. He does not have to play games with anyone in this House and cop out like that.

DOMTAR PROJECT—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, with his argument that the government is trying to get out of a hole for which others are to be blamed and by reading a statement of one of the Domtar vice-presidents a few moments ago to the effect that no company should be receiving assistance, was the Prime Minister trying to tell us that he does not intend to provide any assistance to the Domtar project in the Richmond constituency?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): On the contrary, and this was not a statement by a Domtar vice-president, but a statement on principle by the Forest Industries Advisory Committee, with all the members of the executive committee, who, for their part, made a statement in principle in favour of the national association of which Domtar is a member. One of those signing this statement was the executive vice-president of Domtar. However, this is a statement on principle by the pulp and paper companies which are asking us not to make any donations; however, we shall try to find a formula which could help the Windsor project.

GOVERNMENT AID TO DOMTAR—ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES FOR EASTERN TOWNSHIPS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister aware that if the Canadian Government were to provide a $100 million subsidy to Domtar at this time, it would recover its entire investment within three or four years, because this would create $1.2 billion of economic activity in one of the regions of Quebec where there is the greatest need of economic assistance at this time?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we shall see whether the figures quoted by the Hon.

Member are really accurate when we scrutinize them. However, we should be told once and for all whether the Leader of the Opposition, speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party, is in favour of a direct contribution of $100 million. Is the answer yes or no? This is what we would like to know?

DRUG PATENT LAWS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister concerning changes in the drug patent laws which are being urged on us by the pharmaceutical manufacturers. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that, when he meets with President Reagan and discusses this question, he will give the President no assurances that Canada will change these laws in a way which will increase substantially the price of prescription drugs to Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure the Hon. Member by quite simply telling him that in conjunction with pharmaceutical and generic companies we are now looking for a solution to that problem of pharmaceutical licences, and I can assure him that in so doing we are attempting to safeguard the best interests of Canadian consumers.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the reason I directed my question to the Prime Minister was that the media report this is a question which will be discussed by the Prime Minister and the President.

POSSIBILITY OF DRUG PRICE INCREASES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Given that Mr. Hunter, director of the Competition Branch in his Department, has estimated that these increases could run as high as $750 million a year, will he assure the House and the people of Canada that his Department and the Government will not agree to any changes in the legislation which will mean substantial price increases for the people of Canada?

ATLANTIC ACCORD—CLAUSE 54

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He has today been very cautious with respect to his answers concerning Clause 54 of the Atlantic Accord. He knows very well that clause allows for refining of Hibernia crude in Newfoundland only if such facilities exist in Newfoundland on the day this legislation is proclaimed. He knows as well that currently there are no such facilities. He knows Petro-Canada wants to scrap the Come-By-Chance refinery and has publicly said so. Will the Prime Minister not recognize that Clause 54 will place the Province of Newfoundland in the same position with respect to Hibernia oil that we find ourselves in with respect to Churchill Falls hydro power, that is, we lose forever any right of recall of a resource for use in the Province of Newfoundland? Will he not recognize that basic and fundamental fact?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is really too bad that the Official Opposition cannot find anything good to say about the Atlantic Accord since it is the most important and beneficial document ever to be signed between the two levels of Government since Confederation. If you are looking for bad news, you can read anything you want into Clause 54. The intent and thrust of that clause was to give first refusal or prior access for Newfoundland to Hibernia, and also to ensure continuing and full access in the future.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, it is not only the Official Opposition but the Nova Scotia Minister of Energy who cannot find anything good that he wants to opt for in this Atlantic Accord. It is incredible that the Minister would stand up and say that anyone can read anything they want into Clause 54. That is precisely the problem, and we want it clarified.

USE OF OFFSHORE OIL

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, will the Government move to make absolutely clear that Newfoundland does not foreclose any future right to utilize Newfoundland offshore oil in the Province of Newfoundland, to create jobs for Newfoundlanders? Will the Minister not give that clear commitment today?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the position outlined by the Hon. Member was the position taken by his Party when it was in government. It was not the position taken by our Party. The whole thrust of the Atlantic Accord is to bring industrial benefits to Newfoundland and ensure that this Province shares and participates in the offshore resources.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—ACID RAIN ISSUE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister and it deals with the impending Shamrock Summit. He just refused to give assurances to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North that the interests of Canadian consumers with respect to the price of drugs would be defended at that meeting. We also notice that Canada has had to cave in on things like Star Wars and foreign investment.

In light of this mature peer relationship he wants to establish between Canada and the U.S., can the Prime Minister tell us why it is that he is reduced to considering having to make a telephone call to the President, on the eve of the Summit, to see if, in return for all these concessions, we might not get something token with respect to acid rain?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to what the Hon. Member refers. He seems to be offended at the prospect of a reasonable and civil relationship between friends and allies. I know it is deeply offensive to the NDP to get along with people.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Or with each other.

Mr. Mulroney: Or with each other. But I can assure my hon. friend that it is our judgment that the people of Canada want the Government of Canada to get along with the provinces, the regions, and our friends, neighbours, and allies around the world. That is exactly what we are going to do.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, there is a difference between getting along with people and living on your knees.

REDUCTION OF POLLUTING EMISSIONS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I am referring to a report in the paper that he might be calling the President to ask for a concession on acid rain. Will we be hearing from the Prime Minister before March 17 that the Government will be moving on the reduction of nitrous oxide emissions here in Canada so that, with respect to the Prime Minister's remark about going to the table with clean hands, we will have something to show in the way of action here at home concerning acid rain?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): What is it about the NDP that causes them to be concerned that when you conduct yourself in a civil way you presume there is some degree of subservience? We have conducted ourselves with honour and independence. That has always been the policy of Canada, and it will always remain the policy of Canada with our friends and neighbours.

An Hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Mulroney: With regard to the question, we will have a statement tomorrow.

FINANCE

PURCHASE OF TREASURY BILLS—TAXATION OF PROFITS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. A large number of Canadians are purchasers of our country's Treasury bills. Those bills are purchased at a discount without any reference to an interest rate. Is it the opinion of the Minister of Finance that the profit earned on those bills is taxable income? What arrangement has the Minister of Finance made to remind people who have purchased those bills that they must pay income tax on the profits earned?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is quite right. The discount on Treasury bills is income. It is taxable, and not to report that taxable income is an evasion of tax. I have been concerned about this for the past two or three years. I have discussed this with officials and with my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue. We have been in touch with members of the investment community to advise them that if people are not reporting this income it is evasion of tax and will be dealt with accordingly.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PREMIER'S TRIAL—INTERNAL INVESTIGATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the suntanned Solicitor General. I would like to ask him about the report commissioned by Commissioner Simmonds into the RCMP handling of the Hatfield investigation. Is that report ready? If it is not ready, in what stage of readiness is it? When does he expect to receive it?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the report is not yet ready. It is substantially complete and, when it is ready, I will be informing him and other Members of that situation.

ALLEGATIONS ATTRIBUTED TO PREMIER

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the report also cover allegations made by Premier Hatfield subsequent to the commissioning of the report by Commissioner Simmonds, that members of the RCMP were out to get him and to bring down his Government? Will the report deal with that as well?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we shall have to wait until the report is received before we get into any such details, if in fact they are made public.

Oral Questions

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

APPLICATION OF POLICY

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Prime Minister Lange of New Zealand has said, in the context of his Government's refusal to allow nuclear capable ships in its ports: "We want no part of nuclear weapons . . . we do not ask, we do not expect, the United States to come to our assistance with nuclear weapons or to present American nuclear capability as a deterrent to an attacker". Is the Canadian Government prepared to take its own "no nuclear weapons on Canadian soil" policy to the same logical conclusion?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, naturally I am not going to comment on the position of the Government of New Zealand, except to note that New Zealand is not a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Canada is a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and we intend to continue to honour our obligations and play a full and prominent role in carrying out our obligations as a member of NATO.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, by implication the Minister is saying that New Zealand is not a loyal member of the alliance to which it belongs.

CANADIAN POSITION

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. The answer of the Secretary of State for External Affairs accepts, uncritically, the American nuclear umbrella as a so-called protection of Canada. When the Prime Minister meets the President, will he accept uncritically all aspects of American nuclear policy, including MX missiles, star wars, and ASAT testing and development?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that inflammatory question is, of course not. Canada has taken consistently, and with particular vigour since the election of the Government on September 4 last, a position that indicates that we intend to assert vigorously the sovereignty of Canada, to respect the values that are important to us, and to defend them in a way that respects our sovereignty. That includes, among other things, closing the holes in the DEW Line so that Canadian security and sovereignty will be protected in the future.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Jewett: That's no answer at all.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I have one other point to make, Mr. Speaker. If this fresh interest in having the NDP join NATO—

Ms. Jewett: Don't be silly. Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —was based on the view that New Zealand is a member of NATO, then I suggest the NDP had better inform themselves.

Ms. Jewett: What a dummy.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

AWARDING OF CONTRACTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. He will recall that two months ago today I wrote to the Commissioner of the RCMP requesting a criminal investigation into the awarding of certain government advertising contracts. My colleague, the Member for York Centre, wrote to the Minister of Justice concerning the same topic. Is the Minister now in a position to inform the House whether there will be such an investigation, recognizing that two months of delay is a long time, and that justice delayed is justice denied?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice may wish to comment on this matter, but the most recent information I have on the situation is that the Commissioner had not made a determination that there is need for such an investigation.

RCMP—REQUEST THAT SOLICITOR GENERAL SEEK IMMEDIATE INQUIRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that two months have already elapsed as I indicated earlier, since I filed that request with the Commissioner of the RCMP, would the Solicitor General now be in a position to indicate to the House whether he himself intends to ask the RCMP to immediately initiate a criminal investigation on those matters?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member seems to suffer from the same misunderstanding that many on that side do, that the Solicitor General directs the RCMP to conduct investigations, or interferes with their operations. I tell him, and others, including the former Solicitor General, that that is not the role of the Solicitor General.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ANTI BALLISTIC MISSILE TREATY

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Does he support the Anti Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972? Does he agree that any violation of that treaty would threaten world peace?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada supports that treaty. We intend to remain vigilant and active in our support of that treaty. We intend that the actions of Canada will remain consistent with our support of that treaty.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Prime Minister would not answer the question himself, in view of the fact that he is meeting with Mr. Nitze tomorrow.

DEPLOYMENT OF DEFENSIVE WEAPONS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Would the Prime Minister inform his American visitor that Canada wants the ABM Treaty to continue in effect to prevent deployment of defensive weapons systems?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the best answer to that question, since we live in a parliamentary system and want to expose our position, warts and all, to Mr. Nitze, is to relay that view of the Hon. Member.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the Government's decision not to remove urea formaldehyde foam insulation from a number of government buildings, including the postal facility on Eastern Avenue in Toronto, has the Government decided to lift the health hazard ban on urea formaldehyde foam insulation?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Government has not lifted the ban. I will take the specifics to which he refers under advisement.

ETHNIC AFFAIRS

LETTER TO MINISTER FROM NATIONAL CONGRESS OF ITALIAN CANADIANS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In December, when the Minister of Finance offended the Italian

Canadian community with an insensitive remark, the Prime Minister refused to apologize. He has received a copy of a letter written to the Solicitor General from the National Congress of Italian Canadians, as have I, in which they complain of the "insensitive and on its face, discriminatory comment" about the Member of Parliament for York South-Weston. They used the term "Nunziata" in the letter. In the circumstances, would the Prime Minister make an apology on behalf of his Government to the Italian community, particularly to the National Congress of Italian Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of the specific point to which my right hon. friend refers. I would be happy to look at it.

I did receive a copy of a letter from another Liberal backbencher prior to Christmas, and I believe a copy was sent to my hon. friend. I responded in my personal name, because it reflected my views and that of my Government, and I said that as far as I was concerned, the tremendous courage, dignity, and the remarkable contribution that the Italian community has made to Canada is one that we salute. We have nothing but genuine respect and support for the magnificence of the contribution that Italian Canadians have made to Canada.

Should anything at any time be said by anyone on this side, inadvertently or otherwise, that is in any way contrary to that, of course it would be something that I would immediately regret and repudiate.

REQUEST THAT APOLOGY BE CONSIDERED

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we welcome that statement, but in view of the fact that the National Congress has made what essentially amounts to a formal protest, I would like the Prime Minister to look into it formally and decide whether, in his good judgment, and reflecting the remarks he just made, a formal apology should be made.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to look into this. As I recall, just prior to Christmas I wrote to the Hon. Member—I believe I sent a copy to the Leader of the Opposition—and I referred to the tremendous regard in which we hold the contributions of Italian Canadians. However, I will look into this, and should there be even the slightest iota of a comment by anyone at variance with that, I assure my hon. friend that it is not the view of anyone on this side, and I am sure it wouldn't be his.

CHALLENGE '85—OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I have just completed a tour of women's centres in British Columbia, all of which are suffering from very inadequate funding while their clients are suffering increased unemployment, poverty, and increasing violence. In view of his promises to Canadian women, will he guarantee that women's services will have a priority for summer job placements under Challenge '85?

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Minister of State (Youth)): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Government has already told Canadians that women's issues were part of its priority in Challenge '85 and many other programs. For example, we are working toward the Prime Minister's goal to have 30 per cent of appointments made of women in Canada.

I think women in British Columbia, as well as in the rest of Canada, can rest assured that they will find the place they deserve in Challenge '85 and any other programs.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Mitchell: With all due respect, I think that was a very naive reply.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION INQUIRY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of State for Youth. Why has the Government, her Ministry, and the Ministry of Employment and Immigration not required a specific affirmative action plan as part of the Challenge '85 Program which would guarantee at least 48 per cent of those jobs to women students? That has not been done. Women want more than just lip service.

[Translation]

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Minister of State (Youth)): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Employment and Immigration knew as well as I did, when we were working on "Challenge '85", that there was no need for a quota, that women, young Canadian women, would themselves seek their due and take the necessary step to obtain their full share of available summer employment.

FISHERIES

NORTHERN FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Hon. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He knows that almost two years ago the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland signed an agreement to set up a Northern Fisheries Development Corporation for fishermen north of 50. That has not yet been put in place. What has the Minister done in this respect, and can he give an assurance that the $15 million which was set aside previously for funding that corporation, or adequate funds in any event, are still in place for it?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his question. It is an appropriate question, the answer to which is that discussions are going on between the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland with respect to this issue. The amount of money that was allotted for the Northern Corporation is no longer available, but if the discussions that take place are worthy and useful, of course I shall do my very best to find the funds to proceed. I must say to the Hon. Member that I am sympathetic to the concept.

REQUEST FOR CONSULTATIONS WITH FISHERMEN

Hon. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the Minister would be able to say that the Corporation would be in place for this fishing season. Can he give that assurance, and can he tell the fishermen on the northern peninsula of Newfoundland and on the Labrador coast that he will consult with them this spring before anything specific is done?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that I have been invited to his province to take part in discussions. If it is possible I will go and, if not, then senior officials of the Department will be there. I cannot give an assurance today that the Corporation will be in place for this season.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

DISMISSAL OF LESBIAN PERSONNEL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Last year five qualified women in the Canadian Armed Forces, who happened to be lesbians, lost their jobs at CFS, Shelburne, in Nova Scotia, solely on the basis of their sexual orientation. In view of the fact that these women pose no threat whatsoever to Canada's national security, would the Minister explain why the women were fired, and why he continues to allow a policy on the books which discriminates so blatantly against Canadian gays and lesbians?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, or should know, the existing regulations within the Canadian Forces make the Minister of National Defence very much a part of the grievance process. I am not aware of whether one or more, or any of the women involved, have triggered that grievance process. I am sure that the Hon. Member, having regard to his background and profession, would be the first to agree that I, being involved in that grievance process, should not be making any comment one way or the other until we establish whether or not they intend to grieve.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF NO FURTHER DISMISSALS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, presumably the Minister knows that there is no grievance process in place for these women who were dismissed on that basis. In view of the fact that the Justice Committee has been asked by the House of Commons to study the whole question of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, particularly in the Armed Forces, is the Minister prepared, for at least as long as this study is under way, to assure us that no man or woman currently in the Armed Forces and qualified to serve there will be dismissed on the basis of his or her sexual orientation?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the last part first, there are regulations in place, and legislation in place, governing the conduct of servicemen and women in the Canadian Armed Forces.

With respect to the first part of the question, the Hon. Member leaves the impression with the House that there is no grievance procedure in place to be pursued by these women. That is incorrect. There is a grievance procedure that is available, and if they so wish—as far as I am aware they may have already done so—that process is available to them.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

CANCELLATION OF RESEARCH PROJECT

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Science and Technology. One of the direct and devastating results of the cuts of black Thursday, last November 8, which eliminated the National Research Council's Energy Division, is the cancellation of CIDA's long-term program to reclaim lands from the desert in Africa. When the Minister cancelled NRC research support, was he aware of the damage that this would do to the fight against starvation in Africa? If so, did he suggest other ways of maintaining research for this critical project?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is stretching a long way the connection between the deprivation in Africa and measures which were announced by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, on November 8. In fact, if he is referring to reductions of funding for solar energy research projects, I have made clear in this House on many occasions that worthy projects will be continued, and adequate funding sources are available to ensure that such necessary research is continued.

Point of Order—Mr. Crosbie

CLERK OF PETITIONS' REPORTS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petitions presented by Hon. Members on Monday, March 4, 1985, meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

POINT OF ORDER

ALLEGED MISQUOTATION BY MR. BROADBENT IN QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my point of order has to do with the misuse in the Question Period by the Leader of the New Democratic Party who improperly quoted what I was alleged to have said.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Crosbie: This is a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I said:

"I can't see that the Senate performs any really useful function any longer," he told reporters.

But he added that perhaps "It could be reformed in some way that would make it more useful and more in tune with democratic times, so I don't want to foreclose anything."

That is quite different from the incomplete, incorrect, in fact false quotation posed by the Leader of the New Democratic Party to the Leader of the Government in an attempt to trick the Leader of the Government into thinking that I had said something I had not said.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I want to quote his words which are a breach of the rules of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I was waiting for the Hon. Minister of Justice to tell me under what order he was rising.

Mr. Crosbie: A common sense order, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to say to the House that there perhaps should be in the rules a common sense order, but there isn't yet.

Mr. Broadbent: I rise on the same common sense point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I think the Hon. Member knows that is not a point of order.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Petitions

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —I would urge Your Honour, the next time one of us has a point of order, to give us the same generous time to make it.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The next time the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition rises on a true point of order, I will be happy to give him time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This is a real point of order.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I simply want to rise at this point in time in view of the fact that there is a change of business and I want to make an announcement with respect to the business of the House for tomorrow.

Tomorrow, rather than as announced, as the first item of business we will be dealing with Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, to be followed, if we complete second reading of that Bill tomorrow, with Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act.

CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Mr. John Gormley (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by constituents of The Battlefords-Meadow Lake who wish to express their concern over capital gains tax on the sale of farm land.

Therefore, the petitioners pray and call upon this Parliament to remove this tax and in so doing encourage the renewal of economic activity in the agricultural economy.

SPREAD OF PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Terry Clifford (London-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to present a petition on behalf of the constituents of London-Middlesex. The teachers of our youth are petitioning against the spread of pornography in Canada. In a recent magazine the capital was "exposed". I am confident that this Government will act to rid the country of this evil spirit.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C), 1984-85

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 63, I move, seconded by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret):

That the Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985, tabled earlier this day, be referred to the several standing committees of the House as follows:

Because the list is rather long, Mr. Speaker, and there is a detailed allocation of the Supplementary Estimates to the committees, if it is agreeable with the House I ask that the list be printed in Hansard as if it had been read. I have indicated the list of committees to which the estimates will be referred to the Opposition House Leaders in advance of making this proposal.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council. Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

EFFECT OF IMMIGRATION ON UNEMPLOYMENT LEVELS

Question No. 106—Mr. Kaplan:

Has the Government studied the effect of immigration on unemployment levels and, if so, will the Government table any such resulting information?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): There are no recent studies on the effect of immigration on unemployment. The latest study to include this aspect of immigration was done in 1978. The study, prepared by Informetrica Ltd. of Ottawa, assessed the major macroeconomic implications of varying levels of immigration to Canada for the period 1978 to 1985 under varying sets of economic assumptions.

The report is available upon request from the Strategic Policy and Planning Division, Employment and Immigration Canada.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Question No. 233—Mr. Howie:

For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1984, how many (a) men (b) women in New Brunswick were receiving (i) Old Age Security pension (ii) guaranteed income supplement (iii) the full amount possible under the guaranteed income supplement?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a), (b), (i), (ii), (iii), For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1984 there were on average 32,552 men and 42,030 women in New Brunswick receiving Old Age Security benefits. For the same period an average of 20,629 men and 27,795 women received guaranteed income supplement benefits. Out of the group who received guaranteed income supplement benefits 5,863 men and 8,658 women received the full amount possible.

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 62—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—THE ENVIRONMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Caccia:

That this House condemns the Government for its negligent and irresponsible approach to the protection and management of the environment, for its cuts of wildlife, meteorologial and parks services, for abandoning Canada's past initiatives on the national and international levels to combat acid rain and to restore the water quality of the Great Lakes, and for thereby jeopardizing the health, economic well-being and the heritage of the present and future generations of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Questions and answers. Debate. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, we proposed this motion and asked for this debate—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: With great respect, the Hon. Member for Skeena is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to break into the speech of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner), but I believe the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Gurbin) still has the floor for a couple of minutes to answer some questions.

● (1510)

Mr. Speaker: I called questions and answers. No one rose.

An Hon. Member: He did.

Mr. Speaker: With respect, I called questions and answers. No one rose. With great respect, the Hon. Member did not rise when I called questions and answers. I then called debate.

An Hon. Member: You didn't see him.

Mr. Speaker: I waited. I called questions and answers. No one rose.

An Hon. Member: He was up.

Mr. Speaker: With great respect to Hon. Members, I was looking directly at the Member when I called questions and answers, and no one rose. I therefore called debate. With the consent of the House and with the consent of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner), I am prepared to return to the three minutes remaining for questions and answers. Does the Hon. Member for Skeena have a question?

Mr. Fulton: I want this answer.

Mr. Speaker: There is no question before the House of which I know. Please put the question.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Parliamentary Secretary was seized with my question immediately before we rose for lunch. It related to the witnesses who appeared before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry regarding the Canadian Wildlife Service cuts and the other cuts to the Department of the Environment. I want to solicit the views of the Parliamentary Secretary, as well as his views as a Member of Parliament, as to whether or not he would agree that the overwhelming bulk of the evidence, if not all of it, given by the witnesses determined that in fact those were among the worst possible cuts which could have been made. There were other cuts which perhaps could have been made, but those were the worst possible ones. Not a single witness, despite the fact that the Government had the opportunity to call witnesses from anywhere in Canada, supported the cuts made by the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier).

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, in response to the question of the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), I think it is very clear, and I concur, that without exception the witnesses before the committee identified the sensitivity of the areas affected by the budgetary changes. I think that point is clear.

What I have to add in response to the Hon. Member's question is that there are a number of sensitive areas. I am not personally sure from hearing most of the witnesses, if not all of them, of the relative factors of some of the areas for which the Canadian Wildlife Service is responsible. If we were saying that they were not to be supported, that those programs were not to be addressed in some way, I think he would have a legitimate point. On the other hand, the $1 million fund, the consultations which have been taking place with the province, with the federations involved—only one so far and one upcoming—and with others, universities included, lead me to believe that the Department, the Minister and I would be very unhappy if we were not successful in seeing all the things done on behalf of wildlife research in Canada which the Hon. Member, other Hon. Members and I would like to see done.

Mr. Fulton: I have a very short supplementary question. If I understand the Hon. Member properly, what he is saying is that on the bulk of the evidence of witnesses from all across Canada, including specialists in the field, it is quite clear that the overwhelming majority of those areas which were cut should be reinstated.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I tried to be as clear as I could in my response the first time. I could only reiterate that there has never been a denial of the recognition of the sensitivity and need for research in wildlife. The question is how it can be done most effectively. The Government is working on that aspect right now and intends to dedicate resources and effort to seeing that it is fulfilled.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have proposed this motion and requested a debate and a recorded vote because there is a growing concern among Canadians that the Government lacks a real commitment to our environment.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The Minister spoke this morning. I am sorry she is not present in the House at this time; her Parliamentary Secretary was here a minute or two ago. I deplore the practice of a Minister responsible for the subject matter of an Opposition day not being in the House to listen to the speeches, remarks, questions and complaints of the Opposition. The same practice is developing during the course of debate on pieces of legislation, where the Minister might appear in the early stages of second reading and then disappear. I hope this large majority in the House of Commons will not promote the type of indifference to Parliament which we have seen displayed on recent Opposition days. I wish the Minister were here. At the moment there are very few Conservative members present.

I am not sure that we have seen in the last few months since the Government took office is a case of the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) losing battles in Cabinet over the cuts of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) or whether the Minister even participates in those battles. She has given no major address in the country on the subject of the environment. We do not know, aside from the cuts, what the Minister's plans are. We hardly know what her views are. Members of the government back-bench have said, and I paraphrase them: "Don't fight the cut-backs; wait until you see the Budget of the Minister of Finance, there are going to be even more". The Minister did not mention that in her remarks this morning. I hope she will take the earliest opportunity to do so.

I urge the Minister to explain the logic of imposing even more cuts in this vital area and to make a commitment to standing up for our environmental programs. Even on the basis of public relations, which seems to be a consideration that rules Cabinet decision-making within this Government, where the pollster has replaced the Minister in the councils of government and ranks higher in the affections of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), if the Minister thinks she got heat over the November cuts to vital areas of the Department of the Environment, even more cut-backs will raise temperatures through the roof.

As a Canadian and as one who has had the privilege and opportunity of travelling across the land over the years, particularly by canoe with my family on many of our waterways, from one coast to the other, particularly north of the sixtieth parallel and across the Arctic Circle and into the Arctic and Pacific Oceans, I am absolutely dismayed and disgusted with the cuts to the environment made by the Government. We in British Columbia and in western Canada are absolutely outraged.

I will cite a few examples. First there is the closing or the attempt to privatize wildlife interpretation centres across Canada. There have been cut-backs in services at Webb, Saskatchewan; Creston Valley, British Columbia; Percé, Quebec; Cap Tourmente, Quebec; and Wye Marsh, Ontario. I could refer to the migratory bird sanctuary in Vancouver, the delaying of work on the Fraser River dyking project in British Columbia on the largest flyway on the west coast of North America, and the cutting of projects which monitor effects of forestry pesticides on birds in Manitoba. I could refer to the herring gull egg monitoring program. It is a $250,000 program. In relative terms that is not much money. It employed six people. It was tracing the toxic chemical impact through examination of gull eggs and analysis thereof. It is important to our understanding of the impact of these chemicals on birds or on other animals, and eventually on us. It is critical that we know precisely what is the impact in order that we can find a solution that precisely meets the danger.

What has been the Government's response? It cancelled the whole program in November. No reasons were given. After a huge public outcry, it now claims to have reinstated it. I was in Toronto yesterday and made further inquiries. Before, that project had six people and now there is only one. That person has been told just to collect the eggs, note the chemical presence and not look at the impact. What good is that?

It has cut programs to reintroduce certain fox species to Alberta and Saskatchewan where they have disappeared. It has cut the program to monitor the build-up of agricultural chemicals on birds in Alberta, particularly edible fowl. It has closed weather stations right across the country. The one in Bissett, Manitoba immediately comes to mind.

I should also like to mention the Guelph Toxicology Centre. It was to be the first of its kind. It was to monitor and assess the impact of new chemicals, but the Government cut it completely. We know that there are some 800 different chemicals in Lake Ontario alone. The Niagara River Toxics Committee found 261 chemicals in the Niagara River, 57 of which are at levels known to pose a risk to human health. Without programs like the herring gull project and the Guelph centre, how will we know what these chemicals are doing to fish in our lakes, to birds that eat the fish or to humans who drink the water or eat the fish?

The National Research Council Environmental Secretariat has been eliminated, 400 top scientists. They explained environmental issues to the country by way of lectures and publications, research on lead, PCBs, asbestos, phosphates, heavy metals, mercury and other pollutants. Where will this information come from now?

The area of the Public Service which has been savaged most severely and which really outrages me is the Canadian Wildlife Service. There were 84 people cut, 25 per cent of the entire staff. These were highly trained biologists, technicians and environmentalists. They are closing our centres across the country. The finest brains in the world, some of them, in our environment and in biology, where are they going now? They are going to the United States, Asia and Africa. They were snapped up by any country that had any interest in the environment. For three generations the Service had contributed to the best environmental service on the globe, and it has been savaged.

The Minister says that the cut-backs will not, and I use her words, adversely affect the survival of this program. What a naive attitude! It is physically impossible to cut one-quarter of the staff and have no repercussions.

And it is the same story with respect to national parks. What are the Conservatives doing this year to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of Parks Canada? They raise entrance fees, reduce the number of employees, and force the management of many parks and reserves to eliminate some services. Nineteen hundred and eighty-five promises to be the year to visit our national parks, on one condition however: being able to get into them.

Mr. Speaker, we are incensed at the way the Government has been treating the Canadian Wildlife Service and the National Research Council. We feel insulted! Most Canadians do enjoy one common advantage: availability of and ready access to wide open spaces. Not satisfied with such savage cut-backs in our own national environment programs, the Government has also seen fit to reduce its participation in the United Nations environment program whose purpose is to seek ways to check desertic encroachment in countries such as Ethiopia where the tragic loss of agricultural land has led to untold suffering and innumerable deaths.

Aid programs of that kind are needed if we are to put an end to the dependency cycle and help other countries set up lasting agricultural programs. By reducing our participation in those programs, we can only become less familiar with the problems and contribute to make the dependency cycle even more acute.

[English]

My colleague from Davenport (Mr. Caccia), our critic on the environment, spoke eloquently this morning about acid rain killing our lakes, rivers and vegetation at an alarming rate. The Minister of the Environment says this is no longer a priority. Her leader, the Prime Minister, seems to think that the United States Government has a case in taking no action because he says our record is not as good as theirs. The Prime Ministers says we have to do more, but the actions of his Government indicate that he is doing the reverse.

The Prime Minister says that acid rain is at the top of his list at the Summit with President Reagan in Quebec City on March 17. I congratulate him for that and wish him well, but as I have suggested in the House of Commons, he has already given the President an easy way out. The President is going to say: "Well, Brian, sure I agree, but you yourself said Canada has not done well on this, so why should we take any action if you are not?" He has already thrown his cards away.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): As our environmental critic, the Hon. Member for Davenport, was quick to point out to the Prime Minister immediately when he heard the comment, the truth is that Canada has done very well in reducing acid rain. The former Minister of the Environment in the Province of Ontario agrees. We have a program to reduce sulphur dioxide emissions by 25 per cent by 1990 and by 50 per cent by 1994. The United States does not have that program. Considering that the United States produces 19.6 million tonnes of nitric oxide per year compared with our total of only 1.7 tonnes, we know where the responsibility must be shed across our neighbourhood and across the air.

The Canadian Press now reports that the Prime Minister is anxious to telephone President Reagan in the hopes that he can get, as one official calls it, at least a token gesture on acid rain from the President. Otherwise the meeting of March 17 will be a public relations defeat for this Government. All I can tell the Prime Minister is: Beware the Ides of March, because we have been getting a busy signal from the White House on that issue ever since President Reagan took office four years ago.

The Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland have jointly agreed, despite the Atlantic Accord, to keep under wraps the publication of the Mobil Oil Environmental Assessment Impact Study on the production of Hibernia oil. That report was to be released two months ago. The Hibernia development will take place in the middle of one of the richest fishing grounds on the face of the globe. We urge that report to be published and to be released because it is very important environmentally.

Some Hon. Members: Hear hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I can turn now to the west coast. There was the tragedy of several fishermen drowning last October on the west coast when six vessels went down. There was an inquiry under Professor LeBlond which showed serious deficiencies in our forecasting. The Minister has taken some action. She has expanded the drifting buoys and she has automated shipboard programs. However, the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union has called for a reinstatement of a weather ship off the west coast as absolutely necessary. The LeBlond report calls for forecasting services to fishermen to be brought up to the standards provided for aviation. I urge the Minister on behalf of British Columbia to speed up the one position for a marine forecaster instead of waiting until October, 1985 to staff that position.

The problems of the environment are not solved overnight, we know that. It requires a long-term, serious and deep commitment by the Government to be a leader in this area. Apparently the Government of Canada under this new administration wants to let others take over. The Minister suggests it is the duty of the provinces—let the provinces do it; let the private sector intervene. The Minister says that provincial Governments will pick up the slack when federal programs are cancelled. All I can say is that this is not likely, especially when you consider that in Ontario, for example, the Ontario Government has cut some $29 million out of environment programs over the past two or three years. Mr. Grossman, the Treasurer, is promising to cut every Ministry even more.

I can tell the Minister that she will not get the money from the provinces. She should realize that once she cuts a program, it is finished. I can also tell the Minister that because of the costs involved, the private sector needs some leadership, co-operation and incentives.

We take this issue immensely seriously. Every Canadian has a personal stake in protecting our environment. It is the air we breathe, the water we drink, the priceless and precious wildlife in our vast open spaces, the lakes, forests and rivers which we enjoy. Those great national treasures are fundamental to life in this country.

I do not know of anything more important to Canadians than the natural heritage with which we have been blessed. No other country comes close to the variety of geography, panorama, wildlife or space. We have one-third of the fresh water of the world. We have rivers and lakes that provide limitless recreational and camping opportunities. We have a climate and an environment which challenges us in each of the four seasons.

Our national character has certainly been shaped by our geography. Our national character has been fashioned by the type of country we have been given and with which we have been blessed. For a Government not to recognize that, but to diminish and denigrate the priority of preserving that heritage, is beyond my understanding. I cannot tolerate it. Everywhere I go, and this is shared by my colleagues, at every public platform, at every question and answer session that we have in our universities, high schools and in our groups, the Canadian people raise this subject.

Two weeks ago I had a town hall meeting in Vancouver Quadra which 900 people attended. The environmental questions were absolutely uppermost on the minds of the people. Why is it, blessed as we have been, that the Government, as the custodian of our heritage and our natural environment, allows the cuts to be so shamelessly taken? Who sets these priorities? Why does the Minister not stand up for them? If she has not succeeded against the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) or the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret), why does she not at least have the guts to say so? She should take that responsibility off her shoulders and say, "No. I cannot succeed, but I will not be blamed by the people of Canada for what we are doing to our environment".

• (1530)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I believe that is why Canadians have reacted so strongly to the Government's tampering with the protection of the environment. That is why, since those cuts were known after the November 8 statement of the Minister of Finance, our Party has led the fight in the House to reverse some of those cuts. It is also why we in this Party will continue to lead that fight if the Government persists on this very dangerous and self-defeating course. We will do it in Parliament. We will do it in the country. We will fix the record in the public's mind, because what is being left undone by this Government is something that can never be repaired.

The environment is a permanent heritage. The renewable resources of Canada depend on it. The well-being and health of our citizens depend on it. The life that we have been given and the welcoming of tourists from all over the world depend on it. It is part of the Canadian heritage and character. It goes right to the fibre and bone of Canadian intuition and instinct. If the Government does not understand that, it does not understand the country. If the Minister wants to regain some of the promise she has lost, she had better stand up to her colleagues soon. She should go to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and say, "Look, I am being pilloried from one end of the country to the other and I am not being allowed to do my duty, to fulfil my mandate or to fulfil the expectations which the Canadian people have in me and in this Government. Either allow me to do it, Mr. Prime Minister, or relieve me of the responsibility".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Is that what you did, John?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I will ignore that particular remark. On this subject I know that the Right Hon. Member, who comes from High River and enjoys one of the most beautiful constituencies in the world, agrees with every darned word I am saying—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): No, he doesn't.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The right hon. gentleman has one of the great national parks in his riding, but the user fees and the expenses are going up. Instead of opening that national park in 1985 on the one-hundredth anniversary of our national parks, the Government, of which he is a member, is making it more difficult for Canadians to get into that national park.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The Parliamentary Secretary is smiling because the right hon. gentleman has taken the heat from his Minister. I want to say to him that I never expected a man who had the good fortune to grow up in High River to challenge a debate on the environment, and I hope that will be properly recorded for his fellow citizens.

I trust that this House will take into consideration the motion which we have put before it. Nothing is more fundamental for the future well-being of Canadians than the subject we have brought to the attention of the House. I want to thank the House for its consideration and attention.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) and I certainly agree with much that he said. Of course, to many of us who have been concerned about the environment and the erosion of the environment over the last few decades it is refreshing to hear the Leader of the Liberal Party expressing those sentiments. I wish those sentiments had been expressed many years ago. I am afraid that the record of his Party when in government in dealing with Eldorado Nuclear and the waste and spoilage which that corporation caused in many parts of the country is not favourable. One could mention the testing of herbicides and pesticides and the pollution of ground water on the Prairies that the Department of Agriculture of previous Liberal Governments allowed. One could go on to mention waste disposal in Canada.

My question is: Is this a conversion of the Liberal Party? If the Liberal Party ever regains power, will we see a new agenda for the environment of Canada? Will he give us the commitment that the errors of the past are indeed of the past and that a new Liberal Government will set a new agenda for the environment of Canada?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, there need not be any new commitment. The commitment has been there throughout the years of Liberal administrations.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), had the honour to inaugurate and establish more national parks than any other Minister in the history of the country. We have been at the leading edge of environmental protection. The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), when he was Minister of the Environment, brought the acid rain question to the attention of Canadian people, as did his predecessor, Mr. Roberts. Our record stands on its own. We have no apologies to make. I have no doubt that the Canadian people, in their minds, will recognize that, whatever reasons they may have had for changing the administration on September 4, our commitment to the environment was not among those reasons.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) a question. First, I would like to note that I was not smiling at his comments with respect to the intervention of the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark), but merely at his extraordinary gesticulations and comments about what happened within the Conservative Cabinet. I am not there, so I am sure I do not know. I am not sure whether the habit of the former Government was such that he knew that his Minister of the Environment was really impotent in the face of Liberal Cabinet Ministers.

My question is: Is he proud of the Liberal record as it relates to the environment?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I could not be more proud of the record of Liberal Governments over the years as being the leaders and the pioneers of environmental protection. Certainly I am proud of that record.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner). I think be might want to take the opportunity to distribute the credit for public awareness of the acid rain problem more widely than he did a minute ago when he gave all the credit to the former Minister of the Environment, the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), and the former Member from Toronto, Mr. Roberts. Is the Leader of the Opposition not aware that a special subcommittee of the House was set up to study acid rain, that it travelled the country and the world, produced reports and played a great part in creating the public awareness which we now have, of which we should be taking advantage? Out of respect for Parliament and the work of that committee, I think that the Leader of the Opposition should have something more to say.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for bringing that to my attention. With only 20 minutes in which to speak, I cannot cover all of the good aspects of what Parliament has accomplished. I second him in lauding the work of that committee which, after all, was set up by the previous Liberal Government under the Ministry of John Roberts. Our former colleague, Ron Irwin, then the Member for Sault Ste Marie, was the Chairman of that committee and did an excellent job. I would not have had time to mention that had the hon. gentleman not been kind enough to bring it to our attention.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) mentioned the Toxicology Centre at the University of Guelph which was cut out by the Government. I think that was a tremendous blow to the whole policy on toxicology. It was a model idea because it drew together federal and provincial Governments, the private sector, the University of Toronto and the University of Guelph. It was to be a centre of excellence which would not only develop new techniques, designs and models for handling toxicology issues, but it was also to be a national centre for the entire country which would train young scientists. It is a tragedy that that centre was cut out. Over a period of several years it would have received $16 million from the federal Government, $16 million from the provincial Government and about $8 million from the private sector. It really grew together in one location, under the sponsorship and co-operation of two large national universities. The most frustrating and maddening part of this whole episode was not only that it was cut out after a director had been appointed, with the resultant floundering, but that I received no real answer from the Minister when I asked her in the House why it was being cut out.

Everyone seems to be concerned about pesticides and toxins in our environment which affect our health. We have concern with cancer and so on. The chairman of the board was a cancer specialist at the University of Toronto. When I asked a question of the Minister, she made some comment that the cost had jumped up from—I have forgotten the figure—about $15 million to $50 million. But in fact the actual cost of the plant was going to be about $21 million. Obviously, the Minister cannot know about each decision, but one would think that when a major national institution of this type is being wiped out by the Government, the Minister would take the time to familiarize herself with the situation.

There was an adjournment debate on this subject. The Parliamentary Secretary or the Minister usually reads from a prepared script with all the facts, figures and details in it. It was very disconcerting that the Minister made a couple of comments about the centre but did not go into the details. Obviously she still did not know what the centre was about or the national role it was designed to play.

So as a comment I will say that I was pleased that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition mentioned this centre. I think it is one of the most terrible decisions made by this Government since it was appointed. I would like to ask the Leader of the Opposition if he agrees with me.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I could not have put it better, Mr. Speaker. I know of the Hon. Member's abiding concern for the environment, coming from the place of location of the Algoma Central Railway. I have travelled on that train up to Wawa with the Hon. Member and others and I know what a great part of the country he lives in.

These cut-backs are not only a blow to the research which needs to be done but they are a tremendous blow to the scientific community of this country. Something we have tried to build up over the course of many years is our expertise. Dismissing this project, sabotaging the Canadian Wildlife Service, will just lead to the export of the expertise which we have developed over three generations.

Mr. Caccia: That is something they cannot understand over there.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): No country can afford that.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in hearing the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) say that he was proud of the Liberal record. I wonder if he is proud of the fact that when Mr. Roberts was Minister of the Environment under the last Liberal Government, he desecrated the only park in the townsite of Banff by selling it to a former Liberal colleague. It was a desecration of something which can never be changed. I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition is proud of that record?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I really cannot find much sense in the enthusiastic question of the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor). I do want to say, however, that I neglected to mention the name of the man who sponsored the Guelph project, that is, Jim Schroeder, a tremendous Hon. Member of Parliament in his time. I wish he were here to listen to this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is now over. We shall resume debate.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would have hoped, in speaking in this debate on the environment today, that it would be treated in more of a non-partisan way. One would have hoped that Hon. Members, by the time they managed to get elected by their communities across this country, would have read enough, or know enough generally, to understand what is happening in the world. Right now, today, about six species of life on this planet are becoming extinct. What is happening around the world, Mr. Speaker, are changes to the basic architecture of the living environment which are irreversible. We have the introduction of certain toxics and all kinds of different materials as the result of the development of cities, transportation, the use of jet aircraft. All kinds of developments are changing our environment forever. We are tinkering with the basic living components of the world. I would have hoped that in a country such as Canada where we have a very literate and well educated population, a country with free press and excellent media, these kinds of irresponsible and rash decisions which are being made by the new Government simply would not occur. I would also hope, Mr. Speaker, that by now, with the thousands and tens of thousands of representations which have been made by well educated, interested and concerned Canadians to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and to the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier), the kinds of cuts which were made would not have happened and debates such as this simply would not have been necessary.

I do not think I can stress enough, Mr. Speaker, the real need for this Parliament to come to grips with the issue of the environment when we talk about sending the MV Arctic up into Zone I ice knowing that it is contrary to the regulations of Lloyd's of London and contrary to the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act. I see the Parliamentary Secretary shaking his head, but I know in fact it is true, Mr. Speaker. I have looked into the matter. It is only through an Order in Council that that particular tanker is going to be allowed into the Canadian Arctic.

When we examine the cuts, Mr. Speaker, I think we have to understand something about the person who made them. A recent article written by Warren Caragata, I believe, revealed something with which the Prime Minister should have taken issue before the Minister's appointment. Since it was not taken issue with before the appointment of the present Minister of the Environment, it should take place now. With the same reasoning and on the same grounds that the Prime Minister accepted the resignation of the former Minister of National Defence, he should request the Minister of the Environment to step down from her Crown portfolio. The article is headlined, "Called Unfit in Previous Job, Tory Minister Sues Over Firing". The former Minister of National Defence rose in this House and said that he could not actively and properly pursue his lawsuit against the Citizen newspaper here in Ottawa as a Minister of the Crown. Using the same kinds of rules and guidelines used by the Prime Minister in accepting the resignation of the Minister of National Defence, I believe he should accept or request the resignation—even if it is only temporary—of the Minister of the Environment. Because of what is filed in the court documents, it is truly unusual for the Minister to remain in her portfolio while the air is coloured by these matters. I quote from the article by Warren Caragata:

> Court documents quote Mrs. Blais-Grenier as saying that she was accused of falsifying minutes of meetings, hysteria, incompetence and intellectual dishonesty, was ultimately fired, and was unable to find similar work in the area of workplace health and safety.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Quite apart from the personal propriety of entering this kind of material into debate—which I leave to the personal judgment of the Hon. Member and will consider it an indication of the personal standards of the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton)—I think the Chair would want to raise the question as to whether it is appropriate for the Hon. Member for Skeena to be reading a newspaper article into this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair would also like to make the point that the matter is sub judice at the present time. I feel that the Hon. Member should refrain from discussing the particular court case.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, to make sure that the Right Hon. Member from High River is aware of the situation, I will quote from an article in The Globe and Mail. I believe it is quite proper that this kind of information be made available to the Hon. Members of this House and to the general public. It is printed in the paper. The article goes on to state:

> The fashion in which she was dismissed raised doubts about her competence, she said, and made it difficult, if not impossible, to find an equivalent post in the health and safety field.
> Environmental groups and one source within the Environment Department itself, meanwhile, contend that Mrs. Blais-Grenier has shown similar behavior over the cuts in the wildlife service. Most asked, however, that their names not be used.
> Ken Brynaert, vice-president of the Canadian Wildlife Federation, complained that, despite requests for meetings with the Minister to discuss the cuts, the association has not yet had even a reply. "You can't negotiate with her," he said. "She has been protected by her office."
>
> Early in her tenure, the Minister confided in a private conversation that she had decided against a full range of briefings by her officials on the workings of the department.
> She refused briefings, she related, because she did not want to be confused and because she had decided to learn on the job.

When you tie that article into the mosaic of what has occurred—and I hope the Hon. Member from High River listens as I tie together the reason for introducing that information into this debate—you can see why Canadians are deeply troubled by what was said during the Conservative campaign until September 4 and what has occurred since. They had no mandate from the scientific or corporate communities, the voters or any private interest group which made themselves available to committees of this House on which to base those cuts. They were made for other reasons, and I intend to reveal some of the reasons why I believe those kinds of savage cuts were made. Canadians have time and again indicated they are prepared to take a lower standard of living and pay more taxes to preserve the heritage of this country.

In a November news release, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) made it clear what his intentions were. He intended to cut $8.7 million from environment services, which encompass federal programs in wildlife, water, environmental protection and atmospheric services. He intended to cut $5 million from the Environment Secretariat and all its research facilities. He intended to cut Parks Canada operations by $19.5 million and to get rid of the Guelph Toxicology Centre at $5.4 million, as well as take $10.5 million away from Parks and Weather Services. We can discuss at greater length this matter and the loss of lives which are perhaps related to some of those cuts. But let us look at what the Conservatives had to say during the campaign related to the environment. I quote from the PC campaign handbook on the environment:

> As a government:
> We will make transboundary pollution problems the government's top environmental priority.

What happened, Mr. Speaker? They get rid of the herring gull program, something which was recognized around the world as a base line scientific project providing important information on toxicology and the impact of materials coming particularly from the Niagara River, the Love Canal, S Site, Hyde Park and other dumps on the American side, as well as what is happening to Great Lakes water quality. The Parliamentary Secretary knows full well the pressures coming from Cabinet not to allow committees of this House to hear certain witnesses on matters related to problems with the Great Lakes water quality. That is shameless commentary on a mandate which was improperly and irregularly taken from the Canadian people to seat them on that side of the House. The handbook goes on to say:

> Instead of relying exclusively on diplomatic intiatives by the Minister of the Environment, as the current government has done, a P.C. government will also engage the Prime Minister and the Minister of External Affairs in top-level efforts with their U.S. counterparts on such bilateral issues as acid rain, Niagara River pollution, and the Garrison Diversion Project.

I hope to learn during this debate from the government side what these steps have been to date and what kinds of ameliorative actions there have been in the U.S. Not one single nickel has been spent since September 4 by the Environmental Protection Agency from its superfund for the clean-up of the Love Canal, Hyde Park or any of the other dumps. As to Garrison, we are fortunate that finally Congress has agreed to a sensible position, at least temporarily. But acid rain has yet to receive the kind of attention either in this country or in the U.S. that it deserves. We still have as much acid rain today as we had on September 4, if not more. The handbook goes on to read:

> We accept and will act to implement all 38 recommendations of the all-Party House of Commons Sub-committee on Acid Rain.

Not one has been implemented since September 4, Mr. Speaker. These are great promises, but let us go on and look at the really key statement related to the cuts. It reads:

> We will conduct a thorough review of all Environment Canada programs and expenditures, based on the twin principles of sunset laws and zero-based budgeting.

Where do they talk about 28 per cent cuts? It simply does not appear in the documents on which the Conservatives were elected. So let us look at what was cut.

The reduction of the Canadian Wildlife Service of Environment Canada by 84 person-years and $3.8 million will eliminate most of the Wildlife Research and Interpretation Branch, one of three CWS branches. Most of a series of projects grouped together in a program called Wildlife Research are to be cut. They involve 50 person-years and $2.2 million, and the operation of five Interpretaion Centres involving 32 person-years and $1.2 million. The Habitat Acquisition Fund, $400,-000 and two person-years will also be eliminated. That includes most of the work carried out under the authority of the Canada Wildlife Act passed by this Parliament some 12 years ago. So those go out the door.

Let us look at some of the other things which will be added to the burden on the Canadian environment. First is the effects of toxic chemicals on birds protected by the Migratory Birds Convention Act. Under that, the monitoring of effects of agricultural insecticides and herbicides on the Prairies is gone. Then we have monitoring of contaminants in birds on the St. Lawrence River and its estuary in Quebec. That is gone. The monitoring of the effects of presticides and herbicides and sewage and everything else on the Fraser River estuary, that is gone. Then there is the identifying and monitoring of the occurrence and effects of toxic substances in herring gulls and other fish-eating birds on the Great Lakes. That matter has been raised many times in this House and I must say that my colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) described it quite accurately as being a fraud. The Minister announced it was going to be cut and then, under pressure from the public, said it was reinstated. Many people in Canada, certainly in Ontario, expected that the program was being reinstated when the Minister put out a press release saying it was going to be reinstated. But we now know that only one person out of the six was reinstated. I have a few comments here from an article by Michael Keating which I think are worthy of being on the record. He said:

> Last month, Mrs. Blais-Grenier announced that "the detection and monitoring of toxic substances in herring gulls will be continued," although some of the work would be done by another government laboratory.
> However, the second laboratory is already fully booked with other work. There is no indication that it is equipped for—or has the time or expertise to handle—the specialized work of gull egg analysis.
>
> In the meantime, the chemist in Hull who did the analysis of chemicals in gull eggs collected from around the Great Lakes has found a job in another department.
> Only D. V. Weseloh, the biologist at the centre of the controversy, has been reinstated and he has been told only to collect the eggs, but not to make observations about the health of the gull colonies.
> Mr. Weseloh and his assistant have previously found defects in gulls such as crossed bills, deformed feet, poor embryos, thin eggshells and other signs that pollution affects the birds' health.
> Mr. Weseloh has been told not to bother recording these observations in the future.

What kind of responsible Government would tell a professional biologist that if he sees deformities or unusual biological occurences, he should not observe it. "Whatever you do, do not write it down. We do not want any more of that kind of stuff in the newspaper". If you look at the people whose jobs have been eliminated across Canada, Mr. Weseloh was the only wildlife veterinary pathologist in Canada. This morning the Minister said that the cuts were designed to get rid of people who were redundant and extravagant. That particular person was responsible for some of the key work related to migratory birds. He is responsible for the key work being done on the anaesthesizing of grizzly and polar bears, a very tricky and highly specialized field.

This cut will perhaps endanger not only biologists who work with bears in the parks and so on but others as well. When you find someone that highly specialized and doing some important international work, you cannot describe it as redundant or extravagant, nor can you claim it is replaceable. There is no one in any university or hospital in this country who can or will replace that kind of expertise. It is those kinds of savage and unnecessary, ill-thought out and irresponsible cuts that this House should be demanding be reinstated.

Another cut involves monitoring effects of forestry insecticides on birds in New Brunswick. A little bit of that has been replaced because of public pressure. Yet the Minister said this morning she was very proud of what she has done in the Department regarding these cuts. Those were her own words this morning. Under the program for the rehabilitation of endangered species, Mr. Speaker, studies on the reintroduction of peregrine falcons in eastern Canada have been stopped. The program for the reintroduction of the pine marten to Newfoundland, that is gone. The program for the reintroduction of the swift fox, black-footed parrot and the greater prairie chicken to the prairie provinces, that is gone. Biolectronics services are gone. Studies being done on the porcupine caribou and George River cariboo as well as on the Beverley-Kaminurial caribou herd are all gone. Also cut was the study on the impact of development on migratory birds using the Fraser River estuary. Environment impact assessment has been chopped. Support to federal services such as national parks and other federal lands, work on marten and peregrine falcons, wolves, elk, bears and caribou is all gone.

● (1600)

Under forestry, funds for studying the effects of spraying on migratory birds, song birds and wildlife habitat, which includes the effect that cutting and spraying practices have on small rodents, are all gone. The wildlife interpretation centres and habitat acquisition is gone.

It was not only the Minister of the Environment who was involved in these cuts, Mr. Speaker. This was a very carefully and methodically thought out process which obviously occurred at high levels within the Conservative Party. All of the networking programs which are under way at the NRC were chopped as well.

Funds were cancelled for the following programs under the air sub-committee: environmental impact of emissions from residential combustion appliances; analytical techniques for polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons in environmental media; indoor air quality and human exposure to indoor air pollutants in Canada; effects of gaseous pollutant mixtures on crops and forests; scientific criteria for the atmospheric deposition of acidifying substances in Canada; and aerial transmissions of microbial aerosols and its implications for human and animal health.

A report on fetal hazards, which was requested by Health and Welfare Canada and the Canadian Medical Association, was in its second draft when it was cancelled. A study on the pulmonary effects on humans of the wood processing industry, which was requested by the woodworkers in British Columbia, is cancelled. Also cancelled is the study on the environmental effects of salmonella on human health. Mr. Speaker, a study on the effects of poisons on human health has been cancelled. Also cancelled were studies on the aerial transmissions of microbial aerosols, the effects of manganese in the Canadian environment, and the effects of environmental lead on children.

Earlier today Conservative Members were asking my colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill, what is wrong with lead. The Government does not want to know. The Royal Society Commission on Lead asked for that study to be done, and then it was cancelled by the new Tory Government. This was a study of the effects of environmental lead on children in daycare centres near stop signs with cars stopping and starting all the time. Also cancelled were studies on the effects and interactions of trace elements on the cardiovascular system and on efficient monitoring of the environment for toxic elements and their compounds. Why would a government want to get rid of that kind of program?

A study on the effects of mine tailing wastes in the Canadian environment, requested by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, was cancelled. A study on the effects of acid precipitation and toxic waste dumps on the quality of ground water in Canada was cancelled. How can we possibly accumulate the kind of research information we need on acid rain if these kinds of projects, which do not cost very much, are cancelled by the Government?

A study on pyrethroids and their effects on man and terrestrial and aquatic systems, requested by the National Research Council, was cancelled. At the time of cancellation, scientific analysis was over 90 per cent complete. An updated scientific analysis of the key issues in the assessment of polychlorinated biphenyls, which was requested by the Ontario Government, was cancelled. A study on PCBs, one of the most chronic and debilitating toxics in our environment, was cancelled. A study on the scientific analysis of the criteria for assessing the impact of organic chemicals, including pesticides, on ground water resources in Canada was requested by the NRC and then cancelled. What kind of government does not want to know what the effects of pesticides and chemicals are on ground water? Ground water provides sustenance to the majority of Canadians, but the Government does not want to know what the effects of toxic or chemical pesticides on ground water are.

A study on the scientific analysis of the criteria for assessing the impact of phenolic compounds on man and his environment was cancelled. Studies on cadmium in the aquatic environment, viruses in the water, biologically available metals in sediments, metal mixtures in the environment and viral infections of fish and their impact on fisheries in Canada were cancelled.

All one has to do is to look at the headlines in recent months to see how the public has received these cuts. The Tories delivered the crullest cuts to our wildlife. They cut 3 per cent across the board, except for the Canadian Wildlife Service where they cut 28 per cent. Mr. Speaker, this is irresponsible and reprehensible and the Minister should step down from her portfolio immediately.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. gentleman who just spoke for his speech. I can assure the translator and the young lady who is taking dictation that I will not read such long words as the hon. gentleman had to do in his speech to get his point across. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his speech.

I think that the cuts in the Department of the Environment can be divided into three categories: bad, worse, and ridiculous. I will give the House some examples. According to the Minister' own press release of November, 1984, she said that in Parks Canada improvements to existing parks, including maintenance complexes, visitor service facilities, staff accommodation, restorations, interpretation centres, and new land acquisition, will be cancelled to save $18.7 million in 1985-86. That can be classified as bad enough. It meets the Tory philosophy of cutting back immediately on what they think should not be continued.

I will now go to the next section, which I classify as being worse. It says that revenues will be increased by $9.2 million from increased entrance fees, camping fees, fishing permits, canal fees, golf course fees and utility fees. The new fee structure, according to the Minister, will more closely reflect those for similar services offered in the private sector. That is even worse, Mr. Speaker, than the first set of cuts that the Minister announced for Parks Canada. That is worse because it affects every single person entering a national park. Those increases in the charges were made with no thought whatsoever to how it would affect all the people. According to this, anyone who lives within a national park will now have to pay $30 to go trouting. Those cuts are worse.

We now come to what I would call ridiculous and impossible cuts under Parks Canada. The first sentence indicates that alternative guide services, such as self-guided and volunteer guided tours, will be implemented on interpretation trails throughout the park system. That is absolutely ridiculous, Mr. Speaker. That is impossible. How can you have volunteer self-guided tours in national parks? As I mentioned to the Minister before, you have to erect signs saying "Enter at your risk". You would probably have to leave a telephone number for search and rescue on the same signs. Can you imagine people visiting our national parks, going among the forests and bears on a self-guided tour? That is plainly and simply ridiculous. I presume that the Minister has enough in her budget to paint those signs to say "Enter at your own risk".

I will now turn to the cuts in the atmospheric environmental service. That is a service which really cannot be cut at all. When the Conservatives were running for office, they said they were going to increase that service and provide better weather forecasting. They were going to spend more money on personnel in the weather offices in eastern Canada. This was one of the big election promises. The cuts are bad in that operations will be streamlined by integrating weather stations at five locations: Goose Bay, Sept-Îles, Port Hardy, Prince George and Fort Nelson. That is bad enough. The next section, which I would classify as being worse, reads that according to the Minister, weather observing stations at Eddy Point, Nova Scotia, and Bissett, Manitoba, as well as the North Bay, Ontario weather office, will be closed. Rather than the promises to increase personnel in the weather offices throughout the country and to improve forecasts for fishermen and farmers, weather offices have been closed. These cuts could be classified as being worse.

We come to the third category which I would classify as ridiculous and impossible. The Minister says that those people wishing weather information additional to that provided by the media will be charged a fee for this service. That is just plain insane. The Minister has tried to skirt around the question of how one can charge people for phoning the weather office. I brought this question up in the House one day with particular reference to fishermen and those whose health and safety are affected. The Minister said in the Chamber, in grandiose fashion, that fishermen will not have to pay. For a moment I reflected on the generosity of the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) in at least retracting somewhat on that policy. However, I began to question how one could know if it was a fisherman who was phoning the weather office. Will he have to give his social insurance number so that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans can verify if he is a fisherman? Even if it could be determined that a fisherman was phoning the weather office, by what means could he be charged? When I pursued this further with the Minister, I asked her the same question. She had to admit in the Chamber what she was bound to find out anyway, that she was incorrect. Everyone will be charged, including the fishermen and those people whose health and safety could be affected by that information. There was no way to exempt fishermen.

Today there is no possible way to charge someone for phoning the weather office. One would have thought that the Minister of the Environment would have discovered that. The CRTC will not allow her to do what she had asked Bell Canada to do, which was to make the collection for the Department. That cannot be done because it violates their licence.

There is only one option that the Minister can use to collect $1.3 million from Canadians who want to know what the weather will be but missed the forecast on the TV or radio. The only way to collect that money, which is listed in the Estimates as revenue of that Department, is for the weather office personnel to call back someone phoning the office in order to charge them for the call. In other words, it is giving more work to weather forecasters than they can do in the weather office.

Let us continue with the Minister's press release. There is a section which is bad with respect to the Environmental Protection Service. The Minister announced that waste management activities will be cut to save $1.2 million. That is bad enough because we have wastes in this country that are dangerous to Canadians. They are scattered in provincial jurisdictions, in vacant mines and in old buildings in the middle of the countryside. According to our regulations, there must be some monitoring taking place. There are provincial jurisdictions with provincial rules which do not even permit wastes to be transported across provincial boundaries without the permission of that provincial jurisdiction. It is detrimental to cut $1.2 million from a branch that deals with the safety of Canadians.

Even worse, toxicology research will be phased down with cut-backs on specific projects in certain provinces such as in your home province, Mr. Speaker. The ridiculous category concerns wildlife interpretation and research which will be restricted to migratory birds and endangered species. It is not possible to cut even $100,000 from the Canadian Wildlife Service without affecting migratory birds and endangered species.

An Hon. Member: We did it.

Mr. Baker: That is exactly what I wanted someone to say. The Minister also said that "we did it." She cut back on the scientific research that was being done on the shorebirds in British Columbia. They were migratory birds. She cut back on the entire research team that was studying the effects of pesticides, insecticides and herbicides on ducks, migratory birds, in the Prairies. That experiment should not have been discontinued because the research project was only half completed. Although the research team consisted of five or seven people, how important was that research? They discovered that the aerial spray that was used on those farms in western Canada had actually caused the death of young ducklings. The question which arises is, how did it cause the death of young ducklings? Was it caused by the infecting of the food that young ducks ate, or was it actually caused directly to the duck itself? Those questions remain unanswered because that experiment on migratory birds has been cancelled. According to the Minister and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret), who is sitting here this afternoon, who stated in his Estimates that migratory birds would not be affected, we are now aware that they are affected by those cuts.

Let us deal with endangered species. As the Member from the New Democratic Party mentioned, the experiments with the perigrine falcon are finished. In Newfoundland, at the request of the Newfoundland Government, the Department of the Environment under the previous Government embarked on a project to save the pine martin in that province. That project has been cut. Two endangered species in Atlantic Canada have been affected by these simple cuts, as the Minister says, in the Canadian Wildlife Service.

The Minister stated recently that she was implementing another man-year to continue monitoring the porcupine caribou herd that travels from the Northwest Territories into the Yukon, down through Alaska. In other words, this involves an agreement with two Territories, the United States and Canada. However, there was a cut in the monitoring management of another cariboo herd in this country through these cuts in the Canadian Wildlife Service. That cariboo herd is in Labrador in Newfoundland. We all saw on television 10,000 cariboo going down the river. That entire initiative that was instituted by the federal Government upon the request of the Governments of Quebec and Newfoundland has been wiped out by these Estimates. The other one, apparently by reinstating one man-year according to the Minister, has been reinstated, that is the one that deals with an agreement with the United States. But the one on the Labrador coast, the Georges River herd, the largest in the country, is not being reinstated.

When the Minister and the President of the Treasury Board, who is in his seat today, make statements that they are not going to touch endangered species projects and migratory birds projects, I wish they would look at what exactly they are cutting because therein you would find the contradiction, Sir.

The debate so far has only dealt with the high profile items cut in this Department. Staying with the Canadian Wildlife Service cuts, there are grave consequences to the cutting of projects within the Wildlife Service that have to do with birds that are not endangered species and that have to do with animals that are not endangered species. I refer specifically to the function that was always there of the Canadian Wildlife Service to provide information to the Pest Control Division of the Federal Department of Agriculture for the registration of herbicides and insecticides.

The input into that very vital operation of the federal Government in the Department of Agriculture is required from the Department of National Health and Welfare. It is also required from industry, but the only people who supplied the information on animals and birds was the Canadian Wildlife Service. They supplied it sometimes acting in conjunction with the National Research Council. How important is that, Mr. Speaker? How important is that cut made in eastern Canada to discontinue experiments being done on aerial sprays as it relates to insecticides? I will tell you how important it is, Mr. Speaker. If we go back about 20 years we will recall the registration of DDT in Canada. We all know what happened. Nobody in his right mind in this country today would say that we should approve DDT to be used as an aerial spray to get rid of the balsam woolly aphid, or the hemlock looper. No, not today. We moved from that particular product into phenitrothion and then when the research work was done on that, we moved into matracil, and we discovered, by looking at the research that was done on the wildlife in this country, that these particular products had problems. They, in effect, in the amounts being used in the products, were killing birds.

Why is that important? Birds are the natural predator of the very insect that we were trying to get rid of. Birds ate the spruce budworm. You would think, over a period of time, that if the budworm increased its population, birds would also increase their population. But there was a new element put into the environment, that of the aerial spraying of chemicals.

The Government of Canada has been instrumental in the world in trying to find a solution to the problem of chemical spraying. I suppose some of the Members here who have delved into the subject would know about the very valuable research being done by Dr. Schmirnoff in the Province of Quebec who invented BT, which is a non-chemical substance. Why? Because the chemicals killed the birds. In the beginning, with the types of chemicals we were using, it also killed the fish. It also gave rise to such terrible things as Rey's syndrome in children.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are telling me that I have a minute left. I wish I could go on until the official vote or until the Minister steps into the House so that I could tell her where she is wrong as far as these cuts are concerned.

To conclude, the Minister's cuts can be divided into bad, worse, and ridiculous. Let me add another category, that of impossible. The most important part of these cuts deals with things that cannot be cut. The government has to realize that there are certain Departments of the Government in this country today that are really operating on a shoe-string. To use those Departments for cuts is unfair and against the wishes of the Canadian people.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to thank the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) for his lucid view of the effects of the Minister's cuts on our environment. Why does he feel the Minister was wrong in this respect? He indicated her views were somewhat incorrect. Would he expand on that?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I think the most important aspect has really been lost to date by some of the discussions involving the Canadian Wildlife Service. The President of the Treasury Board just made a comment, and I will overlook it because he was lost when he issued his financial statement. There were words in that financial statement that were not carried through in the cuts.

The reason I made the statement is that when you remove a service from such a vital area of input as the use of chemicals, not on the ground but in the air, and when you remove an input from the registration of a chemical that is being sprayed over an entire province and you remove a vital aspect in determining whether or not to use that chemical, how long you are going to use it, or what size the droplet will be, when you remove that vital information that nobody else is going to provide, then you are getting into an area that is very very dangerous.

If you look at Canadian history and examine what has happened over the years in this country, you see that there are people who have written books on the subject and articles that said that perhaps our mistake happened when we used chemicals in aerial sprays. Perhaps that is what happened. Perhaps we should be looking at what they do in Europe in controlled woodlots. Perhaps we should have bird nurseries instead of using chemicals. Perhaps there are other options that are open.

When one makes an across-the-board cut and says for public consumption, "I am not going to touch migratory birds and endangered species", the ordinary person says, "That's good. We all love endangered species. We all love migratory birds". In that way one gets away with the cut on the basis of immediate reaction from the public generally. Nobody looks at the long-term effects or the drastic effects that are in place. You are not looking at birds that were not endangered, you are looking at species that were not endangered, nor at migratory birds, and there is the whole point. Down the road, a future Government will come along and reinstate every one of those cuts. If things keep going the way they are, if the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) keeps forcing Ministers to cut the budgets of their Departments ad hoc, if he keeps doing that in conjunction with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), the Government will not last beyond the next election.

Mr. Pat Binns (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in the debate on this non-confidence motion before the House. Actually I am surprised that the Opposition has decided to condemn the Government for its negligent and irresponsible approach to protection and management of the environment. It would be shocking if that were true, if it had some basis in fact, but the resolution itself has no basis in fact. I should like to try to point that out during the next few minutes.

When we look at the environment and its protection, we have to look at more than just what is within the jurisdiction of one Minister or that Minister's Department. For example, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Government made a substantial and important move in appointing the Cabinet of the new Government and in appointing the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew). The Minister of State for Forestry is perhaps as important to environmental issues as any other person aside from the Minister herself. For that reason, we see right off the bat that environmental issues have at least two strong supporters with Ministries in Cabinet at the present time. That is a pronounced and dramatic improvement in the situation. In fact, it is the first time in almost two decades that an independent portfolio has been created in the Government of Canada to take care of forestry. What could be more important to environmental matters than taking care of our forests and the natural habitat of much of Canada's wildlife?

The Opposition has gone on at some length in regard to the substantial cuts made to environmental programs. Yes, there have been changes in priorities and cuts have been made. However, let us take a look at the budgetary summaries. I think they speak for themselves. In the Minister's summary it was suggested that almost $727 million will be spent by the Department of Environment in 1985-86. If we compare that figure with the one for last year, there is a $15 million cut, but we have to determine how much $15 million is in relation to the $727 million. We will soon see that the decrease is a little over 2 per cent. That hardly reflects the kinds of accusations which opposition caucuses have been making in this debate today. If we take into account the toxicology support which the Government is providing at the present time, I am told that we will find that the budget for environmental matters is actually up 3.8 per cent.

I could be a little more specific in terms of some of the support which is being provided to groups and organizations and to various issues across the country, but it is important to realize that there are more issues in the environment than the ones noted so far by the Opposition. There is continued support at the same levels to groups such as the Canadian Association of Geographers, the International Geograhic Union, and the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers. There is continued support at the same levels as those of the past for the Canadian Wildlife Federation and the Canadian Nature Federation. There is an increase in the budget for the Creston Valley Wildlife Management Authority. There is a new figure for the Wildlife Habitat Canada Foundation, a new injection of $1.3 million, which the Opposition did not point out during the debate so far. There is another increase to the Fur Institute of Canada of $500,000. If we continue through the Estimates we find an increase to the James Bay Agreement project, to the Red River Ring Dyking project and to the Qu'Appelle Valley project in Saskatchewan.

Perhaps we could look at the reductions. I suggest these have been omitted by the Opposition as well. If we look at the specifics—and perhaps I will not go into them—we will quickly see that the reductions probably reflect those programs introduced by the former Government in its last ditch attempts to be re-elected.

There are other contributions which I think are significant in terms of the over-all objectives of the Government. For instance, there is the contribution to the National and Provincial Parks Association of Canada. It has been increased by 50 per cent this year. There is a new contribution to the Interagency Forest Fire Centre, which is important if wildlife is to be preserved and enhanced. We must ensure that our forest fire service is as good as can be. There is a new contribution to the International Council on Monuments and Sites. These are just a few of the other services which are also important to the activities of the Department of the Environment.

I would be pleased to enter into debate on the subject of specific cuts. As a member of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, I recently met with representatives of the Canadian Wildlife Service to discuss the particular cuts to that organization. I would be the first to say that I would rather not see cuts made to any organization, for certainly they—and this one in particular—play an important role in protecting environmental matters in Canada, wildlife in particular. During the discussion with the Executive Vice-President of that group, Mr. Brynaert, I had the opportunity to ask him whether or not, even with staff cuts of 84 people out of 370, the Canadian Wildlife Service could continue to perform its job. I think it is important to point out that the Government is under an obligation to Canadian people to try to be as effective as it can in the management of programs. We are facing a $34 billion deficit which we do not want to pass on to our children and grandchildren. It is important to find ways and means to make programs move effective. Obviously that overhead is crippling our economy. We must find ways and means to do things better. However, I will return to the question I asked of Mr. Brynaert as to whether the staff cuts and the budget cuts to the Canadian Wildlife Service could be lived with, assuming of course that perhaps in-house changes could be made to ensure that services would continue to be provided. He suggested the following:

> But I might suggest that it is probable that the Department could operate with those kinds of cuts—providing some thought and planning had gone into where those cuts were made.

This group is profoundly affected by the cuts, yet its Executive Vice-President was quick to agree that government could live with cuts, probably these specific cuts, with some thought and planning on how they would be administered.

The Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) was somewhat concerned about what the Executive Vice-President had said, and he questioned him on it. In reply Mr. Brynaert said:

> I am sure there are areas where there could be cuts, cuts that would not have dramatic effect in terms of carrying out the mandate and the responsibilities of the Department.

I should like to focus for a few minutes on one area of the Department and its responsibilities, that is, the Atmospheric Environment Service. We tend to overlook many of the functions which the Department has to carry out in its day to day operations. The weather affects all of us in a more dramatic way than we often think. Perhaps yesterday's storm was an example of how weather affects our daily lives. Because of the work of the Atmospheric Environment Service, yesterday's storm was forecast accurately and important decisions were made on transportation, snow removal, store and office closings and cancellation of public gatherings ahead of time so as to minimize the adverse effect of the weather on a variety of activities. It is the objective of that service to ensure that adequate information on the atmosphere, ice and sea is provided for. Their goal, of course, is the safety of lives, security of property, greater efficiency of a variety of economic activities and the maintenance and enhancement of environmental quality.

The Government feels that it can carry out this mandate with its policy of providing greater efficiency in government services. I would point out that new initiatives are being undertaken, as I mentioned in the reflection on the Estimates a few moments ago. In this area, a broad program to improve weather warnings on the West Coast for fishermen and other marine users has been implemented. The Government has moved aggressively to provide improved weather services for fishermen. Following the West Coast storm of October 12, 1984, a study was commissioned to determine the circumstances which led to the sinking of seven ships and the loss of five lives. The study was carried out by Professor LeBlond of the University of British Columbia. It was completed in December, 1984. The Government has now announced a series of responses to the LeBlond recommendations.

In December, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) announced the number of weather observations taken by federal government vessels and that the recording of special observations for significant weather changes would be increased. He also indicated that co-ordination of fisheries openings and closings between the Weather Service and Fisheries vessels would be increased. In January, the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) announced an expansion of the West Coast committee which co-ordinates marine safety activities for roe herring fisheries to include the salmon fishery. She announced research into the causes for severe Pacific storms and the development of techniques to better forecast these events. She announced improvements of procedures to exchange weather observations and forecasts directly with the fishing fleet on a real time basis.

In February, the Government announced the establishment of a marine weather forecast position at the Pacific Weather Centre, giving specialized attention to providing marine weather forecasts and the introduction of a wave forecast service for two offshore areas and the acceleration of research and development on wave forecasting techniques for coastal areas in order to implement a comprehensive coastal service by 1987. It also announced improvements to the communications system between government services to provide more rapid exchange of weather information and to improve forecast services to the fishing community. These are just a few of the measures that have been undertaken, including automatic weather reporting services on the coast and in the coastal channels that will make life safer for our fishing and marine interests.

I would like to mention briefly climatic services. The climate program is very important to the Canadian Government, the provinces and Territories. We have involvement from all those groups, plus universities in the private sector. Research is being carried out on the effects of increasing levels of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere. This year, socio-economic impact studies are in process to gauge the probable effects of CO_2 induced climate changes on food, agriculture and on Great Lakes water resources.

On March 1, this Government announced a start of a one-year experiment which may eventually enable the Canadian public to obtain monthly and seasonal forecasts of climatic conditions on a regular basis. During the trial period, and I think this is interesting, selected organizations such as provincial Departments of Tourism, municipalities and fishery groups will be asked by Environment Canada to evaluate the format and usefulness of these experimental forecasts. Just imagine, if you will, in planning your holidays for this summer that you would be able to determine what the weather will be like in Prince Edward Island when you want to go there, and we welcome you all to our province.

In October of last year, Canadian astronaut Marc Garneau carried out successful experiments using the super sunphotometer aboard the U.S. space shuttle. The instrument was developed through joint efforts of the Atmospheric Environment Services Research Directorate and Canadian industry. It provides information supporting our continued research on climate as well as the stratospheric ozone layer and acid rain.

Over the past several months, this Government has provided additional funding for the completion of the report on the possible environmental effects of nuclear war. The study was completed by the Royal Society of Canada in early February. It describes the likely effects of a nuclear conflict on climatic conditions in Canada and around the world and, in particular, the so-called nuclear winter effect. The report is now being reviewed by Environment Canada and other federal Government Departments. I am pleased to announce on behalf of the Minister that she will be distributing to each and every Member of this House a copy of the report as soon as it can be printed so Members will have the opportunity to be apprised of the latest scientific assessment of this potential human and environmental catastrophe.

The demand for weather service continues to grow. It is widely used among government departments, federal and provincial, and in fact there were over 15 million contacts with the service in the last year. It certainly points out the need of providing this kind of service to the public.

Since 1976, the number of requests for information at the service has more than doubled. During that same period, staff members for the service have decreased by 10 per cent and expenditures remained nearly constant in real dollar terms. This productivity improvement has resulted from automation of AES operations such as the collection of wheather observation, preparation of forecasts, increased computerization of forecast methods and more rapid and widespread dissemination of products through an improved communication system. Obviously, the Government is providing better service and maintaining costs. In some areas, it was able to decrease costs without imposing a further hardship on the Canadian taxpayer.

Improvements in the economies and the methods of delivering weather data and forecasts to the public have been achieved through a process of continuous review of staff deployment and technological improvements. In many cases, the service can be maintained at a lower level and still provide the objective of AES.

One way to improve efficiency, and I have already alluded to the fact that we can improve efficiency and productivity through automation, but one specific way that this has worked is the way in which AES has worked with high-tech companies in Canada. These companies have been able to build on the experience, and a number of them have a special but significant market niche for sophisticated scientific instrumentation which is now being sold in export markets. Because of the support of the Canadian Government, two of these high-tech companies building this equipment are now providing jobs to Canadian manufacturers who are selling this equipment abroad.

The Atmospheric Environment Service is responsible for the kind of weather reports and forecasts we hear daily. In fact, I would point out very quickly that they do provide in excess of 230,000 weather forecasts annually for 167 inland public forecast areas and all large population centres. They produce 130,000 marine weather warnings, advisories and forecasts annually for 101 marine regions. It produces 380,000 weather forecasts, amendments and warnings for 90 aviation areas and 170 airports. It also provides complete service for military operations.

There are some other things that the service provides which do not immediately come to mind, for instance, the long-range transport of air pollutants. AES provides the scientific leadership for the Canadian research effort concerned with the environmental impact of acid rain. In the area of toxic chemicals management, it looks at the persistent high concentration of toxic chemicals and how they would occur with increasing frequency over representative geographic areas. It provides scientific leadership in the areas of measurement, research and modelling.

Research on the following issues is also carried out: the danger to the earth's life-protecting stratospheric ozone layer which demands the use of certain chemicals, the effect of the build-up of atmospheric carbon dioxide caused by man's activities, even the effects of volcanic eruptions that may have long-lasting effects on man through climatic change and by significantly adding to the acidity of rain.

The National Weather Service, which I referred to, employs some 2,350 people from coast to coast and in remote Arctic locations, However, it enjoys the unselfish participation of twice as many unpaid volunteers who daily measure temperatures and precipitation for the National Climate Archives. That volunteer service is very important to this country as a whole.

I am only pointing out these items in relation to AES so that the public and Members of the House will appreciate that there is more to the Department than the cuts and the kinds of negative items which the Opposition has brought forward in this resolution. I hope that my comments in some way have pointed out that the Government has not abandoned its commitment to the environment. Indeed, the Govenrment has almost held the budget intact despite an overwhelming need for deficit control. When we look at the $34 billion deficit and the need for control, and the mandate which the Government has been given to control the deficit, it is admirable that the Government and the Minister have been able to hold her budget almost intact. I am sure that the majority of the Members of the House will have the foresight to vote against the non-confidence motion when the time comes.

● (1650)

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to join in the debate this afternoon on the opposition motion of non-confidence.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong). This morning when the traditional alternation of speakers did not take place, I raised the matter with your colleague who then occupied the chair and drew his attention to the fact that when it is an Opposition Day and a motion has been put by an opposition party, there is a policy that every second speaker, after the first round of three speakers, is alternately selected among the moving Party and whichever other Party Your Honour wishes to recognize. I thought that point had been received favourably, and that is why I am now rising on a point of order in the hope that you will consider this representation favourably and recognize a Liberal Member as the next speaker, as it was our Party which put the motion on the Order Paper.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a second point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) rises on another point of order.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the clear pattern in this House has always been that after the first round of speakers the number of speakers normally would be in proportion to the numbers of Members in the House. However, it has become a pattern in this session that on an Opposition Day there is one speaker from the Opposition, one speaker from the Government, and then back and forth, in order to give government Members a fair shake.

I noted in reviewing the proceedings this afternoon that there have been two speakers from the Liberal Party, one speaker from the New Democratic Party and only one speaker from the Government. It would seem to me that it would only be proper for the Government to be at least represented equally in replying to the severe criticism which has been levelled against the Government by the Opposition. It is totally unfair that the Opposition should have the time it has had, particularly in view of the numbers in the House.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the points of order which have been raised, regardless of the merit of the argument which was raised about what the tradition might be or what the Chair should or should not have done, I would like to make two points. First, Mr. Speaker, you did recognize the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) and he had begun to speak. Second, in watching the House, the fact of the matter is that no one from the Liberal Party was standing when you recognized the Hon. Member for Regina East. I saw the Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) rise, but by that time the Member for Regina East had already been recognized. As well, the Hon. Member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) was trying to get the attention of the Chair. I am only trying to point out the empirical facts of the matter, without getting into what the tradition may be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): All Parties now having been heard, may I point out, as a point of information, that on Opposition Days the only clear tradition is that the Party which has put the motion usually has one speaker more than the other Parties. That seems to be the only clear tradition.

It was brought to the attention of the Chair this morning by the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) that there seemed to be some imbalance with respect to the alternation of speakers. I also know it is a matter of concern to the Government. However, in this debate three government Members have spoken, three members of the Official Opposition have spoken, and two members of the New Democratic Party have spoken. The Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong), whom I have already recognized, would be the third member of the New Democratic Party to speak. It is my understanding, if the debate had followed its usual course, that there would be one additional member of the Official Opposition who would speak on the motion.

On Opposition Days, until now, approximately 36 members of the Government have spoken, 26 members of the Official Opposition have spoken, and 24 members of the New Democratic Party have spoken. It is a matter of concern to the Chair on Opposition Days to see that the initial tradition is respected and that more opposition Members are able to speak than government Members. Of course, that is difficult to apply, considering the lopsided House which we have. Therefore, I will recognize the Hon. Member for Regina East on debate.

Mr. de Jong: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It has been pointed out by several Members, and in particular the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) and the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), that we are living in an age of very rapid industrial and technological change. One realizes that every year thousands of new chemical products are introduced in the market-place. Some of those products are foods, herbicides, pesticides and other chemical products. As well, different types of industrial practices occur. Different combinations of different chemicals are put together to produce a new product, or new types of by-products and industrial wastes, either in solid, liquid or gaseous form, are created.

In a highly industrial and technological society, there will be a very high rate of technological innovation. If we want to remain an industrial society, there is a technological imperative involved, that is, that we play a part in developing new products, chemicals and industrial practices in order that we remain competitive with other countries in the world. In fact, it is imperative to innovate continually in the industrial society.

Yet we know from past mistakes that in this rapidly changing industrial process mistakes do happen. Sometimes the mistakes can be fatal to the environment and to human health. That is why the state, as a social institution in a highly complex and industrial society, is so essential and important. It is the state which has the responsibility to ensure that no accidents occur, and that new products which are put on the market will not be harmful to human health or to the environment in present and future years.

The Government has a very special responsibility in an industrial society. It has a trust over our environment. It has to be a guardian over the quality of the land, the water and the air. It is a guardian for the present and for future generations. It is, therefore, with tremendous sadness that we see this newly elected Government, with its tremendous majority, decide to cut the Department of the Environment as one of its first acts. It is said that it has decided to cut from the Department some of the instruments which the Government needs in order to fulfil its role as the trustee of the environment. It is not only sad, it is shameful and it will not be forgiven by generations yet to come.

I would like to relate briefly some of the experiences I have had in the past in dealing with Liberal Governments. I would also like to refer to some of the chemical products which get on the market and the testing of those products for our health and safety. A number of years ago, when I was first elected, I became quite concerned with what was called the "IBT affair". "IBT" stands for International Biotest Laboratories in Illinois. This laboratory was the largest private toxicological laboratory in the world, I believe. It did the testing on just about all of the herbicides and pesticides on the market in Canada today and in fact in the United States as well. It did the tests to make certain that the use of these products would not cause cancer in the future and that, indeed, these products would be safe for the environment and for us as consumers.

It was discovered, Mr. Speaker, that this lab had deliberately falsified its tests. It had taken out dead rats and put in live rats. It had scratched out the results of its tests. A suit was filed in the United States, and several of the Chief officers of that company are now in jail. I brought this matter up in the House on numerous occasions. The Minister of National Health and Welfare at that time pooh-poohed me and said I was being sensationalist. The result was, Mr. Speaker, that the events in the United States, particularly in the courts, showed that I was not sensationalist.

Several of the products which IBT had tested had to be taken off the market. Governments, both in Canada and in the United States entered into an agreement to redo the testing of almost all the herbicides and pesticides on the market in Canada and the United States. But, Mr. Speaker, for a long period of time we had products on the market for which there was no accurate data proving that they were safe for human use and consumption. It became obvious at that time, Mr. Speaker, that the study of toxicology was essential in a modern contemporary industrialist society at a time when new chemicals were coming on the market at such a fast pace. It was not enough just to rely on the private sector to do those studies. Governments had to take this responsibility. It was recognized that it was a difficult field because there were very few trained toxicologists. It is an expensive field.

I as well as many others urged that an international public organization like the United Nations should become responsible for the toxicological studies which were needed to determine if all these new chemical products were safe to the environment, the users and the consumers. The establishment of a toxicology study centre in Canada was announced by the previous Government and was a truly important step. Unfortunately, we find that this Government has cut that proposal. We find that this Government now has cut the toxicological studies of the herring gulls. We find that the monitoring of of the effects on forests of the spraying of hundreds and thousands of pounds of toxic substances has been cut. We find that the program which monitored the effects of massive spraying of toxic materials on the Prairies has been cut. How unwise and how sad this is.

Previous studies, both in eastern Canada and in my home province, have shown that the poisons sprayed—and, indeed, herbicides and pesticides are poisons—collected through ground water into lakes and gullies is having a detrimental effect on the life chain. Studies have shown that at the base of the life chain are microscopic organisms which generally exist in the mud and the bottom of gullies and lakes, and there is an unacceptable high rate of deformities among these lower life forms in the life chain. These lower levels form food for fish, and fish form the food for the birds and for human beings. So, Mr. Speaker, these toxic substances are moving up into the life chain. That is why it is so important to have monitoring in place. Monitoring provides an early warning system to human beings. The destruction of the program, Mr. Speaker, which gives us that early monitoring system is irresponsible. It is stupidity to the highest degree, and we will pay the price in the future. The few million dollars that the Government will save today, it will have to repay in hundreds of millions of dollars in the future as the toxic substances move up the life chain. How stupid is this action of the Government! How stupid it is to save a few millions today which it will have to repay a hundredfold in the future!

We know of the effect of thalidamide. We know of the heartaches and human suffering which that drug caused to untold numbers of people. What the Government is doing with this action is disabling the country from preventing the type of catastrophe like thalidamide.

In my own home Province of Saskatchewan, we know that there is some correlation between the number of miscarriages which occur after crop spraying time. This hard to put a correct statistical correlation on it, Mr. Speaker, because there are too many variables still involved, such as wind patterns. We know that the chemical spray is concentrated in certain urban areas. But I think it is fair to say that those who are knowledgeable in the field know that the chances for miscarriages increase because of crop spraying. Is it any wonder? Logic would tell you that. Obviously when hundreds and thousands of pounds of toxic substances are sprayed in the air, substances which are meant to kill weeds and insects, it can also have a detrimental effect on human health. So when the Government makes these cuts, it does a tremendous disservice to the present generation and generations to come.

There is also concern about the future, Mr. Speaker. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency issued an amazing report around a year and a half ago. It warned that about 15 to 20 years from now we will begin to see the greenhouse effect. It predicts that this effect will have a tremendous environmental impact of a global nature. It warns that the build-up of carbon particles in the atmosphere will create a tremendous climatic change around our world, and we will begin to see it in our lifetime. That, Mr. Speaker, is just an amazing warning from an institution like the EPA, an agency which would not unduly alarm American citizens because of some false or whimsy reports. It was a well researched warning. Yet when we see the cuts this Government has introduced in the Department of the Environment, we begin to realize that the Government is not really concerned about the future. It is not concerned about things like the greenhouse effect; if it is 15 or 20 years away, forget it. This Government is only concerned about four-year terms. But environmental concerns are not just for four-year or eight-year terms but much longer terms. Private industry does not have those because the concern of private industry is the profit margin and the bottom line. Whether you like it or not, that is the nature of private enterprise. But Government should have a long-term concern, because if it does not, who in heaven's name in our world, in our society, has that concern? No one. It is the duty of the Government to become concerned, not just about this year or next year, this term or next term. This institution is the only one with the responsibility not for this generation alone but for generations to come. We are the guardians of our environment. We are the guardians of our world, and the cut-backs this Government has introduced mean giving up that guardianship. That is inexcusable.

One begins to wonder the reason for this. I mean, normally I tend to get along with the Conservatives; not the new right in the United States, they frighten the heck out of me but the traditional small "c" conservatives who think in terms of conserving, preserving and husbanding our resources. They have been critical of past Liberal Governments for squandering our resources and the environment for the sake of development for now and the heck with the future. I have always felt a very close affinity with those small "c" conservatives who believe in conserving. We have to conserve our resources, our environment, our energy, our fresh water and our air. We have to conserve these precious commodities because they are not inexhaustible. We are living not in an infinite world but in a very finite world. But now we see those very Conservatives are now destroying their own philosophy by cutting back on the Department of the Environment.

Why are they doing it? I see a pattern in the cut-backs in the Department of the Environment and in the NRC. Where are the cut-backs in the NRC? Are there cut-backs in Atomic Energy research? Oh, no. Are they in alternative energy? Oh, yes. Where are the cut-backs in the grants to oil companies? Oh, no, don't touch them. But there are cut-backs in developing alternative energy sources and home insulation. Everything that would help conserve and preserve is being cut back. I am afraid that the pattern is clear, Mr. Speaker. This Government here is not for the long term but for the good times.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. de Jong: It is here to rape and to plunder the resources now and forget about the future. It is a Government which is for freeing things up for unfettered private enterprise. "Put away the silly environmental restrictions. We do not want to hear about deformities in herring gull eggs. We do not want to hear about deformities in primitive life forms at the bottom of our lakes. We do not want any of this early warning system. Let's have a go at it, let's rape and plunder and despoil our resources and the heck with the future. We are not going to be around for them to vote for; we are just concerned for things right now".

Well, Mr. Speaker, this tremendous irresponsibility, this stupidity that we will pay for many times over in the future, this is why I stand here in support of the motion of non-confidence. I hope and urge all Members of this House to vote according to their conscience and not according to their political affiliation and loyalties. It is the future of this country, its environment, its precious natural environment, and generations to come which are at stake.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Questions or comments?

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member made a great point about the herring gull program. He will know that when that program started there was clear evidence that dioxins and DDT in Lake Ontario were causing the gulls to disappear. However, he will also know that problem seems to have been solved in that the gull population has certainly expanded and seems to be in hand. Therefore, I was wondering why this program should be carried on. Would he perhaps tell us why we should carry on a program where the problem seems to be solved?

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, first of all, using the Member's logic, we would never have had the program to begin with because there was not a problem to begin with. We instituted the program as an early warning system. When the problem started we were able to pick up on it.

I cannot agree with the Hon. Member when he says the problem is gone. Two years ago I, along with several of my colleagues, visited the Love Canal and Hyde Park dump sites. At the Hyde Park dump site there are hundreds of thousands of pounds of dioxin. Let me explain to the Hon. Member that one ten-thousandth of a part of dioxin, that is a little speck that you see in the sunlight on a dusty day, is enough to cause cancer and kill a person. At the Hyde Park dump site in Niagara there are over 100,000 pounds of dioxin stored. We know from the past that there has been leaching from that dump site through the Niagara River into the Great Lakes. They have found dioxins along the Niagara River. In fact, it would be a tremendous terrorist plot, if one were to write a terrorist novel, for someone to blow up some of those make-shift dams which exist around the Hyde Park dump site during a period of heavy rains. The Hyde Park dump site is a ticking time bomb. There is leaching of dioxins out of that site into the Great Lakes system.

We need the monitoring system as an early warning for us all. Not until those dump sites of sewage and industrial wastes around the Great Lakes have been cleared up should the early warning system be dismantled. As long as those dangers continue to exist, we must keep the monitoring system. To destroy that monitoring system is to pluck out your eyes. That is how dumb and stupid it is.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Member does not know what is happening. The herring gull program has only been reduced from six people knocking open herring gull eggs to one person. Instead of using the intense control program that was in place, a much lesser control program will be maintained. That is all that is really necessary.

There are other ways of approaching the leaking dioxin. That is why more money is being spent on water quality control in the Great Lakes. Does the Member not realize that we must attack new problems as they develop? As you have been successful in solving one problem, you can withdraw money from that program and place it into another program. Is that not a reasonable way of handling it? Must we continue forever doing the same old thing without getting at the new problems in the environment as they develop?

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, it dismays me to hear these types of comments and that type of logic. There is no recognition by the Hon. Member that this program is recognized world-wide. I am dismayed to hear the Hon. Member say that the six people were only cracking open eggs. The Hon. Member is dealing with a very serious problem.

They have not killed the program; there is still one person left, he states. I understand that if the one person who is left in the program observes deformities in the eggs and offsprings, he cannot even report them. The Government does not want to hear any of that stuff because it disturbs people. It means that local people get upset, form committees, and demand more regulations on industry. The Government does not want more regulations on industry, so it shuts down the programs which supply the information that gets people all upset. The Government would rather have the people accept what is going down and not know and understand the dangers that exist to their health and safety. That is the attitude of the Government and of the Hon. Member and it is deplorable.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. There have been many government speakers who have been prepared to enter the debate this afternoon. The Chair has taken a decision, and I respect that. I would like the Chair's confirmation, before this becomes a habit or a precedent, that the Chair will entertain discussions with the Government to establish what the sequence will be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. Considering the time we have left for debate, I will only say that the Chair will neither add to nor subtract from the decision that has been rendered.

The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) had a question or a comment.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question. I find it very difficult to understand the holier than thou attitude which we have seen demonstrated all day today, particularly from the opposition Parties. I am getting the impression from the Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) that today is the first day of the last days of our lives, that the world is ending, but indeed it is not. The Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) referred to the word "impossible". Napoleon said that the word "impossible" exists only in the dictionary. The former Government, however, left us with trying to do the impossible in this country.

The financial corporate community of Canada has been saying that we did not go far enough on November 8. Many respected research organizations in the country, such as the Business Council on National Issues, the Conference Board of Canada and the C.D. Howe Institute, are saying that we did not go far enough with our cuts. They are saying that we cannot continue to live beyond our means in this country. The Member for Regina East spoke about cuts across the board. He spoke about all the Ministries and gave us a litany, as did many other Members this afternoon, of cuts. Does the Member for Regina East think that this country can continue to live beyond its means any longer?

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the PMO has increased its budget by 50 some per cent. I think most Canadians would rather have seen that money spent on wildlife and to protect the health and safety of our environment and water quality than to increase the propaganda arm of the Prime Minister's Office. I would suggest to the Hon. Member that there are other ways of solving our deficit problems. Doing it at the expense of future generations and the health and safety of Canadians is stupidity. It is a false economy because we will be paying for it a hundredfold in the future.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to contribute to this debate by speaking about renewable energy, and in particular about research into renewable energy. I would like to speak about the serious questions that the cuts at the National Research Council energy division have raised about our ability to cope with the depletion of conventional energy resources, and the relationship of these cuts to the protection and management of the environment.

We live in a complex world, Mr. Speaker, and the decisions we make sometimes have consequences which we cannot foresee. Earlier today I asked the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Siddon) whether he was aware of the consequences of his decision to cut research spending on Canadian aid programs in Africa at the time that he made the decision. In answer to me he said that there is quite a distance between the cuts in basic research and the problems of starving millions in Africa.

I would suggest that it is not so, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest that there is indeed a very direct relationship. On November 8, we had the elimination of the research program in renewable energy. In January, the National Research Council informed CIDA that it could no longer provide the research support for the programs that it had contemplated to provide for irrigation using Canadian technology in the desert. In February, CIDA responded by indefinitely postponing its program because this research support was not available. These connections may be hard for people to see.

● (1730)

I would like to suggest to the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Siddon) and to his Cabinet colleagues that research is not conducted in a vacuum. Indeed, technology has application in many areas.

It is precisely the applications of this technology and the long-term consequences of the use of technology that we expect the Government to be studying when it makes decisions of this nature.

Let me review briefly the history of Canada's renewable energy. It was born out of the oil crisis in the mid and late 1970s. In the National Energy Program, the Government foresaw a greater role for alternative and renewable energy in Canada. I quote from an excerpt of the program:

> The realities of the energy future indicate the wisdom of accelerated efforts to develop new and renewable energy forms—

This program was followed by the House of Commons special committee on alternative energy and oil substitution which studied this subject for one year. It took a half century perspective—I do not suggest that a half century perspective is too long—on Canadian energy development and presented some 65 recommendations to foster the introduction of alternative energy sources, technologies and fuels into our energy system.

Considering the variety of concerns including the depletion of conventional energy resources, environmental impact, regional energy disparity, strategic considerations, diversity in energy supply and social benefits, this committee argued that the twenty-first century would see a profound change in Canada's energy system away from hydrocarbons and toward sustainable resources. Support programs were gradually developed by the Government and an interdepartmental panel on energy research and development was established to co-ordinate the Government efforts in the areas of renewable energy, conservation, fossil fuels, new liquid fuels, conventional energy and nuclear energy. In 1983 and 1984, some $54 million was provided for the research programs operated by the NRC Division of Energy. The following programs accounted for some $41 million of research expenditures: heat pumps, fusion energy, solar energy, bioenergy, wind energy, hydrogen and energy storage. It should be noted that some three-quarters of this research was conducted by the private sector under contracts with the National Research Council. It is these programs and indeed the entire NRC Energy Division that were cancelled by the Government last November 8.

[Translation]

The renewable energy industry consists largely of small- and medium-sized businesses, many of which have been in existence for only ten years or less. Today, some of these companies are financially dependent on public research programs such as the one initiated by the National Research Council. About 500 companies are directly active in research, design, manufacturing, distribution and installation of various lines of products in the renewable energy field. About 225 companies are manufacturers who in 1984 employed about 5,000 people and had sales of nearly $530 million, $30 million of which to export markets. These companies offer products that have been quick to acquire an international reputation. Our future for exports looks promising, provided we can remain competitive at the international level. We export mainly to the United States but also to Africa, Central America, South America and Asia.

According to a study carried out in 1983 by Frost and Sullivan, a consulting firm, international sales of biomass-based products, photovoltaic cells, small hydroelectric turbines, windmills and solar-thermal technology are now estimated at $3.5 billion and are expected to reach $15 billion by 1990.

[English]

It is against this background that we learned on November 8 of the complete elimination of the NRC Division of Energy. The reaction from the industry can only be characterized as disbelief. Research contracts which had been approved and were about to be signed were cancelled. Firms which had been counting on contracts were forced to lay off personnel and cancel projects. In spite of the grand promises of the Government, there was no warning, no consultation and no alternative presented by the Government.

The reaction from the industry was predictable. It is perhaps instructive for Tory Members in the House to hear some of that reaction. From Vancouver, a Mr. P. William Bishop wrote to the Minister of Science and Technology on November 24. He said:

From this distance, the decision to cut the entire NRC Energy Division seems somewhat arbitrary. I am concerned that in your keenness to make cuts you may not have fully considered the impact on the private sector.

Mr. Bishop went on to refer to the superwindow program and the plasma lamp.

Cutting the research at this stage will in my opinion be an act of vandalism . . . cutting back on private sector research in Vancouver is not why I have supported the Tory party for years.

[Translation]

Here is what Société d'énergie solaire du Canada Inc. Director Jacques Beaudet wrote in his letter of November 29 to the Hon. Member for Dollard:

For over ten years now, Canadians have made a lot of efforts and spent their own money to promote science, technology and the use of new energy sources. Government policies have helped put Canada's experts on the international scene . . . It would be a shame if a hasty decision, perhaps inspired by short-term objectives, were to make Canadians lose all the benefits of work already done and supported by Government policies.

[English]

Let me quote one other comment from the industry. Michael Bein of Chelsea, Quebec, wrote the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) on December 18:

I am all for getting rid of waste in government and reducing Canada's enormous budget deficit . . . but why use a chain saw when a scalpel, or at least a butcher's knife, will do?

Canada's fledgling solar industry stands to be wiped out, with something like 2000 private sector jobs lost, and with areas where we had a chance to be the world leader handed over to the Japanese on a silver platter. I am especially surprised that a Tory government would condone such an attack on small business.

It is hard to fathom why this particular decision was made. There was many questions that have been raised and very few answers offered by the Government. Last November 13, the Minister of State for Science and Technology said that this program was the least essential of all the activities of the National Research Council. We have no indication on what basis that determination was made. Obviously, many people in industry do not agree with him.

He also said on November 29 that the Government was:

—not sufficiently convinced of progress to the extent that special allocated funding should be continued in this area. Alternate energy could obtain funding for its projects through EMR and other government agencies. If proponents of projects in the solar energy industry wish to come forward, their application would be considered alongside that of anyone else's.

He did not indicate any consideration of the effect of this decision on jobs, Canada's export potential, on regional development or on the environment.

Another question which comes to mind is why the Division of Energy was not consulted. On November 19, the Secretary General of the National Research Council was reported as saying that the decision about what program cuts would be made to fulfil the budget reduction were made by the Government, not the agency.

● (1740)

Another question I have is, why was this entire division eliminated rather than the reduction spread throughout the NRC? Savings in 1985-1986 are forecast to be some $32 million. The NRC last year had an over-all budget of $502 million. Why not cut back all programs by 5 per cent or 6 per cent and preserve this particular program?

Were other alternatives considered, such as cutting a small percentage of expenditures in non-renewable energy and thereby providing funds to preserve a smaller Division of Energy? There is no indication that that was considered.

The Tory Government says it favours small business. Why harm an industry made up of small businesses? As I indicated earlier, 75 per cent of the research managed by the National Research Council is contracted out to the private sector. What about the Wright report which recently studied all aspects of government research and development? It recommended that greater efforts should be made by federal labs to work with industry by means of contracting out and that due recognition should be given to scientists and administrators supporting these efforts. Why, therefore, cut a program which corresponds precisely to this recommendation, which presumably is supported by the Government? I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to compare the cost of this program, again some $50 million, and its benefits to other forms of government support for the oil and gas industry or, let us say, to the cost of cleaning up polluting industry. The folly of this decision becomes all the more remarkable: $54 million, the 1983-84 budget of the Division of Energy, as opposed to billions of dollars that are spent on loan guarantees, PIP grants and subsidies to the oil and gas industry; $54 million as opposed to billions that must be spent to clean up acid rain. The Globe and Mail in an article on February 16 reported that Canada's major nickel and copper smelter operators may have to spend over $1 billion on capital equipment to clean the air.

There is no comparison whatsoever between the $54 million, the amount is almost picayune, that was invested in a promising young industry, as compared to the billions of dollars spent on more mature industry in this country.

It is not just a matter of cost, Mr. Speaker; electricity exports to the U.S. are threatened. The National Governors Association made up of Governors from 50 U.S. states resolved last year to press for legislation that would prevent U.S. imports of Canadian electricity unless Canada reduced its emissions that cause acid rain.

I would like to conclude my comments by saying that nothing other than the complete restoration of this budget would put this industry on sound footing. Our Party is also concerned about the deficit. However, when we look at this program and we see its relationship to the future of a promising industry in our country and when we compare the levels of support that are accorded renewable energy in many other countries, there is no foundation for this decision.

There has been much talk this afternoon about efficiency, about the necessity, the mandate this Government received, to control the deficit. That is true, Mr. Speaker, but there is another part to that. There is the part that says the Government must act responsibly, that its decisions must be made, as we have heard so often in the past few days, in the best interests of this country. The Minister of State for Science and Technology earlier today indicated that he did not see the connection between basic research and the problems of feeding starving millions in Africa. I would suggest that this is a totally irresponsible way to address the long-term consequences of research and development. I would suggest that the Minister of State for Science and Technology, if he has not done so already, meet with the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) and with other Cabinet colleagues and discuss some of the long-term consequences. The only conclusion that one can come to is that this Government, as has been suggested this afternoon, is only concerned with the short-term. Its only preoccupation is with the next election.

Future generations of Canadians depend on our Government to act in a more responsible manner when it comes to a crucial issue such as our environment and research spending as it affects the environment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 62(9), to interrupt proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply. Consequently, the question is as follows: Mr. Caccia, seconded by Mr. Rossi, moved:

That this House condemns the Government for its negligent and irresponsible approach to the protection and management of the environment, for its cuts of wildlife, meteorological and parks services, for abandoning Canada's past initiatives on the national and international levels to combat acid rain and to restore the water quality of the Great Lakes, and for thereby jeopardizing the health, economic well-being and the heritage of the present and future generations of Canadians.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Caccia), which was negatived on the following division:

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GOVERNMENT AID TO DOMTAR—QUEBEC AND EASTERN TOWNSHIPS

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Government is dealing the economy of Quebec an unprecedented blow by refusing to grant a subsidy of $100 million to Domtar, which was planning to invest $1.2 billion in the Eastern Townships, and especially in Windsor, in my riding.

The purpose of this project is to build a fine paper mill in Windsor that would be the most advanced of its kind in the world, and the project is therefore in line with our goals of generating permanent jobs. As far as employment is concerned, this project will both consolidate and create several thousand jobs. Since the pulp and paper industry is vital to the economy of the Eastern Townships and to the entire province, I think it is imperative that, for the sake of the thousands of workers in the industry, the Government review its decision as soon as possible. A refusal to grant the subsidy would be intolerable, and the Government would be ignoring the interests of Quebec and of the Eastern Townships. This is a very important time in the history of the Eastern Townships, and their people cannot and will not let the Government mortgage their future for the benefit of Americans or Bay Street.

I urge the Conservative Members in this House to act by supporting these thousands of workers in Quebec.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

LACK OF MAIL SERVICE IN MISSISSAUGA SUBDIVISIONS

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express the concern of many of my constituents concerning Canada Post Corporation. I represent the riding of Mississauga North in this House, a riding which has many new subdivisions and developments which are without mail service. These developments are by no means miles from the closest community. Many are simply across the street from neighbourhoods which have existed for 10 or 20 years. These new subdivisions are completely equipped with paved roads, sidewalks, adequate lighting, and receive all services except mail delivery.

There is no reason why Canada Post cannot deliver to these taxpayers. The fact the Corporation has not been able to organize itself to a sufficient degree is no excuse for the failure to fulfil its mandate. While it is commendable that the Corporation has lessened its debt, the people in my riding, having experienced in the past few years dramatic increases in postal rates, wonder if any of that cost saving has been made through better management as opposed to simply jacking the price of the service through the roof. Other than Canada Post, no business, and I use the word lightly, would attempt to enhance its reputation amongst its customers by raising the price of the product while cutting back on service.

My first report from Ottawa to my constituents was rushed through printing so it could be ready for the Christmas season. In fact, copies were bundled and ready for delivery on December 18, 1984. Canada Post immediately sprang into action, and my constituents received the mailing last week, a mere 62 days later.

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

CHALLENGE '85—DEADLINE FOR APPLICATIONS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I have previously described Challenge '85 as exemplifying prevarication, procrastination, and puffery. And now the alliteration is spoiled by incompetence. When the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) announced Challenge '85 on February 6, many people were skeptical of our ability to put the program in place by this summer. Now the Minister has sounded its death knell by moving the application deadline back to the end of March, just three weeks before thousands of students become actively unemployed. Officials within the Minister's own Department have said that it will be mid-July before the applications can all be processed. The program announced by the Minister on February 6 would be more appropriately called Cancel '85.

Then there is the Career Oriented Summer Employment Program. Application forms became available on February 21, and the deadline was set for one week later, February 28. This program was equally poorly administered. On February 27 students at Ryerson Institute were told there were no application forms available, and were sent to the University of Toronto. At the University of Toronto students were sent to York University because no forms were available there either. Every day we hear someone on the Government side of the House talking about confidence. Well, I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that students have no confidence in the Government's ability to provide desperately needed—

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COMPENSATION FOR VICTIMS OF CRIME

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, there have been many advances in the criminal justice system in Canada over the decades, but the plight of one group of Canadians has been largely ignored; namely, those Canadians who are the victims of criminal offenders. In Canada the victim of a crime has no real status in the criminal prosecution of the offender. Reparation under the Criminal Code is often useless, and compensation under federal and provincial legislation is inadequate. Surely a nation that spends millions on criminals should help the victims of their criminal acts.

A Nova Scotia case deserving of national attention is that of Lucille Hollett and her family. Their husband and father died in 1980, following an incident that resulted in criminal charges against two police officers of the City of Dartmouth. One was convicted of manslaughter. Four years have elapsed, yet the City of Dartmouth claims legal complications prevent payment of compensation. Litigation is grinding through the courts, but everyone knows you cannot fight City Hall.

Reasonable and adequate compensation for crime victims is the responsibility of all Canadians. If municipalities and the police avoid clear responsibility on legal grounds, the law should be changed. In 1982 I raised the case of Donald Marshall in Parliament. Now I ask Parliament to consider the case of Earl Hollett, another victim of our system.

CLOSURE OF POSTAL MUSEUM

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Postal Museum was closed on Friday, March 1. Canada Post knew for several years that it needed to find a new location for the Museum, but it did nothing. As a result, the Canadian Postal Museum, which is not only a national treasure but also a very useful museum for Canada's estimated two million stamp collectors, was closed. Canada's philatelic community spends an estimated $50 million annually to buy new issues from Canada Post. Those purchases produce a handsome profit for Canada Post, a corporation which needs the revenue badly. Other countries run their postal museums at a profit by issuing special stamps to collectors each year. Canada could do the same.

The 19 people who were laid off last week should be rehired immediately. We should reopen this vital museum immediately. The shabby treatment of those employees, some of whom had up to 30 years' experience and were given only a few hours notice, is unacceptable, and a step backwards in labour-management relations.

A permanent location can and will be found for the Postal Museum when the Minister responsible for the Post Office and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. LaSalle) realize the need for this valued Canadian institution. I urge those Ministers to meet as soon as possible to find a permanent location. I also urge you, Mr. Speaker, to allow the Postal Museum to remain in its Wellington Building location—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

NORTH AMERICAN AIR DEFENCE

VISIT TO NORTH BAY BASE

Mr. Richard Grisé (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, February 28, 1985, thanks to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Wenman) and the cordial hospitality of our hon. friend, the Member for Nipissing (Mr. Mantha), several members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence had the privilege of visiting the military base in North Bay, Ontario.

This one-day visit, which took place under the guidance of Major General Morton, was a most interesting experience in the light of the information we received on the NORAD system and its role within the general defence plan for North America.

Our visit to North Bay showed how important it is to be properly informed about the need for increasing our country's security.

Mr. Speaker, such visits are desirable and even indispensable to provide the Members of this House with firsthand information so that they can then better inform their constituents and the Canadian public.

THE SENATE

CALL FOR ABOLITION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) seriousness in suggesting that he would take steps to abolish the Senate, if he could get the agreement of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner), opens up a unique opportunity in Canadian history to complete the victory of political democracy in Canadian parliamentary tradition. The Leader of the Opposition has indicated that he is open to the idea. The Prime Minister now has a responsibility to propose an appropriate resolution for the abolition of the Senate. In this he could certainly count on the support of the NDP, and hopefully, finally, the Liberals, if they can bring themselves to let go of the elitism and patronage that have been their trademark for so many years.

The Prime Minister should bring in such a proposal and seek the views of the provinces on it. When he decides to go ahead, let him not be afraid of any Senate veto. A senate that dared to stand in the way of a genuine Canadian consensus that its time had come to an end, would be a Senate whose time would soon come to an end in any event.

Failing action by the Prime Minister, Canadians can expect that the NDP will propose such a resolution and provide the House with the opportunity to act on this important issue. All Canadians are anxious to see just where the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition really stand.

ALBERTA CONFERENCE DISCUSSIONS

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, on March 2 the consultative process enveloped all of Alberta. Some 230 delegates and Members of Parliament from every constituency in the province converged on Edmonton to present their views on the financial statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). The three Cabinet representatives from Alberta participated in the dialogue and provided insight into the national agenda of the federal Government.

The views expressed by the delegates were varied, stimulating, and well researched. This was the grass roots speaking. The delegates agreed that unemployment is our most pressing problem. We must eliminate trade barriers to create new employment and a stimulated economy. The Alberta MPs listened. This forum was an exercise in democracy.

The delegates urged the Government to respond to the commitments made on energy and energy development, to attack the deficit with great determination, to continue to trim government spending, and to stop the rise in interest rates for the sake of the dollar. Mr. Speaker, this conference illustrates our continued commitment to consult Canadians in the formation of a national agenda for a better future.

CONSULTATION—STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTERS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, Members of the House of Commons and Canadians across the country can only react with dismay to the arrogant attitude of federal Cabinet Ministers who say they do not have to consult the public or the public's representatives, the MPs, on departmental policies. Statements attributed to the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) in this morning's Toronto Star, and statements by the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Bissonnette) several days ago, reflect an arrogant attitude and a siege mentality on the part of an administration paranoid of opposition.

The Minister of State for Small Business told Members of Parliament on Monday that the has no intention of consulting either the House of Commons or members of standing committees on future changes to the Small Business Loans Act. These statements make a mockery of the good work being done in the House of Commons reform committee under the chairmanship of the Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). They reflect a growing disposition to rule by edict and public opinion polls. That kind of arrogance landed the Soviet Union in Afghanistan, it landed the United States in Vietnam, and it is going to land this administration in great jeopardy.

NATIONAL PARKS

CELEBRATION OF CENTENNIAL

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on February 18 we celebrated Heritage Day in Canada with a national luncheon on Parliament Hill, and we launched the one hundredth anniversary of our national parks. One hundred years ago Sir John A. Macdonald and his far-sighted Government gazetted Banff National Park as our first truly national monument, by protecting a magnificent part of Alberta. Countless millions have enjoyed its splendour since, and will continue to do so for generations to come.

[Translation]

Canadians are rightfully proud of the way their national parks network has been operated over the past decade.

We now have 31 national parks and 75 historic sites spread over all provinces and the two Territories.

• (1415)

[English]

I had the privilege of working in Terra Nova National Park, Newfoundland, and Banff National Park, Alberta, under the very capable direction of Mr. Jack Nichol when our National Parks system expanded considerably. Of this we can be proud. I urge the Government, however, not let up on its determination to preserve our historic sites, our canals, and our parks for posterity.

I remind the Government of the powerful expression on a poster printed by the Haida people of the Queen Charlotte Islands, in describing their Duu Guusd Tribal Park:

Duu Guusd is not just a land we inherited from our ancestors, but one which we borrow from our grandchildren.

We cannot afford to jeopardize their future.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

PRESENTATION OF BUDGET

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Canadian dollar hit another record low this morning, although it recovered slightly this afternoon. Mortgage rates were up by one half per cent yesterday, and consumer loans became more expensive yesterday as well. There are 1.5 million Canadians who are out of work. We have the largest governmental expenditures in Canadian history, and there is no clear idea of the Government's monetary policy or its fiscal policy. This is the longest period we have waited for a Budget since an election, in Canadian history.

Will the Prime Minister prevail upon his Minister of Finance to bring down a Budget earlier than he has already expressed, in order that we can have some direction in the economy of our country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): My right hon. friend is aware, and in fact has spoken with sympathy, of the kind of situations he anticipated inheriting himself as Prime Minister. I am sure that he was no more pleased than I was at the heritage that had been left by our predecessors in this office.

I picked up where my right hon. friend left off, in continuing the job with the Minister of Finance of straightening out the public finances of Canada and bringing some degree of sanity back to the process.

The Minister of Finance laid out a very important document on November 8 which brought about the largest single group of cuts ever initiated in Canada to begin the process of reducing the deficit, which has been followed by a number of other initiatives leading up to a Budget which, I assure my right hon. friend, will be introduced at the earliest possible moment. It will be based on the fundamental notions of re-energizing the private sector and getting Canadians back to work.

INQUIRY ABOUT POSSIBILITY OF TABLING BUDGET IN MARCH

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has promised tens of thousands of jobs, and he has failed to deliver. He promised low interest rates. He could not deliver. He promised to reduce the deficit. He did not deliver. He promised to reduce Government spending. He did not deliver. He promised us a strong dollar during the election campaign. He did not deliver. Therefore, I would ask the Prime Minister if in the circumstances he could persuade the Cabinet, the biggest in our country's history, to bring down a Budget immediately, in March instead of April, May or June.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Liberal Party promised Liberal delegates at the leadership convention a great Liberal victory. He failed to deliver the goods.

We have started the slow and difficult process of cleaning up the public finances of this country. I am sure my hon. friend realizes how difficult this is, considering the twenty-year-old legacy we have to deal with. We have inherited an extremely difficult situation, I must admit. On November 8 last year, we tabled a very serious document and started the process of national reconciliation and economic renewal, and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will be very pleased with the Budget that will be brought down shortly by the Minister of Finance.

• (1420)

GOVERNMENT'S MONETARY AND FISCAL POLICIES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Prime Minister that the election is over, and I suggest that he start dealing with the serious matter of governing this country.

An Hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): He used the word "considering" . . . Considering the state of the dollar, interest rates, the unemployment situation, and considering the lack of confidence in the present Government, could the Prime Minister at least clarify for the Canadian public what his Government's monetary policy is with respect to interest rates and stabilizing our Canadian dollar? Furthermore, could he clarify his fiscal policy once and for all, and if he cannot, could he, with his Minister of Finance, bring down a Budget right away?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to discuss the policies of the Government at greater length with the Leader of the Opposition, if he so wishes.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Do you want me to write your Budget?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I think it has been made quite clear what our monetary policy is. I set it out very clearly in answer to the questions last week and the week before. I set out, during the economic statement of November 8, one of the clearest definitions of economic policy on the fiscal side, removing some of the regulatory problems that this country has faced, identifying very clearly the areas of incentive to which we are going to direct any government resources, all with a view to increasing employment.

I do not believe there is any need to rush on a Budget. When we put down the Budget we are going to get it right, and we will get it right because we have had full consultation with a wide range of people across the country, including the Premiers, the people who will be represented at the national economic conference, and many others who feel they have a very important contribution to make. When that is done, and I would hope it will be done very soon, then we will have that Budget, and I am sure the Hon. Member will be very pleased with it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORTH WARNING SYSTEM

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Next week the Prime Minister will be meeting with President Reagan. Already he has stated that he will change Canadian policies. Now the Government of Canada, will be doing something contrary to the wishes of the previous Parliament, and of the previous Government, that would support the star wars program. Is it true that next week the Prime Minister will sign a new agreement on the North Warning System that could change forever the balance of relations in defence between Canada and the United States?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to use the word irresponsible, but I know my hon. friend sat through a hearing of a parliamentary committee, a hearing that I volunteered, in which the questions were put forward and the facts were put forward on the North Warning System. There is absolutely no relation between the North Warning System and the Strategic Defence Initiative. The Hon. Member knows that, and he should act on that knowledge and not abuse his position as a Member of this House.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE HEARING

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I can see the Right Hon. Minister is very touchy about it, because I wrote to him about two weeks ago. He did not even dare to reply. I wrote to the new Minister of National Defence asking for a committee hearing to permit some concerned Canadians to come to Parliament to express their views on this matter. What does the Minister have to hide in refusing to allow Canadians to express their fear that we will be trapped in a situation from which we would never be able to get out, as happened in previous administrations?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what happened in previous administrations—

Mr. Chrétien: Diefenbaker and the Bomarc.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —particularly when the Hon. Member who just spoke was the Secretary of State for External Affairs and a member of the Liberal government, was that the negotiations were continuing on the North Warning System. But the Parliament of Canada was never given the opportunity to hear what was being discussed. The Parliament of Canada was treated by the Liberals as if it had no right to know what was going on in national defence policy.

● (1425)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We had the sense of responsibility to put the facts on the table. I would ask the Hon. Member to have the sense of responsibility to stop abusing his position as a Member of this House.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

EMERGENCY SHELTERS FOR WOMEN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He will recall that in 1982 some Hon. Members in the House laughed when it was pointed out that one in ten men in Canada beat their wives. Since violence continues to increase among the young and the old, as well as among battered wives, and since women need services and shelters which will provide them with advice and protection, will the Minister tell the House how many emergency shelters for battered women are operating in Canada today, and how many of these are cost-shared under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the matter which the Hon. Member raises is an important one, a serious one, and one about which I think all Members of the House and society should be concerned and see if we can reverse the trend. The question which she put to me in terms of the numbers is, frankly, more easily answered through the Order Paper. However, I can tell her that there are about 190 homes, and I believe 63 of them—those are the latest figures which I have—are cost shared along the lines of the question she asked.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SHELTERS' ADMISSION PROCEDURES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I don't think that number of shelters is really worthy of applause. We must do much more, and I know the Minister agrees. When a woman with children who is battered, upset, and desperate, has to go to a transition house for shelter, she is forced to fill out a complicated means test, if the shelter is funded under the Canada Assistance Plan. Will the Minister negotiate with his provincial counterparts to improve this situation so as to remove this kind of needs test mechanism, so that there will be no impediment for women who are very vulnerable and are seeking protection from violence, along with their children?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the manner in which the Hon. Member puts the question, she will recognize, as I believe she did, that any changes to Canada Assistance Plan agreements have to be negotiated with the provinces. I have mentioned to the provinces that I would like to meet with them in regard to the Canada Assistance Plan and other social issues, and that is to take place at the end of April. That will be our second meeting, the first one being a very brief one.

Additionally, we have said to the provinces that we are willing to look at the issue. It is not so much a money issue when a woman presents herself at one of these homes, no matter what her financial background might be, as it is an issue of violence and injury. It is not an immediate cost factor which she has to face as she presents herself to the home. As recently as today, four Deputy Ministers representing four provinces are discussing this issue with my officials.

REQUEST FOR INCREASED FUNDING

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it may not be a money issue in some sense, but it certainly is for the transition houses which, as the Minister knows, are grossly underfunded. Will the Minister live up to the Conservative election promises and the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs in its report, and provide increased federal funding, funding which is very much needed for services and shelters, so that desperate families who have suffered from battering will obtain help?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member recognizes that this matter has been looked at. As I said, the trend is a worrisome one. It concerns me deeply, as I know it does her. We have had the Badgley report on that. There are some questions from some quarters as to the veracity of the figures, but apart from that it is a major issue. When she says that the Government identified this as an election issue and as an election promise, we did. I say to her it is for that very reason, and our concern, that these negotiations and discussions are taking place.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. He will know that on February 14 the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence held one meeting to discuss the new Early Warning System across the northern part of Canada and down the sea coasts, which was attended by the former Acting Minister of National Defence. At that time we were treated to an overview of the system, but there are many unanswered questions and there are other issues related thereto that should be clarified before the new agreement is signed. Will the Minister respond positively to the request for additional meetings on this subject that will affect all Canadians for the next 20 years and beyond, and will he consent to attend meetings of the Standing Committee of this House before that new agreement goes into effect?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Hon. Member most of all would not want me, or any other Minister of the Crown, to dictate to committees what their order of business will be. I am informed that the steering committee of the Standing Committee will be meeting at 3.30 today. Undoubtedly that is a subject matter which will be raised. However, I would call to his attention, if he will study the record of the last committee report, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs offered to stay for as long as members of that committee had questions to ask. The fact is that Members over there ran out of questions, and the committee meeting was terminated. The opportunity was certainly there for a full questioning of the Minister at that time.

ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT COMMITTEE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, again we hit the stonewalling tactics. The Minister knows full well that the chairman called off the meeting. Why is the Minister welching on his Party's promise of open Government by refusing to attend any meetings of the External Affairs and National Defence Committee—the other was attended by the other Minister—and bring his officials with him before the renewed NORAD agreement is signed? What is he hiding? In 1980 when this agreement was up for renewal, his own Parliamentary Secretary was the biggest critic.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I really do not know what the Hon. Member is talking about. I have received no request from the chairman or any other member of the Standing Committee to appear before it. I have a letter from the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, I think, which will be responded to. I reiterate that my most recent information is that the steering committee is meeting this afternoon at 3.30. If they, in their good judgment, wish to invite me before the committee, I would certainly be very pleased to receive and consider that request.

HOUSING FOR BATTERED WOMEN IN RURAL AREAS

Mr. John Parry (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs issued a report Violence in the Family in May, 1982. What action has the Minister taken to implement recommendation No. 9 dealing with the housing of battered women who live in rural and remote areas and who do not wish to move to urban centres to have access to the transition homes and the services that they can provide?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member is aware of the answers that I gave to the questions of his colleague. I say to him that this matter of how much government funding can go into what is recognized by all of us as a very difficult social problem, is not a matter of simply finding more money. It is also a matter of what kind of education in terms of society can be provided. For instance, and I see his colleague questioning that, the NDP Government of Manitoba launched just that kind of an approach. I say that for all of us it is an issue which has to be dealt with reasonably and rationally. It is not a matter of more homes being provided or whether there is an unlimited source of money. That is obviously not the manner in which we can go.

NATIONAL TELEPHONE SERVICE

Mr. John Parry (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Minister that dealing with things reasonably and rationally also includes dealing with them fairly.

[Translation]

Is the Minister prepared to help women, as recommended by the federal-provincial-territorial task force, by providing a free national telephone service to assist and inform victims of family violence?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the Hon. Member, as I said to his colleague, that these issues have to be dealt with between the provinces and the federal Government. I have indicated to him that we are willing to look at it. The CAP agreement in part covers that. That is the approach that has been used between the partners in the federation. I intend to continue that approach.

TRANSPORT

MANUFACTURE OF RAILWAY FREIGHT CARS

Mr. Michel Gravel (Gamelin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Transport and concerns the manufacture of railway freight cars. The previous Government's lack of clear-cut policy led to the disappearance of thousands of jobs, not only in that industry but also in subcontracting companies making car parts. I would like the Minister to tell the House about programs and policies he intends to implement to revitalize the industry and ensure steady and regular production in the coming years.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the Hon. Member for Gamelin that last year, apparently to offset job losses, the Government advanced the purchasing process in that sector so that we do not have the necessary funds to place new orders in 1985. However, such purchases are now made directly by the companies and, naturally, we hope they will follow Government policies, namely, contrary to what we have seen for a long time, spend the money we do have for very specific requirements.

THE CONSTITUTION

MINORITY LANGUAGE RIGHTS IN QUEBEC

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Next Friday, the Prime Minister will be meeting Mr. Lévesque, the Premier of Quebec, but he has yet to announce the agenda for their talks. Could the Prime Minister inform the House today what that agenda will be and whether he intends to discuss, first of all, the entrenchment of minority language rights in the Constitution and second, negotiating a supplementary agreement for native people in Quebec, pursuant to the ERDA agreement that was signed recently?

Mr. Speaker, I asked those questions on December 12 and February 1, but at the time, the Prime Minister was not prepared to give an answer. Is he prepared to answer those questions today?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Premier of Quebec has already indicated that he would like to discuss the possibility of a constitutional review, but not until after Easter. I therefore do not expect any talks on constitutional matters this Friday. In fact, I shall be in Quebec City for the Conference on Minorities organized by the newspaper Le Devoir, and I shall be taking advantage of this opportunity to meet with the Premier of Quebec for some talks on other subjects.

[English]

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, these meetings between the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister of Quebec are on very important issues affecting the future of the people in Quebec. They have a right to know the exact agenda of that meeting. In any case, will he assure this House that in his discussions with the Prime Minister of Quebec under no circumstances will he make a trade-off between the entrenchment of minority language rights with the signing of the Constitutional Accord by Quebec? We support the signing of that Accord by Quebec, but not at any cost. Will he give us that assurance that he will not make such a trade-off?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can see why the applause is so tepid. In Montreal and elsewhere, I know they are interested, and that is why I gave my hon. friend a clear-cut response to a question in this regard which was on all fours with the question he asked some three weeks ago. In point of fact, the Government, across the country and in the Province of Quebec, campaigned as a strongly federalist Party committed to the integrity of the nation and the protection of minority rights. That is why we were elected.

EXTERNAL AID

FUNDING OF MATCH INTERNATIONAL

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for External Relations. As the Minister knows, we are rapidly approaching the end of the U.N. Decade of Women, and MATCH International, Canada's only organization devoted solely to assisting women in developing countries, is still struggling to survive. We are now almost at the end of the decade and MATCH International is barely alive. Can the Minister recommend additional funding to CIDA to enable it not only to increase the over-all funding to MATCH International but also to increase its core funding from 66 per cent to 75 per cent?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister responsible for CIDA, I have already mentioned certain policies and issues with which I am particularly concerned. Considering my previous undertakings and my position as a woman, I intend to watch very carefully any issues that concern the daily lives of women, and I shall be looking very carefully at the particular organization mentioned by the Hon. Member.

[English]

ASSISTANCE TO WOMEN IN DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the Minister that MATCH International is the only organization devoted solely to assisting women in developing countries, and that it is often used by CIDA itself for its expertise? Therefore, it needs help. In that connection, and in connection with her general comments on assisting women in developing countries, will the Minister assure the House that increased funds will be made available to CIDA to enable it to carry out the very detailed plans of action it has made for addressing the basic needs of women in developing countries, so that by the end of the decade Canada can report progress in this matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I know that 52 per cent of the population consists of women, and I have confidence in the intelligence of these women. I will find out what they can do, and as the Minister responsible for CIDA, I will encourage them to develop their talents.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT

PROTECTION OF EMPLOYEES AND TRADESPERSONS

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Parliament passed the Bankruptcy Act in 1949. Since then, because of increasing problems with the legislation, there have been a total of six unsuccessful attempts to change its provisions. Can the Minister assure the House that steps will be taken at the earliest possible opportunity to introduce comprehensive amendments to the Bankruptcy Act that will protect employees as well as the suppliers and tradespersons who all too often are the real victims in bankruptcy cases?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Hon. Member for his question and advise him that in fact we are looking into the feasibility of introducing amendments to the Bankruptcy Act. We hope this can be done as soon as possible.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GOVERNMENT AID TO DOMTAR—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is again directed to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister. Since it is now perfectly clear that Domtar cannot accept a basement-bargain agreement between the Prime Minister and Mr. Lévesque, and since we know now that Ottawa alone is jeopardizing that project vital to the Eastern Townships, I am asking whether the Prime Minister sees eye to eye with his Quebec caucus colleagues who promised last Saturday that, within two weeks, they would do their utmost to make sure that Domtar will get a positive response regardless of the circumstances.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that my friend would commend the outstanding job done by our remarkable Quebec colleagues. They have done an extraordinary job and I am grateful for that.

My colleague is aware that discussions will take place this Friday. I have already indicated our intention to be as co-operative as possible, but our hands are tied for very obvious reasons—we are shouldering a $35 billion deficit. As the Hon. Member appreciates, we cannot hand out that kind of money, but we hope to be in a position to be of some help and co-operate with the Quebec government and the company to finalize the project.

DOMTAR—INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER WILL MEET COMMON FRONT REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the more the Prime Minister responds to questions . . . To some extent, I agree with some of his Cabinet colleagues who say that the policy changes every time he gives an answer, and they are right to be concerned. The Prime Minister, who claims to be in favour of consultation, dialogue and what not, knows that the people united in a common front against his decision want to meet with him as soon as possible. I know that others have sent him an invitation. Will the Prime Minister meet with—

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Lapierre: Here is my question: Will the Prime Minister meet with the members of the common front who are anxious to convey to him the representations of Domtar employees?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the Member for Sherbrooke and others have told me about that request. I followed with interest—

An Hon. Member: Yes or no?

Mr. Mulroney: There is the Quebec lieutenant from Newfoundland talking again.

Indeed, the matter has been brought to my attention and I will be pleased to meet with eastern Townships representatives at any time.

POSSIBILITIES OF GOVERNMENT ASSISTING DOMTAR

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the Domtar case. Today, Domtar's management made it clear that their modernization project will not go ahead without a federal subsidy. In view of the disastrous effect of such a decision on the future of the Eastern Townships and Domtar employees, and considering the fact that the Prime Minister does not want to give Domtar a blank cheque, has he seriously considered the option of providing financial aid in exchange for shares in Domtar?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): What shares, Mr. Speaker? The majority or the largest block of shares is already held by the Government of Quebec through several of its agencies. I do not know what our talks will be like this Friday, but we are prepared to examine any reasonable plan to try and help this project. I think we should bear in mind, and we have read this in the press, that Domtar is a very good company and that it made a profit of $90 million last year and $45 million the year before. I am told it expects to make a profit of over $100 million in the years to come. This is a sound company.

That is why I think perhaps it should examine its borrowing capacity and perhaps other formulas in the private sector that could help a company as powerful and as sound as this one to—

Mr. Speaker: Order please, with respect.

CORPORATIONS—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIZATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I think shares in exchange for financial aid is a very reasonable suggestion.

My supplementary is also directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Could the Prime Minister confirm to the House that his Government will approve federal subsidies for corporations where less than 50 per cent of the shares are owned by a Government, a decision that would not constitute an attack on the Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec as was the case when the Bay Street Liberals used Bill S-31 to do that very thing?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since we, that is, the New Democratic Party and ourselves, fought with great determination against the Liberal Government when it tried to break the Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec, and we stood up together to defend the Caisse, I can give the Hon. Member the assurance that we shall continue this vigorous defence of the Caisse and other Quebec institutions.

FINANCIAL SITUATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. A couple of weeks ago the Canadian Federation of Agriculture passed a unanimous resolution calling on the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Finance, to treat the present financial situation in agriculture as a serious crisis in Canada, and demanding extraordinary attention and action. Last week the Government responded by cutting the estimates of the Farm Credit Corporation by 80 per cent. Could the Minister comment on that? Does this mean that the Government is not prepared to take extraordinary action to help farmers who are facing foreclosures this year?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I have difficulty understanding the position taken by the Hon. Member because, indeed, we have taken a number of measures to this point in time. They are far too numerous for me to mention on this occasion, other than to say that they total about 42 in number. We continue to look at options and other alternatives which we may apply in this crisis. I hope to be in a position this Friday to mention another move on behalf of the Government to deal with the very, very serious problem of farm financing.

FARM DEBT—REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the United States Congress is debating appropriation Bills right now amounting to over $1 billion to set aside or reschedule farm debt in that country. The Farm Credit Corporation has put proposals before the agriculture committee—more modest, of course, and appropriate to Canada—to deal with the farm debt crisis. Is the Minister prepared to bring forward legislation to reschedule some of this debt or to set it aside, as the American Government is doing for its farmers?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member cites the American situation, measures which are in place in the United States. The latest information I have is that, indeed, some 8,000 farmers participated in that program. I draw the Hon. Member's attention to a measure which we announced on January 15 which brought down interest rates in this country from 16.75 per cent to 12.75 per cent, a reduction of 4 per cent, which will cost the Canadian taxpayers some $16 million a year for five years, making a total commitment of $80 million. Indeed, it assisted not 8,000 farmers but some 5,600. However, if we use the normal scale of one to ten, it is obvious that the measure we brought forth on January 15 is far more beneficial to Canadian farmers than what has been done by our counterparts in the United States.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES MEETING—ACID RAIN ISSUE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He will recall that yesterday he indicated to me, when I asked him about the upcoming Shamrock Summit, that an announcement would be forthcoming today with respect to Canadian auto emission standards. Given that the Minister of the Environment will be holding a press conference later this afternoon, and presuming that she will be making an announcement in that regard, could the Prime Minister tell us what he now intends to ask of President Reagan with respect to American action on acid rain?

An Hon. Member: Nothing.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister will be having a press conference and will be sending out what I believe will be the most comprehensive and helpful program ever initiated by the Government of Canada to rid this country of the savagery of acid rain to our environment, and I think that is good news for Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: We have heard the acerbic criticisms of a very ineffective previous Minister who has distinguished himself by his lack of recognition in the field, and finally we have a Minister—

Mr. Foster: Where is your Minister hiding?

Mr. Mulroney: —a woman in this House who is not afraid to stand up, who has the courage to stand up and initiate a program of vast reform which is designed to rid this country of acid rain.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, given the preview, I can hardly wait for the announcement.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

DISCUSSION INQUIRY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, if the announcement is as good as the Prime Minister says it is going to be, could the Prime Minister answer the question and tell us what he is going to ask of President Reagan next week with respect to American action on acid rain? And could he tell us whether or not he will be asking President Reagan to give up the false perception that more research is needed before action should be taken on acid rain? Action should be taken now on both sides of the border.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I were going to talk to a world leader, the last person I would tip off would be a member of the New Democratic Party.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Another Blaikie blunder.

Mr. Deans: How about a Member of Parliament?

OLYMPICS

1988 WINTER OLYMPICS—CONDITION OF SKI RUN

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. International Olympic officials voiced their concerns in Calgary this past week about the condition of the Mount Allan ski run for the men's downhill event, and the lengthy hockey tournament scheduling which, if not corrected, could mean the pull out of six top European teams. Would the Minister tell the House whether these problems will jeopardize the success of the upcoming Calgary Olympics?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, it is true that some concerns were raised during the IOC meetings in Calgary last week in the area to which the Hon. Member refers. However, subsequent meetings with the IOC, and with the officials responsible for the sites, confirmed that these problems can be rectified, to the extent that the President of the International Olympic Committee, His Excellency Juan Antonio Samaranch, said—and I agree with him wholeheartedly—that the 1988 Winter Olympics in Calgary are indeed going to be the best staged event of this kind ever in the history of Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRIME MINISTER'S MEETING WITH UNITED STATES ARMS CONTROL AMBASSADOR

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I understand that Ambassador Paul Nitze of the United States is meeting with the Prime Minister later this afternoon. I wonder if both Governments have already determined the conclusion of the conversation, because the United States embassy has already issued a news release of Ambassador Nitze, and I quote:

My conversation with the Prime Minister was extremely useful.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra):

We discussed next week's nuclear and space arms negotiations and the U.S. approach to them. In those negotiations, the United States will proceed in a serious and constructive manner, but we all realize that they will be complex and perhaps lengthy.

Could we have the companion piece issued by the Prime Minister's Office of the conversation which will take place later this afternoon, so that we can see whether they match and are well orchestrated in advance?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I am sorry that the right hon. gentleman has not received mine; I put it out yesterday.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: I have no knowledge of what a functionary at some foreign embassy might, or might not, put out. I am surprised that my right hon. friend reads very much into it.

All I know is I was asked by the ambassador, who is in charge of arms control negotiations with the United States, for a meeting this afternoon, with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am honoured to meet with him, given the complexity and importance of the issue of the Geneva talks on March 12. I know that the Liberals seem to treat this very frivolously but, for us, arms control and nuclear arms reduction are the most important matter on our agenda.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRESS RELEASES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I urge the Prime Minister to read that release, as well as the release which I assume is issued from his own office, so he will know what script to follow in the conversation this afternoon?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is widely acknowledged, in a non-partisan spirit in this House, that if anyone is following a script and cue cards, it is the Right Hon. Member.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FOOD AND DRUGS

DRUG PRICES—REPRESENTATION MADE BY CONSUMERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He will know that today the Consumers' Association of Canada sent an open letter to the Prime Minister in which it condemned, as insensitive to the consumer interest, the arrangements made by the Minister for meetings between the competing drug companies to discuss changing the drug patent laws. Now that the Canadian Association of Consumers has spoken so clearly against the Government's procedure, will the Minister agree to its request to stop the closed door negotiations, publish the report of the Eastman Commission, and involve the public and consumers groups in any further discussions regarding changes in the patent laws?

• (1500)

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure my colleague by telling him that I did receive the Eastman report last week, a very complex 500-page document. It goes without saying that department officials will need some time to undertake those studies. I can also assure my colleague that no decision will be made concerning this major problem without prior consultation with Canadian consumers.

[English]

REQUEST THAT DISCUSSIONS BE STOPPED

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister put a stop to the discussions going on between the two groups, because any agreement would mean watering down the present protection the patent laws give consumers?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the discussions have been initiated with a view to solving that problem and, until further notice, we are prepared to listen. Again I can assure my colleague that we intend to consult with Canadian consumers and protect their interests.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, given that tomorrow the House will not be sitting in its normal fashion, is the Government House Leader in a position to tell the House what the business will be for Friday and perhaps on into next week?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I had a brief discussion with both the House Leader of the Official Opposition and of the NDP in which I informally advised them that, as the Hon. Member points out, tomorrow we will be having a joint session with our colleagues from the other place. Members are advised to be in their places by 2.50 p.m. in order to receive the Secretary General of the United Nations at 3 p.m. We will not have Question Period and we will not commence proceedings because of the physical arrangements necessary for this joint address tomorrow. The only business will be the address to a joint session of Parliament.

With respect to business today, the House knows we will be dealing with Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act. The second reading stage will be brought forward by my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser), today. If we are able to make progress and accomplish second reading of that Bill, I would of course call Bill C-24, an Act relating to the COSP and CHIP Programs. On Friday, depending on the progress made today, I would call Bill C-32 relating to the Fisheries Act. Hopefully we will be in a position to have second reading of that Bill some time on Friday. Following that, it is my intention to call Bill C-30, the Bretton Woods Bill. As a back-up we will have Bill C-24 again if we have not already disposed of it.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that I will wait until Friday in order to assess the situation before announcing business for next week. As my colleague knows, the House Leaders will be having a meeting after Routine Proceedings in which we will have a chance to canvass other possibilities.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, given it is sometimes quite difficult to inform Members over the weekend what the business will be on Monday, might we get a hint as to what we might possibly be doing on Monday? I am not worried about Tuesday or Wednesday, but perhaps we might get just a little hint about Monday.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Just a tiny little hint. I think we will be doing the same thing we will be doing on Friday, just carrying on.

Mr. Skelly: A point of order, Mr. Speaker, I understood this was House business. Is there an opportunity for a question?

Mr. Speaker: I had received notice of an intention to ask a House business question from one of the House Leaders.

Mr. Skelly: I understood that the usual Thursday question had been moved forward.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) has a House business question.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister is going to be meeting with President Reagan very soon in Quebec City and there are some very important issues to be considered, I wonder if the Prime Minister has any intention of giving the House some form of statement on how that meeting—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That may be an appropriate question for Question Period but it is not a House business question at this point.

Mr. Skelly: It sounded like one to me.

Mr. Speaker: At this point.

ACID RAIN

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, residents of my riding are aware of the hazards of acid rain, and they want a bilateral agreement negotiated with the American Government and enforcement of regulations concerning acid rain.

PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICE

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of railway employees, especially those of the CN, who are concerned about the issue of passenger train repairs and maintenance.

Wherefore the petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to consider that what belongs to railway companies ought to remain with those companies.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ABORTION PROCEDURES

Mr. John Gormley (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-226, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (abortion).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gormley: Mr. Speaker, every year over 65,000 abortions are performed in Canadian hospitals. An overwhelming number of these abortions are permitted because of "endangerment to health". The present law has therefore become a loophole for what amounts to abortion on demand, which has resulted in the death of thousands of unborn children. The purpose of this Bill is to amend the Criminal Code to restrict the use of abortion procedures to those instances where the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life of the female person, exclusive of social or economic conditions affecting the female person or her family unit.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

COPYRIGHT ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING AUDIO AND VIDEO RECORDINGS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-227, an Act to amend the Copyright Act (private recordings).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure in moving first reading of an Act to amend the Copyright Act. This Bill will allow an audio or video recording of a work where such recording is made by an individual from a public broadcast for his or her own private use. The recording is not to be used in a commercial way nor sold, exchanged, bartered or given as a gift.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 80, 201 and 256.

[Text]

RAIL TRAFFIC IN CITY OF TORONTO

Question No. 80—Mr. Young:

1. In (a) 1980 (b) 1981 (c) 1982 (d) 1983, did Canadian National Railways receive any complaints about excessive noise from rail traffic on its line between Jones Avenue and Victoria Park Avenue in the City of Toronto and, if so, in each case, what total number of complaints were received and how many were made (i) in writing (ii) by telephone?

2. Does the railway impose a speed limit on rail traffic within the City of Toronto and, if so, what is the limit for (a) passenger trains (b) freight trains and was it increased in the period January 1, 1980 to December 31, 1983?

3. In each 24-hour period, what is the frequency of of Canadian National passenger and freight service using the line in the period (a) midnight Sunday to midnight Friday (b) midnight Friday to midnight Sunday?

4. Does the railway lease or otherwise permit the use of its rail bed on the line to other users and, if so (a) what are their names (b) in each 24 period, what is the frequency of such use in the period (i) midnight Sunday to midnight Friday (ii) midnight Friday to midnight Sunday?

5. Will the railway upgrade its rail bed and tracks on the line and, if so (a) when is the work scheduled to begin (b) what is its scheduled date of completion (c) is consideration being given to restricting traffic in the period between 12 midnight and 6.30 a.m., until this upgrading has been completed?

6. Will the railway erect fences parallel to its rail lines which run through residential communities to restrict access by children and others to those lines and, if so (a) when is this work scheduled to begin on the line mentioned in part I (b) on what date is this work scheduled to be completed?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

The area in question is from about mileage 327.9 (Victoria Park Avenue) to about mileage 330.7 (Jones Avenue) on our Kingston Subdivision, and all answers refer to this trackage.

1. No.

2. Yes. (a) 145 km/h (90 m.p.h.); (b) 97 km/h (60 m.p.h.)—except freight trains carrying special dangerous commodities, when the speed is 55 km/h (35 m.p.h.) as set by the Railway Transport Committee Board Order. The speed limits were not increased during the years 1980-1983.

3. CN does not operate passenger trains along the line in question. Daily freight train service is as follows: (a) Monday—Friday, (b) Weekends (Saturday and Sunday), 6.

4. Yes. (a) GO Transit and VIA Rail Canada Inc.; (b)(i) Monday—Friday 78, (ii) weekends (Saturday and Sunday) 54.

5. (a) and (b) Normal railway maintenance work on this particular section of trackage was completed in early May, 1984; (c) This work did not unduly affect normal train traffic.

6. CN erects and maintains fencing parallel to the track to restrict access in accordance with the requirements of the Railway Act. Any necessary repairs required to restore fencing in this area were carried out in 1984.

RECEPTION FOR DIPLOMATIC CORPS

Question No. 201—Mr. Malépart:

Did the Prime Minister host a reception in the honour of the diplomatic corps on December 13, 1984 and, if so (a) what was the cost of (i) the reception (ii) the decorations (iii) the Christmas trees installed for the occasion (b) what was the menu (c) what are the names of the people hired on contract for the reception?

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): The Prime Minister hosted a reception in the honour of the diplomatic corps on December 13, 1984.

(a) The cost was:

(i)	for the reception:	$1,957.65
(ii)	for the decorations:	$3,909.86
(iii)	for the Christmas trees:	$ 496.25

(b) The menu was:

Terrine de légumes
Cresson Chantilly
Fumet de canard Seigneurie
Suprême de dindonneau
Choux de Bruxelles au beurre
Carottes glacées au miel
Pommes de terre mousseline
Bûche de Noël
Coulis aux framboises
Petits fours

(c) No contract was issued.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFICIARIES OVER AGE 45

Question No. 256—Mr. Dingwall:

How many (a) women (b) men over the age of 45 are presently receiving unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The most recent information available is the preliminary figure for the month of November, 1984.

During the month of November, 1984; (a) 91,920 women age 45 and over, and (b) 146,340 men age 45 and over, were in receipt of Unemployment Insurance benefits.

[English]

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all notices of motions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans) moved that Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House to hear me out for a few minutes with respect to Bill C-32, which is designed to amend the present Fisheries Act of Canada. This piece of legislation is specific. It is not, nor does it attempt to be, a review of the entire Fisheries Act. It is designed to meet certain difficulties which now face us in the administration of fisheries in Canada as a consequence of two court cases which were heard in the Federal Court of Canada in British Columbia last summer. Unless we make amendments to the Fisheries Act, the effect of those cases will be to make it almost impossible to manage the fisheries of Canada, except on one narrow approach, and that is conservation of the stock and nothing more or less than that. The amendments set out in this Bill are needed for the day-to-day management of our fisheries on both coasts. As it happens, these amendments are particularly urgently needed now for the proper management of the Pacific roe herring fishery. I will explain later or why this is so.

Before getting into the details of the Bill, Mr. Speaker, I would like to provide Hon. Members with some back-ground which will be usefully kept in mind when I turn to the specifics of this Bill. In the Pacific fisheries we face a major challenge. Problems have developed there over a long period of time. Salmon is the backbone of the Pacific fishery, yet some salmon stocks are depleted and weakened from over-fishing and other causes. The numbers of two of the five species of Pacific salmon, the Chinook, more commonly called Spring salmon, and the Cohoe, are dangerously low. Herring stocks too are depressed in some areas. There is a serious problem of over-capacity in the Pacific fishing fleet because the fleet is too big and too powerful. It was built and equipped to catch more salmon than the coastal rivers can presently provide. Investing in this excess fishing capacity has left fishermen with a heavy burden of debt. With, as it has been put, too many fishermen chasing too few fish, different groups of fishermen are competing for the same resource. Of necessity, government must arbitrate between these groups.

The competing claims include the demands of Indian fishermen. They must be reconciled with the larger needs of the fishery. Fishing has always been a major source of food and employment for native people and it has a special place in their culture. We must ensure that our native people will continue to enjoy their traditional access to the fishery in years to come. The competing claims include the demands of sports fishermen who are economically a very significant factor on the West Coast. Their claims must be weighed against the claims of commercial and native fishermen who depend on the fishery for their livelihood. When I refer to native fishermen, I am referring not only to our native Canadians who take salmon as food fish, but also to the very large number of our native citizens who are in the commercial fishery.

Within the commercial fishery itself there is competition for a scarce resource. We must reconcile the interests of fishermen using different types of gear. Moreover, this reconciliation of complex, competing interests must take place within the context of the crucial need to safeguard and enhance the resource itself. Mr. Speaker, as you will see, the amendments to Bill C-32 are needed to confirm and to clarify our authority under the Fisheries Act to make decisions reconciling all these competing interests.

Although I have so far spoken mainly of the Pacific fisheries, Hon. Members will find that the amendments in this Bill are no less necessary for proper management of the Atlantic fishery. The process of reconciliation of competing interests now in place to distribute the resource between inshore and offshore fishermen, and among fleet sectors operating in different areas, must be maintained. Clarification of the scope of the Act will confirm our current ability to manage fisheries, not only to protect and to conserve the resource, but also in the interest of fishermen, plant workers, and communities that rely on the resource for their livelihood. There is clear relationship, Mr. Speaker, between sound fisheries management and the social and economic health of the entire Atlantic region.

I and my Government have already taken steps to alleviate some of the problems which I have mentioned today. We have curtailed fishing of some stocks to levels that will help those stocks to rebuild. On the West Coast we have negotiated a salmon treaty with the Americans. This treaty plugs loopholes in Pacific salmon management that have cost both the United States and Canada great losses over the years. There will be a period of some difficult, short-term adjustments, but the benefits from this agreement will be truly long term. Right now we are in the process of developing options to address the other problems I have mentioned, such as the excess capacity in the Pacific fleet.

I am convinced that the resolution of such specific problems, and of the enduring problem of reconciling disparate interests, must be a co-operative enterprise. It has to be. These are not problems that can be solved by government decree. No one group can hope to realize its objectives to the exclusion of all others or in isolation from others. The problems we have in our fisheries, and there are many, have largely arisen, I believe, through an inability to agree. I do not blame anyone in particular for that although it has been more of a problem in some places than in others. That problem is being successfully addressed by all of the participants in the fishery.

The House is being asked to consider amendments of two types. The amendments in Clauses 1 and 2 clarify and confirm the scope of the Fisheries Act within the jurisdiction of Parliament. They are made in the interest of clearer expression and adequate definition. It is fair to say that they will, by and large, ensure that the Fisheries Act says what many people thought it said until doubt was cast by two recent court decisions which I referred to a few minutes ago and which are both under appeal. Clause 3 contains the second type of amendment. It will permit departmental managers to make spot openings and closings. Although spot openings and closings are necessary for good fisheries management, under the Act as it now stands they require recourse to a cumbersome regulatory process. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, under the present regulatory process they are not convenient, almost impossible to implement quickly, and will not meet our present needs which are a consequence of the Canada-U.S. salmon treaty on the West Coast.

The Fisheries Act is a venerable document. It was passed in 1867. Amendments were made in the 1970s to permit protection and management of fish habitat. Apart from that, little changed in the Act for 117 years. Not surprisingly, as time has gone by, parts of the Act have become almost obsolete. New needs, new issues and new implications for management have arisen that could not have been foreseen in 1867, or even 1967. For instance, the establishment of the 200-mile economic zone in 1977 has given whole new dimensions to fisheries management.

One result is that definitions supplied in the Act do not always adequately reflect the realities of modern fishing management. Recently this situation has prompted two challenges in the trial division of the Federal Court of Canada. Both challenges succeeded and both are now under appeal.

● (1520)

The Fisheries Act itself does not clearly provide the federal Government with the powers for full fisheries management. Bill C-32 will confirm the ability of the federal Government to fulfil such a full range of modern day responsibilities.

Let us look at the specifics. Clause 1 provides new definitions for the terms "fish" and "fishery". More comprehensive definitions are required. For example, the definition of fish will be broadened to include marine plants and portions of fish. The inclusion of marine plants in the definition will allow the variance, for sound management reasons, of close times and quotas set for their harvesting during the given seasons.

The inclusion of "portions of fish" within the definition of fish is necessary, for example, to manage fish processing activities at sea.

The current definition of "fishery" includes the gear used in fishing and the area where fishing takes place. But management of a fishery or fisheries has, in practice, long included the managing and regulating of matters other than type of gear used and the fishing areas—matters such as the inspection of fish, the activities of catching, the people who are licensed to fish as well as the places and times involved. Indeed, if we lack the ability to manage these matters, Canadian fisheries would be thrown into confusion. The amendments confirm our role in these areas.

The next amendments are in Clause 2 of the Bill. As it stands, the Act does not clearly assign to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans the power to manage the fisheries for reasons other than the conservation and protection of the resource. Fisheries management involves not just resource goals but also social and economic goals. Clause 2, which will create a new purpose section in the Act, makes clear, when read in conjunction with the revised definition of fisheries, the intent of the Act. It is to provide for management of the fishery in all its dimensions.

Let me proceed to the amendments in Clause 3 of the Bill. These are changes needed to refine and lend precision to our management measures. The essence of good fisheries management is control. If you want to avoid over-fishing you must be able to do this quickly. If you are too slow, weak stocks can be wiped out. Among the five salmon species on the West Coast, there are about 4,000 different stocks in 2,000 river systems, which is illustrative of the complexity of the question.

Under the Act as now written, our fishery managers have authority to open and close large areas—windows, so to speak—to fishing. However, to selectively open and close smaller sub-areas that might be referred to as panes in the window, they must get an order in council. This is a slow process and one that does not lend itself to the on the spot management that is necessary in our fisheries.

At the moment, a fishery officer observing over-fishing of a species in a sub-area often only has one option short of letting the fishing continue, which is to close the whole window. In other words, it would be to close the whole area. Some of the areas are vast and the result may be to prevent fishing in other parts of the area where the stocks are not in danger, thereby reducing the opportunities for economic returns to fishermen.

The changes in the Act made by Clause 3 of the Bill will give managers the authority to open or close any portion of a management area or to vary the size and weight limit of fish that can be caught.

I promised that I would explain the urgency for revising the Act by passing this legislation. It concerns the herring roe fishery and the Canada-U.S. Pacific salmon treaty. We have every reason to expect that this treaty will be ratified by the Americans and that it will come into force this year. In fact, it will have almost completed the legislative process in the United States as of today or tomorrow.

Among other things, the treaty creates a coast-wide approach for salmon management. Under its terms, Canada and the United States have agreed to restrict catches selectively by species, by area and by gear. For Canada to honour this treaty, the management powers specified in the Bill are required.

The confirmation of management powers in the Bill will be welcomed in connection with the treaty. It will also be welcomed by fisheries managers in all the Canadian fisheries, including those managed by the provinces under delegation of Fisheries Act authority. It will be relevant to the management of the Pacific herring roe fishery. It is urgent because that valuable fishery will open within a number of days.

The herring roe fishery of British Columbia is one of the most intense and lucrative in Canada. In a matter of days—in a matter of hours in some years—tens of millions of dollars are earned. This year the fishery will take place against the backdrop of an unusual combination of circumstances.

Some of the herring stocks are depleted and as a result we have had to cancel the usual herring roe fishery off the west coast of Vancouver Island and reduce the fishery in Georgia Strait. At the same time, herring roe prices appear to be up over last year. In Japan, which is our major market, the prices are good. We expect fishermen's earnings to reach at least $30 million with the wholesale value for the product of about $60 million.

The prices are up and some of the stocks are down. This comes on the heels of several bad years for the salmon fishermen. As I have already mentioned, the salmon fishing fleet is over-capitalized, salmon prices have been low and many fishermen are in debt and some are bankrupt. Salmon fishermen who hold herring licences, which many do, will depend on the herring fishery more than ever this year.

In short, we have all the ingredients for a herring roe fishery of great intensity. Things move with breathtaking speed in this fishery. There have been years when the entire annual fishery we could allow in a given area was started and completed in a matter of 15 minutes.

Therefore, the power to decide on precise openings and to split the boats of different gear types as provided for in the fishing plan developed with user groups is absolutely crucial this year. Unless we clarify by enactment of this Bill that the Government has these powers, the whole management scheme for this year's fishery, which has been generally agreed to by the industry, might very well be disrupted by a further court challenge brought by a single dissatisfied fisherman. Should that happen, with the result that fishery managers could not divide the fleet between seiners and gillnetters, I might well be left with no option but to close the fishery, at least for periods of time. The concentration of fishing vessels in one spot could be so great that to open the fishery for even one dip of the nets would threaten to deplete the stocks. I would not like to have to take such drastic action. I urge the House to pass the Bill with due speed.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am aware that the rules do not permit questioning at this stage. However, the Minister has not used up his allotted time and, with the consent of the House, could he return to his remarks in order to make some comments? I know he is a lawyer and Queen's Counsel and perhaps he could comment with respect to the difficulties that were presented to the Department, to the legislation and to the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. If there is unanimous consent there could be questions for approximately 13 minutes. Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister. I am not trying to snooker him. I have before me the decision of Mr. Justice Collier in the Gulf Trollers Association against the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It is a decision from the bench dated August 2, 1984, from Vancouver, British Columbia. What is the Minister's understanding of how those decisions affect the constitutionality of his power to allocate? Would that be unconstitutional or does he expect there to be a court challenge on it? How does it fit into this particular legislation?

Mr. Fraser: My hon. friend is a counsel of some ability from the bar of British Columbia. The question he raises is serious and also, from the point of view of lawyers, fascinating. May I try to relate very quickly to the House a complex situation? There were two actions in the Federal Court last summer, one by the Fishing Vessel Owners' Association of British Columbia, and one by The Gulf Trollers Association.

• (1530)

Let me deal first with the Vessel Owners' decision because the facts are important. I will try to do this quickly to help my hon. friend. In the Vessel Owners' case what happened was that the Department, trying to be fair, wanted to put the small gillnetters into a fishing area for a day or two before putting in the big seiners to give the small boats with the less powerful gear a chance. The Vessel Owners', representing the seiners, challenged that in court. In the other case Mr. Justice Collier said that the Department cannot manage that way unless allocation were strictly for conservation purposes. Of course, it was not. It was allocation. Mr. Justice Collier said that the power to manage is not there under the Constitution, but he also left open to suggestion in both cases that the Fisheries Act as presently enacted does not give the power to manage except for conservation purposes.

You see the problem, Mr. Speaker, of a fisheries Minister trying to be fair who has been told that you cannot do that under law, not because the judge is saying that is right or wrong, but the judge is trying to read the law as he sees it. In one case, as a consequence, an injunction was granted.

In the case of the Gulf Trollers, the Department restricted the time during the summer that the gulf trollers would fish, which seriously cut the number of Chinook salmon they could take. At the same time the Department had failed to take any steps to be sure that the Chinook the trollers did not take got through the water, up the streams and on the spawning grounds. In fact, many of them were taken by sports fishermen.

The trollers went to court and said that this was not fair. Mr. Justice Collier agreed. Once again what the Department did was allocate, but not on the basis of conservation because if it had been just for conservation the Department would have had to restrict other users of the resource from taking the fish that the trollers did not get.

Again, what we have in the Vessel Owners' case is a situation where Mr. Justice Collier's decision was on the basis of an injunction. The decision is not as complete or as full as it would be had the case gone to trial with full discussion and full legal reasons for the decision. My hon. friend knows that because the onus is not as high in an injunction application.

There are two grounds for those decisions which give me great difficulty. One is that the present Act is not adequate, and that is what these amendments are designed to correct. There remains another area of great difficulty for me as the Fisheries Minister: even with these amendments, it does not stop somebody from challenging on the basis of the question of constitutionality that Mr. Justice Collier raised.

Those two decisions of Mr. Justice Collier are being appealed. I have to consider seriously whether I speed up that appeal process and take a reference to the Supreme Court, but I do not have to make that decision today. The effect of this legislation will at least get us partly out from under those two decisions as they currently operate. It gets us away from the possibility of citation for contempt if we try to allocate this summer, and there has been some suggestion by one judge that that threat lies over us.

I must say to my hon. friend, frankly, and he will understand the legal reasons for this, that I still have a problem on the constitutionality as long as Mr. Justice Collier's decisions hang there. For laymen and for those watching the debate the difference is this: if I do something I am not allowed to do under the Fisheries Act, it is called ultra vires, beyond the powers given to me under the Act. If I do something which I am not allowed to do constitutionally, it means it is something beyond the power of the Government under the Constitution of Canada. I have to say with the greatest respect that it is my view, with no disrespect to the court, that on appeal there will probably be a different result. Otherwise, it would mean then that we could not manage any area of activity, it seems to me, in this country, unless it was set out specifically in the Constitution.

My friend has raised a very important matter, Mr. Speaker. I have tried to address it as succinctly as I can.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) has a short question, I believe.

Mr. Baker: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In this particular case it is not lawyer to lawyer, between distinguished lawyers from British Columbia. I am a non-lawyer. I am not a lawyer from Newfoundland.

Mr. Fraser: A distinguished colleague.

Mr. Baker: Perhaps I might add that I do at times represent poor fishermen before the Federal Court of Canada. I have done it many times. I do so for fishermen who cannot afford a lawyer.

I wonder whether the Hon. Member from the NDP who asked the question was not trying to get the response from the Minister that he got. I was surprised as a non-lawyer to hear the Minister, who is a lawyer, on two occasions say that both of these cases were being appealed. The ground for the judge's decision, as the Minister stated, in this action by the federal Government was social and economic. It was not for conservation reasons. The Minister just stated a moment ago that the reasons for his action on the West Coast were not for conservation purposes. He then pointed out that the decisions were under appeal. The Minister has stated on two occasions, and I think the Minister knows what I am talking about, that the actions of the Department were not taken for conservation reasons. The justice correctly pointed that out in his judgment. He said:

> I do not accept the statement nor the inference in this affidavit—

That is the affidavit from the Department, from the Minister.

> —that the proposed allocation of fishing times in the areas in question was based on conservation or protection considerations.

I have a legal question for the Minister from a non-lawyer. The Minister stated twice, he admitted, that it was not for conservation reasons. He is appealing the decision made by a judge, a decision in which the judge said that because the action was not taken for conservation reasons the Minister could not do it. How could the Minister appeal the decision of the judge after admitting a moment ago that it was not for conservation reasons that these decisions were made?

Mr. Skelly: It was a different Minister.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I think it was the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) who just said the reason is that it is a different Minister. I know he is being facetious. I see my two friends are fighting among themselves as to who said what to whom, which reminds me of another story which is not fit for this House.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: My hon. friend for Gander-Twillingate says he is not a lawyer, not quite. He dissembles when he approaches legal matters with the innocence which he has expressed because he is a long-time colleague in this House and understands legislation and the implications of it only too well. He asked, why would I do this because I am not directing my remarks solely to conservation? The question of management of the fisheries on both coasts is not just a question of conservation, it is a question of managing the fishery in such a way that various interest groups are treated equitably in the harvest of that resource. Unless I have the power to do that, the entire fishing management plans in the different parts of Atlantic Canada which have been in place for many years would come to a grinding stop. On the West Coast I would not be able to make any allocations which would be necessary under the Canada-United States treaty. I would not be able to try to treat fairly the different user groups. Consequently, the only recourse I would have would be to come back to conservation, which would mean massive closures. For instance, in salmon we would hold whole areas closed until the last minute and when we knew enough escapement had taken place, we would let people in as a mop-up fishery. In Atlantic Canada, we could not function at all. The entire plan would fall apart unless I could make these changes.

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am always delighted to address the House on fisheries issues. I must say that the fishing industry in the country is a very exciting one. Along with that excitement there are many complications. It is an industry with a great many variations from region to region, from zone to zone, from coast to coast. I include the freshwater fishery and the northern fishery in that comment.

In speaking to the Bill before us today, I must say at the outset that I have some mixed feelings about the proposed amendments. Of course, it has been said that amendments to the Fisheries Act were made necessary, as the Minister mentioned earlier, as a result of a recent Federal Court order handed down by the Hon. Mr. Justice Collier. As has been said, the decision basically indicated that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans could not discriminate or allocate against one particular gear type or another. For instance, it could not discriminate against gillnetters in this particular dispute over seiners or possibly sports fishermen without well-established conservation grounds.

It is on those very same grounds that I express my mixed feelings. I have been involved in the fishing industry in one way or another for the past 25 years. I have played many different roles. I was actually a fisherman for a while. I worked for the Research Branch of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans for five years. I was involved in the fishing business for another five years. Also I have been involved in fisheries as a politician from 1974 to 1979 in the provincial legislature of the Province of Prince Edward Island, as Minister of Fisheries. I served as Parliamentary Secretary, as the Hon. Member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass) is doing now. I probably have some understanding of what the fishery is generally all about.

There is a fair amount of excitement. I understand perfectly well the situation in which the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) finds himself. I truly appreciate some of the problems which are out there. As well I appreciate the efforts of Hon. Members in the House in trying to overcome the problems for the benefit of those who are involved in the fishery—primary producers, fishermen, processors and all others in the industry.

Over the 25 years I have been involved in the industry, I have experienced some problems with fisheries management. It has not always been carried out in the way I would have liked. I witnessed some very strange regulations in different regions which made very little common sense. I know the Minister's past work in the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and so on. He knows where I am coming from when I say that when we pass legislation in the House of Commons or in provincial legislatures we often think that our job is done. However, that is not the case, as regulations flow from legislation. Sometimes those regulations do not reflect an iota of what we in the House of Commons thought we were passing. That really concerns me.

One example which comes to mind is in my own riding. It concerns a zone known as District 8. It is on the Northumberland Strait which divides New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. We have a scallop fishery there, as well as lobster, groundfish and pelagic fish. The fishermen from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island fish the same resource; they fish the same area. In fact, in many instances fishermen from New Brunswick will come into island ports and stay there.

This example concerns the transfer of licences. It is a controlled fishery. I understand the controls. If we did not have controls, we would have too many fishermen chasing too few fish. It comes down to the management aspect of it. The Bill will provide a better way to manage the fishery. A fisherman from Prince Edward Island cannot purchase the licence of a fisherman from New Brunswick, although it would not exert any extra pressure whatsoever on the resource. It is a limited fishery. A fisherman in Prince Edward Island cannot sell his licence to a fisherman in New Brunswick, but he can sell it to a fisherman within the same province. This has created many problems in the past.

Another example of what I am talking about in fishery management was outlined recently in the editorial section of the Eastern Graphic, a weekly newspaper in my province. Again it relates to licences associated with the same district but different provinces. This is a fisherman's view of it. It is headlined: "Licence policy can be annoying". A fisherman from Murray Harbour, Mr. Herring, is looking for a tuna licence but federal regulations are preventing him from purchasing any of the ones offered to him. It would not involve any expansion in the fishery. He is not looking for a brand-new licence; he is looking for a licence to purchase from another fisherman. He stresses that since tuna are a travelling species, fishermen are going back and forth between districts. He indicates that it is a ridiculous law set up by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I cannot say that this has happened because of the Minister or any previous Minister. It flows from legislation passed in the House. Sometimes regulations flowing from legislation are implemented with very little concern about how they affect people, and we are not really accomplishing with those policies and programs the objectives we think we are when we pass legislation here.

As I mentioned, that fisherman points out that he is not asking for a new licence. He is just asking for a transfer. He says that fishermen are not the ones causing the flak, that it is the Government. He adds that it will soon lead to a lot of friction, as one can only take so much pressure, and that fisheries officials are doing things at the local level which should be done at the parliamentary level.

This illustrates quite accurately what I have witnessed over the last number of years. It is not only happening under this Government, it happened under previous Governments. These things creep in. Sometimes we are not achieving what we are trying to achieve. These are great inconsistencies at the management level. If every one of us was out on a special project, we may have different ways of implementing something within the regulations prescribed by Parliament. We may come up with different views as to how the regulations could be implemented.

This Bill increases the powers given to local fisheries officers. The process has been streamlined too much. It means that there are more regulations. Every time we pass legislation, there are more regulations. Management of the fisheries is totally at the discretion of the fisheries officers in some cases.

A study The Public Regulation of Commercial Fisheries in Canada shows the degree of regulation in the Canadian fishery. It is very interesting. I quote from the study:

> Our study suggests that the Canadian tidal fishery is among the most closely regulated of industries in Canada and comparable industrial democracies. The federal Government exercises comprehensive control over the primary sector. The chief instrument is the Fisheries Act (with amendments and regulations stemming from it being made by Order in Council). Broad and sweeping powers are claimed by the Act, with more or less detail embodied in the Act itself.

That is one example. It is not just what I have found; others are finding the same. Bill C-32 will extend those powers. I understand the situation with the West Coast salmon fishery. It has to be managed a little differently than maybe the lobster fishery or the groundfish fishery on the East Coast. When there are salmon runs, gillnetters, trollers or any other group of fishermen can catch many fish very quickly. As the Minister stated, sometimes the season is only open for 15 minutes. You have to be reasonably spontaneous to manage that sort of fishery. The regulations to manage that sort of fishery should not be applied in a fishery that allows more time to make concrete decisions.

One problem that I and other Members from the Atlantic area have seen over the years is that fishermen are ill-advised or not advised soon enough as to when a new policy or regulation is brought into the Department. Sometimes fishermen gear up for a certain species only to find that the season is delayed or cancelled.

There is a difficulty on the West Coast that should be addressed. Since there is a rather short season in the fishery, how does one get the message out quickly enough to the fishermen? Radio could be used, but fishermen are not using their radio all the time. If they miss a broadcast, in some cases they could find themselves in contravention of the law by illegally fishing in a season which they thought was open but in reality the fisheries had closed. That is an area that should be looked at.

The same study prepared for the Economic Council of Canada, The Public Regulation of Commercial Fisheries in Canada, on page 39 talks about simplification of the rules. I quote:

> One cannot help but be impressed, indeed overwhelmed, by the weight and complexity of the rules now in place to govern the Canadian Fishery. We have described how this regulatory nightmare has come about. For now, we emphasize that in many cases the most honest fishermen cannot bait a trap, drop a line or set a net without breaking some law. And the most assiduous and well-motivated fisheries officer cannot uniformly enforce the rules.

That is the finding in that pamphlet. It emphasizes what I am trying to caution the Department and the Minister about on this legislation and the management of the fishery in the future.

We have programs of enforcement. Sometimes the fishermen's associations, their unions or the fishermen themselves, if they had the money, would probably better enforce the laws, regulations and the intent of the Act. We have had the experience in Prince Edward Island and new Brunswick of a co-management program. It was extremely successful. It cost the federal Government roughly $150,000 a year. I know the Parliamentary Secretary commented on soundings and radio broadcasts and is in support of that program.

When the Minister was in Prince Edward Island last fall, he agreed with the program. He met with the P.E.I. Fishermen's Association. I am told that he said that the program has been very effective and that it is a fine example of co-operation between the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the fishery. I certainly agree. The problem is they need some dollars. This could be policed a lot easier, more economically and better than by having more law enforcement officers within the Department. it is their resource. They understand how to police it, but they have to be identified as enforcement officers. That program has been in operation for three or four years. It has been extremely successful. The program needs dollars. When the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was in Prince Edward Island, he asked his Department to find some dollars. I hope he was serious and not only asks but tells them to find dollars within the Department to have that program implemented again for a number of years.

Another problem of regulation enforcement has to do with the lobster fishery. If you are caught illegally fishing lobster or with short lobster in your catch, you are taken up by the fishery officers, sent to court and assessed a fine. There is no question about it that no one on this side agrees with anyone taking anything illegal. However, the Minister has the power to take the licence away from that fisherman for a period of 10 days or longer.

I have seen a number of fishermen from different zones who have received a penalty. If he gets a 10-day suspension for 25 or 30 short lobsters, it is not because it is deliberate. It only happens rarely when a fisherman has a few short lobsters in his catch, if there is a bad storm or some such thing. Mostly it is proven not to have been premeditated; it is by accident.

When the officer picks up these people, he has to report. The fisherman may then be convicted. For example, if a fisherman in District 7 in Prince Edward Island loses his licence for seven days—and this happens in other areas of the country—he is not losing as much because the landings in the two-month season of May and June are rather uniform. It is probably 400 pounds a day, amounting to revenues of maybe $800 or $900 a day. However, if seven days are lost on the west side of the Island in District 8, almost the entire season is lost because catches with revenues as high as $20,000 can be lost. A bit of unfairness exists there. I do not know how we can get around that situation and manage the fishery properly.

• (1600)

I have a suggestion that I will put to the Minister today. If a short lobster is found under the floor-boards, the fisherman should lose his licence for the entire season. However, for every short lobster that is just one-sixteenth of an inch under the two and a half-inch carapace size, a first-time offender should be fined $100 per lobster. That fine should be imposed on the spot. That is fair to everyone. If that does not curtail illegal fishing, we should put the fine up to $200, $300 or $400; but we should at least make it uniform and fair to all.

Maybe a program could be worked out so that the Government could use some of the revenue from those fines to put toward more inspection and protection officers and to put toward the fishermen's associations themselves. There would be some logistics involved in making that proposal work, but I think that sort of thing does have some merit.

In preparing for this debate today, I picked up a copy of a Canadian Fisheries Management document entitled A Legal and Administrative Overview by David VanderZwaag, Professor of Dalhousie Ocean Studies Programme, Halifax, Nova Scotia. In this document he speaks of Canadian fisheries management. He noted:

> Great administrative discretion allows federal officials to alter fishing regulations and policies almost overnight. Lack of legislatively mandated consultation process allows officials to chart fishery management policy virtually on the basis of plans of their own design, subject only to the advice of their own choosing.

He goes on to point out that two statutes bear the brunt of the management of the Canadian fisheries and that:

> The Fisheries Act might be described as the hook, line, and sinker of fisheries management for it is the great source of managerial power over domestic fisheries.

Professor VanderZwaag goes on to indicate that the Act allows the Minister in his absolute discretion to issue fishing leases and licences and that the Canadian Cabinet also has wide-ranging powers.

There is no question about it. To manage a fishery and manage it properly, one must have powers but those powers that we give to the Department must be managed with a degree of fairness and common sense. That has always been of concern to me. When I see a piece of legislation that gives someone more power, I feel a little easy about the fact that the Minister in his own right has some control over the management at the lower levels.

In the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, the Minister can be kept terribly busy with travelling across the country and dealing with his day-to-day office routine. He has very little time to spare and in some cases gets very little help from the middle and lower management. That is what causes a great deal of the problems in the Department of Fisheries.

As I mentioned previously, the fishery is a very diversified industry. It is a very exciting industry but one which certainly creates a great many problems. It is one which must be managed on a region-by-region basis. When I speak of regions, I do not necessarily speak of the Pacific region versus the Atlantic region. I speak of regions within regions. The Minister mentioned the window. I am talking about the pane. If the industry is not managed properly, it is the fishermen who bear the brunt of those decisions.

Over all, the fishery industry has been managed well despite all the problems it has encountered. On the West Coast we speak of too many fishermen chasing too few fish. We had a similar situation on the Atlantic coast. It is hard to attribute that problem to any officials or even to any Ministers because we must also realize and understand that in the last 20 years the industry went through some tremendous advances in technology. When a fisherman left the harbour to go to the fishing grounds 25 or 30 years ago, he did not have a fish finder. He did not have a radar system in his small boat. He went out with a compass and nothing else.

Today, the situation is totally different. A fisherman can catch a great many more fish. The gear is more sophisticated and that has put more pressure on management. That is the problem with which this Minister and I am sure any Minister who will follow him in the next 20 years will have to deal. This Minister will be judged as other Ministers have been judged by how effectively he does deal with that. He must understand the fight between the offshore and the inshore and how he can rationalize that fight. It has to be rationalized because we have to protect the fishermen. This legislation at least will hopefully give him the power to allocate two different gear types. That will certainly be of great benefit to his ability to manage in the future.

The Minister mentioned the Charter of Rights and its effect on the fishery industry. I certainly hope that he does not run into any problems in that area. I believe the fishermen of the country are too important to be given second-hand treatment, whether it is through legislation or the Minister's budget. I am sure the Minister fought for more money but he lost some money for small craft harbours and things like that. By gosh, the Minister will have to find more money. I know that this has nothing to do with the legislation before us. I am rambling a bit. However, I caution the Minister that those are areas in which—

Mr. Fraser: There's the guy.

Mr. Henderson: There's the guy right there. I agree with the Minister. There's the slasher. I am trying to put a plug in this hole. I am not here to criticize the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser). He has been a Minister for six months.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What about potatoes?

Mr. Henderson: No, the potato people are after you as well.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I'm not eating potatoes any more.

Mr. Henderson: I know you aren't. You would probably find something in them if they came from P.E.I. after those rates.

In any event, we will certainly be watching the activities of the Minister. We wish him very well and we will be helpful. We will not be criticizing for the sake of criticizing. We want to criticize constructively and make sure that the fishermen on both coasts, those who are involved in the freshwater fishery and those fishermen in the great northern part of our country, are well served by this Parliament. I give fair warning here today that we will fight and fight hard to make sure that the proper allocation of funding is in place in order for the Minister to do the job which I believe should be done.

• (1610)

This is a very important industry in that it has an opportunity to grow and expand and in turn create jobs. The shellfish industry in my area with the virginica oyster, properly managed—and this can happen on the West Coast with its gigas oyster—can grow. We have good management tools now and great understanding of how to expand that industry. That creates jobs. When the Minister is trying to get dollars out of the Treasury Board and his Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), he should make sure they know that if government is serious about creating jobs, it is the Ministry of Fisheries and Oceans which can do that. The Department of Agriculture can do the same thing—I'll bootleg that in.

You are indicating I have seven minutes left, Mr. Speaker. I could go on for a half hour.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): No!

Mr. Henderson: I can see that you, as Minister of Finance, would not want me to talk in this way.

Mr. Fraser: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, to suggest to my friend that he might take a question in order to use up the seven minutes he has left, if the House would consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not want to set a precedent here. We did that for the Minister because we knew he wanted to get a few more questions posed to him. I feel we should let the Hon. Member finish his speech and just see how much time he has left.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, I have a lot more to say on this fisheries Bill yet.

Mr. Fraser: We have him wound up again.

Mr. Henderson: That's right. I must say that the time will come when I will be pleased to ask questions and I hope the Minister will be pleased to take questions in another six months when he has been a Minister for almost a year. We will see how his Department has made out as far as budget cuts are concerned.

I would like to speak about the area of national regulations and how they do not necessarily fit the situation. I feel this is a very serious problem and I would hope that the Minister would address it in his future management of the fisheries. A very important program is the vessel subsidy program. Prince Edward Island and parts of New Brunswick have shallow harbours and I do not see many dollars coming out of the Minister's Department for dredging. Those harbours need a differently constructed vessel. The basic Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick style vessel will cost around $50,000. The regulations say that up to 43.11 inches the vessel must be ten years of age. If it goes over one inch, it must be 15 years of age. That provision was not implemented during the present Minister's regime but this is an area at which a separate look should be taken from the basic policy in order to meet the needs of certain areas. It depends on how the vessel is constructed as to the length of life of the vessel. We either have to have a type of vessel which draws a lot of water, which basically cannot come into most harbours in Prince Edward Island, or we have to have a lighter boat, constructed with lighter materials, with a lower draught and shallower keel, in order to get in. With the latter, our vessel will only last us for approximately ten years if it is fished hard, that is, six months a year. I cite that as an example of another regulation which certainly is not conducive to good harmony among the fishermen. I have received many complaints about that sort of regulation.

Clause 3 under (m) refers to "portion thereof". When we go to committee I would like some clarification as to just what exactly "portion thereof" means. I suppose if a fishery officer were to board your boat and find a lobster claw or tail, he could probably take you to court. I hope there is someone in the committee to give us a legal definition of just what that part in the Bill is designed for. During the last couple of days of the season, some fishermen cook their lobsters aboard the vessel in seawater for their own use. They are legal lobsters, 2.5-inch carcass size, but if they throw the bodies away and are caught just with the tails, they could be unjustly punished. On the other hand, it has happened over the years that some people deliberately try to poach lobsters. So there should be some clarification as to just what that part of the Bill means. Is it tight enough? Is it clear enough that you send it out to a fishery officer in the boondocks and he will be able to make a decision as to exactly what that means?

Section 2.1(a) provides for the conservation and protection of fish in waters frequented by fish. That is pretty well basically the same as the previous Act, but Clause 3 reads:

(m) authorizing a person engaged or employed in the administration or enforcement of this Act to vary, in respect of any area or portion thereof, any close time, fishing quota or limit on the size or weight of fish that has been fixed by the regulations.

The wrong person can take anything out of that. I will want to know in committee exactly what that means in relationship to the Act.

In conclusion, I would like to say once again that over the next few months we will be travelling with the committee to the West Coast and we certainly will be able to discuss further with the people on the West Coast their feelings towards this legislation. It will have to be passed, I presume, probably before that but we will be meeting with fisheries groups. They certainly seem to want this legislation through before the salmon season. The Minister himself needs this legislation because of the court rulings and in order to start the new season.

• (1620)

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak to this extremely important issue. My friend from the Liberal Party who just spoke is, I know, extremely experienced and knowledgeable of the East Coast fishery and his speech covered that effectively. I think for the time being I will deal with our concerns in the West Coast fishery. I will deal with what I see as being the background to this particular issue before the House today. I will deal with what I see as the real problem with allocation and talk for a moment about the role of the Minister. I will speak for a few moments about departmental officials and their role in the process. I would also like to remind this House, the Minister and those who are watching of the Conservative promises made in the heat of a campaign and which are now put in question by this Bill.

I want to speak about allocation in a number of critical areas as it relates to the sports and commercial fisheries, as between gear types and as between native and non-native fishermen. I would then like to talk about the west coast salmon interception treaty. I would then like to speak for a few moments about the herring fishery and perhaps wrap up with some remarks on fairness in a number of areas. I hope the Minister will take my remarks in the spirit in which they are made so that we in this House can co-operate and do a great service to the communities and people concerned.

As I see it, this legislation results from two decisions by the Federal Court of Canada involving gulf trollers and people who were involved in a chaotic fishery in Barkley Sound. From my reading of the judgments, not being a lawyer, I get two messages. The judge says that the Act does not provide the Minister the right to allocate in a beneficial way between groups. He then says that even if the Minister changes the legislation, the Constitution would strike down any attempt to allocate beneficially between groups. That to me spells complete chaos in the fisheries management regime, not just on the West Coast but on the East Coast as well.

I am certain that this House has two very serious problems before it. We must amend this legislation to provide an orderly management regime in the fishing industry. As well, we need to know whether that particular legislation, that is the amendments before us, will stand a constitutional challenge which will most certainly occur if the opportunity presents itself. It could happen as early as May or June of this year.

So I am surprised that this Bill comes before the House at what you could call the eleventh hour or beyond. We have known about this particular dilemma since last August. This Government has been in power since September 4. The Minister has been involved with this issue for a considerable period of time. I know that myself and my colleagues have been asking for the legislation to be brought forward so we could deal with it, ask questions about it and hear witnesses. But no dice. The legislation is dropped in the minute the herring season is about to open on the West Coast.

The herring fishery is a chaotic fishery right now. It goes down in a very short period of time and it will go down even faster this time because quotas have been substantially reduced. There is a fishery out there worth $75 million, but instead of bringing this Bill before the House when it had the opportunity to deal with it. the Minister and his Government chose to do otherwise. They chose to drop it in the House and demand that we pass it in order to get it into his hands so that if the herring fishery opens tomorrow, he has the legislation. Mr. Speaker, it would be less than responsible for any legislator to deal so quickly with a Bill as important as this. This move by the Government borders on blackmail. You cannot get away from it and this style of operation must change.

This is not a simple Bill. It contains the guts of the business of fishing and allocates who gets what fish. Every sockeye salmon that swims down Johnstone Strait represents a ten dollar bill. The question is what community does that ten dollar bill wind up in? Is it Alert Bay or Vancouver or Campbell River or Prince Rupert? The Minister makes that decision during fishing season. We are talking about an awful pile of ten dollar bills, to the tune of millions of dollars. Last year in Barkley Sound the debate was between gillnetters and seiners. The previous Minister opted for one group and it was struck down in court, the judge essentially saying that if you open it for one, you open it for all. This is a vital aspect of fisheries management, a step in the process of redeveloping the fishery on the West Coast as we see it.

The important question we have to ask the Minister is not what is in this Bill, because this Bill represents the unfettered right to allocate fish. Quite honestly, I do not think it is appropriate that the Minister be given that unfettered right. But the real issue and why this Bill will not pass today or Friday, and certainly it will not pass the week after, is because the Minister has not bothered to tell us how the process of allocation will develop. That is the reason we will keep this Bill before the House until we have a reasonable explanation from the Minister.

We do of course have a new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I personally have a great deal of respect for him. I know him to be open, honest, sincere and well thought of by the people he has served on the coast of British Columbia for many years. But I want to point to some shortcomings which should be addressed if the relationship in this House is going to develop into an effective operation. It was impossible to discuss this Bill in advance and who will make the decisions, what mechanisms will be put in place to provide for an effective consultative forum in which these decisions will take place. I am tired of seeing many communities in my riding shafted because they do not have input into decisons about allocation. The money goes somewhere else even though they have depended on it for ages, before history was even written. That has to stop if I am to represent the constituents in my area and if I and other Members of this House are going to do an effective job as legislators. This Minister must be prepared to discuss the issue. He cannot simply drop a Bill in this House at the eleventh hour and expect one shred of co-operation. He certainly cannot expect a legislator with integrity to yield to blackmail.

Another point I want to make concerns political staff. This Government has appointed a group of political staff who have no experience. These people anticipate with some paranoia a bogeyman under every rock. This staff has to stop throwing road-blocks in the way of Ministers. This certainly applies not only to this Department. You can no longer sit down with a departmental official without a political commissar from the Conservative Party sitting right beside you. You cannot have a decent discussion with people on a day-to-day basis and I think that has to change. There has to be more openness if it is an open government. The Minister must appear before the Committee on Fisheries and Forestry soon. The Annual Report and the Estimates are before that Committee. The salmon treaty has been before that Committee. The Committee will travel to the West Coast. We cannot get a briefing from the Minister on his general game plan for fisheries and we cannot get the officials before the Committee.

I would like to make one more comment on the Minister which I hope he will take in the spirit in which it is intended, which is to lead us to stronger co-operation in the House. The Canada-U.S. salmon interception treaty did not come before the House. It came up in Question Period one day when I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) what the Government's intention was and he said that they had passed it that morning. There was no documentation in the House. We had no opportunity to study this treaty or to talk to the Minister before it was a fait accompli. That is not open government, Mr. Speaker. We do not want that style of government. We lived with that for a number of years under the previous administration and I think that style of government is past; but nevertheless, we have an example of that kind of government here. The salmon treaty approach reminds me of the approach taken with this Bill. We have no chance to call witnesses or to study it. This need not have happened because the Government has known about it since last summer. The Minister must change the approach.

During the election campaign, and even before, the Conservatives wandered the country saying that they would have an open government. I believe it was a sacred trust. The Minister and candidates on the West Coast promised a co-operative management scheme in the fishery. They said that for too long the material had come from 1090 West Pender or from Ottawa. It is time that the people who work in that industry and the communities that are dependent upon the industry have a fair and representative opportunity to give some input. We no longer want a selected committee that does not represent the group fairly and that, in the future, may include defeated candidates. We need a group that represents that sector of the industry and in which the industry has confidence to input fairly.

We have a real dilemma, Mr. Speaker. All the data about the fisheries resource, the returning stocks, and the fishery for a given year is produced by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. No one is allowed effectively to challenge the truth of that data. In certain years it has proven to be absolutely false after they have turned away fish at the spawning gates to drift down the river and rot. From that data they make the fishing plan. There is input from a number of sources, but none which anyone would consider to be fair. Of course, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans monitors the whole program. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction and distrust. It is felt that political decisions are made and that the squeakier wheels get the grease.

The solution to all the problems is a fair consultative body which represents the groups with confidence. During the election campaign candidates on the West Coast promised that would happen, with the acquiescence of the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser). I want to see that promise delivered on as does every person involved in this industry on the West Coast of British Columbia. If we had any indication from the Minister that a fair and effective consultative body was going to be put in place to determine how allocations will be made and how management will be administered, this Bill would have a very easy passage through the House. Without such an indication it is going to have a rough time.

The Conservative Party promised a $200 million salmon enhancement program on the coast of British Columbia. The resource is in desperate shape. The salmon enhancement program would create employment in many communities which are suffering tremendous economic depression in that province. That promise was made by Conservative candidates and acquiesced to by the present Minister. In the Estimates we do not find the $200 million salmon enhancement program or the $100 million buy-back program that was promised. Rather, there is about a $70 million cut in the operating budget of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, as well as a $200 million cut in its capital program.

We do not want that kind of commitment. I am not blaming the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for this development. I think it has more to do with the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the fixations of the Prime Minister and his Deputy than with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Those promises were made, Mr. Speaker, and they must be kept in order to have an effective, viable fishing industry on the West Coast.

A great deal of blame is placed on departmental officials, the people who work in the industry. I hear politicians, fishermen and people on the street blaming the bureaucrats. They are looking for a scapegoat. I believe there are people involved in that industry who have integrity and pride. They work against obstacles that I do not think many people would work against. The people who give policy direction to the Department do not back them up. Many times a fisheries officer in habitat protection has indicated that a vital area must be protected, only to have the ground chopped out from under him. I would not blame a fisheries officer for not sticking his neck out, knowing that it will be cut off by the Minister or one of his political commissars.

The departmental staff are loyal and take great pride in their work. They have integrity and are, by and large, a decent group of people doing an excellent job without being backed up. Time will tell how the Government will treat, encourage, and develop this group of people. They are definitely not to be scapegoats in this case. If the Government wants to cut the budget, it can live with the political results of that. If it wants to cut capital programs, it can live with the consequences of that. However, it must not scapegoat the departmental officials in that field.

A large amount of very valuable habitat is being ruined. One example of that is the CN twin-tracking project of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski). The Department of Fisheries and Oceans refused to hire one additional fisheries officer to monitor this extremely important river in order that the twin-tracking project could proceed. That just does not make sense. It is not a responsible way to husband a precious resource.

In short, Mr. Speaker, there cannot be scapegoating of departmental fisheries officers. They are an excellent group of people. I believe the reason we have done as well as we have with habitat protection and environmental concerns is because of the integrity of these individuals.

This Bill gives the Minister the right to allocate. An interesting situation occurred in the Gulf of Georgia because of the salmon treaty. Last year the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans recognized that the people fishing commercially in the Gulf took 100,000 fish the year before from April 15 to September 30. He said that he was going to cut that amount by 80 per cent, allowing them to take only 20,000 Chinook from July 1 until August 30. That is only eight weeks and is not even enough time to earn unemployment insurance. The people justifiably said that that was crazy. The Minister said it was important to cut the catch to 225,000 Chinook and to get the rest to the spawning grounds in order to preserve this endangered resource.

He did not do that, Mr. Speaker. The Minister said that it was for conservation purposes, but in reality they turned the whole catch over to the sports fishery. That was the intention. What I believe happened is that last year the commercial fleet took 100,000 Chinook from the Gulf and the sports fishery took 350,000. Almost half a million Chinook were taken out of the Gulf when only 225,000 were to be taken. A court case resulted from that. Today, with the salmon treaty in place, the limit, supervised by an international body and subject to a treaty, is 275,000, almost half of what was taken last year. We have an enormous expectation in the recreational and tourist fishery. We expect that approximately 100,000 pieces of Chinook, or half of that catch, will go to the troll fleet. I know that the Minister has received telegrams from the Province of British Columbia saying that tourism will be harmed because of his decision to sign the treaty at that level.

There are serious concerns about the expectations of sports fishermen. The Minister should have agreements to allocate fish differently such as to permit Gulf trollers access to another fishery or to permit unsupervised taking of Chinook by the sports fishery in the Georgia Strait. Furthermore, I do not honestly believe that the Minister has enough fisheries officers to determine what will be taken.

There is a serious problem with allocation. The Minister has not given all the details of the deals which have been made. He has substantially limited the fish that are available to the recreational fishery and to the commercial fleet in that area.

The second problem concerns gear type. The three basic gear types are seine fleet, gillnet fleet and the troll fleet. They are all attempting to earn a living during difficult times on the coast of British Columbia. According to this Bill, the Minister will have the unfettered right to allocate fish, but how will this be done? Some critical questions include which advisory group will advise him and how will he and his Department be bound by the decisions that are made.

Another area of allocation involves communities. The Minister knows as well as anyone that communities like Alert Bay in British Columbia have been devastated because of a number of economic set-backs due to the recession. While the Minister must have the right to make allocations, how will he take cognizance of the needs for economic assistance that the fisheries can give to communities along the coast of British Columbia?

The legislation will give the Minister the right to decide what gear type and group of fishermen will take what species in what area. Our Party suggest that there should be a mechanism to give people on the coast of British Columbia a fair and representative input into those decisions.

Another deep concern about allocation in British Columbia is the allocation to native people. In my opinion there is a commitment by the House of Commons and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to ensure greater participation by native people in the fishery. Traditionally, native participation has been approximately 20 per cent but it has dropped to 5 per cent. There has been a commitment in the past that their participation rate would go at least to historic levels if not traditional levels.

The Minister has made no mention of native people. He certainly is aware of the problem, as evidenced by his good words recently about twin-tracking. Although he knows the people and the community, native leaders are greatly concerned that he has made no public commitment with respect to allocation. The Minister knows that native communities depend on the fisheries as a major source of economic development.

Let us take the examples of the Nimpkish band, the band at Bella Bella, the band at Bella Coola or the Sechelt band. These communities depend on fishing as a major source of expected income. According to the allocation provision of this Bill, the Minister can make decisions that will affect those communities for years to come. The Minister has said nothing on this, yet he wonders why we are not prepared to pass this Bill immediately. We want some commitments.

Native people, in their aboriginal land claims, are developing sea claims to resources with the view that they were never surrendered and that the Government of Canada must recognize those claims and deal with them. The fisheries resource will constitute a major source of the claim. How will the Minister deal with these aboriginal sea claims within the provisions of his allocation process?

The fishery has been the traditional resource of native people of British Columbia. In many cases it is the resource opportunity from which they have been deprived for a number of generations and to which they have a legal right and wish to return. Taking fish is a traditional right of native people.

The Minister has often been made aware that one reason why reserves along the coast of British Columbia consisted of large communities with very small land bases is the assumption by the people who granted those reserves that those people lived off the sea and its resources. It was assumed they would be given access to those resources in perpetuity. In fact, they have been deprived of access to those resources and at the same time have a very small land base with no other effective resource base to develop the economy of their communities and the expectation of a decent future in the country. They say that their traditional rights must and should be respected.

This also raises an allocation problem among native communities themselves. If native people on the coast of British Columbia are given greater allocation, what will happen to the inland reserves of British Columbia where there is a very large inland fishery? There will be an expectation of allocation on the rivers, mainly for sunfish for food and sunfish for escapement. That issue will have to be addressed.

I believe the salmon treaty has created enormous problems in the House. It has compromised our sovereignty and its timing has created problems with salmon enhancement programs. I do not believe that Americans in southeast Alaska can live up to the terms of the treaty or that Canadians in the Gulf of Georgia can live up to the terms of the treaty. Gradually one will work against the other.

According to the minutes of the ministerial advisory committee in British Columbia, the Minister said before that committee that that treaty went through Cabinet in 30 minutes. He said that the Prime Minister never read that treaty. That is also recorded in the minutes of his advisory committee meeting. Furthermore, in a conversation with a journalist which was put on the air, the Minister said that he realized that there were many serious problems in the treaty but the Prime Minister wanted it very badly.

I suggest that the Prime Minister of Canada owes the House an explanation. How can he turn Canada into a doormat for the President of the United States? How can he turn the people on the coast of British Columbia, who depend on this industry, into a doormat? This treaty went through the Cabinet in the morning and we accidentally discovered it in the afternoon. We did not receive any documentation or details about it until the next day. Such action by the Government is completely unacceptable.

When the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was subsequently questioned about this treaty, he said that it would not be changed in spite of its problems. He said that he would take full responsibility for it. I suggest that in two years, after the Minister has restructured the West Coast fisheries according to the wishes of others in the Cabinet, he will become the Minister of Supply and Services and will no longer be responsible for that Department. Someone from the East Coast of Canada will be responsible and we will be faced with the problems that result from the decisions of the Government.

Let me refer briefly to the buy-back program. Not only did the Conservatives promise a buy-back program, but in December the Assistant Deputy Minister to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans laid a proposal before the B.C. ministerial advisory committee for a $100 million buy-back program. This buy-back program included proposals to buy one-third to one-half of the boats from the fleet in order to reduce its size. It included selling $100 million worth of boats for $40 million to keep a cost of $60 million. They were going to impose a landing tax over ten years that would earn $200 million for the Government. The net cost for the buy-back would have been a $140 million profit to the Government and it would have bailed out a lot of banks.

We were seriously concerned about the wisdom of that program, and sure enough the Minister withdrew it in January. In January he laid another proposal before his ministerial advisory committee. It was at about a grade eight level, a C-minus grade paper on problems in the fishing industry that essentially asked the committee: "What do you think we should do about it?"

It strikes me that that move was made in concert with the hackers and choppers in this particular Government. The $100 million buy-back was not in the program. Let them root, hog, or die. The Government was simply here in the business to save money. "Let them root, hog, or die", meaning the fishermen on the West Coast of British Columbia." It does not matter that they are suffering. We, the Government, are here to save money and we simply are not going to get involved in the buy-back".

That is my supposition, Mr. Speaker, but when I look at the type of paper that was put before that advisory committee, what other conclusions can you come to? The Minister should be standing up in this House telling us what his intentions are about the buy-back so people can make some decisions about their lives in an orderly manner.

I want to speak briefly about the herring industry on the coast of British Columbia. It is a $75 million industry this year. Again, the quota is reduced from something in the order of 30,000 tonnes to about 18,000 tonnes. There will be less money for people this year. It will happen faster this year. We contacted every major user group in the herring industry this year and they knew the difficulties. They said months before they had made a herring fishing plan. Every major industry group will stick to that plan. We were assured of this by every group. They said that they would not have time to interfere with it.

When the Minister said it could collapse, he was wrong. The groups in it are prepared to co-operate and get the herring fishery done. Each one of those user groups to whom we talked said not to pass that Bill, that the Bill contains the guts of a fisheries management program. They asked who will make the decision to allocate fish to them or to the other users in the herring industry, in the salmon industry with other marine plants and animals? Who will make the decision about ocean ranching, about area licensing, about license limitation? This is the whole process of allocation.

This Bill provides that unfettered right to the Minister. That is what we are about today. That is what has to be decided upon. The Minister has to stand up in this House and tell us who is he going to consult. What are the mechanisms? Will they be fair? Will they be representative? Will they consider communities and people involved in the industry? All of that is absolutely imperative.

There are a couple more areas, and I put these up as a matter of fairness in the fishing industry, things which the Minister has to talk about before this House, before the committee, or privately. We have a situation called the "no net loss of habitat". The Minister has been around touting that his policy is a net gain of habitat. He thinks by allowing industrial despoilers of the environment to wreck a piece of fish habitat that you can create an artificial piece of fish habitat that will replace what is lost.

Let us now look at the Fraser River. I was born in a city beside the Fraser River. I lived on that river as a kid, and worked on it as a young adult. I know it very well. I did not get back to it for 15 years and I could not believe what had been done to it. The trifurcation program channelized the river so one no longer has to dredge it. It speeded up the river. This has now caused a stress on returning salmon. The pollution in the river is astounding. There are poisons that run into it from sewage, industrial plants and dumps along side its banks. It is astounding, Mr. Speaker. They say each one when considered individually is a small increment of despoilage of the river. It only creates a small increment of stress. When one adds the effect of the trifurcation program and all that over-running of sewage, it is no longer a small increment of stress. We can use the example of the City of Vancouver which has been told to spend $75 million to clean up the Iona sewage plant because it is polluting the mouth of the river. But every community up and down the river is virtually doing the same thing. So we have pollution, poisons, and trifurcation. Then along comes the filling in of marshes because the land is needed. The land is near shipping and transportation areas. It is also juvenile rearing ground. That creates an additional stress on the world's largest salmon river.

What about the double-tracking of the CN? The Department of Fisheries and Oceans comes before us and says that we have CN studies and other older studies that say this is incrementally not going to be of great impact. But the Department of Fisheries and Oceans did not look at the fact that CP will want to double-track. It did not look at the cumulative load on that whole river as more and more and more things take place.

You cannot replace that kind of loss of habitat, Mr. Speaker, because we will not know that it happened until way in the future as that stress builds and reacts on the species. They may fill in a small juvenile rearing area. That is great, but the total impact on that river is substantial and it is continuing to get worse every year.

Then there is the Quinsam coal project, a no net loss of habitat. The company intends to build an open pit coal mine at the head of a major hatchery on the Quinsam River. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans said that it did not have the staff to monitor the effects of this coal mine. The people said they did not really know what was going on because they will not be given the staff or the resources. The Department said that if the mine does not wipe out that hatchery or place an enormous stress on the river, it will certainly not be because the Department was able to detect it.

Next is the Rivers Inlet which is one of the largest Sockeye areas on the coast of British Columbia. Rivers Inlet and the Owikeno Lake area are being logged out. The rivers and streams behind in which salmon spawn and rear are affected. This Department will not become involved in integrated resource management studies because I do not think it likes to hear the results. I do not think it has the resources to enforce the requirements anyway to protect those habitats, Mr. Speaker.

The Minister has known that loss of habitat, the invention of Peter Pearce, is not applicable. It is not effective. It is a complete sell-out of the environment of British Columbia. It must stop. Even though the Department is operating on that basis, the Minister's deputy admitted that the Department has not even developed that policy.

Another point is fairness concerning small craft harbours. British Columbia out of the small craft harbours budget will get from $2 million to $3 million this year. It generally gets $6 million. Six million dollars hardly paints and maintains the wharves. We need a priorized list of the harbours that are going to receive money in the order that it becomes available. We need a decent budget.

On the West Coast of Canada fishermen pay for every foot of moorage no matter what they tie to the dock. It is grossly unfair that this Government in cost recovery wants to increase that from 200 per cent to 500 per cent of an already expensive cost in a diminished economy. Yet their brothers and sisters on the East Coast get free moorage for quite a few categories of vessels. That is grossly unfair. I think we have to give the same consideration to our fishermen on the West Coast as that provided to our fishermen on the East Coast.

My last point concerns insurance. In this philosophical fixation which the Conservative Government has about the private sector and the sanctity of the free market, fishermen and vessel owners on both coasts have a serious problem with insurance. I think it is imperative that this Government not give up coverage of those fishing vessels. Without it there will be severe difficulty. Some people will sail without insurance. Some people will run into extreme difficulty without it. I understand this matter is before the Minister now. Those groups to whom I have spoken in the fishing industry on the coast of British Columbia are absolutely adamant that that fishing vessel insurance program stay in place and not be changed and that it is a matter of serious concern. If the Minister would like to hear that from user groups themselves, they are prepared to come to Ottawa now.

In summary, I think this Bill before us today is critical. We will over the coming days debate it. I think the style of the Minister has got to change in order to develop openness and some element of trust so we can deal expeditiously with a Bill like this, and that we also have time to study it fairly. What happened in that salmon treaty process is intolerable, but the good news is that the herring fishing will go ahead without this particular legislation.

• (1700)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I should like to draw to the attention of the House that we are now entering the second phase of the debate, which means that according to Standing Order 35(2) Hon. Members will be allowed to make 20-minute speeches, followed by the 10-minute question and comment period.

Mr. Morrisey Johnson (Bonavista-Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I was certainly pleased to hear the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) close his remarks on a positive note when he spoke about the herring fishery. Everything else he said about the remarks of the Minister was very negative.

An Hon. Member: And he was right on.

Mr. Johnson: I do not believe he was in all cases. He suggested that the Minister did not speak about the native people. I happen to have a copy of the Minister's speech—and I heard him—and right on the first page he spoke about native people, Indian people. I suggest the Hon. Member should look at Hansard at the first opportunity to see what the Minister said.

I have no difficulty in expressing my support for the amendments to the Fisheries Act proposed in Bill C-32. As most Hon. Members in the House know, the fishery in my province has been, is and always will be the main industry. In his remarks the Minister said that the passage of this Bill was a matter of particular urgency on the Pacific coast. He also said that the issues addressed by these amendments are very live issues in the Canadian fishery. I concur, and I would like to add that they are crucial in the Atlantic region.

One of the objectives of the Bill is to ensure that the objective of fisheries management does not end with the protection and conservation of the resource. We want to protect stocks, the raw material base of the fishery, but not as an end in itself. We do so in order to realize certain benefits for society. We cannot ignore social and economic situations in our management of the fishery. They are part of the reality of the fishing business. We manage the fishery for the benefit of fishermen, plant workers and fishing communities. In fact, we manage it in the interests of the country as a whole. Whether we are talking about controlling fishing effort or stipulating a certain net mesh size in a given fishery, or allocating fish between fleet sectors, the principle is the same. I suspect this was realized in 1867, and that the only reason it was not made more explicit at the time was that it seemed self-evident. I think it is safe to say that the people who drafted the original Act knew why and on whose behalf they wanted the stocks protected.

Certainly we in Atlantic Canada, the region in which the Canadian fishing industry was born, have never had any reason to be confused about the relationship of good fisheries management to the social and economic health of our region. If we were ever tempted to forget it, we received painful reminders. I am thinking, for instance, of the depletion of groundfish stock due to over-fishing in the days before the 200-mile limit was established.

Even today, with Canadian jurisdiction in place, we know that the health and productivity of the fisheries depend on our ability to exercise the comprehensive management powers which these amendments clarify. For several years now groundfish stocks have been managed by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans on the basis of a comprehensive annual plan. Under this plan, quotas are set and portions of that total are assigned to vessels of different types—so much for vessels over 100 feet, so much for vessels between 65 and 100 feet, so much for vessels using fixed and mobile gear, and so on.

That approach has been further refined. In the groundfish trawler fleet and the herring purse seiner fleet, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans now make allocations of the total quota, not just to fleets but to individuals and companies. This approach to some extent is also for smaller boats, especially in the Gulf region. These measures are basic to the management of the Atlantic fisheries. If the act as it stands does not make that authority clear, if it is likely to be challenged on the basis of inexplicit language, the sooner we remove the ambiguities the better. I urge early consideration and passage of the Bill by the House.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity beforehand to read the speech of the Minister. I should like to direct a question to the Hon. Member concerning the basis of the allocation to native people. A very serious problem arose at the mouth of the Qualicum River where there is a large terminal fishery and a huge fleet. At the end of the year fishermen who want one last crack at earning an income, be they gillnetters or seiners, are at the mouth of that river trying to catch fish on their way out. It is my understanding that last year the Minister of Fisheries wanted to allocate surplus fish to an Indian band but he could not do it because the law had changed. Therefore he decided to turn the surplus fish over to Crown Assets Disposal to get rid of them and only allowed one bidder, the Indian band, and it took the fish.

That is a very unusual procedure, but nevertheless the question becomes: Should the fish have gone to the commercial fishery or to the Indian band? Without making a judgment on whom they should go to, I want to illustrate that allocation is a complex problem. The Minister never mentioned a word about the nature of allocation to native people. They have serious complaints and serious economic problems, yet he rose and made some fairly euphemistic statements. There was not a shred of content upon which they could base any serious hope. Perhaps the previous speaker might want to comment on this.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, it is very evident from the fact that the Minister introduced amendments to the Act that he is aware he did not have the power as described by the Hon. Member. This is the reason he brought in those amendments, so that he would have the power to make allocations to people from different regions. I think that is very evident. I am sure the Minister is more familiar with the incident to which the Hon. Member referred than I am, coming from the East Coast.

• (1710)

I want to assure him that when I am on the West Coast very shortly with the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, I will have an opportunity to learn more about that part of the country. I am sure that his colleagues from his Party will endeavour to tell me all about their province so that I will be more informed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate, a very short question.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I always notice you say to me "a very short question".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The only reason I mention that is no matter what I say, the Hon. Member seems to take three or four minutes. I would hope that he would endeavour to help because there are other people who would like to ask questions. Therefore, if I do get a short statement, question or comment, somebody else may be able to ask a question.

Mr. Baker: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it is the quality of the question that I ask. The hon. gentleman who just spoke is very knowledgeable of the fishery. There is not a person in this Chamber who would deny that. I want to ask him a basic question. This Bill is all about a problem that is basic between gillnetters and seiners. There is a basic question here. No matter what part of the country you go to, you find a dispute between gillnetters and seiners, gillnets with the nets down to the bottom, anchored on top of the water, and the seiners with the big net that captures the fish. Why does the Hon. Member think there is such a dispute? Does he side with the finding sometimes of the scientists which is directly contrary to the opinions of both the seiners and the gillnetters? There are really two questions. Can he just explain to the House why we have this conflict?

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps some people in my riding will be offended by what I am about to say, but I think the reason there are conflicts between people fishing on a dragger and people fishing with gillnets is that humans have a tendency to be a little bit jealous, and because the regulations permitting people to set gear in certain areas conflict with the ability of other people to fish. If I were to speak about gillnetting, which I have done, people set out their gillnets, a draggerman comes along and he wants to fish because it is good fishing ground. Sometimes he might inadvertently take some of the fixed gear away, not because he wants to hurt his fellow fisherman, but because sometimes as a result of sea conditions and visibility he is not able to see the markers for the fixed gear. I am sure that those problems will always exist. It will be impossible for any Minister of Fisheries to be able to say that gear will be fixed there, that everybody has to stay so many miles away from it and people will not encroach on that fixed gear.

On the other question, it would be difficult for me to condemn scientists who sometimes may make errors in setting the amount of fish allowed to be caught, the quotas for certain species. I am sure they have made mistakes. I am sure that fishermen overestimate the stocks too. There will be friction when there are more and more people depending on the fishery for their livelihood and there is not enough of that specific type of fish to fill the needs of all the fishermen. They are going to be critical of the scientists who sometimes make recommendations to the Minister when he is setting the allocation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate on a short supplementary question.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, a very short one. In the opening of his last answer, the Hon. Member said that he was going to say something that perhaps some fishermen will not like. I am now going to ask him to say something that perhaps the Minister will not like. Did he suspect that the federal Department of Fisheries did not have the authority to do what it did under the existing Act, thereby giving rise to this legislation today? In his vast experience, did he suspect that? Did his cohorts, his fellow skippers, mention to him that perhaps the federal Department of Fisheries was acting outside of the law and that it should be tested in court?

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I would be offending the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr.

Fraser) if I gave my hon. friend a truthful answer, which I am sure he wants, but I would certainly be criticizing previous Ministers of Fisheries. Yes, I did suspect that the Minister of Fisheries did not have authority. In fact, I had been asked on a number of occasions if I would be willing to be the scapegoat, to go out and catch fish against the law, because a lot of people believed it. I am glad that the Minister has brought forward this amendment.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Hon. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to say that I am pleased that the Hon. Member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception (Mr. Johnson) has participated in this debate. I do not know if we have ever had a practising fisherman from my province, but we now have one in the Chamber. I may say, I hope without offence to my colleague from Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), that not only is he and was he an expert fisherman, but he is fast becoming fast on his feet in this Chamber and on his way to becoming a parliamentarian. I think my friend from Gander-Twillingate would agree.

Having said that, I have 20 minutes in which to put some things on the record that I think are very important. Basically, this amendment gives the power to the Government to do presumably what it has been doing. It reminds me of a quote from Pope, talking about beauty. He said:

True wit is Nature to advantage
dress'd,
What oft was thought, but ne'er so well
express'd.

I do not know how beautiful what we have from the Minister today is, but it is what was often thought "but n'er so well express'd".

What is happening here, and we must be aware of this, is that this amendment is about power. It is an allocation of power to officials. The Minister said in his remarks that previously officials would have to get order in council approval for certain closures, and that is true. That will no longer be the case. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) is already the most powerful Minister in the Government in terms of the Act which he administers and for which he is responsible. He is now enshrining in law more power. That is good if that power is used well. It is good if we have good officials and good bureaucrats, and we do.

I want to take the time to say that the officials and the people who work in the Department of Fisheries here in Ottawa and in my region have been faithful, competent and good public servants. However, that does not say that at some point there may be officials who are over-zealous and insensitive. There has to be some sort of protection against that over-zealousness and insensitivity. We in this country are not ruled by officials and bureaucrats. We are ruled by a Government which is responsible to people. As long as we have good officials, this law is good.

We are talking about power, not only over fish and fish stocks and allocations, but power over people's lives. The island of Newfoundland was settled as a result of the fish stocks around our shore. Our culture and our way of life is built on the fishery. It is of no mean importance to us. It is of fundamental importance. This House should recognize that what we are talking about here today is not simply power over fish stocks and over fish processing. It is power over people's lives and over communities. That should be clearly understood. It is how that power is shared that is important to me.

This amendment gives the Department more power. It gives it power to open and close sections and power to allocate fish stocks to provinces. It gives the Department the right in law to allocate resources from one area to people who live in another area. As I say, it is important to us how this power is used.

The Premier of Newfoundland has heretofore put in very graphic and dramatic terms the fact that the northern cod stocks of the Hamilton Banks off the coast of Labrador and the northern coast of Newfoundland are very important to Newfoundland. He has claimed it is of such fundamental importance to us that he has said from time to time that it is more important to us than the oil off our shores. If that is the case, then he wants an assurance that those northern cod stocks are to be the priority of Newfoundland and Labrador fishermen. However, other people from other provinces fish in that area as well. Newfoundland fishermen and the Premier are very concerned that their priority be adhered to.

It is true that Newfoundlanders fish off the Scotian shelf. We do not want to balkanize the fishery in Canada. I point this out because I think it is very important in this debate that we understand that the possibility for balkanization exists. I will want an assurance that this power, if it is given, will be used properly, fairly and in the best interests of the people I represent.

As well, the Department has power to restrict fisheries in certain bays and in certain sections of certain bays. That power will be enshrined in this legislation. My friend, the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate, alluded to the fact that certain small-boat fishermen and certain inshore fishermen have been at the mercy of larger vessels, of herring seiners and even of long liners that fish in the same grounds. A man with a 45-foot or 60-foot long liner can fish in the same area as a man with an 18 or 25-foot boat. There are inequalities.

The Hon. Member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception alluded in his answer to the fact that between human beings there are jealousies and apprehensions. That is true but the Government is there to see that all people are treated fairly whether they are small-boat fishermen or large-boat fishermen. I hope that this power will be used to see that those who are disadvantaged, who do not have the larger vessels and do not have access to the deep sea fishery are protected by this law and that herring seiners and long liners are somehow restricted in their ability to fish small inshore stocks in small inshore regions.

If we are to give more power as this Bill does to the Government and the officials, I would ask how we are going to assure ourselves that the power is shared equally by the federal Government, the provincial Government and the fishermen themselves. There is only so much power to go around. If power is given to one group, it is automatically taken from another. I repeat that the Premier of Newfoundland has said that the fishery is very important to us. He has asked from time to time for more control over the Newfoundland fishery. There is no assurance here that he will get the kind of input that he requires. Moreover, there is no assurance here that the fishermen themselves who are most affected will have any more control over their own lives. I worry about the acquisition of more power by officials because I fear that it means less power to fishermen, those wose lives are most affected.

In his speech the Minister spoke about a fisheries policy and the 200-mile limit. I second his thoughts on those matters. The 200-mile limit has been a godsend to us in Newfoundland. I am proud that it was this Party that brought in the 200-mile limit. As a result of that measure, the fish stocks off Newfoundland and Labrador are now in much better shape than they were previously.

The 200-mile limit and the fisheries policy has been put in place. We will have to wait to see what the position is of the present Government on the utilization of those fish stocks and the processing of the fish that is caught. This Bill tells us nothing about what the policy of the Government or the Minister is with regard to the prosecution of the fishery.

I would like to see a management policy brought forward at an early stage. I particularly want to know what the Minister will do, when he will have the legal power to allocate stocks, about the allocation of certain stocks to what is known as resource-short plants. Following on the recommendations of the Kirby report, the Government adopted certain policies. One of those recommendations which was accepted was that an allocation of fish stocks be put aside for what is known as resource-short plants. There were plants in certain areas that had access to the deep sea fishery but there were plants in other areas, like the northeast coast of Newfoundland, that did not have access to deep sea fisheries at the time and were dependent on the inshore fishery. If the inshore fishery were to fail for any reason, those plants would be in serious economic trouble and people would be laid off. There must be allocations to those small inshore plants from the deep sea fishery. I would like to know what the Government and the Ministry will do about that.

I would like a fisheries policy brought forward at the earliest possible opportunity. I believe the Minister is a well-meaning and sincere Minister. I hope that we will be able to have a full discussion with him as to the nature of his policy. So far, if we are to judge by the Government's record, the policies have not been all that great. What we in my province have seen in the fisheries so far is cut-backs which have inhibited the ability of fishermen to carry on their livelihood.

The economic statement dealt with a number of things that will create hardship for the fishermen in my area. What about the announcement of the possible cut-backs in unemployment insurance, for example? This is not the time to announce further restrictions on unemployment insurance. We have had a failure in the inshore fishery this year and after some prodding, the Government finally came forward with an amount of $6 million to help those people who did not receive the benefits that they required to carry on through the winter. That amount is inadequate. There are fishermen in small communities in Newfoundland who are still not able to draw unemployment insurance this year because the amount of $6 million which was made available after some prodding is inadequate. Now is no time to announce further restrictions on unemployment insurance.

As well, the Government cancelled certain capital projects like the marine service centre that was to be built at Smokey on the Labrador coast. The Government has announced that it will privatize insurance for long liners. That, I believe, is a disastrous move because if there were private industry companies that would insure those kinds of fishing vessels, they would have been doing so all along. I know of no alternative to government support for vessel insurance. I do not think there is any alternative. When the Minister was in Newfoundland, representatives from the fishermen's union spoke to him at length about this matter and told him that it presented them with a serious problem. I encourage the Minister to take a second look at his decision to privatize fishing vessel insurance because I believe it will have a disastrous effect on small inshore fishermen.

This is no time to make cut-backs in the fisheries policy because the industry is struggling. There is a great deal of competition in the market-place and particularly in the U.S. market-place. Scandivanian countries are putting a good quality product on the United States market at a reasonable cost thus creating a great deal of competition. This is no time to exercise those cut-backs on a struggling industry. Now is the time not for cut-backs but for incentives.

I want to know what the regional policy of the Government is. How is the Government going to ensure that small fishing firms, for example, in Atlantic Canada will have a fair chance in the market-place in the future? We have not heard from the Government on that issue. What is going to be done to help Fishery Products International? That company was set up when the private sector failed and it is owned now by both the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland. I believe it is going to need a further infusion of funds if it is to be financially sound and if it is going to be able to compete in the market-place. The Government has to tell us clearly what its policy is going to be with regard to Fishery Products International and how it intends to make it a sound financial operation.

In speaking of Fishery Products International, Mr. Speaker, I want to get on to a topic which is very important to me. That is the topic I raised with the Minister yesterday, the Northern Fisheries Development Corporation. This also was a recommendation which came out of the Kirby report and it was accepted by both the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland. There was a signed agreement in principle to set up this Northern Fisheries Development Corporation north of 50 because it is understood that there are disadvantaged fishermen in that area who need special measures. It is not good enough to leave those plants on the northern peninsula of Newfoundland, such as St. Anthony, for example, and plants along the Labrador coast, at the mercy of Fisheries Products International. I believe that after the provincial election is over—whenever the Premier decides to call it and I feel it will come very soon—certain hard decisions will have to be taken with regard to Fishery Products International which are not going to be very easy to sell in my province.

I fear certain fish plant closures. I want to make sure that the people I represent, and the people on the northern peninsula and the Labrador coast, are taken care of. I would ask the Minister not to leave those people who live and fish in the north at the mercy of the people in the south. Those plants have been marginal. In the northern peninsula of Newfoundland and the coast of Labrador we have some of the most disadvantaged fishermen anywhere in Canada. The irony is that they have some of the greatest resources off their shores. There is cod, salmon, arctic char and shrimp resources off that coast. Yet those fishermen historically have been among the most disadvantaged in Canada.

A lot has been done to improve their lot and I don't want to get into that now, but more needs to be done, particularly in terms of marketing. We must help them to market their product. The whole reason behind the Northern Fisheries Development Corporation was basically to help them mobilize their catch and to receive a better deal in the market-place.

The Minister told me yesterday that there is no guarantee that the corporation will be in place by this fishing season. He told me that the money has been reallocated somewhere else. He did tell me that he was sympathetic and that is encouraging, but I want him to be more than sympathetic. I want the Minister to give people on the northern peninsula of Newfoundland and on the coast of Labrador an assurance that he will follow through on that sympathy and that he will see that that Northern Fisheries Development Corporation is put in place, not some time in the future but this spring, before the next fishing season, because it is of paramount importance to those people. I hope the Minister will find time to consult with these people before he makes a final decision on this.

That, I think, sums up what I want to say on this Bill. It is a housekeeping Bill. It simply enshrines in law what the Department felt it could do all along. What I really want to see and what I am looking forward to is a chance to debate fisheries policy in this Chamber and in committee. Moreover, I would like a chance to see the fiscal framework of the Government so that we can put that policy into context. I would urge the Minister to bring forward that policy at the earliest possible opportunity and, of course, I would urge the Government to bring forward its fiscal statement so that we can see exactly how the dollars and cents are going to affect those of us who live and work in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member if any of these problems are new, and I believe none of them is. Since none of them is new, would the Hon. Member please explain to this House why they were not addressed when he was a member of the Cabinet; when the Crown Corporation was formed to look after the fishery; when the 200-mile limit was there and the northern resource was there? Are any of these problems new? If any of them are, would he delineate those and explain why the old ones were not addressed?

The remarks just made by the Hon. Member could very well have been taken from the debate on the Bill which created the Crown corporation. They could be taken from the remarks of Hon. Members on this side of the House when they were in opposition at the time the Bill was passed through the House and through committee. I appreciate the tone in which the Hon. Member has presented his remarks, but what is new?

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, these are excellent questions. What is new, of course, is that there has been a suggestion that unemployment insurance will be restricted. That is new. There have been cut-backs in small craft harbours allocations, particularly in the $2 million infrastructure which was to be installed at Smokey. That is new. We had agreed to it; the present Government cancelled it. The fishing vessel insurance is going to be privatized. That is new. The Government was supporting it before. There was a government scheme to insure fishing vessels, which was the old policy. The new policy is that the Government will not do that but will hand it over to private enterprise. These are all new measures.

To speak particularly to the issue of the Northern Fisheries Development Corporation, the history of it is as follows. St. Anthony in particular was always a marginal plant under Fishery Products, fueled and supplied by the inshore fishery. It always lost money. As a matter of fact, it lost so much money that Fishery Products was going to close the plant down. The Government of Canada said: "We don't want that plant to close. It is the only receiver of fish products in that area of the northern peninsula so it must not close". So the Government of Canada under the then Minister of Fisheries, Mr. LeBlanc, who comes from the same province as the Hon. Member, said that he would ask the Canadian Saltfish Corporation if it would intervene. We had a great deal of trouble because the Province of Newfoundland got very upset that there was a federal intrusion into a provincial jurisdiction. It even threatened not to issue the fish processing licence for that plant.

However, that was overcome and the Canadian Saltfish Corporation took over that plant for a year. It ran the plant well and for the first time in history it broke even. The recommendation coming out of the Kirby report was that a Northern Fisheries Development Corporation be set up. We had the previous experience of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation. We had the vehicle in place and our idea—certainly my idea—was to allow the Canadian Saltfish Corporation to operate that plant. But again, although the Government of Newfoundland signed an agreement in principle to set up a Northern Fisheries Development Corporation, it would not agree to have the Canadian Saltfish Corporation run it as such, or a subsidiary thereof. So negotiations have been going on with the Province of Newfoundland for all of that time to see if both Governments could come to an agreement as to how that corporation would be set up. I have seen nothing on paper in terms of a proposal from the Government of Newfoundland.

To answer the question directly, that is why action has not been taken. We were prepared to move. Indeed, we allocated $15 million for that particular project which, I gather now, has been reallocated to some other area or some other project. It is no longer there, although the Minister says, to give him his due, that he is sympathetic, and certainly if arrangements are concluded he will seek funds. I take him at his word. I hope that is a fair answer, Mr. Speaker, to what I believe is a very good question.

● (1740)

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, two things are not new; he has made that very clear. Number one, with respect to public insurance versus private insurance, fishermen's organizations and clubs found that they could get better coverage from private sector insurance. Yes, they did.

Mr. Rompkey: Well, you ask Richard Cashin.

Mr. McCain: I am not interested in what Richard Cashin said. You know as well as I do the attitude he has taken on various occasions. He did not support either you or this side of the House.

Mr. Rompkey: But he does represent the fishermen.

Mr. McCain: There is a club in my constituency, so I know what I am talking about, which went the private route as a group for private insurance. They got their boats insured for replacement cost, which the public Act never would grant at any time. They accepted the value of the vessel as submitted by the manufacturer and the fisherman and insured the boat for that amount at less than the cost of public insurance. As long as there is that capability in the private sector, I submit it is not very logical for the public sector to continue the insurance unless it is prepared to match rates and coverage.

Mr. Rompkey: Two different experiences. It is not the same thing.

Mr. McCain: All right, but you mentioned Cashin and he goes the club route.

Mr. Rompkey: Let's not say Cashin; let's say the Newfoundland Fish, Food and Allied Workers' Union.

Mr. McCain: I submit that if they go the club route, or the union route which Mr. Cashin is associated with, then private insurance may very well give you, as it did in my constituency, better coverage for less money.

Mr. Rompkey: That is not the track record.

Mr. McCain: That is the existing track record, my friend. You speak of what you know and let me do the same thing without argument.

The second thing is there may have been a change in the amount of money for small craft harbours, but I want to tell you it has been awfully scarce in certain constituencies under the former Government and very plentiful in others. I hope this might be changed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Would the Hon. Member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) like another comment?

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, no self-respecting politician would ever turn down the floor when it is offered by such a gracious person as yourself.

The two experiences, Mr. Speaker, are completely different. I appreciate that the Hon. Member speaks whereof he knows. I speak whereof I know, and that is what politics and representative government are all about. But the track record in Newfoundland is that there has not been that kind of support from the private sector for fishing vessel insurance at reasonable prices. The Government has provided the insurance and it is the position taken by the Fishermen's Union in Newfoundland, a very strong, powerful and large union, that this should not be changed. The Government should not depart from public support for fishing vessel insurance. To give it over to the private sector would be disastrous for people in a struggling industry at the present time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period of questions and comments is now terminated.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to place a few remarks on the record regarding Bill C-32. Before doing so I would like to say that I think that Members on both sides are very pleased with the appointment of the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser). There are great expectations all across the country because he has demonstrated in his years in this Chamber that when he takes on a task, he does it in a very sincere, honest and forthright way. I can certainly say that I have great respect for him and at the same time I have great expectations.

The matter of expectations is something I think the House has to look at in terms of Bill C-32. We have been requesting the appearance of the Minister before the committee, not only regarding Bill C-32 but also concerning the west coast salmon treaty, something which has very severe implications for some parts of my constituency and requires a great deal more evaluation than it has been given by our committee. Another matter has to do with insurance but we have not had the Minister in front of the committee on either of these issues. I know the Parliamentary Secretary is here and I am sure he would agree it would be inappropriate and inopportune to cancel the commercial fishing insurance program, and I think that is how it will stay. But again we would like to hear from the Minister.

The Government side raised the problem of small craft harbours. We would like to know why vessels under 45 feet on the East Coast do not pay any berthage fees, yet all the fishermen I represent have been told their rates are going to be doubled. If I heard the Parliamentary Secretary correctly, he has just said that the rates in British Columbia are going to be brought into line with those on the East Coast very soon and I am pleased to hear that.

There are a couple of Trojan horse clauses in Bill C-32 which I think the House has to look at much more carefully than perhaps even the Minister has looked at them so far. Looking at the purposes clause, the first part, 2.1(a), provides for the conservation and protection of fish and waters frequented by fish. I think that is reasonable and expected. Part (b) is to provide for the proper management, allocation and control of the seacoast fisheries of Canada.

There we start to see the first wording of the Trojan horse clause. We find a distinction within the purposes clause of the Bill between the seacoast fishery and the inland fisheries. I intend to spend a few moments dealing with that.

Then, of course, Part (c), which is the contentious part and a point the Minister spent some time on relating to the Collier decisions. It refers to ensuring a continuing supply of fish and to maintaining and developing the economic and social benefits from the use of fish for fishermen and others employed in the Canadian seacoast fishing industry and for others whose livelihood depends in whole or in part on seacoast fishing, and for the people of Canada. That relates directly to the two Collier decisions.

I think the Minister outlined quite well the two decisions and I would just like to put a few remarks on the record regarding them. The first case involved the Fishing Vessel Owners' Association of B.C., the Pacific Coast Salmon Seiners Association and the Prince Rupert Fishing Vessel Owners' Association, and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. In that case Mr. Justice Collier granted an injunction preventing the Department from setting separate salmon quotas for seiners and gillnetters, prohibiting the Government from allocating the resource between gear types.

Strict interpretation of the Fisheries Act would then seem to say that all groups would have equal access to stocks over an equal area. The act gives the Department the power to enforce regulations for the preservation and conservation of the resource, but not to give preference to one user group over another on either social or economic grounds. Whatever the proper wording would be to give all due deference to Justice Collier and the Federal Court, I would side with the Minister in that I do not think a constitutional challenge would be successful once the amendment was in place with that wording.

The second case involved the Gulf Trollers Association of British Columbia versus the Department. In August of last year Mr. Justice Collier upheld the Association's application to quash seven Government orders dated April 16 which permitted commercial fishing between July 1 and August 31, and at the same time allowing the sport fishers to operate year around. In effect this was allocating the resource by giving preference to one user group over another.

The Federal Court judge did not accept the Government's argument that it had federal power to manage and control the fisheries for the benefit of Canadians as distinct from preservation considerations. The April 16 variations of the total closure were, on the evidence presented by the Crown, conceived on two bases: a need for conservation, and the intention to favour the sport fishers. The conservation motive was at the ultimate expense of the commercial Gulf Trollers. The preference, the judge stated, was based on socio-economic considerations which he determined to be beyond the Department's permissible constitutional powers.

I would not want to put words into Justice Collier's mouth, Mr. Speaker, but it seems to me that what he was trying to say was that it was beyond statutory or legislative powers as opposed to constitutional. The Minister touched on the very delicate dilemma this country would find itself in if it was impossible for different Ministries, either at the federal or provincial levels or in fact at the municipal or aboriginal self-government levels, to manage the resource for social or economic reasons. I think we would have a rather chaotic Constitution which would be the same length as the Income Tax Act, some 34 feet in length, if we had constitutional debates about the ability of Parliament to pass statutes to allow the division of such things as the fishery.

• (1750)

I would like to deal with what I consider to be the Trojan horse clauses of this Bill which make it so important for the Minister to come before the committee to explain. In Clause 1 he added "portions of fish". That is quite understandable. He has also added "marine plants and portions thereof". I think that is good. There has been a debate in British Columbia as to whether the Government of B.C. can issue kelp harvesting permits and that type of thing. I think this will certainly clarify that.

Clause 2.1(d) says:

> to provide, in cooperation with the provinces, for the proper management, allocation and control of the inland fisheries of Canada.

It is quite clear from some available judgments that once you get out of tidal waters you are getting into inland waters. The Minister must tell the committee and those interested in this particular matter exactly what his intention is in bringing the provinces in in terms of "the proper management, allocation and control". I am sure many Members of the House are aware that under the west coast salmon treaty on the Fraser river there is a very specific, internationally recognized allocation of 400,000 pieces for the native food fishery on the Fraser River system. That same allocation is not found on any river system in B.C. other that the Fraser. In British Columbia we will find ourselves with a government which will not recognize aboriginal rights or title. In fact, it will not even appoint a Minister responsible for that matter.

How can discussions regarding inland fisheries possibly proceed with that kind of wording inserted? The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has a responsibility to come before the committee and explain fully why he has added that particular wording and what the implications are for negotiations regarding the native food fishery in Canada and possibly, in the future, inland commercialized fisheries of native people, which is an aboriginal right recognized in the Constitution.

I would like to discuss some of the other difficulties we are faced with, not having had the Minister before the committee. The basic problem with the Bill is that we cannot discuss these things with the Minister but must discuss them in Parliament before the public of Canada. The buy-back is crucial. The Minister is on record, as are many other Conservatives who were elected to this place, as saying that there will be a $100 million buy-back within the B.C. fishing industry this year. It is not included in the Estimates. I assume that the money will be found somewhere. Perhaps it will come from the Department of Transport or another department. We are eager to hear from the Minister where the money will come from.

The second matter is the $200 million salmon enhancement program. These amendments dovetail with the possible implications of the salmon enhancement program. This basically has to do with the division of stock on the B.C. coast and in the Maritimes of Canada, whether it be lobster, salmon, crab, oolichans, geoducks or kelp which is included in this amendment. We must have some understanding of the direction the Department is taking with these major agenda items which will have an effect on the global stock productions.

I would like to spend a moment on one of the key problems. We do not know how soon the money for the buy-back or the salmon enhancement program will come. We do not know what the implications of these clauses will be in terms of consitutional negotiations with our aboriginal people. We do not have a clear understanding of why the Minister smuggled in an amendment to paragraph 34(m) which says:

> authorizing a person engaged or employed in the administration or enforcement of this Act to vary, in respect of any area or portion thereof, any close time, fishing quota or limit on the size or weight of fish that has been fixed by the regulations.

This power is beyond anything anyone in the House has yet imagined. This is government by regulation. Someone who is hired for 30 days by DFO working out of Come-By-Chance, Prince Rupert, or Tofino could well make a sudden decision that you cannot keep Chinook under 50 pounds, or that a particular creek is going to be closed, or that lobsters cannot be taken for some particular reason. These kinds of authorizations should be far more specific and explicit rather than merely putting in a clause which allows a person working for DFO to do anything. It directly affects the income of everyone involved in the industry.

This is really the crux of the matter. We do not know about the insurance, salmon enhancement, the buy-back, the constitutional implications of the west coast treaty or of this amendment.

However, the other very serious and chronic problem of the Department with regard to the industry itself must be addressed by the House. We do not have a good enough understanding of what the maximum potential spawning yield or the maximum habitat potential of the streams is. We do not understand what the maximum return of the various wild stocks is or what the implication of adding hatchery stocks to those stocks is going to be. We do not know about these things in terms of kelp, oolichans or a lot of other species. There has not been enough time, energy or research effort put into determining what the global stocks can be. We know that they are now devastated on the East and West Coasts. We need to know how we can develop the resource and what our maximum yield and utilization can be so that we can discover what the social and economic impacts are for the different gear types. If negotiations are going to take place this year with aboriginal groups in the country, we need to know what a realistic negotiated settlement can be that can then be constitutionally protected.

In order to do that we need proper tagging programs and proper stream and creek evaluation. We need a firm understanding of the implications of major projects such as the CN twin-tracking. We will then not have to deal with the no net loss policies and the net gain because we will know where the dollars are going to be spent and what the returns are going to be much more accurately than we do now. We will not have to worry about the voodoo-like predictions of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

Fishermen often wonder whether specific areas will be open, whether they will be able to take pinks, whether the Gulf will be closed, and how many herring they will be allowed to take and what size they must be. It is treated very much like voodoo, Mr. Speaker. The fishermen on the coast do not know from day to day whether there will be a buy-back. They do not know whether there will be an opening or closing. They do not know if their insurance will be taken away.

The Department has been placed in that state of chaos by a run of Ministers who, I firmly believe, did not put the kind of energy into the Department that was required. I think that the present Minister has that potential, but he needs the support of his front-bench colleagues to get the cash. I am sure that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) will be fighting in Cabinet to ensure that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans gets that funding.

Mr. Mazankowski: What about the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Transport needs the cash too, he says. However, Fisheries and Oceans is crucial.

I will conclude my remarks by pointing out that before Parliament should consider passing this Bill, it and the Minister should appear before the committee. The Minister should explain its contents and the constitutional and statutory implications of it as related to the Collier decision. He should explain what he is going to do in the future with regard to the other issues I raised this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call it six o'clock, I would like to say to the Hon. Member that he has three minutes remaining when the Bill is presented to the House again, as well as the ten-minute question and answer period.

It being six o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Tuesday, February 26, 1985, this House stands adjourned until Friday next at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

The House adjourned at 6.01 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 21

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

ANNUAL COMMEMORATION

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in recognition of International Women's Day, a day which gives us an opportunity to pay tribute to the progress women have made collectively and individually.

Since the early 1970s when the women's movement began in earnest, women have organized and worked effectively for social and economic change. Since the early part of the century, March 8 has increasingly become a focal point for drawing attention to women's concerns.

Across Canada this week, more than 900 groups representing women from farms to cities are going beyond simply celebrating the day; they are organizing activities around issues that are so crucial to their struggle for equality.

[Translation]

This year, International Women's Day has particular significance.

[English]

Indeed, it falls in the year marking the culmination of the United Nations "Decade for Women". In July, Canada will join with other countries in a world conference on women which will be taking place in Nairobi, Kenya.

The concerns and achievements of Canadian women will be brought to the conference table and shared with women from around the world who are part of this global struggle for equality.

The concerns of women are many and varied. In Ethiopia, for example, there is the tragic famine. In many Third World nations women are plagued by poverty and illiteracy. Indeed, the needs of women in the developing world are dramatic, but the needs of women in Canada are great too.

Mr. Speaker: With great respect to the Minister, I am now in some difficulty because this is the period for 90-second statements. May I take it that the Minister was rising to seek unanimous consent of the House that we move to Statements by Ministers? Is there unanimous consent for that?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. I must advise the Minister that his 90 seconds have expired.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SITUATION OF IMMIGRANT WOMEN IN CANADA

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, on International Women's Day, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the lives of immigrant women in Canada. Many are confined to jobs in the lowest-paying industries in our country, services and manufacturing, which employ one-third of immigrant women, compared with one-fifth of all Canadian women and one-sixth of all Canadian men. Language training courses do not always fit in with their working hours, and there is a serious lack of industrial training courses.

Many of these women work in the home and are not eligible for language training because the programs are offered only to individuals who intend to enter the labour market.

There is a great deal to improve in our adjustment and training courses for immigrant women, and I think an approach based on feminine values and a more generous and humanitarian outlook would be advisable for these programs.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY—TRIBUTE TO CANADIAN WOMEN

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join my colleagues in paying tribute to women around the world and women in Canada on the 75th anniversary of International Women's Day. Women in Canada have contributed much, in building this country originally as pioneers, as farm women, as homemakers, as workers in many fields of endeavour, and as those who perhaps contributed most to the survival of families during the Great Depression, which was followed by the war. We are now in the forefront of maintaining peace as well as contributing to our social and economic well-being.

Our heritage has been enriched, particularly by the contribution of Inuit and Indian women and the different cultures and viewpoints brought by women from many countries. It has been through hard work of Canadian women that we have achieved victories such as equal pay for equal value, although much remains to be done—legislation outlawing discrimination on the basis of sex, recognition of society's contribution to children through some form of maternity benefits and, if not action, at least acknowledging the lack of truly equal opportunities and the systemic barriers facing women.

We are looking forward to really establishing equality under the Charter of Rights, with sound amendments that will benefit women and implement equality. International Women's Day is a day for reflection.

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the Hon. Member that her time has expired.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

CONCERNS OF WOMEN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, today we observe International Women's Day, a day which marks the celebration of women's rights, and honours our contribution.

For so long, women's needs and concerns were ignored and excluded from processes of government. It was only 56 years ago that women were recognized as persons under the BNA Act, and the right to vote was granted only nine years earlier. Discrimination still exists in many areas, subtle, often as a result of attitudes.

In the Speech from the Throne our new Government outlined measures aimed at redressing economic and social inequalities faced by women in our country. I am proud to say that we have made substantial progress in addressing these concerns, through amendments regarding spouses allowances, removing the discrimination against Indian women, and with the statements to be made later today on the Abella Report. In this session we anticipate changes to the Divorce Act and the establishment of a parliamentary task force on child care. These are all issues of special though not exclusive concern to women.

We know other social change must occur before women achieve full equality not only in the eyes of the law but in the councils of those who hold power in business, government, and labour.

This morning my 15-year old son said to me: "Mom, why do we have a women's day? I bet we don't have a men's day". I would like to be able to answer him within the next decade—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the Hon. Member that her time has expired.

STATUS OF WOMEN

ECONOMIC EQUALITY

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the concept of International Women's Day was first advocated on March 8, 1910, when Socialist International held a conference commemorating the strike by New York women textile workers who, on March 8, 1857, began a labour struggle to improve their working conditions. Women's Day recalls the participation of women in an event unmistakably defined as a clear intent to redress injustices experienced on the labour scene. Today, once again the emphasis is on the economic independence sought by women for years.

Men and women alike are concerned about efforts aimed at making people more aware and promoting justice and equity in our society.

With respect to the status of women, 1985 will be just as significant as 1975 if only because next July will signal the end of the Decade for Women. Women have not achieved all their objectives, but their courage, determination and efforts to stir people have given rise to a new mentality which nurtures our aspirations towards justice and equality.

Initiatives should be undertaken in order to protect our aging population, preserve future generations, and ensure employment equity.

Today we reach out to women across the world and assure them of our support in their efforts—

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

ENERGY DIVISION ELIMINATION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Government has eliminated the energy division at the National Research Council. The energy division sponsored research and development of renewable energy resources, 70 per cent of which was contracted out to the private sector. It is estimated that some 2,000 small businesses will be drastically affected by the withdrawal of research and development assistance, and that approximately 15,000 jobs will be lost. Per million dollars, invested in alternate energy, twice as many jobs are created as in fossil fuel and nuclear energy projects.

The New Democratic Party is not only concerned about this job loss, but also about the fact that the Government is so short-sighted regarding the potential for Canada's renewable energy industry on the international market. It is estimated that international sales in renewable energy, including solar, will increase from $3.5 billion in 1985 to $14.75 billion by 1990. Canada now has a fledgling solar industry which exported $4 million in photovoltaic products in 1984. Most of the products exported were developed under the guidance of the National Research Council's energy division. Technologies such as the "light pipe" super window, and photovoltaic water pumps, show considerable promise and are in high demand in developing nations around the world. This is in contrast to the CANDU reactor which is in demand nowhere.

Ironically, Canada is hosting the World Solar Conference in Montreal this June, and 2,000 delegates will see, unfortunately, that Canada has made this new type—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REQUEST FOR POLITICAL MECHANISMS TO CORRECT INJUSTICES

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil-Papineau): Mr. Speaker, today we are celebrating International Women's Day. Throughout the country, women are gathering to show their solidarity and to reflect on the themes of our major demands.

The women of Argenteuil-Papineau learned long ago to consult with each other and to solve problems together. I would like to pay tribute to their ongoing efforts in this respect.

Mr. Speaker, since women got the vote, a great deal of progress has been made. However, the fact remains that we are too often obliged to use in conjunction with the concept "rights", the terms "demands", "struggle" and "women". Mr. Speaker, it is also a fact that issues as basic as equal pay, abortion, maternity leave, day care centres, old age pensions, shelters for battered women, rape legislation and sexual harrassment are still the subject of public debate in 1985.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see all women make this a day of increased awareness of the status of women here and in other countries, in countries where women are hungry, cold and afraid. Let us hope that this 33rd Parliament will give us the political instruments we need to correct these inequities.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

TRIBUTE TO MINISTER

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to give hearty congratulations to another woman, the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier). Her initiatives in waging war on acid rain put Canada on the cutting edge of environmental protection throughout the world. This Government has attained heights in its first six months that the former government failed to achieve in 16 years.

Canadian automobiles and light trucks will be equipped with emission standards equal to the United States, effective in 1988. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) must also be given credit for his wisdom in endorsing this necessary and vital measure. For the first time in the history of this country, we have some bargaining power to seek cut-backs in the United States.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) meets with President Reagan in Quebec City on March 17 and 18, he will take with him a new mandate supported by every Canadian who fears for our fragile environment. We will reduce sulphur dioxide emissions by 50 per cent by 1994. We will provide $150 million for emission controls at smelters. We will assure $25 million is used for technological development. We will investigate increased use of low sulphur coal from western Canada. We will organize an acid rain office to co-ordinate new policy.

I advocate the reconstitution of the federal sub-committee on acid rain to monitor the progress of this war we are waging. There will be many battles before the war is won—

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATE LEVELS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, we don't seem to have much of a front bench. I see the Minister of Finance is not here.

An Hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Johnston: The Prime Minister is not here. I see the President of the Treasury Board is arriving.

An Hon. Member: What about your front bench?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, we are not the Government, and we expect the Government to be present. I must say that I am a little surprised, in view of the economic circumstances and the escalation in interest rates which we saw yesterday, that we do not have the Minister of Finance in the House. I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

We have seen the bank rate rise to just under 12 per cent. The Minister of Finance has constantly and repeatedly said that this is a temporary matter, and "wait until March". Well, we are in March.

An Hon. Member: Yes, the ides of March.

Mr. Johnston: The trend is clear. We have had six consecutive weeks of interest rate increase, and the Government steadfastly refuses to act. We have the impression that this is a Government of handwringers, that the Ministers are out there wringing their hands. That is not what Canadians thought they elected back in September of last year. The economic summit is not necessary to tell us that increasing interest rates are the most serious problem facing the economy of the country. I plead with the Government, through the Deputy Prime Minister, on behalf of home owners, farmers, fishermen, the unemployed, and small businesses, to use his good offices to ensure that action is taken immediately to stop the escalation in interest rates.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the last time I wrung my hands was when the former Finance Minister in the Liberal Government brought down his Budget.

I should like to point out to the Hon. Member that this morning we have a modest recovery in the Canadian dollar and that we have some better news on the unemployment front because the people of the country have confidence in the Government. We will see the change in interest rates for which we are all hoping.

REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the Minister of State for Finance is here. I wish they were wringing their hands, because at least they would be doing something. In fact I believe they are probably wringing their hands.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a year ago on March 20, the present Minister of Finance asked my colleague at the time, the Hon. Marc Lalonde, some questions. He said, and I quote:

> Will the Minister, on the strength of his convictions, stand up and offer his resignation if the Government's policies do not stem the slide in the Canadian dollar which today hit an 18-month low of 78.06 and was only stopped by massive intervention on the part of the Government?

I would therefore put the same question to the Minister of State (Finance). If a year ago, the resignation of Mr. Lalonde would have been appropriate, does the Minister of State believe, considering the economic situation in this country and the lack of confidence shown by the Prime Minister, that the Minister of Finance ought to offer his resignation?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps if Mr. Lalonde had resigned we wouldn't be in as big a mess as we were when we took over the Government.

The Minister of Finance has the confidence of the Canadian people. He has expressed, in the House many times, his concern over interest rates. None of us like rising interest rates. We have reflected to the other side of the House that the strength in the U.S. dollar has been unique and has affected the currencies of all western nations, including Canada. The interest rate policy of the Bank has been to pursue a moderate, stabilizing influence.

EFFECT OF INTEREST RATES

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of State for Finance tell us in concrete terms what advice she would offer the home owner whose mortgage is coming up for renewal, and the small-businessman who is basically labouring under increasing interest rates every day and is afraid to make capital investments?

• (1120)

I am not satisfied to stand here and hear this nonsense about last year, when we had one of the strongest growth records, delivered by a Liberal Government, of 4.7 per cent, and the lowest inflation rate of 3.7 per cent, better than the United States. What advice does the Minister have today to offer those people who are suffering every single day and who are not able to plan their future because of these escalating interest rates?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have expressed their confidence in the future. Small business with which we have been discussing many of our policies, has expressed its support for what we are doing about bringing down the deficit. The best thing we can do for Canadians is return an atmosphere of confidence, which we are seeing all over the country.

SPACE WEAPONRY

UNITED STATES STRATEGIC DEFENCE INITIATIVE—CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence. Yesterday we heard a plea from the Secretary-General of the United Nations that Canadians not become captive to the new nuclear technology. Today we are honouring International Women's Day. We know that no cause unites Canadian women more than their plea that Canada not contribute further to the arms race. In the spirit of those messages, I would ask the Minister of National Defence whether he thinks it is now time for the Government to reconsider its support for the U.S. star wars initiative.

In particular, because of a further apprehension raised by Mr. Nitze in Ottawa two days ago about the linkage between the radar agreement and star wars, will the Minister agree that no signing of any agreement should take place until there has been a thorough review by Members of this Parliament? Can he give us an assurance that the Government will not sign an agreement until Parliament has fully examined the conditions of that agreement?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the short answer is no. I am really surprised that the Hon. Member continues knowingly to distort the Government's position with respect to EDI, which he knows as well as the rest of us is a research project, and continues to distort, as do others, what was said by Ambassador Nitze. I am sure he will be up to date—

An Hon. Member: Read from The Globe and Mail.

Mr. Nielsen: No, I will not read from The Globe and Mail. I will read from the official news release put out by the United States embassy on March 7, where the news release speaks of the comments of Ambassador Nitze.

Mr. Waddell: Are they writing your briefing notes now?

Mr. Nielsen: It is a copy of the press release, not of my briefing notes, which the Hon. Member, if he were up to date, would have in his own possession.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: The quotation from that release is as follows:

> With regard to the upgrading of the DEW Line and its replacement with the North Warning radars, the Department can state clearly and categorically that the North Warning System being planned by Canada and the United States is not part of the Strategic Defence Initiative Program.

The Government having said that, and the United States having said that, the Hon. Member should cease this constant distortion of the actual facts.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SIGNING OF POSSIBLE CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question on the same subject to another Minister. Let me ask the Secretary of State and Minister responsible for the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, knowing as he does personally the very deep concern that women in this country have about the cause of peace, and recognizing that his colleagues are so far stonewalling any effort to have at least a parliamentary review of these major conditions, will he undertake on behalf of women in this country to represent to his colleagues the argument that there should be no agreement signed until Parliament has had the opportunity to review and determine if there are any linkages at all to the new American defence strategy as announced by Caspar Weinberger, the U.S. Secretary of Defence? Will he give us the assurance that at least he will do something about the arms race and the support the Government is giving to it?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member simply will not accept the blunt statement of facts that has been given to him, both by the Government and by the United States, that there is no linkage. Having said that, I refer to the answer that I gave to his first question. The answer is no, there is no justification for following that process now.

• (1125)

STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on the same subject. It is certainly interesting to hear Liberal Members, now that they are on the opposition side, calling for debates in the House before agreements are signed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Talk about unmitigated hypocrisy. We have just heard it.

Mr. Axworthy: Are you just a cheap-shot man?

Mr. Broadbent: I know a hypocrite when I see one.

Mr. Axworthy: I know a cheap-shot artist when I see one.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: It is the Members' time. How they use it is their choice.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would Hon. Members please let other Hon. Members ask questions? If they do not, they will not be able to ask questions.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence. He has just indicated that there is no link at all between the star wars concept, the policy of the American administration. He has indicated that the U.S. Government has specifically denied this connection.

Not many days ago Mr. Paul Nitze, a senior official of the American Government, while in this city, said that it remains to be seen, and prior to that the U.S. Secretary of Defense said that the updating of the DEW line is an integral part of the backup system for the star wars concept. How does the Deputy Prime Minister square these two statements, which do make a connection between the modernization of the DEW line and the star wars project, with the statement put out by the U.S. embassy yesterday or the day before?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, they are entirely consistent. I will show the Hon. Member, who obviously has not read a copy of this press release put out yesterday, the only inconsistency it contains. The only confusion or misconception is in the minds of the members of the Opposition and, I am afraid, also in the media. There is no linkage to the future of the SDI system. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that repeatedly, and we have a press release here which sets that out very clearly. The press release goes on to indicate:

We believe that these reports have been misleading. In responding to a hypothetical question, in Ottawa yesterday, Ambassador Nitze was merely pointing out that the President's Strategic Defence Initiative is a research project and that it is impossible at this time to predict what decisions will or will not be made at a considerably later date on any actual development or deployment.

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, it is a research project that the U.S. Secretary of Defence has said involves an inextricable link with the modernization of the DEW line. I do not care what was said yesterday. There is a conflict between what was said yesterday by the U.S. Government and what the U.S. Secretary of Defense said. We on this side of the House want clarification of that.

If the Deputy Prime Minister is so certain that there is no connection, I would ask him, in the name of democracy, and because of the seriousness of the issue, why the Government does not bring a proposed treaty before the House of Commons for debate and discussion before it is signed by the two Governments.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the difficulty is that the Hon. Member, and others who are asking similar questions, continue to refuse to accept the statements made by the Canadian and U.S. Governments.

Mr. Axworthy: Let's see it.

Mr. Nielsen: I see that the former Minister is nodding in agreement. He spoke about linkages between SDI and the North Warning System. He was a member of the Government which started the negotiations on the upgrading of an outdated system, not this Government.

Mr. Axworthy: We didn't sign an agreement.

Mr. Nielsen: I simply emphasize once again that the North Warning System, as we have said, and as the United States is saying, is being planned by Canada and the United States not as any part of a Strategic Defence Initiative's program, which is purely a research program.

● (1130)

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister has certainly proved that he can read the same statement over and over again in the House. That is encouraging.

Considering that senior officials in the United States,—and I am not denying what they have said—including the U.S. Secretary of Defense, and Mr. Nitze, have said something to the contrary, namely, that they see a linkage between the two systems, and considering that the whole world, not just Canadians, is concerned about the star wars concept, why will the Government not do the correct thing, and bring all of the proposals before the House so that we can see what the details are, before an agreement is signed?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's problem is that he continues to reject what Mr. Nitze has said, which has been verified by the United States Government.

Mr. Broadbent: No, I do not.

Mr. Nielsen: There is no conflict. There is no linkage. The North Warning System is exactly what its name implies. It is an early warning system to account for intrusions over our sovereign territory. The SDI is a research project which has no linkage whatsoever to the NWS. We have said that, the U.S. has said that, and if the Hon. Member chooses to reject that, that is his prerogative. But, I rather suspect his motives in doing that, as I do those of the former Liberal Minister.

STATUS OF WOMEN

CHILD CARE—THRONE SPEECH DECLARATION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the status of women. In light of the Throne Speech commitment to accessible and affordable child care, and the Minister's announcement that he would be consulting with his provincial colleagues on the mandate for a parliamentary task force on child care, and after five months of inaction on addressing this primary building block, where is his commitment to the principle of the right to work and effective equal access to the labour market for women?

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has raised an issue which is of importance to the women of Canada and to this Government. I am happy to report that I have been holding consultations on this matter with my provincial counterparts in recent months. As the Hon. Member knows, the delivery of child care is principally done through provincial vehicles, so without consulting the Provinces and reaching some agreement regarding the frame of reference of the parliamentary task force, the possibility of achieving what we all wish—affordable and accessible day care—would not be the outcome of the parliamentary task force. It is anticipated that my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, will announce the frame of reference for that task force in the weeks to come.

COOKE TASK FORCE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister is aware that Canada has signed the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination, and that part of that convention is the inclusion of child care services. In light of the forward move which the Minister has just announced, would he share with us the task force decisions which were made by the Katie Cooke child care task force? Will he share that information with us? If so, when will it be tabled?

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should mention to my colleague that, over the past decade, this has been an issue on the public record, and the previous Government did not distinguish itself with movement in this area.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Who set up the task force?

Mr. McLean: The task force, which was headed by Dr. Katie Cooke, will report to me at the end of this month. After a period of one month, which will be used to study the report, the report will become a base document for the parliamentary task force.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State who is responsible for the status of women. The Minister may be aware that the Jobs Action Group of the NDP caucus has met with groups across the country and that the principal recommendation coming from those hearings concerned the effect on women's employment of cut-backs in the service area—health jobs, welfare jobs, and so forth. Many women have told us that they do not want to move into the non-traditional areas, and that they want to keep their jobs because they think they are important.

Would the Minister explain if it is government policy to attack women's jobs? Is he aware of the disproportionate effect on women that restraint policies have? Is this a good policy for the status of women and for the jobs which women want?

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will know that it is quite clearly the policy of the Government, both in its job-creation programs and in its over-all direction, to see that women and other target groups will not be disproportionately affected by the necessary cut-backs. As Minister responsible for the status of women I have been in touch with my colleagues who have direct program responsibility, and I have asked them to be particularly sensitive about those implications. If there are further questions on this subject, I think my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will be able to speak to them directly as they relate to employment initiatives.

RESTRAINT POLICY INQUIRY

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Is the Minister aware of a Canadian government paper which was delivered to a UN-sponsored conference on women in the economic crisis, in Vienna, which specifically said that as Governments cut jobs or restrain wages in jobs, women would be more affected than men? Losses mean not only less women's jobs, but also less better jobs which women can get. I have also pointed out that the job-creation programs of the Government were not directed toward jobs for women, but were disporportionately directed toward jobs for men. Is it the policy to cut these jobs? If not, how will the Minister make up for the disproportionate effect which women will suffer as a result of the so-called restraint policies?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know that employment and unemployment figures are not always ones which the Hon. Member wants to hear, but I would advise her that, in actual terms, between January and February, the last month for which statistics have been reported, 61,000 more women entered the labour force. Of that number, 53,000 obtained jobs, the great majority of which were full-time jobs. That is the largest increase for some time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PENSIONS

CHAPTER 3 OF PENSION REFORM REPORT

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

During the election campaign, the Prime Minister said:

[English]

Our commitment is clear and irreversible... We are committed to the concept of a homemaker's pension within the Canada Pension Plan; we believe it is a fiscally sound proposal and will urge the provinces to give it their consent. Women should have, in their own right, a measure of future security.

[Translation]

Does that mean that this Government is going to be encouraged to implement the recommendations of Chapter 3 of the Report on Pension Reform?

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we are well aware of the statements which we made during the last election campaign, those statements being our objectives to achieve within our first mandate. The one concerning which the Hon. Member has raised a question is under review, and I would suggest that she exercise patience and allow us to get into that mandate for the purpose of achieving those objectives.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE—PENSIONS

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel-Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I must say I am rather disappointed with the answer. The House is aware that the Prime Minister will be meeting several employer and labour organizations on the twenty-second and twenty-third of this month at the National Economic Conference. Could the Minister give the House a guarantee that the subject of pensions will be put on the agenda?

[English]

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for the agenda of the national economic conference, but I can assure the Hon. Member that there will be issues of great relevance to women discussed at that conference. Certainly the question of pensions and pension reform is being discussed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare with the provinces at the present time, and indeed, in his over-all discussions. It is also on the agenda for discussion during the conference which the Minister responsible for the status of women is holding. So I can tell the Hon. Member that this Government, which is committed to moving ahead with pension reform, will be taking steps which the former Government, unfortunately, shirked.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR OUTLAWING OF TAX DISCOUNTERS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. At this time of year many women who have children are the victims of predatory tax discounters who pocket 15 per cent of an advance on the family child tax credit which poor people desperately need. That is why they go to them in the first place for an advance. Will the Minister tell us when he will introduce legislation to outlaw tax discounters and protect low-income Canadians, particularly women, from such gouging practices?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reassure my colleague by telling her that we have undertaken a consultation process, particularly with the provinces and various interest groups, and that we intend to introduce legislation in the near future. In the meantime, however, my colleague the Minister of National Revenue has speeded up the process to cushion the disastrous impact of that situation.

[English]

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals procrastinated, and now this Government is doing the same thing. We don't need more consultation. Women are going to tax discounters today. What is the point of reforming child benefits, as we are doing now in committee, if usurers take 15 per cent of the benefit? Why can the Minister not bring forward legislation right away? There is enough evidence to show that this is needed.

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I must tell my colleague that it is simply because the Government wants to consult the Canadian people and make the decisions they expect in their best interests.

TRADE

INCREASE IN EXPORTS—FREE TRADE PROPOSAL

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance and, in his absence, to the Minister of State for Finance. A recent report by Statistics Canada indicates that there is an increase of 23.4 per cent in our industrial productivity in Canada. This increase has been attributed to the fact that the United States economy has improved and we are selling it more of our goods in United States markets. Does the Minister believe that this trend is going to continue? And should we have a free trade arrangement with the United States?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reflect a little bit on some of the things which have happened. An OECD report noted recently that Canada has risen from thirteenth to seventh place among the industrialized nations.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. McDougall: We did have a $2 billion trade surplus that indicates our capability to compete, which certainly puts us in a much stronger position as we negotiate our trade relations around the world. I expect the productivity gains to continue because we are seeing an upsurge in confidence among Canadian businessmen who are going out around the world to attempt to compete even more.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REPRESENTATION OF WOMEN

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the status of women.

During the last election campaign, the Prime Minister promised to increase up to 30 per cent the representation of women on boards of directors, commissions, agencies and Crown corporations. What did we get? Few if any women have been appointed as executive assistants or Deputy Ministers, and women account for only 5 per cent of all Government appointments to key positions.

Can the Minister explain to the House why women are one of the minor concerns of the Government, contrary to the claims made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign?

[English]

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in response to the Hon. Member I would like to remind her that, of the recent changes in senior personnel within the Public Service, 20 per cent of those appointments went to women, which is a beginning of a process. I would like also to assure the Hon. Member that, in the process of cabinet appointments, this is a high priority, and in the months which lie ahead the Government will be announcing a number of key board appointments. This morning I met with key managers in the Public Service Commission, from across the Departments, in order to affirm to them the importance the Government places on the elevation of women into key managerial positions.

EDUCATION

FUNDING OF POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS—EFFECT ON WOMEN

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Secretary of State responsible for the status of women and for post-secondary education. Does the Minister realize that the enormous cuts in education which are taking place across the country have a particularly adverse effect on women? Does he also realize that the approximate $100 million which was slashed from post-secondary education in British Columbia is in direct violation of a moral commitment to spend the money from the federal Government on post-secondary education? When is the Minister going to make it possible to ensure that federal transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education are spent on post-secondary education in the provinces?

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in response to the Hon. Member who shares the concern of myself and this Government for the viability of Canada's post-secondary institutions, let me assure her that I have been meeting with the Ministers of Education from across the country. I have now had three meetings with them in an effort to come to a consensus regarding the funding of post-secondary education. It is my intention, and the intention of this Government, to go back to the drawing board with the provinces in order that the concerns which are reflected by university administrations, faculty, and students, are addressed in the funding which is made available from the levels of government.

LEVEL OF PROVINCIAL EXPENDITURES

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, these continuing consultations are too late for the President of the University of British Columbia. He has resigned in despair at the situation in that province because the federal Government will not speak out. When will the Minister not only carry on these consultations but publicly denounce the fact that the provinces, particularly British Columbia, do not spend the money intended for education, on education? When will the Minister speak out publicly on this issue? And when will he present to this House of Commons the kind of goals and standards for education which we think a Minister in his position should be able to espouse?

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, through you to the Hon. Member, I might remind her that, in her selective memory of the circumstance, she may have forgotten that it was the amendment of this Party in opposition to Bill C-12 which sought to bring about the accountability in terms of the financial transfers which are made, which was not there in the agreements which were laid out.

Ms. Jewett: It's absolutely toothless.

Mr. McLean: It is our intention now, in the discussions with the provinces, to bring about a sense of accountability for future arrangements.

EXTERNAL AID

SUDAN—FOOD CRISIS—CANADIAN ASSISTANCE

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for External Relations. Will the Minister advise the House what response the Government will make to the food crisis in the Sudan, exacerbated as it has been by so many Ethiopian refugees? In particular, will the Minister tell us if the Government intends to appoint any full-time officials to protect such a Sudan relief program from the kind of abuse suffered in Ethiopia?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. We had appointed a co-ordinator last fall and, at the same time, established an emergency fund for Africa. I might point out that Ethiopia has been one of our concerns and the emergency fund was intended as well to cover food assistance for Sudan. Mr. MacDonald just came back from Sudan and is expected to produce a report which will likely recommend assistance to meet the new needs in Sudan.

GOVERNMENT AID—BÉCANCOUR

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. As the House is aware, we have been trying for two weeks to persuade the Government to assist the Domtar project in Quebec in order to ensure the continued existence of thousands of jobs, and we are still waiting. Instead of reacting positively to our request, the Government is now depriving another region of Quebec, Bécancour, by refusing to finance or assist the oxysynthesis project, despite the fact the project has been approved by the Foreign Investment Review Agency and is a development priority for the Government of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to know when the Government is going to find its feet and whether the Minister can inform the House whether workers in Bécancour can count on the Government's assistance in carrying out this major industrial project in a region that has a pressing need for such projects.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as far as information on the oxysynthesis project is concerned, I can inform the Hon. Member that I will make sure his question is passed on to my colleague, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, who will be able to give him a more detailed explanation than I am able to do this morning.

Regarding his long preamble to the question about Domtar, I think my hon. friend is well acquainted with the Government's position and that he knows perfectly well the Prime Minister is meeting the Premier of Quebec on this very day and that this particular subject is on the agenda. Furthermore, I think the Hon. Member is also aware the Government has indicated that, aside from the direct subsidy suggestion, it is prepared to support other options that might be discussed with respect to the Domtar project.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister whether the Government is finally going to bring in a consistent regional development policy instead of proceeding by means of decisions that are haphazard, arbitrary and ignore the provinces' priorities. Are we finally going to see where the Government stands and what its criteria are for regional development? It is extremely important for Canadians to know this, and the oxysynthesis project is a case in point.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the Hon. Member's comments, one would almost think this is his first time in the House since a new Government was elected.

He says we are ignoring provincial priorities and industrial development. We have just signed a number of agreements, including a general agreement worth $1 billion with Quebec and subsidiary agreements on industrial, tourism, agricultural and forestry projects with Newfoundland. Is this neglecting the provinces' priorities? We have an industrial development strategy based on the creation of permanent jobs, instead of the makeshift programs for creating temporary jobs that we have had during the last ten years.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT DECISION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex-Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the same Minister on the same subject. As Member for Windsor, albeit Windsor in Ontario, I am interested in the Domtar file. This week, as it happened, the same decision was made concerning the oxysynthesis project as in the case of Domtar. We need to have an explanation now about the Government decision which might strike a blow to Quebec's economy and about which the Progressive Conservative Member for Richelieu was not informed. Why did the Government take that decision?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I must give my colleague the same answer to the same question asked by my other colleague. I will convey it to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion the moment he gets back, and he will undoubtedly be able to provide satisfactory explanations and say why a grant request for a project was turned down, in all likelihood in accordance with the specific standards of the program under which the grant application was filed.

Mr. Speaker: A very short supplementary.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, you cannot go on governing from Bangkok.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex-Windsor): Will the Minister tell us why the Government had made a decision to protect a foreign company, Dupont, at the expense of jobs and income in Quebec? Why did the Government make that decision?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is reaching conclusions which are very far from the topic at hand. I do not see how he can affirm, with such categorical and definite statements, that that decision in any way deals with any other than the question at hand, that of the request for a grant or subvention to the firm in question in Quebec.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIME FARMERS' REQUEST FOR AID

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I will direct my question to the Minister responsible for the Treasury Board. As the Minister well knows, the pay-out under the Western Grain Transportation Act is approximately $600 million. Under the Western Grain Stabilization Program the pay-out is approximately $600 million annually.

My question is with regard to fairness. The farmers in the Maritime region of Canada are requesting a mere $13.5 million because of the emergency situation with which they are now confronted. Does the Minister think it is fair that there has been no action on that particular file?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the question is under very active consideration by the Minister of Agriculture. Knowing my colleague to be a very fair man, I can assure the Hon. Member that the solution will be equally fair.

TIMING OF DECISION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Estimates that the Minister has placed before the House of Commons with regard to the high expenditures in the Prime Minister's office, and a host of other expenditures, would the Minister agree to give the House an undertaking to have a decision by March 15 so that the farmers in the Maritime region will be able to set their economic agenda for the rest of the year?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, sometimes my Estimates are too high, sometimes they are too low. They are all over the map. However, I can assure the Hon. Member that the decison on those matters will be made as soon as possible to ensure—

Mr. Tobin: Timely.

Mr. de Cotret: Timely is a very good word. It will be made in a timely manner to ensure that the farmers in that part of the country are aware of the situation they are facing.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SEVERANCE PAY MEASURES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Severance pay to be used against unemployment insurance benefits will come into effect on April 1 of this year. The NDP task force on jobs travelled around the country and discovered that many people are appalled at this change. Will the Minister tell the House whether she is prepared to reconsider the implementation of such a program on April 1? Will she, in fact, postpone it?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, notice of these changes was given in the economic statement by the Minister of Finance on November 8. At that time I undertook to consult with Member of Parliament, including the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt. I then received representations to postpone the introduction of these measures until certain dates. On December 21 I announced that they would be phased in over a period of time, beginning on April 1. That decision stands, having been assisted, I may say, with advice of Members in the opposition Parties.

PURPOSE AND TREATMENT OF SEVERANCE PAY

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Minister that we on this side of the House advised her that there is a very important principle involved in severance pay. Is the Minister now prepared to comment on, and will she accept, the principle that severance pay in fact has nothing to do with labour given in an employer-employee relationship, and that it in fact is to make up for the hurt to the employee when he is laid off?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the measures that I announced take into consideration that, under the Unemployment Insurance Act, severance pay and pensions will be treated as income in connection with unemployment insurance, like every other kind of income.

Mr. Rodriguez: There is a principle involved.

HOUSING

RRAP PROGRAM FUNDING

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, unless we receive clarification this morning, Canadians can only come to the conclusion that they have been misled with respect to RRAP cuts. My question is for the Minister responsible for CMHC. On November 8 the Minister of Finance announced RRAP cuts of 25 per cent, or $29 million for fiscal year 1985. In fact the cuts range from 45 per cent in the Province of New Brunswick to 11 per cent in the Province of Ontario, for a national average of 36 per cent and a savings in excess of $50 million across the country. Will the Minister confirm those figures? Can he explain the massive disparity in cuts among the regions, under the RRAP Program?

• (1200)

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not confirm the figures that the Hon. Member has used, because they are inaccurate. He is correct in his first assumption that there was a reduction of RRAP announced in the economic statement of November 8. I am sure Members of the House are aware that that reduction occurred because of financial necessity when we took over government from the Party which the Hon. Member represents.

I would also inform the Hon. Member that, if he compares the needs-based study, and removes the special allocation, sometimes called "election year allocation", for RRAP with respect to certain regions in Canada, he will find that across Canada the reduction will be of the order established in the Minister's economic statement.

Mr. Speaker: A short supplementary.

NON PROFIT CO-OP SOCIAL HOUSING

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I note that those numbers were from his office this morning. Will the Minister also confirm that the Government is totally abandoning RRAP assistance worth $5,000 per unit to non profit co-op social housing, housing that is particularly important to senior citizens in the inner cores of our country's cities? I will tell the Minister before he answers that I got that information from his office as well this morning. There are zero dollars in the budget for non profit social co-op housing, housing that is important to senior citizens.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I find it strange that the Hon. Member alleges that he already has answers to these questions but puts them anyway. I would inform the Hon. Member that Section 56(1) with respect to non-profit and social housing—

Mr. Tobin: There is no money.

Mr. McKnight: The Hon. Member says there is no money. I can assure the Hon. Member that this Government's reductions will be considerably less than the 43 per cent by which his Government reduced funding under Section 56(1), particularly to those in the co-op housing field.

CLERK OF PETITIONS' REPORT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petitions presented by Hon. Members on Wednesday, March 6, 1985, meet the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

EQUALITY IN THE WORKPLACE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, today is a landmark for this Government and indeed for all Canadians. Today we are taking a major step: we are opening doors to opportunities and to equality in the workplace.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I am sure that Members of the House will know of my long-standing commitment to equality. They will know that I have long dedicated my energies to the issues that I address today.

[Translation]

That is why I have the rare privilege of rising in the House to announce the measures this Government will take in response to the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Equality in Employment.

[English]

In her report which I tabled in November, Judge Rosalie Abella coined the phrase "employment equity". That phrase is short and simple but it singularly expresses the goal of this Government in promoting equal opportunities for women, for native people, for disabled persons and visible minorities—promoting equity in the workplace.

There are some plain facts that face us in this country today. It is a fact that women, on average, earn only 64 cents for every dollar earned by men. Fully 77 per cent of women are found in only five of the 22 major job categories, those at the bottom of the salary scale. It is a fact that the recently released study Who Gets The Work pointed out that "whites have three job prospects for every one for blacks". Fact: among employable disabled persons, 50 per cent are unemployed. Fact: in many native communities unemployment is higher than 70 per cent.

As a country, we cannot afford to exclude these Canadians from full participation in the workplace. We need their contribution to the economic renewal and the growth of this country. In the past, lip service has been paid to the concept of equality in the workplace. It has been talked about, studied and worried about. What we need is action. That is what I am announcing today.

This Government will require Crown corporations, federally regulated businesses and contractors providing goods and services to the federal Government to implement employment equity. Crown corporations will be required to report annually to Parliament on their plans and progress, beginning in 1986. Federally regulated businesses with 100 or more employees will be required by legislation to report annually to Parliament on their plans and progress with a three-year phasing in period to establish the necessary information and data systems.

Businesses seeking Government contracts for goods and services of $200,000 or more will have to show their compliance or stand to lose their right to compete for government business.

[Translation]

The approach we have chosen will enable companies to develop plans compatible with their individual needs. There will be no major administrative costs or unnecessary and heavy-handed intervention.

[English]

We are not creating a massive bureaucratic enforcement agency and we will not impose an unwieldy set of rigid procedures. Instead, we will draw on the energies and inventiveness of employers in removing barriers that now stand across the path of visible minorities, of women, disabled persons and native people. The means are flexible but the goal is fixed: employment equity.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, for the first time, disclosure of the results obtained will be compulsory. For the first time, all information will be made public. Public scrutiny will be a precious tool since it will provide an incentive for obtaining genuine and tangible results.

[English]

With this information in hand, the powers and authorities of the Human Rights Commission can be properly exercised. When action is needed to ensure equity in the workplace, action will be taken.

The Government will be discussing these measures in the next few weeks with representatives of visible minorities, business, women, disabled persons, labour and native people. We will be telling them, as I am informing the House today, that this Government is committed to action and that we expect results.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Equally important, we will be seeking their views on legislative measures to be introduced into the House by June of this year.

With regard to equal pay for work of equal value, the Government must first set its own house in order and this has not been done. We are committed to doing so. To that end my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret), is inviting the Pubic Service unions to join us in developing an implementation plan for equal pay for work of equal value. I understand that he expects their preliminary report by June 30 of this year.

In total, the measures I have announced today will touch the working environment of over one million Canadians. This is a first and major step but I do emphasize that it is only the first step. We will not be satisfied until the goal—the concept of fair access and equal opportunities for advancement—is a reality from coast to coast, from the shipyard to the assembly line, to the corporate boardroom. We will remove the barriers that restrict the economic future of so many Canadians. Our economic development, the development of this country, depends on and demands the full participation of all. Give Canadians real opportunities and they will get the jobs. Give them the jobs and they will create wealth. Generate wealth and there will be economic growth, and economic growth will develop more jobs.

• (1210)

[Translation]

Jobs in all sectors of industry, in companies large and small. I would like to add at this point that small- and medium-sized businesses will not be obliged to comply with the measures announced today. However, we are confident that they too will implement employment equity measures since they are also anxious to reap the benefits of increased productivity.

[English]

The few people in business, Sir, who indeed have already adopted employment equity have told me that they have seen substantial growth in their productivity, in their profits and most importantly in their people. The value of investment, not just in plants and machinery but in people, was clearly recognized at the First Ministers' conference in Regina. There we embarked on an entirely new approach to labour market development. Fundamental to the new direction that was taken at that time is equity. Fair access for all Canadians to new training and new employment opportunities. This strategy will tackle head on the problem of trapping minorities in employment ghettoes. We will tackle head on the critical problem of job re-entry for women.

The measures I am announcing today in response to the Abella report will join those efforts announced earlier in a comprehensive attack on barriers to equity in the workplace. These measures are a major step forward in the progress of economic renewal. More than that, this is a step forward in the pursuit of economic justice. It is a step that will help to ensure that the benefits of growth and renewal will be shared by all Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: This is another step toward a better future for Canada, a future of opportunity, a future of equal opportunity.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, as the employment critic for the Liberal Party, it is my responsibility to comment on the statement just now made by the Minister in the House, a statement which she alleges to be, and we agree, on a very important subject. I must tell you, however, Mr. Speaker, that I am not able to make the comments that are required because, contrary to all practice and contrary to the promise of the Minister, I did not receive the statement until 11.15 a.m. after the Question Period had started.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Allmand: The Minister had promised to let me have that statement at nine o'clock this morning, and I had set aside the full morning to examine it so I would be prepared for this reply. It did not arrive at 9.30 a.m., it did not arrive at 10.00 a.m., it did not arrive at 10.30 a.m.; it arrived after the Question Period had started.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: That Party talks about parliamentary reform. What a farce that is! The Government has a majority. It has 211 seats to 70 in the Opposition, yet the Government stacks the deck on every occasion against the Opposition.

Mr. Foster: Dirty pool.

Mr. Allmand: The Government talks about wanting to have better debates in this House, yet the Government did not deliver the document, the basis of the debate, until Question Period had started and we were occupied with other things.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McLean: Where were you this morning—

Mr. Allmand: I was here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McLean: Where were you this morning when we wanted unanimous consent?

Mr. Allmand: We would not give that unanimous consent because the Government did not produce the document that was to be discussed.

Worse still—and I want to give you notice, Mr. Speaker, of a question of privilege—this document was delivered to the press before it was delivered to Members of Parliament. I checked that. The Government could get the document to the press but the Government could not get the document to Members of Parliament.

Mr. Foster: That is trampling on Parliament.

Mr. Allmand: That is the real attitude the Government has to Parliament. The rest is rhetoric and media politics. That is all we get out of that Government.

With respect to the statement, we cannot, as I said, give the subject matter the attention it should have at this time. There are, however, some forward steps in the statement. We are pleased for those forward steps. They are the fruition of what was begun by the former Liberal Government in passing the Human Rights Act, sometimes against opposition on the other side, and in bringing in the Charter of Rights, in particular the equality sections that will go into effect on April 17.

When the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) appointed Judge Abella to carry out this commission, the initiative was indicative of the Goverment of Canada's commitment to increase the employability and productivity of disadvantaged groups. The commission of inquiry was to examine and report on ways to assist women, native people, disabled individuals and visible minorities to compete on an equal basis for employment opportunities. The Member also stated on that occasion that the elimination of systemic discrimination is essential to ensure that there is full participation of all Canadians in the public and private sectors. The growth of the Canadian economy depends on such participation. That was when the Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry appointed Judge Abella to carry out that commission on July 27, 1983.

Despite the fact that there are some positive steps announced by the Minister this morning, the document falls short of what Judge Abella recommended and it falls short of the promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Conservative Party during the election campaign.

I have read the statement quickly. Some parts are vague and will need much clarification. We will be asking for some clarification this morning during the question period that follows.

One of the main points that Judge Abella makes in her report was that voluntary action was not working and we needed legislation.

Let us examine what the Minister has announced. She says that Crown corporations will be required to report annually to Parliament on their plans and progress beginning in 1986. But in another document which the Minister of Employment and Immigration gave us at the last minute, she says there will be no legislation.

Miss MacDonald: We don't need legislation.

Mr. Allmand: I am interested in knowing how the Minister intends to oblige the Crown corporations to do what she wants them to do. I would like to know what the sanctions are, and why she did not bring in legislation such as Judge Abella had recommended. In addition, Judge Abella recommended that this reporting apply to Crown corporations and federal agencies. There is no mention of the federal agencies in the Minister's statement.

With respect to federally-regulated business, and this includes Bell Telephone, Canadian Pacific Railway, the companies that come under the federal Goverment's jurisdiction for labour purposes, the Minister says that federally-regulated businesses with 100 or more employees will be required, in this case by legislation, to report annually to Parliament on their plans and progress with a three-year phasing in period.

The Minister says elsewhere that this applies only to 800 out of 4,500 companies. There is no explanation. We would want to know why only 800. I would also want to know what the sanctions are if the wishes ofthe Government are not adhered to.

With respect to contract compliance, the Minister says that businesses seeking government contracts for goods and services of $200,000 or more will have to show their compliance or stand to lose their right to compete for government business. Again, I am interested as to whether there will be legislation or will it be done by administrative action? The Minister said it would only apply to 100 companies. Members opposite are laughing; they do not pay much attention to Judge Abella. They should read the report. Judge Abella said that legislation was required. I am anxious to hear the Minister's answers. For example, why only 100 companies? The Minister rejects outright Judge Abella's recommendation for a monitoring agency. There are no reasons given. She calls it a massive bureaucratic enforcement agency, but it does not have to be massive and bureaucratic. It can be an effective enforcement agency under one of the options set out by Judge Abella. We do not have very much on that either.

● (1220)

In her statement the Minister said that it was time for action. While she has given us some steps forward, there are many areas which are vague and appear to be in the voluntary sphere rather than provided through legislation. I do not understand that, and I think we would all like answers.

She will discuss further with representatives of visible minorities, businesswomen, the disabled and so on. I thought she was to do that before making the statement.

With respect to equal pay for work of equal value, she says the Government must first put its own house in order. The Prime Minister categorically promised to bring in legislation on that in the women's debate during the election campaign. If its house had to be put in order, what has happened? Government Members bragged the other day about being in office for six months. Why were they not doing that? The Minister says that they need action now, but she keeps putting it off.

We all have some specific questions to ask. Not only our employment critic should have had the right to look at the statement in advance; we have critics for the handicapped, the Hon. Member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille); for women, the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone); for multiculturalism, and who is also responsible for visible minorities, and for native people. None of them has had a chance to look at this statement. What kind of debate can we have?

Mr. Nunziata: She gives it to the press.

Mr. Allmand: Yes, she gives it to the press.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We made the mistake of giving it to you.

Mr. Allmand: You did not give it to me. Live up to your commitments. I got it at 11.15 am. You would have been the first person in the last Parliament to complain of that kind of treatment. My colleagues who are specialists in various fields have many questions on this statement.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Minister for providing me with a copy of the statement at about 10.30 a.m.

Mr. Allmand: Why the discrimination?

Mr. Nystrom: We can say that the real Opposition got the report on time.

Employment

We have had a statement this morning on the Government's response to the Abella report. My first reaction has to be that the Government has stolen the words of Judge Abella but not the substance of the report. The Government across the way has a mandate to act or enforce what Judge Abella is saying, but I think it has chosen not to act in a substantive way. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) had said that it should be done in the federal Government, Crown corporations and the private sector, with his mandate we could have employment equity, we could have equal pay for work of equal value, we could have all the things about which Judge Abella talked in her report.

[Translation]

As I said in English, they have stolen the words of Judge Abella, but they completely forgot the practical aspects of the report.

[English]

The first thing is employment equity. We find in the Government's statement this morning that there is no enforcement, outside of a voluntary appeal and lots of good words that there should be employment equity in the country. It is one thing to have rhetoric but it is another thing to have some real enforcement for the women and the minorities to whom the report refers—the visible minorities, the native people of Canada and the disabled. I ask the Minister and the Government: Where are the goals in her statement for employment equity? Where are the targets in her statement for employment equity? Where is the timetable in terms of imposing employment equity? Where are the sanctions? How can we have something without sanctions? Where is the enforcement mechanism? In the report of Judge Abella three or four different ways were outlined to enforce employment equity. Where are the enforcement mechanisms which are so necessary for this to work?

When it comes to enforcement, Judge Abella said that the voluntary mechanisms would not work and that we needed a mandatory mechanism. On page 195 of the report the following appears:

> A voluntary program which a mandatory reporting requirement is nonetheless voluntary in the absence of a requirement to remedy the discriminatory practices disclosed by the information reported.
> A requirement of public reporting may result in public pressure on a company to revise its systems but it is unrealistic to rely on public opinion as an effective monitoring agent. It results in a speculative and scattered approach and creates the perception, in the absence of enforcement, that the issue is deserving of only casual attention.

If we are to have employment equity in the country, we need an enforcement mechanism to ensure that it occurs. We have had a lot of good will and good words in the past. People have said that we could do this in a voluntary sense, but it just has not happened. This is why we need some enforcement.

As I said before, the Minister has stolen the words of Judge Abella, not the substance of her report. Also the Minister mentioned in her statement the importance of publishing information, making public all kinds of information. That in itself is not enough.

We, in this country, have often looked into the situation of Canadian women, native women, visible minorities and the handicapped, with much publicity throughout the land. Judge Abella has produced a good report with many recommendations, and I agree with most of the recommendations denouncing inequality, inequity towards Canadian women, the handicapped, native people or other visible minorities here in Canada.

But what we need now, Mr. Speaker, is action. The time has come to do something in Canada. The Minister borrowed the words of Judge Abella, Mr. Speaker, but she forgot the practical aspects of the judge's report.

[English]

The fourth point I want to make this morning concerns the whole question of equal pay for work of equal value. In her statement this morning the Minister talked about the dismal record of the country in this particular area. Of course, I agree with her. I think we should look at her statement very carefully. She refers to the federal Government only, that she wants to rectify this situation in the Public Service. There is a bit of a timetable in her statement. The Government will enter into a consultative process to bring about the whole principle of equal pay for work of equal value. However, there is nothing in her statement for Crown corporations. There is nothing at all pertaining to the private sector when it comes to this very important question. There is nothing at all when it comes to government purchasing, and the Government purchased several billions of dollars worth of goods and services every year.

It is fine to apply the principle only to the federal Public Service, but what about the other areas that are so important? The Government has an important mandate. If the Prime Minister gives the word, I am sure he would have co-operation to implement the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, not only in the Public Service but in Crown corporations, in government purchasing and in the private sector. I suggest to the Minister that the Government should act according to that principle and sentiment.

As the Minister has said, there is tremendous discrimination against visible minorities in the country, such as black Canadians who are faced with real difficulties, as we discovered the other night in Toronto, finding jobs as compared with white Canadians. Also we find that about 50 per cent of the employable disabled people and 70 per cent or more of Indian and Métis people are without jobs. Because those figures are so harsh and real, the Minister should apply the principle across the board. We need more than just words and rhetoric; we must apply the principles which Judge Abella recommended in her report.

In the last while the action group of my Party met with disabled Canadians. There was a very moving example in Halifax about a month ago when we were told by an organization of disabled Canadians about the need for contract compliance, affirmative action and employment equity for disabled Canaians. We were told that disabled Canadians tended to be the forgotten people in our country and were discriminated against greatly when seeking jobs.

The Minister did not deal adequately in her statement this morning with the question of government purchasing. In this area she is being very timid and is taking a Mickey Mouse approach. She says the government purchasing section applies to around a hundred companies in the country. Judge Abella says in her report at page 227 that in 1980 the Canadian Government purchased goods and services from between 25,000 and 30,000 companies, worth $6.5 billion to the private sector, and an additional $5.5 billion worth went to Crown corporations. That was around $12 billion back in 1980. As I say, there are between 25,000 and 30,000 companies involved, and all this compliance will apply to is the 100 largest companies in this country. She could be a lot more bold than that.

• (1230)

There is another important point, Mr. Speaker, and that is training. In Regina two or three weeks ago, and I was there with the Minister for the First Ministers' Conference, the Minister announced a training program for Canadians which unfortunately allocated only 17 per cent of its funding for Canadian women and Canadian youth. Funding for other groups mentioned in the Abella Report was not very generous either, and I am thinking of native people, visible minorities and the disabled.

[English]

Once again that is an example where the Minister is very long on rhetoric but very short when it comes to substance.

Another area is the whole question of child care. Yesterday this Party had an opportunity to meet with about 15 or 16 women's groups from across the country here in Ottawa. One thing they mentioned time and time again was that if we are to have equality and equity for the women of Canada, we must provide adequate day care and child care services. We heard from the Prime Minister during the campaign the promise to put a lot more dollars into child care in Canada. What have we had since? We only have the promise of another study. We tend to study, study, study. I say to the Minister that the time for study is rapidly ending and the time for action is now approaching. We have a comprehensive study and a lot of specific recommendations. How about implementing some of those recommendations on child care?

We can have employment equity in this country. We can have employment equity for the four groups mentioned in this report. We can have employment equity just as we have employment equity now for Francophones in the Public Service.

[Translation]

And I agree with this affirmative action program for Francophone women, and I am sure all Parties in the House will agree, Mr. Speaker, but we could do exactly the same thing for the other groups mentioned in this report.

[English]

We must, as I said before, have enforcement. Without enforcement, we are not going to have any action at all, or very little. In the United States, where there are some mandatory laws, it has been found, first, that it improves equality for minority groups and improves equality for women; and, second, it has made those particular industries more productive in the United States. I suggest that the same wouldhappen in the country.

We can and must have goals, targets, opportunity and more money for training and child care. In conclusion, we must give the people of this country an opportunity. We must give them equality. We must give them the tools to build a new country, a new vision for Canada where everybody will be put back to work and we will become a nation of producers. Putting Canada back to work will mean more fairness for every Canadian, more opportunities for every Canadian, more fairness for one and all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The period for speeches is now over. Questions?

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister.

The Abella Report contains at least fifty recommendations on training, especially language training for immigrants and for women who work in the home. I wonder whether, considering the Abella Report's recommendations, the Minister could negotiate new agreements with the provinces on second language teaching, either French or English, for courses for women working in the home which would of course require some financial arrangement for babysitters, in any case for the whole language training issue. Mrs. Abella mentions the subject in at least fifty recommendations. I wonder whether the Minister could give us her views on the subject today and let us know where the Government is going and whether she intends to introduce a definitive policy, with the co-operation of the provinces, for setting up these language training programs.

[English]

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) for his question. A number of recommendations have been made in the Abella report with regard to l'information, the training area. These have all been taken into the ongoing review—and Regina was the first step of it—of training and job creation being conducted by my Department. Some of that will have to be developed with regard to training for native people, for example, with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie). There will be other areas which touch directly on programs relating to the Secretary of State (Mr. McLean), and this will be developed with him. The fact is that the whole thrust of training as agreed to at Regina is being worked out now on a federal-provincial basis. One thing that impressed me in Regina was the fact that there was co-operation in this field by the First Ministers of the provinces. I look forward to seeing that continued.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister why she has not dealt with the whole question of part-time work. As she knows only too well, the large majority of part-time workers, some 72 per cent a couple of years ago, are women. We recently found that Crown corporations, Air Canada being the prime example, are trying to press for unlimited part-time jobs in their contracts. This will be targeted particularly at women. Women who have been employed full-time will be forced into part-time jobs without adequate benefits. They will not have adequate chance for all kinds of opportunities, for example, job improvement and training, such as they would have with a full-time job. Why are part-time workers not mentioned? This is vital. What is she going to do about part-time workers as far as employment equity is concerned?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, there is no exclusion of part-time workers from this report. The approach that has been taken is looking at ways in which Crown corporations, federally-regulated businesses and those businesses having contract compliance will develop their employment equity plans to meet their needs. That includes part-time workers. It does not exclude them. I want the Hon. Member to know that.

I would also like the Hon. Member to recognize that in the agreements that were arrived at in Regina she may have noticed that there was one area where the federal Government committed something in the vicinity of $100 million for innovation. That is an area where I hope progress can be made with regard to flexible work hours, part-time, child care structures, all of this.

Ms. Mitchell: We want full-time, not part-time.

Miss MacDonald: The Hon. Member does not recognize that I mentioned flexible work hours and part-time workers. All of this will be dealt with in that field as well, but it will be interrelated.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would begin by congratulating the Minister on making the announcement in the House. I listened to the critic from the Liberal Party. I was critic on behalf of the Opposition for over four years. On one occasion and one occasion only was an announcement made in the House. The common practice was for me to have a good day when I could pick up the actual announcement within 24 hours after the announcement was made somewhere else in the country. The average was close to two days. So we are in good shape.

The thrust of what the Minister said in the House today is that we are going to get employment equity in this country that its sensitive to local communities, sensitive to local aims of government and their function, sensitive to local businesses and the functions they perform in the local community. Am I correct in drawing the conclusion that this is a program that will be really sensitive to all the differences between communities and businesses in the country?

• (1240)

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, not only this major step that we took today but the announcement that was made in Regina emphasized that the thrust of the Government will be toward recognizing local issues, local needs, regional disparities and regional differences. I know the critic for the New Democratic Party has said in the discussions he is having across the country with many of the people to whom I spoke that decentralization from Ottawa is definitely needed in this field. This would place more self-reliance on individuals, organizations and communities. That is the whole thrust of the Government's new labour market strategy and of today's announcement.

I should also tell the Hon. Member that in sending the preliminary material to the official critics of the opposition Parties, I was assured by both offices that it had arrived before Queston Period.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, perhaps one of the things to which the Minister can address herself is her concept of the purpose of Parliament and her idea of allowing an opportunity for people to debate the issues. What is the purpose of making a statement in the House of Commons when the Official Opposition has no chance to respond to that statement? Something of such moment and importance as the Abella report which deals with four very important groups about which this Parliament is concerned and wishes to give them their dignity and human rights is brought up on a Friday. I would think that this would be a matter of great importance to this Parliament.

Members of the Official Opposition had not been given notes or information about the statement until it had been made. The statement was brought before the press before it was brought before us. As the Opposition critic for issues affecting the handicapped and as the deputy critic for issues affecting minority groups and visible minorities, I feel that that is a deprivation of my opportunity to get the information I think I ought to have in order to be able to approach this question.

Mr. Keeper: Come back tomorrow.

Mr. de Corneille: Tomorrow is Saturday. Members of the NDP should look at their calendars.

This issue is something which requires some concern.

Ms. Mitchell: Let's get at the issue.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. de Corneille: There is a great deal of noise coming from my left side where Members of the NDP sit.

One of the promises that was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) during the election campaign was that he would in fact bring in those recommendations contained in Sections 26 and 27 of the report entitled Obstacles. That report made recommendations that required legislation and compulsory action on the part of the Government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. I would ask the Hon. Member to put his question to the Minister, this being a question period. The Hon. Member's preamble has well exceeded the usual time allotted for the asking of a question. Would he please put the question to the Minister?

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, the question is related to the promise made by the Prime Minister that the limit for government contracts would be $20,000. Unless the Minister made an error in reading her script, she seemed to indicate that the level at which a contract must be before there will be some concern on the part of the Government regarding asking a private sector organization to comply with these requirements will be $200,000. That seems to be 10 times the amount mentioned by the Prime Minister. Will the Minister be satisfied with this promise—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. I now recognize the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald).

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member began by asking what I thought Parliament was for. I think it is for discussing issues such as this. That is why I have taken the time to make this statement in the House of Commons. That did not normally happen when the Liberal Government was in office.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: As the Hon. Member perhaps heard, I have also announced that there will be legislation coming before Parliament on these issues. I would trust that he would be here to debate those issues and discuss and study this legislation when it goes to committee. I would also say that reports were sent to the employment critics of the House of Commons. I am the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I am not responsible for other areas. Therefore, I sent the announcement to the official critics.

The Hon. Member wanted to know about the $200,000 limit with regard to contract compliance. I can tell him that that affects 100 of the largest companies. In total, private companies do something in the vicinity of $6 billion worth of business in goods and services under government contracts. Those 100 companies to which contract compliance will apply do 75 per cent of that $6 billion worth of business. The great bulk of moneys that are dispensed by the Government to private companies will be covered by the steps being taken today.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald). The Minister has expressed her commitment to employment equity and her concern about visible minorities. She knows that second-language training in English or French is crucial to visible minorities and recent immigrants so that they may have adequate employment opportunities. I am wondering why the Minister, having expressed her concern about visible minorities and about equity, has made no announcement today regarding adequate funding for language training.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, that is because those issues were addressed in the over-all agreement that was arrived at in Regina. At that time we spoke about training as it applies to women, native people and visible minorities. I would like the Hon. Member to understand that the labour market strategy that was announced in Regina and the agreements that were reached with the provinces enable us for the first time to work together to meet the very concerns expressed by the Hon. Member. In that $900 million which is totally allocated for programs that will be worked out with the provinces and the private sector, training and second language will be a very major concern.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I would first like to compliment the Minister. I am really very pleased.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Finestone: On behalf of the Liberal Party, I would like to express the fact that I see this as a part of the ongoing steps of development started by one of the Minister's very good friends, Judy LaMarsh. I know that in the history of the development of equity, affirmative action and equality for women, it has been an uphill fight for all women regardless of political affiliation. I am really pleased to see this step being taken. I do, however, have questions. I must admit to the Minister that I did not receive a copy of the report so I cannot ask her the kinds of pointed questions that would elicit the responses I want.

My general gut feeling is that even with the Minister's desire to see this ongoing development continue in keeping with the Royal Commission on the Status of Women report which began in 1967, with the Advisory Council in 1973 and with many other events which I will not read into the record, I am really concerned about what I heard from the Minister. Does she believe that in not applying a mandatory requirement for reporting, the Canadian Human Rights Commission will not be given the kind of manpower and finances it needs? If it is not given to the Canadian Human Rights Commission, then to whom will it be given and how? She is creating goodwill no doubt, but how does she see the reporting so that we can supervise what she wants to accomplish for all women, visible minorities and the handicapped, some of whom are also women?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments which the Hon. Member made. She knows, as I do, of the ongoing struggle in taking steps and measures such as the ones which were announced today. We realize that struggle is there, but every time something moves forward, there are a great many of us who are that much more pleased. But we never give up the struggle.

Because the Hon. Member has not had an opportunity to read this document in detail, I will tell her that the reporting is mandatory. It is mandatory for Crown corporations and it is mandatory, by legislation, for federally-regulated businesses. As those reports are received on an annual basis, they will be tabled in Parliament and made public. Under its present legislation, the Canadian Human Rights Commission will be able to initiate action if it feels that the goals are not being met.

[Translation]

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to see that after six months in power and only a few months after the Abella Report was published, the Progressive Conservative Government has now been able to table in the House some concrete measures on equality in the workplace.

The question I would like to put to the Minister, and which is of great concern to me, concerns maternity leave. I would like to know whether, in the near future, the next step will be to consider that women need supplementary maternity leave in addition to what they have now, in order to be able to raise and care for their young children more consistently and with let us say better results than is the case today. Does the Minister intend to consider this matter in the near future?

[English]

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, when I was listening to the Hon. Member, I asked myself when was the last time a Government responded to a royal commission report within three months?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Some royal commission reports seldom get a response. The suggestions which the Hon. Member has made are very relevant and I will certainly give them consideration.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to encourage the Government to continue making statements. I think it is a helpful process when it is done in the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Manly: The Minister will know that up to 20 per cent of the projected increase in the labour force, especially in the western provinces in the next decade, will involve native young people. What plans does the Minister have to increase, rather than decrease, pre-employment training programs and particularly life-skills training? What steps has she planned for following the recommendation of the report, that there be innovative mobile training centres, especially in northern and remote areas, to help those people prepare for the jobs which they need badly?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned earlier, the measures which have been announced today fit into the wider program of the new labour force strategy which was agreed upon in Regina. I mentioned that because a number of provincial Governments, particularly the Government of the Province of Saskatchewan, raised the issue which was raised by the Hon. Member. In that sense, the thrust and directions which were decided upon in Regina will enable several target groups to have programs more effectively directed to them. The target group which is covered by the new programs, and job entry, will take young native people from the educational situation where they may be at the moment, and increase that educational opportunity to have it lead to work experience. Money has been allocated for that. At the present time we are working, together with the provinces and native people, to decide where and how these programs can best be allocated to the concerned regions. I can tell the Hon. Member, having arrived at the principles and an over-all agreement in Regina, that we are working on detailed plans for each of these programs.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that at least the rhetoric is there as far as it concerns the removal of barriers for re-entrance into the workforce, specifically as it affects women. I imagine the Minister had in mind the women who, for one reason or another, had to leave the workforce and are trying to return. It is very difficult for women to get back into the workforce, even when jobs are available. Women are discriminated against, especially in high unemployment areas. The greatest discriminator against those women is the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) because of her hiring guidelines which went to every single Manpower office in the country.

In view of the fine rhetoric today which indicated that the barriers would be removed, I would like to ask the Minister, for all the remaining direct job-creation projects that come under her jurisdiction which have not yet started but will start in the coming months, will she remove the restriction against hiring new entrants and re-entrants in the hiring criteria? Will she also tell the House if she will undertake to remove those same restrictions which, as she said, discriminate against women in the federal-provincial agreements which will be arrived at for direct job creation this coming fall? Yes or no? Or will she blame it on the Liberals?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, of course, that is very easy to do because the guidelines were set up by the former Government. I understand the importance of the steps which have been taken today. I waited 15 years for something like this. I sat in the House of Commons and urged the former Liberal Government to be much more assertive about affirmative action programs.

To address the question of job creation, it is because the job-creation projects of the past did not work for women, long-term unemployed and young people who were seeking entry into the labour force that we have developed a new labour force strategy. The Hon. Member does not seem to comprehend that. Indeed, we are making major changes in all of the programs. I am sorry, with the number of years he sat on the government side, that he could not bring the Liberal Government to take some of these steps.

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to congratulate the Minister. I think women on all sides of the House, and women across Canada, are heartened today by the model which the Minister has put forward.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Collins: I am also pleased to see such a reasonable approach. Some of the concerns which the small business community had, most of which businesses are headed by women, have been addressed. I am pleased to see the Minister's approach, particularly with respect to contract compliance.

Could the Minister share with us a few examples of the kind of assistance which she would anticipate being provided to companies under the contract compliance section, and the criteria by which their plans would be assessed?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, the guidelines and the techniques which will be agreed upon with companies, whether they are companies which purchase from the Government or companies which come under the federally-regulated sector, will be discussed with each company. There have already been guidelines developed which can be utilized.

I would like to give a few examples. The following list outlines examples of measures which employers could implement: on-the-job training for target group members; development of an inventory of qualified, competent and interested target group members; orientation regarding career planning; work site modified as appropriate for women and/or disabled persons; jobs being widely advertised using target group media to recruit; company to ensure that all selection criteria are valid; and there are a number of other measures. All of these will be discussed with these companies so that they can put into effect a fair and just employment equity plan. I would see that this is done as we come down to making sure that these companies have in place the necessary systems for reporting the data and information which will be required.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): It now being one o'clock, may I suggest to the House that I have unanimous consent to complete routine business?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

CLOSURE OF NATIONAL POSTAL MUSEUM

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of citizens who call upon this Parliament to persuade the Minister responsible for the post office—who I note is in the House today—to intervene with regard to the closure of the National Postal Museum. This is important to the philatelic community across the country. They have been meeting with us and expressing their concerns. It is also important with regard to employment. If the Minister would consider issuing a special stamp, some of the financial obstacles to keeping the postal museum open could be met.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Gerry Weiner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 208 and 229.

[Text]

OFFICIAL PHOTOGRAPHER

Question No. 208—Mr. Henderson:

1. Does the Prime Minister have an official photographer and, if so, what is the person's name and salary?

2. Does the photographer travel with the Prime Minister and, if so, who assumes the cost of travel and expenses?

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. In keeping with an established practice, Mr. Peter M. Bregg has been hired on contract to act as official photographer. His service contract is not to exceed $24,050.

2. When Mr. Bregg is asked to travel on official business, his travel expenses are covered under the terms of his contract.

PENSION BENEFITS

Question No. 229—Mr. Howie:

1. From January 1, 1984 to January 1, 1985, how many women were receiving (a) Spouse's Allowance (b) Old Age Security benefits?

2. To the government's knowledge, how many of these women were also receiving pension benefits which they had earned, as opposed to widow's benefits, from a private company's pension plan?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. From January 1, 1984 to January 1, 1985 there were on average (a) 80,931 women per month receiving Spouse's Allowance and (b) 1,449,885 women per month receiving Old Age Security benefits.

2. Information does not currently exist which would permit an identification of the number of women receiving either Spouse's Allowance or Old Age Security benefits who also receive pension benefits from a private company's pension plan which they earned in their own right. However, the 1984 Survey of Consumer Finances conducted by Statistics Canada did contain a number of questions which would help to estimate the number of women receiving earned, as opposed to widow's benefits, from a private company's pension plan. The results from the 1984 Survey of Consumer Finances are being processed and results should be ready in early 1986.

Fisheries Act

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. Gerry Weiner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 204 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

[Text]

RENOVATION OF OFFICES ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Question No. 204—Mr. Henderson:

1. Were any Parliament Hill offices of Cabinet Ministers renovated since their appointment and, if so, in each case (a) at what cost (b) was the design and implementation done by (i) House of Commons employees (ii) Public Servants (iii) private sources?

2. If private sources were used, what was the name of the individual or company concerned and were quotes requested from them before the work was awarded?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Weiner: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fraser that Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could call it one o'clock and I will resume my address to two o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The Chair agrees. It being one o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 1.05 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At the close of the day the last time this Bill was debated the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) was not finished speaking. He had three minutes remaining and there was a 10-minute period to follow for questions and comments. I would like to make a comment on the speech of the Hon. Member for Skeena. Prior to recognizing the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) you did not offer an opportunity for comments or questions to be posed on the speech of the Member for Skeena.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I do not see the hon. gentleman in the Chamber. I realize that does not bar making comments on his speech. However, Mr. Speaker, you rightfully recognized me just prior to the luncheon adjournment.

I would like to point out two things. According to the rules, if I have uttered any words at all from my speech on second reading, that means that I have spoken on second reading. Therefore, by relinquishing my position, there would have to be unanimous consent of the House to permit me to continue my remarks. The second point I wish to bring to your attention is that the Standing Orders clearly state that when a Member feels there is a point of order arising from the proceedings, that point of order will be raised immediately forthwith.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order. It is customary in the House that the question period following a Member's speech comes at the completion of the speech. When a Member does not have the opportunity to complete his remarks, as is the case today, because he is not present, we have not followed the practice of allowing questions or comments. I respectfully submit this to Your Honour and we will go by your ruling.

Mr. Gass: Mr. Speaker, the point of order I wish to raise is that this debate was started by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser), a Conservative. Since that point in time, two Members of the NDP and two Liberals have spoken on the Bill. I was going to rise at two o'clock because at one o'clock, when Orders of the Day were finished, the House adjourned. It was after one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, that you recognized the Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I have one further comment on the point of order. I wonder whether, in advance of making your ruling on the point of order, another course of action might be available to you, and that is to test the wish of the House. There has been some suggestion that the Conservative Member who just spoke would like to speak. I believe the Member for Gander-Twillingate—

Mr. Dingwall: Distinguished.

Mr. Skelly: —the distinguished Member for Gander-Twillingate would be prepared to stand down if he were guaranteed his right to speak on second reading. with unanimous consent of the House, we might allow these Members to reverse their order and leave the question of time for comments undecided.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): For the benefit of all distinguished Members of the House, the Chair never thought it would have a chance to rule on this question. Having heard all the points of order, I would like to indicate that the Member for Skeena, as pointed out, had not finished the period for questions and comments on Wednesday. There were approximately three minutes remaining in that period. He is not present in the House today, however, and I am told that when the day finishes the period also terminates.

• (1410)

In all fairness, having already recognized the Member for Gander-Twillingate, and considering myself incapable reversing that decision, I suggest that the House could seek unanimous consent to return to the period for questions and comments with respect to the speech from the Hon. Member for Skeena. It would seem rather awkward, considering the Hon. Member's absence today, but if there is unanimous consent, I would do so. Otherwise, I will recognize the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): We will return to the period for questions and comments that follow the speech of the Member for Skeena.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for that gracious approach to the problem. I would simply point out to the House that I thought the speech by the Member for Skeena was an excellent dissertation on the fishing industry. I will resume my seat and allow the order to progress.

Mr. Schellenberg: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Member for Skeena. In his absence, could I direct it to the fisheries' critic? I have taken the time to compose a question. Can I not put it on the record for the benefit of the Member for Skeena?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): This is a period for questions or comments. Due to the absence of the Member for Skeena it is not possible to ask him a question, nor is it possible for another Member to answer in his place. However, the time is available for the Hon. Member to make a comment.

Mr. Schellenberg: Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to turn this well-phrased question into a comment.

I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Skeena on his participation in Wednesday's debate. It was a good deal more positive than I expected it to be, quite frankly. One of the benefits of interrupting a Member midspeech is that other Members have time to compose comments like this.

The Member for Skeena made the point that the powers given to the Minister to manage the fishery for a wide variety of purposes are absolutely essential. At page 2806 of Hansard he spoke of:

—the very delicate dilemma this country would find itself in if it was impossible for different Ministries... to manage the resource for social or economic reasons.

While he supports the Bill, he did make some suggestions. He asked about the implications of Section 2.1(d) of the "purposes" section, which reads:

—to provide, in cooperation with the provinces, for the proper management, allocation and control of the inland fisheries of Canada.

He wants to know why we are bringing the provinces in. It is no mystery.

In the inland fisheries in general, the right to fish comes under provincial jurisdiction. We cannot undertake to allocate provincial property, so we added the qualifying phrase to avoid any suggestion of intrusion on existing indisputable provincial rights.

My comment concerns the Hon. Member's objection to the amendment to paragraph 34(m) of the Act. The amended paragraph would permit the enactment of regulations:

—authorizing a person engaged or employed in the administration or enforcement of this Act to vary, in respect of any area or portion thereof, any close time, fishing quota or limit on the size or weight of fish that has been fixed by the regulations.

He says that this power is beyond anything anyone in the House has yet imagined. However, has he read the existing legislation? Does he realize that we are just adding two refinements to the existing on-site powers delegated to fishery officers? Fishery managers already can be empowered to vary close times for entire management areas. By adding the words "in respect of any area or portion thereof", we merely allow exercise of that power over a small geographical area, over portions of management areas. Does the Member realize that this is the impact of the legislation?

I should explain that the addition of the power to vary size or weight limits is simply an alternative management tool to opening or closing an area. It is a refinement of existing practices.

I hope the Hon. Member will also realize that granting these on-site powers to fisheries officers in respect of sub-areas will allow fishermen greater fishing opportunities. It will give fishermen access to selected fishing grounds in parts of the management area that cannot be opened in its entirety because it would endanger the stocks. This power would allow the fishery manager right there on the spot to close off the particular limited area where the endangered stocks are, while leaving the rest of the area open for fishing.

Does the Hon. Member prefer the existing blunt instrument of opening or closing entire large management areas? Does he want these decisions taken quickly and effectively on-site or does he want to preserve the current lengthy process of enactment by order in council?

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's intervention is perhaps a good place to start. He said that the Government did not want to infringe upon provincial jurisdiction and there would be a consultative process. Any infringement upon provincial jurisdiction is really subject to an interpretation of the courts. The same is true with respect to infringement upon federal jurisdiction.

For example, with respect to infringement of rights, it is quite possible for a court judge to interpret these amendments, once they are enacted, as being an infringement upon provincial jurisdiction. The first amendment, 1(a), is to include "portions of fish" under the definition of fish. That is a new section of the Act. The explanatory notes say that portions of fish would allow control in management of fish which has been processed to some degree; for example, headed, gutted or filleted fish.

It is a well known article of law that once fish are captured they become real property. We also know that according to the Constitution, provincial jurisdiction comes under property and civil rights. Once a fish is captured it becomes real property. Therefore, it could eventually be interpreted by a court judge that this section cannot be implemented under the Fisheries Act.

Let us look at the clause in terms of the Hon. Member's comment about not wanting to infringe on provincial jurisdiction. Clause 1(b) includes in the definition of fish marine plants and portions thereof. The explanatory notes say that marine plants were formerly not included in the definition of fish. Anything attached to the seabed from headland to headland—in fact, out to three miles in some provinces—is provincial jurisdiction according to the interpretation of the courts.

In other words, as a result of decisions made by Supreme Court judges in the past, a provincial Government could not only control what is attached to the immediate seabed in every bay and cove on the East Coast of Canada, it could also be interpreted to mean under that law that the provincial Government could issue lobster licences because lobsters are on the seabed. If a net were attached to the seabed, then that could be interpreted to mean provincial jurisdiction.

These issues have been discussed between ministers in provincial jurisdictions. However, they do not issue lobster licences or licences for nets that are attached to the seabeds in their bays and coves because they know that according to federal law the federal Government has the rights to open and close seasons and limit the extent of that season for protection and conservation purposes. There would be no purpose for a provincial Government to issue lobster licences because the federal Government, under federal law, would have to shorten the fishing time.

The two additions to the Act which we are debating today could be perceived by a court judge to be an infringement upon provincial jurisdiction. This is not to say they should not be in the Act because we have seen provincial laws enacted that are really an infringement upon federal jurisdiction. I recall a couple of years ago the Province of Nova Scotia enacted a law that unilaterally seized control of the continental shelf off the coast of the Province of Nova Scotia, and the wording went "and extensions thereof"; and the wording further went "to the extent of exploitability".

● (1420)

The drafter of that Bill in the Nova Scotia legislature took that section out of some charter of the mid-50s in Europe when there was an International Law of the Sea meeting. "To the extent of exploitability" meant as far as the technology would carry a drill ship, or whatever the case is, for the purpose of drilling for oil. In 1980 terms "to the extent of exploitability", meant you could drill an oil well in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean. By passing a law in a legislative jurisdiction, you are passing it for a purpose, but although it is on the books, it does not really mean anything. If you went by the Nova Scotia law, "and extensions thereof" and "to the extent of exploitability" mean right across the Atlantic Ocean. If somebody walked out in the water off the coast of Africa, he could be charged with trespassing on Nova Scotia soil. It operates both ways in response to the hon. gentleman's question. Look at the ongoing disputes between provincial and federal Governments.

I have with me today a recent discussion paper passed to this new federal Government, the Mulroney Government as it is commonly known outside this Chamber, on behalf of the provincial Government of Newfoundland, by the Hon. A. Brian Peckford. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) should know this. I notice his Parliamentary Secretary is here. I only wish the Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie) were here. The Premier on behalf of the Newfoundland Government says in this paper delivered to the new Conservative Government:

> Newfoundland believes that it must have a prominent role and in certain cases the paramount voice in the management of the fisheries resource in those areas which are adjacent to the province.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the Newfoundland Government wants a prominent role to manage the fishery off the coast of Newfoundland. The Premier does not stop there. He said that to achieve this goal "we have proposed a constitutional amendment to the federal Government".

I wonder what the response to that will be from the federal Minister of Fisheries. The Premier of Newfoundland goes on on behalf of his Government to say that in particular, resource allocation policy—which is what we are talking about in this Bill—for the northern cod way out in the Atlantic Ocean, hundreds of miles north of Newfoundland and east of Labrador, must grant priority access to the Newfoundland inshore fleet. In other words, toward the east, the north, the northeast coast of Newfoundland, out into the ocean, the Premier says first priority must be granted to the Newfoundland fleet.

Then he says that the second priority for access to this stock should be Newfoundland offshore vessels which land their catch at resource-short seasonal plants in communities adjacent to the stock. That is a further division, Mr. Speaker.

Then the Premier says that the third priority is for the remainder of the offshore fleet based in Newfoundland, and the fourth priority is for the Maritime Provinces respectively.

It would be interesting in this great time of consultation and of trying to appease the wishes of the provinces to find out what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) thinks of the Premier of Newfoundland's submission to him, given to him since he was elected. I bring this up because it is relevant to this Bill before us today. You get to the actual purpose of the Bill when you get to the section that outlines the purposes under this new Act.

An interesting question has been raised here. Right now according to the justice who made this decision in the court in British Columbia—and I would say that justice was absolutely correct in the decision that he made—the federal Government does not have the right to distinguish between gear types. It has been illegal all the way along for the federal Government to say in the case of a salmon fishery or a herring fishery: "All right, the big boats can have x amount of fish; the small inshore boats can have x amount of fish. That was always illegal but it was never tested properly in the courts.

The case presented before the federal Government said that we should have this power because there are the small boat fishermen or another group of fishermen who are really not getting enough fish to keep themselves alive. Therefore, we have a social and an economic responsibility toward fishermen. Nowhere in the present Act does it outline that the federal Department of Fisheries has a social and economic responsibility toward fishermen. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because that problem was never supposed to occur. In other words, it was not historically the duty of the federal Government to look at the socio-economic breakdown within the fishery and make resource allocations accordingly. It was not necessary. All of a sudden it is necessary. It has been necessary for the last eight to ten years. It is necessary because we have not, as the Government of Canada, devoted enough money toward research. We have not devoted enough money and now we have the recent cuts introduced by this Government into this Parliament which are laying off research people right across the country in fisheries, closing down research stations and cancelling expansions to research stations. These cuts are aggravating the problem. The duty of the Department of Fisheries now will become a socio-economic problem.

If you are going to get into that territory, Mr. Speaker, then you had better do it all and have a policy that says: "All right, what happens to the fish once it is landed? That is within provincial jurisdiction, but we have a socio-economic responsibility. Let's can the fish. Let's make sure it is going to the best use". Then you really get into it because of the waste that happens in the fishery today.

Let me outline what happens to capelin that is caught off the coast of this country. When you realize that 60 per cent of it is thrown away once it is caught, you begin to realize what a socio-economic problem we have, and that there is a number of things that would be required to be done by this Government to solve that problem. The fact is that you can sell only female capelin because that is what the Japanese want. You have a Japanese shaker in every fish plant. The female herring continue along; the male herring go down a chute into the salt water and are thrown away.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker: When you get into trying to solve socio-economic problems, you had better be prepared to address an awful lot of problems associated with this fishery, Mr. Speaker.

In dealing with the actual legislation, it deals with definitions. It makes a new definition for fish, for fisheries, and for those people who are engaged in the fishery.

I have with me a copy of the telex from the Premier of Newfoundland which he sent to the Prime Minister on March 6, just two days ago. In that telex the Premier of Newfoundland, the Hon. A. Brian Peckford, said to the Prime Minister:

> I wish to bring to your attention the terrible plight of approximately 210 fishermen in the Bonavista North area of the Province.
> Due to a payroll computer error, dating back to 1983, these fishermen are being assessed UIC overpayments on an individual basis anywhere from $72 to $6,000. The overpayments occurred in a purely accidental manner—

The Premier is requesting the Prime Minister to intervene with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) to have that assessment cancelled. I have another telex from the Hon. Charles J. Power, Minister of Career Development and Advanced Studies, requesting the same type of assistance. It all goes back to what we are talking about today—the definitions of fishermen and fish.

● (1430)

Thousands of cases come before the courts every year, yet when there is a problem with legislation, that is a problem for the Government of Canada whether it is this one, the last one or the one before, and we are very quick to respond with amendments to the existing Act. People are faced with ongoing problems wherein they have to pay back between $20,000 and $40,000 which they cannot afford. They are faced with having to pay it back over coming years. Why is this the case? It is because simple amendments have not been made to the regulations and under law the process for fishermen is that once one has been judged to have received an overpayment by the Department of National Revenue, not by the Department of Employment and Immigration as one would expect, on behalf of the Minister, one is guilty until proven innocent.

I wish to justify the statement that one is guilty until proven innocent by referring to a position taken by a justice in British Columbia. I am referring to a decision of Justice Labelle, who I believe lives in Ottawa. He made a very good decision. I have not as yet seen a decision of his which has been off the mark. He said that there was no evidence to prove that the Minister was wrong in his determination and that the onus of proof that the Minister was wrong in his determination is upon the appellant. Then he cited Anderson Logging Company v His Majesty the King, 1925, and went on to cite Justice Duff and Justice Rand. It is an accepted fact in the courts of the land that a fisherman has to prove the Minister of National Revenue was wrong.

Why do I raise this point? It is because the Premier of Newfoundland has asked the Prime Minister to intervene in a case which is widespread. Why did the case arise? Because the Government in its so-called wisdom said that it would do checks on unemployment insurance recipients. There is nothing wrong with that. One might say that those people who deserve to be on unemployment insurance will remain on it and those who do not will not receive it. Again it gets back to the definitions of fishermen and fish.

I know this Act very well. I believe I know it just as well as anyone. I know the Unemployment Insurance Act as it relates to fishermen. The problem arises when an audit of a fish company is ordered. The audit goes back over the years and looks at the formula for issuing employment stamps. They can only look at what is on the books, but we have to realize that what is on the books may not necessarily be the case. Fishermen could have iced their fish on Saturday and sold them on Monday. In other words, they could be given credit for two weeks of fishing but the books show only one. Maybe the weather was bad at the end of the week and a fisherman could not get over to sell his fish. The books in 1982-83 would show that he had one shipment when he really had two. When the fisherman goes before the judge he has to try to prove, for example, that on a Saturday in 1982 he iced 50 cents worth of fish and therefore is not guilty. However, he does not have any proof.

That is what is wrong with the system. We see this over and over again. In the case of Justice Labelle to which I referred earlier, I represented the appellant. I realized that the people may not be wrong, that they may be absolutely right. However, the system says that the fisherman must prove wrong an audit of what was done back in 1982-83.

I notice Mr. Speaker indicating that my time is coming to an end. I had so much to say on this question. The Minister is not in the House, so I will not congratulate him.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, come on!

Mr. Baker: All right, I congratulate the Parliamentary Secretary and the Minister. We will see down the road just how good he is. He has been making fine statements, but I do not like his cuts. It is unfortunate that I do not have the time to deal with them. This is an incredible problem with which we are dealing. This simple action on the part of the Minister is not good enough because of actions taken by the Government since it came to power. Also it is not good enough because of the appeals which will undoubtedly arise as a result of the inaction and audits of the Department.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member referred to some of the dilemmas in the fishing industry, notably the unemployment which has come about and the problems with the Unemployment Insurance Act. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will listen to this comment as well. It is important to the topic raised.

In the process of trying to address the question of unemployed fishermen on the West Coast, the Conservative Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) appointed a committee to oversee the disposal of $5 million. That particular committee was appointed by the Minister on the recommendation of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser). As I understand it, they have hired a group of former Conservative organizers from the last federal election. Certainly there are elements of serious concern in terms of patronage and propriety. I would note, for example, an individual by the name of Stan Hagen, a prominent organizer; Jim Lorney, a prominent organizer; and Thor Petersen. They have been named as individuals to oversee this committee. Has the Hon. Member had any experiences of a similar nature in his riding where political patronage has been similar?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I cannot point toward any political patronage which has occurred so far. I notice they changed the board of directors of Fisheries Products International since the Minister of Justice took office. His brother was removed from the chairmanship of the board. I cannot see any influence being exerted there by the Government of Canada as far as appointments are concerned.

I am not too concerned about political patronage, but when we have a Government which professes to do certain things which are perceived to be for the public good, what should be examined by the Chamber and by its committees is their impact on ordinary people. For example, when we decide to try to cut back on unemployment insurance and just do audits, as I mentioned in my speech, we have to realize the ramifications; people who are innocent could end up being found guilty and having to pay back enormous sums of money. We have to look at what happens down the chain. We cannot, as the Government announced, close a $30 million laboratory facility or cancel vessels for research at $18.1 million. The technological laboratory in Vancouver will be closed. It is intended that the technical and scientific staff will be reassigned within the Department. Really that is not an excuse; we have to look at the long term. I notice that the Minister says:

● (1440)

The recently-created task force headed by the Hon. Erik Nielsen intends to consult with the provinces and the private sector to determine which other areas of activities or programs might need restructuring.

The point is that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans really does not deserve the treatment that he is getting from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret). This Minister is trying honestly to do his job. He has been associated with the fisheries for years. Now he is being frowned upon by the fishermen. He is being chastised in practically every home in certain parts of the country, all because of the actions of the Minister of Finance, the President of the Treasury Board and other Cabinet Ministers. I do not really think it is fair to treat the Minister of Fisheries in that manner.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the House, I am wondering if the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), because of his long-established knowledge of the fishing industry and particularly some of the various federal departments associated with that industry, would share with us his views with regard to other possible conflicts between the Fisheries Act and these amendments. While we are attempting to assist the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser), it is important that we know what those conflicts are so that we can try to resolve or reconcile them to the benefit of the people we are supposed to serve. I would therefore ask the Hon. Member that question.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, in the short time available I will deal with definitions. I could go anywhere in the Act. When you look at the Act, you see that the regulations under the Unemployment Insurance Commission describe kelp. Let us get down to the catch, the fish, the natural product or by-product of the ocean. It includes Irish moss, kelp and whales, but does not include fish scales. It includes kelp and Irish moss. That is a definition of fish under the Act. Somebody who walks out into the water and catches a capelin which drifts ashore is not insurable under the definition of fisherman, but somebody can walk out and rake up kelp on the ocean floor or in a river basin and he is a fisherman. That person is a fisherman, but somebody who does it from the shore is not. There have been innumerable cases before the courts.

Fresh catch is defined as a catch that is not cured. There have been cases which arose from that because cod liver is listed as cured fish but shark liver is not. You go back and you judge that somebody should not have received unemployment insurance because the division was wrong.

The definition of "fisherman" is a person engaged in making a catch, but it also includes people doing incidental work related to that catch. In other words, let us look at judges' decisions in the Province of Nova Scotia, where the Hon. Member who asked the question is from. There was the case of Phyllis Karsten and Catherine Stevens v. The Minister of National Revenue. In that judgment, the Chief Justice said that by reason of performing the tasks, these tasks include cutting bait and baiting hooks. The point is that it was not done in the boat. It was done on the shore.

There are these problems within the Act. Women in this case are saying that they bait hooks. So does somebody in the boat. You need do only one thing to cure that problem. You need just put in one line that says you must have been in a boat. You would not then have these appellants having to pay back $10,000 to the federal Government. There are many other cases. I do not have time to go into them because my time has expired.

My original point is this. When a problem arises, MPs from this Chamber have to go to their districts and defend constituents who must repay money to the federal Government. We have been doing that for years. When you look at other judgments that have been made, it could be a massive problem. However, no changes are made to the Act. When the Department of Fisheries has been slighted, changes have been brought before the House of Commons and they have been passed forthwith. That is what the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should be examining.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The period for questions and comments is now over.

Mr. Mel Gass (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, sometimes when a Member is going full flight, he should be allowed to carry on. I appreciate the comments being made by the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) regarding UIC and the fact that there are problems. I agree almost 100 per cent with the Member when he talks about the problems of UIC and Revenue Canada. I have had the same experience with the previous Government and the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act with regard to the Minister of National Revenue making the final decision. With a new Minister, I hope some changes will be made and some of the problems with UIC will be corrected as they relate to fishermen and the fact that the Minister of National Revenue has the final say after the fact. I know from experience where five years after the fact people have had to pay back money because the Minister of National Revenue said the person was not eligible as a result of some circumstance that happened four or five years previously which the person could not prove.

I am off the point I am supposed to be speaking on, namely Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) made special mention of the roe herring industry in British Columbia. He has pointed out its great importance this year. For those Hon. Members who are not from the Pacific coast and who may not be familiar with the roe herring fishery, it may be difficult to visualize the challenges and rewards that management of this fishery involves.

Certainly in terms of its tempo and its intensity, the roe herring fishery is unique. The prize in this fishery is not the fish but the roe, the eggs. Herring roe is a gourmet item in Japan. It is, so to speak, the caviar of Tokyo. The price fishermen get for the catch depends on the maturity of the roe. The trick is to catch the herring at precisely the right moment, figuratively speaking, at the eleventh hour and fifty-ninth second before spawning.

The herring season has opened on the West Coast. We had two seasons, one on Wednesday which lasted four hours and ten minutes and one that started at nine o'clock this morning British Columbia time. It will end when the quota is reached in that area.

A large British Columbia fleet takes part in this fishery, 241 seiners and more than 1,300 gillnetters. To succeed in this fishery, timing has to be exquisite. The stakes are so high that many boats take up position on the fishing grounds well in advance of the opening. That is in case the herring show up a little earlier than expected. If they show up late, that means higher costs and dead time. If they show up very late or not at all, it could be a catastrophe. February and March are tense months for herring fishermen in British Columbia.

The roe herring fishery starts very early in the year in San Francisco Bay. Then it moves north with the spring to other parts of the coast. The first Canadian roe fisheries off the west coast of Vancouver Island and in Georgia Strait began, as I said, yesterday. The last one before the stocks pass on into Alaskan waters is at the end of March on the north coast around Prince Rupert.

The intensity of this fishery is legendary. There have been years when a roe herring fishery in a given area has been opened for just 15 minutes. The competition in this limited fishery is tremendous. One of the management challenges is to balance the interests and efforts of the two gear types used in this fishery, gillnetters and seiners. It might be interesting to note that of the two seasons that began this year, one was for seiners and one was for gillnetters. The seiners generally work in deep water. They are powerful harvesting machines. It is not unusual for a seine boat to take 600 tons in one set. The gillnetters work closer to shore with fixed gear and their capacity is much lower: about 1 per cent of the seiners. Part of the problem is to balance the interests and impact of these two different gear types. To do that we have to be able to regulate by gear type and by area.

There is another aspect to the challenge that also demands precise fishery management. Herring stocks have a reputation for instability. In 1965 there was a massive stock collapse that put an end to the fishmeal industry. In the long run, things turned out well. In 1972, when Japan's herring stocks were in decline, the B.C. industry was able to get a foothold in a much more lucrative market. Fishermen had been getting $11 per ton for herring used for fishmeal. In recent years they have been getting as much as $900 per ton for the roe. In fact, the price this year is $812 per ton.

The basic volatility is still there, however. As the Minister pointed out, some of the stocks are depleted. The fishery off the west coast of Vancouver Island has been closed and the fishery in Georgia Strait has been curtailed. This is a prudent and necessary action. We do not know all of the reasons for the ups and downs of the herring. Some scientists think it may be related to the infusion of warm currents known as El Nino. Whatever the cause, we know we have to be doubly careful not to over-fish the stocks.

It comes down to this, Mr. Speaker: we have a resource of immense value. We have an industry built on that resource which in B.C. is second in size only to the salmon industry. We have a complex fishery concentrated in time and location, conducted by competing gear types. We have a resource that requires careful management.

If, as this fishery gets under way, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans' authority to manage the fishery or the validity of the fishing plan developed with the industry is challenged because of a possible deficiency or lack of clarity in the wording of the Act, there may be very serious consequences for fishermen, for the industry and for the resource. With the salmon industry in difficulty, an efficient roe herring fishery is essential. We should make sure that its performance is not hindered by uncertainties in the Act. We can remove that danger by making the revisions proposed. I hope Members will do so without further delay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Questions or comments?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I heard the speech made by the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary. While we are dealing with a fisheries Bill, I would like to comment on the tremendous importance not only of the fishing harbours in eastern Canada and the West Coast but as well of the small craft harbours and fishing harbours on the Great Lakes system. In fact, in the Ontario region there are some 450 or even close to 500 fishing harbours and small-craft harbours.

I would like to draw attention to the fact that the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the small craft harbours branch have done an excellent job in maintaining these harbours. They not only do a good job of maintaining them under very arduous conditions but they see that they add greatly to the economic activity throughout the Great Lakes Basin.

In my own constituency there are some 45 small craft harbours, representing about 10 per cent of the small craft harbours in the Ontario region. There are a number of harbours used for fishing but a great many are used for small craft activity and provide access to the north channel of Lake Huron which is the best boating and cruising area in North America.

I would call on the Parliamentary Secretary, the Minister who is present in the House and other Hon. Members to add their support to providing financial assistance for the maintenance of small craft harbours and fisheries harbours in the Great Lakes Basin because they are very, very important. I agree completely with what the Hon. Member from Newfoundland who just spoke said, and that is that the Minister is totally dedicated to his Department and to improving and upgrading the harbours. However, he needs the support of the Fisheries Committee and he needs a strong resolution from the Fisheries Committee and from Members of Parliament in order to get adequate funding.

Funding for the Ontario region runs to slightly over $3 million per year. That is simply not adequate to ensure that there is proper maintenance of the small craft harbours. There has been very massive expansion due to the special recovery capital projects in the last two and a half or three years.

There is a main entrance point from Michigan into the north channel of Lake Huron on Meldrum Bay. An iceflow seriously damaged the harbour there and it will require some $70,000 or $80,000 to repair it. I know it is difficult for the Minister to get that kind of funding but I appeal to him to provide that assistance.

For the Minister to have adequate funding not only for the Great Lakes Basin but for the entire country, we as Members must speak up and support him in the Fisheries Committee and in the House to ensure that there is adequate funding to repair and upgrade all our harbours and particularly those like Meldrum Bay, a main entranceway into the north channel area. As I said, that area is not only a fishing area but a very important boating and sailing area.

Mr. Gass: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the Hon. Member's comments, I can only assure him that we on the Fisheries Committee and we who represent fishing communities on the West Coast, on the Atlantic Coast and on the inland waters of Canada realize that ports, harbours and wharves are essential to fishermen. Fishermen must be able to depart from a safe port and return to a safe port with their catch. I can assure the Hon. Member that that is something about which we are all very concerned even in these times of restraint.

We have to try to be conscious of the dollars that are spent because of the fact that the previous Government wasted so many dollars and set us on a course of no return. We have to cut back everywhere we possibly can, but we must maintain if possible the harbours and wharves that are so essential to the fishermen from one end of the country to the other. In fact, as early as Monday night we are bringing people before the Standing Committee to talk about small craft harbours.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary about a serious matter of which I gave him warning by way of a question, and that is the matter of patronage. I mentioned the individuals concerned and the fact that prominent Conservative organizers now handle jurisdiction over the approximately $5 million that is intended to be spent on projects to aid unemployed fishermen. I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary if—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): That is a point of order. The subject matter brought up by the Hon. Member is not related to the Bill. I am stopping the Hon. Member at this point because it is obviously not related to the Bill before us today. It is neither related to the speech made by the Hon. Member nor to the Bill itself.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I would rise on a point of order and take a moment to point out to you that the previous speaker mentioned serious economic concerns of fishermen. The point I am coming to is that that particular group has been charged with the responsibility of dealing with the economic concerns of fishermen by using this money, and that the Minister failed to conduct any meaningful consultation with fisheries groups, community groups or any other groups that may be affected. This particular point of order is vitally important because we do not want to see this kind of thing happening. I hope you will recognize my right to ask the Parliamentary Secretary a question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Government continue to appoint political hacks rather than move ahead to widespread consultation? That consultation is not happening.

After I have made my point of order, may I have an opportunity to ask a question of the Parliamentary Secretary on a matter directly related to this issue?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I will permit the question. However, as I have pointed out, I have reservations concerning its relevance in the large interpretation. I will permit the question but I would hope that the Hon. Member will bear that in mind.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might just correct the record by indicating that the individuals who are involved are experienced, knowledgeable and have integrity. The point of the matter is that consultation is a factor which is important. I do not wish to criticize those people in any way, but the way in which the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) went about this appointment was absolutely wrong.

● (1500)

Mr. Gass: Mr. Speaker, I cannot take responsibility for appointments which are made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald). Neither can I take responsibility for the appointments which are recommended by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser). I have no knowledge of the appointments which have allegedly taken place. However, if members of the Liberal Party and members of the NDP would let this Bill out of the House today, they could put those questions to the Minister in the standing committee next Tuesday.

Mr. Schellenberg: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker). However, we ran out of time, so I will bootleg it to the Parliamentary Secretary.

In his speech, the Parliamentary Secretary mentioned that not enough money had been devoted to fisheries research. I presume he was speaking about the last 16 years. As I am a new Member, I wonder if he could tell me if it is indeed a fact that not enough money has been devoted toward research in the fisheries. Second, he wondered whether socio-economic grounds should come into play in the Fisheries Act. Is it not true that the majority of legislation in the House of Commons is based on socio-economic grounds? If so, why should the Fisheries Act be an exception?

Mr. Gass: Mr. Speaker, I realize it is an important question and one which would take a long time to answer. Again, I would remind the Hon. Member that the question could be more appropriately put to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. If this Bill could be given second reading today, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans could be before the committee as early as next Tuesday and he would be able to answer those questions. Then we could get on with this Bill, which is very important to the fishing industry of Canada because of the uncertainty which exists due to the two decisions which were rendered by a judge. The intent of this Bill is to remove uncertainty in the minds of Canadians as to whether or not the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has the right to allocate fish stocks to different sectors of gear type and different areas.

Fisheries Act

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): In resuming debate, I will recognize the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly).

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-32, although I regret the haste with which the Government is attempting to push this legislation through the House. The Government says that the legislation must be passed in a hurry because of the herring season. The herring season opened two days ago for seiners on the West Coast and it is open today for gill netters. The rush and fury of the herring season, which the Minister and Parliamentary Secretary described, seems to have infected the Government. It is introducing this Bill in a similar manner of rush and fury, expecting the legislation to pass very quickly. I do not think the Government is going to do that. I think it is in for a long haul, unless it is prepared to give certain assurances to the House. This last minute tabling, and the Government's indicating that we are up against a deadline, is the sort of activity that we used to get from the Liberal Government. It encourages a degree of cynicism and makes parliamentarians look somewhat irresponsible. Our Party does not intend to submit to that kind of blackmail.

Bill C-32 will increase the power of the Department to control the fishery but, at the same time, the Estimates which were tabled a week ago decreased the ability of the Department to manage the fishery in a rational manner.

Incidentally, we do have some good news. I think the Minister has been too modest in some of the things which he has done. He is responsible for a net increase of one-third in the fisheries habitat over the last week. If we looked at the Estimates which were tabled on February 26, we would see that there are 1,500 rivers on the West Coast which are capable of spawning salmon. However, in the Minister's speech a week later he indicated that 2,000 rivers were capable of doing that. The increase of 500 rivers within a week is the first sign of any real activity we have had from the Minister since his appointment.

I would like to ask a question in a rhetorical way, and maybe the Conservatives would like to answer it in a rhetorical way. If Roméo LeBlanc or Pierre De Bané had brought in this legislation in the previous Government, would members of the Conservative Party have supported it? I suspect the Hon. Member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) would have been among the first, after the New Democrats, to oppose it.

Bill C-32 is as arbitrary and high-handed as the salmon treaty which was recently concluded with the United States. As my colleague has pointed out, that treaty was rushed through Cabinet in half an hour. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) had not read it, but he knew that he wanted the treaty so he would be able to sign it with President Reagan on St. Patrick's Day in Quebec City. That illustrates the arbitrary nature of what is happening.

We could look at what that treaty has done in relation to the sports fishery. There are 300,000 to 400,000 sports fishermen in British Columbia. The treaty indicates that within the Strait of Georgia there will be an annual catch of 275,000 Chinook. That catch has to be shared between the sports fishery and the trollers. Sports fishermen were previously entitled to four Chinook a day, or a total of 30 Chinook per season. When the Department was first studying the treaty, it considered a limit of one Chinook per day, or a total of five per season. However, under pressure from the sports fishing industry, the number was increased to two Chinook per day, or a total of 20 per season. That seems to be a reasonable compromise.

We recognize the importance of the sports fishing industry, but we must recognize that that compromise is not without some very serious problems. There is still an upper limit of 275,000 Chinook which must be shared between gulf trollers and sports fishermen. Not all 400,000 sports fishermen are salt-water fishermen, and not all of them fish in the Strait of Georgia, but that is where the bulk of the fishing takes place. The official designation for the Strait of Georgia includes everything from Sherringham Point on the west coast of Vancouver Island, to Chatham Point, which is located north of the Campbell River. If there were only 150,000 sports fishermen in that area, the total allocation would not give them one day's catch of two Chinook each. That does not leave anything for the gulf trollers. Gulf trollers generally have small boats and cannot fish on the dangerous west coast of Vancouver Island, so they require a share of the Chinook in the Strait of Georgia.

Because of the mild climate on the coast, sports fishing has year-round potential, not only as recreation but also as an industry. Once the 275,000 Chinook limit is reached, the industry will be closed down. That limit includes both natural and enhanced stock. In a letter to me, the Minister said that the limit could be raised "if there is an improvement in the strength of runs of natural Chinook stocks". But how about enhanced stocks? If there is a great improvement in enhanced stock over the next few years, the 275,000 limit will remain. If there are more fish, it will take much less time for the sports fishermen and the trollers to reach the total allocation. When total allocation is reached, the sports fishery will be closed. That will mean financial ruin for marina operators and others who depend upon it.

The treaty has now been approved by the United States Congress and is ready for signature on March 17. It is worth nothing, Mr. Speaker, that the United States administration has not put any dollars on the table to make sure that it is able to live up to its part of the bargain. This fact was brought out by Mr. Don Bonker, a Washington State Democrat, who is concerned that the United States might fall short of its obligation with regard to the salmon fishing treaty.

The arbitrary means by which the Conservative Government approved the treaty is fully consistent with the arbitrary nature of this Bill. There was no consultation. We recognize the necessity of management and of allocation. We recognize that there is great pressure on a limited resource. But we raise the question of how that management should take place. This is an important question, Mr. Speaker. On February 3 of last year, when the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans was in opposition, he raised that question when he moved a motion of non-confidence in the Liberal Government. Throughout his speech on February 3 of last year, he stressed the need for industry involvement and management. He said, and I quote from page 1055 of Hansard, February 3, 1984:

> The third imperative is industry participation in fisheries management. This must be something much more than mere consultation.

The present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans went on to say:

> What we have in mind is an industry management board appointed by the respective user groups to determine policy and to report directly to the Minister. Policy recommendations, with the rationale for them, should be made public. This is the only way the difficult decisions, impinging on one group or another as they will under current circumstances, can ever be made to work. The immediate advantage to this is that those who know the most about the industry and the impact of decisions on the industry will be formulating the policy. The insistence that their deliberations be made public will guarantee accountability.

Later in his speech he said:

> —we would recommended that the Government establish an industry management board with representation from all segments of the industry, including the sports fisherman . . . If we are going to do that, as I have urged, that industrial management board must have some clout. It must be respected. The policy options that it works out must be treated seriously by the Government.

The Minister also called for buy-back and building habitat. He talked about the importance of the salmonid enhancement program. He said that second stage salmonid enhancement program funding should be brought forward immediately for this purpose. There is no reference in the speech of the Minister last year to increasing the berthage fees for vessels at the docks of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. There is no reference to privatizing the fishing vessel insurance plan. These are two things about which we now hear.

There is nothing in this Bill, Mr. Speaker, and nothing that the Minister has done since taking office last fall, that has addressed the urgent problems which he outlined last February. Where is the commitment to open Government about which we heard so much last spring and during the election campaign? Where is the commitment to real participation in management of the fisheries which the Minister talked about when he was in opposition? Where are the decisions which are going to be made by different user groups? Where is the buy-back to reduce the excess fishing capacity in the industry? Where is the increased habitat protection? Where is the salmonid enhancement program?

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that shortly after the Minister was appointed he was interviewed by the United Fishermen Allied Workers Union and he said that he was committed to a buy-back program as soon as possible, and to increasing funding for salmonid enhancement. He said that if the buy-back program could not get legislative approval in short order, he would proceed without it. One of his first announcements after taking over his new post was to call for an industrial board to advise the Minister on fisheries matters. However, details of the board structure have not yet been worked out. That was back in September, Mr. Speaker, and the board's structure has still not been worked out. We find that this Minister, who had and still has a good reputation as a progressive within his own Party, is going right along with the cut-back mentality of his Government. I believe that some of the progressives within the Cabinet are going to have to sit down together at some point and ask their consciences how long they can continue to go along with the general direction of this Government, which runs completely counter to the sort of things they in their hearts believe in. Although the Minister is from the Pacific coast, 4.4 per cent was cut from the budget of the fisheries on the Pacific coast as compared to 1.5 per cent cuts to the fisheries of the Atlantic coast. We do not expect patronage just because the Minister is from the Pacific coast but we would like to see at least some equity.

On the Pacific coast the fishery research has been cut almost 30 per cent, from $17.5 million to $12.5 million. That is a loss of 31 person years. Fisheries management will have 18 fewer people to do the kinds of jobs which are needed if the fishery is going to be properly looked after. At the very time that the Bill is giving the Department more responsibilty to regulate the fishery, the Minister is reducing its capability to do so in an informed and intelligent manner. The salmonid enhancement program remains stuck in second gear of the transition phase.

Without any regulations which require input from user groups, the Department will be given the right to regulate the industry in the most minute ways and in a manner which can spell economic life or death for the people who are involved in the fishery. The Minister made a commitment that there was going to be involvement of user groups, but now we see that there is an arbitrary power being given to the Department and its employees. The Minister asked for this power so that he could treat all segments of the industry in a fair manner. However, I am sure that the Minister would not have wanted to give this kind of power to his predecessor. I am sure that he would not want to give this power to any successor from another Party because it places too much power by far in the hands of the Minister and his Department without any kind of checks or balances.

I would like to say a few words about the rights of the aboriginal people. There is nothing in this Act which speaks to their needs or reassures them with respect to their aboriginal rights. Hon. Members of this House should know—they have been told a number of times in the last couple of weeks—that the reserves in British Columbia were very small when created because government officials recognized that Indian people in British Columbia depended for their livelihood upon the ocean and rivers and upon the regular runs of salmon and other fish. For that reason the reserves, when created, were very small. They have very little economic viability apart from their access to the fishery, yet there is nothing in this Bill which recognizes their right. Several British Columbia aboriginal tribes look out to the ocean and stake some of their claims there, but this Bill does not recognize or deal with that.

We have concern about Clause 2 of the Bill which alters the purposes of the Fisheries Act. Clause 2.1(d) reads:

This opens the way for provincial involvment and control of inland fisheries, which can have a very negative impact upon some of the rights of the Indian people who live upstream. The sweeping nature of this clause leads us to request that the Minister either delete it or else bring in some kind of acceptable amendment.

I understand that there is also some question about the congruence of the English and French version of this Bill. I am neither a lawyer nor an expert in the French language so I do not intend to go into any detail on that. I simply want to flag it. I hope that the appropriate people will study that and ensure that the English and French versions are brought into line with each other.

● (1520)

In conclusion, before we give the Minister the power for which he has asked in this Act, we want to have some reassurances from him that there will be regulations ensuring a proper allocation to the native people, some guarantee of their right to fish. We want assurances that there will be commitments to the different communities on the coast so that allocations will not discriminate against one community in favour of another to ensure that all parts of the coast are treated fairly. We want assurances that there will be guidelines tabled to enable us to understand how allocations will take place. We want assurances that there will be some mechanism for co-management as the Minister promised. I urge the Minister to be forthcoming in these respects as soon as possible so that, as he requests, this Bill can get out of the House and into committee where it can be properly addressed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) on a question or comment.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested to learn, from the remarks of the previous speaker in his excellent presentation, that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) had not even read the treaty when he urged that it be signed and dealt with very quickly. I recall the time when we discovered that the Cabinet had passed this very complex, important document in 30 minutes, that the Prime Minister accused the NDP of trying to force the country backward. I am now shocked to learn that the Prime Minister had not even read the document. The second thing that amazes me is that they spent most of the time in that Cabinet meeting discussing where they would get the $8 million to pay for the administration.

Would the previous speaker give the House an indication of whether the Prime Minister has read the document to this date? I know it is on record that he wanted that document very badly, as it appears in the news release. Yet, until the point in time when the Cabinet approved it, he had not even read the document. Does the Hon. Member know whether he has read it to this day?

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say whether the Prime Minister has read the document. However, I would like to point out that while there has been some discussion as to whether the $8 million would be forthcoming, there has been no indication in the United States that the money they need to implement the treaty will be forthcoming.

My hon. friend has just pointed out that the increase in moorage will match exactly the $8 million needed to administer the treaty. Therefore, fishermen, who are facing a very difficult economic time right now, are being charged extra moorage costs which they cannot avoid in order to pay for the administration of this treaty, which, as my friend has pointed out at different times, seriously impinges upon the sovereignty of Canada.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks on Bill C-32 with a very unusual statement coming from this side of the House. I would like to congratulate the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister (Mr. Gass). I would like to wish them well in carrying out their responsibilities of administering a fisheries program for all of Canada. I say that very sincerely because I want the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for Canada to be successful. It is important to my region of the country that the fisheries and the fisheries programs instituted by the national Government be successful. I do not think that any Member of Parliament, regardless of his or her political affiliation, would want to see the Minister or his very able Parliamentary Secretary not be successful. We want the complete opposite. I hope he will be successful. I will indicate some areas, Mr. Speaker, in which Members in this Chamber, including Members of his own Party, can be beneficial and very helpful to the Minister and the Department in assisting them in carrying out their mandate.

In reading through this short Bill I was interested to read its purposes. One of the purposes stated in the Bill is worth bringing to the attention of all Members. It is a far-reaching purpose acknowledged solely because the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans understands the complexities of this particular Department and the linkages which that Department has with the economies of the West and East Coasts. It is stated in Clause 2.1(c):

> The purposes of this Act are
> (c) to ensure a continuing supply of fish and to maintain and develop the economic and social benefits from the use of fish to fishermen and others employed in the Canadian seacoast fishing industry,

That is a very far-reaching purpose in a federal statute. The Minister has said that the reason for these amendments is that:

> The Fisheries Act itself does not clearly provide the federal Government with the powers for full fisheries management. Bill C-32 will confirm the ability of the federal Government to fulfil such a full range of modern day responsibilities.

He went on to say that:

> —the amendments to Bill C-32 are needed to confirm and to clarify our authority under the Fisheries Act to make decisions reconciling all these competing interests.

And I emphasize the word "competing", Mr. Speaker. The Minister went on to say that:

> Fisheries management involves not just resource goals but also social and economic goals.

Very clearly, Mr. Speaker, as stated in the clause on the purposes of the Act and by the Minister responsible for the Act, social and economic goals are part and parcel of a fisheries policy for Canada. I want to flag that because it is important. When one looks at the other agencies and Departments of the national Government, there seems to be a void. They are not, in my opinion—and I stand to be corrected—fulfilling the substantive portions of the enactment and of the Minister's statement.

I will give you an example. What about the provisions of unemployment insurance? My colleague, the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), made mention of some of the changes and other things which are tied to the Unemployment Insurance Act and how that affects fishermen. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), sent out signals across the country that he wants to haul back on the Unemployment Insurance Commission payments. For a fisherman living on UIC, $150 a week is not much. These signals sent out by the Minister of Finance are different from those sent out by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It is one thing to tell the middle class of Canada, who make $25,000 or $30,000 a year, that there are going to be changes. They can provide for their food and lodging. However, it is a different matter for the Minister of Finance to tell those receiving $150 a week in unemployment insurance that he is going to shorten their period of insurable earnings and they will get less money. Do you know what that means to someone who must buy the milk and pay for the rent and heat? It is a devastating feeling to sit in your home, available and ready to work but unable to find work, and to have the Minister of Finance say on the floor of the House of Commons that the Government is considering and will ask questions about how it can save more money on unemployment insurance. I say to the Minister in all sincerity that that is certainly not in the best interest of the recipient of UIC, whether it is a fisherman or someone else. It is a devastating feeling. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) are sending out many different signals throughout the country which have a real effect on the fishermen on the East Coast and the West Coast.

Another agency that has a competing interest working against fishermen rather than for their benefit is the Department of National Revenue. Perhaps it is acceptable for Members of Parliament, some of whom may be legal scholars, to talk about audits conceptually. However, for those who make a small amount of money, often below the poverty level, it is tantamount to harassment to have some bureaucrat, at the instruction of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Beatty) or in co-operation with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, say that the Department will do a lengthy and detailed audit of their earnings over a period of time. This may be acceptable conceptually, but the reality is that those individuals are facing harassment. There can be nothing more distasteful or repugnant than to have a national Government zeroing in on the unemployed—fishermen or anyone else. We can agree that abuses must be corrected, but National Revenue, in its attitude to fishermen in auditing their claims, has gone too far. I hope the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Minister of National Revenue and their colleagues will consider that issue.

The Minister talks about social and economic concerns. The Department of Regional Industrial Expansion is a substantive and very important body in terms of the lifeblood of Atlantic Canadians. We are worried in Atlantic Canada that the Minister responsible for that Department is not acting in co-operation with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Some weeks ago, I brought to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) that a fire destroyed a fish plant in my constituency. Of course, there were musings from the Minister of Employment and Immigration that help would be forthcoming to rebuild that plant, but nothing has taken place except for a few studies.

My point is that the intent of this legislation cannot be left to one Minister of the Crown to carry out. There must be a collective will to do so, and I urge Members of Parliament, particularly government Members, to impress upon their colleagues and respective Ministers to take cognizance of the purpose of the Act.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has pledged his support for the fishermen and their interests. However, notwithstanding his comments about unemployment insurance, the Minister of Finance has made substantial cut-backs with regard to the Deparment of Fisheries and Oceans. I suggest that a Government that strongly supports a resource industry would not implement cut-backs as the present Government has done. For example, with respect to capital expenditures alone, there has been a deferral of phase 3 of the construction of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Centre in Saint John's. This is a substantial cut, although it may seem insignificant to those who are not familiar with the fishing industry. I urge government Members not to allow the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister to hang the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans out on a limb, because that is what they are doing. They are not permitting the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to have the tools to do his job, as evidenced by the deferral of the construction of the new fisheries lab in West Vancouver and the deferral of the construction of a new district fisheries building in New Brunswick.

It is time for Government back-benchers to speak up, because I firmly believe that the Government cannot state a certain intent in a federal statute and then do the exact opposite. Another example is the Scotia-Fundy Fisheries Centre which will be deferred for four years. That is a facility which would greatly contribute to the enhancement of opportunities for fishermen and people in the industry. There are many more cuts.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) wants to cut the deficit. Rather than go to Bay Street to cut the deficit, he singles out the fishermen. He will not build more wharves or give them the much needed infrastructure when the livelihood of the fishermen depends on a good facility. However, neither the Minister of Finance nor other Ministers of the Government have a vision of this country. He does not share, as we in this party and, I am sure, certain Members on that side of the House, the view that the fishing industry of Canada is important to the Canadian economy and absolutely vital to the regions of this country. The Minister of Finance has taken actions which are completely opposite to what the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has stated publicly, and they are also opposite to what is stated in the Act.

Again I say to government Members that if they are going to vote in favour of this legislation and its objectives, I suggest that they advise the Minister of Finance to live up to those objectives.

Finally, in the last number of years we have seen a proliferation of regulations both at the provincial and the federal levels. There are approximately 17 statutes which are administered by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It is one thing to enact a piece of legislation, but we must remember those whom we are attempting to serve. What is this legislation for? It is to have regulation after regulation after regulation made by the vehicle of Order in Council, much of which is not known by many individuals. Yes, we have the argument time and time again that a regulation is gazetted and that it goes out to the regions, and if anyone wants it they can call up and get it. The fact is that there are a lot of confused individuals who, through no fault of their own, are not aware of the regulations nor of their effects and how they operate. I will quote one individual talking about regulations, a professor of law at Dalhousie University, who said that great administrative discretion allows federal officials to alter fishing regulations and policy almost overnight. A lack of a legislative mandated consultation process allows officials to chart a fishery management policy virtually on the basis of plans of their own design subject only to the advice of their own choosing.

● (1540)

I think that tells it all, Mr. Speaker. We do not want a proliferation of regulation for the sake of regulation. If there has to be regulation, it ought to be meaningful. Before you arrive at that level of legislation—because that is what it is, let us make no mistake about that—there ought to be a meaningful consultation process. It does not have to be a process which is long and cumbersome, but there has to be a process, both to communicate the intended result about what the regulation is supposed to achieve and also for the general knowledge of the active players in the fishing industry. It is important for them to know first hand both the content of what regulations may be and the effects of that legislation.

I want to conclude because I have a gentlemen's agreement with my colleague, who no doubt will get up and support everything I have said. I want to have the record show that I agreed to speak until a quarter to four—

Mr. Gass: It was twenty to four.

Mr. Dingwall: My understanding was that it was to be a quarter to four.

An Hon. Member: It is now eighteen minutes to four.

Mr. Dingwall: Maybe I will go on until ten to four. I had a gentlemen's agreement with my colleague that I would speak until a quarter to four.

I want to thank Members opposite for giving me an opportunity to participate in this debate. Unlike the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, this is the only area on which I have disagreed with him up to now. I think it is good we are having this debate in the House of Commons. I would not be in a hurry to pass this legislation through this Chamber. Let us give each and every Member an equal opportunity to say what he or she believes, particularly the Members who come from the east and from the west where the fishing industry is so vital to our economy.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the Hon. Member's assertion that the Minister is trying to do a good job. That fits with my recollection of the Minister speaking on this matter in the House last year in his role as Fisheries and Oceans critic, but whether he was the critic or not, he was certainly active on this subject. I remember that at that time the Minister was very interested in having the greatest amount of consultation possible with the fishermen before the legislation was passed. Could the Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall) comment on whether there has been the kind of consultation to his knowledge, because he knows a great deal more about this than I do, that would enable this legislation to be more practicable, or would he suggest that that consultation might still be obtained?

Mr. Dingwall: Briefly, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there has been any meaningful consultation. I believe there has been consultation by the Minister in terms of his travels across the country in meeting with the various provincial Ministers of fisheries and the various interested groups. In terms of actually debating and having briefs which will be submitted on various points, hopefully we will be able to get some of that information through the process of committee. I would say in cursory fashion that if there had been consultations, then why were there such devastating cut-backs in the November 8 economic statement to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans? I do not find too many fishermen writing to me saying that they agree with these cut-backs, both in terms of the capital and the operating expenditures of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. There is not a fishermen that I know of in Atlantic Canada who will write and say, "Yes, we want to have our special recovery program terminated", whether it is to build a wharf or something else. There was no consultation.

The answer to the Hon. Member's question is that I do not believe there was meaningful consultation. Hopefully, because of the attitude of the Minister there will be much more meaningful consultation in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Schellenberg).

Mr. Ted Schellenberg (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is customary for a Member of Parliament during his maiden speech to sign the praises of his or her particular riding. Far be it from me to break this tradition.

Nanaimo-Alberni has been called Canada's paradise, with its temperate climate and inherent scenic beauty from Nanaimo on the east coast of Vancouver Island to the rain forest of the Pacific Rim National Park on the west coast. It is also a very busy place, Mr. Speaker. It is the scene of the world famous Nanaimo to Vancouver bathtub race. It is said that Nanaimo has the cleanest politicians around. The salmon capital of the world is located in Port Alberni. Parksville-Qualicum is the site of the world croquet championship. It is also the former riding of one of the world's great statesmen, Mr. Tommy Douglas.

There is a dark side to the beauty of Nanaimo-Alberni, and it is one of the main reasons I would like to speak today on Bill C-32.

In an area dependent on the resources sector, the logging of trees and the harvesting of fish, unemployment is as high as 30 per cent in Nanaimo-Alberni. That, Mr. Speaker, is unacceptable. The fishermen in my riding are counting on our new Government to manage the resource properly and to improve the economic prospects of the West Coast fishermen, or fisherpersons as one Hon. Member has stated. Unfortunately, many of our fishing methods have been around for the last one hundred years. They are very much out of date and changes have to come. This Bill represents a modest change.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate on second reading of Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act. We on this side of the House had hoped we could still get speedy consideration at all stages. This Bill is housekeeping legislation. I am quoting the Hon. Member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey). It is a straightforward, unambiguous Bill intended, first, to confirm the Minister's powers to manage the fisheries in all its dimensions and, second, to refine the on-site management powers assigned under the Act to fisheries managers.

I was rather disturbed by some of the objections raised by members of the two opposition Parties in Wednesday's debate. I think they are labouring under some misapprehensions about the implications of the Bill—misapprehensions which I hope to dispel this afternoon. I am equally concerned when they say they cannot pass this urgently needed legislation until the whole gamut of issues affecting the fisheries on both coasts has been aired.

Let us establish at the outset what this Bill is about. Essentially, it has two thrusts. First, it removes any statutory ambiguity concerning the Minister's powers under the Act to undertake the full management of the fishery. It does this by spelling out clearly the purposes of the Act and by up-dating the definitions of fish and fishery in the Act to make them more comprehensive. It confirms what people who know the fishery have always known, that is, that true management of our fisheries means management for social and economic benefit and not for conservation alone.

Second, the Bill refines the on-site management powers available to local fishery managers to allow them, among other things, to open or close portions of a management area where now they must open or close entire areas.

Let us be clear. There are no vast new powers conferred by this Bill. To quote again the Hon. Member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, this Bill "simply enshrines in law what the Department felt it could do all along".

Mr. Redway: It sounds like an excellent Bill.

Mr. Schellenberg: It is. Many of us were surprised that these powers were disputed in a court of law, but since they have been disputed, that shadow of doubt must be lifted. These amendments do just that.

• (1550)

None of the three Parties in the House has questioned the need for these powers. The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) in a speech in this Chamber on Wednesday indicated, in terms of the denial of these powers to the Minister, the following:

—to me spells complete chaos in the fisheries management regime, not just on the West Coast but on the East Coast as well . . . We must amend this legislation to provide an orderly management regime in the fishing industry.

Mr. Redway: That makes sense.

Mr. Schellenberg: It does. The second major provision concerning on site management powers for fishery managers similarly refines existing delegated powers rather than conferring new ones. As I just remarked, currently fishery managers must make judgments about opening or closing entire management areas to fishing. If a particular endangered stock is found in one small corner of a given area, the entire area may have to be closed and fishermen denied access to fish stocks throughout that area, just to conserve the endangered stock.

Opening and closing sub-areas is possible under the current Act, but the decision cannot be taken on site. It requires a lengthy process of enactment by Order in Council a slow and cumbersome process which inhibits effective fisheries management. The process can take weeks, and we need decisions in hours or even minutes. The provisions of the Bill simply ensure that a fishery manager can act right there on the site, right where a highly changeable situation is unfolding, a situation much like the one the Parliamentary Secretary talked about earlier today in the herring season.

The final point I should like to make about the over-all package is its urgency. The West Coast roe herring fishery has begun. Confirmation of the Minister's management powers is required to ensure the smooth progress of that brief, very lucrative and very competitive fishery.

Members of the NDP have said that these powers are not needed for the herring fishery because the major groups have agreed to be bound by the management plan worked out in advance. The Department can take some credit for this, because the Minister and his officials devoted time and energy to developing a workable fishing plan in consultation with the industry. We hope the fishery will proceed without disruption, but it could take just one unhappy fisherman to disrupt that densely packed race for a precious harvest. NDP Members acknowledge that the Minister must have these powers to do his job. Where we part company with them is when they say they will not allow this House to confirm those powers—the framework for fisheries management—until they have a complete accounting of how he plans to allocate among gear types between commercial, sports fishing and native fishermen, of how he plans to address native constitutional and economic issues, and so on. They want to know every detail of how the Minister plans to discharge every facet of his responsibilities now and forever.

They have demanded details on the proposals for a voluntary vessel buy-back, on the next phase of salmonid enhancement, on the settlement of native land claims, on small craft harbours, and on habitat management. If we get into that, we will be discussing this Bill for many days to come. I can tell them that the answers are not available because we are still working them out co-operatively and in close consultation with all affected groups, in line with our commitment to open government.

The opposition Parties claim that we have not adequately considered the people and Parliament on all these issues. That is incorrect. Let me deal with these points in turn. Fisheries management is a consultative process. In the end, Government has to take tough decisions. That is what we are elected to do. Those decisions are tough. They affect the lives and livelihood of literally tens of thousands of individuals in hundreds of communities. They require the reconciliation of closely competing interests of diverse groups, all vying for the same limited resource. But because the issues are so tough and their impact so deep, they have to be resolved collaboratively. On the East Coast, there is an elaborate bottom-up consultative process involving the industry and the provinces. This year the federal groundfish management plan developed by the industry was approved enthusiastically and in a timely fashion by all Atlantic Ministers. Moreover, since taking office, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) has consulted the industry exhaustively on a range of long-term issues.

The Minister has met with the Ministerial Advisory Committee, commonly known as MAC, a body which brings together gillnetters, seiners, trollers, natives, sports fishermen, unions and processors. He has also met groups individually—the Native Brotherhood, the Prince Rupert Fishermen's Co-operative Association, several native bands, the Sports Fishery Advisory Board, and so on. He has met several times with the Fisheries Ministers of the Atlantic provinces and with numerous provincial fishermen's organizations. There is no alternative to putting time and effort into these consultations. This commitment to open decision-making will be preserved and strengthened.

The Opposition alleges that the new Fisheries and Oceans Minister has not sufficiently consulted Parliament. That charge is unfair. NDP members of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry had numerous opportunities to bring the Minister before the committee, but they have never availed themselves of those opportunities. The committee had before it the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation amendments, the Saltfish Act amendments and the departmental Supplementary Estimates, but they have never invited the Minister to appear on one of those items.

I urge my colleagues—let us put the essential statutory framework in place. If the Opposition has concerns about the specific provisions of this Bill, let them be put on the record of the House. Let us get down to the business of the Bill, let us leave the rhetoric aside.

I see that I am almost out of time. I should like to point out quickly, as I said earlier, that fishermen on the West Coast have been fishing that way for over a hundred years now. Not everyone likes change, least of all radical change. The fishermen's whole economy is based upon how things are now, so radical change could disrupt many of them. Thus we must be very careful in the measures we initiate in the House and how those measures are initiated.

I have been listening to the comments of my hon. colleagues in the Opposition over the past two days. I know they have a great deal of faith and respect for our new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It is not too presumptuous to say that the future of an industry in trouble rests in the hands of the Hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It has suffered from neglect for too long now. Through this Bill, we are simply asking for the tools to get the job done.

In view of the fact that it is five minutes to the hour, I wonder whether we could simply get the job done and pass this Bill into committee.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I join with other Hon. Members in the House in congratulating the Hon. Member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Schellenberg) on his maiden speech in the House. Most of us have had that experience. I know he lives in an area which is dependent upon fishing. Would he be in a position to elaborate on a number of issues which he touched upon?

On the Gulf of Georgia there is a serious allocation problem which has been exacerbated by the fact that the Government signed a treaty limiting the total number of Chinook which can be taken. However, it appears that there is a conflict between the gulf trollers and the sports fishing group in the gulf. There appears to be the question of a very serious threat of removing the gulf troller fleet from the gulf entirely. Would the Hon. Member be prepared to go on record as stating that he personally supports the continued existence of a commercial fishery in the Gulf of Georgia?

Mr. Schellenberg: Mr. Speaker, obviously I am a relatively new Member of the House, but the Hon. Member who has just spoken and several of his colleagues who have been in opposition for years know that the West Coast fishing industry has been in trouble for decades. Very little has been done. We are simply asking for the tools to get the job done. The Pacific salmon treaty was one of the first measures which we could enact to give us the framework so that fishermen could plan for the future. This Bill is another measure or action to enable the Minister to get the job done. We fully support what he is doing in that matter.

As I said earlier, we are running out of time on this. The Minister is prepared to appear before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry next week to answer those kinds of questions. I simply ask my colleagues and the Hon. Member's colleagues to pass this Bill at second reading today.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Hon. Member. He certainly indicated his support for the salmon treaty. Does he support the process by which that treaty came into force in Canada, the fact that Members of Parliament were not allowed to deal with the issue in the House, unlike the American Senate where representatives of the people had a chance to make a judgment on it? Does he in fact support a process wherein Cabinet approves a matter and denies the opportunity for elected representatives to consider it?

Mr. Schellenberg: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to tell the Hon. Member what kind of process I support. I support any process which actually results in action after 18 years of dithering on the salmon treaty. We actually brought action into the House and on that treaty. This Government stands for action, whether it is on this Bill or on the treaty. We stand for action on this Bill today. Again I ask the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River to assist us in passing this Bill into committee.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity in the lobby to see the Hon. Member making his speech, and I congratulate him on it. I thought it was well crafted. I know of his obvious intergrity and sincere interest in fisheries matters. However, I want to say to the Hon. Member that we cannot stand—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am wondering if the House Leader can confirm the business for Monday. He did hint last Wednesday what we would be looking at. I wonder if he could give a stronger hint today of what we will be doing on Monday.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, if I were a betting man, I would say that we will probably be doing the same thing on Monday as we are doing today, but I hope we will make progress on the fisheries Bill. Then we will deal with the Bretton Woods Agreement. There is an element of urgency to get that legislation passed. The business of the House will be in essence in the same sequence as I announced for today.

I am in the process of monitoring and of consultations with respect to the progress made in the House on these pieces of legislation. I will advise the Hon. Member and his Party and all Hon. Members if there is any change in that sequence on subsequent days next week.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is there unanimous consent for the House to proceed to Item No. 59?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

THE SENATE

ADVISIBALITY OF REFORMING

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of introducing a motion to amend the Constitution Acts, 1867 to 1982, in order to provide for a major reform of the Senate, so as to ensure that this House is able to fulfil the mandate it was elected to implement without undue interference.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is vital because, as it is now constituted, the Senate has no place in a democracy. To be a valid democratic legislature, the Senate needs a mandate from the people, and it has no such mandate. The Hon. Stanley Knowles told this House in 1965, and I quote:

We ought to ask ourselves whether there is any place in our parliamentary institution for a group of people who are not responsible to the electors.

In defence of the Senate, there are those who point to the quality of its Members. Of course, Canada is not a meritocracy governed by an elite. It is a democracy whose laws are passed by men and women who have one source for their authority. The Members of this House have a right to determine the direction of Canada. Regardless of our individual talents or lack of them, regardless of our Party strength or lack of it, each of us has the same legislative authority. We have been chosen by the people. We have been given an authority no Senator can ever claim.

Defenders of the Senate have tried to make it acceptable by defining it as a kind of legislative refinery, designed to improve legislation that emanates from the one democratically authorized house, namely the House of Commons.

Bagehot, the 19th century authority on Parliament advocated an Upper House as "a revising and leisurely legislature". In this country, John A. Macdonald wanted it available to check what he called "hasty or ill-considered legislation", to be the so-called "chamber of sober second thought". Let us appreciate, in fairness, that often the Senate has been that in terms of amending and improving legislation, but when we try to defend the Senate as the bulwark of defence for the regions, for the minorities, for the oppressed, we do not have that kind of impressive history to cite.

Let apologists for the Senate admit that it has not been the bulwark for justice they claim. They say the Senate is needed to protect regional interest, but where was the Senate when the national energy policy eviscerated the economy of western Canada? They say the Senate is needed to protect the people's freedoms, but where was the Senate when the War Measures Act was used in 1971 to override civil liberties? They say the Senate is needed to protect minorities, but where was the Senate when Canadians of Japanese origin suffered injustice at the hands of their own Government? The fact is that the Senate has been effective mostly when it has defended privileges, like the privileges of the chartered banks and of the Liberal Party.

Its Liberal majority in the Senate, the only Liberal majority left in the western world, and that solely because it is appointed, has just given us another example of its passion for privilege. Its delay of the borrowing Bill was not a necessary defence of the taxpayers. If that had been necessary, why would the Official Opposition in this House ever have supported passage of the Bill? Yet, it did give support for its passage. I wish to quote from a letter sent by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to the Leader of Opposition (Mr. Turner):

This Bill was not forced through the House by the use of our majority. It passed following an all-Party agreement that had passed the scrutiny and approval of your Caucus.

I cite correspondence from the Government House Leader to his counterpart:

This Order was the result of an agreement made in good faith on behalf of the three parties represented.

The action of the Senate violates the unanimous decision of the House of Commons. The decision was made after full consultation with yourself and your Party's finance critic, Aideen Nicholson, MP, on behalf of the Liberal Caucus.

There was, therefore, no need for the Senate to resurrect its long-neglected power of resisting and vetoing so that it could protect the people of Canada against the tyranny of a majority in this House. The Senate's objective was clear to see for anyone with memories of the Coyne affair. It was to begin a Fabian-like guerrilla war on this elected House and this elected Government, this in spite—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I remind the Hon. Member, and I say this for the benefit of all Members who will intervene in this debate, that the Senate, as the House of Commons, is part of the legislative body of Canada. Therefore, as other Speakers in this Chair have done from time to time, I remind distinguished Members of this House that they must be treated with respect. I would carefully remind all Members at this point to act accordingly.

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Speaker, I just point out that I have the utmost respect for Fabius in the ancient world. In likening the Senate majority to Fabius, I was not showing disrespect, but simply pointing out a historical parallel between his ancient style of warfare and what is now being initiated in this Parliament. The action of the Senate—and in no way does this reflect on any individual Member—occurred in spite of the Leader of the Opposition saying to this House words that were permitted by the Speaker in the Chair at that time "I recognize the primacy of the elected House of Commons over the Senate."

This motion was introduced in the hope that it can be passed and that it will not be talked out, for the time for Senate reform is overdue. No one should acknowledge this more than members of the Official Opposition. Senate refrom was a plank in the Liberal platform at the 1919 convention. It was advocated by the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King in the elections of 1925 and 1926. In 1925, King said that reform of the Senate was a necessary bulwark for the preservation of democracy in this country.

I come closer to the present. In 1961, the current Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, writing an article entitled The Senate—A Political Conundrum, said:

> The Senate, in terms of current facts, no longer plays a useful part in the Government of Canada. Its historical purposes have been lost. It no longer operates (albeit through forces beyond the control of its own Members) as a restraining influence on legislation. Its initial historical function, that of representing and protecting the rights and interests of the provinces, were never discharged; and it is scarcely equipped with the necessary mandate for that role today. Consequently, the argument for its abolition is difficult to resist.

● (1610)

The Leader of the Opposition wrote that in 1961. Let him act on it now.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stackhouse: His Party has endorsed Senate reform since 1919. Let it use its opportunity now.

Some of us may think that there is little or no hope of action replacing discussion. We count on the support of the Opposition in this Parliament. As the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker said, Senate reform has been a continuing subject of conversation throughout the years, "something like the weather".

The time for major reform is here as never before. This House has to face the possibility of a Senate using its veto power over legislation. An article in The Toronto Star of February 3, 1985, reads as follows:

> Liberal Senator Royce Frith, Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, says his Party "will not ignore the fact we have a majority . . ." if legislation is important enough to warrant defeating a Bill.

He is reported to have said that examples of such Bills could be Investment Canada and the reinstatement of capital punishment. That some Members of this House are equally opposed to those measures does not justify an unelected Chamber thwarting the will of this elected House. Certainly, Liberal Members of Parliament should not want it to happen because their Leader has already affirmed the primacy of the elected House of Commons over the Senate. If that primacy is to be taken seriously, the Senate must be reformed. Its potential for vetoing this House must be checked.

We all know the argument for defence which goes that the Senate has not exercised its veto for so many years that only parliamentary historians know when the last time was. Surely that was in part because since 1935, the Liberal majority in the Senate had a Liberal Government to follow in the Commons for 43 of those 50 years. Now there is a Progressive Conservative Government, and since the Thirty-third Parliament opened, this House has heard rumbling sounds rising from the usually dormant Senate. To quote a Member of the other place, Senator Hartland Molson, an independent Senator, has observed:

> It's perfectly obvious that what is happening is purely political.

Hubert Bauch in the Montreal Gazette of February 20 reports Senator Molson as saying that with the appointment of so many Trudeau loyalists to the Senate during past years, the Liberals have extended the heated partisanship of the Commons to the Senate.

Now is the time for reforms that can change that situation. One possible change is the proposal that the Senate be elected. This proposal was supported by the Joint Committee on Reform of the Senate in the previous Parliament. According to Senator Michael Pitfield, the Senate cannot perform its function of representing the regions because it is not elected. He has written:

> As an appointed Chamber it simply does not carry the credibility to perform the role in this day and age.

If an elected Senate would be, as some people fear, an example of the cure being worse than the disease because it contradicts the principle of Cabinet Government, then we must attempt another kind of reform, namely, one that will spell out clearly and definitively that the Senate's role is not to hold a veto over this House but to assist it precisely by refining its legislation and making major studies of current problems. If that is what history has shown the legitimate role of the Senate as an appointed body should be, then let the Constitution say so. Let us make a reform that spells out in words and legislation the way history has evolved.

I plead that Hon. Members of the House see that reform of the Senate should not stop there. The Senate can never have credibility with the nation, with the House of Commons or perhaps even with itself as long as it is, as so many members of the public have thought it to be, a happy hunting ground for hacks, a plantation for patronage plums, a Shangri-La for sinecure seekers. If an elected Senate is not acceptable, then let us use the opportunity of having a new Government and a new Parliament to give Canada a new method for appointing Senators, one that will give them the same public respect enjoyed by Justices of the Supreme Court who are appointed without reference to partisan criteria.

To quote the Hon. Robert Stanfield on the Senate:

> We should do whatever is in our power to increase its credibility and that has to come basically through reform of the appointment process.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come for this House to endorse a resolution calling upon the Government to initiate a process that will lead to legislation reforming the Senate and making it a more viable, credible, effective and acceptable institution in our parliamentary system.

I must conclude by saying that if such reforms are not possible, then I as one Member of Parliament would have to believe that abolition is the only reasonable alternative. An unelected legislature exercising powers to make and unmake laws has no place in a democracy. As the Leader of the Opposition in this House has written, "... the argument for its abolition is difficult to resist". Only legitimate and adequate reform can resist it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate this afternoon on a motion to reform the Senate. One cannot help but wonder if this is not indeed a motion rather to abolish the Senate, a move which seems to be a late bluff of some of the Conservative Members of this House.

When the Senate is accused of not doing its job, we say it needs reform. When it is accused of doing its job, we say it needs to be abolished. It is that kind of schizophrenic behaviour on the part of some Conservative Members of the House that makes me wonder if we know what we are speaking about.

I do not purport to be an expert on constitutional matters in this country, but it seems to me that throughout the years, the Senate of the country, nothwithstanding the fact that it does require reform, has indeed performed a very unique and useful role. Let us look at some of the history of that institution.

When the Provinces of Canada East and Canada West joined together along with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, there was fear in Canada East, which prior to that was called Lower Canada, that through representation by population, the parliamentary structures would create a circumstance under which the Francophone group of Lower Canada may eventually lose its reprensentation through sheer numbers. Therefore, the people of Canada East wanted to have a structure by which there would be a guaranteed representation, and that structure of course was the Senate. It is also interesting to note that in the Province of Quebec, unlike any other province, the Senate has electoral districts or Senate ridings, if we can call them that.

Again, looking at this matter historically, we also note that the maritime provinces wanted to have some guarantees that they would not be part of the conflict that was raging at that time between Canada East and Canada West. There were linguistic conflicts and a constant deadlock after the Act of Union of 1840, and there seemed to be a new Government about once a year. The maritime provinces felt that difficulties could arise from the union because they felt they had more stable parliamentary institutions at that time. Again, they wanted a structure which would guarantee some uniformity, consistency and regional representation. That structure, of course, was the Senate.

We are discussing here today whether or not the Senate accomplished any useful role in providing regional balance to this country.

● (1620)

If I remember correctly, Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker said that he thought the Senate had not fulfilled its mandate to represent the regions of this country. I would like to remind my Conservative colleagues how, after the 1979 election when the Clark Government had only one Member from Quebec, a Francophone, who could be appointed to Cabinet, how the then Prime Minister decided to have a Francophone presence from Quebec in Cabinet. Mr. Speaker, I would remind the House that Messrs. Asselin, Flynn and de Cotret were appointed to the Senate to guarantee the Province of Quebec representation in Cabinet, because there was no other way to do so at the time.

Perhaps the Hon. Member for Scarborough West (Mr. Stackhouse), who spoke earlier, feels that those Senators did not do a good job in Cabinet. That may be his opinion, but I think that although the Government of that day was short-lived, it was essential that Quebec be adequately represented in Cabinet, and that is the mechanism that was used at the time.

[English]

We are told that as an institution of sober second thought the Senate has not been useful. In the opinion of the Hon. Member who has just spoken, it was the fault of the Senate that the War Measures Act was invoked. I would like to remind the Hon. Member that his Party voted for the War Measures Act as well as did the Government of the time.

Mr. Stackhouse: They did not stop it.

Mr. Boudria: Well, I have not taken the time today to verify how Conservative Senators voted on that Bill, but I know that the Conservative Members of the House—who, the Member claims, were pure and holier than thou—voted for that Bill. In hindsight we might say that the measure was unnecessary, but we are not debating that today. We are debating the fact that the Conservative Members of the House of Commons also voted for that Bill, and now the Conservative Party is accusing Liberal Senators because they voted for it.

I think I have just described what is wrong with the Government. It is trying to find scapegoats for its incompetence. Conservative Members have indicated that the War Measures Act was the fault of Liberal Senators, even though Conservative Members of the House voted for that measure. Today, because of the Government's inability to run the country, to keep interest rates down, and to find employment, it is creating a new debate—the debate of the Senate.

The Senate does need to be reformed. We have probably looked at Senate reform in Canada since 1868—just after the institution was established. There have been Liberal and Conservative Governments since that time. There is no reason for the Member who has just spoken to stand and say that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) should act on it now. Since when is it the initiative of the Leader of the Opposition to initiate government legislation? Introducing government legislation, in my short experience in the House, was, I thought, the responsibility of the Government. That is why it is called government legislation. Perhaps the Hon. Member should become familiar with that fact. What we have today is nothing but a red herring. Conservative Members of the House are attacking another institution because of their own inability to govern.

The Government House Leader (Mr. Hnatyshyn) was quoted in The Globe and Mail of today as having said:

> You can't abolish the Senate without unanimity, the reason being that it affects the amending formula under the Constitution.

He also said that it would require the consent of all ten provinces, as well as the consent of the House. But the Member opposite just told us that it required the initiative of the Leader of the Opposition. Need I remind that Hon. Member of the feelings of the ultra-conservative Premier of British Columbia? How does the Premier of B.C. feel about abolishing the Senate? How do the other Premiers in Canada feel about abolishing the Senate? They do not feel that it needs to be done away with—

Mr. Stackhouse: How does your Leader feel about it?

Mr. Boudria: I am glad the Hon. Member asked how I felt about the Senate. I feel that our parliamentary institutions need to be enhanced, protected and, first and foremost, they need to be respected by each and every one of us.

[Translation]

And that, Mr. Speaker, is where the Members of this House have been extremely remiss. We must remember that senators are Members of Parliament as we are. We are Members of Parliament as Members of the House of Commons, and Senators are Members of the Parliament of Canada by the very fact they have been appointed to the Senate.

An Hon. Member: That is not true!

Mr. Boudria: One of the Members opposite says that a Senator is not a Member of Parliament. He is entitled to his opinion, but I would strongly advise him to read the Constitution of our country and to become a bit better acquainted with our parliamentary procedure. If he has ever presented a petition in this House or in the past read up on the history and traditions of the Parliament of this country, Mr.Speaker—The Parliament of Canada is not the House of Commons, it is the Governor General representing the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons in assembly. I want to mention and emphasize that for the information of the Hon. Member opposite who has just stated that a senator is not a member of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, some claim that the Senate has not played an important role, especially over the past few years, and that it has not carried out its duties in the best interests of the Canadian people. I could mention a number of achievements and reports . . . For instance, "Soil At Risk" is an excellent report which has been prepared by the Senate and which several Hon. Members of the House have publicly described as being a well-documented paper of major significance. There have been in the past many such documents. The Senate of our country has done quite a lot of work in many areas.

[English]

The Senate has acted as a Chamber of sober second thought.

Mr. Skelly: Prove it.

Mr. Boudria: There are some New Democratic Members who say that it is not useful and that it is unnecessary. Perhaps they should review some of the Bills which have been passed by the Senate to see what they missed when the Bills were in the House. Then they will know that their shortcomings are sometimes corrected by the expertise which exists in the upper Chamber of our Parliament.

• (1630)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will say that I feel it is somewhat ironic that we are debating this motion today. We have today, very appropriately, discussed women's issues in this House. I live in the same village as the first woman Senator of this country, Senator Cairine Wilson, who was appointed to the Senate in 1930 and whose statue is right here in this building. I just thought that on this particular day it was appropriate to pay a special tribute to the first woman ever to have sat in that illustrious Chamber, namely, the Hon. Senator, Cairine Wilson.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my Progressive Conservative colleagues that the steps taken by the Senate in recent weeks were aimed at delaying an unreasonable initiative on the part of the Government. Unreasonable indeed, for the Government came before this House to ask the Canadian Parliament to approve expenditures for a fiscal year yet to begin, a fiscal year for which the estimates had not even been tabled. Mr. Speaker, we have seen today why we do need the Senate, if only to remind the House and, particularly, the Progressive Conservative Party that Canada is not under a dictatorship and that respect must be shown for our parliamentary institutions. So it was the Senate which reminded the Progressive Conservative Government about the respect which our parliamentary institutions command.

Mr. Speaker, one of the NDP Members was wondering why the Bill left this House in the first place. I thought that any NDP Member would know and recall that, on December 21, when the Bills came up for debate in the House on the last sitting day, we reached a compromise and agreed to hold a debate on universality and another one on a Conservative Measure which threatened a tradition and something important to this country. On that day, the House had to debate that measure and, once this was done, the Bill was read the third time and sent to the Senate.

I would remind my NDP colleague that Liberal Members rose to speak in the House on many occasions, and I challenge him to check that in Hansard. He will find out that it was not only in the Senate that Liberal Members or rather members of the Liberal Party stressed the importance of seeing the Government's estimates before passing the Bill, for I said so myself in my speech when the Bill was under consideration.

As usual, we see that the preconceived ideas of the New Democratic Party and of the Progressive Conservative Party, which of late seem to have been drawing closer than before—

[English]

We are seeing, Mr. Speaker, more and more members of the Conservative and New Democratic Parties sleeping in the same bed. On this particular issue it is quite obvious again. We are seeing this incestuous relationship, and let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it is becoming obvious that the two Parties are playing the same game in this House.

The New Democratic Party does not want a Senate. Perhaps it does not feel that the regional interests of this country are important. I accept that as the policy of those Hon. Members, if that is the policy they wish to have. But I don't like it and I feel that that is why that Party will never get anywhere. But Hon. Members of the Conservative Party should know better. They are in government. They should have more respect for our parliamentary institution. If they do not realize the value of our institutions, Mr. Speaker, then let them consult with the provincial Premiers across the country. Let them ask what those Premiers think of this initiative, and we will see that that idea will be soundly defeated. Reform of the Senate, Mr. Speaker, yes; abolition of the Senate, definitely not.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion of the Hon. Member for Scarborough West (Mr. Stackhouse). It is a possible sign that there might be some action at last on this subject, which everyone says has been talked about for the whole history of the entity known as Canada, then a semi-independent country and now a "maybe" independent country. It depends on whether we can run our own affairs without interference from across the border.

This motion only calls for reform of the Senate, but I would like to support it in the hope that an exploration of reform might lead sooner or later—I hope sooner—to the discovery that reform is neither possible nor really useful and that the only real alternative is abolition.

Mr. Weiner: Hear, hear!

Mr. Heap: Of course, that has always been the policy of the Party I represent, including its predecessor since 1933. The Hon. Member opposite who said, "Hear, hear!" reminded me previously of his history in that connection.

Mr. Keeper: He must be a red Tory.

Mr. Heap: The CCF adopted this policy in 1933. I was not at that convention. I was a little too young, but I will admit that that was one of the many attractive features of the CCF when I joined it in 1957. Since then I have never had any occasion to reconsider or have second thoughts about the proposal to abolish the Senate, to reform it right out of existence.

The Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria), said that the Senate has done many good jobs on legislation, but he did not say what jobs. I am not aware of any Bill which came out of the Senate any better than it went in. There have been some Bills, such as Bills concerned with regulation of the banks, which came out from the Senate worse than when they went in. That is not surprising considering the ties and directorships which many members of the Senate have.

There was a Bill put forward by the Liberal Government last year to impose the secret service on us, the CSIS, which did go to the Senate and did get a superficial proposal for reform. However, it was clear by the actions of the Liberal Government that it was not interested in having that Bill improved. It was only interested in playing for time. It only used the Senate as a smoke-screen in order that it could ram the Bill through the following year with only superficial and cosmetic changes. Some of the changes which in fact the Senate committee suggested were ignored by the Government. It was clear, therefore, that the Government of the day did not intend that the Senate should actually improve the Bill. It only intended that the Senate be part of a charade in the pretense of the Government that it was consulting the public on a Bill to impose a secret police on us that was utterly irresponsible, that is to say, it has absolutely no obligation to report what it is doing to any elected representative of Canada.

The Senate made no change in that essential irresponsibility of the Bill in its proposals, so the whole charade of putting it to a Senate Committee was, as I say, only a way of keeping it out of public view for some months, then bringing it back with deceptive changes made. They changed nothing fundamentally. So I am very pleased that there are no New Democrats in the Senate. There are certainly New Democrats who have been respected enough by the Government of the day that they might have been appointed to the Senate, but if they were ever asked, they declined. There are now no New Democrats in the Senate, and therefore, as The Toronto Sun points out, we are in a very clear position in saying it should be abolished. I hope there never will be New Democrats in the Senate. There will be New Democrats on the other side of the House in due course, but not in the Senate.

● (1640)

It is very interesting to note that The Toronto Sun is with us. It surprises Paul Godfrey, the Editor. It even surprises us a little bit, but not as much as it surprises him, because we believe that our position was sound and that some day even publications such as The Toronto Sun will recognize that. Evidently some Members across the way are beginning to recognize the soundness of our position. They were probably encouraged to do that by the extreme action in the opposite direction of the previous Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, in entrenching the Senate into the Constitution and then loading it down with his buddies just before he left and just after he left with the little deal he made with his successor. That certainly left a bad taste in the mouths of many Canadians. That, of course, is no reflection on the individual merits of the Members of the other place, but it is a reflection on the function that that body has served, intentionally or unintentionally.

I congratulate the Member for Scarborough West for having introduced this subject. I would be very interested to know whether he and his colleagues, who have votes in this place, are serious about what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has trumpeted in the media in the last few weeks, what many of his colleagues on that side of the House have supported, and what the Hon. Member for Scarborough West advocates in his motion. Are they really going to try to make changes?

The Hon. Member for Scarborough West reminded us that a former Prime Minister, John Diefenbaker, said that everybody talks about Senate reform like the weather but nobody does anything about it. In that case, John Diefenbaker himself was one of the nobodies, that is to say, he did nothing about it. He had a term of office in which he could have addressed the matter, but apparently he did not choose to do so. Now the members of this Party are talking about the need to do something. The question is whether they are serious or whether this is just horseplay. I am sure the Hon. Member for Scarborough West is serious, but he is a back-bencher. He sits as close to the back-benches on his side as I do on my side. It is not clear whether those who sit on the front benches share his seriousness of purpose.

Is the Cabinet willing to proceed or is it just stalling? Is it going to put forward a definite, concrete proposal, or perhaps even a Bill as a beginning? If not a Bill, will it make a report to Parliament? Will it put a motion to the appropriate committee of Parliament to have this matter opened up? In the alternative, will it hide behind the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner)? Is it going to say that with 211 votes in the House it cannot do it because 40 people on the opposite side of the House in the Liberal caucus are not going to co-operate?

If the Prime Minister takes that stand seriously he will make himself the laughing-stock of the country. Everybody can count. Everyone knows that if the Prime Minister wants to put that through the House of Commons, he can do it. There is a constitutional question which he might have thought of before he spoke, but perhaps, as is his custom, he is better at speaking than at thinking, and he does not always know which he should do first. The fact is that he said he was going to make changes, and then the next day he and his colleagues began to wonder whether it was possible to make the changes. The fact is that there are colleagues of his Party in most of the provincial Governments of Canada. If there is agreement within his Party, they can act.

I can assure him, on the basis of more than 50 years of consistent policy by the NDP and the CCF, that he will not find the Government of Manitoba difficult to work with on this point. I can assure him that he will have co-operation from the Premier of Manitoba. There is evidently the potential for near unanimity among the provincial Governments of the country. Changes in the Constitution have been accomplished before with even less unanimity than that.

The question raised by the motion of the Hon. Member for Scarborough West is whether this talk by the Prime Minister and others of his Party about reforming the Senate is merely a dodge to take the minds of the public off the fact that the Conservative Government is doing nothing about jobs and tax reform, or whether it is a serious concern that will be followed up in the next week or two by a substantial proposal from the Prime Minister or one of his colleagues in the Cabinet for actual reform of the Senate. We will soon know whether the Conservatives are serious about it or are just leaving a back-bencher out to dry.

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure for me to have the opportunity this afternoon to speak in support of this motion on Senate reform which was put forward by my colleague and roommate, the Hon. Member for Scarborough West (Mr. Stackhouse). This is a subject on which I personally have felt very strongly for a long time. In my very first year of university, I took a Canadian political science course. After having taken that course, I was convinced that we needed some very drastic changes in the Canadian Senate. Therefore, I am delighted to have this opportunity to speak today on that very subject, which takes me back a few years.

The subject of Senate reform has been discussed very broadly and in a great deal of detail over a number of years. The pace of that debate has been speeding up, particularly in the years leading up to our new Constitution, our new amending formula, and our new Charter of Rights. Since that time, there has been a great deal of debate on what we should do about the Canadian Senate.

There are a variety of thoughts which I believe break down into four main choices. The first choice is that of making some modifications in the power of the Senate. The second choice is that of changing the method of selection of appointees to the Senate, or changing the method of appointment. The third choice is the possibility of actually having an elected Senate, as my friend the Hon. Member for Scarborough West suggested.

The fourth choice is, as both the Hon. Member for Scarborough West and the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) indicated, that of abolishing the Senate altogether.

With regard to modification of the Senate, or any of these choices, the key to the issue is accountability, that is, whether the Senate is an accountable body now or whether it can be made an accountable body and whether, in a democracy, we can have a body which is not accountable to the people of the country.

With regard to the first option of modifying the powers of the Senate, there is no question in my mind that no matter what is done with the Senate, whether its power to block legislation is limited or whether a time limit is imposed on its debate, it still cannot be made accountable to the people of the country. Therefore, I personally reject the idea of tampering with the powers of the Senate.

● (1650)

The second possibility is to have another method for Senate appointments, that is, based on propositions put forward by provincial Premiers that the provinces be allowed to appoint people to the Senate. Once again, this raises a very basic and fundamental issue about the accountability of the Senate to the people of the country. Tampering with the powers of the Senate or finding another method to appoint Senators, be it by the provinces or anyone else, does not deal with their accountability and responsibility to the people of Canada.

The third choice that is possible, which has been suggested today, is that of electing the Senate. I reject that proposal because it would bring about a very fundamental change in the concept of our democratic government and Canadian parliamentary system. As the Hon. Member for Scarborough West has pointed out, our system is a Cabinet system in which the Cabinet is responsible to the House. If there is more than one elected body, there will be two bodies claiming to have equal accountability and responsibility to the people of this country. They will be vying to represent the authority of those points of view as far as Canadians are concerned. I do not believe that will work and I think it would simply create a stalemate. It could very well happen that an elected body in this House and in the other House could have differing views on how the country should be run, and if so, both these elected bodies could claim to have the right to follow their respective course, based on the mandate they received from Canadians. I suggest that we do not want that.

What we have had in the past in this country is strong government. When the Government must act, it has had the ability to act because of the Cabinet and the parliamentary system. That is not the case in every democracy. France went through many republics before de Gaulle became President. The main reason that France could not come to grips with its problems was the instability of the constitutional system under which it was operating. We would not want to move from a system with one unelected, unrepresentative House, to a system with two, which would create a completely unstable government in this country. Personally, I believe we would be extremely foolish to adopt such a system.

It has been suggested that perhaps we could modify the powers of the Senate in relation to having an elected body there. At the same time, Senator Pitfield, whom my hon. friend quoted, also said that it would not be possible to limit the powers of another responsible and elected body for long because it would also have a mandate from the people.

The fourth choice, which I believe is the only choice, is that the Senate must in fact be abolished. It seems to me that when we look at the history of Canadian parliamentary democracy and try to find the isolated events when the Senate played a role of which we can be proud, the only one I can think of is the James Coyne affair. He is the former President of the Bank of Canada who came into conflict with the Government of the day. The Senate took his side in that argument and there was a great controversy in the country about whether or not the Government had the right to tell the Governor of the Bank of Canada how to run the monetary policy of the country. As a result of that Coyne affair, the Governor of the Bank resigned from his position. The question of whether the Government had the power to direct monetary policy was left in Limbo temporarily. Subsequently, a new Government with a majority in the Senate decided that the Government should have that power, and it changed the Bank of Canada Act so that it is now clear that Mr. Coyne's position was not the one we wanted in the country and that the Government of Canada should have that power.

Many people in various provinces have said in recent days that it would be foolish to abolish the Senate. There was a day when many provinces of this country had a second House of Legislature. Today, there is not one. In fact, the provinces abolished all of their legislative second Houses, and if they believed that the second legislative body was so essential to their proceedings it is almost inconceivable that they would believe we should not abolish the Senate of Canada.

Therefore, I am led inevitably to the conclusion that our Senate should be abolished and that this motion should be passed to call upon the Government to take some action in this manner.

What action can the Government take once the motion is passed? The Constitution Act sets out provisions for amending the Constitution of the country and the method for dealing with the Senate and any motion to abolish, or otherwise reform, the Senate. Those provisions are set out in Section 38(1) of the Act, as well as in Section 41 and Section 42.

Section 38(1) provides the power to pass a motion of the House of Commons. The remaining procedure is outlined, but my time is drawing to an end. I want to ensure that this motion comes to a vote this afternoon, and with that in mind, I urge you, Mr. Speaker, to put the motion to a vote right now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Senate

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Mr. Stackhouse, seconded by Mr. Redway, moves:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing a motion to amend the Constitution Acts, 1867 to 1982, in order to provide for a major reform of the Senate, so as to ensure that this House is able to fulfill the mandate it was elected to implement without undue interference.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The hour provided for consideration of Private Members' Business is now expired. It being five o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

The House adjourned at 4.59 p.m.

APPENDIX

ADDRESS

of

HIS EXCELLENCY JAVIER PEREZ DE CUELLAR

Secretary-General of the United Nations Organization

Both Houses of Parliament in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

on Thursday, March 7, 1985

His Excellency the Secretary-General was welcomed by the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Hon. G. Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate and the Hon. John W. Bosley, Speaker of the House of Commons.

[English]

Hon. John W. Bosley (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. Secretary-General, we are highly honoured to have you address this joint session of the Senate, and the House of Commons. Before calling on the Prime Minister, we want to welcome you and Mrs. Perez de Cuellar warmly to our Parliament.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Your Excellency, Mr. Secretary-General and Mrs. Perez de Cuellar, Hon. Members of the Senate and the House of Commons, it is a special occasion in the life of the Canadian Parliament when we gather to hear a distinguished visitor address a joint session of the Senate and the House of Commons. Today, we have the honour of receiving the head of the world's pre-eminent international organization, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and we bid you a warm welcome.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: In his presence let me reaffirm, on your behalf, Canada's commitment to the United Nations and to the values and aspirations it was created to serve.

Mr. Secretary-General, there has been no war on our soil in more than a century and a half. In that respect, Canadians are among the most fortunate people in the world. Yet three times in this century young Canadians have put on uniforms and, leaving all they love behind, have gone overseas to war. Six hundred and twenty thousand did so in the First World War; 550,000 in the Second World War; and 25,000 in Korea. More than 100,000 Canadians died in those wars. Most of them were younger by far than any of us in this Chamber today, and they lie in graves in Europe and Asia. Those who came back to Canada gladly turned to peaceful occupations and to the building of this country. Some of them sit in this parliament. Some have raised sons and daughters who sit in this parliament with us today.

[Translation]

Canada has not forgotten those days and the lessons of those days. So long as there remains etched in our national memory the sacrifice of our youth and the trauma of war, peace will be, Mr. Secretary-General, the paramount objective of this nation, of its Parliament and of its Government. I mean a lasting peace, a just peace, a universal peace.

[Applause]

Forty years ago the terrible memories were new and hopes were high that the United Nations could ensure international order and world peace.

On many occasions and in many parts of the world, the United Nations system has in fact helped prevent the worst from happening. Your predecessors, sir, have played an honourable and a memorable part in those events. Your own very tenacious efforts have contributed to the easing of tensions in such areas as the Falkland/Malvinas Islands, Cyprus, the Middle East and Africa.

[English]

Yet, as we meet today, the most tragic and brutal wars are laying waste to the lives and resources of human beings and nations in many parts of this world. These wars and their continuance mark the failure of our world organization to make peace prevail. This failure is a reproach, not to the United Nations, but to each and every member state.

As you know, Sir, Canada is a member of the North Atlantic Alliance. That Alliance has for more than 30 years helped prevent war in Europe. We believe in a strong defence as a deterrent to war. We believe further that a country such as ours can make its best contribution not only to defence but to peace and stability by participating in organizations such as these.

You will also be aware that the Canadian Armed Forces have taken part in almost every United Nations peace-keeping force that has been formed. We are particularly proud of the fact that we have never failed to respond as a nation to a call to serve the United Nations. We have heard that call in the past and it is with great pleasure that we meet with you today in the quest for peace.

[Translation]

The wars that are still raging in various parts of the globe do not seem ready today to respond to peacemaking or peacekeeping initiatives by the United Nations.

Is there a more effective way for the world community to anticipate and avert such wars?

That is a complex question. But I want you to know, Mr. Secretary-General, that Canada agrees that a good part of the answer lies in a stronger United Nations Organization.

In particular we support your personal efforts to play a more active role in the Security Council in dealing with critical world situations—and to pursue the task of peace-keeping and peacemaking as the sine qua non for significant progress in the social and economic spheres.

[English]

We welcome the steps you are taking to ensure that the machinery of international co-operation is serviced by an efficient and solid secretariat. Your actions have restored a strong and central role for the Secretary General in the management of the international system and in the conduct of world affairs. For that and for many other things, Sir, we salute you as we welcome you to our Parliament today.

Canada strongly supports this pivotal role within a renewed and revitalized United Nations system.

No less than the waging of frequent war in every part of our world, the threat of nuclear war and the danger that life on this planet will be extinguished by nuclear war is a reproach to member states and a disgrace to the ideals of the United Nations.

In every forum that is open to us, Canada will pursue arms control and disarmament with vigour, commitment and patience.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: In this connection, Mr. Secretary-General, I want you to know that your remarkable intervention, at the last General Assembly, on the dangers of nuclear war, struck a responsive chord here in Canada.

Mr. Secretary-General, if the multilateral system is, at worst, under siege or, at best, in a weakened state, then we pledge to strengthen the system.

We know that continued prosperity in Canada cannot be realized except in a healthy and growing world economy.

That is the meaning of interdependence. The world community must address with renewed seriousness the issues of trade and aid, of social and economic development, of raising living standards everywhere.

Up to now, those issues have been addressed intermittently. They must be addressed relentlessly or we shall constantly lose ground, all of us, especially the poorest.

[English]

Canadians have come to know you, Sir, for your determined and reasoned leadership of the United Nations. The leadership of the United Nations in co-ordinating the massive response of the international community to the emergency in Africa is a tribute to your personal commitment, a commitment which is shared by the Canadian people. At such times, we see vividly something of the immense possibilities for good when the nations of the world are mobilized to that end. We see manifested also, the solidarity of millions of individual human beings around the world, their sense of fraternity, their willingness to help. That, Sir, is a powerful force for the betterment of mankind.

Under your leadership, the international community must rededicate itself to the realization of these objectives and to the rule of law in international affairs. You can count upon the Canadian Government, the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people in this formidable pursuit. Welcome, Sir.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

His Excellency Javier Perez de Cuellar (Secretary-General of the United Nations Organization):

Mr. Speaker of the Senate,
Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons,
Mr. Prime Minister,
Honourable Members of Parliament.

Thank you, Mr. Prime Minister, most sincerely for your warm, generous, and stimulating words of welcome.

It is a great honour for me to address this joint session of the Canadian Parliament. I regard your invitation and kind welcome as another expression of that deep concern for the success of the United Nations, which has motivated Canada's role in the world Organization.

It has been an exemplary role, based, of course, on your sincere dedication to the aims of our Charter. But I believe it has also derived much of its vitality from this great country's distinctions: the rich diversity of your culture, the wide range of your international contacts and the understanding of world affairs which you command.

It has been suggested to me—from your side—that I should speak to you about the possibilities relating to Canada's future role in the United Nations and not deliver an encomium on your contributions in the past. The suggestion reflects an appealing modesty and generosity, yet it would be inappropriate for me to omit a reference to all that Canada has done to help the United Nations meet the difficult challenges facing it.

The break-through in 1955 in the deadlock which had frozen the composition of the United Nations, the innovative response in 1956 to the situation created by the Suez Canal crisis, your participation in almost all peace-keeping operations launched by the United Nations, your positive contributions to the work of every committee or commission set up since 1945 to deal with the issue of disarmament—these are only the most outstanding instances. Long before the issue of achieving greater balance in the world economy assumed its present prominence, Canada was among the pioneers of the idea of technical assistance programs for developing countries being undertaken by the United Nations.

Let me, therefore, pay my heartfelt tribute to Canada's loyal and consistent support of the endeavours of the world Organization. Solidly based as it is on a national consensus, sustained as it has been through your successive administrations, it provides a graphic illustration of the capabilities of countries, other than the permanent members of the Security Council, to advance the work of the United Nations. I might parenthetically mention here that it has become conventional to call countries such as yours the medium-sized ones. The phrase is hardly descriptive of a number among them. Canada, for one, is large not only in territory but also in spirit and intellect, in its resources of statesmanship and in its philosophy of practical co-operation in international life.

As I stand before you today, looking ahead in this year of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations, I feel that the future appears to hold even better prospects for the decisive role of countries such as yours. A dynamic United Nations system provides you with a unique instrument for wielding a collective influence on the resolution of outstanding global issues. It is true that major decisions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security depend on the agreement of the permanent members of the Security Council. But in our age of interdependence, other countries have an equal stake in peace and cannot, therefore, be bystanders. A privileged position is conferred on a few, but responsibility rests with all.

Ladies and gentlemen, I am sure you are aware of the increased dissatisfaction being expressed in certain circles with the way the United Nations operates. It is said, and there is some truth in this argument, that the UN has been steadily losing credibility. I have said as much, if not more so, myself. However, can the world afford to sit back after making such a judgment? Credibility requires that we provide purpose and direction to the multilateral dialogue on issues that give rise to tension and threaten to cause conflicts between nations.

Since in the world forum that is the United Nations, the dialogue is an international one, it is incumbent on those who express dissatisfaction to bring to this forum the requisite practical and methodical approach and appreciation of urgency and consistency which together may be expected to produce concrete results. An organization like the UN cannot afford to maintain a purely rhetorical stance. It cannot afford to prevent the free expression of the aspirations, fears and grievances of the peoples of this world. It is important that each Member State consider the success or failure of the UN as the success or failure of a personal undertaking. Small- and medium-sized powers have various avenues open to them for making good use of the capability of the UN to promote negotiations leading to lasting agreements. These countries can influence the climate of debate and play a moderating role in international conflict. They can formulate specific and realistic suggestions and put them on the agenda of the international community. Through discreet diplomacy they can help fend off threats to peace. The United Nations offers many opportunities for consultation and contacts between ministers of Foreign Affairs and heads of government, which can be used to seek a meeting of minds, to explore avenues that may lead to an agreement on major issues and to analyze the world situation.

[English]

I have mentioned earlier the idea of peace-keeping by the United Nations and the part that Canada has played in its conception and development. Peace-keeping operations have conclusively shown the resilience and responsiveness of the United Nations and its capacity for conflict control. The very idea of launching a peace-keeping mission with the help of member states that are not permanent members of the Security Council puts a focus on the responsibility of these states for the maintenance of international peace and security.

But the responsibility does not end with containing a conflict; it extends to resolving the underlying cause of the conflict. Peace-keeping without peace-making can be but a palliative. The cooling-off period which peace-keeping operations manage to secure is of little avail if it serves only as a prelude to a more violent eruption.

I do not have to cite any particular regional conflict: the proposition holds true of all that, without a credible movement toward a just and lasting settlement of an international dispute, pent-up passions accumulate and distrust mounts.

Frequently, such a situation runs the risk of dangerous escalation on to a global plane, with immediate ramifications for the entire international community.

The Charter of the United Nations lists all conceivable means for the pacific settlement of disputes. At present, in situations where direct negotiations are difficult or impossible for one reason or another, states rarely feel encouraged to avail themselves of such means as mediation, the good offices of an impartial third party, or adjudication. This is one of the cardinal manifestations of disorganization in international affairs. However, the failure is by no means terminal. Member states of the United Nations can exert a collective and benevolent pressure for the rational settlement of international disputes.

In this regard, the bulk of these states, compared to the world powers, have the advantage of greater flexibility because they are less entangled historically in the causes of the conflict. Alone, none of them can expect success in mediating a dispute: together, their voice can be persuasive and may well prove irresistible.

I would urge influential states like Canada to use the opportunities afforded by the United Nations for giving a fresh impulse to encouraging the comprehensive and durable settlement of regional conflicts. I do not underrate the difficulties involved but, even with the small signs of realism and fluidity that can be discerned in certain situations, the climate may be more propitious now than it has been in recent years. In some situations, the United Nations or the Secretary-General remains essential to communication between the parties. I think, for example, of Cyprus, over which at the moment I am engaged in a new personal effort to find a solution, of Afghanistan, the Iran-Iraq war and South-East Asia.

Another very important area in which a country like Canada can play a most useful role is the promotion of the North-South dialogue. I do not believe that there is a primordial or inherent conflict between the interests of the developing countries and those of the industrialized ones: all will benefit from a more efficient, less unbalanced and less crisis-prone global economy. If the positions respectively formulated by the two sides seem irreconcilable, a more imaginative approach can help to bridge the gulf. What is important is that the dialogue should be free from the tone of confrontation.

Canada has been second to none among the industrialized countries in acknowledging the necessity of making the world economic system more responsive to poverty in large parts of the globe. Your statesmen have urged a less fractious approach to the process of giving a more balanced meaning to the idea of economic interdependence. The objectivity and breadth of vision that inspired their appeal can be most helpful in stimulating some progress in the North-South dialogue.

[Translation]

One of the main concerns of our society today is the existing situation with respect to human rights. Paradoxically, at a time when the United Nations, after tremendous efforts, has succeeded in giving the provisions guaranteeing the protection of human rights force of law internationally those very rights are still being violated on a wide scale. For the first time in history, the states that make up the international community and are signatories to the Charter of the United Nations are committed to work together to promote and foster respect for human rights and basic freedoms for all. Such instruments as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and related convenants prescribe those standards against which the international community can judge the behaviour of a state in that context. Various procedures have been established to make it easier for the states to adhere to those standards. Unfortunately, many regions of the world still violate them, and that is one of the most disturbing characteristics of mankind. This problem ought to be tackled with tact, and the method most likely to give positive results ought to be adopted. In my opinion, countries such as Canada can contribute to strengthening the means available to the United Nations to allay the great sufferings caused by the denial of human rights and dignity.

In conclusion, may I allude to the concern which, in the minds of people the world over, overshadows by far all others: the apprehension stemming from the unrelenting expansion of the nuclear arsenal. Here again Canada has the advantage of being a country which, however advanced in the realm of nuclear technology, is not equipped with nuclear weapons.

In that capacity, you are in a position to give invaluable assistance to overcome the technical obstacles which stand in the way of the implementation of effective measures to limit and, ultimately, eliminate nuclear arms. Mankind's foremost objective must be to reverse the trend towards nuclear overarmament. This is not the proper forum for me to attempt to analyze the various reasons why no progress has been made to that end. However, it seems to me that the human mind has now become a prisoner of a new form of determinism, even more paralyzing than fatalism: a belief in predestination, to which the fall of the glorious civilizations of the past has been attributed. I am speaking of the submissiveness to the ruthless advance of military technology.

Technology should be at the service of mankind and not be the ruler of its destiny. If private corporations can maintain control over their industrial technology and use it sensibly in their own financial interests, there is no reason why states cannot maintain control over the technology of destruction in the interests of peace. However, such control requires reciprocal agreements to put an end to the arms race. Without these agreements, science can play the role of the sorcerer's apprentice as far as armaments are concerned; if we want the gnome to stop before all of us are swept away by the flood, we need an order from our political leaders.

As a matter of fact, the arms race among the major world powers was prompted by their serious concerns about their own security. However, the concept of security cannot be solely military; its other aspects, whether economic, social, cultural or philosophic, are infinitely more important today than in the past. Moreover, there is no reason to believe that our quest for security must always lead us to outbid each other as far as armaments are concerned rather than agreeing to a mutual reduction of arms levels. Without an armament limitation agreement there can never be a fixed point at which one of the parties can feel assured of equality or of an advantage in armaments. Viewed only in terms of armaments, total security is a goal which always recedes further as we close in on it and which is always just out of reach. Humanity cries out to escape from this vicious circle.

[English]

Distinguished Members of Parliament, I have touched on only some of the more important problems facing the international community today. I am convinced that if these and other difficulties are to be tackled squarely, we must all concentrate more on what unites us as human beings than on the often transitory factors that pit nations as adversaries one against the other. Few nations know better than Canada the need to recognize fully and accommodate differing voices in a representative forum.

Such recognition is the secret of your success as a people. Success for the community of nations cannot be complete while so many of our fellow human beings languish in deprivation. Ultimately, we must all advance together, and I am convinced that the United Nations is by far and away the best vehicle for doing so. I am gratified indeed to find here in Canada such frank and fair recognition of these truths and I look forward to continued close co-operation with you as we proceed to our common goal.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Guy Charbonneau (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. Secretary-General, being aware of your reputation, I knew you would be sharing with us today some profound thoughts on the current problems of a divided world. As we sit upon a huge powder keg, the detonator of which could be activated from the four corners of the world, we find solace in the assurance that the Secretary-General of the organization whose mission is to unite all the nations on earth is endowed with such a positive understanding. As a matter of fact, you carry out your duties with the realism of an experienced politician and the generosity of a confirmed humanist.

As we commemorate this year the 100th anniversary of Victor Hugo's death, allow me to quote one of the biting comments for which this great man was deservedly famous and which reflects on the nearly superhuman dimension of your quest: "Universal peace is an hyperbola and the human race is following its asymptote". In other words, we are trying to bring together two parallel lines which can never meet.

In spite of this age-old evidence, you fervently persevere in your efforts to foster appeasement throughout the world, efforts which we, as Canadians, both admire and support. In your achievements so far we find grounds for hope because, like us, you constantly proclaim the priority of right over force, of reason over blind passion, and of dialogue over violence.

Through your untiring and omnipresent action, you appear to us to have acquired a sense of ubiquity which is the distinct characteristic of a universal assembly. You must be everywhere at once because nations all over the world need a peacemaker.

[English]

When things go wrong, it is easy to join the chorus criticizing the United Nations. But we should never lose faith and throw our hands up in exasperation. You know as we in Canada know that the United Nations system can be no stronger than the collective will of its member states. We cannot treat the United Nations as a handy scapegoat.

It is not surprising that the United Nations is having more difficulty carrying out its responsibilities in the maintenance of peace and security. The drift toward political conflict and war between nations is never easy to reverse. You, Mr. Secretary-General, have continued to work assiduously in the centre of these conflicts in the highest traditions of your office. I need only note that where all others have failed to date, you have successfully chipped away at the inhuman edges of the war between Iran and Iraq. In Cyprus, you are bringing the leaders of the two Cypriot communities together to promote a settlement. You must not lose hope. You should draw your encouragement from quiet successes and the support of nations like Canada for the long road ahead.

We are honoured by your presence among us. Canadians support you in your vital work. We are proud of the contribution we shall continue to make in strengthening the United Nations so that it can rise to the new challenges. Thank you, Mr. Secretary-General.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John W. Bosley (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. Secretary-General, on behalf of the Hon. Members of this House of Commons and the people of Canada, I wish to thank you for sharing your thoughts with us so eloquently.

Twenty-one years ago, U Thant spoke in this Chamber and brought to Canadians a message that still rings with relevance and importance. He said to us that "for all its moral authority and good intentions, the United Nations, like any peaceful agent of order and justice, cannot be effective without some co-operation, some give and take, some effort to move forward, on the part of the peoples primarily concerned". Today, you gave us a message that will stay with Canadians for at least another 21 years.

[Translation]

We are compelled by your masterly review of the current global situation to ponder seriously over the problems faced by the international community and over the impact on each of us of the "multilateralism crisis."

You have explained why it is of the utmost importance that the United Nations Assembly should remain strong.

If there is a lesson to be drawn from recent history, it is the global interdependence of nations.

Without such a dynamic mechanism for international co-operation, the conflicting interests of nations would lead to chaos. In a world of increasing complexity, the United Nations is an essential body.

[English]

Canadians know this, and as you have heard in the Prime Minister's introduction, Canada remains committed to the United Nations, its principles and its objectives, in both word and deed. As you have indicated, what is needed is a revitalization of the U.N. system. What better or more effective way could there be to celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations?

[Translation]

During the thirties, certain countries turned their backs on the League of Nations, and the consequences were disastrous. If in a nuclear era a new cataclysm were required to have us realize the importance of mankind's heritage, we might very well find that we have nothing left on which to rebuild the world.

This is the reason why your message to us today is of unparalleled urgency and import.

[English]

For Canadians, peace is an urgent matter, as it is for you. We too hope that leaders around the world will find the way to make peace last forever throughout our planet. For Canadians, the blue beret that has been worn with pride by thousands of Canadian peace-keepers is a constant and positive reminder of Canada's partnership with the United Nations. You, Sir, by your presence and your words here today have reinforced this partnership. For this we are truly grateful. Again, Mr. Secretary General, thank you.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This meeting is now adjourned.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fraser that Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place today to speak on Bill C-32. I am pleased for a number of reasons. This Bill gives us an opportunity to address some outstanding issues in the fishing community, both on the east coast of Canada and, in particular, on the west coast of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the Hon. Member for just one second. I would like to ask a simple question. I understood when we interrupted this debate on Friday that the Hon. Member wanted to rise and ask questions at that point. Is the Hon. Member now asking questions or is he resuming debate?

Just for the formality, may I see if there are any Members who wish to ask questions in the question time remaining. There being no such questions, we will resume debate with the Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I would have been delighted to ask questions today but the Hon. Member who spoke last is not in the House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Hon. Member is not supposed to refer to that fact.

Mr. Tobin: I do not think it would be proper, given such an excellent first effort by this Member, who is sincere in his concern about the fishery, to question him seeing that he is not here. I am sure the Hon. Government House Leader would agree that is a very proper attitude for a Member from Newfoundland to take.

As I said, I am pleased to have an opportunity to address this Bill. I do not think there is anyone in this House of Commons who does not support a request by the Minister to clarify his powers with respect to his ability to allocate fish, be it on the west coast or on the east coast of Canada. I think all of us recognize that, given the court cases that have occurred and the fact that the Minister's powers are very fuzzy at this time, there is a need for him to be certain what his powers are with respect to the allocation of fish.

That is not the problem, Mr. Speaker. We support the thrust of the Bill. What Members do not support is the notion that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) should have the right to allocate fish unimpeded by any body, by any court, by any user group, without first telling Members of this House and, more important, telling the user groups on the west coast and on the east coast what the guidelines and parameters should be respecting the allocation of fish.

On the west coast of Canada, Mr. Speaker, you would appreciate the tremendous value of the salmon fishery worth many hundreds of millions of dollars, some estimate as much as a billion dollars, and you would know there are conflicts between various user groups, between native and non-native fishermen, between commercial and sports fishermen—

Ms. Mitchell: Fish people.

Mr. Tobin: The Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) reminds me I should say fish people—and between fish people of whatever sex.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: These conflicts are real and the bottom line is that they affect people's ability to make a living. They affect their livelihood, their ability to put bread and butter on the table and their ability to protect, in many cases sometimes, decades of investment by way of gear and vessels and the most modern technology the industry can offer at this time. We have a Minister asking us for approval to clarify his role and his powers to allocate fish without first telling us what the parameters and the guidelines should be with respect to the conflicts between the various user groups. That simply is not acceptable, Sir. We must have a clear statement from the Minister before this House can give approval to a Bill knowing what the consequences of giving the Minister that authority will be.

In my own Province of Newfoundland, there are a number of outstanding issues. I represent a riding, if Members of the New Democratic Party are interested—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: —on the great northern peninsula of Newfoundland. It is a riding with 500 miles of coastline consisting of 90,000 souls and several hundred communities. In over 50 per cent of those communities people live in small villages or towns with populations of under 1,000. I know Members will appreciate that in that kind of environment, the fishery, the health of the fishery, the sensitivity of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, his knowledge and his commitment to the fishery, is critical. It is the difference between having a life of dignity, a life which, if not prosperous, is at least decent, and having no life at all.

The people along that 500 miles of coastline have been trying to organize a meeting with the Minister of Fisheries and his officials in a community called St. Anthony which is located on the tip of the great northern peninsula right on the edge of the Cabot Strait. They pulled together every development association, every fisheries committee and every economic development group along that coastline to have a meeting with the Minister to discuss the establishment of a northern fisheries development corporation. The meeting was scheduled for the end of last month but the Minister, being a busy man and despite the many weeks of preparation, could not attend. Thus the problems and aspirations of the people living on that rocky coastline of the great northern peninsula were put on the shelf. Being the decent people that they are, they did not complain; they simply came back and asked the Minister whether they could schedule another date.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, I am sad to say, as busy as he is, responded last week in the House of Commons by indicating that he could not commit himself to any such meeting or to being in St. Anthony—the outer perimeter of the world, it sounded like to me—but that he would be glad to send some officials. When 30,000 souls along 200 miles of coastline take the trouble for weeks to organize a meeting about the very lifeblood which puts bread and butter on their table, they do not want to meet some official. They know the buck stops with the Minister of Fisheries. They know, because I have told them even though I sit on this side of the House, that the Minister of Fisheries is a good and decent man, if one can simply get his ear. He wants to be an effective Minister of Fisheries. However, they do not know that the Minister has his hands tied by a Minister of Finance who has already slashed in November $31 million from the fisheries budget, by a Minister of Finance who cancelled the $15 million which had been allocated to negotiations between the Province of Newfoundland and the Government of Canada for the establishment of a northern fisheries development corporation on the great northern peninsula.

Hon. Members are probably wondering why we need this northern fisheries development corporation. It is because on the northern peninsula, north of the fiftieth parallel, from the community of Port au Choix all along the peninsula to the Labrador coast and on to the Quebec north shore, historically fishermen and fish plants, as humble as they are, have been nothing but a feeder plant, exporters of raw material. Fishermen bring in some of the best product in the world from some of the richest fishing grounds in the world to a small fish plant. The fish is simply cut, put on ice, loaded on a truck and exported to Boston. There the product is finished, filleted, packaged and frozen, and it comes back not only to Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, but to the great northern peninsula as a finished product.

The people on that coast realize that there is something wrong. When they export raw fish, they are not only exporting that product but they are exporting jobs which could and should exist on the great northern peninsula. Each small feeder plant is part of the chain of either a national or international fishing conglomerate. Even though the majority of fish is landed on that coastline in the north, it suits the objectives of multinationals to ship it raw off the northern peninsula and south of the border for packaging.

Fishermen have the raw product and the determination. Given the assistance, the time and the attention of the Minister and of both Governments, they would have the ability within their grasp to take hold of their destiny, to fasten their own sail, to be masters in their own house and to be captain of their own ship. Jobs could be created where they should be, on the great northern peninsula, but that will take our help. If we are going to help, we have to listen. They cannot come to Ottawa. The Minister has to take the time; he has to see it as a high enough priority to go to the great northern peninsula and give these people the fair hearing that they deserve.

There is another matter that upsets me greatly. In the November 8 financial statement by the Minister of Finance the Minister announced that in future berthage fees will be charged to fishermen right across this country. A fisherman who ties up to a public wharf will have to pay a parking fee.

We have the spectacle of this Government having practically put a freeze on small craft harbours funding right across this country, an end to upgrading, maintaining and building new facilities for fishermen on the one hand. On the other hand we have the announcement that fishermen will have to pay to tie up to a wharf. There is a disparity in facilities not only across the regions of this country—some regions have fairly good facilities, some have hardly any—but the disparity within the regions is such that no fair and just berthage fee can be charged to fishermen.

When I was Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, I had the pleasure of travelling to the great west coast of Canada. At a public wharf, I saw boats lined up 10, 12 and 15 deep. Who will pay the berthage fee? Will it be the fisherman who actually gets to tie up to the wharf who will pay the fee? Will the fellow 15 boats out have to pay when he is not sheltered and protected? According to this regulation, they will all pay.

On the northern peninsula of Newfoundland there is a wharf in the community of Anchor Point where $25 million in fish is landed and taxes are paid. The wharf is falling into the water. Will those fishermen have to pay a berthage fee to tie up to that dilapidated structure? I do not think so. This Government should first establish a basic level of service, a basic quality or standard of harbour facility before deciding to charge fishermen to tie up to facilities which in many cases, if they exist at all, are poor.

Members who were here during the last Parliament will recall the many hours of debate on the bail-out of Fisheries Products International in the Province of Nova Scotia and in the Province of Newfoundland. Some $200 million of government funds was injected to save Nickerson's, National Seed, The Lake Group and Fisheries Products. A new company was formed, Fisheries Products International.

During the time of that debate, the position taken by the Party opposite and by the like-minded Premier of Newfoundland, the Hon. Brian Peckford, who Members opposite will say is a good Conservative, was that no fish plant that was owned by the new conglomerate, Fisheries Products International, could close. Every job had to be saved in every single community. At the time I thought that was a bit ambitious. In fact, I knew it was.

I am bothered now by statements of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens) that Fisheries Products International is for sale. Having injected $200 million of taxpayers' money into that company, having revived the company, having put the company back in operation and beginning the process of making it productive, it will be passed over for a song to private enterprise. They are going to take it back as well as the taxpayers' $200 million. More than that, we are now being told by the federal Government and the Government of Newfoundland that the non-productive plants of Fisheries Products International, and there are several dozen, can be closed. Those communities can be consigned to the dustbin of history. The productive plants, those that are showing a profit when it is sold, will be kept open. I would use an unparliamentary word, Mr. Speaker, but you would simply interrupt my line of thought. Exhibiting concern before September 4 and being brutal immediately afterward is not worthy of the members of the Government.

There are communities both in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland that have been fishing communities for 500 years. There are isolated communities and small towns that have only become accessible by road in the last 15 years though it still takes a drive of a day or two to get to them. There are small towns in which the culture and the way of life have revolved around the fishery. These communities are now being told by the Government, without its offering any alternative suggestion as to how they may provide for themselves otherwise, that their history has been long and colourful but they are about to be consigned to the next chapter of the book on ghost towns in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will have to address all of these questions before he finds that members of my Party are prepared to give him the ultimate power to assign quotas for the fish that is available to fishermen and fishing companies.

Let me say in closing that I know the Minister of Fisheries. I have had the pleasure of working with him for the last five years. I know him to be a decent man, a caring man and a sensitive man. However, I know as well that he is a member of a Cabinet that will slash the fishery with no forethought of the consequences in human terms and in terms of isolated communities which have no other options.

On behalf of the Minister and the people I represent, I beg the Minister's Cabinet colleagues to listen to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans because he understands. Because I know the Minister understands and cares, I say to him that if his colleagues will not listen and if the kind of brutal "bull-in-a-china-shop" approach that has been taken so far continues, I would ask the Minister to find the courage and integrity required to do the right thing. He knows that that right thing is to stand up on behalf of his first constituency as Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and to expose the brutal approach to fishermen, their families and their communities that has been taken so far in the brief six months in which this Government has been in power.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the Hon. Member on his speech. I would like to ask him a question. The Minister of Fisheries for the Province of Newfoundland has stated publicly that the Government of Newfoundland has made representations to the federal Government about the province's concerns over the federal Government's announcement that it will be terminating the federal fishing vessel insurance program. The union in Newfoundland is also objecting to the termination of this insurance scheme. As of yesterday, the Government of Newfoundland has publicly opposed the cancellation of this scheme.

The provincial Minister of Fisheries has given a public indication that the federal Government is now rethinking this cancellation. He also claims that the federal Government will support the seal hunters and that the federal Government will do this, that and the other thing. I am wondering whether or not the Hon. Member could comment on those items.

• (1125)

Mr. Tobin: It is wonderful what the eminent call of a provincial election will do to wake up the provincial fisheries Minister to the problems which fishermen face in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador. My fellow colleague, the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), may or may not know this, but the Premier of Newfoundland has reserved prime time on television and radio tonight. He is going to call an election. Lo and behold, his Ministers in each portfolio, and in particular the Minister of Fisheries, have discovered their clientele, and that all is not rosy and well with Ottawa.

I would say to the Hon. Member opposite that we have not heard a sound from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans about the $36 million in cut-backs which were announced on November 8 by the Minister of Finance. We have not heard about the introduction of berthage fees, or the cancellation of the vessel subsidy program. Nor have we heard a sound from the Province of Newfoundland about its long-standing statement that northern cod should only be used for the benefit of Newfoundland and no one else. As a Canadian and a Newfoundlander, that is a position with which I disagree. It has gone by the wayside.

If the politicking between federal and provincial Government was not so obvious, it would be hilarious. Unfortunately, the consequences of that kind of cynical view with respect to fisheries development and management is brutal, not for the politicians who sit in the House, but for the fishermen who live in small communities on the great northern peninsula such as Bear Cove, Anchor Point, Flower's Cove or Cooks Harbour. It is brutal to those fishermen and their families. It is not a laughing matter, it is rather sad.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, one of the interesting things which I did not hear the previous speaker elaborate on was how the Liberal Party destroyed the fisheries in Canada. For years and years tremendous opportunities on the west coast laid fallow. I know that the Hon. Member touched on the incompetence of this Government. I wonder if he would care to speak to many of the former Liberal Ministers of Fisheries who did nothing constructive with respect to the West Coast fishery?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting that fellows who go to hockey games, sit up in the stands and who have never had a hockey stick in their hands claim to be the biggest experts. We all know the NDP has never formed a government, and will never form a government, so its members are armchair experts in every field of endeavour.

Let me speak about the province which I know best. The reality is, in those districts where the fishing constituency is predominant, Newfoundlanders returned to the House of Commons the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), the Hon. Member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey), and myself, the Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe, despite the best predictions of the pundits. Let me say, in all humility, that I have great respect for the opinions and the decisions of the fishermen of Newfoundland. They decided to send three of us back to the House of Commons in the last election. When the NDP next has the opportunity to hold the hockey stick, its members may then make comments. He who has clean hands has no hands, and I guess the hands of the NDP will stay clean for a long time.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I have a very short comment. I feel certain New Democratic Members will agree that never before in the history of the Government of Canada have we seen so many cuts in such a short period of time as we have recently seen in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Never before in the history of the Government of Canada have we seen as many cuts in every federal Department as we have seen in the last few months. There is no comparison—and one could go back to Sir John A. Macdonald—between any former Government and this present Government. It is unfortunate that the New Democratic Party at times is so preoccupied with trying to criticize former Governments that it sometimes loses sight of what is happening today in Canada, and that is what we are dealing with. I would hope that that Party would take aim at the real issues which face this nation and which have been created by this present Government.

• (1130)

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to follow up on what my hon. colleague has just stated. We have all seen the recent love affair carried on out west with the First Ministers' conference. My hon. friend from Newfoundland has really laid it on the line about the qualities of the federal Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser). I would ask the Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) who spoke on this issue if he and the people of Newfoundland do not agree that although the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans might have all of those qualities which were mentioned, he has very little clout in Cabinet and has no influence against this "cut, cut, cut" committee which has been working within the Tory Cabinet? Would the Hon. Member not agree that because the Newfoundland Government has gone along with the love affair we have seen in western Canada, it is in no position now to go back to its own people and say that it fought for the people of Newfoundland? Indeed, it is my two colleagues from Newfoundland who are the ones standing up in this House and defending the rights, privileges and livelihoods of the fishermen in Newfoundland.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member very much for his question. I have one brief comment to make to my colleagues from the New Democratic Party who now profess a sudden interest in the fishery. I noticed with great interest the fact that during the entire summer election campaign, neither the Leader of the New Democratic Party nor any other Hon. Member of that Party visited the Province of Newfoundland even once. Obviously they did not deem it important enough. They did not know enough about the province and they thought it was so insignificant and irrelevant that they didn't even bother to come and visit the province.

Our Leader got elected on the west coast. That Party's Leader did not even take the time to visit the Province of Newfoundland even once during an entire summer election campaign. There can be no more of a stinging indictment than that the New Democratic Party is more interested in holding up the proverbial carrot, promising everything to everybody, rather than taking a serious, mature and realistic approach to problems besetting individuals across this country today.

With respect to his question, I would like to tell my hon. colleague that I believe, as I said earlier, that this Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is a well-intentioned fellow. He is basically a good man. But I feel he is surrounded by Ministers such as the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) who have no knowledge of and, indeed, no sensitivity to the importance of the fishery to both the east coast and the west coast and are prepared to act with a hatchet in dealing with the fishermen on both those coasts. I hope that this Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will emerge as a strong Minister who has clout. I know he has more brains than all of the rest of the Cabinet put together.

What I do not know is whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has the common sense to recognize that fact. So far he has not. So far the Government has scuttled that Minister and held him up to derision in front of the fishermen of Canada. This Minister is taking flak he does not deserve. He is being blamed for program cuts which he did not initiate. We on this side of the House are trying to help this Minister do his job and be a good Minister, and if Hon. Members opposite cared and would listen, they would get behind this Minister and give him a hand because, basically, he is a good man. But that Minister is in with a crowd of people who belong on the saddle of a robber's horse.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, after the Hon. Member's last statement I feel a little winded, to say the least. There is a lot of hot air flowing around this Chamber.

In speaking to Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, I want to express the concern which I believe other Hon. Members have expressed that it really is unfortunate that the Minister in this case has made a decision to again centralize the power of the fisheries in his office and in the bureaucracy which in the past have not had a great deal of credibility with the people who are doing the fishing and with the industry as a whole. He has taken it upon himself, without consultation with the people who are directly concerned, to allocate the fish supply.

The intent of the Bill, as I understand it, is to expand the authority of the Minister and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and in particular to expand the proper management, allocation and control of the sea coast fisheries of Canada. In our view, the Bill gives far too much power to the Minister to allocate the fishery resource. It would seem that this will be controlled largely by the Minister and his staff and undoubtedly would lead to an increase in the bureaucracy which has been far too insensitive, at least at the central level, to the needs of the west coast fisheries in particular. This Bill expands the role of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans personnel and gives them greater authority.

Something I noticed in the Bill which I expect we will agree with is the intent to redefine the term "fish" to include plants. I would hope here that the intent is to expand into various types of fish farming and the farming of sea plants which we know have considerable nutritional value and perhaps export value as well.

The previous speaker remarked on the terminology of the Bill. In preparing for my remarks this morning I found myself once again struggling with the terminology of "fishermen" in view of our charter and wondering what would be a better term. Perhaps we should have a redefinition of that term in this Bill. I considered "fish people", which sounds a little silly, and "fish folk", which sounds a little folksy, but concluded that perhaps we should be using the word "fishers" as a generic term for workers in this industry.

West coast fishers on the whole are a very large community. In the past it has been a very large industry. I would like to give you, Mr. Speaker, a few statistics. The average wholesale value of the Pacific and Yukon fishery management resource between 1979 and 1983 was $45 million. There are some 17,000 commercial fishers and 350,000 to 400,000 recreational fishers. In addition to that, of course, there are many native communities whose main means of survival and potential for economic development is fishing. There are five species of salmon which constitutes the most valuable catch on the west coast. This makes up about 64 per cent of the value of the industry.

The herring and herring roe fishery is a particularly large industry in British Columbia. We are the prime suppliers to the Japanese market and, of course, we have concern about what is happening to our herring fisheries as well as a concern for the salmon fishery. There are many people who work in related industries as well. In my riding of Vancouver East there are many immigrant and native women who get up very early in the morning, while it is still dark, in order to get down to the port to work in the fish canneries and fish freezing industries. Those industries are big job suppliers in my riding and in many others. Potentially, therefore, we have a very strong fishing industry in the Province of British Columbia and potentially it is a self-sufficient industry. It is very important as a renewable resource, but we must take the steps which are needed and which have been so long delayed to have an adequate renewal program.

We know that in recent years there has been a very worrisome shortage of fish on the west coast. This indicates the very urgent need for a proper salmon enhancement program, adequate planning, and the development of new and related industries. I recently saw a very impressive program on TV showing the experiments going on in oyster farming off the northern coast. As the fisher people will tell us, there is a lot that can be done in catching, processing and exporting fish that Canadians do not eat but which other countries, particularly Asian countries, would be very pleased to get in greater numbers, dogfish and hake being two of them. Seaweed and other forms of sea plants are other areas that can and should be developed for a variety of purposes.

There has been an increasing rivalry, given a limited supply of fish on the west coast, between the various user groups seeking the resource. The reduction in available fish has been complicated and perhaps even affected by poor management in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I think most people on the west coast who are close to this industry would agree that the lack of adequate planning and consultation with the various groups involved has been a major problem.

My colleague challenged the Liberal Member to look back at the record of the Liberal Government. There is no question at all that the various experts the Liberals used came in with plans and the bureaucracy and the Minister himself just seemed to take their word without consultation with the user groups, and that added greatly to our problems. We had hoped this Minister would be different. As was pointed out, he is from the west coast, he is sensitive and I think tries very hard for a just approach in most matters. In view of that, we are very disappointed in this Bill.

I would like to point out that any planning for the fisheries industry must consider human resources as well as the fish resources. The native communities up and down our coast have survived for hundreds or even thousands of years on fish supply. It is the main source of jobs for commercial fishermen and they are very worried. Many of them invested a great deal of money in very expensive vessels and it is critical that they obtain a certain amount of take each year. It is not just the individual fisher people who are affected, it is also their communities. We predict that if these kinds of cut-backs continue along the west coast, many coastal villages will almost disappear. Of course, this affects mothers and children, indeed all the people living in those communities.

We have found that the Liberals were inclined to be very biased toward the sports fishermen. Indeed, this is a big industry. I would not put it at the top of the list myself, but I do know that there is considerable room for expansion if we have more fish so that it is not taking jobs away from commercial fishers and food out of the mouths of native communities.

What is the present Government doing? This Bill was laid on us just as the salmon treaty with the United States was agreed on. There was no consultation with the people who are going to be directly affected and this is very difficult to understand. This Government has talked over and over again about consultation. The Minister himself should certainly be sensitive to this need. The Conservatives promised fair representation and co-operative management in consultation, but where is the consultation? Has there been fair representation in the process involved in presenting this Bill? Once again the Minister did not consult before presenting his plan. He has not gone to the groups most affected despite having promised a more open department. I think there is a considerable concern that again the bureaucrats will be in charge. While we know there are many fine workers in the Public Service, the central bureaucrats have tended to lay some pretty heavy trips on some west coast people and have not been sensitive to their views and needs. So we must ask the Minister to reconsider this and go back to a process which will involve people.

I am not an expert in this field, Mr. Speaker, but the creation of some form of independent board removed from the political sphere seems to make a great deal of sense to me. This was proposed by a lot of people concerned; indeed it was part of the Conservatives' election campaign promises. The board would be outside of political influence entirely and independent of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Such a board should consist of members of user groups such as the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union in British Columbia. It should include native representatives such as the Native Brotherhood, sports fishers and all those who have a particular interest in this industry, including management. The board should examine the Atlantic and Pacific fisheries stock and determine the size and quality. It should establish a recommended level of expected return and escapement and the catch levels. It should set quotas and make recommendations on allocations to the Minister. This would take the responsibility away from the Minister and his Department and place it in the hands of the industry.

About a week ago we had a job task force meeting in Vancouver and representatives of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union made a presentation: They said:

> The fishing industry in British Columbia is not now nor has it ever been a welfare state for the people who produce its wealth. With our rich salmon resources, the industry has been able to stand on its own two feet although it has experienced its booms and busts. The potential for the industry is being smothered by the bureaucracy and government indifference. Incredible as it may seem, the Department of Fisheries & Oceans is staffed by some 6,000 people nation-wide, when our fishing industries from coast to coast, produce a landed value comparable to a country like Norway (pop. 4.14 million).
>
> Administration of the Pacific fisheries must be de-politicized. The Pacific Fisheries Development Board needs to be created, properly and adequately funded, to develop our fisheries to their fullest potential. The Board's authority would be:
> 1.) Arrange loans at reasonable rates of interest to fishermen to finance vessels and gear.
> 2.) Selectively reduce the fishing fleets that have an over-capacity for fishing and/or are over-capitalized. Fleet reductions must be voluntary and accomplished by attrition.
> 3.) A comprehensive and scientific salmonid enhancement program to concentrate on the enhancement of wild stocks.

● (1150)

> 4.) Conduct research with particular reference to coastal and high seas interceptions of salmon. Canada must lay claim to salmon spawned in its streams and rivers and assert ownership over our valuable and fragile salmon resources.
>
> 5.) Develop fisheries and markets for under-utilized or non-utilized species like dogfish and hake.
> 6.) Protection of fisheries habitat particularly that for salmon.

These are some of the measures that would be taken to ensure that the fishing industry remains a vibrant and viable part of British Columbia's economy and to ensure that sound management and development policies are being practised for the benefit of the owners of our Pacific fisheries resources—the Canadian people as a whole. I do not understand why there is nothing in the Bill that recommends the establishment of such an interdisciplinary board which would be independent from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

There are certain very important principles to the fishing industry that are being threatened by the amendments in this Bill. First, we believe that all users of the resource, including native, commercial and sports fishers, have the right to share in the resource and therefore be involved in the planning and decision-making relating to this resource.

Second, commercial fishers have a right to a fair and decent income for their labour. It is particularly important that they have enough catch and income each year to help pay off their considerable debts for the very expensive vessels that are required in today's fishing industry.

Third, natives have special traditional rights to the resource and to its use in furthering the economic development of their communities. This resource is not only important as a source of food for native people; it is important to their potential development of economic resources in which they may do their own processing as well.

Fourth, while there is potential to develop the sports fishing industry, we hope that it is secondary to the priority of the other two fishing bodies.

Fifth, the protection and enhancement of the resource is paramount and must take priority in all deliberations.

We realize that there are many studies and proposals that have been made which indicate the need for action in this area. Most important is the question of consultation and the re-establishment of some kind of credibility between the Government of Canada and the people on the west coast who both manage and work in this industry.

The allocation of the resource between the various sectors of the industry must be negotiated and developed with the full co-operation and involvement of the industry. Allocation and who controls it is the key to an acceptable plan for fleet rationalization, income stability and resource conservation. Before allocation to the commercial fleet can be even considered, it is necessary to make a commitment to the continued existence of the fleet.

That fleet is very much threatened under the present circumstance. There are fishers who have spent much of last year collecting unemployment insurance. They do not want to be continually dependent on that for their existence. The present circumstances have left many commercial fishers unsure of either their personal future or the future of the fleet as a whole. There is a fear, particularly among smaller independents, that they will be pushed out of the industry. Many of them have already been pushed out of the industry.

There should be a guarantee that fishers, regardless of the type of gear, will have equitable access to the resource in order to maintain a decent income. Emphasis should be placed on the need for consultation and representation on any decisions affecting the industry. The expansion of the powers of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans without sufficient guidelines or curbs, as is being proposed in this Bill, is a common fear among the user groups. I hope that the Minister will meet with the people affected by this legislation and reconsider this Bill, which we and the people affected by it do not like.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, there are many concerns about the fishery because the previous Government left it in great difficulty. It did very little for that industry over many years. Furthermore, the bureaucracy under the previous Government was insensitive and unwilling to address the problems facing that industry. The Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) said that this board might be a better solution to the problem. She outlined some of the duties of that board, but would she expand further to indicate what powers that board should have in order to increase control over the industry?

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, my colleague knows that I am not an expert in this field. However, I am very concerned about the situation because of its effect on people in my riding, in communities not only in British Columbia but on the east coast, and on those involved in the inland fisheries as well.

I understand that the function of the board would be somewhat different from that of a marketing board. My colleague and I attended a job task force hearing in Saskatoon. It was asked why there could not be a marketing board for the fisheries. It is my understanding that a marketing board would not be necessary because there is no problem with marketing the fish, particularly in our area. The problem is that there is not enough of the resource; it is dwindling and the management of the resource is ineffective.

The most important function of the board would be planning and renewal. Of course, that involves some allocation of the resource but, as I understand it, the problem has been that governments have concentrated too much on limiting the resource without trying to increase it. This is the complaint that I have heard very often. For example, commercial fishermen are not opposed to limiting their catch to a reasonable and fair amount but only want to do so in the knowledge that the resource is being improved and expanded. That would be one of the very important functions of this body. I suggest that the board would be interested in what is taking place in research while keeping close ties with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans in that regard.

I understand that one of the most important aspects of this board would be to bring together all the groups in order to achieve a compromise as a result of conflicting and competing interests due to the shortage of the resource. For example, seiners and gillnetters who have different methods of fishing and are sometimes in competition would have to sit down at the table to negotiate, as would commercial fishers and sports fishers. They would also have to recognize that native people have traditional rights which must be maintained. There would have to be compromise in determining the management and planning of this resource.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) is our critic with respect to women's issues. One of the interesting aspects of this industry concerns the shore processing plants. It is very difficult for women who work seasonally and part time in those plants to earn a decent living. Would the Hon. Member outline some of the dilemmas that women face in this particular job ghetto area with part-time work, problems with unemployment insurance and, of course, the difficult question of secondary job area confinement?

● (1200)

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I hope Members of the House are aware of several cases, about two years ago, which went before the Unemployment Insurance Commission. These were concerns of women, equal partners in many cases, who go to sea in boats in very cold weather and carry an equal load in the job of fishing. They were treated as spouses or partners but were not treated equally with regard to paying into unemployment insurance. There was quite a protest. I believe that issue has now been resolved. Perhaps it is one on which we should get an update to see how women feel about it at the present time.

I would suspect, just like family farming which involves women in several roles, that women in the fishing industry are the traditional homemakers and have responsibility for raising families. Women on farms work in the fields, particularly at harvest time, with their husbands and other farm workers. Most recently in the agricultural field, and I think the same could be said of the fisheries, they are having to take on extra jobs because there simply is not enough income. They are involved in full-time jobs quite often as well. This puts a triple workload on women. I hope the gentlemen in this House will realize that. This situation applies particularly to women in many resource areas.

I think my colleague is leading up to the question of part-time work as it affects women, because so often they are regarded as the secondary worker in a family. They are forced into part-time jobs, part-time jobs that do not have adequate benefits, that are not covered under the Labour Code. They should be covered under the Labour Code for pro-rated benefits. That is why we are pushing so hard for this provision for part-time workers, 73 per cent of whom are women. They are often the last hired and the first fired when there is a stress on jobs or when jobs are tight. I am sure this situation occurs in the fishery industry as well.

In my riding, as I mentioned, there are many women working in the fish plants. I have toured those plants. Those jobs are not very enviable in many ways. Quite often immigrant women are the ones who do these jobs. They do not speak very much English and often it is the only type of job they can get. It is important that they have decent pay, decently protected working conditions and job security.

In this industry the only way men and women and families can have job security is if the Government takes some positive steps to do more planning for renewal of stocks so we have more fish to fish and more fish to can and freeze. There will then be more opportunity for jobs in the processing of this particular resource.

Mr. Crofton: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment. I have been listening with some interest to the speeches this morning. The speaker for the New Democratic Party suggested that there is no consultation going on. It could be construed as a big lie; if you say something often enough, it takes on a life of its own. Certainly in the fishing industry there has been conversation going on for years, any amount of it, but what has been lacking is action. Finally we have a Government and a Ministry that are prepared to take some action. The consultative process is in place. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) has advisory boards in place. Consultation will continue.

Concerning management of the fishery, let me speak about the herring roe industry where the fishing season is counted in hours, not in weeks or months. It is essential that Ministry officials have the opportunity to make decisions quickly.

There was conversation this morning about docks falling down in Newfoundland and in places elsewhere. There are a great many things that still need to be attended to in the operation of the fishery. The particular legislation before us is to give the Minister the opportunity to manage and to make decisions about allocation. That is a shortcoming in the present legislation. This is not meant to be a panacea for all the problems in the fishing industry. It is to address a particular aspect of it. It is long overdue and it is essential.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is now terminated. The Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) will resume debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it was a pleasure to hear the comments made by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell), whose riding is next door to mine. I would like to start in French, because this Bill is of particular interest to the people of Quebec and to French-speaking Canadians on the West Coast who are affected by this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, in Clause 1 of the Bill, an addition is made to the definition of the term "fish". For instance, Clause 1.(1)(a) provides, and I quote:

(a) portions of fish,

(b) . . . marine plants and portions thereof,

(c) . . . shellfish, crustaceans and marine animals,

I see no problem with the definition and this addition.

In Clause 1.(2) the definition of "fishery" is also changed, and I quote:

"fishery" includes

(a) the places in Canadian fisheries waters where, and the times when, fishing and related activities occur, including such packing, transporting and processing operations as are within the jurisdiction of Parliament, and

(b) the persons engaged and the fishing vessels, fishing gear and other equipment used in the activities referred to in paragraph (a);"

Mr. Speaker, I have no problem with this definition, but there is a problem with "purposes" in Clause 2, and I quote:

2.1 The purposes of this Act are—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Might I remind the Hon. Member that the debate on second reading is to be on the principle of the Bill and not on specific clauses as the Hon. Member seems to be doing.

Mr. Waddell: I understand, Mr. Speaker. But the problem with this Bill's principle may be found in this passage, and more specifically, in Clause 2.1(b), and I quote:

(b) to provide for the proper management, allocation and control of the seacoast fisheries of Canada;

I have a problem with the word "allocation". The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) can only provide management for conservation, not for allocation.

There are many groups, including sports fishermen, commercial fishermen, Indians, etc. There may be as many as four or five different groups of fishermen, and that is the problem with this Bill. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) said recently that the Bill is the result of two court cases on which I would like to comment for a moment.

• (1210)

[English]

As I said, the problem is with the addition of allocation. It gives power to the Minister to allocate. It is to this that groups especialy on the Pacific coast object. There are a number of groups. For example, there are sports fishermen, commercial fishermen and the Indian fisheries. Within the different groups, say commercial fishermen, there are seiners, gillnetters and others. As long as the Minister had power to manage the fisheries for conservation purposes, it was accepted by the groups. However, a year or so ago the Minister was involved in two court cases as a result of the problem of allocating. In fact, in those court cases the Minister said that he would step in and say that sports fishermen could fish instead of commercial fishermen, or seiners instead of gillnetters. That was like putting the cat among the pigeons. There were complaints and two court cases.

I should like to comment on the court cases. The documents of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans indicate that the current Act is deficient in that it does not clearly give powers to the Minister to manage the fishery for economic and social purposes.

[Translation]

That was in the other passage, Mr. Speaker, in Clause 2.1, under "purposes", and I quote:

(c) to ensure a continuing supply of fish and to maintain and develop the economic and social benefits from the use of fish to fishermen—

The words "economic and social benefits"—

[English]

Economic and social concerns are new to the Act. We are adding to the main principle of the Act. My colleagues are saying that this is not mere housekeeping legislation. Once the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) is given the power to allocate stocks for economic and social reasons, we open up a can of worms, or perhaps a can of sardines in this particular case. It goes beyond the powers the Minister had before and it has ramifications. All user groups or fisher groups on the west coast raised some concerns.

The last Hon. Member who spoke indicated that there had been lots of consultation and that we should get on with action. I am a man of action. I like that approach. I respect the Minister of Fisheries who represents the next riding to mine. I have respected and know him for many years. He is a man of action. But we must remember that this is a bureaucracy with 6,000 people in it. As one of the fishermen said, if we could produce as much fish as we produce bureaucrats in the Department of Fisheries, we would be the leading nation in the world in fisheries. We have to be careful about the power we are giving the bureaucracy. The thrust of NDP speeches is that we want the Minister to give us a commitment to add to the Bill or provide some other way for it to be done. Perhaps it could be discussed in committee. We want a consultative process to be written in so that the Minister cannot unilaterally or arbitrarily make allocations, especially when it is for social and economic purposes.

I am sure Hon. Members opposite admit that a lot can be done under those two words. We are saying that an industry consultative process should be set up. It would appeal to the Conservatie Party. As the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) said when she talked about what the United Fishermen and Allied Workers had told the NDP task force on jobs, Mr. Jack Nichol suggested that there should be set up a development board, which in fact would be the industry regulating the industry. I know that is difficult because in the past there have been disputes and different interests. However, they have one common interest: they are all in the fishing industry and they all want their fair share of it. It is a rich industry in Canada, especially on the west coast.

I should like to say something about the law in this respect. There were two rulings by Mr. Justice Collier of the Federal Court of Canada which indicated that the Department did not have the authority to allocate fish to various user groups, rendering management of the fishery in jeopardy on a national basis. In other words, Mr. Justice Collier's decisions show that the Department does not have the power to allocate fish to various user groups. If it is not possible to allocate to user groups, the Department's activities would be restricted to strictly opening and closing very global fisheries to all users. All it could do is open up the fishery or close it to all different users. It could not discriminate among users.

According to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, this would result in the threat of overharvesting due to combined fishing power of users, and in hardship for many who would be denied access to the resources on the basis of specific allocation. The Department is saying that it cannot live with this situation because it opens it up too much and we could have overharvesting and so on. This has become more and more the argument of the Department.

I listened to the maiden speech of the new Member from Nanaimo. He said that we had to think about the fish—forget about the different users and preserve the fish. That is the basis of the new salmon treaty with the United States. When the Deputy Minister of the Department of Fisheries appeared before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, we asked him who won in the salmon treaty, and he said "the fish won". Everyone applauded because everyone likes the fish and it is nice that fish can win. The only problem is that we cannot take instructions from fish. We cannot consult the fish. Therefore, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans can say "this is what the fish want", meaning what it wants. I am not trying to be supercilious; it is always safe to say that we represent the fish, because the fish cannot talk back. We have to be careful with that line of argument, just as we have to be careful with the line of argument that we should stop consulting and get on with some action. Let us protect the fish, let us have some action and so on, but let us do it in the proper way.

Mr. Justice Collier's decisions are worth looking at. The first case involved the Fishing Vessel Owners' Association of B.C., the Pacific Coast Salmon Seiners Association, the Prince Rupert Fishing Vessel Owners' Association, and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Mr. Justice Collier granted an injunction preventing the Department of Fisheries and Oceans from setting separate salmon quotas for seiners and gillnetters, prohibiting the Government from allocating the resource between the gear types. This is a case where the Department wanted to allocate for the seiners and gillnetters, not so much for conservation.

● (1220)

In case Hon. Members do not know this, I understand that the seiners put down a big net and scoop up the fish from the bottom. The gillnetters have a net that spreads out. The net of the seiners is like one steaming vegetables; you close the steamer in order to steam the vegetables. That is how the seiners work. The gillnetters have a net that spreads out; the salmon swim into it and catch their gills on it. That simple lesson is the difference between seiners and gillnetters. Mr. Justice Collier gave this interpretation. He said:

> Strict interpretation of the Fisheries Act says all groups would have equal access to stocks over an equal area. The Act gives NFO the power to enforce regulations for the preservation and the conservation of the resource,—

As I said—

—to provide for the conservation and protection of fish.

[English]

The Act does not give preference to one user group over another, for example, the seiners over the gillnetters. This is the principle or the crux of the Bill we are now debating. According to Mr. Justice Collier, the Fisheries Act and the Constitution Act—I gather that is the Constitution Act of 1982 and the British North America Act of 1876—Sections 91 and 92, set out the powers of the provincial Governments and the federal Government. Looking at these laws, Mr. Justice Collier said that the Government did not have the power to distinguish between one user group; that is, between the seiners and the gillnetters. Therefore, the Department could not act to exclude one from the fishery at a particular time, even by arguing that they really wanted to conserve the fish. What they were doing was deciding between two different groups.

That is why we have this amendment to give power to control on the basis of social and economic reasons, to develop the economic and social benefits flowing from the harvesting of fish.

[Translation]

To develop the economic and social benefits from the use of fish to fishermen and others—

[English]

The second case involved the Gulf Trollers Association of British Columbia against the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. In August, 1984 Mr. Justice Collier, the same judge, upheld the association's application to quash seven Government orders dated April 16 which permitted commercial fishing between July 1 and August 31, at the same time allowing sport fishing to operate year round. In effect, the Department was allocating the resource by giving preference to one group over another. Here the sport fishers were getting a preference over the commercial fishery. The Gulf Trollers Association, which is one of the commercial fishing groups in British Columbia, went to court and challenged the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

In that case the judge did not accept the Department's argument that it has a federal power to manage and control the fisheries for the benefit of Canadians as distinct from the argument of preserving the stocks. Perhaps my friend who intervened last might be interested in the arguments by Crown counsel. Mr. Gunnar Eggertson, a distinguished counsel against whom the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and I have appeared in the Supreme Court in British Columbia at one time or another, was quoted by the Vancouver Sun. It quoted the court reported Mr. Eggertson's argument in court. He said:

> Parliament has a duty to the people of Canada to manage the fishery and for the benefit of society and not for the benefit of the people who are in it.

The argument was that we represent the fish, not the people.

> It was a decision made for a proper motive. The benefit of the fish and the people of Canada . . . insisting that the Fisheries Department's power to manage included the power not to allow any fishing at all—

How to get user groups angry: just say: "Well, Your Lordship, as a matter of fact the Department could outlaw the fishery completely". I again quote Mr. Eggertson:

> It is within the powers of the Government of Canada to restrict the troll fleet, even if there is no conservation consideration. There's no right for trollers to any season at all.

He said that we do not even have to bother about conservation, we can even tell them that they cannot fish at all. I do not know the right fishing analogy, but the farm analogy would be the red flag to the bull. No wonder they were angry at the Department. For court purposes, the Department took a pretty strong view, saying: "Forget it, we have complete power". Mr. Justice Collier said they do not have that kind of power at all. He said and I quote:

> The April 16 variations of the total closure were, on the evidence presented by the Crown, conceived on two bases; a need for conservation and the intention to favour the sports fishers. The conservation motive was at the ultimate expense of the commercial gulf trollers. The preference, Collier stated, was based on socio-economic consideration which he considered to be beyond DFO's permissible constitutional powers.

How much time do I have left?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member does not have any time left.

Mr. Waddell: I will just wind up. I have outlined the two law cases. I have not been able to get into the constitutional matter; the judge challenged the constitutionality. I am agreeable that these changes be made, frankly, with the consultation process.

Let us try and institute an industry consultation process so that the Department cannot do anything on the ground of socio-economic reasons. I do not think the Minister should take a reference on the constitutionality of the Fisheries Act. That would open up more problems. It is only a decision on an injunction, and I do not think he has to do that. I am replying to the debate I had with the Minister the other day. I hope he will read it in Hansard. In conclusion, our position is——simply to hold consultations with all groups involved in fisheries here on the West Coast and on Canada's East Coast.

[Translation]

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member a question. There is a problem which the Hon. Member recognizes as far as stock availability is concerned in practically every species off the British Columbia coast. He said that he is in agreement with the federal Government making decisions on socio-economic grounds and not just on the grounds of conservation and protection. We are into a new area here.

For purposes of argument, suppose there were five groups of salmon left over which could be caught off the British Columbia coast. Would the hon. gentleman allocate one to the trollers, one to the gillnetters, one to the seiners, one to the sports fishermen and one to the native population? That is what we are getting down to here. We are getting down to the allocation of a resource among user groups because there is not enough of that resource.

• (1230)

I do not know whether or not the question I put to the Hon. Member is unfair. He is not a Government Member. I just wonder about his opinion. Should each user group get an equal share of the resource or, when we get to the point where there is practically nothing left, which one do we erase? Do we erase the sports fishermen, the trollers, the seiners, the gillnetters? I would like the hon. gentleman to comment on that.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, hopefully we do not erase anyone and we do enhance the stock. This must be done through a consultation process with some fairness and equity in its management. I would ask the Hon. Member to be careful about how he quotes me. I said that the use of the phrase "social and economic terms" regarding allocation is very wide and that I have some real concerns about that which I would like to raise in committee.

Second, I said that if the resource must be allocated on the basis of the social and economic terms, then it must be done with safeguards, and the safeguard I suggested was to have the user groups decide co-operatively what should be done rather than have a distant Fisheries Department decide what should be done. I also said that I recognize that that is not easy. The different groups have different interests and they have a history of arguing among themselves because they have different interests. I think I cited the suggestion of Jack Nichol which is that a Pacific fisheries development board be utilized in which all these groups could take part and have some say in the allocations.

I am optimistic. Everyone on the west coast recognizes that we have a resource that is dwindling. We also recognize that we need a fishing industry. Just as it is for those in the great province of Newfoundland, fishing is a part of the culture of those of us from British Columbia. Where would the province be without its salmon? I represent the only riding on the coast of British Columbia that does not border on the ocean and even I feel fishing and fishermen are very much a part of our culture on the coast.

While the fishermen may have conflicts, they are not stupid. They understand that they must work together and they will work together. Our Party has been suggesting that the resource be allocated over all by the Department but with built-in consultation with the user groups. I think that makes a lot of sense.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be unfair to the hon. gentleman. After all, he is not a Government Member. However, perhaps his Party does have a view on this question. I would like to repeat the question and narrow it down.

Suppose there was not enough of the resource for all of the user groups.

Mr. Keeper: As a result of Liberal mismanagement?

Mr. Baker: The Hon. Member says that is the result of Liberal mismanagement. At this point in time, it does not matter who mismanaged the fishery; we have a problem on our hands. I would like to have an indication of the New Democratic Party's position on this important question.

Narrowing the question down further, if there is not enough of the resource left to maintain the user groups, would the Hon. Member and his Party advocate discontinuing the sports fishery? Does he regard the commercial fishery to be of more importance than the sports fishery in salmon, for example? I really would like to receive an answer to the question but I know that the hon. gentleman does not have to answer the question. Perhaps he does have some views on the issue of the sports fishermen versus the commercial fishermen when very little of that resource is left. Would he advocate a discontinuance of the commercial fishery in favour of the sports fishery?

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why Liberal Members are so negative about this matter. Perhaps it is because of their years of mismanagement of the fishery. As I told the Hon. Member, I am not negative. He asked me what I would do if I were, God forbid, Minister of Fisheries of the country. I would concentrate on things like salmon enhancement on a huge scale. I would look at some of the things that are being done in Europe in the fish farming sector. I would look to developing our industry the way it has been develop in Denmark, a country which I visited this summer and in which I saw what an efficient fishing industry can do.

It is purely hypothetical to talk about allocating five fish. There will not be five fish. Hopefully, there will be a great many fish. I admit that the different fishery groups are competing and that they have different interests, but they share one over-all interest and that is that they all benefit from the fishery. As I said before, fishermen are not stupid. They understand that.

I see the system working with more than simply the influence of the Minister's advisory committee which he calls on whim to consult when he wishes to consult. I would like to see something written into the legislation which would indicate that a Pacific fisheries development board would be involved. That board would be composed of the people who are most affected, not of some bureaucrats who are 3,000 miles away in Ottawa. I trust the people who are involved in the fishery industry in British Columbia to ultimately come up with suggestions for enhancement, allocation and so on. Naturally I feel that there must be a Fisheries Department in Ottawa to take part in all the different interests.

It is not a question of allocating five fish to five different groups. It is a question of managing an entire industry and having the people who are involved in the industry participate. I invite my friend, who I know has an open mind, to come toward this new social democracy which believes in decentralization, participation and co-operation and is very positive and new and is looking to the future. I invite him to come to the era of the 1990s and to throw out all that old baggage. Come on over here. We will have a new beginning and we will develop the fishery industries on the west coast and the east coast together.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, one of the interesting aspects of this Bill is the question of its constitutionality. We could allow this Bill to pass through the House of Commons and it could be put in place, but what would happen if, in the middle of the salmon season this coming summer, a dissatisfied fisherman on the west coast suddenly took the matter to court, said this is against the constitution and the Federal Court granted an injunction against the fishing plan and threw this amendment out of court? A judge from the Federal Court has indicated that this could happen and the Government has indicated that this could happen.

Would there be merit in putting this Bill through the House with the Minister's guidelines and mechanisms for consultation and referring it to the Supreme Court so it may make a judgment as to whether or not this Bill will stand up constitutionally? I wonder if my hon. colleague might give us an indication of whether it might be wise to do so at this point or wait until the season collapses this summer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Could I ask for a short answer from the Hon. Member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mr. Waddell)?

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I draw the Hon. Member's attention to the statement made by the Minister on March 6, 1985, as reported on page 2789 of Hansard. To be very fair to the Minister, this is a problem with which the Minister must struggle. The Minister got out of these two court cases by having us amend this law but he cannot get out of the constitutionality question.

I do not think I would like to give a quick answer to this question. I think we should hear from the Minister in committee. As my friend pointed out, there will be problems if someone challenges this in the middle of the season. I think that must be considered in committee.

I have already given my own opinion as a constitutional lawyer. I would not like to see the Minister give this matter a quick reference to the court. I would prefer to have him wait, but I could be persuaded otherwise.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period allowed for questions and comments has unfortunately expired.

• (1240)

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) on a point of order.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, my point of order has to do with the rule of relevance. I want to say, with respect to the rule of relevance, that the only relevant thing the Hon. Member said was God forbid he should ever become the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) on debate.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the Hon. Member trembles in fear at the prospect of my colleague becoming the Minister of Fisheries. Of course, there are real prospects that that will happen. The Liberals dread that. They have the notion that somehow they will automatically return to office. That is a myth of Canadian politics which is fast passing. Therefore, I can understand why my hon. colleague trembles in fear at the prospect of the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) becoming Minister of Fisheries.

This legislation is important. I represent a constituency which does not have people who primarily make their living by way of the fishery, but it is still important legislation. It is important for a number of reasons.

One of the reasons is that this legislation gives a legislative mandate to a Minister and to the executive which will give them the power to allocate resources among competing groups. The legislation provides absolute authority over the economic well-being of people. Any time we give unfettered authority to an executive, it raises questions. Any time we give absolute power to anyone, it lights a red light. Perhaps at this point it is a yellow light, but it is telling us to wait a minute and examine what is being done by this legislation. The legislation will give absolute authority to the Minister to allocate fish among various user groups; for example, sports fishermen, commercial fishermen and native people. To give that authority without guidelines or criteria upon which decisions can be made causes me to question the move which the Government has taken.

There is a principle of holding those wielding power accountable. That is the basic notion of democracy. It is the basic principle which underpins the existence of this place. The purpose of having Parliament is to hold executive power accountable. Originally, Parliaments were set up in an attempt to bring some accountability to the exercise of power by the kings of old. In fact, the arbitrary use of power in historical circumstances even led to the loss of one's head being taken by a king. It is a serious question. I am not suggesting that we should behead the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser), but I think it is important to mention the absolute authority which is being given to an executive. We must do that with caution.

It is surprising that the Conservative Government has brought forward legislation which offers absolute authority to a member of the executive. Over the last number of years, the Conservative Party had a proud tradition in the House of speaking in support of parliamentary democracy. The Conservative Party, when in opposition, told the Government that it could not be arrogant and that it must be accountable to the people. It is sad that the Conservatives, now that they are in office, are changing their ways. They are no longer acting the way they did when they were in opposition. Surely, a Party which has a long tradition of concern about Parliament would draft legislation which clearly spells out the basis upon which the Government will act. This legislation fails that test.

There is another area in which this legislation is wanting; that is the whole question of meaningful consultation. Obviously, in order for government in this large country to work, it is necessary to consult with the groups which are affected by government decisions. It is also necessary for those consultations to be meaningful. It is not adequate simply to have conversations about fisheries; there must be meaningful consultation. The government must provide a real opportunity for groups which are affected by its decisions to have an impact on the direction of government policy.

The united opposition of the groups which are affected by this legislation—sports fishermen, commercial fishermen and native people—is testimony to the fact that the consultations which have taken place to date have not been adequate. I am trying to be fair in giving the Government some credit when it says that it has consulted with people. However, somewhere along the road those consultations have broken down and failed. If the consultations had been successful, there would have been support from people in the fisheries for the legislation. Surely, we must accept the proposition that the people who actually fish are just as concerned, if not more so, as the Government about the conservation of the fishery. Obviously, the legislation has been brought before the House on the presupposition that the Government needs authority to manage the fishery in order that the resources can be conserved. But we must accept that the people who are involved in the fisheries have, as their first interest, the conservation of the fishery. If the people who are committed to the fishery still find the legislation, in spite of its high aims, to the wanting, then there are some real questions which must be addressed.

When the Conservative Party was running for office it promised a new era of co-operation and it promised to go beyond confrontation in government. It is ironic and sad that it should be the Party which, now that it is in office, has failed to carry out the necessary and meaningful consultations with the groups which are affected. Again, this Government, when it was in opposition, said one thing, in the election campaign said one thing, but now that it is in office it is behaving in the opposite way. The Government is imposing policies and legislation upon a community, rather than having the legislation and policy develop out of the community and adopted by the Government.

As long as we are being asked to give this sweeping authority to allocate the various user groups to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, I think it is legitimate to ask whether the people who are involved in the fisheries trust that Department to have such unfettered authority. Is there a basis upon which the people in the fishing industry could agree that they would like some guidelines for this Department to operate under, but in the absence of those guidelines they have experienced such a good working relationship with this Department over the years that they know it will only act in their best interests? I believe that most Canadians would find it difficult to bring themselves to a point where they could say to a government bureaucracy: "We will just trust that what you do will be in our best interests. We will just trust that the rules and regulations you make, which have a life and death impact on our incomes, will be fair and equitable and will allow us to continue to make a decent income".

Most of us have had experience in dealing with large bureaucracies, not only in the public sector but in the private sector as well. We have all been frustrated by the experience of trying to have our needs met and our voices heard. The Conservative Party, I must point out, Mr. Speaker, was a very strong critic of the abuse of bureaucratic authority when it was in opposition. Those Hon. Members were very strong critics of administrative fiat. I believe this Government deserves some credit in terms of the income tax area. It has made a number of commitments that Canadians would be treated more fairly in their relationship with the Department of National Revenue. I have some real doubts whether that is going to come about in practice, as I am sure most Canadians have, but at least the Government has said that there is a need to recognize the rights of citizens. It has announced and issued a Bill of Rights for taxpayers which is a commitment on behalf of the Government and the Department of National Revenue to treat taxpayers fairly. Wouldn't it be nice, Mr. Speaker, if the Government would take the same attitude in the area of the fisheries, rather than simply asking for a blank cheque for the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to regulate the fishery and to allocate it among the various user groups, and to have this absolute power over the capacity of individuals and communities to earn a living. Wouldn't it be nice, Mr. Speaker, if government approached the area of the fisheries in such a way that it came before this Parliament and said: "We need authority to manage the resource, to ensure conservation and fairness in the allocation of the resource among the various groups, and to show you our commitment to fairness we will lay out guidelines under which the people in the fisheries will be treated fairly"? Why not have a Bill of Rights for fishermen, Mr. Speaker, instead of a request for a blanket authority?

When I was a child, Mr. Speaker, I lived on an island on Lake Winnipeg. The community in which I grew up was a fishing community. Everyone there made their living through the fishery, so I have some idea of what it is like to be dependent upon this resource for one's income. I also have some awareness, at least from a Manitoban perspective, of how the fishermen view the officials who are involved in managing the resource.

I mention this, Mr. Speaker, because I feel that if over the years a relationship of trust had been built up between the fishermen and the Department based on actual experience, it would be more credible for the Minister to come before this House and ask for such wide-sweeping authority for his officials to regulate this industry. But I know from my own experience that the perception—I will not make the case whether or not that perception is completely accurate—among small fishing communities, certainly in Manitoba, is often that the officials who are involved in managing the resource do it in a way that at least appears to be arbitrary and that they do not take into account the real and practical aspects of making a living from fishing. Often the regulations become obstacles to a person making his living.

In fact, in northern Manitoba up until now the community of Norway House, which is a small native community located right on the lake, has no access to the fishery and they have had no adequate explanation as to why they have not. Officials involved in the management of the fishery are often viewed in a less than favourable light, so to ask for complete authority for those officials to regulate the fisheries without laying out the guidelines as to how this will be done to ensure it will be done fairly is not reasonable. It is asking too much.

We would be willing to give this blanket authority to the Government, this absolute power to regulate the fishery in any way it wants, if the Canadian people could say with some confidence that they trusted this Government unequivocally, without question. If the Canadian people could say that their trust in this Government was such that they believed it would fulfil all of the promises it made, then perhaps we could say on their behalf: "We are glad to give you this blanket authority because we know from experience that you won't in any way abuse that authority".

But if we are to give the Government the authority to manage the fishery on the basis of trust, then we have to ask ourselves what has been our experience to date with this Government? Our experience has been one of constant reversals of positions, of broken promises and broken trusts. When those Hon. Members opposite were running for office they promised, "jobs, jobs, jobs". Now that they are in office, their priorities have been switched. Their priority now is cutting public spending. They are focusing all of their attention on economic policy, on the deficit, and they have forgotten about their commitment to provide employment for people.

When those Hon. Members were running for office, they said that universality and social programs, medicare, pensions and family allowances were a sacred trust. What have they done, Mr. Speaker? Shortly after those Hon. Members were elected to office they started to raise questions about universality, and they have raised so many questions about universality that the people across this country are very concerned about what the Government might do with pensions and family allowances. So there is no basis for trust in this Government when it comes to asking for broad, wide and sweeping authority without any limits or guidelines.

When those Hon. Members opposite were running for office, Mr. Speaker, they said they would reduce public spending by cutting out waste. Shortly after they were elected to office, November 8 to be specific, a series of cut-backs was started which affected the substance of various programs, including the area of the fisheries.

My time is running out, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to say that I appreciate the opportunity to enter into this debate because I believe it is important that when a Government asks for authority to act in any area, that that authority be limited and that the Government defines precisely what it wants to do before it brings legislation to this House.

It should not come here asking for a blanket authority and absolute trust.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

THE LATE KONSTANTIN CHERNENKO, PRESIDENT OF THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): On behalf of the Government of Canada and, I am sure, Hon. Members of this House, I rise to extend our condolences to the Government of the Soviet Union, the Soviet people, and the family of Mr. Chernenko, on the untimely death of the leader of the Soviet Union. Mr. Chernenko's death was not unexpected. He had been ailing for several months.

He rose from inconspicuous beginnings through the Soviet bureaucracy to the supreme position in the Soviet Government. While his style did not mark a departure from that of previous Soviet leaders, men and women of good will around the world will be hoping that the appointment of a successor from the new generation may mark a new approach to the contentious issues dividing East and West.

The hopes of the world for an easing of tensions and a step forward toward lasting peace are pinned on the arms talks now going on at Geneva. It can be regarded as a sign of hope that those in charge of the direction of the Soviet Union have seen fit to authorize the peace talks to continue. It may be that the world is on the threshold of its greatest opportunity for new approaches to the issues that have divided us since the end of World War II. I am sure that Members in this House, and Canadians everywhere, will share the conviction that the time is now for a concerted world effort to banish forever the dreadful threat of nuclear holocaust hanging over the world.

While it is unrealistic to expect a radical change in Soviet objectives as a result of a change in leadership, a new leader may bring about a change in style, and a more open approach which in itself would result in an easing of tensions. Many of us had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Gorbachev when he visited Ottawa, and were impressed with his readiness to discuss issues bluntly and openly. In his recent visit to England he created a favourable impression on the British public.

Regardless of who the new leader is, men and women throughout the world will look forward with hope to positive steps by the superpowers to back away from the abyss of nuclear confrontation. The arms control talks and the appointment of a new Soviet leader present an opportunity that should not be missed. It is an opportunity for positive steps at the world level to inject a new style in relations between East and West, and to place the future of the human family above sectarian interests.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that the Official Opposition has learned today of the death of President Konstantin Chernenko.

Mr. Chernenko had devoted his life to the service of his country, and in the brief period that he was President of the Soviet Union he worked to improve the prospect for peace in the world by resuming peace talks with the United States of America, in Geneva.

The Official Opposition extends its sincere condolences to the Government and people of the Soviet Union and to the family of the late President. We wish to take this opportunity to ensure that the Government reaffirms our strong desire to work in co-operation and friendship with the Soviet Union to further the search for a true and lasting order of world peace and security.

The Soviet Union stands at an important threshold. A new generation of leaders will decide the future destiny of not only the Soviet Union but also possibly of mankind. It is our sincere hope that President Chernenko's reported successor, Mikhail Gorbachev, will continue the late President's efforts along the elusive path of peace. Mr. Gorbachev's visit to Canada and to other western nations will hopefully have given him a personal insight into our great desire for peace and co-operation with the Soviet Union.

I can assure the Canadian people that this Party will continue to urge the Government, no matter what the difficulties, to work with the Soviet Union to rid the world of the scourge of war.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we were very sorry to hear the news of President Chernenko's death, and we wish to offer the people and the Government of that great country our sincere sympathy.

We were pleased to hear that Mr. Gorbachev has been appointed the new leader of the Soviet Union. We had the opportunity to meet him in Canada when he met with Members of Parliament. He appeared to have the makings of a modern leader with an open mind, and we hope that remembering the friendship he showed our country when he was in Canada, he will try to get to know us and understand us better. In fact, this may be an opportunity for the Government of Canada to show that we are an independent country, and that we may have a role to play between the two superpowers, so that a durable and lasting peace may be achieved in this very troubled world.

[English]

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I would like to extend our deepest sympathy to the family of Mr. Chernenko. I would also like to extend our deepest sympathy to the people of the Soviet Union who have now lost their third leader in three years. This is a cause for great sadness for any society.

We welcome the choice of Mr. Gorbachev to succeed Mr. Chernenko. He is a man of relative youth and vigour in terms of international leadership, as was displayed very forcefully to those of us who had the opportunity of meeting him when he was in Canada. Although here in his capacity of Minister of Agriculture, he did show a very deep understanding and concern about arms control matters. Those of us who had the opportunity to question him in committee found that he was relatively open to ideas emanating from a variety of nations, including Canada, on arms control and disarmament matters.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chernenko was not in office a sufficiently long enough time for us to be able to discern the degree to which he, too, would have pursued arms control and disarmament matters, nor the degree to which he would have pursued a greater opening up of Soviet society.

Mr. Gorbachev and those around him—and I hope one of these days we will see that number include a prominent woman—do, it seems to me, have a concern about Soviet society itself and the possible opening up of that society, particularly in the human rights field. So, while joining with the Soviet people in their grief at the death of their leader, we welcome an opportunity, and hope and trust that the Government will take advantage of the opportunity to develop even closer relations with the Soviet Union, an even greater degree of understanding on our part, and help to promote an ever greater understanding on theirs.

Mr. Speaker: I seek to learn the disposition of the House. Normally at this point there would be three or four minutes left in the period for Statements under Standing Order 21. Should I assume that the House would like to have the regular amount of time for Statements under Standing Order 21, and Oral Questions?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, we are quite prepared to extend the time to allow full statements and the usual Question Period. Under the circumstances this seems fair and equitable.

• (1410)

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. House Leader for the Official Opposition agree?

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore I will call for Statements pursuant to Standing Order 21.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 21

CATTLE GRADING FEES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, on Black Thursday, November 8, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) perpetrated his vicious attacks on the people of Canada when he presented his cut-back program.

One group who can least afford these cut-backs and increases in taxes and surcharges are the farmers of Canada. The Ontario Cattlemen's Association recently sent a letter to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) indicating to him that the fees for grading to be charged by the Government are excessive and unfair, and were implemented without consultation.

Although the Minister says that the fee will be 67 cents per head of cattle, he failed to indicate that the smaller meat processing plants will have to pay some $125 service charge every time an inspector walks through the door.

The farmers involved in horticulture and other areas have also expressed strong disagreement with this measure.

Thanks to the previous Liberal Government, Canada had the best beef grading system in the world, and the Tories should not be allowed to dismantle it. The cattlemen of Glengarry-Prescott-Russell produce some 78,000 head of cattle. They are good productive farmers who only want a fair chance to make an honest living. I ask the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture to repeal the introduction of grading fees in the interest of good agricultural practices for this country.

SPORTS

MEN'S CURLING CHAMPIONSHIP—NORTHERN ONTARIO RINK VICTORIOUS

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the Times-News in Thunder Bay this morning bore the headline "Switchman Derails Ryan's Express". This imaginative title aptly describes yesterday's victory by Thunder Bay's Al Hackner, a locomotive switchman, over Alberta's Pat Ryan, whose rink had curled 11 consecutive winning games at the Canadian men's curling championship in Moncton, New Brunswick.

The winning quartet of skip Hackner, third Rick Lang, second Ian Tetley, and lead Pat Perroud, came from behind in the tenth end after a brilliant shot by Hackner created a tie. They went on to win in a tie breaking 11th end after Ryan's last throw left hackner's the shot rock. This gave Hackner's Northern Ontario foursome a six-five win over Alberta.

This is the fourth time Hackner has appeared in the Brier, and the second time he has won. He was runner-up in 1980 and 1981, and then won the Canadian and world championships in 1982.

The citizens of northwestern Ontario are extremely proud of these fine amateur athletes. As New Democratic spokesperson for amateur sport, and especially as the Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon, I extend my best wishes to these very talented young men as they leave later this month to represent Canada at the Silver Broom in Scotland. I also look forward to seeing them at the Olympic Games in Calgary in 1988.

TRADE

IMPROPER LABELLING ON CLOTHING IMPORTS

Mr. Norman Warner (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I am most concerned about the amount of imported clothing that is not properly labelled and is being sold to Canadian consumers. In a five-month period, Customs and Excise inspected 30 per cent of the clothing shipments to Canada. One-third of the inspected shipments had inadequate or misleading labelling.

I have with me an example of this mislabelling. It states "Top quality hosiery—genuine wool 51 per cent, polyester 19 per cent, nylon 30 per cent". Laboratory tests indicate that there is no wool, no polyester, and no nylon in these socks. What are Canadian consumers buying? I don't know, and they don't know either. What we do know is that they are not buying what is described on the labels.

This situation is most alarming when one considers that 243.6 million garments of every type and description, including pants, suits, blouses, jackets, shirts, and sweaters were imported to Canada in 1984. In January, 1985, import permits were up 40 per cent. This year, if 5 per cent of the imported garments are mislabelled, then half of the entire Canadian population could purchase mislabelled imported clothing. This could affect every Canadian family.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

ANNUAL CELEBRATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, today is Commonwealth Day. This is an annual event which owes its origin to a Canadian proposal made during the 1975 Heads of Government meeting that was held in that year in Jamaica. The proposal is that the second Monday in March should be so designated in order to underline, in Canada and all other Commonwealth countries, the importance we attach to this unique association of 49 countries of great diversity in terms of size, colour, race, creed, culture, and at all stages of economic development.

Across Canada today special programs have been planned, especially in schools and public libraries, to mark this special occasion. Yesterday, special inter-faith services were held in various centres across the country to mark Commonwealth Day in Canada. This evening, all parliamentarians are invited to a special reception hosted by the Commonwealth High Commissioners in the Confederation Room in the West Block, to mark this very important occasion. Speaking on behalf of the executive and members of the Canadian Branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, I want to say how pleased and honoured we are to be able to associate ourselves with the celebration of Commonwealth Day.

Commonwealth Day is an important institution to all of us—

Mr. Speaker: I regret that I must advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

ENERGY

FEDERAL-NEWFOUNDLAND AGREEMENT ON OFFSHORE DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to address some issues with respect to Newfoundland energy. Since 1978 the New Democratic Party has supported the view that the offshore belongs to the provinces. Therefore we applauded the recent deal respecting Hibernia, and I said so in the House.

We also suggested that it be taken further and enshrined as a constitutional amendment. However, we warned that Newfoundlanders should not forget about their fish, forests, their mines, and renewable resources, by putting all their eggs into the Hibernia basket. These other resources must be developed as well.

I am worried that the rate of development in Hibernia will not be controlled by the Newfoundland Government or the Canadian Government, but by Mobil Oil which is 100 per cent American owned. Mobil is very difficult to deal with on many issues. I have a suggestion for the Government of Canada. By chance, FIRA must approve the take-over by Mobil of Canadian Superior Oil. I suggest that Mobil should be forced to sell shares to a minority of Canadian shareholders so that it is faced with a minority share interest and must look after the needs of Newfoundlanders and Canadians. This can be done in the same way that the Government forced Texaco and Chevron to comply, in a previous ruling. That would be helpful to the interests of Newfoundland and Canada.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend I had the opportunity to participate in an environmental day in Niagara Falls sponsored by Canadians for a Clean Environment. As the representative of the federal Government I was very pleased to be able to provide details of our new program to limit acid rain. This is the most comprehensive attack on pollution conceived in this country's history, and in that we can all take pride.

This new program is also timely in its announcement. We can now discuss environmental concerns with clean hands. In the past, our negotiations with the Americans have been hampered by our failure to take initiatives which would demonstrate our own commitment to deal with the environment. Today, that no longer can be said.

I am pleased that these issues will be first on the agenda at the meeting between the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the President of the United States. I would urge the Prime Minister, the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) and members of the federal delegation to impress upon our neighbours to the south the need for an all-encompassing attack on pollution, dealing not only with the air that we breath but also with the water that we drink.

The levels of toxic wastes in the Niagara River continue to be of major concern to the people in my riding and to those whose drinking water originates in Lake Ontario. We must do everything within our power to convince our American friends that together we should begin the long and difficult process of restoring the Niagara River to the state in which it should be. I know that the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment share those concerns as strongly as the people of my riding.

NATIONAL PARKS

STAGING OF WOMEN'S WORLD CUP SKI RACES IN BANFF NATIONAL PARK

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Mininster of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, Banff National Park has been welcoming Canadians and people from around the world for over 100 years. This year Parks Canada is celebrating its centennial, and one of the events that all Canadians can take pride in was the last of the 1985 Women's World Cup ski races that took place in Sunshine Village, deep in Banff National Park. To keep pace with the moment, one of Canada's many bright and capable young skiers, Miss Laurie Graham, took first place in the women's downhill race.

● (1420)

This World Cup event draws attention and is a tribute to the success that our country can enjoy when we are able to maximize the co-operation between athletes representing our nation, companies like Husky Oil which sponsor them, the officials of Parks Canada managing our parks system, and the entrepreneurs in places like Sunshine Village, Banff.

The centennial of our National Parks system, Mr. Speaker, has been highlighted by this event, and it speaks volumes about what happens when we work together.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

JOB SECURITY

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and its president, Jean-Claude Parrot, have been negotiating with Canada Post for eight months in order to obtain a collective agreement that will guarantee job security. A tentative agreement has just been announced, which although it has yet to be ratified, is certainly a major achievement. Canada Post, through the collective bargaining process, has been able to obtain the flexibility it was seeking as well as a reasonable monetary settlement.

[English]

Job security for postal workers means fewer Canadians on unemployment insurance or welfare. It means continued and uninterrupted postal service. It means that small business can get on with the job it does best, creating employment for people. This agreement establishes a precedent, that it is indeed possible to negotiate job security for employees without long drawn out work stoppages, when both the employer and the employees are prepared to negotiate in good faith.

Collective bargaining can work. Mediation can help. We have a collective agreement and a settlement in the postal talks. Thank you, Mr. Parrot. Thank you, Mr. Warren. We welcome this settlement.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

QUOTAS ON IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE MANUFACTURED VEHICLES

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, by March 31 the current quota system on Japanese car imports will expire. The Minister for International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) has stated in this House that "when Canada reaches a decision, it will be a decision in the best interests of Canada".

Until we develop and implement an automobile strategy on our own, Mr. Speaker, the automobile manufacturers, parts manufacturers, and the auto workers of Canada warn us that thousands of automobile related jobs are at risk if these quotas are not extended.

We know that Canada's strong period of growth over recent years was largely due to major investments and sales in the North American automobile industry and the quota system.

We know that the importance of the automobile industry in this country cannot be underestimated.

We know, as well, that the American decision to end quotas on imports will put our manufacturers under severe stress and strain.

Two years ago the special task report on the automobile industry recommended that the Government pursue a trade policy that would require all vehicle manufacturers to make binding commitments in investment and jobs. We would need a much more open market in Japan, or substantially more investment from the Japanese, before we should even consider dropping the quotas.

Too much is at stake for Canadian jobs and the survival of the Canadian automobile industry for the Government not to make the best decision possible for Canadians—continue the quotas.

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

DISARMAMENT

RESUMPTION OF U.S.-U.S.S.R. TALKS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, with a new spirit of hope and peace, all the world anxiously awaits tomorrow's resumption of arms control negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union. The Geneva talks mark a new beginning in the long and often bumpy road to world peace. We in Canada congratulate both sides for re-dedicating their efforts to the peace process. The talks will not be easy. The issues involved are complex and very detailed, offering no simple solutions or quick answers, but it is the act of negotiating the world welcomes. Progress for peace can only be accomplished through practical dialogue and meaningful co-operation.

Canadians join the world in rejoicing at the prospect of lasting nuclear arms control between the two superpowers. We share a dream with each and every person on this planet that our children will grow up and live in a peaceful, safe world.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

ADDITIONAL FUNDING FOR NATURAL SCIENCES AND ENGINEERING RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. David Daubney (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend the Government for its recent announcement that $20 million in additional funding has been allocated to the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council.

These additional funds will enable the Council to respond to some of the over 1,400 applications for research equipment currently before it.

The fact that the Government made this announcement despite the severe financial constraints confronting it, demonstrates the importance the Government attaches to university research.

The previous Government made no provision for dealing with these equipment applications, and had the new Government not stepped in, university researchers would have been seriously impeded in their work.

The previous Government's attitude toward university research and the NSERC Council is reflected in the numerous cuts it made to the Council's first five-year plan, a plan which was first approved by the Progressive Conservative Government in 1979. The new Government's approach is illustrated by last week's announcement, and by the statement of the Minister of Science and Technology (Mr. Siddon) when Supplementary Estimates for NSERC were brought forward in November. At that time he said:

> We recognize that R & D is fundamental to our over-all plan for economic and social development in Canada and that the success of NSERC's programs in universities is a prerequisite to that national effort.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS FORMULA

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. In view of the many changes in the policies of the Government, the transformation of policies, and a lot of insecurity this has caused in many provinces, and in view of the fact that Quebec is talking about imposing a special tax on its citizens because of the difficulties that Province is facing at this time, is it not possible for the Minister to do what the previous Government did last year, that is, to extend for one year the equalization payment formula so that weaker provinces like Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, and Manitoba could use that money to soften the blows they are receiving with the big change in the economy at this time?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the problems which the various provinces are facing under the equalization program were established because of the equalization formula that was put in place by the Government of which the Hon. Member was a part, three years ago in 1982. That formula was not extended a year ago. It expires on March 31, 1985, and that was the original plan for transitional payments.

An Hon. Member: You are supposed to be smarter.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): There have been a number of discussions with people, the Premier of Quebec, the Finance Minister of Quebec, with the Province of Manitoba and other provinces, on this difficult issue. All I would say to the Hon. Member is that we have to face difficult financial problems at the federal government level, as he well knows. We are determined to face those problems, as was set out in the November 8 statement. I suggest the Hon. Member wait a bit before we get an answer on the equalization payments.

QUEBEC INDUSTRIES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the Hon. Member has not given a final word, and that there is still hope.

I have another question in the same kind of economic sphere.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, today in the Province of Quebec, we are facing some major problems. We do not know what is going to happen to the Domtar project. We have had factory closings at Wabasso and Philips in Trois-Rivières, at Melchers in Berthier, Carbures in Shawinigan, Oxysynthèses at Bécancour, Pêcheries Cartier in the Gaspé and many others. The Department of Transport is about to close down VIA Rail in Montreal, and at Air Canada, hundreds of people are being transferred from Montreal to Toronto. Considering the major problems confronting the Province of Quebec, could the Minister consider the following: extending the equalization program for a period of one year, as I asked in my previous question, and helping Domtar as Quebecers are requesting, especially since the Minister's colleague, the Minister of National Defence, has just been allocated $100 million to send more military personnel to Europe?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are not unmindful of the economic problems currently being faced in the Province of Quebec. We have negotiated the first Economic and Regional Development Agreement with the Province of Quebec since 1974.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1430)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Since then a number of subagreements have been negotiated. In addition, the Minister of National Defence has announced the purchase of some eight jet planes from Canadair. We are not unmindful of the problems in the Province of Quebec.

The specific question which the Hon. Member asked was whether we could move ahead with this agreement. The Prime Minister was in Quebec City last week and had some very extensive discussions with the Premier of Quebec on the problem. We should have an answer very shortly.

SHIPBUILDING

ABOLITION OF SUBSIDIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I think there is a difference between signing an agreement and the money involved. It is easy to sign documents that provide less funding for Canadians than the programs we introduced at the time.

I have another question for the Minister of Finance.

Am I correct in saying, for instance, that the Government, as the Right Hon. Prime Minister indicated at his press conference last Friday, has virtually decided to do away for ever with subsidies for shipyards throughout Canada?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we do know how to sign agreements and how to put them into effect. That is what was done with the ERDA agreement which we just signed. Maybe the Hon. Member should explain to the House why an ERDA agreement was not signed for the last 10 years, if he is so good at signing things.

Mr. Axworthy: The program is only one year old.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): There was a new agreement signed on ERDA. If the Hon. Member doesn't know about it, I will send a copy of it over to him.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DOMTAR—NEGOTIATION OF SOLUTIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER LÉVESQUE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, whom I wish to welcome back to Canada. He must have thought there had been some developments in the Domtar case since he left. Mr. Speaker, for two weeks now, the Prime Minister has been stalling for time in the Domtar case. He was probably waiting for his senior Minister to get back.

I would therefore ask the Minister, now that the Prime Minister has met with his Quebec counterpart to discuss the Domtar case, whether he could inform the House today what kind of solution the Prime Minister has negotiated with the Premier of Quebec to rescue the Domtar project in Windsor.

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the Hon. Member, it is quite correct that there was a meeting between the Prime Minister and the Premier of Quebec, at which various economic issues in the Province of Quebec were discussed, including the Domtar situation, but there were certainly no conclusions. As my colleague, the Minister of Finance, has indicated, this type of thing will be commented upon in due course.

I can only say that as far as the forest industry is concerned, which of course the Domtar situation falls under, I will be meeting with the Forest Industry Advisory Council in about a week. They, in turn, will be bringing me up to date on what is their current attitude concerning the forest industry, any new modernization which may be required. Most specifically, I want to hear from them whether they still say that no grants should be extended to member companies in that industry for increases in capacity.

DOMTAR—MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

If the Minister would bother to read the statements made by the pulp and paper producers association, he would realize that there never was any question of the association saying no subsidy should be given to pulp and paper companies, and according to what the Prime Minister said in the House, this clarification was provided by the association.

My question is as follows. We know there was a meeting on Friday. We know that work on the project must start before spring thaw. We cannot wait while the Minister consults for months on end. Every week, costs are increasing because of the Minister of Finance's policies. Interest rates are going up every week.

Is the Minister prepared to make the same undertaking as his colleagues from the Eastern Townships and promise the House that we shall have an answer by next Saturday?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the Hon. Member, I thought the answer was abundantly clear. Domtar's request for a $117 million grant has been refused. That is where it stands.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Churchill.

An Hon. Member: Now we know where the power is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Is it the intention of the Government to continue the Liberal scheme on equalization which will result in Quebec, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island receiving less money in equalization payments next year than they are receiving at the present time? Is it the intention of the Government to maintain that Liberal policy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that the Prime Minister and I have both had discussions with members of the Manitoba Government. That decision will be taken shortly. We are exploring ways of trying to meet the needs of the Province of Manitoba as well as those of the Province of Quebec, but he has to recognize that it is a larger problem. The federal Government has probably a more severe financial problem that the provinces affected have. It is for that reason we have to be very careful on how we address this issue.

TIMING OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I find it ironic that the Minister of Finance pleads poverty versus the cases of the poorer provinces. My supplementary question is directed to him. When will those four provinces know whether they will receive less money than they receive this present year? When will they find out?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Shortly.

TRUST COMPANIES

PIONEER TRUST—SITUATION OF UNINSURED DEPOSITORS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. It concerns the collapse of Pioneer Trust. The Minister will be aware of the fact that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation bailed out uninsured depositors in the Greymac, Seaway, and Crown Trust affair in Ontario. Will the Minister inform the House whether the CDIC is planning the same action for the uninsured depositors of Pioneer Trust?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, in the case of Greymac, Seaway, and some of the earlier companies, including Fidelity, CDIC entered into an agency agreement which it is allowed to do under a certain section of the Act, provided that there are savings to the corporation as a result. In the case of Pioneer Trust, those calculations were made and it was concluded that there would be no savings to CDIC, after careful examination. There is no agency agreement and the company is in liquidation. Therefore it is not possible for CDIC, under legislation, to pay off uninsured depositors.

APPLICATIONS FOR GRANTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. First I welcome him back from his magical mystery tour. I am sure, now that he has seen the programs of his Department unravel in the meantime, he probably wished he had never come back. In his letter to Domtar cancelling the project, he stated that the difficulty was the fear of U.S. retaliation. That was one of the reasons given for cancelling the grant. Is it now the policy of the Government on any industrial grant applied for by a Canadian company to take into consideration first whether the United States Government agrees or disagrees? Will that be the criterion by which we determine whether Canadian companies obtain grants? Does he not consider that to be a serious compromise on our sovereignty in determining our own industrial structure and how we should go about helping our own industry?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the Hon. Member who referred to my tour, I assure him that the results of it will be demonstrated in coming months and years as we develop new trade associations and relationships with the countries which I had an opportunity to visit. He will also find that investment flows will once again start coming back into Canada, partly from those countries.

● (1440)

In reply to the Hon. Member's question—do we consult first with officials in the United States before we can consider making a grant in Canada—the answer, of course, is no, but I would say that as a consideration in making a grant, when a company such as Domtar tells you that the plant that it intends to build would have 49 per cent of the total Canadian capacity and you ask where are you going to sell that extra capacity, and they tell you substantially in the United States, certainly with the delicate nature that exists with respect to our trade in forest products with the United States, it is very natural to inquire from our officials what they feel would be a reaction in the United States if there was such a new exportation of this single product into that country.

CROWN CORPORATIONS—ELIGIBILITY FOR GRANTS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the Minister that this sounds like the new Fortune magazine philosophy of the Conservative Government, that we really do not want to export our products, we are afraid to export them, and we are going to establish involuntary restraints without even being asked.

I want to raise a question with the Minister on another aspect. He said in his Estimates that the Government would no longer give any grants to Crown corporations or any companies in which Crown corporations hold interest. The Prime Minister contradicted that statement on March 1. Is the Minister now going to rescind that policy that he made in his Estimates, that Crown corporations, federal and provincial, are no longer eligible for grants, or is the Prime Minister not telling it as it is in this House of Commons?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the Hon. Member who talks about some kind of voluntary restraints, the fact is we have no objection to Domtar through its own good resources building the plant and exporting to the United States. There is no suggestion on our part that it should not do it.

All we are saying is that a profitable company such as Domar does not have to turn to the federal Treasury for the funding that it requested. Bearing in mind the deficit position in Ottawa, that was part of the reason why we said we could not accommodate it. As far as the Crown corporations are concerned, if the Hon. Member would have one of his researchers, or even he himself do a little better homework, he would find that those statements are entirely consistent with each other.

SPACE WEAPONRY

UNITED STATES' STRATEGIC DEFENCE INITIATIVE—NORTH WARNING SYSTEM

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have questions for the Prime Minister on the forthcoming summit meeting that will take place between himself and President Reagan. He was not in the House on Friday. He is not here today. There may be good reasons for it, but we certainly hope that before that summit takes place the Opposition will have occasion to put directly to him important questions that concern the future of our country.

In his absence, I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question that is going to be discussed at the summit meeting. It concerns, of course, the linkage that a number of American officials have made between the star wars project of President Reagan and the modernization of the radar facilities in our DEW Line. It was proposed by two officials before there was a linkage. A third was added to the list on Friday. Considering that Mr. Richard Burt, in his briefing of Canadian journalists, says there is a linkage, why does the Canadian Government continue to say the opposite?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how long the Leader of the New Democratic Party will pursue this course of deliberate anti-Americanism by quoting half the statements of American officials. Mr. Burt made it clear that his initial statement was a mistake. The Hon. Member should know that the Department of the Secretary of State in the United States said clearly, and I quote from the statement:

> With regard to the upgrading of the DEW Line and its replacement with the North Warning radars, the Department can state clearly and categorically that the North Warning System being planned by Canada and the United States is not part of the Strategic Defence Initiative Program.

The Hon. Member knows that. He was told and read that statement on Friday. He raises it again today in a deliberate attempt to try to sour relations, and try to frustrate the development of jobs here in this country. I consider that to be unacceptable behaviour.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs reveals his usual intellectual mastery of a complex subject. There is no attempt on this side of the House to be anti-American or anything else.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is normally proper to grant the questioner the right to ask his question. Will the House please do that?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, American official after American official, whether it is the Secretary of Defense, a senior policy advisor on defence matters, or an American who briefs Canadian journalists, are all saying there is a linkage between the two. The Minister has a lot of nerve saying that we are distorting the truth. He is doing it. Why does the Canadian Government continue to say the opposite to what the Americans are saying?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons we differ from time to time with what the Americans say is that we are a sovereign country, and we intend to remain that way. On this particular question, the responses by the Canadian and American Governments have been the same, because the fact is there is no relation between SDI and the North Warning System. That is well known. That has been established. I personally do not understand why the Hon. Member, representing a constituency that relies, as it does, upon good relations with the United States of America, would go out of his way to try to sour relations between his country and the United States.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR REFERRAL TO PARLIAMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, we can certainly understand why the Member is no longer Prime Minister of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: My goodness, it is only Monday. Question, please.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering that many Americans have said that there is such a linkage, and considering that the Government of Canada says there is no such linkage, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs do the honourable thing, produce the evidence by bringing any proposed agreement before the House of Commons so that people in this House and the people of Canada can actually see the agreement and make up their own minds?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons why I am no longer Prime Minister is that the Hon. Member for Oshawa, as Leader of the New Democratic Party, did what he always does when he has to face a tough decision. He runs and joins the Liberal Party.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Joe, Joe!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, Perhaps the House will now let the Minister answer.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the question of the evidence being brought before a parliamentary committee, I remind the Leader of the New Democratic Party that I took the initiative which had not been taken by his friends and copains, the Liberal Party, for years, to put the North Warning System before a parliamentary committee. Members of his Party were there. Instead of asking questions of this kind, they asked about power generators in the north.

PETRO-CANADA

SALE OF COME-BY-CHANCE OIL REFINERY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and the Minister of State for Mines, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. The President of the Treasury Board should know that, following an invitation to tender in January, 1985, six companies have posted $10,000 bonds to bid on the Come-by-Chance oil refinery. That invitation to tender has been submitted by Petro-Canada. Three of the companies that posted bands are in the business of dismantling refineries, and three are themselves refiners. Will the Minister confirm that Petro-Canada is in the final stages of concluding a deal with one of those six companies to dismantle the refinery and ship it out of Newfoundland?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to take this question under notice and make sure that an answer is given.

REQUEST THAT SALE BE HALTED

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister also take the following under notice and pass it along to his Cabinet colleagues? In view of the fact that there has never been a study done to determine the viability of that operation in Newfoundland, and in view of the fact that Clause 54 will wipe out Newfoundland's opportunity to have a petrochemical industry forever if that refinery closes, will the Minister and the Government agree to instruct Petro-Canada to freeze the sale of that Come-By-Chance oil refinery until such time as a viability or feasibility study has been carried out?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, again I will be happy to take the question under notice. As for the premises and hypotheses that are being tossed around, I will leave them up in the air. I will make sure that the Hon. Member gets an appropriate answer to the question.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—CANADA-UNITED STATES DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Secretary of State will recall that last week I asked the Prime Minister what he would be asking of President Reagan with respect to action on acid rain, and that at that time the Prime Minister refused to say what he would be saying to Mr. Reagan in this regard. In view of the action taken by the Government on acid rain since the time I asked the question of the Prime Minister, I wonder if the House of Commons could not be told what the Prime Minister will be asking of President Reagan with respect to American action on acid rain when he meets with him in Quebec city.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member would want to have the House recall more precisely what the Prime Minister said. He said that if there were to be consultations with anyone prior to discussions with United States officials, he would probably choose someone other than the Hon. Member. The point that has to be made—

Mr. Deans: That wasn't what he said. It's interesting, but that wasn't what he said.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): He was a little more definitive than I was.

We hope that the actions that have been taken under the very strong leadership of my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, to demonstrate our determination to move on the acid rain question, will allow Canada to go to those meetings with clean hands so that we can increase the influence of Canada's arguments in order to try to reach an agreement that will reduce the danger to Canadian and American lakes and livelihoods posed by the threat of acid rain.

CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, given the former Prime Minister's occasional words about respect for Parliament and respect for Members of Parliament, I would have thought that he would have been the first to say that Members of Parliament have a right to know and ask about what position the Prime Minister will take.

May I ask the Secretary of State just what action the Government will be seeking from the Americans with respect to acid rain? Could I have the assurance that we will not simply agree to any kind of joint or mutual study of the problem? This would be to retreat from the position already taken by the Government that action is needed, and would involve conceding to the American view that more research rather than action is needed. Do we have the assurance that we will be seeking action and not mutal study?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is a member of the committee studying parliamentary reform and procedures. It will be making reports to the House. A question that it may raise is whether or not treaties and agreements should be approved by the House in advance of their signing, and another question it may raise is the rather unusual proposal the Hon. Member is putting forward now, that before we go into an open negotiating procedure we should tell the people with whom we are negotiating exactly what it is that we seek. I think that would very seriously undermine our negotiating stance, if not with the United States then certainly with other countries.

With regard to the acid rain question more particularly, the historic difference in views between Canada and the United States is clear. We believe there does not need to be more research. We believe there must be action taken. We believe that we can be persuasive in seeking action by taking action ourselves. My colleague, the Minister of the Environment, has shown leadership by having Canada take action. We hope that at the meeting between the President and the Prime Minister in Quebec city this weekend and next Monday, we will be able to get some solid progress against the threat of acid rain put into action.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

CANADIAN COMMITMENT

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence whom I would like to congratulate on his recent appointment. Today the Government announced measures regarding the strengthening of Canada's conventional commitment to NATO. Can the Minister advise the House of the implications of that announcement, and can he advise the House whether there will be any consideration of future augmentation to Canadian forces in Europe?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Government has taken two immediate initiatives with respect to a commitment made by the former Minister of National Defence at the NATO meeting last December. The first of these will involve increasing the number of our troops in Europe by 1,200 military personnel, in order to strengthen the Fourth Canadian Mechanized Brigade group based in Lahr. The second measure will be to designate specifically an infantry battalion group in Canada to fulfil our commitment to AMF land. Both of these commitments have been announced today to the ambassadors of the countries of NATO.

With these initial measures, we hope to increase the effectiveness and contribution of our Canadian forces in Europe. The objective, of course, is to meet fully our commitments to NATO, as we have often said we would do.

HUMAN RIGHTS

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION—ROLE OF CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to my Hon. friend, the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Minister knows that the provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act on affirmative action have no teeth and that they are essentially permissive rather than prescriptive or mandatory, except when a tribunal rules. The Minister knows that the Canadian Human Rights Commission cannot order affirmative action. Will the Minister, in the proposed employment equity legislation, assure that there is an obligation on the part of Crown corporations and federally regulated companies to have consistent employment equity programs?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the Canadian Human Rights Commission, one of the reasons it has not been able to take action in the past with regard to inequities in employment was because it simply did not have the information available on which to initiate action. It has responded by following up on complaints. The measures that were announced the other day will make it mandatory for Crown corporations, firms doing business with the Government, and the federally regulated private sector, to file reports and returns giving the required information. If that information does not show that employment equity plans are being implemented and targets met, then the Canadian Human Rights Commission can take action on its own.

RESOURCES OF HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the goal may be fixed, and it is a laudable one. However, without legal and financial clout it simply will not work. If the Minister believes that the Human Rights Commission will be able to measure that action, can she tell me if she has made provisions to give it the kind of financial and human resources it will require to meet all her very laudable expectations?

● (1500)

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for her comments about these initiatives. I know they have received a great deal of support from women and minority groups across the country. I have already discussed this matter with the Commissioner of the Human Rights Commission and have assured him, if he feels he does not have sufficient resources, that he should come forward and put his request to the Government. I am sure that request will be received very sympathetically.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

APPLICATION TO PART-TIME WORKERS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Minister assured me last Friday that employment equity would apply to female part-time workers as it would to full-time workers, but she completely ignored the recommendations of the Abella and Wallace reports regarding benefits and protections for part-time workers. Will the Minister guarantee that the recommended changes to the Canada Labour Code will be made so that part-time workers, who now have little job security, will at least have prorated benefits and protections?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not have responsibility for the Canada Labour Code. I am sympathetic to the point of view which the Hon. Member has put forward, and I will be glad to undertake ongoing discussions about this matter with the Minister of Labour.

EMPLOYMENT

EQUALITY IN THE WORKPLACE—AIR CANADA POLICY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. What action will she take to counteract the anti-equity policies of Crown corporations, such as Air Canada, which wants to force women from full-time jobs into part-time work?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that question. As of last Friday, we announced that there would be employment equity extended to Crown corporations. I trust that the Hon. Member will give them longer than a weekend to respond to that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

STEEL EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade, but in his absence I will direct it to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. Last fall the United States exempted Canada from import quotas on steel. The steel market, the jobs, the steel produced in Canada, and the primary producers are very important. Since that time there has been a fairly rapid increase in the amount of steel which is exported to the United States, some of which is due to fabricators bringing semi-finished steel into Canada and subsequently selling it to United States markets. Is the Minister considering establishing a system to monitor steel movement in Canadian and United States markets?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have no direct knowledge of any mnitoring which is taking place at the present time. Certainly in my Department there is no formal monitoring. Whether there is on the trade side I am not sure, but I will inquire for the Hon. Member.

REQUEST THAT MONITORING SYSTEM BE ESTABLISHED

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the Minister that a tonne of steel which is produced by a primary producer in Canada creates about eight hours of work, but if it is fabricated it creates about one hour of work. Would the Minister look into the feasibility of establishing a monitoring system, such as the one in the United States, so that we can take action and, in the long run, protect the value of the United States markets, and also protect the Canadian jobs of our primary producers?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as I said in answer to the Hon. Member's first question, I will certainly inquire if any such monitoring is presently done by the Government. If not, I will ask if it would be a desirable thing to do.

EMPLOYMENT

ABELLA REPORT—ENFORCEMENT MECHANISMS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

[Translation]

The Government's response to the Abella Report as announced last Friday does not contain any specific reinforcement mechanisms. Considering that Judge Abella said in her report that voluntary programs did not produce the desired results, I would like to ask the following question: Is the Minister prepared to inform the House today that she will set up a reinforcement agency to ensure that inequities suffered by the four groups mentioned in the Abella Report will indeed be corrected?

[English]

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has yet to understand the statement which was made on Friday. As I said at that time, it is not voluntary, it is mandatory. By legislation, companies will be required to report annually on their employment equity plans. By legislation, they will be asked to gather this material and put in data systems. Crown corporations will be required to submit the same information annually. Companies doing business with the Government will be required to submit their reporting on employment equity, and if they do not meet the goals which they set for themselves, they will lose the right to contract. That is not voluntary. That is mandatory.

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF ENFORCEMENT AGENCY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Minister understood the question. She spoke about the fact that it is now mandatory for them to report to Parliament. My question concerned an enforcement agency. Judge Abella said in her report that there had to be an enforcement agency and that a voluntary method of reporting would not work. Can the Minister now announce that there will be some enforcement agency in order that there can be equality for the four groups which were mentioned in Judge Abella's report? Without that, it does not work.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, again the Hon. Member does not understand. In her comments, Judge Abella welcomed what the Government had done. I think she was surprised that we had moved so quickly and seriously in implementing the recommendations which she had made. Nevertheless, I would tell the Hon. Member that if he looked at the human rights legislation he would see that the Human Rights Commission can initiate action if it feels there are shortcomings as a result of this information being tabled in Parliament and being made public, so that it will have some basis on which to work. It has not had that up until now.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

FRESHWATER SALE INQUIRY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. I would like to ask him whether he supports the readiness which was expressed by his leader, as reported in Fortune magazine, namely, that he is prepared to sell Canada's supply of freshwater to the highest bidder, notwithstanding the warnings which were issued last summer by the federal water policy inquiry when it said that in parts of Canada we are already reaching the limits of supply.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the article to which the Hon. Member refers.

NIAGARA RIVER POLLUTION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Well, Canadians will have to wait and see if they receive a clear signal from Cabinet.

Again, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, in relation to the meeting which will take place in Quebec city next Sunday and Monday, whether he will ensure that the serious matter of the Niagara River and Lake Ontario water deterioration, which will be placed in a basin where there are five million people who are likely to face water shortages in a decade or two if toxic contamination is not eliminated, will be on the agenda?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter raised by the Hon. Member and make every effort to ensure that it is given the appropriate consideration.

SUGAR BEET INDUSTRY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. He will know that sugar beet growers in Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta are facing great uncertainty about the future of their industry, having watched their share of the domestic sugar market drop to something like 8 per cent. Does the Minister intend to keep the domestic sugar beet industry alive? If so, what actions will he propose to do that?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I share the Hon. Member's concern about the state of the sugar industry in Canada. Indeed, I hope to be in a position, possibly by the end of this week, to give some indication of what action the Government might take with respect to attempting to solve some of the problems which are currently being experienced by the people who are in that industry.

● (1510)

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Will the Minister put forward at that time the precise eligibility requirement in any levels of support, if that is the direction in which he is going at that time, or will it simply be a broad outline of what he sees for the industry?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether I will be in a position to provide that much detail by the end of this week, but if so, yes. I caution the Hon. Member that I personally do not think that I will be in that position at least by the end of this week.

THE SENATE

REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO INTRODUCE MOTION OF ABOLITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the House to waive the usual requirement of notice to introduce the following motion and have it listed under Motions:

Whereas the fundamental purpose of the Constitution of Canada is to protect the basic rights of Canadians in a free and democratic Canada;

Whereas Canadians adhere to the principle of democracy and desire that their legislative institutions be democratic;

Whereas democratic rights of Canadians are protected in the Constitution of Canada and have their clearest expression in the House of Commons and the provincial legislatures;

Whereas the Senate of Canada enjoys legislative powers, but exercises these powers without popular mandate;

Whereas the Senate of Canada is a product of an earlier period when democracy had not yet matured in Canada;

Whereas adoption of this resolution would continue to allow for the creation of new and democratic legislative institutions by the Government of Canada and the provinces of Canada;

This House urges the Government of Canada and the Governments of the provinces to act as expeditiously as possible to abolish the Senate of Canada.

This motion is seconded by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans).

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) seeks, I take it, to place a matter under Motions by unanimous consent. The question is whether or not there is unanimous consent.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say on behalf of our Party that we are certainly prepared to give our consent to allow this motion to be debated provided that the debate will take place at a time when our Leader is able to be present and can speak on behalf of our Party.

I would also like to observe that it is my understanding that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) will be attending the Chernenko state funeral in Moscow and will not be back in the House until Friday. I am sure that the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party, and perhaps all Hon. Members of the House, will agree that it is very important that the House and the country know the Prime Minister's views on this important question.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I spoke to the Leader of the New Democratic Party just before Question Period and discussed with him the particular proposition he has put forward. At that time I pointed out that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has spoken to each of the Premiers of our country with respect to the matter of Senate reform and that this process is required under our Constitution.

I pointed out as well to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that under those circumstances I thought he would be the last person who would want to take a position with respect to unilateral action while this important consultation is taking place. Accordingly, I told him that when we complete the negotiations and discussions with the provinces, we would be approaching the Leaders of the other Parties with respect to an appropriate resolution which would reflect the consensus in our country. That is the kind of government we provide, a government of consensus and consultation. Accordingly, I am not prepared to agree to the proposal put forward today.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

COMMONWEALTH DAY

OBSERVANCE OF ANNIVERSARY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, today Canada and other Commonwealth countries encircling the globe are observing Commonwealth Day. It was a Canadian proposal made ten years ago at the Commonwealth heads of government meeting in Jamaica that one day should be set aside each year to mark our membership in this singular organization. The second Monday in March was chosen not to be a holiday but to be an occasion when most children would be in school and could participate in special projects to increase their understanding of the Commonwealth. Its continued vitality depends upon the interest and involvement of all of our citizens, but particularly of younger Canadians.

[Translation]

The United Nations has declared this year the International Year of Youth. The Commonwealth countries are planning to organize a number of special events, the main one being a gathering of young people from all Commonwealth countries who will be coming to Ottawa in June to discuss the challenges of the 80s.

The number of Commonwealth bursaries offered by Canada has been raised from 300 to 500. Since the program was established in 1959, when it was first suggested by the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the time, Mr. Sidney Smith, more than 20,000 Commonwealth students have been able to benefit from these bursaries.

Canada remains convinced that this program and other training programs are useful because our country sees the youth of the Commonwealth countries as a guarantee that the Commonwealth will remain in the same excellent condition it is now.

[English]

We live in an age, Sir, of hardening ideologies, of increasing economic disparities and growing cultural nationalism, yet the Commonwealth association cuts across all of these barriers. Its 49 members represent every geographical, political, economic and social group in the world. Nevertheless, it has many things in common; a shared working language, the heritage of common law and parliamentary traditions and, most importantly, the tradition of a frank and pragmatic approach to problem solving. The latter part of this century has been called the "era of negotiation" but it is witnessing a crisis in the world's multilateral system. We believe that the Commonwealth, with its special qualities, can be an example to other international bodies.

With this in mind, it is fitting, Mr. Speaker, that we commemorate this unique family of nations and reaffirm Canada's commitment to the future of the Commonwealth.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) in stressing the importance of this anniversary for Canada.

[English]

As everyone knows, Mr. Speaker, the Commonwealth is a very unusual association. In that organization are people of different cultures, different languages and different political orientations; yet when we meet at the conferences there is a sense of fraternity which is very useful. It is another forum where we can play a different role.

I am glad to hear the Right Hon. Minister speak about the Commonwealth as a valid proposition because Canada should not think only in terms of being more or less the fifty-first state of America. I just want to use this occasion to remind the Minister that it was not very pleasant the other day in London when, at the same time as the Commonwealth was toasted, one of the Ministers toasted the United States of America, and this was done in front of British guests. I believe the Commonwealth is something we belong to. We must make sure that we keep our position in the world and not become more and more close to the United States, losing our traditions such as our association with the Commonwealth and with the francophone countries. We must make sure that Canada keeps its proper and definitive role internationally.

I am glad that the Hon. Minister took this occasion to talk about this organization which extends to some students of the Commonwealth the opportunity to come into Canada and to learn here. That is not only good for them, it is good for us, because when they go back to their respective countries they are in a position to know more about Canada. Very often they become leaders of these nations and this helps very much to establish political, social and economic links with Canada.

• (1520)

I am glad the Right Hon. Minister took this occasion to make a statement. It is very rare that we have statements in the House. The Minister had a private press conference at 1.30 in his Department today relating to important commitments on national defence. Making this announcement outside of the House did not give us an opportunity to comment on the Government spending another $100 million on national defence in Europe. I find it very awkward that the very day negotiations on disarmament are starting the Minister announces a greater contribution to defence in Europe. I think that when people start to talk about disarmament it is not the time to announce an increase in our contribution to armaments. But that will be for another occasion. I just want to tell the Hon. Minister that we would have liked to have an announcement in the House on national defence and external affairs too.

In closing, I am glad to talk about the Commonwealth. I had many experiences with this good association. My first international meeting was a Commonwealth meeting; but this question of national defence might well have been discussed in the House of Commons, too.

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we in the New Democratic Party join with others in the observance of Commonwealth Day. We are pleased to note that Canada has increased the number of scholarships from 300 to 500 for Commonwealth students. We, too, would have to say there is nothing particularly controversial about our recognition of Commonwealth Day, and while I welcome the Minister making statements in the House, as I have done before, I hope he will also make statements on somewhat more controversial matters, such as the proposed signing of a treaty with the United States relating to the northern warning system. I hope he will be encouraged to make statements on matters not only of fundamental importance but also of some real controversy. No matter how much we may try to slough it off, this matter is of great concern and the subject of controversy in Canada.

May I ask the Minister if there are other initiatives relating to the Commonwealth which he has in mind? For example, does he think it might be useful to follow up the New Delhi Summit, and perhaps he already has, of a year or so ago?

Mr. Speaker: With great respect, is the Hon. Member's statement finished and we are now embarking on a question? Should I understand it to be that way? Does she wish this to be treated as questions to the Minister?

Ms. Jewett: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you.

Ms. Jewett: Would the Minister see Canada playing a larger role in the Commonwealth Pacific? Many of the island nations are only now emerging into a decolonization situation; does he see our playing a large role in the Commonwealth Pacific?

Does he not feel that at this time he might have addressed more the North-South issue? We have tended to forget that a bit. Many of the Commonwealth countries are, of course, developing nations. Would the Minister not soon be prepared to reinstate the $180 million which was removed from official development assistance and, indeed, increase that amount? Is that not as important as spending an additional $100 million on our troops in Europe?

Finally, does the Minister have any knowledge as to whether Radio-Canada International is going to suffer cuts within the CBC? If so, would he—

Mr. Speaker: I am forced to rise for two reasons. One, there are a large number of questions; two, the questions must be relevant to the statement made by the Minister. At least one or two of the Member's questions were directly relevant, but I am not sure about the others.

Commonwealth Day

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, in light of the latitute of the responses by my two friends on the other side, I might be permitted to say how pleased I am to note the new-found interest by the spokesman of the Liberal Party in Statements by Ministers in the House of Commons. I also accept the observations made by my colleague representing the New Democratic Party.

With regard to the Commonwealth, our first emphasis—because the issue arose there first—has been to try and bring some new vitality to relations between Canada and some of the Commonwealth members in the Caribbean area. We were pleased at the tone and the possibility of progress found when the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) met with Caribbean Commonwealth Prime Ministers. There is, of course, a very significant job to be done in the Commmonwealth Pacific. I think it is an open question as to whether it is more appropriate for Canada or other Commonwealth countries with similar wealth to take a role of leadership in that region. That is an indication of my current attitude and I would be very pleased to discuss that with the Hon. Member and others.

I do not want this to be taken in any way as criticism of former Governments, but it seems to me that one of the aspects about the Commonwealth that we should bear in mind is precisely that it is so easy to take it for granted. I think there is some real advantage to having a day like this on which we can draw attention to an organization which has very real opportunities open to us, including reaching across lines which have traditionally been defined as North-South. Those do not always arise just in economic spheres. They arise, for example, with regard to the present crisis in UNESCO. It occurs to me that there may well be some opportunity to make better use of the Commonwealth connection in trying to bring progress and achieve real reforms in an organization of that kind.

With regard to overseas development assistance, I am not here to argue figures with the Hon. Member, as I seem to have to do with every statement I make at this time. There were reductions in the summer of last year by the former Government, some of which were reinstated. There was a statement made by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), in November. There has been very significant spending on the fund for Africa, as the Hon. Member knows because she has encouraged us on it. I share her commitment to increasing Canada's activity in overseas development assistance; I think the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) shares that same commitment, and I will be looking for their help in years ahead to ensure that we are able to reflect that commitment in reality.

Mr. Speaker: I have time for one more question.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I expect the Minister will also comment on the New Delhi peace initiative.

My final question goes back to the scholarships for Commonwealth students. Would the Minister consider a grant system to compensate for the increased tuition fees now being levied on Commonwealth students, as distinct from the scholarship system?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to look at that approach but I am not convinced it is the best way to deal with the difficult problem relating to tuition fees; not simply in relation to Commonwealth scholars but others as well.

With regard to New Delhi, there is no specific initiative which is planned at this moment by way of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker: I will allow one more question given the shortness of that last question and answer.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, we on this side obviously welcome the increase in the number of scholarships and we welcome the Minister's statement on Commonwealth Day.

I would like him to comment with regard to the question of the cuts in aid the Government has undertaken and the consultations it is carrying on regarding our aid policy, particularly as it reflects the notion of tied aid. The document on consultation seems to proposed that aid should be tied to economic benefits for Canada. In order to demonstrate the depth of his commitment to development generally and in Commonwealth countries in particular, can he comment on the suggestion that aid should be tied rather than using the more effective route, which is to have aid which meets the priorities of the country receiving it?

• (1530)

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that it is appropriate for me, on Motions, to comment on aspects of consultation papers which are in circulation. Let me say that, in addition to the consultation papers that are now in circulation, there will be at least two parliamentary opportunities, of which I hope full advantage will be taken, to discuss fully the question raised by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper). One will be when the Estimates of CIDA come before the standing committee. The other will be when the green paper, which I am preparing as a basis for the first public parliamentary discussion of international policy in our history, is available to Parliament.

PETITIONS

RELOCATION OF NATIONAL DEFENCE DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES IN OTTAWA-CARLETON

Mr. David Daubney (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of several hundred civilian employees of the Department of National Defence in the Ottawa-Carleton area. Approximately 2,200 members of the Department located at various locations in the city of Ottawa are scheduled to be relocated to the outskirts of Hull in the near future.

The petitioners are suggesting that insufficient attention has been paid by the appropriate authorities to the cost of this move and the effect on efficiency and employee morale, and ask that the House ask the appropriate officials to reconsider this move.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 39 and 131.

[Text]

COMPUTER CRIME

Question No. 39—Mr. Howie:

Did the Government undertake, or has it initiated in the current fiscal year, any studies relating to the effect of computer crime or measures to combat it and, if so (a) were these studies carried out by outside consultants (b) in what time frame were the studies to be conducted (c) was any amount allocated to the studies and, if so, what amount?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice): In 1984, two bills containing proposed amendments to protect the integrity of computer systems were introduced in the House of Commons; Bill C-19 the proposed Criminal Law Reform Act, 1984, on February 7, 1984, and Bill C-18, the proposed Criminal Law Reform Act, 1984, on December 19, 1984. Following the tabling of both bills, consultations were held by the Department of Justice and public inquiries were received concerning these proposals. Costs were assumed within the normal fiscal and person-year allocations of the Department of Justice.

Following a recommendation of the Parliamentary Report of the Subcommittee on Computer Crime, June, 1983, a federal-provincial study on the legal protection of trade secrets and commercial information was initiated in February, 1984 to determine the type of legal protection that should be afforded in this area. Canada and the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Alberta and Saskatchewan are represented on the study, which is being chaired by the Province of Alberta. The study is to deliver its interim report at the next meeting of Deputy Attorneys General responsible for criminal justice. Costs at the federal level were assumed within normal fiscal and person-year allocations, except for the payment of $8,189.20 to an outside contractor for the preparation of a research report and consultative services on the criminal misappropriation of trade secrets. The report was prepared between June 4 to August 31, 1984 and a consultation occurred on November 19-21, 1984.

LEASED OR RENTED CARS FOR CABINET MINISTERS

Question No. 131—Mr. Boudria:

Since September 17, 1984, have any cars been leased or rented by the Government for the use of Cabinet Ministers and, if so (a) how many (b) what is the name or names of the companies providing cars (c) in each case, what is the make, year, model and price?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): (a), (b) and (c): The Table below lists 17 cars rented or leased by the Government for the use of Cabinet Ministers. Leasing arrangements may vary from one day to four years.

Company	Make	Year	Model	Price
Baillot et Fils Ltée	Chrysler	1985	New Yorker	$19,200.60

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fraser that Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Do I have a couple of minutes left in my speaking time?

Mr. Speaker: I am advised by the Table that the Member's time for debate has expired but the period for questions and comments has not expired. The Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) has a question arising from the speech of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper).

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the speech made by the Hon. Member. He took exception to the intent in the part of the Bill that dealt with the authority of the Minister and fishery officers to make on-the-spot decisions relating to the opening and closing of seasons, if I interpreted his remarks correctly.

Why does he take such exception to those powers that will be given under this Bill, when those powers will be needed in certain circumstances locally and regionally by fisheries officers? They will be able to make value judgments on the spot as they relate to allocations to various sectors of the fishing industry. Would he expand on his objection to new powers being granted to the Minister and to departmental officials according to the Bill?

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question because if I left that impression, of course it is wrong. The Hon. Member has given me the opportunity to clarify what I said.

In no way was I objecting to the granting of authority to local officials to make on-the-spot decisions. I can imagine circumstances when that authority may be necessary. I was attempting to point out that we do not know how the Government intends to use the legislative authority it is seeking from us today. If the Hon. Member knows what the Government intends to do and would share that with us, I would be pleased to comment on the Government's policy.

Our Party is concerned about the unfettered and absolute authority to regulate the fishery which the Government is requesting in this legislation. We understand that there is a need for regulation of the fishery and that there must be local authority for fisheries officers, but we have not been told how much authority will be delegated to local fishery officers and how it will be used.

Furthermore, the Government is seeking this legislative authority, yet it has not given any details with respect to guidelines by which the Department will have to operate, or laid out any plans for management of the fishery resource. Is the Government considering some kind of co-management structure and, if so, what is it? Will there be a mechanism to allow adequate representations from those involved in the fishery? We recognize the need for authority at both the departmental and local levels, but will that authority be limited, will the officials be accountable and to whom? We want to have this information before the legislation is passed. We believe that the departmental officials should know what the rules and guidelines will be before the legislation is passed.

We do not want to give the Government unspecified authority when its record has been one of flip-flopping on its election promises and government action.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the immediate problem facing the Department of Fisheries is that, according to a judicial interpretation, it is not legal for the Department to allocate the resource according to the users. Does the hon. gentleman believe that that part of the legislation must be passed by this Chamber before the season starts in the spring, particularly in B.C. but certainly on the East Coast as well, so that the federal Government can have this power which deals with socio-economic problems and not so much as it pertains to conservation and protection? Does the Minister need the power? If he does not need the power requested under the Bill, then certainly I would agree with the hon. gentleman's sweeping statement. But let me ask him specifically, does the Minister deserve to have the power to regulate the fishery and regulate the fish to user groups, power which he presently does not have and which has been, according to the justice of the court, illegal all along for the Minister to do?

• (1540)

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member appeared to be shifting his question as he went along. I will start out with what I thought was the question in the first place. It seemed to be: what is the immediate need for legislation granting authority to the Government to regulate the fishing industry?

We are not saying there is not any need for legislation. We would be glad to sit down right now with the Government to have the Government spell out exactly what kind of authority it needs to do what precisely. There are a lot of fishermen who want to know what the Government has in mind for them.

The Hon. Member who asked the question is obviously very conversant with the fishery and speaks out well on its behalf. I can understand why he is asking these questions. Even if the case could be made for immediate action, that does not mean it has to be thoughtless action, unexamined action, or unconsidered action. If we were to act without thought and without all of the facts before us, the other place might call us up short.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Keeper: Its Members might say that this is the time for sober second thought.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Keeper: Who knows, Mr. Speaker? I do not want to give any provocation to the other place; with as much respect as I have for it, I do not want to give any excuse for its Members to be pouring over legislation of this democratic Chamber, to be looking at it, examining it, and asking, "How can we improve it? The House of Commons has acted without full consideration of the facts and we will put a stop to this". We cannot have an undemocratic body continuing to play that role.

If there is need for immediate action, then I think we could do what the American Congress does. When it has need for immediate action and it does not have agreement among legislators about what the action will be, members get together to forumlate an agreement. They have a conference. Perhaps this is the time to have a conference. This Government promises co-operative government. It promises consultation. It intends to be open. If we need immediate action, we would be prepared in this Party to sit down immediately and talk about what plan this Government has in mind for the fisheries and get it all spelled out. Therefore, when the Government comes before this House seeking authority, the authority is defined, limited and accountable and the people in the fishery will know what kind of Government regulation they will have to face. They will know whether they will be able to make a living, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We shall now resume debate. The period of questions and comments has terminated. The Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo).

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, we are talking today about one of the primary industries in this country. Within that category it is very important that we have the kind of legislation that allows those primary industries to develop in a way that the people who work in those industries want it to develop. It is important, therefore, that the Government take the kind of responsibility which allows it to put in place a structure which will not allow these industries to degenerate and to become less effective and less productive.

The industries I am talking about include the farm industry, the forest industry, and the fishing industry. I suppose one could throw the mining industry in there too as a primary production industry, except that the mining industry deals with a non-renewable resource. The other three can be considered to be producing products from resources that are renewable, although I am sure I would get into a considerable amount of argument with a number of people about the renewability of farm land. Basically what we are talking about here are primary industries and the kind of legislation that we need in place to make sure that the primary industries can produce the way they want to produce.

We have a case for concern. I know we are talking specifically about the fisheries, but we have a case for concern. Under the responsibility of the Liberal Government, which has been our Government for the past 16 to 20 years, it has allowed the degeneration of these primary industries in such a way that we are now faced with considerable amounts of trouble in each industry.

The farming industry is having trouble, the forest industry is having trouble, and today we have been talking about the fisheries and its trouble. It has become a kind of ongoing feeling on the part of these communities, the farming, the fishing and forest communities, to recognize that they are a long way from Ottawa, that Ottawa is pretty insensitive to their basic problems, and that they cannot expect the kind of legislation and understanding from Ottawa that would be relative to their importance in Canada's economy.

I think it is important to note that farming and fishing particularly are industries which are carried on in most cases by families and by whole communities. If we are going to keep the kind of traditional independence on the part of communities and families, we should make it possible, as far as we can, for these industries to be kept producing, allowing them to increase production and making them viable once more as part of the economy of Canada. That is something we have lost over the last two years. We have lost the primary industries as part of the viable structure of the economy of Canada.

We are talking today about the fisheries industry, which is not a minor industry. It could be a much greater industry. It is not a minor industry because if you take the structure of it, it has provided well over 100,000 direct jobs across the nation for fishers and plant workers and the other people who work in and around the fishing industry. These people produce 1.3 million tonnes of fish in 1983, valued at $874 million. Aside from those figures, they have derived products valued at $2.1 billion and an export value of $1.6 billion. We are not talking about a small industry or about a very few people. On both coasts of Canada there are fishing fleets comprised of 42,000 private fishing crafts.

Let us take a look at the particular communities affected, in particular in Newfoundland and along the East Coast. There are 1,300 communities which are entirely dependent upon the fishing industry. Consequently, we should have legislation in place which protects that industry as much as possible. The industry on the West Coast may not be as large. There are not as many communities directly affected by it. However there are 17,000 commerical fishers and approximately 500,000 people who are sports or recreational fishers. They provide a lot of indirect employment to people in the tourist industry. It is very important that what we discuss in the House in terms of the fishing industry take into account what is good for the industry, for the people and for the survival of the fishery.

The reason this Bill is before us is that the previous Government did a bad job in terms of husbandry in the fishery over the years. Consequently there is a shortage of fish and a problem with allocation of the fisheries. We needed this Bill to provide the Minister with what he thought was a proper amount of control. To a certain extent we agree, but we differ on the kind of control and who should have it. This is why we are suggesting a number of changes before the Bill goes to committee.

The Bill itself contains a number of very beautiful words. Aside from conservation and protection of fish and the waters frequented by fish, the purpose of the Act is "to provide for the proper management, allocation and control of the seacoast fisheries of Canada; to ensure a continuing supply of fish and to maintain and develop the economic and social benefits from the use of fish to fishermen and others employed in the Canadian seacoast fishing industry, to others whose livelihood depends in whole or in part on seacoast fishing and to the people of Canada;" and so on. These are very beautiful words, but we have learned that these kinds of words are very easily forgotten. If we look at the words in the preamble to many Bills passed in the House, we find that, regardless of the beautiful words and statements of purpose, five years or even less down the road their purpose has been forgotten.

With the record of broken promises and mistrust before the fishers of Canada, is it any wonder they ask us to ensure that this Bill gives them the input they want? Sometimes what is written in a Bill has no real bearing on what happens in the industry. This is why members of my Party have risen and asked the Minister for an assurance that he will not put in place an over-all structure which would allow him to do anything he pleases without defining under what circumstances he will use the power.

We hope to bring forward in committee the fact that we would like to see a structure which is close to what the fishers are requesting. We cannot be sure that the beautiful words in this Bill will necessarily be the words the bureaucrats remember. They are more likely to remember the fact that the Bill gave them absolute power to do whatever they wanted or that it did not suggest that they had some responsibility for the social development of fishing communities. It is very important as this Bill approaches committee that we look at some of the background and basic principles which are important.

All the users of the resource—natives, commercial and sports fishers—have a right to share the resource. The Bill gives the Minister the absolute right of allocation. Should he have that right without any direction from the House?

Commercial fishers should have the right to a fair and decent income for their labour. That sounds very good within the context of the Bill, but we must have an assurance that we do not follow the more common position taken by the United States—"let us fish this out and when all the fish are gone, we will move some place else and fish it out." We want a continued development of a fisheries program so that we always have fish.

Natives, particularly those along the West Coast, have special traditional rights to the resource and its use in furthering the economic development of their communities. Across Canada many native communities depend upon fish as a basic food staple and as a cash crop, as farmers say. Fish were their main source of income, their main source of cash. Because of mismanagement, overfishing, pollution and a number of other things, they now find themselves without enough fish to eat and without fish to sell. The quality has gone down in some places, the quantity has gone down in many places.

The final principle is that protection and enhancement of the resource is paramount and must take priority in all deliberations. This follows what I said earlier. If we are to have a structure in place, it must recognize the needs of the industry. We are parliamentarians and the industry itself must be assured that it has an input into the programs and that they are continued, not only this year and next year, but for generations to come.

• (1600)

What is wrong with the approach of this Bill? The Minister suggests that this Bill is not all that important, but it gives him authority to control the fishing industry. Maybe it is the words he used that concern us. He suggested that because the Department of Fisheries was taken to court on several occasions and lost its bid, it should have this power. We are being asked to give the Department absolute power to make the kind of decisions that will control the industry.

A number of my colleagues have suggested that we recognize the need for control and redevelopment. We will support that, but it must be acceptable to the people. I suggest we put in place a board made up of people from the commercial fishery, natives, the packers and communities that depend on fish. We should give that board the kind of power and structure to make decisions on continued development and on how the fisheries will be used today. It should decide on how the fisheries will provide stock for the next hundreds of years. These are the people whose families are dependent on them now and in the years to come.

Let us deal with the question of resources. We should develop a structure which allows the people to provide this kind of food to the rest of the country and the rest of the world. We should ensure that we no longer have famines such as presently exist around the world. Canada should make a contribution to humanity within a structure that helps the Canadian fishing community feel that it is an important part of the community, an important part of the economy of Canada and will continue to be so for many years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Questions or comments?

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, my question to my colleague has to do with the native fishery and aboriginal rights. The Party in office promised greater participation for native groups. The power it is seeking today has to do with the allocation of the fishery. This will affect resources at the disposal of native people involved in the fishery. Having examined the legislation, does my friend find any guarantees for aboriginal rights? Is there any protection in this legislation that would ensure that the traditional native fishery would be respected?

We are dealing with a piece of legislation that has to do with the regulation of a natural resource. I ask my friend to look at it from the perspective of native people, the aboriginal people's point of view, those who are struggling to have their rights respected and defined. Does he find in this legislation any provisions which would ensure the protection of aboriginal rights? Does he feel that this is a legitimate concern that should be dealt with by this House before this legislation moves forward?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, to be fair to the Minister, I have to say that he did not say that this Bill would take care of the need that is there. If you look closely at the legislation, a native fisher may be a little worried, knowing the track record of the Department of Fisheries, the previous Government and Governments as a whole toward the native community. I would be a little suspicious that maybe there are parts of this Bill which might give the Government authority to further disintegrate native rights, particularly in communities along the West Coast. That is one area that might be handled by a board which has representation from the native community. It would have the power to worry about conservation, future supply, something that has not been worried about in the past.

Many people blame the native community for overfishing. The Department of Fisheries has not in the past given natives the kind of security whereby if they do a good job of conservation in their area, someone else will not fish them out. That is not taken care of in this Bill.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Hon. Member with regard to this legislation. The legislation purports to seek authority to regulate the fishery in order to conserve a natural resource and, therefore, is obviously worthwhile and seeks a public benefit. Can the Hon. Member tell me whether it is possible under this legislation for the Minister to exclude from the fishery, for example, sports fishermen, commercial fishermen or native fishermen? This Bill seeks authority to allocate the fishery among various user groups, which includes at least sports, commercial and native groups.

It may not be likely, but is it possible under this legislation that the Government could say that in order to conserve the resource and meet the main objective, it will not allow any more sports fishery? As the legislation is written, is it possible for the Government to say to native people, "We would like to allow you to continue to fish, but we have to conserve the stock, so we are not going to allow you to fish any more"? Is it possible under this legislation, which allows the Government absolute authority to allocate the fishery, for the Government to say to commercial fishermen, "You will have to find another way to make your living. I am sorry, we have to conserve the fishery"? I would like to know just how much authority the Government is seeking under this legislation and whether or not the Hon. Member feels that this is a good idea.

● (1610)

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I think I can best answer that by quoting directly from the Bill itself. Clause 2.1 reads in part as follows:

> The purposes of this Act are—
>
> (b) to provide for the proper management, allocation and control of the seacoast fisheries of Canada;—
> (d) to provide, in cooperation with the provinces, for the proper management, allocation and control of the inland fisheries of Canada.

We do not have the entire Bill before us and there are some restricting factors. Clause 3 describes another amendment to be made to the Act and makes the following substitution:

> (m) authorizing a person engaged or employed in the administration or enforcement of this Act to vary, in respect of any area or portion thereof, any close time, fishing quota or limit on the size or weight of fish that has been fixed by the regulations.

Therefore, if that is interpreted in the light of the over-all control that is being asked for by the Minister, it means that the Minister can say at any time that a fisherman's quota for this year is one fish. He could therefore close down a particular part of the industry through that kind of allocation. That is why we need to have some kind of a board which has some input into how the Minister makes his decisions and what kind of decisions he makes.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether or not he and members of his Party have any thoughts on how to overcome the existing regulations and powers of the Minister. Obviously the Minister has powers for conservation and protection. I would make specific reference to regulations that were brought in over the years indicating that incidental by-catches are not permitted by law. In other words, if a fisherman put out a net and the intent of that net was to catch cod fish and he accidentally caught a salmon, according to recent regulations made by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, that fisherman must throw back that salmon if he does not have a salmon licence. The intent of the regulation is that if the salmon is alive, the fisherman will throw it back. However, by Canadian law, an incidental catch of salmon by a person who does not have a salmon licence must be thrown overboard, whether it is dead or not. One cannot keep it even for one's own consumption; it must be thrown overboard.

There is an incredible incidental catch in various sections of the country, particularly with regard to salmon, because the salmon normally follow the coastline fairly high up in the water and usually get caught in leaders of gillnets. I wonder if the hon. gentleman would have any suggestions regarding how to overcome that particular problem or how to stop a Minister from making an absolutely ridiculous regulation, something which has happened.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, incidental catches in the process of fishing create a difficult situation. However, what we are worried about in this Bill is not those incidental catches but the absolute power given to the Minister to allocate fish stocks and to say who catches the fish, how much can be caught and when it can be caught. The absolute power that is given to the Minister is the problem we are having with this Bill, not those incidental catches, with which it is difficult to deal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Resuming debate.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my comments to the debate, especially as it concerns the people involved in this sector.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about an industry, and although I come from an urban riding, and even if I am not directly involved, I am very much aware of the fact that there are 200,000 people in Canada who are involved at the commercial level, and all regulations and amendments to existing legislation will have some impact on the daily lives of these people. Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that we must examine this industry more closely.

[English]

My concern is perhaps related to the fact that I am also a housewife, a mother and a person who is looking at this Bill from the perspective of an amateur sports fishing enthusiast. I am concerned about how this Bill will impact on those like myself. I do not pretend to be any kind of an expert in the field of fishing nor do I know as much about it as I would like to know. I do know that fish costs an awful lot of money in the store; yet fishing does not bring that kind of income to the fisherpersons—and I use that word advisedly because I will come to it in a moment—who are involved in the industry.

First I would like to know if we are dealing with a shortage and if that is the reason why the costs are so high. If we are dealing with high costs, it is because we have not implemented the kind of husbandry programs which would be necessary to ensure the stock in an ongoing way for future generations?

As a sports fisherperson, I went salmon fishing in a very beautiful part of New Brunswick. We were fishing in one of its famous salmon holes. After we went fishing, I spoke to some people who were on the shore discussing the problems surrounding the lobster fishery. I mentioned that I was as interested in eating lobster as I was in catching and eating salmon. The gentleman with whom I was conversing said, "Well, you had better eat those lobsters now because there will not be any in the near future". I asked him what he meant by that. He said, "Well, lady, do you know that they are allowed to catch either male or female lobsters and that they catch female lobsters when they are ready to lay their eggs?" As a result of the overfishing in the lobster fishery, we will not have lobster any longer and we will not have the joy of eating that delectable food. I felt that what I learned that day was very interesting and I added it to my list of concerns.

My concern regards the approach taken to proper conservation of lobster, and I am sure it relates to other fish, both in fresh and in salt water. I would hope that the Minister who will be getting some control over the fishery will exercise good judgment when it comes to protecting this resource for the future.

Another time, I was in northern Quebec fishing for pike and walleye. That experience was a great deal of fun. By chance we came across some Indian people who were fishing for sturgeon. My husband was quite intrigued by the method by which they caught this sturgeon. I do not know if you are aware of the way one fishes for sturgeon, Mr. Speaker, but one uses these long, hook-like things which go along the ground because sturgeons eat from underneath their gullets. The restrictions on the right to fish for sturgeon was not explained to us at that time. The next time we went fishing, my husband brought along one of these special fishing lines that are used to catch sturgeon. We wanted to catch some sturgeon because we had been given a gift of a sturgeon by the Indian we met in the area. We had taken it home and had it smoked and it was utterly delectable.

So, back we went on our next fishing trip, all prepared to catch our own sturgeon. At that time, the local warden came over and told my husband that he was contravening the law and that we, as non-aboriginal peoples, had no right to catch sturgeon. He told us that if we did not put away this particular form of fishing tackle our car would be impounded. This brings me to ask a question with respect to the kinds of regulations that the Minister will have at his disposal. Will the Minister be allowed to issue a regulation that will change the normal traditional rights of aboriginal people? Will they no longer have the exclusive right to catch sturgeon? In terms of custom within their own land and waters, I do not think that would be particularly to their liking. I wonder if there will be consultation in that regard, or if the Minister will use his discretionary powers in a non-discretionary way.

I would like to talk about another point which has caused me some concern. Under this new legislation with the right to issue certain regulations, will the Minister have the right to determine who is a fisherman? He will have the right to determine what is a fish when it is on the land, whether it is gutted, skinned, headed or todded but I would like to know if the Minister will have the right to determine who is a fisherperson. I use the term "fisherperson" quite deliberately. I do not know how many people are aware of the fact that a man, his wife and children may be in a boat fishing together, but if the man, his wife and children apply for unemployment insurance benefits, they have to be careful what the names of the children are and what the name of his wife is. If the wife's name is Sam, or any name which sounds like a male name, she will get unemployment insurance payments without question. However, if he is named June, Joan, or any other commonly known female name, her right to unemployment insurance benefits is questioned. The same is true for children.

I had a very interesting experience in 1978 when attending a meeting of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. There were some women from Newfoundland at that meeting who came to ask for equal rights as partners in the fishing industry. With all due respect to my friends from Newfoundland, I did not completely understand the language which was being used concerning the greening of the fish and everything else. However, I learned to my absolute horror that these women, Frankie, Jackie and John, had a different kind of right to pay, depending upon the Government's interpretation of their names. The name gave them the sex and the right or the lack of right to receive unemployment insurance benefits. I think discrimination against fisherpersons is unacceptable. I do not particularly want to change the term from fisherman to fisherwoman, but if that is what we have to do in order to receive proper payment, then we will do that.

It concerns me that the legislation points to sports commercial and native fishing groups and the difference in those user groups. I have travelled along the banks and shores of the coastal waters in the East and have visited small communities. The Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) told us that there were 1,300 small communities along the coastline. It seemed to me that there were hundreds, but I cannot account for 1,300. However, to avoid interference in what had previously been provincial rights, and to avoid causing federal-provincial concerns, I hope the Minister will be very cautious in writing up his new rules and regulations.

No one should have absolute power, because absolute power corrupts. I believe that when the Minister acts, it will be with limited and accountable powers. They would only be the norm and the expectation of House of Parliament in Canada. That is what I expect from the Minister when he studies this Bill.

What is good for the people I hope will be considered in the Bill and will be considered very carefully in the regulations. The Government has undertaken a few measures which make me rather sceptical. I hope this is a Minister of goodwill who has not only thought of cuts, but who has thought of consultation with the people who will be affected by the Bill. Giving the Minister ministerial control, with responsible controls and proper dialogue with all parties concerned on the federal-provincial level, I hope is what is behind the initiatives of this Bill. A British Columbia Supreme Court judge may well have ruled, and the Minister has come down with a Bill to try to redress that decision. I hope great care and caution will be taken.

Earlier I discussed the idea of husbandry and conservation. I believe that to be key, because if that is done, when I go back to being a housewife and a consumer in an urban area, perhaps, eventually, the cost of my food basket will decrease because the careful monitoring and developing of our fish stock will result in an abundance of stock which will be provided at a lower cost.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Questions or comments?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Hon. Member for outlining the outright discrimination against women as it relates to the fishery and unemployment insurance benefits. I do not know if I would go that far, but I can see her point.

Historically, if we looked at the patterns of referring names to the Department of National Revenue from the Unemployment Insurance Commission as it relates to the fishery, one would have to agree, in looking at across the board decisions, that most of those decisions affecting the determination of a question related to women. I would like to cite as an example the squid fishery. When Japan bought dried squid from the East Coast of Canada, a great number of women became involved. The squid were dried and sold to Japan. All of a sudden, there was a request from the Unemployment Insurance Commission for the Department of National Revenue to do an audit to determine whether these people were actually fisherpersons. Consequently, hundreds of women had to appear before appeal boards, and eventually a federal judge had to attempt to prove that they were fisherpersons as it related to the Act.

Apart from the over-all problem, if we looked at the specifics of judgments from appeal courts in Canada, we would find that there were many requests which were made to the courts to determine whether a particular person was a crew member. As the Hon. Member has stated, if there is a husband, his wife and two sons in a boat, usually the woman's name will be referred to the Department of National Revenue for a judgment. Of course, the reason for that referral is that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is wondering whether the woman is a crew member or a fisherperson. A crew member cannot be someone who does work on shore, in other words, when the catch is brought in from the boat. A fisherperson baits and hooks on shore so that the crew can go out on the ocean. Certainly it is not accidental. Most of the cases which are referred to the Department of National Revenue for determination of a question end up being cases which involve women's names. If anyone doubts that, all they have to do is to look at the records of the appeal courts with respect to the definition of a crew member. Most of the decisions which were made related to groups of women. It is somewhat unfortunate that the Unemployment Insurance Act and the regulations which define a fisherman and a crew member are so loose and convoluted in their definitions. They define a fisherperson or someone who actually participates in the catch. A fisherman who comes in after the catch, who salts the fish, or cuts the fish, or does up the gear or fixes the boat, is still considered a fisherman. Of course, the distinction is made whether or not that person was actually in the boat and took part in making the catch. Then we note that someone who steers the boat is defined as someone actually taking part in making the catch, whereas someone who baits the hook does not take part in making the catch.

It is unfortunate that most of the referrals made to the Department of National Revenue for determination of a question are actually women. The Hon. Member who previously spoke made an excellent point, and I want to ask her one question. The Department of Manpower, in conjunction with the Department of Fisheries, in supporting fisherpersons—if I can call them that—has had employment programs in the last two years when the fishery has been bad. Could the Hon. Member tell us whether she has looked at the hiring criteria of those programs, which are commonly referred to as Canada Works as they relate to her particular area of critique in this House, and whether or not she finds that the hiring criteria of federal works programs utilized in this manner are discriminatory toward women?

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, yes, I would say that I have looked at the hiring criteria and, yes, they are discriminatory. However, yes, they are allowed to be discriminatory under the Canadian Human Rights Act. Affirmative action programs are part and parcel of the employment equity about which we have been talking so that we can assure the right of not only women but of native people, visible minorities and the handicapped to enjoy the fruits of their potential in the marketplace. In order to get there, we require certain kinds of measures which allow them access. Given the same kind of skills and same kind of background, but lacking the experience, yes, we are entitled to ensure them affirmative action programs.

I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, by the way, that I wish it had been the affirmative action program which had caused the squid jiggers—and that is what they told me they were—of Newfoundland not to have to go with a complaint based on discrimination before the Human Rights Tribunal. They were right about their benefits and rights, and the decision came through in that way.

I am really fascinated, Mr. Speaker, to see how an area like the fisheries—to which I had not given much thought, and I was remiss—touches men, women and children and all elements of our society in a very profound way. I would imagine that this thought, in the sense that you look at these industries in a very stereotyped way, would hold, if you were looking at mining or forestry as well as fishing—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Finestone: If you don't stop laughing, I am in trouble.

Mr. McCurdy: You are doing all right.

Mrs. Finestone: With respect to the question raised by my hon. friend, I would like to say that I hope he will understand that affirmative action is very much a point of priority for families in our society and particularly as it relates to the fishing world.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I admit that there was some element of tongue in cheek there for a moment, but the Hon. Member's speech was certainly one of the best non-traditional speeches which many of us have heard in the House. The Hon. Member expressed some excellent thoughts concerning the fishing industry about which, I am sure, many of us had not thought. It was an extremely good speech concerning the fishing industry.

I would like to put a question on the main thrust of the Bill. The Bill deals with the absolute power to allocate fish, and, of course, every fish represents a ten-dollar bill. We are talking about the Minister's unfettered right or absolute power to allocate money to different groups in a proportionate way, and that power is an extremely important part of this Bill. Under this particular legislation, there are a number of traditional groups which are entitled, on a traditional basis, to a share of the fishery. What we are now faced with is the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) having the right to throw some of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The period for questions and comments is now over.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria) (a) Government Advertising—Awarding of contracts. (b) RCMP—Request that Solicitor General seek immediate inquiry; the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Premier's trial (a) Internal investigation (b) Allegations attributed to Premier; the Hon. Member for Scarborough West (Mr. Stackhouse)—United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization—Canadian membership and funding.

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fraser that Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. John Parry (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I am also delighted to speak on Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, particularly as it affects the fisheries which is carried on in Canada's three oceans. I am happy to say that, like the previous speaker, I do have some personal experience of the industry and some personal viewpoints or perspectives which I feel I can offer in the debate on this Bill.

In 1972, just a couple of years after I came to Canada, I had the very distinct privilege of serving as a deck-hand on that great vessel, the United Church mission ship, the Thomas Crosby V, which sailed down the west coast of British Columbia. I considered it a real privilege to have the insight into the B.C. fishing industry, particularly the salmon fishery, which that working holiday gave me. I can recall being on cook duty during that cruise and coming up to the galley at six in the morning to be greeted by the sight of a beautiful fresh 15-pound salmon on the slab, a donation to the ship and its crew for the sort of work which that ship was doing among the fisherpeople of the B.C. coast. I also had the opportunity, and it was a valuable one, of meeting many of the people engaged in the fishing industry, users of the fishery who were not engaged on a commerical basis and people who utilized that fishery for recreation, subsistence and for earning a living, as a very integral and important part of their life-style. I met the people who utilized that fishery for subsistence, that is, primarily native people, but also others, who took to the sea in small vessels and fished to help feed their families and supplement the rather limited employment opportunities and meagre transfer payments which they were receiving. I had the privilege of boarding a commercial vessel and looking around, and I am sorry that at this point I cannot remember if it was a seiner or a gillnetter, because I understand that the distinction is important. The distinction has caused considerable discussion and some disagreement on the B.C. coast. I also had the privilege of meeting people who were fishing for sport, as a break from work, as part of their retirement life-style, simply for their own enjoyment and recreation.

I can say that it was a way of life which made a profound impression on me, particularly as it relates to the native people involved in subsistence fishing. Although I represent a riding which has no significant salt-water fishery, I think it is a way of life which should be preserved and developed, as indeed the Act suggests in its objectives. However, without careful conservation of and attention to the fish stock as well as the breeding cycle, breeding grounds and breeding seasons of the salmon—I will not name the varieties for fear I fall into the trap of misdescribing them—this way of life and economic opportunity will not be passed on to the children and their children by the present generation of users of this very significant Canadian resource. Thus we have the introduction of the original Fisheries Act and thus we have the amendment before us in the form of Bill C-32.

I believe that this is another example of an inexperienced Government taking the hammer to crack a nut. We have, it is true, seen court decisions which the Government may feel go against the careful management of that fishery, but nevertheless we have to make the point that the remedy for an adverse court decision is not necessarily legislation, particularly not legislation of the very far-reaching and powerful nature embodied in what the Government tabled in this House on February 28.

I would like to draw a parallel to the salt-water fishery, which is of course the main topic of discussion, with the freshwater fishery experience in my own riding of Kenora-Rainy River. It would appear that the Government of Ontario, in its very questionable wisdom, has decided that certain user categories will have preference over others on the Lake of the Woods. This is based on an economic analysis of the return from fishing which employs some very seductive and somewhat gross measures which may not reflect, and of course cannot fully reflect, the various interests involved as well as the significance of the changes in the licencing and allocation regime. Certainly they do not reflect the wishes of a large number of people who live in that area and participate in that particular fishery. It appears that the Province of Ontario has decided that sport fishermen are to have first crack, so to speak, at the fish resource, primarily pickerel, and that the balance should be divided among the traditional commercial fishery interests. Let it be remembered that these were the people who established the Lake of the Woods as a major producer of protein for Canadians during the westward expansion of our country in the late 1800s and the early 1900s. Lest it be said I am painting a rosy picture of history, it should also be acknowledged that the sturgeon fishery on the Lake of the Woods was completely fished out in a very short number of years because of demand and the fishery died out shortly thereafter. Obviously that is to be avoided in the ocean fisheries of Canada. Equally obviously, that is the Government's responsibility and it is trying to meet that responsibility, but not in a way which I or my Party can approve of, certainly not fully.

Under the amendments to the Act, the Minister gets the unfettered right to allocate the resource. He is given full power over the fishing industry without any form of appeal or review process as would normally be expected given Canada's democratic traditions. Bill C-32 flies not only in the face of our democratic traditions, but also in the face of biology. The Bill says that "fish" includes:

(a) portions of fish,

Sensible enough. It also says:

(b) shellfish, crustaceans, marine animals,

That is stretching a point, playing a little fast and loose with the language, but it continues:

marine plants and portions thereof,

It says fish includes marine plants and portions thereof. We are being asked to look at legislation which is phrased in shorthand. Surely any biologist, as my hon. colleague seated right next to me could tell us, would say that fish does not include marine plants or portions thereof. What next, Mr. Speaker? Will there be a move to repeal the law of gravity in this Chamber along the lines that whatever the Government enacts becomes the case? I think not. I certainly hope not. But this objection, it must be admitted, is a small one compared to the objection to the power that the Minister is granted over the fishery. Again I quote from the proposed substitute paragraph for paragraph 34(m) of the Act:

(m) authorizing a person engaged or employed in the administration or enforcement of this Act to vary, in respect of any area or portion thereof, any close time, fishing quota or limit on the size or weight of fish that has been fixed by the regulations.

What this does, Mr. Speaker, is to give the Minister dictatorial powers over this particular industry. Under this clause he would have virtual power to dictate every parameter of the industry partically down to what time of day the fisherpeople could exercise their bodily functions. That is frankly an abuse of the legislative process. I would not propose that even an NDP Government should have such sweeping powers without any right of appeal or review.

The Conservative election promises of fair representation, co-management and consultation have gone by the way. Such is life. The Government, because of the size of its majority, appears to be tabling legislation which reflects a blind belief that it and it alone has the knowledge to express the will of the people. That is manifestly not so.

We have another related issue. The Progressive Conservatives apparently have decided to privatize the fishing vessel insurance plan and have set the target date as April, 1986. Looking at some of the press clippings, we can see that the Government, by tabling this legislation, is basically trying to go around the courts that have said that the Government does not have total powers over the industry. It does not have the unilateral right to determine all the variables that govern success or failures in fishing. There has been no proposal made that that sort of power without review or appeal should only be exercised by a board or commission that is fully representative of all the parties involved in this industry.

• (1650)

Let us consider the matter of the tradition in the industry that has grown up over decades. I do not suggest that all of those traditions are operable in the 1980s, but they certainly should be considered in the determination of what powers the Government should exercise through the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) over the fisheries on Canada's coasts.

There are traditions and expectations in this industry. There are traditional user groups for the various areas. They have an expectation—I believe that it is a legitimate expectation in a democratic society—that the historic and traditional patterns of the industry be observed and the informal allocations that have grown up over the years be given attention in determining the allocation process.

The Minister has intimated that there is a pressing need to have these amendments passed quickly. User groups who have been consulted feel that there is no great rush to implement these changes. The other factor we must consider is that if these amendments are passed before a judgment is sought in the Supreme Court of Canada, one or more of the groups representing fisheries on the West Coast will challenge those amendments in the Supreme Court of Canada, which process I do not believe will operate in the long-run interests of anybody involved.

Most of those user groups want some sort of guarantee or floor under their participation in the industry. They want some assurance from the Government that the traditional fisheries and the traditional divisions in the fisheries will be respected. They want fair play. After all, fair play was one of the best selling themes in the election of last year. We in the New Democratic Party know that our emphasis and advocacy of fair systems in economics, in justice and in social relations was something that brought us back from the predicted brink of extinction to which we had been consigned by Canada's supposedly all-powerful media interests as recently as last February.

Frankly, I suggest that fair play has to be a major consideration in any allocation process of the fishery stocks, be it on the Atlantic, the Pacific or any freshwater lake in the country. There must be a recognition of that need and there must be a recognition of the historical patterns of usage of the resource by the people who have grown to depend on that resource.

I say that the legislation is flawed in its concept as it is flawed in its execution. It envisages powers that would fundamentally endow the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans with the right to say, "Sheep, goat; sheep, goat", in other words, "This group, this person will be successful in the industry; that group, that person will fail in the industry". The legislation is barbed with hooks. It is baited for the unwary. It will leave an entire way of life beached and gasping for air if it is allowed to pass in its present form.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member indicated a certain interest and knowledge about the relationship between the Indian community and the fishing industry. What protection would native people want contained in this Bill with respect to their traditional fishing rights?

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I believe I could offer some of the mechanisms that might go a long way to satisfying the need for protection of the traditional fishery that Indian people feel. I believe that they would want to be consulted in any form of allocation process.

Second, in the formulation of advisory councils, as we suggest, for the regulation and development of Atlantic and Pacific fisheries, I am sure that native people would be seeking representation on any such advisory board and commission.

From experience in my own riding I could offer examples of the sort of tragic consequences that can occur and would derive inevitably from the deprivation of the Indian people of traditional fishing rights and their traditional fishing resource. I met very recently in Ottawa with the Chief of Shoal Lake Band No. 40, who told me that whereas as recently as seven years ago there were 15 families in his reserve depending on commercial fishing as a very large part of their livelihood, because of the reduction in quotas the number had gone down to two families three years ago and now there are no families fishing in Shoal Lake. Those families are either on welfare or they are engaged in some other form of industry, mostly off the reserve, because they were deprived of this access to the fishery.

I am sure that if the Chief of Shoal Lake Band No. 40 were here to answer the question, he would say that representation in the decision-making process would have been a key mechanism for those people to protect their very valid and significant interest in the fishery. After all, that has been exercised by them since time immemorial.

Similarly, if I talked to members of the band council of Grassy Narrows and asked them to trace the causes of the tremendous social damage that has been done to that community, I know that they would have given instances of the destruction of their fishery by mercury pollution, which rendered fish dangerous to eat and has led to terrible consequences that have been very well documented. They would have said that had they been allowed to protect their fishery and indeed been in a position to determine where they might go to seek a substitute fishery, that would indeed have averted some of the terrible consequences which afflicted their community as a result of their not having had a say in the determination of the allocation of fish resources.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. I notice the previous speaker had only two minutes to question and comment in the question and comment period. When the next session starts, would there be seven minutes remaining? Some of the material was very fascinating. Am I correct that the next time the Bill appears the Hon. Member will be allowed seven minutes?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): As the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) knows, this is a question that arose last week in the House. May I just remind him that if the Hon. Member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Parry) is present, at that time, it would be possible to complete the question and comment period.

Mr. Skelly: I rise on another point of order, Mr. Speaker. I notice that Mr. Speaker today, in the absence of the Member in the House, invited comments or questions. Could the principle be extended a little further?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I do not intend to discuss a decision made by another Speaker in this chair which I have not seen. I just explained what the position is of the Chair now. There are other recourses for the Member if he wishes to take them.

[Translation]

Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is there unanimous consent for the House to proceed to Item No. 164?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Agreed.

Training and Development Program

EMPLOYMENT

ADVISABILITY OF IMPLEMENTING HIGH TECHNOLOGY TRAINING AND DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of consulting the provinces, educators and labour representatives, for the purpose of implementing a modern high technology training and development program which would offer to many Canadians, and especially to youth, the possibility to find satisfactory employment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the issue is a very current one. The motion was tabled last year on December 13, if I remember correctly, and although much has happened since then, I still think it is a very current subject and one that, I hope, interests the people of my riding and the Members of this House.

Mr. Speaker, you have read the motion, and I therefore assume Hon. Members have understood the purpose of this motion: to implement a national training program with the support of the provinces and the private sector. This will be a training program for our young people, for the jobless, and for those people who today are having trouble finding satisfactory employment.

Mr. Speaker, it is always wise to put problems in perspective and in this case it means that we should remember that since the end of the Second World War, there has been a spectacular development in technology. This development has meant a complete transformation of the kinds of machines and tools used by man. For over 2000 years, energy-producing machines have been evolving to the point that their development has produced a complete transformation of our society. It was the industrial revolution in the nineteenth century, which was to modify profoundly our social structures, radically change production techniques and diversify goods and create both new needs and new services.

These changes did not always occur smoothly, but after 100 years, we can easily perceive the benefits this revolution brought to western society. However, the technological changes did not stop there. With the discovery of increasingly powerful energy sources, we started to develop new tools which were themselves increasingly powerful. This was the advent of the data processing machine, the vacuum-tube computer, the transistor and microelectronics.

The changeover from energy-oriented technology to information-oriented technology is going to bring about changes in our society which, I think, could be equated with a second industrial revolution. The first revolution completely transformed society and social relationships, but the second revolution, by its very essence which is information, will bring about a transformation that will be so complete that we are hardly capable of imagining all the repercussions it will have. We need only think, for instance, of the tremendous potential the computer gives us in management, production, and planning and control of services. Our financial systems and international banking as we know them today will no longer be able to operate without increasingly perfected computers. The same applies to the government and business sectors.

During the last thirty years, changes have been relatively gradual. Information processing invaded our daily lives without giving anyone much cause for concern. The 70s, for instance, were a time of considerable economic development. There were jobs for whoever wanted one and our standard of living was rising in a manner that was quite spectacular.

However, economic development was also visible in the information processing sector, and in an even more spectacular manner. While all other sectors were experiencing considerable price increases and inflation was gradually becoming a major problem, in the information processing industry, we witnessed a quite incredible drop in price, at a ratio of 10,000 to 1. I mean that what cost $10,000 in 1960 now costs only $1.00.

As a result, computer science and microelectronics have gained worldwide currency—from offices to industry, in private homes, invading sectors where man would find a job which is now done by a machine. Car assembly lines have been turned into computer-controlled plants monitored by a handful of men or women; a secretary using a word processor does the work which used to keep three employees busy. Many jobs disappear, traditional skills no longer exist—typography is a good example. On the other hand, completely new types of jobs appear. Newspapers are full of employment offers for programmers, computer engineers, systems analysts and designers, and electronics technicians.

Those factors have given rise to a paradox in Canada: a seasonally-adjusted national unemployment rate averaging 11.9 per cent, and close to 19 per cent among youths aged 18 to 24, yet at the same time—and that is the paradox—there is such a severe shortage of qualified workers in specialized sectors that in many cases we have to rely on immigrants to fill those jobs.

Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Task Force on Employment Opportunities for the '80s referred to that problem in its report entitled "Work for tomorrow". It even pointed out, and I quote:

> The existence of imbalances in many sectors of the Canadian labour market and the probability that such imbalances will grow worse in the '80s unless corrective measures are taken to set the situation right.

Well, just what are those measures? To anyone reflecting upon the situation, it becomes clear that a radical change is required in the training given to Canadians. This change is needed as much in traditional education and training sectors, colleges and universities as in manpower retraining. That is the challenge we Canadians must meet if we are to remain in the forefront and protect our international markets as well as our standard of living.

To achieve that, we must be creative and imaginative. The transition from a consumer society to a data-processing society forces us to devise new methods and to set up new, more dynamic and flexible structures. An ability to adapt to change will always be paramount in our new programs. Above all, the various interest groups at all levels of Government, industry and traditional education systems have to realize the extent of the problem with a view to working together towards a common objective.

All those efforts must be channeled. We must have a master plan to provide the basis on which these new training programs will operate. The problem is national in scope. It is a problem that should, in our national interest, be one of our priorities. It would seem that the federal Government would be eminently suited to playing the role of conciliator. Where occupational training is concerned, there is, of course, both a jurisdictional and ideological conflict between the federal Government and the provinces.

Let me explain. The Canadian Constitution gives the provinces the right to legislate in the area of education and training. This is a historical development and goes back to the time when this country was founded and it was felt that each province should have the means to preserve its cultural, linguistic and religious identity. On the other hand, the economic development of Canada as a whole is a federal responsibility. The occupational training issue is tightly wedged between these two sets of priorities, hence the jurisdictional problem. However, we must understand that the present situation no longer compares with the one that existed when our country was founded. Canadian society has changed and is now facing new challenges. It must turn towards the future and prepare for the twenty-first century.

The problem of occupational training is a national one, as I said. Whether they are from Ontario or Quebec, from the East or the West, all Canadians are affected. Our economic future as a nation is at stake. Therefore, there must be a definite federal presence, otherwise the federal Government will be accused of neglecting to fulfil its role. The participation of provincial governments is absolutely essential and it can only be obtained if we make them understand the urgency of the situation.

However, the situation is not entirely new. There is already a certain body of federal legislation that concerns occupational training. In 1960, the Parliament of Canada passed the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act, which received royal assent on December 20, 1960. This legislation made it possible for the federal Government to become more actively involved in this area, and the provinces have benefited from the attendant economic spin-offs. For instance, before 1960, federal spending on vocational training totalled about $110 million. From 1960 to 1966, it increased to $850 million. Most of that money—70 per cent—was earmarked for capital expenditures, which explains the phenomenal growth of educational insitutions. In those days, during the 1960-70 decade, Mr. Speaker, the provinces had a secondary school and college construction program which was 75 per cent financed by the federal Government.

Then we established the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Canada Manpower Training Program, the Canada Manpower Industrial Training Program, the Critical Trade Skills Training Program, and a series of federal programs designed precisely to meet the challenge of training ill-prepared workers who needed special attention.

In January 1982, the federal Government announced a National Training Program and, on August 2, 1982, Parliament adopted the National Training Act. The Liberal Federal Government then made training a priority, as evidenced by the fact that $1.2 billion had been set aside for a manpower retraining fund. Those figures make it obvious that the Liberal Government's interest in that field was not new. But something new is the challenges we have to meet now. New challenges call for new solutions. When I say "new", I do not mean a $120.9 million cut-back in the National Training Program, as the Conservative Government has done in the estimates tabled recently. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this program is costing us . . . in my riding I took advantage of the National Training Program.

• (1710)

[English]

The skills growth fund which was part of the National Training Act has been cancelled by the Government. This program gave money to industry and to community colleges for new training facilities. I had occasion to work closely with the high-tech industry in this area. We submitted to the Government of the day, in 1983, a program which was approved for funding under the skills growth fund of the National Training Act. It provided $1 million to the Kanata High-Technology Training Association for the purchase of a computer and $1.5 million for courseware development. Of course this program was a success. I am sad to see today that such co-operation with the industry has been cancelled because of the cutbacks decreed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in the order of $100 million. Indeed this makes it impossible the the skills growth fund to continue. That program has been cancelled.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the time has come to create a kind of national manpower training institute as a federal entity bringing together the various training programs for improved coordination of them. Such an institute could become the perfect instrument enabling Canada to affect changes that are imposed upon us by the technological challenge. This federal institute could analyse the whole impact of the technological challenge on the Canadian economy, develop and implement better-adapted training programs, train managers and help us to meet the challenge of the century.

This national training institute could provide services to our young people who cannot find job opportunities as well as to scientists, and women who are affected by the training programs which, as clearly demonstrated today, are lacking in our communities. For instance, I became aware this week that there is in my own riding a community organization called "Comité coordonnateur en Alpha" which has decided to deal with the serious problem of illiteracy within the Ottawa-Vanier area, a problem which is becoming increasingly alarming because it is quite concealed, overlooked and wide-spread. As a matter of fact, the Ottawa-Vanier "Comité coordonnateur en Alpha" has submitted an application for a subsidy under the International Year of Youth program, and I hope the Minister of State in charge of this program will give a favourable response to this application from a group within my riding.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to conclude my remarks by saying that such a Canadian manpower training institute could generate interest within the provinces, provide the sense of purpose which we are all seeking in the area of education, and in the national interest, that there is a real need to encourage all individuals, organizations and levels of government concerned about this problem to work together and set up concrete and coordinated programs to help young Canadians train and prepare for the future.

Mr. Speaker, the training institute could work jointly with industry in providing on the job training, in helping industries midernize their production facilities, and in developing a robotics sector in Canada. God knows how much we need that! But mainly, a national training and manpower Institute could assume the leadership Canada needs to reorganize its manpower and economy. All participants at every level could benefit from its economic spin-offs, from its expertise. Finally, the Canadian economy, the labour market and the standard of living of Canadians would be better off.

Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that this motion will be supported by the House and that we can involve the Canadian Government, the provinces and the private sector, and implement for our Canadian workers a worthwhile program of manpower training and in-service training that is greatly needed.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to rise on a motion which, given the changes that are occurring which have been aptly described by the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), is one that ought to be given very careful consideration. I was interested in hearing the review of the industrial revolution which may be variously estimated as having taken decades to proceed or a century to proceed.

One of the dramatic changes which has occurred is that changes that took a century to occur previously now take a matter of decades. For example, it has been estimated that the amount of accumulated knowledge in the field of biology has doubled in a half decade. Therefore, we are dealing with a very dramatic change in the character of our environment, whether it be the national or international environment.

We talk a good deal about the technological revolution, the data revolution, the informational revolution. There is an inclination to see it, even though it is rapidly changing, in static terms. Certainly one of the clear results of what is occurring is a very dramatic change in the nature of the kind of workforce that this country is going to have to produce in order to compete internationally and to ensure economic survival.

I do not think anyone is unaware of the fact that in the past it was possible to produce abundant high-paying jobs which were based on the routine involvement in an assembly line that defined tasks in very narrow terms and allowed people with very little education successfully to fill a niche that permitted that individual and his family to have reasonable economic returns and comfort. Based on this accessibility to high-paying low-skilled jobs, we achieved a high level of standard of living in this country, as did many other western nations.

This dependence on the routine, narrowly prescribed jobs of the past is no longer possible for us. We are all aware now that many Third World nations on the basis of low wages are benefiting from a shift of production to those areas. We can no longer depend on that kind of engagement in industrial and economic enterprise to provide jobs for all our people. Nor can we depend upon the assembly line and that kind of occupation to guarantee our economic survival. Our strong suit in the future certainly must be based on the extent to which we have an educated, versatile, adaptable workforce.

One thing that concerns me about the prescription that has been described by the Hon. Member is the implications of the use of the term "training", as if in this day and age it were possible as it was in the past to provide individuals with little on-hand experience in a plant and thus make them adaptable to the new environment in which they live. If there is one lesson that certainly ought to have been gained by what has been occurring over the last few years, it is that every attempt to accord people an opportunity to fill new jobs by the static, old-fashioned approach to training without anything else being involved has ended with the realization that by the time they are trained, the jobs are gone.

We have to look for a new prescription. While I hate to use the current jargon, it is a prescription that must be based on the notion of a generic education that will provide individuals with the kinds of skills, whether they be writing, mathematical, communications or other skills, to permit him or her to acquire very rapidly the new knowledge that is required to succeed in a highly technological and informational society as previously described.

I have difficulty in seeing the solution being achieved within the narrow description of a national training institute. As a matter of fact, I have difficulty seeing a proper description being achieved through the establishment of any central body which would see the solution in terms of what is described as training, unless there is something implied in the use of this term which has not been elaborated in the presentation of the Hon. Member. Clearly, what we are talking about is the possibility that we may very well be faced with the impossibility of adapting large portions of our population to the new industrial age.

Unless we direct our attention to the entire educational system from the ground up, if we are to survive as an industrial nation, if we are to survive in the new economic climate, we will have to address the issue of providing an educated workforce that can be further educated on a continuing basis throughout their lifetime. I do not hear within the prescription that I just heard the answer to that problem. It is a complex one, there is no question about that. The motivation behind the motion is indeed a sound one, but there must be a little more care taken in elaborating the approach which must be taken to the solution of this problem.

True, it involves a number of jurisdictions and there must be co-ordination of the efforts of the federal Government, the provinces and the various sectors of the community within those two separate jurisdictions, but we must give a good deal more careful thought to this than was given in the presentation we have heard. I hope the Hon. Member will address this subject with a little more care, bring back a motion at some future time perhaps and after a little more widespread consultation on the problem that is to be addressed. Perhaps some process might be designed. We are living in a time of process. Perhaps a process might be arrived at which will permit this huge problem to be addressed. It is far too complicated to have been properly addressed in what we have heard. It is far more complex than what I regard to be a rather simplistic approach as suggested in the motion. Although well-motivated, it is destined to fail, as have all short-term approaches to training in the past.

Mr. Lawrence I. O'Neil (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, I strongly doubt that the Hon. Member would have moved this resolution if he had understood the intent of the consultation paper on training released in December. The new labour market strategy announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) at the First Ministers' conference in Regina further develops the consultation process in the linking of training and employment initiatives. We have consulted very widely, not only with the provinces, educators and labour representatives, as the Hon. Member suggests, but also with employer groups, voluntary associations, community groups, native associations, women's groups and many more.

The Government does not need to consider the advisability of consultation now. It has made the consultation process the foundation of its approach to policy development before it even took office. The Hon. Member proposes a new program. The Government has developed an entirely new strategy which will go well beyond any single program.

● (1730)

The Government realized from the outset that the challenging conditions facing all Canadians at the present time provided a new and fundamental opportunity for Canada. This is the time of invention and enterprise, the time for renewal and rebuilding. It is an era of new ideas, an era which calls for the full and equal participation of all Canadians in the economic life of our country. The restrictions of time and place no longer apply. Microtechnology is fully portable. The workplace of tomorrow may be a small town or a big city, the home or the office. Technology promises us new freedom and new avenues of participation.

The Government is fully aware of the problems facing the country. It has been obvious for some years that technological changes were accelerating and posing new problems. The previous Government did not seem particularly aware of these obvious developments and it moved slowly in doing anything about them.

When we initiated consultation, we put to the individuals and groups with whom we met a number of simple questions: Is there enough training going on in Canada? Is it the right kind? Are we training the right people in the right places for tomorrow's needs? The responses implied a long string of failures.

First, programs were so complex and ridden with bureaucratic barriers that business, labour and Canadians generally often just gave up on them. Training programs seemed to lead nowhere. Make-work job creation programs simply shifted people around like packages in a warehouse until they could requalify for unemployment insurance. Training and job creation, instead of being integrated into a package which could give an individual marketable experience and skills, generally operated separately from one another.

Programs tended to ignore regional diversity. Solutions were considered at the centre and imposed without regard to the plain fact that what was useful in one province could be pointless in another. Even programs which were specifically designed to overcome the failures and shortcomings of other programs did not seem to work. The separate initiatives for women ended less in affirmative action than they did in even further segregation from the employment mainstream.

The consultations provided some useful lessons which the Government has incorporated in the new employment strategy. We must have real development, not dependence. Programs and initiatives must prepare people for real, meaningful jobs.

Training and job creation must be viewed as an investment to help make the Canadian labour force fully competitive with others elsewhere in the world. Women and men must be encouraged to look at skills development not as a one time affair but as an ongoing experience, part of a life-long learning process. Labour market initiatives must be undertaken in co-operation with the provinces, the private sector and many other groups.

The First Ministers' conference in Regina showed that the Government is building a national consensus. There was full recognition of the importance of employment and skills development to Canada's economic renewal. There was also a concrete commitment to work together in the development and implementation of an entirely new labour market strategy.

The First Ministers agreed on the following points: Programs must respond to the varying needs of all regions. There must be flexibility and community participation. Responsibility must be shared between governments and the private sector. The role of small business is critical. Women, natives, youth and other groups must have equal access to training and employment. Programs must be simple and understandable. Training must bring an economic advantage. Training for training's sake is a thing of the past.

Two of the six thrusts of the new labour market strategy are particularly relevant to the Hon. Member's resolution. The first is the skill investment thrust to which the Government will be making an initial commitment of $80 million in 1985-86. The purpose of this thrust is to help people in occupations threatened by technological change to acquire skills and experience they will need for new jobs, new occupations and new careers.

A second thrust of the strategy is job entry to which the Government is committing an initial $125 million in 1985-86. This thrust is designed to help young people as well as adult women and others entering or re-entering the labour market. The training and employment development measures of this thrust will be carefully oriented to develop the skills and experience required in the future. This, of course, means that participants, notably including youth, will be exposed to training and experience in high technology activities.

In conclusion, the Government is way ahead of the Hon. Member's suggestions about the advisability of consultation. The Government's strategy has a specific thrust to help young people develop a productive, satisfying attachment to the labour force and to acquire the foundation in necessary skills and work experience.

In co-operation with the provinces and the private sector, the Government will be doing more than simply exposing young people to training in high technology. It will be seeking to ensure that the skills and experience acquired by Canadian youth will prepare them for the labour market which we have known for many years will be extensively altered by technological change.

[Translation]

Mr. Léo Duguay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to speak on this motion. I would like first to tell my colleague from Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) that I am in total agreement with his historical outline. Clearly, he has supplied us with great food for thought and he has very clearly identified the problem.

But I have real doubts, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. Member would have presented his motion had he understood the objectives of the consultation paper on training that was put forward in December last. I say this, because the consultation process we have already initiated is much wider in scope than the one he has just described.

The new labour market strategy announced by the Right Hon. Prime Minister and the Minister at the First Ministers'

Conference in Regina puts greater emphasis on the consultation process and the combination of initiatives, training and job creation.

Very stiff competition on the international level and technological innovation are now altering the economic situation faced by Canadian workers.

Over the next decades, developments of that sort will have their impact on the relative significance of various industrial sectors and will be affecting skill requirements in the Canadian work force. This is the background referred to by my colleague.

It is also true, Mr. Speaker, that technological change obviously cannot help Canada if our labour force does not have the training required to make use of it.

Furthermore, a well-trained and highly educated population would have the best opportunities to develop other innovations, which in turn will generate economic growth over the coming years.

[English]

It is absolutely correct that consultation is important. It must be clear to all of my colleagues in the House that the Government has undertaken the largest consultation of any Government in recent history. It must be clear that the Minister has gone to meet with officials in every province to discuss the entire matter of employment. It is also clear that there has been consultation with educators. The Minister of Labour (Mr. McKnight) held a meeting with the Canadian Teachers' Federation to discuss possibilities in terms of education. As well, it is on record that six or seven of the Ministers have had individual meetings with officials of the Department of Labour. This Government and its officers have nothing to learn from past Governments and their officers about consultation.

As well, I would like to agree that this resolution is one to which it is difficult for anyone to object. I think everyone would agree that it is necessary to consider the advisability of consulting with the provinces. However, I wish the framer of the resolution had placed it in a somewhat broader context. Training and the improvement of training programs is only one part of a massive undertaking of the Government. There are also broad economic considerations at which we must look regarding the matter of employment for young Canadians.

It is true that training for high technology is a crucial aspect of this resolution. It is true that that is important for all Canadians and especially for the young. However, in terms of broad economic considerations, it is not only a matter of training young people that is important but it is essential that there be jobs for those young people. There cannot be jobs when we do not attract capital investment. There cannot be jobs when we have a national energy policy that chases capital away. There cannot be jobs when we have a Foreign Investment Review Agency that chases potential business away. It is important to keep interest rates low. It is important to increase productivity. Those are lessons which we need not learn from the past. When my colleague spoke about the record of the Liberal Government, he should have mentioned those things. They are the reasons we have unemployment.

Having said that, I think the intent of the resolution is sound. Young Canadians must be ready for the future, and anything which we can do to help them is very important.

Our Government has done a lot more than just consider the advisability of consultation—it has acted. Anyone who has sat in the House during the last six months will know that the Government has announced the Challenge '85 program. That program will help young people in receiving appropriate training and in getting work during the summer in order that they can have the income to continue their university education. The Government has taken positive steps and initiated an ongoing consultation process with the provinces, educators, private sector employers and labour sector representatives. This Government has undertaken far more consultation in six months that did the previous Government in its entire mandate.

Co-operation from all sectors has resulted from the understanding that not only training but retraining must become a lifelong commitment for the labour force. It is true that the society of tomorrow will be very different from the industrial age in which most of us grew up. Inevitably, that makes the task of preparing for the information age important and critical. Nothing is more important than the way in which it will affect young Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Hon. Member who spoke earlier about communicating a certain sense of urgency to the Canadian public, that, after being until last September principal of a secondary school, I can assure him that this sense of urgency is already in the minds of the Canadian people. In my own school division in the West, a number of computer awareness programs have already been initiated. From the pre-school level to Grade XII in primary and secondary schools, there are already in Canada a number of programs to make students aware of the situation described by the Hon. Member.

[English]

It is clear that nothing is more important than the way in which this program will affect young Canadians. Young Canadians already understand the importance of the technological society. They live with it daily. I would not agree with my colleague that we need to remind them about the sense of urgency. Young Canadians need only get up in the morning and see the sophisticated gadgetry in their homes to understand that technology is already with them. Not only do they understand that technology is already here, but we only have to look at any school in Canada to recognize that it is the adults who are more often afraid of technology than the young.

The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) spoke about the Liberal record and its contribution to young people, education and money. On this side of the House, we categorically reject the notion that the answer to every problem in Canada is to spend more money. The consultation to which the Hon. Member referred is essential if we are to develop plans which will succeed, especially when we consider the limited resources we have.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it must be pointed out that Canadians already have this sense of urgency and that young Canadians especially are well aware of the situation.

About the record of the Liberal Government over the years I do not think we have anything to worry about on this side because we have already had much more consultation in six months than the Liberals had during their whole mandate.

[English]

As the Government we are firmly committed to meeting the challenges with which this situation confronts us. The consultations which have taken place over the last six months have proven that this commitment is shared by all Canadians and that the spirit of co-operation is real and tangible. I attended the First Ministers' conference in Regina. When I returned to my constituency, I was stopped by hundreds of Canadians who told me over and over again how nice it was to do business with a Government that truly cares about what Canadians have to say. It is not a Government which spends more money; it is a Government which asks Canadians what they think should be done and shares with them the responsibility.

The commitment which we have seen from Canadians over the past six months is outstanding and essential. Canadians are proving that if asked they will be glad to co-operate. The spirit of co-operation is real and tangible. All Members of Parliament see it on a regular basis. The Government is striving to provide Canadians with the real training and employment opportunities they will need in a strong and competitive economy.

The resolution talks about consultation and training. That is important, but we must talk about a strong competitive economy. There is only one thing which will help Canadians more than better training, that is, an economy which will provide jobs. The efforts which the Government has made are part of a collective national effort which involve the federal Government, provincial Governments and the private sector.

In December, 1984, a consultation paper was released on training. As a result, concerned groups and individuals from across Canada shared their views with the Government on the very critical matter of training and retraining. It is incredible that when people are asked to, they come forward and provide opinions. Now that Canadians are being asked, they are responding in record numbers. The consultations which have taken place have indicated that a completely revised approach is necessary in the area of federal support for training and employment creation. We must match skills to the demands of the future, not to the outdated needs of the past. Our resources must be used effectively to ensure that youth, and all Canadians, will benefit from the training which will meet the needs of the economy and the ever-changing technology.

The new labour market strategy, which was announced during the First Ministers' conference in Regina, will meet the new objectives and provide a more positive and structured approach to training and employment.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the initiatives of the Federal Government will be part of a collective effort, and because of this effort, the nature of the programs will meet the special needs of the regions and the labour force. We intend to be flexible. The balance between programs will be established according to regional needs. We are thus moving away from the centralized approach of the past. We shall join our efforts and share the responsibility to create an economic climate that can stimulate investment and long-term job creation for all Canadians.

[English]

Even though the programs are geared to all segments of the Canadian labour market, special efforts will be made to encourage women to forge ahead in new fields. The advent of the information age presents opportunities for women which they have never had before. It is the responsibility of the Government to ensure that training and employment opportunities are made available on an equitable basis so that Canadians will be adequately prepared to take advantage of the opportunities.

The Government has started on a categorical and straightforward plan to consult first, to plan, and then to put its actions into force. I think that is very different from what the previous Government has done, a Government which had the habit of spending first and thinking later. When the appropriate time comes, we on this side of the House will be very pleased to support this resolution.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the motion proposed by the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). The topic of youth unemployment and the ability of Governments to ensure that the young people of this country are properly directed toward meaningful jobs, and jobs which exist, is one to which all Hon. Members of this House should pay a lot of attention.

Over the last few years I had the experience of being a member of the provincial Legislature of the Province of Ontario. During that time I was part of a Liberal task force on youth unemployment which travelled throughout that province and subsequently reported to the Legislature on the needs of our young people. One of the most disheartening facts we had to face was that thousands of jobs in the high technology area were not being filled while close to 20 per cent of our young people were unemployed. I feel that we as Governments and as a society are misleading our young people if we do not properly inform them and direct them to opportunities in the proper areas. Upon interviewing young people primarily at high school age we found that the average student in grades 9 to 12 spends something in the order of 12 minutes with guidance counsellors. It is quite obvious that spending 12 minutes with a guidance counsellor when one has reached that very important formative age is clearly insufficient.

[Translation]

One of the problems faced by the young is that in high schools there are too few vocational guidance counsellors.

We know of course that in Ontario for instance, there is one counsellor for every 410 students although departmental standards call for one counsellor for every 350 students, and counsellors and teachers themselves claim there should be one counsellor for every 300 students.

Under such conditions it comes as no surprise, Mr. Speaker, that students lack the guidance needed to choose the skills they should develop in order to find jobs in the future.

Moreover, counsellors often have to provide emergency counselling whenever young people meet with personal difficulties and so forth. This means that our young are facing quite serious difficulties which this House should concern itself about to a larger extent than it has done in the past.

I would like to take this opportunity to commend the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) for his excellent initiative in calling the attention of the House to the motion.

Mr. Speaker, it should also be recognized that this very Government, since its election last Fall, when a lot of things were promised to a lot of peoples, as I said on a number of occasions, has let the young down after making all those promises. This is precisely the right occasion today to ask the young and the public at large to phone, to contact the Government Members and urge them to fulfil their election promises.

Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that there is a $120.9 million cut in the National Training Program, and this includes a $40 million reduction in the Industrial Training Program. As we know, that program did benefit the young.

[English]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, when we are speaking of where our youth are going in the future, we should remind ourselves of the ineptitude of the Government in providing meaningful summer employment. I am sure you will remember vividly, Mr. Speaker, the day the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) came into this House and, after much prodding by members of the Opposition, finally announced her youth employment program which she called "Challenge '85". In announcing this program she said that this would help out many young people.

Our office immediately thereafter received a little folder which explained to us how the program would function. My staff contacted the Minister's office and asked for several hundred forms so that we could distribute them to our riding. Of course, we wanted this program to function. We felt that this should be a non-partisan issue and we should do our best to make it work. It was in the interests of our constituents to do so. But the staff in the Minister's office told us they were awfully sorry but they could not give us forms for the Challenge '85 program, which I thought was rather unusual. I suggested to the young lady I was speaking to that perhaps I should go back down to the Chamber and have a little chat with the Minister and perhaps I will be able to receive some forms, and I did receive about 20 forms. I went on a few speaking engagements in my riding and distributed these forms. A few days later I received a phone call from a Conservative back-bencher who I will not name, Mr. Speaker, who asked my staff how we got our forms because he could not get any. We had used the forms we received in my riding and we could not give the Conservative Member any. We felt that he probably had enough connections with the Minister—or should have had—to get a bunch of forms for himself but apparently he did not. After we had distributed the forms throughout our riding we were told that those were the wrong forms. It seems that the Minister had changed forms after she had started the distribution of them.

Last week I had a little chat with the Minister in this House and she finally sent new forms to my office. The stack of forms was six inches thick. There were enough for everyone at that point, but it is important to realize that there are only a few days left in which people can apply for the program. So I believe we are seeing here a sample of just how high the priority of the Government is for youth employment.

I am happy to support this motion. I would like to congratulate again the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier for his motion, which I feel should receive support from all Hon. Members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The question is as follows: Mr. Gauthier, seconded by Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques), moves:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of consulting the provinces, educators and labour representatives, for the purpose of implementing a modern high technology training and development program which would offer to many Canadians, and especially to youth, the possibility to find satisfactory employment.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING—AWARDING OF CONTRACTS. (B) RCMP—REQUEST THAT SOLICITOR GENERAL SEEK IMMEDIATE INQUIRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak this afternoon on an issue which I have raised many times in this House in the past concerning government advertising contracts. On January 8, 1985, Mr. Speaker, I wrote a letter to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police asking that an immediate criminal investigation be launched into the circumstances surrounding the Government awarding of advertising contracts to firms allegedly involved with the Conservative Party.

● (1800)

According to newspaper reports at the time, the firms in question were to be awarded or had been awarded contracts conditional upon their agreeing to return a portion of their fees to the Progressive Conservative Party. I was referring to two newspaper articles, one of which appeared on January 5, 1985, in The Toronto Star. The second article appeared on January 7 in The Globe and Mail making similar allegations. These of course are very serious allegations and there is really only one way we can clear the air. That is, Mr. Speaker, to have a criminal investigation to determine whether there is infringement of Secton 108 or Section 110 of the Criminal Code of Canada. According to legal advice which I and my colleagues have received, Section 108, dealing with bribery, and Section 110, dealing with fraud, could be offended if those allegations were proven true.

Again, this is a very serious matter, one in respect of which various people across this country want immediate clarification. As of this day I have yet to receive from the RCMP confirmation as to whether or not there will be a criminal investigation into this issue.

On January 9, 1985, The Toronto Star wrote in an editorial entitled "What's Behind the Ad Deal", the following:

> An immediate investigation is needed into all circumstances of a patronage deal that gives two prominent Progressive Conservatives the exclusive right to handle tens of millions of dollars' worth of federal Government advertising. Only a thorough, independent inquiry can determine the truth of serious charges that the arrangement with Roger Nantel of Montreal and Peter Simpson of Toronto—both solid supporters of Prime Minister Brian Mulroney—is perilously close to resembling a kickback scheme.
> Despite a good deal of back-pedaling by all concerned after the publication Saturday of an exclusive story about the contract by the Star's Diane Francis, this troublesome allegation has been left hanging. If it turns out to be true, this is a serious matter. When he was first asked about the deal with Ottawa, Nantel said his share of the profits from the handling of advertising for 39 federal departments "won't go to individuals, but will go to special events for the sake of the party like seminars with Quebec ministers so they can interface with the grass-roots." But later he insisted he doesn't remember saying any such thing and called that quotation "an honest mistake."

Perhaps Mr. Speaker, all of this is an honest mistake. I am sure that all of us would wish that to be the case. But, after more than two months of waiting for the RCMP to launch this criminal investigation, I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. MacKay) in this House to immediately ask for a criminal investigation into this matter. Exactly two months after I wrote the letter, and two months less four days after the editorial in The Toronto Star, the Solicitor General replied to me in the House on March 5, 1985, as recorded at page 2744 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member seems to suffer from the same misunderstanding that many on that side do, that the Solicitor General directs the RCMP to conduct investigations, or interferes with their operations.

● (1805)

I am not claiming that the Solicitor General should interfere with the operation of the RCMP but, as I understand it and have been advised by some of my colleagues, the Solicitor General of Canada can definitely, if he wishes, request from the RCMP that an immediate criminal investigation be launched into any matter. In this matter, when it could affect the credibility of some of his colleagues in the House, I suggest that an immediate criminal investigation was not only desirable but indeed necessary for the protection of all.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on March 5, 1985, the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria) informed the House that he had written to the Commissioner of the RCMP two months ago requesting that a criminal investigation be carried out in respect to the awarding of certain Government advertising contracts. He also indicated that his colleague, the Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) made similar representations to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie). In view of the fact that two months had elapsed since these actions were taken, the Hon. Member asked the Solicitor General to inform the House whether the requested investigation would be carried out.

As has been mentioned, the Solicitor General responded that as far as he was aware, the Commissioner had not made a determination that there was a need for such an investigation.

This reply prompted a further question from the Hon. Member as to whether the Solicitor General intended to ask the RCMP to immediately initiate a criminal investigation into those matters. The Solicitor General replied that the role of the Solicitor General of Canada does not extend to directing the RCMP to carry out investigations or otherwise interfering with the forces' operations.

The Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell in asking whether the Solicitor General intended to ask the RCMP to initiative a criminal investigation into certain matters, suggests that there is vested in the executive and political arms of Government the authority to require police forces in general, and the RCMP, in particular, to take direction as to how to deal with individual cases. I can assure the Hon. Member that this is just not so.

While the Solicitor General is accountable to the Parliament of Canada for the over-all direction and control of the RCMP, his authority does not extend to directing that force to carry out investigations in specific cases.

It has long been recognized both in our statutes and in common-law, that the decisions as to whether investigations will be carried out in particular cases rests with the police. This is one of the most important principles upon which our criminal justice system is based. This is the principle which ensures that the rule of law takes precedence over political considerations. It is this principle which protects citizens in Canada and other western democracies from political tyranny.

The Solicitor General accepts the view of the McDonald Commission that:

—the government must fulfil its democratic mandate by ensuring that in the final analysis it is the government that is in control of the police, and accountable for it.

But the Commission continued by noting that:

—there is no inconsistency in asserting simultaneously that every member of the government, and above all the Minister responsible for the RCMP, has an essential obligation not normally to become involved in the decisions to be made by members of the Force, including the Commissioner himself, with respect to investigation, arrest and prosecution in individual cases.

The Hon. Member is asking the Solicitor General to subvert his principle of intruding upon the independent responsibilities of the RCMP. I have every confidence that the RCMP is considering the Hon. Member's representation and will take action as it deems appropriate in the circumstances. The Solicitor General can assure the Hon. Member that the RCMP will inform him of its determination and he is free to inquire of the Commissioner when he might receive a reply.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—PREMIER'S TRIAL—INTERNAL INVESTIGATION. (B) ALLEGATIONS ATTRIBUTED TO PREMIER

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that my colleague, the Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria), has risen once again to demand that an investigation be conducted. I have risen because in the situation that I want to talk about the Government has agreed to have an investigation into the way in which the Hatfield investigation and prosecution were conducted, and the decision about appeal. The Government has agreed to conduct an inquiry. But I have to rise because of the unsatisfactory way in which answers are being given about that inquiry and the lack of determination in that inquiry. I believe the inquiry must have been started some time in the fall after October 26, but I do not know for sure. It was certainly on during the month of January. But this is March and this is an inquiry that is very badly needed because of allegations that have been made in a number of places that reflect badly on the RCMP.

• (1810)

First there was the Solicitor General (Mr. MacKay) holding a meeting with a person under investigation. I think that reflects badly on the RCMP because of what might have happened at that meeting. The Solicitor General has not given a good account of the way in which he governed himself following that meeting. He has given us the assurance, which the Commissioner confirms, that he did not directly intrude into the investigation, but nothing has been said about what might have been done behind the scenes to influence the way in which the prosecution was conducted. That is an area which should be investigated, but which may not be part of the investigation that is supposed to be under way right now.

Also requiring investigation are Mr. Hatfield's allegations that somebody in the RCMP was out to get him and to bring down his government. These allegations were agreed with by a senior Cabinet Minister, the acting Minister of Justice in the New Brunswick government.

While an investigation was under way on that very subject, what did we note about the Ministers opposite? Were they sitting back, forebearing from commenting, waiting for the RCMP to do its work? Not at all, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie) sought an occasion to announce that he disagreed with Mr. Hatfield, that Mr. Hatfield's allegations were wrong so far as he was concerned. That, of course, sends a kind of a signal about whether the investigation will be full and detailed. In my question I asked for an assurance from the Solicitor General that the allegations about whether the RCMP were out to get Mr. Hatfield and to bring his government down would also be the subject of the investigation.

What do we have in the answer from the Minister on March 5, found at page 2743 of Hansard? It reads:

Mr. Speaker, we shall have to wait until the report is received before we get into any such details, if in fact they are made public.

The Minister is the one who is going to make them public, or not. What I am calling for is a statement by the Minister right now that that report will be made public, substantially all of it. Maybe there are things in it that cannot be made public in that they identify individuals and deal with the force and with discipline, but certainly the Minister has to reassure the confidence of this House and the country in the RCMP by indicating now that that inquiry will be made public.

I would like to obtain from him an assurance that the inquiry has been extended not only to cover the way in which Mr. Hatfield was investigated and the way in which the Mounties behaved during the trial, but this very much larger and more serious allegation that members of the RCMP are a political force out to get a duly elected Premier and out to destroy a duly established government in this country.

I am not satisfied with the answers given. Editorialists across the country are not satisfied with them. There is a general demand from over a dozen of the leading daily newspapers that there be a public inquiry. Over half of them are asking for a public inquiry, and because of the attitude expressed in the answers they are asking that the Solicitor General resign.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on March 5, 1985, the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) questioned the Solicitor General (Mr. MacKay) concerning the internal inquiry by the RCMP into the RCMP handling of the Hatfield investigation. Specifically he asked the following questions: First, is that report ready? Second, if it is not ready, in what stage of readiness is it? Third, when does the Solicitor General expect to receive it? Fourth, will the report also cover allegations made by Premier Hatfield subsequent to the commissioning of the report by Commissioner Simmonds, that members of the RCMP were out to get him and to bring down his government.

In response to the first three questions asked of the Solicitor General, he replied at that time as follows:

• (1815)

Mr. Speaker, the report is not yet ready. It is substantially complete and, when it is ready, I will be informing him and other Members of that situation.

As of March 7, 1985, the RCMP advised that the report was not yet ready, although it was substantially complete and would be presented to the Solicitor General immediately upon its completion. Therefore, in response to the first three questions the Minister can only repeat what he said on March 5.

Concerning the Hon. Member's question about the content of the report, it is the Minister's understanding that the focus of the report will be the RCMP's handling of the Hatfield investigation and the specific allegation that members of the RCMP may have leaked information of the investigation to the press. However, the Solicitor General has no knowledge of the content of the report and does not wish to speculate about its details.

It must be remembered that it was the Commissioner of the RCMP who ordered this internal investigation to be conducted. While the Solicitor General supported him in that decision, he has in no way attempted to direct or influence that investigation. As the Hon. Member for York Centre well knows, the RCMP has a world-wide reputation for thoroughness in its investigations. The Solicitor General is confident that this high standard of professionalism will apply to this endeavour as well.

Concerning the Hon. Member's reference to the reported allegations of Premier Hatfield, the Solicitor General wishes to repeat that if the Hon. Member, or any of his colleagues, presents him with particulars of inappropriate or unlawful behaviour on the part of the RCMP, the Solicitor General will ensure that immediate and appropriate action is taken. In the absence of such particulars, it would be a serious affront to the long and proud history of the RCMP and the professionalism of its members serving in New Brunswick and throughout the rest of Canada for the Solicitor General to give credence to unsupported generalities.

Adjournment Debate

UNITED NATIONS EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION—CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP AND FUNDING

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I requested opportunity during the adjournment debate on UNESCO because the fate of the organization and Canada's participation in it should be a priority concern to all Canadians who value the United Nations. In recent times we have been made aware of major problems afflicting UNESCO. We have been made aware of the reactions by major member nations, particularly the United States and the United Kingdom. Therefore I directed a question to the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) concerning the policy of the Canadian Government toward our continued membership in UNESCO and our continued funding of it. I appreciate the contribution of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in response to my question. Also I appreciate his indication to the House that he is carrying on a watching brief because it is eminently necessary. We will benefit as a House and as a nation by more public debate of the issue, including this brief discussion.

I sense the Minister and the Government are reluctant to reach the extreme conclusion that Canada should withdraw from membership in UNESCO. In view of the impressive record of UNESCO, especially in its early years, at combating illiteracy and raising the level of cultural life in so many underdeveloped parts of the world, I share that reluctance. However, in view of the United Nations as a whole facing an uncertain future and that future being made more uncertain by threats to the ongoing viability of UNESCO, it is imperative that we treat this as a high priority concern.

We have not only the declaration of the United States which led to its withdrawal from membership, but a few months ago we had the declaration by Sir Geoffrey Howe on behalf of the United Kingdom. In reviewing the policy of the U.K. toward the United Nations, Sir Geoffrey Howe said that one organization where they had not been satisfied that value for money was being obtained was UNESCO. Also he indicated that they were not satisfied the developing world was getting value from that organization.

There seems to be two reasons for the general dissatisfaction with UNESCO as it is now administered. One is administrative and budget extravagance. This has given priority to concerns other than the need to raise the level of life in the Third World and in the Fourth World. For example, we have learned of the very high salary and standard of living to which the Director General of UNESCO has become accustomed, as well as the very sizeable senior administrative staff. We learned that there are more administrative and support staff at the UNESCO headquarters in Paris than there are UNESCO field workers throughout the world.

As well as UNESCO becoming like an inverted pyramid with most of the strength and most of the budget being devoted to administration of the headquarters, we have to be impressed by the reliable reports of the indefensible, ideological bias which has come to dominate UNESCO programs. Under the present leadership of Amadu Mahtar M'Bow, the program of UNESCO has gone behond beyond the paramaters originally intended. It has become a political more than a cultural instrument of the United Nations. It has become the advocate of policies and objectives not shared by the member nations that have supported it.

In the face of not only continued protests, but in the face of United States withdrawal, representing the loss of 27 per cent of UNESCO's budget, some gestures toward reform of UNESCO have been made. For example, a no-growth budget has been adopted. Economies of about $20 million have been effected to close the gap left by the loss of United States funding. However, as the Minister's answer indicated, the Government of Canada is not satisfied and should not be satisfied with these efforts. We therefore have to think about what Canada should do at the annual meeting of UNESCO at Sofia, Bulgaria, next fall. What attitude can Canada show that will do justice to the significance, seriousness and enormity of the situation?

I am one Member of Parliament who thinks that Canada's withdrawal from UNESCO should be the very last option taken. There is still a mountain of ignorance for humanity to climb, and we need to lend a helping hand to our fellow humans as together we try to climb that mountain. UNESCO offers us at least the opportunity of offering that hand. I also believe that passive acquiescence with what has been tolerated too long is not an acceptable option. We should not be satisfied with any gesture of wrist-slapping by Canada that will make no significant difference to the attitudes and policies of those in charge of UNESCO. It should be obvious that nothing short of changing the leadership of UNESCO will be adequate.

Last summer the Canadian people showed that they wanted this country to have a change of direction. They recognized the need for a change of leadership and hence this Parliament has come into being. We need to have the same realism in assessing the future of UNESCO. There is very little serious chance that UNESCO will make major reforms in its administration or in its ideological bias until there is a significant change in the leadership.

I therefore hope that in addition to the watching brief that the Minister and the Department are carrying on now, they will give serious consideration to Canada taking the initiative, with other supporting member nations, toward requiring that there be a change of leadership at the top of UNESCO. Only when we have that kind of change can we expect that UNESCO will show the kind of change that will prevent other member nations from withdrawing.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Landry (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to reply to the question and to the concern expressed by my colleague for Scarborough West (Mr. Stackhouse).

The Canadian Government is still reviewing its participation in UNESCO, as indicated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) in his letter dated October 1, 1984, to the General Director of UNESCO, Mr. Amadou M'Bow. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has also told Mr. M'Bow that our final decision will depend upon the results of the reform UNESCO is now undergoing. In the context of our review, we are establishing criteria to measure the extent of the reform and the improvements made to UNESCO operations. Our evaluation of Canadian participation will also take into account the objectives, interests and activities of Canada within UNESCO, including the interests of the provinces.

[English]

The recently concluded special session of the executive board had mixed results. The need to reduce the budget by 25 per cent because of the withdrawal of the United States' contribution was not adequately discussed. On the other hand, there were limited successes registered at the meeting: agreement to include the U.S. as an observer; determination that the director general and the U.S. Government should negotiate the assumed financial obligation of the U.S. for 1985; consensus on concentration of activities in UNESCO; and finally, agreement that member states should not have their assessments increased as a result of the United States' withdrawal.

[Translation]

The Secretary of State for External Affairs recently expressed to the Executive Committee of the Canadian National Commission for UNESCO his disappointment at the pace and the progress of the reform now underway. He especially emphasized the need to strengthen UNESCO as a member of the UN family in the interests of the international system as a whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

FISHERIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fraser that Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to make a few comments on the speech of the Hon. Member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Parry) last evening.

Mr. Speaker: Questions, comments and answers.

Mr. Manly: I was very interested to hear the Hon. Member point out that at an earlier phase in his career he had served as a deck-hand on the United Church mission vessel, Thomas Crosby V. Although the Hon. Member has sat behind me for the past several months, I did not realize that we had that previous connection. I also have some fairly extensive connections with the Thomas Crosby V which serves the West Coast of Canada. It moves up and down along the north Pacific coast of British Columbia and visits a great many fishing communities which are very important and can be affected by the impact of this Bill. From the time I was associated with the Thomas Crosby V until now, a number of these communities have suffered a great deal because of different changes which have taken place in the fishing industry. I recall the opposition in many of these communities to the Davis licensing plan which forced many Indian fishermen out of the industry. It was an attempt, as the Government at that time said, to rationalize the industry. Many people were rationalized and pushed right out of it. Communities like Klemtu which used to have a cannery no longer has one. We find more and more that the industry has been concentrated at Prince Rupert and in the lower mainland. In the last few years, the Port Edward area has suffered a great deal as more and more of the industry has been concentrated in the lower mainland.

This is a very important consideration in terms of this Bill. We would like some assurances from the Minister that the provisions of the Bill, which give almost absolute and total authority to the Minister and his Department, will not be used in a way that will work against communities up and down the coast. The New Democratic Party is basically asking the Government to take a second look at the legislation. We are supposed to have a Chamber of sober second thought. We in the NDP do not really believe that we need that Chamber. We believe the Government can take a sober second look at legislation within the House of Commons. We do not need the Red Chamber to do it. This is why our Leader yesterday moved a motion to abolish the Senate. It is unfortunate that the Conservative Government backed down from its claims of last week that it was prepared to move on the issue. We are asking the Government to take a sober second look at the legislation.

We recognize that, as a result of the Collier decision last summer, there are certain things which the Government has to do to bring its fisheries legislation into line with what needs to be done. The Department of Fisheries needs to have the power to regulate the industry, but we say that if it is to have that power, it should be in a way that safeguards the industry. We do not want it to be an absolute power. It should be a power which the Department will be able to use to manage the industry consistent with conservation and social and economic goals that can be determined by the participants in the industry.

When the Minister spoke on this issue last February, he outlined a series of concerns. At the very top of the list was industry participation in management. He made some very tentative moves in that direction, but we have not seen the kind of assurances that this legislation is going to deal with that in a straightforward manner.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are motioning for me to stop. I commend the Hon. Member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Parry) on his speech. I urge that the Minister take a second look at this legislation and give his assurance that our concerns will be met.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to debate Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act. This Bill has had a fair bit of debate in the last few days, I think with reason. The Fisheries Act has been criticized by some in my Party for not recognizing the need for full consultation by the participants in the industry. Our speakers have pointed out that the new amendments to the Act will rest a great amount of power with the Minister. In fact, he will have absolute power.

There is some doubt as to whether the powers that are being granted to the Minister are good for the industry. It is not clear how those powers will be implemented by the Minister.

There has been no past practice to provide for the very sudden changes in policy that will be permitted under the proposals in this Bill.

There are some questions as to the relationship between our fisheries and that of the United States, the particular agreements that we work out between our two countries and the means whereby we administer those agreements. We are not certain that those are fair. All of the industry people still are not certain that a consensus has been reached.

The process of Parliament and the activities of the fishery people would be best served if this Bill were given a hoist and if further study went into it. As a consequence, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Epp):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

The Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) may continue his speech.

Mr. Althouse: I think, Mr. Speaker, I have made my point that the Bill should be hoisted, and I rest my case.

• (1115)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) speaking on questions and comments or on debate?

Mr. Skelly: On questions and comments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) made a very wise decision to recommend to the House the hoisting of this legislation for six months. It is apparent that the Government is asking for some extremely wide powers, almost absolute powers, to allocate fish. For many, many years, we in the House of Commons have listened to Conservative opposition Members condemn the abuse of what was virtually absolute power by the previous Liberal Government, only to see them turn around and repeat the sins for which they cursed the other Party.

There is no doubt that we cannot allow a Bill establishing this kind of absolute power to proceed through the House of Commons without having the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) give the House in written form the guidelines by which this allocation will take place. Will he in fact ensure that each of the traditional fisheries now present in the industry will have a place? Will these fishermen be entitled to their traditional shares? Will the Minister make a commitment that there will be an effective consultative process before those shares of the catch are changed? Will this be done by consensus or through some acceptable form of agreement? These are the kinds of questions the Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre has provided the House an opportunity to consider.

In addition, it was a very wise move on the part of the Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre and the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Epp) to allow the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) an opportunity to put on the record how the Government will honour the election promises it made and how it will develop a set of guidelines for a fair and equitable approach to allocation of the resource. It is surprising that the Government itself has not sought an opportunity to do this. After all, we have witnessed the mismanagement of the fisheries resource for years and years. Many people supported the Conservative Party because of the promises it made in the firm belief that Conservative Members would not repeat some of the sins of members of the previous Government who made decisions in a very arbitrary fashion, decisions which in some cases were very harmful. For many years, the loudest voice and the squeakiest wheel got the grease.

Just for the sake of argument, let us say that every fish is worth $10. We are taking a horrendous pile of $10-bills and allocating them. The Minister would then have the absolute right to allocate that money to the fisheries on the West Coast and even presumably to the fisheries on the East Coast. The Minister would then have the absolute power to determine who receives money, who has the right to earn a living and who has the right to acquire income. I believe the Government has an obligation to give to the House of Commons and the people of Canada an indication of how this will take place.

The Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre and the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon made a very responsible and serious move by placing this motion before the House because the track record of the present Government in two extremely important areas, the areas of keeping election promises and of treating people fairly, has not been good. This motion will give the Government an opportunity to justify its activities.

Just to make a few quick points in support of this hoist motion, we know that the Government promised a co-management mechanism. We know that it promised that there would be a $200-million salmon enhancement program. We know that it promised a buy-back program worth $100 million. Those promises have fallen by the wayside, or at least we know nothing of them because the Minister refuses to appear before the committee to lay any guidelines before us. He just allows this Bill to roll merrily along through the House. It is known far and wide that the Conservative Government has an overwhelming number of Members. Those Members can stomp into the earth any initiative which is taken by the Opposition to obtain some equity and fairness for the people of Canada. They can do that and they have demonstrated it.

There are three examples of broken promises in this one industry. I would like to speak about the question of fairness.

On the West Coast of Canada fishermen must pay moorage fees. Those fees are becoming excessive. The Government recently doubled those fees. However, on the East Coast of Canada there are very few fishermen who pay moorage fees.

We are debating whether the motion to hoist is appropriate. In the presentation of the Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre it was made very clear that the motion was appropriate. It will allow the Minister a chance to explain what guidelines and co-management mechanisms will be created. We have allowed the Minister and members of the Government an opportunity to explain why the lapses in fairness exist, such as the horrendous discriminatory situation of the moorage rates. It is absolutely untenable that an inequity which was placed in position by the previous Government would be continued by a Government whose sacred trust was fairness and openness. That does not exist.

On broken promises and fairness I believe the Government has failed very seriously. Government Members sit in shock wondering at the reason why a simple Bill such as this one would not be passed like fishery Bills have normally been passed. Normally there is a speaker from each Party, the Minister is open and forthright and we understand what the import of the Bill is, therefore, it goes to committee. Not this time. To bring to the attention of the House the recent salmon—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member, but I would like to check to see if there are other Members who wish to speak during this period, as only ten minutes are allowed.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) has moved that this Bill be hoisted for six months. He knows absolutely nothing about West Coast fisheries, Atlantic fisheries or northern fisheries, but I understand he has several sloughs in his riding. He was brought in—

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) on a point of order.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, that is an assumption which cannot be sustained. I think it was an attempt to insult the Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre and the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon. I think the Minister should probably withdraw his reference to the slough.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that is a question of debate and not a point of order.

Mr. Fraser: That remark was certainly not intended to cast a slur on the Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre, it was intended to cast a slough. Of course, that is what I mentioned.

The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) has risen again in indignation—because that is what is mostly contained in that gentleman's thinking capacity—and has asked the House to delay passage of the Bill for six months. The Hon. Member ought to know—although it will not surprise me if he does not—that the powers which are being asked for are powers which have always been deemed to have been in the Act but were found not to have been there as a consequence of the Collier decisions. The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River is playing games on a subject about which he knows extremely little.

He spoke about the fact that the Government has not been prepared to come to the House and lay down guidelines which will govern for all time the exercise of powers under the Act. The Hon. Member must be the most ingenuous of newcomers in his approach to the difficulties and problems of ordinary Government if he thinks that under any circumstance he or anybody else could submit a set of guidelines which, in all cases, would look after the concerns which he has mentioned. The proposal to hoist the Bill for six months is irresponsible and is done deliberately. I would hope that the motion has been put with the full knowledge of how silly it is. I am prepared to concede to my hon. friends in the NDP that it may well have been done out of plain silliness and lack of understanding. It reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of the silly member of the New Democratic Party in the Legislature of British Columbia who on Friday went to the press and said that we were cutting the salmonid enhancement program by $10 million. When it was pointed out to him what was in the Estimates, he, of course, had nothing to say. The disease of misconception, irrelevance, ignorance and foolishness, whether it flows from the NDP in this Chamber to the Legislature of British Columbia or whether it has spread from the NDP in the Legislature of British Columbia to the NDP in this Chamber, seems to be a communicable disease among our hon. friends.

• (1125)

Mr. Skelly: May I put a question or make a comment, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the time for questions and comments has expired. We will resume debate.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): In speaking in debate, Mr. Speaker, I can say that I am actually extremely pleased that the Minister rose to his feet and commented on the fishing industry in this country. Before we proceed any further I can tell the Minister—and I don't know whether his officials have taken the time to inform him of this—that a prominent group of users on the coast of British Columbia, when asked in committee last night what they would recommend the House should do with this Bill; would they prefer that the House pass this Bill without guidelines or should it remain in the House until the Minister rose in his place and explained what was happening, no matter how long it took, these people replied, yes, they would like to see it stay in the House until they know whether they are going to have a guaranteed place in the industry. It is regrettable that a Minister of the Crown can stand in this House and make such a blatant, I think, misrepresentation of what is actually happening and what the wishes of the user groups are, every one of whom has been contacted and everyone of whom has said unilaterally across the board, "Don't let that Bill go through until the Government gives us an idea of who is going to be pushed out of this industry and who is going to remain in it".

The Minister knows full well that he has made private deals—or suggested information which would have led people to believe they had private deals—on the allocation of fish. We are not going to tolerate that. No responsible legislator would tolerate that kind of thing.

Mr. Fraser: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is really a point of privilege. The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River has every right to debate. He has no right to accuse me of making private deals which have not been made.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Skelly: On the same point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that there have been groups who have come before the Minister and have left thinking there was a deal. It may not have been a deal in the Minister's mind, but certainly the kind of information which has been imparted to certain groups has left them with the impression that they do have a deal, something to fall back on.

Mr. Fraser: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River is compounding his sin. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not have to stand here and take accusations which literally call me a liar. That is what the Hon. Member is doing. I suggest that he withdraw his accusation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair rules that this is not a point of order. I would ask the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) to continue on debate.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the point is that the Government must provide guidelines. The user groups are telling the Minister and the Government very clearly that they recognize the seriousness of this problem and that chaos could develop in the industry, but the chaos is not of their making. The chaos is of this Government's making because it has failed to adopt a base line of operations, some simple guidelines which would assure everyone a position in the industry, a guarantee that they could maintain the type of proportional shares which have been available in the past until a mechanism can be developed which would allocate that resource fairly and equitably.

That is the issue in the House. There is no attempt in reality to insult the Minister and no attempt to cast a slur on the Government. There is no point in standing up in this House and kicking opposition Members. What we want to see is co-operation. We want to see the Minister laying down guidelines from which user groups can benefit. We want the Minister to come before the committee to tell us what is going on, even if he is not prepared to tell other people in the public domain. That would lead to better communication in this House.

It is the user groups, Mr. Speaker, the people we represent, who are saying, "Hold this Bill". It is not an irresponsible move, it is something that any responsible legislator, especially in opposition, would do. When we asked some questions about the salmon treaty, when would we see it and get it before committee, the Government said it had already agreed to it. It was outrageous that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) should have stood up in this House and criticized the NDP for asking questions about this treaty and then, down the road, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans admitted that there are serious problems with the treaty but that the Prime Minister wants it very badly. We then found out that the Prime Minister never even read the document. It went through Cabinet in 30 minutes so the Prime Minister would have something to give away to his new found friend in the United States. That is totally outrageous and unacceptable. I see the Minister is dancing around in his chair. I would love to have him jump to his feet and comment on that particular act of faith.

This motion to hoist the Bill provides the House with an opportunity to look more calmly at the question. There are other points of view which both government Members and the Opposition can put on the record. This motion is an excellent idea, it gives us some time. There is no point in taking the Bill before a committee until we have some idea of what the Minister's game plan for the fishery will be. We all know the Minister to be an honourable gentleman of good intentions, but he has been somewhat constrained and confined by his colleagues who have a philosophical fixation which is alien to this country. They want to cut money from a basic resource of the coastal provinces of this nation. They want to cut personnel from the departments involved. In reality, the Prime Minister simply wants to trade off with the President of the United States something which he sees as being of little value in return for something he sees as being of major value. But we as Canadians still do not know what that is.

Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, that second reading of this Bill means approval in principle, and we will then not have a chance to change its elements substantially. Given the Government's overwhelming majority, it is very hard for the Opposition in committee to resist arbitrary changes. We know the Bill is out of the public eye when it is in committee. Time allocation is much easier to impose in committee. If we pull our finger out of the dyke, we might as well approve the Bill all the way through.

The Minister has said he will take all the responsibility for what happens on the salmon treaty. Well, we know there are some problems with the treaty. Could he come before the committee to explain his intentions to us? We know that during the election there were some candidates from his Party who roamed the coast of British Columbia promising a salmonid enhancement program. Could he come before the committee to tell us what his intentions are? He criticized a provincial colleague of mine from British Columbia for possibly having a different interpretation of that program and the time frame in which it would operate. If he came before the committee, he could clear those problems up, but it seems he would rather sit here in his ivory tower.

What about the buy-back program? Allocation will be on the basis of the fishing vessel. Who will have fishing vessels and who will not? Is there a buy-back program costing $100 million or is there not? We have a serious dilemma because we do not know what is doing on in the fishing industry. We do not know what the new directions are. We know there are broken promises, we know this Government is adopting, maintaining and embellishing the sins of the previous Liberal Government in some fishing areas. We know there is some blatant unfairness. What is the Minister going to do to clean up those particular problems?

I raise again the question of moorage fees. There is no way in the world to justify the fact that fishermen on the West coast must have their moorage fees jacked up by 100 per cent when at the same time fishermen in the Province of Prince Edward Island and the Province of Newfoundland pay no fees. It was pointed out in committee by department officials that there are 40,000 fishing vessels in Canada. Some 32,000 of those are registered from Quebec east into Atlantic Canada. About 90 per cent of these vessels do not pay moorage fees, the bulk of which are under 45 feet in length. I see the Hon. Member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) is in the House. Why is he not screaming from the rooftops for equity and fairness in this matter? We are not advocating that eastern Canadians have their income further diminished. Trying to eke out a living on the East Coast of Canada is just as hard as it is on the West Coast. But why are people in the Government not on their feet telling the Minister to go before the committee to explain why he is doing this or else to get rid of the inequity. Let the people in British Columbia have a fair chance at earning a living. No one is getting rich out there, it is a tough time.

One of the most outrageous things I have ever heard in my life, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that the Government is contemplating getting out of the business of supplying insurance for fishing vessels. The Government knows that private companies will not insure all those vessels. It knows that in some cases insurance rates have gone up 100 per cent. Yet the deadline is drawing closer, April 1 is approaching. There are a large number of fishing vessels which, if we believe the Minister's officials, are going to lose their insurance. Yet the Government is going to wait until March 20 before it makes a decision. Someone who needs to go fishing on March 22 will suddenly find his insurance is gone. One of the conditions of the lending institution is that the vessels be insured. When the insurance is gone, the loan is foreclosed, he loses his vessel and the ability to earn an income. To go and find an independent insurer, the fishermen will have to pull their boats out of the water, have a marine surveyor come along, assess the boat for insurance purposes and then they have to wait to see whether they will be accepted or rejected.

It is not irresponsible to ask that this Bill be hoisted for six months, Mr. Speaker. Certainly there are other options. User groups want it postponed until we get the guidelines. The House wants the Minister to appear before the committee to tell us what the over-all game plan is. Surely that is not too hard to do in respect of the Estimates and the annual report, just out of courtesy to the committee. Fishermen are facing very serious deadlines with regard to moorage and insurance which will affect their livelihoods. The Minister has an obligation to tell them what is happening.

I would suggest that my language was certainly harsh. But the Minister knows that that is not a personal thing. It comes from a feeling of frustration. I know, as we all do, of the overwhelming task with which he is faced. However, there are certain things which must be done. In executing the duties that fall to him as Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, he has responsibilities to Canada, the Government and fishermen which he must live up to.

That is the reason the Hon. Member for Humboldt-Lake Centre and the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon moved the motion in the House. The Minister could stop this debate immediately by appearing before the committee, laying guidelines before the House on allocation, and giving us some indication on the record of what the game plan is to be. Unless this is done, he leaves us very little option. A responsible Opposition cannot allow a Bill such as this to be passed.

We recognize that when the Government wins a majority of 211 seats such as it has, it overwhelms the Opposition completely. We know that there are options. The Government can drag out any decision by having the Opposition talk it out until it has essentially bled it white and by not putting forward any opposition to a Bill such as this. We know that there is closure. However, in the past the Government has criticized that mechanism severely. It would be useful if the appropriate route to resolving this impasse were taken. The Minister must appear before the committee, give us some guidelines on how that allocation process is going to take place, and give us an indication of how the people who have used the resource are going to have a place in it. Will they maintain, as a base, traditional shares? Or has he in fact, through the salmon treaty, placed himself in an awkward position?

The Minister knows full well that there is a native dimension to this issue. There are a great number of native people on the coast of British Columbia who share in the industry. I will use rough figures as an illustration rather than absolute figures. Many user groups are saying that native people should have a participation rate at their traditional level. We all recognize that it is complex, but we want to know that the Minister is working on it and that he has a game plan to bring people from a participation rate of around 5 per cent to a rate of 20 per cent. Further than that, native people at the 5 per cent participation level are in danger of losing their vessels. Will they be taken out of the native fishery? Will their participation rate be reduced? We do not know any of this. We must know what direction the Minister is taking.

There are communities on the coast of B.C. which depend on the resource. The previous federal Government was doing enormous harm to those communities that could have been prevented, or at least those communities could have been prepared for the shock of financial change. The Minister recognizes that communities on the coast of British Columbia are tremendously dependent upon the fisheries. When the Minister makes a decision on who will receive the fish and how those fish will be taken, he determines whether those communities will live or die. As he moves the fishing plant, the local bank does not receive business so it leaves town. Local businesses leave town and gradually there is an implosion which blows the community away.

I recognize that my time is nearly up, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to recap the last point, which has been made many times in the House. I hope that my colleagues from the Liberal Party will comment on this hoist motion and on the issue of promises and fairness as related to Atlantic Canada which I have not had an opportunity to develop in my presentation. I hope that they will rise and comment on this as well.

The Minister must appear before the committee on the Estimates and on the annual report to give us an idea of what is happening, what his intentions are, and what direction the new Government is taking. I am hoping that that will occur very soon. Let us have some indication of what is going on in there. Let him give us an indication, and perhaps on that basis this Bill can be moved to committee and we can get this legislation in place so that it can be applied to the fishing plan which is under development. We will see this summer whether it will hold up constitutionally.

Mr. Fraser: Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to my hon. friend from Comox-Powell River that I sensed in his remarks some softening of what he called the harshness of his earlier comments. I will accept that as an indication that perhaps we can have a dialogue. I will use this procedure to communicate with him through you, Mr. Speaker.

More than any Fisheries Minister in a number of years, I have met with all of the various groups on the West Coast. I see that my hon. friend is nodding because he knows that. I have been in his riding on several occasions and have accepted his invitiation to meet with groups which he co-operated with me in seeing. The Member knows that I have met with a great many groups on our West Coast. I am confining my comments to the West Coast except to say that I have been in every province in Atlantic Canada twice and in Quebec three times. I have been meeting equally there and will be returning there. Any suggestion that I have not been out and about where the fish and fishermen are is not valid.

Through the Minister's Advisory Committee in British Columbia, the Sports Fishing Advisory Board, the Vessel Owners Association, the Pacific Trollers Association, the UFAW, and a host of other organizations, I have spoken repeatedly in the last six months and given my views on the fishery in the Province of British Columbia. Put very simply, they are, first, the maintenance and re-establishment of the salmon runs. Second, the continuation in a viable form of what we would call the commercial fishery on the West Coast, keeping in mind the lifestyle there. Third, the recognition that there is a growing commercial sports fishing interest which must be recognized. Fourth, that never again after the treaty will any federal Minister of Fisheries be able to set down fisheries policy on the West Coast without consultation with the provincial Government.

There is now a realization that the fishery is of great economic value to the economy of British Columbia, especially in these dreadful times when we have 15 per cent unemployment. The Hon. Member knows also that I am committed to having the Minister's Advisory Committee evolve into an industrial board. He knows also that I have made a commitment that any recommendations that the Minister's Advisory Committee gives me, or the board if it is to be formed at the wishes of the Minister's Advisory Committee, will all be made public at the wish of the board or the Minister's Advisory Committee.

The Hon. Member knows all this, so the suggestion that I am somehow operating behind closed doors or behind some shield of secrecy is not accurate. It is not true, it is not my style, and it is not so.

My hon. friend has suggested that I could come before the committee. I have never refused to come before the committee for any reason at all. I will come before the committee on Estimates or any other matter that the Hon. Member wishes. He says that no one has talked about the fishing vessel insurance program. There was a delegation here from Atlantic Canada yesterday meeting with the officials of the Department. There was a delegation before the committee yesterday talking about this issue. An associate deputy minister will be on the West Coast on Tuesday discussing it. Contrary to what my hon. friend was suggesting—and I do not blame him for suggesting it—we are very much aware of the difficulty with the vessel insurance program if the federal Government should abruptly withdraw from it. As I have said to many other groups and I say to the Hon. Member—and I am sure he will accept this—I have no intention to proceed in such a way as to leave any fisherman in Canada unable to get insurance.

● (1150)

Coming back to what I take are some mollifying words from my hon. friends, if my hon. friend is suggesting that I come before the committee immediately to expand on what I just said, I am prepared to do so. If that would assist the Hon. Member and his Party in moving this legislation along, I will be glad to do that.

I do want the Hon. Member and the House to understand that in discussions with my hon. friend, in perfectly appropriate discussions before the Bill was debated and afterwards, my friend made the suggestion to me that I write down fixed guidelines within which any Minister would operate under the powers the Bill would have with these amendments. I even considered doing that until I heard my hon. friend talking about absolute guarantees of traditional percentages. The moment my friend says that, it puts any Minister of Fisheries in an almost hopeless position because traditional percentages have been adjusting and changing on the West Coast. They have been adjusting and changing by agreement among the different user groups. There will have to be some adjustments in that. I say to you with all frankness, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot come in front of the House and write down a guideline that makes promises that I think will be almost impossible to fulfil in their exactitude.

If my hon. friend wants me to come before the committee and be questioned—it is an unusual procedure, ordinarily this would happen only when this Bill goes to committee—but if my hon. friend is asking me to speed up the process by adjourning this debate and going before the committee to be questioned, I am only too ready to do that.

I want to say through you, Mr. Speaker, that I know the Hon. Member well. We have a high regard for each other, I believe. It was necessary for me, perhaps, to be a little bit acerbic this morning, but myhon. friend has, in the best traditions of the House of Commons, come back with a soft answer and now perhaps he can consider the comments I have made. I will be very interested to hear what his Party and, of course, what my friends in the Official Opposition have to say to that.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I think progress has been made. I would like to make a brief comment on the guideline situation. We were not looking for fixed guidelines, in the sense that they would bind the Minister forever, or to have a totally fixed framework. What we were looking for is the acknowledgement that traditional user groups in the industry would continue to exist and that their rough percentages of involvement would be maintained until by agreement with the user group committee, that could be changed. Therefore, no one would be forced out and they could anticipate, in the short term at least, an acceptable level of presence based on the historical frame.

I do not hear a lot of difference in what the Minister is saying. The other suggestion is that maybe this debate could be adjourned for a period of time, leaving the Government to move on to the Bretton Woods Agreements Bill or whatever its second order of business is, so we could move this Bill to committee and take a quick look at what the Minister has in mind, might be a very useful process.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) referred a couple of times in his remarks to my being in the House and he wanted to know why I had not objected to the policies concerning fishing of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser). I would like to remind the Hon. Member that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is the most available Minister of Fisheries and Oceans I have ever seen in my experience in this House. I have spoken to him so often during the past six months about fisheries matters on the West Coast that he used to pick up the phone and say "Hello, Allan" every day. He has been co-operative to a very reasonable degree.

The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River comes from a commercial fishing area and knows little about sports fishing, I suppose, although he should know because Campbell River is in that region as well as a lot of our commercial fishing fleet.

Around my area, the Victoria constituency, there is mainly sports fishing. We came to what seems to me to be a reasonable compromise between the first cast at the rules for sports fishing this year, which were pretty unacceptable to sports fishermen in my region and the compromise with which the Minister eventually came up that we will be allowed to catch two Spring salmon or Chinook fish each day and 20 per year. I had hoped that during this debate someone would state or be able to question the Minister as to whether that rule would supersede the rule about the 285,000 pieces that can be caught by the trollermen plus the sports fishermen in a year. When that 285,000 has been achieved, does it mean that the person who then has bought a sports fishing licence for $10 can still go out and catch two per day and 20 for the balance of the year?

The purpose of this Bill, which the NDP has been filibustering for several days now and which it now wants to hoist for six months, has been simply to bring some order out of the chaos in the fishing regulations at the present time. The NDP, as is its wont, objects to order. Members of the NDP prefer chaos. They do much better if they can find a chaotic situation about which to complain and grieve and so try to engender some support.

If you look at the clauses in this Bill, Mr. Speaker, each item here is simply to correct a very woolly part of the existing Fisheries Act. I certainly think that the Bill—it is not the end of the legislation—cannot provide a thriving and totally orderly fishing industry, but it goes a long way toward that laudable aim.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is now over. We shall now resume debate. The Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker).

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I understand the official critics in the Opposition are now meeting with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) with the hope of arriving at some mutual agreement on the progress of this Bill. In the meantime, perhaps I could address some of the questions that have been raised. The hon. gentleman who spoke a few moments ago put to the House the problems of the sports fishermen that perhaps by the time the fishermen had obtained their licences, all the pieces of salmon would be gone. That is precisely the problem, Mr. Speaker. It also applies to the commercial fishermen who are saying that when the time of the year has arrived for them to go fishing, perhaps the sports fishermen will have caught all the fish, and as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans says he is going to abide by the U.S. agreement, the season might have to be closed.

I would like to take some exception to the remarks made not only by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans a few moments ago, but to the remarks made by the official critic of the New Democratic Party. Perhaps this is an appropriate time to do so since it appears that we are reaching an agreement behind the curtains.

First, the official critic of the NDP was talking about the moorage fees, as he called them. I believe the Minister of Fisheries called them berthage fees. Fishermen call them wharfage fees. There is quite a difference. A berth is an area where you usually fish, or an area that you have reserved for purposes relating to the fishery. Moorage could be out in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean. Wharfage is when you are tied up to a wharf, either directly or indirectly. In other words, a boat could be tied up to another boat which is tied up to a wharf or to several boats which are tied to the wharf, or a boat could be tied to the wharf itself. I just wanted to clarify the terminology. We are actually talking about wharfage, not moorage, as the NDP says, or berthage, as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans said.

When the official critic of the NDP spoke a few moments ago, he said that the doubling of moorage fees or wharfage fees, which is actually what he was talking about, was unfair because in certain provinces no fees were paid, and that this came to light last night in the standing committee. He is correct that it came to light last night in the standing committee, but I have to take exception to the reasoning. I do not believe there should be any wharfage fees at all. Perhaps that is what he should modify his position to be. There should not be any wharfage fees across the country. I understand what he is talking about. He is angry because fishermen in British Columbia have to pay to have their boats tied up. For the life of me I cannot understand why fishermen in B.C. ever put up with it in the beginning. We heard evidence which indicated that a fisherman had to pay $60 a month to tie up his boat, and it was not even tied up to the wharf. It was his home port. The fees will now become $120 per month for him to have the right to tie up his boat to a wharf. I do not understand the fishermen in British Columbia or the unions representing them, I do not understand how it was put into place in the beginning.

I take exception to the Minister saying that he is looking into the question of the fishing vessel insurance scheme. He has said to several people, I believe behind the scenes, that he will make sure no fisherman will be in a situation where he cannot get any insurance at all. That was the general tone of the Minister's remarks. The fact of the matter is that any fisherman can obtain private insurance on his boat. There is no doubt about that, but the problem is how much he will have to pay for it. The leakiest boat in Canada, the oldest boat in Canada with a rotten bottom, could be insured, but how much will the premiums be? That is the problem. When the notice went out to fishermen that the fishing vessel insurance scheme would be cancelled, that is the government-sponsored scheme, they had to look ahead. March 31 is coming and many of them will have to renew their insurance. They will go to private insurance companies and will have to pay perhaps three times the premiums they paid last year. In some cases, for large boats it will amount to $20,000 or $30,000. The Minister's argument has to be one way or the other, either he will cancel the scheme or he will not.

I should like to give the Minister a word of advice. He cannot cancel the fishing vessel insurance plan which was instituted for a particular purpose. It is serving its purpose well. The Government says that it will save money by doing away with the scheme. It should look at the facts, at the balance sheet which shows a $5 million profit in the scheme since it was instituted in the early 1950s. Where is the saving? Yes, the Government will save in salaries, because everyone who works with that particular Department will be laid off, but it will not be gaining in the long run. Yes, the scheme lost money last year and the year before, but as witnesses from British Columbia pointed out to the committee last night, over a period of time it does not lose money on the scheme. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should announce immediately that the ill-advised policy inflicted upon him by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) will be reversed and the fishing vessel insurance scheme will be reactivated. He should tell the fishermen of Canada that they need not worry, that they will not have to pay two or three times the amount they paid last year for insurance.

I have heard certain Hon. Members point out that fishermen can obtain insurance at the same rate and sometimes even at a lower rate. Those fishermen are free to do so. There is no argument there. If they can obtain just as good a deal from a private insurance company, they would be crazy to stay under the federal scheme. Let them get the better insurance. However, the fishing vessel insurance scheme was put in place for people who could not afford the insurance schemes of private companies. It was put in place so that there would be a fast turnover of money in case of accident. It was put in place for many boats in northern areas of the country, in far-flung areas. It was extremely difficult for those owners to obtain insurance from private firms because the boats would have to be inspected up north in small communities. The Minister should announce the immediate cancellation of that policy statement of the President of the Treasury Board.

The motion before the House today moved by the NDP deals with the authority of the Minister. Of course, matters such as the fishing vessel insurance scheme and wharfage fees being imposed and doubled across the country were mentioned in this debate as they relate to the authority of the Minister. We should not forget that other things were done under the authority of the Minister since the Government came into power which were really not good at all. I refer to the outrageous cost of charts to fishermen. This was imposed by the President of the Treasury Board upon the Minister of Fisheries.

I will refer to another matter which we should never forget. It was brought home last night by fishermen from British Columbia. I asked them whether they realized they would have to pay for telephone calls to the weather office. They said that they did not have to pay for them. I indicated that it was a new policy of the Government of Canada, the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier), and they said they had to call the weather office every day for updates. it is an example of something which will have an effect right down the line. That charge is being imposed upon the Canadian public, supposedly to increase revenues to the Government of Canada by some $2 million. The fact of the matter is that fishermen in British Columbia, in Newfoundland, on the East Coast, in the Great Lakes and in the freshwater systems, will hesitate to telephone the weather office when they know they will have to pay. That is what is wrong with this policy. We do not want to discourage them from telephoning for weather updates because their safety is involved. If they pause before making that telephone call because they have to pay for it, and perhaps cannot afford it, we are into a very dangerous area. However, that subject has not been discussed to any great degree in this Chamber. Perhaps it is one of the most important matters relating to fishermen.

The authority being requested by the Bill is not a new one. It is an authority which the Minister of Fisheries thought he always had. There are some new areas included in the Bill, but its general thrust is to give the Minister authority for something he has always done but did not know he could not do legally. As members of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry know, fishermen appearing before them are not happy with the Federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans or with the Minister. They are not happy with resource allocation or with the distinguishing between gear types which brought on this Bill. The court judge said, "Minister of Fisheries, you cannot allocate fish according to gear types". That is a sore point with fishermen right across this country.

For the benefit of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, let me say that it varies from area to area. It has been a big problem over the last 10 or 15 years. That is why the Ministry of Fisheries is asking for authority under this Bill to impose quotas on gear types of social and economic reasons, not for conservation and protection of the stock. It is a very unusual area with which the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is dealing. Fishermen right across this country will bear out the truth of that statement. I will give just two short examples.

A few years ago when you talked to fishermen dealing with the cod fishery, they said that the Government of Canada and the provincial Governments were saying that they should have a new gear type, commonly referred to as the Japanese cod trap. They were saying that because it gives better quality fish. It is a trap with a bottom, a side and a top. The fish come in and swim around continually. They are alive. When you open the top of the net, you just tip the fish into the boat. Regardless of how long that net is in the water, the fish are alive.

This was promoted. The Japanese cod trap in the early 1970s cost $8,500 made up. Some fishermen were given nets by the Government. They were given to fishermen in selected areas of eastern Canada. It was a great thing for fishermen to have, no doubt about it. Better quality fish were caught.

But along came the problems associated with that gear type. The mesh was small. The holes in the net were small. When the fish got in, they could not get out, not even the small ones. When the salmon got in, only the very small ones could get out. Along came the problems of the salmon fishery. Fishermen were not allowed by law to keep the salmon in the net. They discovered that they were not allowed to sell any fish under 18 inches to a fish plant. The fishermen said, "We were told that this was our salvation, that this was the best way for us to get good quality fish and to get a better price for them".

When you talk about gear types today, you are not talking about Japanese cod traps, which were heralded as being better than a gillnet on the bottom of the ocean, which killed the fish by drowning them. We do not talk about Japanese cod traps any more. They are now a bad thing. Every conservation group, every fisheries officer and the fishermen agree that it is a bad thing because it catches small fish that cannot be sold. In some cases it kills fish in the leader of that Japanese cod trap.

Where has the Department of Fisheries gone now? Now it has gone to trawls. They now tell the fishermen the gillnet is no good any more because it drowns fish. The Japanese cod trap catches small fish which cannot be sold. It traps salmon, sometimes kills them, and they have to be thrown away. That is a bad gear type. Now the fishermen are to go to trawls.

Trawls are hook and line. That is bait. They say you get a better quality fish with a trawl. The fisheries people across this country today are being told that the salvation is the trawl. They have gone from this gear type to another gear type to another gear type.

This Bill talks about gear types. The Government of Canada was promoting different gear types and asked fishermen to catch herring through the ice. They were paid $4.20 a hour. That was only four years ago. They were encouraged to put out gillnets. In those same areas of Canada today, there is no quota. The scientists claim that all the herring are gone. However, it was only a short time ago that the Department of Fisheries was paying people to catch herring. They were encouraged to catch that particular species.

When you talk about gear types and the allocation of a resource to gear types to fishermen, and the fact that this Bill gives this authority, the fishermen say, "What about this and what about that? Why was this mistake and that mistake made? Don't talk to me about gear types. Don't talk to me about the Minister of Fisheries allocating gear types to fishermen in this country because the Government has a pretty poor record to go on".

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that you are indicating that I have run out of time. In conclusion, the authority being sought by the Minister in this Bill is suspect to fishermen in Canada. That is the first point. I do not see anything wrong with the Minister getting that authority. Obviously he has to have some authority. The new authority which he will get under the Bill, according to some Members in this House, is not a good thing. I cannot see that much wrong with it. I simply point out that in legislation such as this, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should remember that the fishermen of Canada have some very legitimate points to make. Those points should be taken into consideration when dealing with new legislation in this Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments?

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I just want to remove any suggestion that we were not asking for fairness in the question of moorage rates in British Columbia. If the previous Government and other Governments which preceded it did exempt people in the fishing industry in eastern Canada from moorage rates, those exemptions should apply on the West Coast of Canada the same as they do in Atlantic Canada. No person in this House would disagree with that statement. After the incredible statements that came to light in the committee last night, I am sure that justice will be done and that that in fact will happen on the West Coast. I am convinced if this does not happen quickly, there is going to be a very rough fight over this issue.

I think the Hon. Member will be with us fighting that cause, the whole principle of fairness which I talked about with regard to those moorage fees being lifted on the West Coast of Canada. In many respects that infrastructure is like that of the highways. Commercial activity has to be viewed in that manner. I just want to pick up that one small point. I enjoyed the Hon. Member's speech very much. I expect he and his colleagues will be fighting with us to have that principle of fairness observed.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of fairness. The question is one of abolition. It should not be in place. Wharfage fees should not be charged in this country. I agree with the Hon. Member that a fisherman with a 38-foot boat will now have to pay to tie up. If it is a rickety old wharf or a brand new wharf in the Province of British Columbia, he will have to pay $120 a month. It is not fair that he has to pay that money. That is what I dispute. It is true, as the Hon. Member says, that all fishermen should have to pay the same, regardless of what province they are in, if it is a federal Act. My point is that it should not be charged at all. There should be no fee.

I wish to say something for the benefit of the Hon. Member from New Brunswick who is about to speak in the Chamber. I always refer to this Hon. Member as being the Hon. Member from New Brunswick because of the speeches he has made over the years in this Chamber. He is going to take exception to something that I said and I will not have a chance to reply until the end.

• (1220)

Last night, some fishermen appeared before the Fisheries Committee. I wish the Member from New Brunswick had been there to listen to those fishermen. They explained why we must keep the Fishing Vessel Insurance Plan. They said that there are groups of fishermen who go to private insurance companies but that there are other groups of fishermen who cannot afford to go to those insurance companies because they cannot get comparable rates. The Fishing Vessel Insurance Plan of the federal Government is much better than the private insurance plan because of the turn-over time involved in settling accounts and because the fees are much cheaper.

The Member from New Brunswick will say that there is this group of fishermen and that group of fishermen who go to private insurance companies and have no problems at all and if they can do it, then why can the rest of the fishermen not do so as well. I only wish he had been at the committee meeting last night. He could have had a good argument with the fishermen from British Columbia who were present.

Mr. Gass: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member from Newfoundland has referred to the Hon. Member from New Brunswick. The Hon. Member from New Brunswick wanted to speak but unfortunately, because of an agreement that we made to adjourn this debate and move the subject matter of the Bill to committee, I think the time has come when there will be no more speakers on this Bill.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make the comment that that is unfortunate. The Hon. Member to whom I was referring, the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), is probably one of the most knowledgeable Conservative Members in this Chamber regarding fishery and forestry matters. He is the most knowledgeable Member I have seen on that side of the House in the past 10 years. I would suggest to members of the Conservative Party that when they are arranging debates on forestry and fishery, they make sure that that Hon. Member speaks.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Speaker, there has been an agreement made today to adjourn this debate and to put the subject matter of the Bill before committee. The Minister has guaranteed us in the House that he will meet with us regarding the Bill itself. We in the Official Opposition agree with that and would like to show the necessary co-operation.

We realize that the Bill gives to the Minister powers that he thought he already had until the ruling of Mr. Justice Collier of British Columbia. However, there are a great many unanswered questions that can be asked of the Department of Fisheries. That is why we wanted the Minister to meet with us before this Bill went through second reading in the House. The Minister has agreed to do that, and we in the Official Opposition agree that we should now adjourn this debate, move the subject matter into committee for further discussion, and then return it to the floor of the House of Commons to complete second reading.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment. Some of us in this House have particular industries at heart, and as the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) has stated, this is one of the industries I have at heart as it is one of the industries he has at heart. However, I would like to point out one thing. The position in which the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) presently finds himself is one which he inherited. Many of the things with which he must deal are things which I have opposed.

On the other hand, I must say that the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate, whose positions and opinions I very highly respect and for whose kind remarks I am thankful, found himself voting for things which put the fishery industry in the position in which it presently finds itself. How this will be corrected, I cannot say.

I do not have an idea of how the errors of the ways of 15 years of Fisheries Ministers under Mr. Trudeau can be corrected in any short period of time or how one can get the people in the Department to recognize that there has been a change and that some of the old methods do not work. For instance, the appraisal of stocks must be revised so that when there are fish in the sea to be caught, our processors do not have to go to the Baltic to buy fish while our own fish swim away under uninhibited fishing restrictions.

These are the things with which the Minister finds himself faced. He inherited these things. I hope that the Hon. Member for Gander-Twillingate and the Hon. Member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson) will be as helpful in trying to reconstruct a fishing industry and a Ministry with a progressive and constructive program as they were in supporting the legislation which put the present Minister in the position in which he now finds himself.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, in the limited time available, I have two brief comments to make. It is quite correct that the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans did inherit certain things. He inherited the fishing vessel insurance scheme with which he is now doing away, research stations which he is now closing and scientific fishery experts whom he is now terminating. I would have to agree with the hon. gentleman in that respect.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I think one of the constructive things that has come out of this rather arduous debate is the development of a new method. In the short period that I have been here, I do not recall too many other occasions on which we have managed to find a way around an impasse. I think the Government has made a unique and very constructive offer to find a way around this impasse. I know my Liberal colleagues are interested in co-operating with the Government to see if we cannot begin to work on the problems away from the Chamber while allowing the House to continue its business. I am extremely pleased by the offer that has come forward from the Government and we certainly appreciate the opportunity to look at the matter in committee.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I have been apprised of the situation which has developed during the course of debate. There have been discussions with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) and the critics of the opposition Parties. I have heard them address the issue of how we may deal with this Bill. Therefore, although I believe it requires the unanimous consent of the House, I am quite prepared, on the basis of that understanding, to propose that we adjourn debate on this matter and deal with Bill C-30.

It is the undertaking of the Minister to appear before the appropriate committee to have a full discussion with members of that committee regarding the questions that have been raised by members of the Opposition. After the appropriate committee hearings, I will then take the advice of and consult with opposition House Leaders about further discussion on this Bill.

I therefore propose that, on that understanding, we adjourn this debate and move on to Bill C-30. The Minister will indeed appear before the members of the committee and discuss the points that have been raised during the course of this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to agree to the House Leader's proposition?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well. It is agreed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council) (for Mrs. McDougall) moved that Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) is unavailable at this time so I call upon the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lanthier) to make an address regarding second reading, and then we can carry on with debate.

• (1230)

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting Bill C-30 on second reading. The purpose of this Bill is to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, and it does so in three ways. First of all, it provides the necessary legislation to authorize participation by Canada in the International Finance Corporation, a branch of the World Bank whose activities are directed toward the private sector; second, the Bill consolidates legislation relating to all member institutions of the World Bank group; and third, it modifies the procedure for obtaining the approval of Parliament for financing these institutions.

The Bill's main objective is therefore to legislate the necessary authorization for Canada's participation in the International Finance Corporation, usually referred to as the IFC.

The IFC was created by the World Bank in 1956, with a special mandate to promote private sector investment in less developed countries by seeking out investment opportunities and bringing them to the attention of local and foreign investors. Using its own staff and consultants, the IFC seeks out and promotes investments that are not only commercially viable but will also contribute to the overall economic development of the country in question. In this respect, the International Finance Corporation complements very considerably the World Bank's development activities.

The International Finance Corporation, which has a capital base of $1.3 billion, expects to invest $4.5 billion over the next five years in projects estimated at a total value of $30 billion. Although the majority of the Corporation's investments will take the form of loans, the IFC also uses part of its resources to acquire an interest in a company when there is a lack of private venture capital. Since the IFC is able to underwrite part of the investment, it has also been possible to set up joint ventures and to help investors obtain commercial loans. Furthermore, the IFC has been active in promoting the expansion of capital markets in developing countries to create both national and foreign sources of investment capital.

Although Canada has been a member of the IFC since its inception, our legislation does not provide any authorization for Canada's participation in the Corporation. As is the case for many other programs, the necessary authorization was considered to have been given by tacit agreement when Parliament approved the payments after the Estimates were tabled. In 1982, the President of the Treasury Board decided that legislation would have to be passed in the case of each program. Last year, another increase in the Corporation's capital, totalling $650 million in U.S. funds, was negotiated to enable the IFC implement its new investment program. If Canada is to be able to contribute like other member countries towards increasing the capital of this important development institution, official approval must now be obtained through legislation.

The second change I am proposing would consolidate, in a single Act, the legislation concerning the three institutions that constitute the World Bank group. Besides the IFC, these institutions include the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, better known as the World Bank and the largest institution in the group, and the International Development Association—the IDA—which is responsible for providing the poorest countries with loans on more flexible terms.

The World Bank was created in 1944 to help finance the reconstruction of a Europe destroyed by war. Once the reconstruction of Europe had become a reality, the World Bank shifted its attention to the economic development of the Third World. Today the World Bank, which has over $80 billion in subscribed capital and some 143 members, is the largest single development agency in the world. Together with the International Monetary Fund, it plays a vital role in maintaining international economic and financial stability. In 1984, the World Bank approved some 130 loans valued at about $12 billion to more than 43 developing countries.

The World Bank finances its loans through two kinds of contributions it receives from member countries. A small amount, recently just 8.75 per cent of the Bank's capital, is provided in cash and in the form of demand notes. The remainder 91.25 per cent of subscribed capital is available in the form of callable capital guaranteed by the governments of member countries. The World Bank borrows funds, usually by selling long-term bonds on the international capital market which are guaranteed by its callable capital. The funds are then lent to developing countries on terms that enable the World Bank to recover 100 per cent of its costs and to constitute a prudent level of adequate reserves.

Although World Bank loans are granted under the best possible commercial terms, some countries find that even these rates would place an undue burden on their resources. Since as a result of loans granted to countries with a low solvency level, the World Bank's AAA credit rating might suffer, in 1960 World Bank member countries set up the International Development Association in order to expand the World Bank's activities in the poorest countries. Unlike the World Bank, the resources of the International Development Association are provided directly by governments of member countries in the form of regular replenishments. The IDA then uses these funds to grant long-term loans on very concessional terms to developing countries with annual per capita incomes below $790. However, IDA projects must maintain a very high quality and provide a high economic rate of return. The IDA—excuse me, Mr. Speaker, but this is of course the English abbreviation and although I realize that the French abbreviation would be in order, I shall continue to refer to the Association as the IDA—therefore, the International Development Association also finances technical assistance to ensure that the objectives of the projects are achieved.

In 1984, IDA approved 106 loans valued at over $3.5 billion to 43 countries. About 32 per cent went to African countries south of the Sahara. In future, the proportion of IDA loans directed to Africa will be increased to 37 per cent, as the World Bank is now concentrating even more of its attention on the very serious problems confronting this region. An increasing proportion of IDA resources is being used to help revamp policies and institutions, to ensure that the resources provided by Canada and other donor countries within the framework of emergency measures and long-term development financing are indeed utilized as efficiently as possible.

● (1240)

To enable IDA to renew its efforts, Canada recently advised the World Bank that we would contribute $100 million in Canadian currency to the American $1.1 billion special assistance fund for sub-Saharan African countries. The fund is administered by IDA whose specific purpose is to implement political reform and structural adjustment programs to correct the weakening trend which now besets African nations. More particularly, IDA is attempting to boost agricultural production in that region.

The third amendment introduced would change the way Parliament approves Canadian financial assistance to those institutions. Instead of providing exact figures in the legislation itself, as the practice has been so far, the amount of Canada's contribution to each institution would come under parliamentary scrutiny each year after the estimates are tabled. Parliament would no longer be required to amend the legislation everytime we want to make an additional contribution under special agreements such as the special assistance fund for sub-Saharan African countries. At the same time, Parliament would be legally authorized to assess the payments made to each institution along with those made to the World Bank Group as a whole and other aid mechanisms, with a view to judging their advisability when the estimates are tabled.

This amendment would also make it possible to standardize the over-all process of payments made to the World Bank Group, along the lines of a special process approved by Parliament in 1982 in the case of regional development banks.

Canada was party to recent negotiations on a selective increase in IBRD capital stock—the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development—whereby Canada may acquire additional shares.

The total cost of additional shares would run up to about $320 million in current Canadian currency. However, only 8.75 per cent of the shares' norminal value—roughly $28 million in Canada dollars—are to be paid over a four-to-five-year period.

The remainder of our subscription is callable and represents a real debt of and a possible disbursement by the Canadian Government. Acquiring that interest will make Canada a shareholder of 2.92 per cent of the total capital stock of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, as such entitled to appoint a Canadian to the World Bank board of directors. This will enable us to scrutinize World Bank policies and projects, and make sure that its financial standing remains high.

Under the recently concluded agreement to double the capital stock of the International Finance Corporation—it must be paid in full—Canada is entitled to buy enough shares to maintain its interest at the current level of 3.85 per cent. This increase would cost Canada $25 million in American dollars payable over the next five years.

The seventh IDA replenishment negotiated last year calls for a payment of $9 billion for the three years from 1985 to 1988. Canada has agreed to contribute $500 million, or 4.5 per cent of the resources.

Most payments to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Finance Corporation and the International Development Association will be made through callable non-interest bearing notes issued by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in the coming four years. However, the notes will be called over a longer period of time, as the institutions finance projects and programs in developing countries. That is why the replenishments and increases in capital stock will have a minor impact on our annual budgets. The latter appear in the Government estimates and will be submitted to Parliament for approval when the annual budget is introduced.

Mr. Speaker, since the above-mentioned amendments require a change of title in the Act, a number of consequential amendments must be made to five other acts under which the World Bank is granted authority to make borrowings in Canada.

Since those acts needed to be amended anyhow, we also brought forward other changes in order that the International Finance Corporation be allowed to make borrowings in Canada to the same extent as the World Bank is. Just like the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and as provided for in its Articles of Association, the International Finance Corporation is required to obtain official approval from the Government of Canada before it will borrow Canadian dollars or make borrowings on the Canadian markets. Since the International Finance Corporation does not make significant borrowings on the international money markets, there is little likelihood that it will attempt to arrange borrowings in Canada in the near future.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, we would like to point out that we are proposing in Clause 7 to amend the requirement for the Minister of Finance to submit to Parliament an annual report on aspects of the World Bank operations that directly concern Canada. That amendment tends to further specify the contents of the report, including the procurement of Canadian goods and services for World Bank funded projects.

With respect to those procurements, although Canada's help to member countries of the World Bank Group is predicated on the efficiency of those development institutions, we have to make sure that Canadians have access to that very significant market. Until now, Canadian suppliers of goods and services have actually received payments amounting to 75 per cent of Canada's contributions to those institutions. The share of procurements in Canada that have been financed by the World Bank is equal or greater than our share in OECD exports to developing countries. Nonetheless, we believe we can do better. Therefore, Canada's trade office in Washington has been strengthened and our procedures in Ottawa streamlined to better help Canadian firms cope with the World Bank's procurement needs.

Mr. Speaker, we are experiencing trying economic times, but the sad conditions which are particularly severe in developing countries and what actually goes on in those countries have a direct impact on Canadians with respect to our exports, our employment situation and the stability of our financial structures. The world economy has never been so closely interrelated.

Some of the recent incidents have made it crystal clear to us that we simply cannot ignore those problems. Television screens brought into our living rooms telling and striking scenes of hardships caused by drought and the resulting famine. Canadians reacted with unprecedented generosity, fully aware that we cannot remain indifferent to the woes which are the lot of other human beings.

The Bill under consideration today confirms once again that Canada does not intend to let developing countries fend for themselves when they most need assistance. It reaffirms as well Canada's strong support for multilateral endeavours—the World Bank Group is a shining example—which have done so much to maintain peace and guarantee the well-being of nations through these trying times.

With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, we urge all deeply concerned Members to support the Government and confirm the sincere Canadian commitment to those international institutions. We hope they will quickly and efficiently consider this very important piece of legislation.

• (1250)

[English]

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, this particular Bill will consolidate legislative authority for Canada's participation in three affiliates of the World Bank group. Thus the Bretton Woods Agreements Act is to become the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act.

Bill C-30 also proposes a change in how Parliament is asked to approve Canada's participation in these international financial institutions. It is proposed that authority for expenditure be sought annually through the Estimates. The practice until now has been to amend the Act, that is to bring a Bill before the House. So with the new proposal the House will lose an opportunity each year to debate a Bill dealing with international development, but Members will be able to see from year to year in the Estimates that Canada is indeed meeting its obligations to these institutions and that our commitments remain strong. Of course, there will be opportunity for discussion of these matters in committee. In 1982, a similar provision was adopted by this House with respect to the regional development banks, the Asian Development Bank, the Inter-American Development Bank and the Caribbean Development Bank.

We in the Official Opposition see no particular reason for a long debate of this Bill. Canada is a co-founder and major player in the institutions with which the Bill deals. The World Bank and its affiliates are the most important multilateral institutions in the world dedicated to fostering economic health and well-being, and we would like to see Canada's contributions go forward in a timely fashion. But because we have relatively few occasions to bring the subject before the House, we would like to talk about these institutions today and while the Bill remains before the House.

International finance is a complex subject indeed, but Canadians are entitled to know where their money is going and why. Our own well-being is closely linked to the economic security of other countries in the world. Behind the technical language of a Bill, we see evidence that Canada is truly interested and committed to helping alleviate if not resolve the problems of a large number of developing countries in varying degrees of financial difficulty. In this Canada has had a long and honourable tradition.

As Hon. Members will know, the name Bretton Woods refers to the village in New Hampshire where, in the summer of 1944, representatives of 28 nations, including Canada, met. All were deeply concerned about the adequacy of the international monetary system after the chaos created by the Great Depression and World War II. Following that war, Europe and Japan found their economies in a shambles. The capital needed to maintain even a minimal standard of living was lacking. Countries which had not experienced massive wartime destruction still had to face the difficult task of converting wartime economies into peacetime and consumer-oriented economies.

A number of economic conferences took place in the immediate post-World War II period to address these problems. The Bretton Woods conference is significant because it established the key institutions of a new international system. GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; the IMF, the International Monetary Fund; and the IBRD, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, also known as the World Bank, were born at Bretton Woods. The founders of these institutions recognized that the prosperity of the world would depend on an orderly and flexible trading system. The IMF was created to provide stability to the global monetary and financial system. The World Bank was created to provide long-term financing to member states in need of it, first, to help in rebuilding post-war Europe, and then to promote economic development in developing countries. GATT was instituted to bring a more liberal trading system to the world after the insular and destructive beggar-thy-neighbour policies of the post-World War I years.

This new international monetary system had as its task to provide exchange rate stability and a greater degree of monetary co-operation among member states. For a number of years this was accomplished. By the mid-1970s, however, the post-war practice of fixed exchange rates had given way to a new system of floating exchange rates, a response to the growth in world trade and the entry of major new players in the world trading picture. Being far less structured than the previous system and therefore less easy to control or operate, the floating rate system has all the advantages of flexibility and all the disadvantages of volatility. The search for a happy medium, more stable than at present and less rigid than the Bretton Woods system, has been seriously complicated by two phenomena; the energy shocks which resulted in extreme fluctuation in balance of payments movements, and the world recession. So what we have had in the last decade or so is an imperfect system operating in very difficult circumstances. What we also have, however, are institutions that have come to be acknowledged as extremely effective multilateral bodies dedicated to helping raise the standard of living in developing countries. That is the very essence of development assistance. Development assistance does not mean handing out money. What it means is that we in Canada, as members of an international community, living in a country which is one of the more privileged trading nations, have a stake in fostering the stability of the international financial system.

In a time of international financial stress we have a responsibility and an obligation to promote multilateral co-operation. The practical application of this obviously is a reaffirmation of our commitment to these multilateral financial institutions.

The World Bank group, with which Bill C-30 is concerned, is composed of the IBRD and two affiliates, the International Development Association and the International Finance Corporation. All three have the purpose of raising standards of living in developing countries, and this is done by channelling financial resources from developed countries to developing countries. The IBRD's capital is subscribed by its 147 member countries, and the Bank's lending operations are mainly financed through its own prudent borrowings on the world's capital markets. Every so often the Bank carries out general capital increases in order to expand its lending programs. Most of the Bank's subscribed capital is in the form of guarantees by members and only a small portion is actually paid in. IBRD loans are made on commercially related terms and only for productive purposes where economic growth would be stimulated. Projects are carefully chosen and evaluated by the Bank's staff with local authorities and client countries to ensure that they will be effective and that the repayment prospects are high. IBRD's loans are made to Governments and must be guaranteed by those Governments.

I note it is almost one o'clock. May I continue after the recess, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member has 30 minutes left in her speech.

CITIZENSHIP COURTS

PRESS REPORT OF COMMENT ATTRIBUTED TO SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State (Mr. McLean) is quoted this morning by the Canadian Press as saying that Citizenship Court Judge Geraldine Copps of Hamilton was denied her appointment by him because: "You check the record. What her daughter had to say about this Government", referring to my distinguished colleague, the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps).

This disgusting comment is an insult, and an infringement on all of the rights of elected officials in this country, whether they be federal, provincial or municipal. This vicious attack by the Secretary of State on the right to freedom of speech, which is protected by Canada's Charter of Rights, is a totally unacceptable abuse of the public trust the Minister has sworn an oath to defend.

The rights and privileges of all Hon. Members in this House are under attack today by the Secretary of State. The very foundation of Parliamentary democracy is being undermined by the degrading and humiliating comments of this man who is the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) personal appointee to oversee the status of women in Canada. In the absence of the Prime Minister, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) to demand immediately the resignation of the Secretary of State who is unworthy of the high office that he holds.

RAILWAYS

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION—USE OF ALUMINUM HOPPER CARS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, there are 3,000 aluminum grain hopper cars available for use on light rail branch lines in the West. The use of these cars increases the movement of grain from those branch lines by almost one-third for the same number of cars loaded, as well as having other advantages. In the last few years the railways have not switched out the aluminum cars for particular use on the branch lines which need them.

I call upon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) to insist that railways use these cars for the purpose for which they were purchased, and so increase returns to farmers for their grain sales.

S.O. 21

In the process of rehabilitation of branch lines would the Minister also assure us that upgrading will include heavy steel so that all kinds of hopper cars can be used without the inconvenience and extra cost of switching? The Henribourg-Paddockwood branch line in my constituency is a good example of the need for such assurance.

ACID RAIN

NEW GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the new government policy on acid rain announced last week by the Minister of Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) is an historic step. Canada thus becomes the first industrialized country to take concrete action to show a firm intention to control acid rain.

I am especially pleased to see that the Minister will allocate up to $150 million for research and the modernization of plants.

Mr. Speaker, the co-ordinator of the Canadian coalition against acid rain has welcomed the news that Canada has finally assumed its responsibilities. In my constituency, Mr. Guy Leclerc of the standing committee on environment in Rouyn-Noranda said on the CBC that the federal government has done its part and that the province and Noranda Mines should now act with the same determination.

Mr. Speaker, during the last election campaign, I had promised my fellow citizens that the Progressive Conservative government would promptly react to improve the quality of life in our environment. After only six months in power, the Progressive Conservative government has shown that the protection of the environment is indeed one of its priorities.

This is, Mr. Speaker, a clear signal that our government is abiding by its election commitments made to the Canadian people.

POLITICAL PARTIES

LIBERAL PARTY FUND RAISING LETTER

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have received a communication from the Right Hon. John Turner, Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, with the salutation "Dear Friend". In the same envelope a memo was enclosed from one John N. Turner which reads: "As a valued Party supporter your opinion is important to me and to the Party as a whole". He goes on to say that my answers will help him to gauge opinion on several of the key issues, and will provide him with valuable direction. He assures me that my reply will be kept in the strictest of confidence and he will see to it that I am kept informed.

This is confusing, Mr. Speaker. I am delighted that the right hon. gentleman considers me to be a "Dear Friend", but become concerned when he tells me that I am a "valued Party supporter". Of course he does not say which Party I am a valued supporter of, so perhaps that explains it. Nonetheless, as he has asked me as a friend to provide him with my opinion of what he should be doing, I am pleased to do so. Throw away the cue cards, be nice to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), expand your peripheral vision to your right, and learn to enjoy being Leader of the Opposition.

Sorry I didn't have the $30 you seek to bail you out, but that is your predecessor's fault. Do keep in touch, and don't worry about keeping this confidential.

EMPLOYMENT

EQUALITY IN EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Last Friday, Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservative government demonstrated its propensity for prospective. In its Equality in Employment program, it has indeed failed to impose mandatory compliance on companies and Crown corporations. With initiatives such as this, equality in the workplace for the handicapped, the visible minorities, the Indians and women generally will certainly not be achieved within the 21st Century.

The aim of this program is certainly commendable, Mr. Speaker, but the means to achieve it are certainly debatable. It has been demonstrated many times that voluntarism does not produce much. To this day, the voluntary programs implemented within the Civil Service for women have hardly changed the manpower structure. The fact that Crown corporations will only be required to report on their progress in the promotion of the four groups identified within the workforce comes down to making public opinion the ultimate instrument of control.

The lack of penalties for non-observance of the Equality in Employment program makes it voluntary, for all practical purposes. That is the impression the government left last week. That is unfortunately the message which it has sent to Crown corporations and companies which compete for government contracts.

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

EMPLOYMENT OF RACIAL AND ETHNIC GROUP MEMBERS

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the Government gave its first response to the Abella Report on Equality in Employment. The response promises that a degree of employment equity is to be achieved in the federal Public Service and in some companies entering into government contracts.

At the same time the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) announced that a survey is to be conducted in April to examine the employment situation within the Public Service of members of ethnic and racial groups. Such a survey was first announced in June, 1983. The previous Government said last June that it would collect and analyse the necessary data by December, 1984. Clearly there have been difficulties within the Public Service in carrying out this essential survey.

As well, the President of the Treasury Board has said that he has advisory committees for women, native Canadians, and the disabled, but not for racial and ethnic minorities in the Public Service. This fact raises questions about the determination of the Government to address the employment concerns of Canada's multicultural community.

Fifteen years of implementation of the Official Languages Act demonstrates that the Public Service can respond to the public will. Members of our ethnic and racial groups expect that the Public Service will come to reflect the multicultural reality of Canada as it now reflects the bilingual nature of our country.

EXPO '86

A WORLD-WIDE INVITATION

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, Expo '86, next year's World's Fair in Vancouver, can be a tremendous economic, social, and psychological boost, not only for British Columbia but for our entire nation. The international spotlight will shine on the world's most beautiful city as Vancouver becomes a magnificent showplace for more than 30 nations and 50 provinces, states, and corporate exhibitors. Expo '86 can be a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for Canada. It can be our chance to welcome the world to a new Canada, our chance to create a new prosperity.

The communications and transportation themes of Expo '86 "World In Motion — World In Touch" will provide a unique focus for Canadian technology and ingenuity. Our nation can reap tremendous benefits from this six-month extravaganza. A new era of economic growth can dawn in British Columbia.

I urge all Members in the House to take a real interest in this century's most spectacular Canadian event, and join with the people of Vancouver and British Columbia in inviting the world to Expo '86.

INDUSTRY

ABITIBI-PRICE COMPANY

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, very often and perhaps too often unfortunately, Members from remote areas, including my own constituency of Jonquière, are prompted to rise in this House to claim jobs and investments.

The case on which I would like to report today is a rather fortunate one. It is indeed a pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to inform Hon. Members that the Abitibi-Price Company has just decided to invest a total of $138 million in its Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean paper mills, of which $110 million will go to the mill in my constituency of Jonquière. Those investments will allow Abitibi-Price to undertake the manufacturing of specialty papers of a higher grade. Those new types of paper are in stronger and ever increasing demand on international markets.

Mr. Speaker, with the announcement of those strictly private investments, Abitibi-Price is asserting its determination to remain the world leader in newsprint manufacturing while improving the quality of its production. But Abitibi-Price did much more than that. It is showing the whole country its confidence in the social and economic future of our remote areas. It is bringing out the skill and expertise of our regional manpower by strengthening its presence and its employment platform.

Mr. Speaker, Jonquière welcomes that major investment and I am convinced—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please! I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired. The Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps).

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENOVATED FIGHTER PLANES PROVIDED TO TURKEY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the House of Commons that there is a very major concern among all Greek Canadians in Canada. I would like to call the attention of the Secretary of State to a decision made by this Government to send planes to Turkey, contrary to the representations now being made across Canada by Greek Canadians.

[English]

I am rising on behalf of thousands of Greek Canadians who are extremely concerned about the decision of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) to send to the Turkish Government 20 renovated fighter planes when none in fact are being sent to Greece. I will have a chance later on following

S.O. 21

Question Period to present in this House a petition which reads as follows:

We, the undersigned Canadians of Greek descent, are very alarmed at the intentions, of the Canadian Government to give 20 renovate fighter planes to Turkey and none to Greece.

While there might be good reasons for Canada to support a NATO ally, Canada should not side with Turkey against Greece.

What we are seeking is in fact justice and fairness for all our NATO allies, and I think it is a petition with which the Minister would certainly agree.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE PROPOSAL

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, the issue of free trade between Canada and the United States is as old as Canada itself. It has been proposed and rejected several times by previous politicians. However, within this last year there has been a renewal of interest in this subject.

Canada-U.S. trade is greater than that between any other bilateral trading partners in the world. Almost one-third of our gross national product results from our trading activities. Total trade between our great nations is likely to exceed $150 billion for 1984. Therefore, it is highly apparent that the time has come that this country's best interest may be realized by forging closer ties with the U.S.

As an Albertan, access to the U.S. market is most inviting. A relationship of this sort will allow for significant growth, both for Alberta and the Canadian economy. The benefits far outweigh any negative aspects.

A closer relationship with the U.S. will enable our industry to restructure itself, and consumers will benefit from increased product selection. Costs to Canadian businesses will decrease when purchasing in U.S. markets; and finally, the important sectors of our ailing economy, such as the oil and gas industry, will be given a new incentive.

The time is ripe for Canada and the United States to consider seriously the mutual benefits of a free trade arrangement.

FISHERIES

MOORAGE RATES PAID BY WESTERN FISHERMEN

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of this House a matter of serious injustice. This House has learned that moorage rates for fishermen in western Canada are already very high and that the Government has proposed to increase them by 100 per cent.

We have also learned that in eastern Canada in many jurisdictions fishermen pay no moorage rates whatsoever.

Although this serious discriminatory situation was put in place by previous Liberal Governments, it is clear that the Conservatives intend to continue the discrimination. In fact they intend to make it worse by charging western fishermen a 100 per cent increase in their rates, while continuing to charge fishermen in eastern Canada nothing.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised this country that people in western Canada would be given a hearing by this Government. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) made the same promises. The Tories have outdone themselves. They have taken a Liberal abuse of western Canada and made it worse.

The NDP calls upon this House to abandon and abolish changes for moorage in western Canada, and to give western Canadians some equality with their confreres on the East Coast.

TERRORISM

SEIZURE OF TURKISH EMBASSY IN OTTAWA

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. I think the Canadian people would want to express outrage and sorrow at the tragedy at the Turkish Embassy today. All of us in this House are sickened by the despicable actions of terrorism and, indeed, cowardice.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I would be grateful to the Deputy Prime Minister if he would give the House a report on the matter as he understands it as of this moment.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as just a moment ago indicated, all Members of the House share the description of the incident at the Turkish Embassy that transpired this morning expressed by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

I think we would all wish at the outset to express our deep regrets to the Embassy and our deep condolences to the survivors of Mr. Claude Brunelle whose life was forfeited. Mr. Brunelle was single and 31 years of age. His next of kin have been notified of the tragedy.

Second, I think all Members of the House would want to join me in commending, to the highest possible degree, the RCMP, the Ottawa Police Force, and the various federal Departments that were involved immediately in dealing with the situation.

The Turkish Embassy itself has indicated that it expects the Canadian authorities to deal with the matter, which we are doing with determination.

The hostages were Ambassador Kirga, his wife, and daughter. The details of the incident are now under investigation by the police, and the suspects have been arrested. They are at this moment being interrogated. The RCMP, of course, and the Ottawa Police have been in close co-operation from the moment they learned of the incident and this co-operation is continuing in the on-going investigation.

PROTECTION OF EMBASSY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is the third incident at the Turkish Embassy. Is the Deputy Prime Minister yet in a position to tell us whether there was a gap in security procedure, and in the procedure for protection of that Embassy? Has the Turkish Government been in touch with our Government relating to this incident on the degree of protection afforded the Embassy?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the first part of the question, the Turkish Embassy has indicated that it expects Canadian authorities to deal with the matter.

With respect to security generally in that and other embassies in Ottawa, the question of the security arrangements of our embassies here was under consideration today, and it will be under intensive review at a very early time. That review will benefit from today's events in assisting the Government in coming to an assessment of its over-all security arrangements for all embassies in the area.

● (1420)

REVIEW OF SECURITY PROCEDURES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Deputy Prime Minister will let the House have the benefit of what that review reveals as to whether there was a gap in the protection or the security in front of that Embassy. I second the Deputy Prime Minister in congratulating the police officers who quickly brought the situation under control this morning.

Would the Deputy Prime Minister tell us how that police effort was co-ordinated between the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the RCMP, the Ontario Provincial Police, and the Ottawa Police Force? Was there co-ordination? Which police force or entity was in charge and in control?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I don't think it would be in the interest of security itself to engage in an exchange with respect to details of the security provided to our embassies, but I would be very happy to undertake to discuss that matter with the right hon. gentleman and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, at their and my convenience.

With respect to a gap, obviously there was a gap; it was penetrated. But, by the most excellent standards which we have been assured exist in Ottawa, the security arrangements were those that could best achieve security for the embassy. In light of the events of today, a review of those arrangements is obviously imperative. That review will be undertaken, assessments made and conclusions arrived at, at the earliest possible time.

ROLE OF CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in his commendation of police action, the Deputy Prime Minister made no reference to the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. I should like to ask him whether the Canadian Security Intelligence Service had a role and responsibility in relation to bringing this incident to a relatively successful conclusion.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Yes, it certainly did. That was one aspect of the question of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition which I did not address. As the former Solicitor General well knows, there was a role played by that Service. As he knows, there is machinery within Government to assure central co-ordination of the responses necessary to meet emergency situations of this kind. That machinery went into action as soon as the emergency was known, and with very efficient and good results apart, of course, from the loss of life which occurred, and the injuries that I neglected to mention which were sustained by the Ambassador. Mr. Kirga who is alive and well and currently being treated for those injuries.

SURVEILLANCE OF ANTI-TURKISH TERRORISTS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the main role, in relation to this type of incident, of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service would be a counter-intelligence gathering role, a role which should be fulfilled before an event of this nature. I want to ask whether surveillance of anti-Turkish terrorism continues to be a priority of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. I think that gap has been left in the answers of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it certainly has been left and, as I am sure the former Solicitor General will appreciate, it would not benefit the security process itself if I were to respond in detail and directly to that question. It does nothing to enhance the security of the Turkish, or any other embassy, if I discuss, on the floor of the House of Commons, what arrangements are in force with respect to surveillance, or any other activity concerning those whose interests might be inimical to the very security we discuss.

ARMENIAN THREATS—PROVISION OF SECURITY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question also concerns the events of this morning. I want to say how happy we are that this incident has been concluded, at least with a lesser loss of life than might otherwise have been anticipated. With regard to our involvement in protection, and given that the international community has been aware for some time, at least since the recent trials, convictions, and sentencing in France, that Armenians had made threats against Turkish communities around the world, did we contact the Turkish Embassy here to discuss with them the possible necessity of additional security being provided for them during this rather high alert period?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is very short. Indeed there had been communication between the Government of Canada and the Turkish Embassy prior to this incident, at which time—that is the time of the discussions—the Turkish Embassy expressed satisfaction with the existing security arrangements in place at the direction of the Government of Canada.

EMPLOYMENT OF SECURITY OFFICERS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, given that we were aware there were threats, was there any discussion between the Government of Canada and the Pinkerton company, which provides service to various embassies around Ottawa, to determine whether or not they felt their operative in that area was capable of dealing with the additional threats which were quite clearly in place over the course of the last three weeks?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think the prudent limitation to the response there, so as not to compromise security arrangements, would be to explain to the hon. gentleman and Members of the House that the arrangements made with respect to the employment of Pinkerton security officers are by way of contract with the Pinkerton organization and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, at the direction of the Department of External Affairs.

EMBASSY ATTACKERS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a double-barrelled supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps he could answer whether or not the Pinkerton agency was made aware of the rather higher alert situation which existed, particularly for the Turkish community at this point in time. Has the Government ascertained the nationality of the two individuals who were arrested at the embassy today and determined whether or not they are residents of Canada, or residents of some other country and entered Canada for the purpose of their attack on the Turkish Embassy?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with respect to those who are now in custody, under arrest, I think the Hon. Member would agree at once that it would be quite inappropriate for them to be identified at a point in time when the information and charges being laid have not even been decided.

Mr. Deans: I am not asking for the names.

Mr. Nielsen: With respect to the details of any investigation which is at this very moment under way, it would be totally inappropriate to be discussing the nature, extent, and details of any such investigation, because that in itself would be inimicable to fair treatment of the individuals involved, having regard to our system of justice in this country.

SPACE WEAPONRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES DISCUSSIONS—STRATEGIC DEFENCE INITIATIVE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the forthcoming meetings this weekend between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States. We recognize that two hours of formal meetings are not sufficient time to cover all the vital issues, but I think the Minister would share with us the belief that, with the beginning of the Geneva arms talks today, the issue of arms control should be a matter of vital concern, particularly the position taken by the Americans.

● (1430)

With reference to that issue, I want to ask him about the statement made by the U.S. Undersecretary of Defense in front of Congress where he said that negotiators could discuss how to co-ordinate the deployment and phasing of strategic defence systems, but not negotiate about giving them up. This really runs very much against the policy of the Government that star wars should not go ahead. I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Prime Minister intends to raise with President Reagan the issue of arms control negotiations and the American position. In particular, will he make the case that the Americans should put the star wars proposal on the bargaining table and attempt to negotiate a ban on any star wars deployment?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, of course the question of arms control will be part of the discussions at the historic summit to occur this weekend in Québec city. As the Hon. Member will know, if his concern is about weapons in space, that matter is already on the negotiating agenda in Geneva, put there explicitly by Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Shultz.

GENEVA ARMS CONTROL TALKS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, it is important that the Secretary of State for External Affairs clarify this because it is quite clear, according to the U.S. Undersecretary of Defense, that the most important, crucial, and dangerous part of development in space is the star wars defence initiative. The Americans say they are not prepared to negotiate it. I ask again, will the Government undertake at that meeting to pressure and press the President to have his negotiators discuss star wars and put it on the table, so there will not be any development of that initiative in outer space and so that we can come to an agreement that will provide further stability?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, for all who wish to know the facts and wish to be guided by them, they are clearly on the table. If the Hon. Member is concerned about weapons in space, as we are, and as the Secretary of State of the United States and Mr. Gromyko are, he should know that that item is already on the agenda for discussion at Geneva.

* * *

SYSTEMS MERGER

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Government insists there is no connection between the Strategic Defence Initiative and the North Warning System. Why then are the U.S. Air Force and NORAD merging their missile, air, and space warning systems, under a new NORAD space command at Cheyenne, Colorado?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member would know that those arrangements have been in place for some long time, well before there was discussion of the Strategic Defence Initiative.

NORTH WARNING SYSTEM—REVIEW BY PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, the only way that we can clear the air on this is not by putting questions back and forth in the House, but to follow the former Prime Minister's suggestion of five years ago that we beef up the committees around this place, as they are in the United States. Any foreign treaty in the United States has to be ratified by the U.S. Senate.

Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs ask his Prime Minister if all the recorded minutes of the negotiations with respect to the upgrading of the North Warning System and the outcome of those discussions will be placed before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that we, as the people's representatives, can find out exactly what is going on, the people of Canada will know what is going on, and they will be protected against any future entanglement with star wars?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the record should be quite clear as to the approach this Government has taken in practice by putting the facts before parliamentary committees. For years, the Liberal Government refused to let there be any public discussion of negotiations on the North Warning System. This Government took the initiative of putting the North Warning System publicly before a Standing Committee for review. This Government also agreed that we would accept the unanimous report of a Standing Committee of this House to allow a review of NORAD arrangements a year before the renewal of the treaty. That was our own example, not one we took from the former Liberal Government, which was not at all open to Parliament.

The Hon. Member talked about the reform that is under way under the chairmanship of the distinguished Hon. Member for St. John's East, with the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill, and others, on the committee. I believe that there will be reforms coming forward. Certainly we on this side of the House hope that, in designing reforms effective to this Parliament, we should not blindly follow the American example. We should establish Canadian examples, and not blindly follow the American example as the NDP want to do.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

COST OF ADDITIONAL CANADIAN COMPLEMENT

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will know that we asked them to appear before the committee this week. In spite of the answer the Minister of National Defence gave me last week, he is not going to appear. He gave me a positive answer last week, and the steering committee requested his presence.

Yesterday the Minister made a statement about 1,200 Canadian troops going to Europe to join the Fourth Canadian Mechanized Brigade Group based in Lahr, West Germany. Unfortunately, the Minister did not choose to make a statement in the House, in order to give Members an opportunity to clarify certain questions. I want to ask the Minister whether the $50 million to cover the cost in 1985-86 is already in the Defence Estimates, or in this new money? From where will the 1,200 military personnel be transferred? Will this require the purchase of more Leopard tanks and other support materiel?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the questions concerning cost, if the Hon. Member will refer to yesterday's press release he will have the answer. The measures will cost $50 million in the first year and about $100 million per year when the full complement has been transferred to Europe. I would think that the Hon. Member would be the last one to suggest that we should fly in the teeth of all established courtesy and make a statement publicly, with respect to this additional deployment of troops in order to fulfil our NATO commitments in Europe, without first having discussed the matter with, and having informed, the Ambassadors of our NATO allies. That took place yesterday. It was not until about 1.30, or thereabouts, that the matter was made public. Pre-distribution of the release was made to himself and his opposite number in the NDP. I really think he has nothing to complain about with respect to the manner in which the announcement was made.

PURCHASE OF EQUIPMENT

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the Minister did not answer my question. I asked him if this is new money or whether it is in the existing Estimates. He chose not to answer. I want an answer on that question.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, we are living in an open Parliament. We should have the answers. Can the Minister assure this House and all Canadians that no purchase of new equipment to which we have already committed ourselves will be adversely affected, and will the Minister put back into the Estimates, now that he is doing something about—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member has put two questions in his supplementary, and I suggest that is enough.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the equipment, I believe that the answer is in the affirmative. I will make doubly certain of that, however, and be in touch with him. With respect to the financing of the move, I have asked officials in the Department to determine what resources can be identified there in order to—

An Hon. Member: Do you know?

• (1440)

Mr. Nielsen: I hear a heckle across the way indicating that I do not know. I would invite the Hon. Member, if he were to have the responsibility of a Department with expenditures of some $10 billion, to identify at once where each dollar for each howitzer comes from. Where those resources cannot be identified within departmental references, yes, it will mean new resources.

AIR TRANSPORT

PREOCCUPATIONS OF LES GENS DE L'AIR DU QUÉBEC

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

We have been informed that the Minister has promised to look into the concerns of the Association des gens de l'air du Québec.

Could the Minister confirm, here in the House, that he will look into the matter of job transfers from Montreal to Toronto and ensure that Francophones are given a fair deal by Air Canada? What is his schedule for completing this investigation an when will the Minister be ready to submit his report?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we met with the Gens de l'air du Québec, and we gave them the assurance that we were going to approach Air Canada and take the necessary steps to ensure that both aspects of the question are considered. We are asking Crown corporations to be viable, but we must also consider principles such as bilingualism. I believe this is something the Government is anxious to maintain.

In evaluating the matter concerning Air Canada, we shall consider all aspects and take the time the corporation, the Gens de l'air and the Government will need to negotiate and formulate the best possible response to a matter which I think the Opposition would do well to consider very carefully.

AIR CANADA—FRANCOPHONES

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we want to know when the Minister is going to meet his commitments. The matter of jobs being lost requires urgent attention, and fair treatment of Francophones by Air Canada is fundamental to maintaining our national unity. When is the Minister going to complete his investigation?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, bilingualism is not something that is going to disappear during the weeks it will take us to submit a report. We are going to give the House a full report as soon as we have the assurance that all parties have been consulted and that Air Canada has been acting without ulterior motives.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DISTRIBUTION OF WORK APPLICATION FORMS

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue in his capacity as the Minister in charge of Canada Post. Will the Minister confirm or deny reports that, although Canada Post in Metro Toronto refuses to supply application forms to Canadians looking for work, those forms are obtainable by Canada Post employees for use by their friends and relatives? If this reported practice is in effect, will he assure us that this form of corporate incest will be stopped?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for asking that question. Since he first raised the matter with me some weeks ago, I have had the opportunity to speak to officials of the Canada Post Corporation who have informed us as follows. First, application forms for positions being filled through internal competitions are available only to existing post office employees; second, casual work is assigned through Canada Employment Centres for persons listed with them; and third, for members of the public who wish to obtain information or application forms, they may do so by contacting the Canada Post employment centre in each division. The employment centre for the York division is at 21 Front Street. In the Toronto area, forms may also be obtained from one of the three plants in cases of competitions that are open for outside intervention.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister could have written.

CITIZENSHIP COURTS

PRESS REPORT OF COMMENT ATTRIBUTED TO SECRETARY OF STATE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Scretary of State. Why are he and the Government attempting to intimidate Members of Parliament who use their rights of free speech by having the Government exert retribution on members of MPs' families as was done when the Government did not reappoint Citizenship Court Judge Geraldine Copps? The reason given for that to the press by the Secretary of State was, in the Secretary's words:

You check the record. What her daughter has had to say about the Government.

Why are the Government and the Minister operating in contempt of Parliament when it comes to the rights of Members of Parliament to speak freely in the way one has spoken in this particular case?

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would like to—

An Hon. Member: It's not funny.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I presume Hon. Members meant the question seriously and would like to hear the answer.

An Hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Then stop yelling.

Mr. McLean: Mr. Speaker, I would like to invite the Hon. Member to pose a serious question to which I could give a serious response. If the Hon. Member thinks that I am in any way about to restrict Members of Parliament, or cast any aspersions on their rights, then the Hon. Member would surely like to lay a charge of some sort. However, an innuendo which appeared in the news media is hardly a source on which to lay such a serious charge. Under those circumstances, I think that is the only response I wish to make.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, when the Kitchener-Waterloo Record sent reporter Phil Bass to interview the Minister yesterday to see if he would clarify the remarks I have just quoted, why did the Minister add this comment:

—just have a look at her comments—

He was referring to the words of the Hon. Member of Parliament for Hamilton East. How can the Secretary of State find it possible to rise and speak of innuendo while I am speaking about his direct quotes, as reported in the papers, indicating that he and the Government are carrying out a policy of retribution against family members of Members of Parliament who use their rights of free speech, to which they are entitled as Members of Parliament?

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will be aware that there has been a campaign mounted and there have been a number of representations made from all sources regarding appointments which Government has the responsibility to make. In the process, in relation to the subject matter about which comments are made, a great deal is said. In the case at hand, I have indicated that the appointment of Judge Copps was terminated—or rather was not terminated but came to—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McLean: If Hon. Members will allow me to continue, her appointment expired. On behalf of the Government, I thanked her for her services. I personally have seen the quality of her experience throughout the years and I feel that it is very unfortunate that, through the pages of the news media, such a fine record of service should somehow be impugned.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DOMTAR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The Prime Minister said last week that he intends to help Domtar by means other than a direct federal subsidy. Yesterday the Minister ruled out any possibility of financial assistance. Can the Minister be more specific and tell the House whether his Government will help Domtar by purchasing company shares, or by other means, such as extending a loan?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am sure most Members of the House would agree that these questions are becoming most repetitive. I dealt with the subject yesterday. There is nothing further to add.

DEFINITION OF CROWN CORPORATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same Minister. We will keep asking questions until we get answers.

Yesterday the Minister contradicted the Prime Minister when he said that his Department would not reconsider the definition of Crown corporation, a Bay Street-inspired definition which discriminates against Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member knows that preambles are not permitted in supplementary questions. Would the Hon. Member please put his question?

[Translation]

Mr. Robinson: Can the Minister explain to the House the contradiction between his position and that of the Prime Minister with respect to this important question of the definition of Crown corporation?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would again say to the Hon. Member that there is no contradiction. I made that clear yesterday. I would ask the Hon. Member to please read Hansard before he poses the same question that another Member put yesterday.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PETRO-CANADA

SALE OF COME-BY-CHANCE OIL REFINERY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. She will know, in response to an invitation by Petro-Canada, that six companies have posted a $100,000 bond to bid on the sale of the Come-By-Chance oil refinery. Will the Minister please tell us when Petro-Canada will decide on the successful bidder for the sale of that refinery? As well, will she confirm that Petro-Canada is in the final stages of negotiating the sale of that refinery to a company whose intention it is to dismantle the facility and take it out of the province?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this question was raised yesterday. I wish to assure the Hon. Member that the process of tendering will not close until May 1. Clearly, in a commercial transaction such as this, no decision would be made until Petro-Canada analyzes the bids after May 1. I can only assure him, at this moment, that all options are open for the Come-By-Chance refinery.

REQUEST THAT SALE BE HALTED

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, until the provincial election is over, all options will be open. The fact of the matter is that six companies have posted bonds, and all of them will dismantle that refinery.

If all options are open, will the Minister consider—because every single bidder wants to dismantle the refinery—placing a freeze on the sale of that refinery until such time as a study has been done to determine whether or not it is feasible to rehabilitate that refinery to ensure that Hibernia oil is used, and refined, in order that jobs will be created in the Province of Newfoundland? As Clause 54 of the Atlantic Accord now stands, Newfoundlanders will see Hibernia oil lost forever to the province, just as the hydro power in Churchill Falls is now lost. Will she answer?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am rather at a loss to decide which question, of the three or four questions I was asked, to answer, and I hope that I have your indulgence in attempting to do that.

First, Clause 54 of the Atlantic Accord does not do what the Hon. Member suggests. It was negotiated at a time when, of course, the Come-by-Chance refinery was there. The word in the accord is "facility", which takes into account the capacity of Newfoundland to process 100,000 barrels a day. There is a facility.

In terms of the analysis about which he spoke, that has already been done by Petro-Canada. An analysis of the refinery has been done. On the basis of that analysis, Petro-Canada has invited tenders to determine the future of the refinery. As I have already said, there is no information which would indicate that everyone wants to mothball the refinery. The information I have is that all options are open, and they will remain so after the Newfoundland election.

IMMIGRATION

DENIAL OF REFUGEE STATUS TO MR. ABDUL MUSSA OF SOMALIA

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Minister is aware of the public concern over the decision of Canada's immigration service to compel a Somali refugee claimant, Mr. Abdul Mussa, to return two days from now to Somalia, where he claims he will be persecuted. Will the Minister tell the House why—if Mr. Mussa's relatives in Somalia are recognized by Amnesty International as prisoners of conscience, and his tribe is known to be persecuted there, and he has demonstrated publicly against his Government—he has been denied refugee status?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with regard to this case, the individual in question has been ordered deported through the normal processes. I cannot interfere with that deportation order. Therefore, the individual will be required to leave the country. He can reapply, from wherever he happens to be, to come back into the country. At that time, his application will be considered.

REQUEST THAT DEPORTATION BE DEFERRED

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister arrange for the deferral of his removal so that he can go to a third country, and not to Somalia, from which he could make his application?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, certainly that could be considered, and I will undertake to look at it.

TORONTO—THIRD TERMINAL PROPOSAL

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The Minister will know that he has been under pressure from the City of Mississauga, and others in the Toronto area, to increase terminal capacity at the Toronto international airport. Has he any plans to allow a third terminal to be built? If he has no plans for his own budget, will he allow private investors to build a third terminal on a lease-back basis?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that issue is currently being considered by officials of Transport Canada. As well, all options are being considered.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

AMERICAN OFFERS TO DOMTAR

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, and I may add that this time it is an entirely new question. As a result of his rigid and arrogant attitude, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion may be giving away $1.2 billion to the Americans. I would like to ask the Minister whether he is aware that Domtar is being wooed by its American friends who are promising the company guaranteed access to American markets, lower interest rates, lower construction costs and some very attractive inducement, as high as 20 per cent. Has the Minister considered the fact that Domtar has the option of investing in the United States if he persists in refusing to see the light?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member no doubt knows, that type of possibility was raised by Domtar. Domtar told us about the type of inducement which might be offered in various areas or States in the United States. Frankly, there is no reason for them to do that. As I indicated yesterday, we would welcome the plant being built. I would only suggest to the Hon. Member that he should be patient. If there is further news on the matter, we will certainly advise him. But, as of now, the matter is in the position which I indicated yesterday.

DOMTAR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, there may be no connection, but the Minister must be aware of the fact that Great Lakes, MacMillan Bloedel Limited and Abitibi-Price have made considerable investments in the United States in recent years. I do not see why Domtar would not be interested.

Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister. Could he give the House the assurance that his Government will never let Domtar leave Windsor to go to the United States, considering the fact that the Americans are offering inducements?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Hon. Member that when there is new news on this question he will be one of the first to hear.

Oral Questions

VIA RAIL

MAINTENANCE AND REPAIR WORK

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The Minister will be aware of the concern of railway shop crafts regarding the present and future of VIA repair work. At one point it seemed that there was an option that VIA would contract repair work to Bombardier. Could the Minister of Transport confirm that that is no longer an option and that railway workers, who are concerned about the present and future of VIA repair and maintenance, can be assured that they will continue to do that work by an arrangement between CN and VIA?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I can give the Hon. Member that assurance. The option of contracting service work to Bombardier was considered by the Rail Passenger Action Force and, indeed, the management of VIA Rail. But I believe it is fair to say that that option has now been dropped. It is clear that VIA Rail will want to take over a greater percentage of the maintenance work on its own. Clearly, Transcona is situated in an area, strategically and geographically, where the bulk of CN traffic is generated. As a matter of fact, 70 per cent of the tonnage which is shipped on CN occurs west of the Lakehead, so I think that Transcona has a promising and secure future. I share the concern of my hon. friend, but I can assure him that all steps will be taken to ensure that it remains a key maintenance facility in the CN network.

WINNIPEG REPAIR SHOP PROPOSAL

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): On the same topic, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister could also indicate to the House whether it is his view that the building of the new VIA Rail repair shop, which at one point was scheduled to be built in Winnipeg, has not been completely foreclosed? Does it still remain a possibility down the road, if not immediately, that Winnipeg being the logical place for such a facility will eventually be recognized?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe I can assure the Hon. Member as far as the future of VIA Rail maintenance facilities is concerned. It is fair to say that the project originally scheduled has been deferred. That does not mean that it is cancelled for all time. I think the most promising and encouraging fact is that this Government is taking positive steps to expand the services of VIA Rail across Canada and to restore a number of the services which were cancelled by the previous Government. That should be the most encouraging signal which has happened to date.

CLERK OF PETITIONS' REPORT

PRIVILEGE

Mr. Speaker: I have received notice of two questions of privilege. I intend to take them in the order I received them. The Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East had a question of privilege. I understand that now the Hon. Member withdraws his question of privilege. The second question of privilege is from the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Miss Copps).

ALLEGED THREATENING REMARK OF MR. McLEAN

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I am rising on a question of privilege arising from the attempt by the Secretary of State (Mr. McLean) to punish me for, or intimidate me from, the exercise of freedom of speech in Parliament, thereby committing what I believe to be a breach of the privileges of this House.

In today's Ottawa Citizen—an original of which I have here for your examination, Mr. Speaker—in responding to a question about the decision not to reappoint my mother to her position as citizenship judge, the Secretary of State replied, "You check the record. What her daughter's had to say about the Government". In other words, the Government has decided to punish me for my criticism of it in Parliament and has given this as a reason for me to avoid the same mistake in the future.

This is clear intimidation of the House, not just of one Hon. Member, but of any Hon. Member whose relatives may have dealings with this Government, in other words, every Hon. Member.

Citation 71 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition is very clear, and I quote:

> Direct threats which attempt to influence a Member's actions in the House are undoubtedly breaches of privileges.

The Minister clearly stated his threat in a direct quotation. I believe his threat affected not only my privileges but those of the House as defined in Redlich and Ilbert's Procedure of the House of Commons', Vol. 1, page 46, which reads:

> The sum of the fundamental rights of the House and of its individual Members as against the prerogatives of the Crown, the authority of the ordinary courts of law and the special rights of the House of Lords.

I believe I have established a prima facie case of breach of privilege that the matter has threatened my free speech and that of all Hon. Members, and I await the Speaker's ruling. If you find a prima facie breach of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East. I think it is quite clear that while the Government certainly has the prerogative to name whomever they wish to positions which are Governor in Council positions, by linking an appointment, or in this case the termination of an appointment, to the actions or words of an Hon. Member of this House, the Government has overstepped the bounds of propriety. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it has overstepped the long-standing rights of Hon. Members of this parliament to speak out without any fear of intimidation, whether that intimidation be direct or indirect.

It is not a question of dealing with the merits of any given appointment. Certainly the Minister himself has recognized that in this particular instance the appointee has served with distinction on the Citizenship Court. One can have one's own views with respect to the methods of appointment to that court but, Mr. Speaker, by linking, as the Minister has done, an appointment which is in the discretion of the Government, with the outspokenness of a particular individual, we in this caucus believe that the Government has potentially threatened the rights and privileges of all Hon. Members of Parliament. I support, therefore, the Hon. Member in calling for this matter to be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in response to the question of privilege which has been raised, I would like to indicate that I have at no time, in any way, threatened the freedom of speech of the Hon. Member or made a threat against her. In the process of taking words which are said in a new context, I would indicate that with respect to the subject at hand there were many representations. In fact, there was great freedom of speech surrounding the subject. The news media had been filled with it. There were ample opportunities for freedom of speech, including those opportunities in the House of Commons, and these representations had been brought to the attention of the Government. I would subscribe, however, Mr. Speaker, that far from threatening, one was affirming the open process around the appointments and the fact that these were brought to the attention of the Government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the request for a ruling that there is a prima facie case of privilege which was raised by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps). I quote from the article in question which appears in today's Ottawa Citizen:

> Asked in an interview whether the Cabinet decision to not reappoint Copps—

That is Mrs. Geraldine Copps.

> —was politically motivated, McLean—

That is the Secretary of State.

> —replied, "You check the record. What her daughter's had to say about the Government".

Mr. Speaker, in rising a few moments ago to comment on the request by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East that you rule that this matter involves a prima facie breach of privilege, the Secretary of State (Mr. McLean) was very careful not to deny the accuracy of the press report in question. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, I submit that privilege is involved in this matter, but not as a result of the Government's decision as such not to reappoint Mrs. Geraldine Copps. As the Secretary of State has suggested, he received a lot of advice on the matter, including advice from the Mayor of Hamilton and the senior Member of Parliament from the area, the Hon. Member for Hamilton Wentworth (Mr. Scott). It arises from the statement of the Secretary of State—which he has not denied—to the effect that the decision not to reappoint Judge Copps was as a result of the judge's daughter's attempts to fulfil her responsibilities as she sees them as an Hon. Member of the House of Commons. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the Government has decided to punish the Hon. Member for Hamilton East for her criticism of it in Parliament and has given this as a reason for her and others to avoid the same mistake in the future.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a clear intimidation of the House, not of just one Hon. Member, but an intimidation of any Hon. Member whose relatives may have dealings with this Government, in other words, every Hon. Member of this House.

I would again like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 71. It is very clear, and I quote:

> Direct threats which attempt to influence a Member's actions in the House are undoubtedly breaches of privileges.

Mr. Tobin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is important that all Hon. Members listen to the point of privilege being raised.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1510)

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, Redlich and Ilbert's Procedure of the House of Commons gives the accepted definition of privilege. It reads:

> The sum of the fundamental rights of the House and of its individual Members as against the prerogatives of the Crown, the authority of the ordinary courts of law and the special rights of the House of Lords.

Erskine May's Twentieth Edition goes on from this point at length to establish the ancillary nature of privilege and to develop the meaning of immunities.

Freedom of speech is clearly established as one of the privileges assigned through the House to its Members. Any attempt to punish or harm a Member for using this freedom of speech or to intimidate a Member from using it is a breach of privilege.

So I say, in conclusion, that the action of the Government, through the Secretary of State (Mr. McLean), taken on its own, may not look like a retribution regarding any activities in Parliament by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms.

Copps). However, the words of the Secretary of State, which he has not denied although he has been given opportunity to do so in this House, indicate that they were intended to be such. In making the statement on the record for the press, or even if he did not make it on the record, it was clearly intended that the Hon. Member for Hamilton East and all other Members should be intimidated from speaking in a negative manner about the Government. Therefore I submit, on the basis of the facts and, more important, on the basis of the precedents, that the Hon. Member for Hamilton East has in fact created an argument justifying your finding that there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be relatively brief in connection with this matter because I think we all appreciate that the right of freedom of speech in this Chamber is paramount. I simply draw your attention to a couple of what are I think very germane points.

It has not been our habit, practice or tradition to base questions of privilege on newspaper reports. They are not affidavits. We all understand that they are interpretative pieces with respect to alleged statements and they are put into a certain context in an editorial sense. Having said that, I think nothing can be clearer than the statement made by an Hon. Member in this House, namely, the Secretary of State (Mr. McLean), a distinguished and Hon. Member of Parliament. In that statement he categorically and unequivocally stated, when confronted by this alleged statement, that it was not in fact true, and there was no statement made, either directly or indirectly, for the purpose of intimidating the Hon. Member.

Some Hon. Members: When did he say that?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is precisely what the Hon. Secretary of State has said. I am sorry this may offend the sensibilities of members of the Liberal Party, but I simply say that one has to listen to what the Secretary of State has said. He said that there was no intention to intimidate, the statement was taken out of context, and it was absolutely incorrect and false. Furthermore, the Secretary of State went to the unprecedented length of conveying directly to Mrs. Copps his congratulations for the manner in which she had carried out her duties. What could be a better and more direct example of the bona fide of the Secretary of State with respect to this whole matter? He had no intention of doing anything but praising Mrs. Copps for the work she had done. I think this is admirable.

The point I am making is very simple. In order to determine that there is a question of privilege, there has to be evidence of a direct attempt to thwart freedom of speech in the House of Commons by a Member of Parliament. Clearly this is contrary to the facts we have here. We have a Secretary of state who has clearly indicated that the matter was taken out of context and that he has done nothing. He stood in his place in this House and made that statement. As you will fully appreciate, the rule is that we are to accept a statement made by a Member when he stands in his place and makes a statement with respect to the fact they have taken a certain course of action and there was no malice intended and no malice in fact occurred. So I say to you that if an Hon. Member does stand in his place, regardless of which side of the House he is located in, it is a tradition of this House that we accept his word. We do not go around in a mealy-mouthed way to try to interpret him in a way which suits our purpose. This is an Hon. Member, he has stated his position, I stand behind him, and I think Members of the House should stand behind him as well when he has withdrawn categorically.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I think Members will know from the length of time I have allowed these presentations to go on that I regard it as a serious matter. As Members would expect, I want to read and examine very carefully exactly what has been said in the House today prior to rendering a judgment. For that purpose I intend to reserve my judgment on this matter.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-3, an Act to implement conventions between Canada and the Republic of Zambia, Canada and the Kingdom of Thailand, Canada and the Republic of Cyprus, and Canada and the Federative Republic of Brazil for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADA PENSION PLAN

TABLING OF REPORT ON FUNDING

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 46(2), I am pleased to table in both official languages a document entitled A Report to the Minister of National Health and Welfare from the Canada Pension Plan Advisory Committee on the Funding of the Canada Pension Plan.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE SEPARATE REPRESENTATION FOR LABRADOR

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-228, an Act respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, it is my intention today to introduce a Bill which will establish a separate geographic riding for the area known as Labrador. Labrador is a distinct geographical entity with clearly defined boundaries. It stands historically, culturally, socially, logistically and politically apart from the rest of the province. I believe that this legislation is supported by the people of Labrador and I hope this House will send it to committee for further investigation and study.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-229, an Act to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to amend the Railway Act to require all railways operating within the provinces to comply with the environmental and safety standards of those provinces. Specifically it would require seeking provincial authority for any spraying that takes place on rights-of-way.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 44, 215 and 264.

CHILD BATTERY SYNDROME

Question No. 44—Mr. Howie:

Did the Government undertake, or has it initiated in the current fiscal year, any studies relating to the effect of child battery syndrome and, if so (a) are the studies to be carried out by outside consultants and in what time frame (b) was any amount allocated to the studies and, if so, what amount?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Justice and National Health and Welfare as follows:

The Department of Justice has not undertaken in the current fiscal year, any studies relating to the effects of the child battery syndrome. Nevertheless, the Department had allocated a contribution of $23,395 to the Canadian Council on Children and Youth for the purpose of conducting a national consultation on the Report of the Committee on Sexual Offences Against Children and Youth. The allocation covered the time period from March, 1984 to October, 1984.

The following projects have been carried out by private organizations in the fiscal year 1984-85:

1. A three-year $2.2 million National Study on Sexual Offences Against Children and Youth, (chaired by Dr. Robin Badgley), was carried out by an outside consultant from 1981 to 1984. The Department of National Health and Welfare's contribution in 1981-82 was approximately $22,000, and 1980-81, $68,000. The findings of this study were released by joint press release on August 22, 1984, by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Justice.

2. "Parent Enrichment Project". A project funded by the National Welfare Grants Program intended to demonstrate how support to parents can prevent the incidence of recidivism of child abuse. Duration: 1979-85 (approximately). Funding in 1984-85: $7,000.

3. "Intervention for Women Sexually Victimized in Childhood". Project designed to assess which therapeutic models are best suited to reinstate mental health and social functioning in victims. Funded by the National Welfare Grants Program. Duration: 1983-87. Funding in 1984-85: $50,400.

4. "Parent and Child Therapy". The purpose of this project was to demonstrate an intensive long-term treatment program for abusive parents and their pre-school children. Funded by the National Welfare Grants Program. Duration: 1979-85. Funding in 1984-85: $7,000.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—FEMALE EMPLOYEES

Question No. 215—Mr. Howie:

As of the last date for which information is available, what proportion of the employees of the Department of Agriculture were women?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): 26.2 per cent.

Order Paper Questions

PROJECTS BUILT BY ROGER DAVIDSON

Question No. 264—Mr. Heap:

1. What is the total capital cost of the buildings Roger Davidson has built under Section 56.1 of the National Housing Act?

2. How many units did he build?

3. Did he specify a development fee in respect of each such project and, if so, what was the total of such fees?

4. Who are the members of the board of directors of each non-profit project?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Labour): I am informed by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as follows:

1. Roger Davidson has not personally built any projects under Section 56.1 of the National Housing Act. However, construction companies have acted as contractors on a number of projects sponsored by various credit unions on whose behalf Roger Davidson has acted as a consultant. The total capital cost of these projects is $177,119,445.

2. Three thousand, one hundred and fifty-seven units have been built or are being built in projects in which Mr. Davidson is involved.

3. No.

4. See list below. The board members shown are the most current listings available to CMHC, but may not represent the present board members.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hnatyshyn for Mrs. McDougall that Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, when this debate was adjourned earlier today I was saying that loans made by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, otherwise known as the World Bank, are made on commercially related terms. In 1960, the International Development Association was established in order to enhance the work of the World Bank in the least developed countries of the world. Again, Canada was a founding member. The purposes of the International Development Association are generally the same as those of the World Bank, but because the assistance is directed at the poorest countries, the terms of IDA loans are more concessionary. Low income countries cannot afford commercial loans or the near-commercial terms of the IBRD, so IDA credits are made to member governments with a 10 year grace, a 50 year maturity, no interest, and a small service fee.

The International Finance Corporation was established in 1956 to assist the economic development of less developed countries by promoting growth in the private sector of their economies and helping to mobilize domestic and foreign capital for this purpose. The Bill before us will also allow the IFC to borrow in Canada on the same basis as the World Bank. As the world has changed, the activities of the World Bank have changed too. In the past, the World Bank financed capital infrastructures such as roads, railways, telecommunications, ports, power facilities and so on. Its present development strategy places more emphasis on investments that can directly affect the well-being of the poor people in developing countries by making them more productive and by integrating them as active partners in the developing process.

Since 1980, the bank has also carried on a program of structural adjustment lending. This program was developed in response to the severe economic difficulties in developing countries and supports specific policy changes and institutional reforms designed to achieve a more efficient use of resources in the client country, and thereby lay the basis for future growth while also contributing to a more sustainable balance of payments.

All this good work, like any human endeavour, does not go smoothly all the time. Under the IDA rules there is an agreement whereby if the United States does not meet its full share of the requirements of IDA, other countries do not have to contribute their full share. That is, they can cut back on a pro rata basis comparable to the United States. In 1982, the United States cut back very significantly. If other countries had cut back on a similar basis, the result would have been very serious indeed. However, the consensus at the World Bank meetings in Toronto in September of that year was that the amount IDA requested was appropriate, and so other countries scrambled to maintain the system.

I had the honour of being a delegate to the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1981. That particular session of the United Nations was on where the conflict between the views of the newly-elected Reagan administration and those of some underdeveloped countries was very sharply delineated.

The differences of opinion continued, and in September, 1983 when the discussions began at the IMF-IBRD meetings in Washington about the seventh replenishment of the International Development Association, the United States again contributed less than expected. Some American officials have expressed fears that if countries already in difficulty find it easy to borrow, this will distract them from making necessary changes to improve efficiency in their own domestic policies. On the other hand, the poorer countries which suffered particularly during the world recession became more frantic and angry in their demands that the industrialized countries help them. This indeed was sometimes difficult for people in industrialized countries to understand since they themselves were having a difficult time.

It has been said that a "dialogue of the deaf" is now going on between the so-called North and South, with the industrialized nations wanting to give less money—Mr. Speaker, I am having a little trouble hearing myself. I wonder if the gentlemen on your right could reduce the noise by a few decibels?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask Members to please listen to the Hon. Member's speech.

Miss Nicholson (Trinity): They don't have to do that, Mr. Speaker. They can just continue their conversation in slightly lower tones of voice.

It has been said that a "dialogue of the deaf" is now going on between the so-called North and South, with the industrialized nations wanting to give less money with more conditions and requirements while the less developed countries want more money and fewer conditions. I think that those of us who have travelled in Third World countries generally come back with the feeling that the need surely is for more money and more guidance and assistance in using it to their best advantage.

As the world emerges from a recession, recovery has been particularly slow for the heavily indebted middle-income countries and for the impoverished nations of Africa. Clearly the existing problems of debt and poverty will remain as long as capital flows to developing countries remain inadequate, trade barriers remain high, and inefficient domestic policies remain untouched.

Multilateral financial organizations are in particularly favourable positions to link capital flows to developing countries with performance requirements and assistance to meet those requirements. Money alone will not help developing countries, although indeed they badly need additional financing. However, financial assistance without performance requirements and monitoring, as has happened both in commercial lending and with bilateral or country-to-country assistance, has led to inefficient investment. Sovereign nations do not usually easily accept attempts by other nations to influence their policies, hence it is difficult to put conditions on bilateral aid. Commercial bank lending to developing countries which increased so rapidly in the seventies, was also not sufficiently buttressed by performance requirements. Commercial lenders evaluated the credit worthiness of their borrowers for individual, often short-term, loans, but did not adequately monitor either how the funds were used or the countries' long-term policies and prospects.

The multilateral financial institutions, however, have proven that they can design, evaluate, and supervise adjustment in the developing countries in ways which are acceptable to the country concerned. Every World Bank loan and IDA credit has conditions and is also complemented by a more general macroeconomic dialogue with each borrowing country about its economic prospects and policies. Now when so many developing countries are struggling to revive economic growth, the Bank's dialogue with borrowers on broad issues of economic policy has become more important than ever.

The Bank today is keenly aware that attempts to revive economic growth without attention to income re-distribution can result in little improvement for the poor, and could lead to widening gaps between rich and poor in the recipient countries. In its lending and its research, therefore, the Bank has worked toward improving the situation of the poor. Approximately one third of all World Bank loans now focus on projects that especially benefit the poor. These loans too are stringently monitored and are subject to conditions.

In April 1984, I heard Munir P. Benjenk, Vice President of the World Bank address this issue at the Lisbon Conference of the Council of Europe as follows:

> Obviously conditionality implies hard, sometimes hot disagreements. But what makes World Bank conditionality work as well as it does is that our borrowing member countries consider the Bank a friend and partner in their development efforts. The Bank's conditions are associated with long-term finance, are a natural complement to the IMF's conditionality and its short-term finance. This is particularly true of the Bank's non-project lending for structural adjustment and sectoral development, which recognizes that major reforms in developing countries can only take root if they are implemented gradually over a number of years, and are financed in parallel with closely monitored implementation.

The World Bank's size, experience and global perspective give it some advantage in analysing a country's economy, and increasingly now we are seeing some other investors, the Regional Development Banks, and the Commercial Banks sometimes, use the World Bank's analysis to help in decision-making.

I would like to refer now to the debate on the Bretton Woods Bill in this House in 1982. The Present Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) who was then the Opposition critic, said:

> I believe the Government of Canada should assess its position very carefully on an on-going basis. Can we continue to play as large a role as we have in supporting these multilateral institutions. If our economic performance continues the same, if we continue to have a weak economy . . . we in Canada may have to cut back.

I have nothing against the Hon. Minister's suggestion that the Government of Canada assess its position very carefully on an on-going basis. Obviously situations change and it sometimes is necessary to modify policies accordingly. However, I sincerely hope that the Government will not consider cutting back on foreign aid at this particular time.

Nearly 800 million people are living in absolute poverty; more than 600 million will still be in this condition as the world enters the next century. We have a moral obligation to help tackle the problems of poverty, hunger, and lack of education, which are all too prevalent in our world. Not only do we have a moral obligation to help, but it is clearly in our own interests to do so.

Because of our interdependence, we need to work for recovery in the world economy so that the benefits of the recovery can spread to all countries. Clearly, resumption of sound, lasting growth among industrialized nations will help developing countries.

But we, too, are helped by increasing prosperity in poor and distant countries. The North-South Institute here in Ottawa, for instance, estimates that the economic malaise in Third World countries has played a large part in a drop-off of Canadian exports and a loss of 135,000 jobs here.

Finding the correct balance between aid, trade and investment is a matter on which the international community can and must work together.

Aid, whether bilateral or multilateral, is still essential and will be for some time.

Trade is at least as important as aid in the promotion of development. Export earnings account for the major part of most developing countries' international purchasing power. During the recession from which we are emerging, these earnings were particularly badly squeezed between a contraction of the market for exports and the fall in the prices of the commodities on which so many developing countries rely heavily. This squeeze, bad enough as it would have been by itself, took place at a time when high interest rates have been the norm and when, unlike their impressive economic performance after the first oil shock of 1973, the developing countries were finding it particularly difficult to cope with high oil prices prevailing since 1979. Many have been faced with mounting debt repayments.

We all recognize the importance of maintaining an open and orderly international trading system. This will be promoted by assisting the developing countries to build up their economies and invest in the future so that eventually they will be less dependent on external assistance. Foreign investment and bank lending are of course extremely important to many developing countries.

We must not forget, however, that no matter how helpful, and indeed invaluable, aid, trade, and investment are, there can be no real and sustained economic progress in developing countries unless their own governments pursue appropriate policies. As I said earlier, it usually proves more acceptable for the multilateral institutions than for a donor country to discuss policy issues with a recipient but still sovereign nation. The process of negotiation is all important so that obstacles to progress are removed with goodwill by mutual agreement.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to comment briefly on the interdependence between arms reduction and development. As the international arms race is brought under control, resources can be freed for international development and other productive uses.

I know that Hon. Members on all sides of the House will join with me in the hope that the talks in Geneva will be fruitful and that when we next discuss Canada's contribution to the World Bank it will be in the context of a world where progress has been made toward armament reduction and toward peace in the future.

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements and to repeal and amend other Acts as a consequence.

The Bill actually deals with three closely affiliated international development institutions. One is the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, commonly called the World Bank. Second is the International Development Association which is basically the soft window of the World Bank. Third is the International Finance Corporation.

In particular what the Bill is doing, and with this we really have no quarrel, is to provide legislative authority for Canada's participation in the International Finance Corporation. This legislative authority had never been provided before. Pursuant to the June 12, 1981, ruling of Madam Speaker Sauvé regarding budget items in the 1981-82 Estimates, it became necessary to provide legislative authority for the International Finance Corporation. Of course, we have no quibble with that.

A second purpose of the Bill is to consolidate legislative authority for the three organizations and the one statute, that is the World Bank, the International Development Association, and the International Finance Corporation. We have no difficulty with that. Indeed we are grateful that the Bill should be brought before the House at all. Therefore, we are happy for the technical reasons, for it being brought before the House. It provides Hon. Members with an opportunity to assess the value of our participation in the World Bank and other organizations, to take stock of their activities, and to determine to what extent they are providing real development assistance to developing countries and promoting a more equal balance between North and South.

We in this Party feel that this kind of reassessment is fundamentally important and particularly crucial now in view of the vast changes in the international economic order over the last decade. Because of these changes and the crucial importance of international financial institutions and Canada's role in them, we are very distressed by a third aspect of the Bill which will possibly make this the last occasion on which we will be able to debate these matters.

As was pointed out by the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), although she does not seem as worried about this as I, the new Clause 6 alters the means by which parliamentary approval for providing funds to these organizations is obtained. Formerly, an amended Act had to come before the House of Commons for approval to be granted in the provision of funds for these organizations. These approvals would now be sought annually by virtue of Clause 6 through the Estimates rather than through amendments to the Act itself. I gather this would not apply to the International Monetary Fund. It is not included because there is no need to increase its special drawing rates in this legislation. What is included and is of particular concern to us is the World Bank, the International Development Association and the International Finance Corporation.

I wonder how many Hon. Members realize that this is in effect what was done with regional development banks back in March 1983. Instead of having to come every year or two years to the House of Commons for replenishment, enabling us to have a debate and enabling us to go to committee and discuss many aspects of the operations of regional development banks, after Bill C-130 was passed that was the end of Parliament having any opportunity to discuss the operations of regional development banks and such related funds as the International Fund for Agricultural Development and the Common Fund for Commodities. From that moment on, the provision of funds to the banks and other funds was through the Estimates, not through special amended Acts of the House of Commons. In retrospect it was a mistake. We should not have allowed it to take place in 1983. We should learn from that mistake and try to rectify the situation, not exacerbate it by making provisions, as the Bill we are discussing today does in Clause 6, that change the way in which moneys are approved for the World Bank and the IDA.

I have heard some people in finance and elsewhere argue that it is more efficient this way, that one can get the money more surely and rapidly. However, I think it must be tongue in cheek because they know the House cannot hold up this kind of Bill for very long. Compared with what goes on in other parliamentary systems, we give incredibly little attention in this House to international financial matters. We should not forego the small amount of influence we can exert through debates in the House.

I hope we will bring forth an amendment in committee which will ensure the continuation of periodic debate in the House on the World Bank and related institutions and bring back the possibility of debate in the House on other international financial institutions in addition to the World Bank, the IMF and, in particular, regional development banks.

The Government knows that we in this Party have always been very supportive of Canada's participation in multilateral institutions which share the burden of international development. As a rule we have approved very strongly in the past all multilateral approaches. However, we are increasingly concerned about what has been happening in many multilateral institutions which most Members of the House have supported in the past.

For example, we are concerned about the trend to withdraw support from these institutions. We see it being initiated by the Reagan administration in the United States. I note with particular concern Canada's position at the recent UNESCO meeting in Paris at which, it seemed to me, Canada hardened its stance, hinting that it was following the U.S. lead and possibly giving some consideration to withdrawing from UNESCO. We would be very troubled if Canada should fall in line with the trend we see taking place in the U.S. administration. If it is, it is even more important that there be a full parliamentary and public debate on all legislation affecting our participation in multilateral institutions. If we do not have that kind of debate, specifically returning to international financial institutions, then we as a Parliament will not be able to address seriously reforms which are needed in these institutions, not only to enhance the stability of industrialized nations but, even more, to enhance the economic survival of the least developed countries of the South and the political stability of all.

I hope it is not the intention of the Government to avoid altogether public and parliamentary discussion of these vital issues. In making this change in Clause 6 I think that is effectively what it is trying to do. A part of my fears is engendered by some of the references of Conservative Members in previous debates in earlier years, including the Hon. Member who is now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), suggesting or implying that Canada did not need to give, should not be giving nor continue to give support to international financial institutions such as the World Bank, IMF and regional development banks. We certainly have many criticisms of the operation of these banks, but we do not want to see the Government move out of Canada's involvement in multilateral affairs.

We are worried about removing the possibility of any parliamentary debate after this debate. That is exactly what the Government may be doing. I would urge it to look at the comments of a former Conservative Member, Douglas Roche, in the House of Commons on March 25, 1983. He did not want Canada to withdraw from its international commitments. This was during the debate on the International Development Continuing Assistance Act. That debate related to the replenishment of the funds of the regional development banks. Mr. Roche said:

> One of the reasons for the importance of debating this legislation is the fact that it is a very rare occasion when the House is seized of any sort of debate on these matters, let alone dealing with legislation having to do with Canada's role in international development. As we know, CIDA has been operating through the years without an Act of Parliament. The only time we deal in any substantial way with CIDA does as the main proponent of Canada's role in international development, is at the time of the Estimates. I am afraid that all Members of the House are too well aware of the inadequacy of the rules concerning the examination of Estimates that preclude the full treatment that important spending programs require.

I recommend to the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall), in whose name this Bill stands, that she look again at those comments of a former Conservative back-bencher.

Let me ask a very serious question. Is it the intention of this Government to abstain from addressing in any meaningful way the vital issue of international development, as it seems to be doing in failing to address our concerns about the North Warning System and star wars?

Is has been very clear for some time that reform of the international monetary and financial system is essential. It is long overdue. The creators of the Bretton Woods Agreements, could not, of course, have foreseen the extent of the changes in the world economy, the vast capital movements, the major imbalances and external payments, foreign debt, the operations of the multinational banks and corporations and the extent of global interdependence which now exists.

A great deal has been written on these matters. One book I found most interesting and helpful is entitled Towards a New Bretton Woods. The report is by a Commonwealth study group. I believe it came out in 1983. It is an excellent series of essays addressing the challenges for the world financial and trading system.

As I pointed out in previous debates, the activities of the commercial banks have undermined the developing countries through, in my view, the banks' totally irresponsible behaviour throughout the 1970s in the expenditure of their petro dollars, almost begging many of the developing countries to take easy loans, to the point of enormous over-spending with huge profits for themselves in the process. The resulting burden of debt, the effects of the world recession and the ultimate withdrawal of commercial lenders forced developing countries into almost total reliance on the International Monetary Fund and, for different purposes of course, on the World Bank.

According to the North-South Institute Review, an outlook for 1983-84, the outstanding external public debt of developing countries now exceeds $600 billion, more than double that of five years ago. Of this, 80 per cent is owed by 20 countries and fully one-third by the three largest borrowers. The balance of payment problems and the repayment of many low income countries are almost insurmountable. The debt servicing obligations and new financial outflows over the next three to four years is a net transfer of resources out of developing countries, threatening economic, social and political stability and making development and growth an impossibility.

The developing countries are now at the point where an IMF agreement has become a crucial seal of approval of credit worthiness. It has become a precondition for gaining access to other sources of finance. The growth of IMF quotas on which members' access is based have not kept pace with demand. Expressed as a percentage of world trade, IMF quotas have fallen from a peak of 13 per cent in 1959 to a low of just under 4 per cent in 1982.

Furthermore, the lending policies of the five major Canadian banks, with an estimated $10.3 billion outstanding in loans to Argentina, Brazil and Mexico, reflect this trend. All now attach high priority to restraining outstanding developing country loans and to expanding their lending activity in such high growth areas as the United States and the Pacific Rim. Also, and this is as important as either of the two previous points I have mentioned, no new issues of IMF special drawing rights have been allocated to members since January 1981. In fact, a decision not to issue special drawing rights in 1983 was taken due to U.S. opposition.

Along with inadequate IMF resources, more stringent conditions and performance criteria have been placed on developing countries seeking assistance. The IMF harsh stabilization programs are designed to correct chronic balance of payment deficits by reducing demand for imports while simultaneously boosting exports. Reduced internal demand is sought by demands to cut wages, reduce state subsidies on many goods, including food, thereby raising prices and a whole host of other measures designed to reduce living standards in the developing countries.

Measures to increase exports include, among others, currency devaluations to make exports more competitive and imports more expensive, concessionary tax laws for export industries and the creation of export processing zones designed to lure export oriented multinationals looking for a cheap, tightly-controlled labour force to exploit. In many instances, these conditions have led, as we all know, to severe social consequences such as high unemployment, as well as creating artificial distortions in the balanced growth of the domestic economies. There are many cases where less developed countries that were previously net exporters of food are now net food importers because the resources have been deliberately drained from the agricultural sector.

The austerity related unrest in Brazil is a serious threat to political stability in that country. The so-called IMF riots in Jamaica are also well documented. An uprising five years ago killed 800 people. A more recent public protest left several dead. In Jamaica, the current average wage is about $12 a week. Unemployment is close to 30 per cent and inflation is also about 30 per cent. Is this what we are supporting the IMF for? I would remind Hon. Members that IMF is an integral part of this debate. Undermining its own stated purposes of promoting international monetary stability and co-operation, is that what we are doing? The big question of the IMF today is, the development is for whom? It is most probably not for the developing or lesser-developed countries of the world.

This brings me to one of the lesser amendments in the Bill before us which so far has escaped previous speakers. It is the amendment to Clause 7 which adds certain words. This clause provides that the Minister of Finance shall table reports of the agencies covered by this Bill and details of their operations which directly affect Canada. The amendment adds:

—including the resources and lending of the World Bank group, the funds subscribed or contributed by Canada, borrowings in Canada and procurement of Canadian goods and services.

We have no objection to that addition to the clause, but I am curious to know why it applies only to the World Bank group, the IDA and the IFC. Why does it not also apply to the International Monetary Fund? Just because there was no need to mention the funding of the International Monetary Fund in this particular Act does not mean that the Government could not have included the IMF in that rather more detailed reporting system provided by the amendment to Clause 7.

● (1600)

Turning now from the IMF to the World Bank, criticisms similar to the ones I have just made about the IMF can now also be made of the World Bank, which formerly was not subject to this kind of criticism to the same extent. Now the World Bank seems to have underwritten the approach of the IMF.

Hon. Members will know that the World Bank has developed really innovative structural adjustment loans which are a form of balance of payments support. However, it now appears to be making these loans conditional upon a borrower's acceptance of an IMF adjustment program. If my understanding is correct, then it is basically underwriting the approach of the IMF.

Second, regarding the IDA window of the World Bank, it seems to me that replenishments to the International Development Association of the World Bank are becoming increasingly uncertain. In 1981, the Reagan administration reduced the U.S. contribution of $3.2 billion to the sixth replenishment, commonly known as IDA-6, by deciding to stretch payment over four years rather than three. This resulted in a 35 per cent slash in lending in 1982. Fortunately, the non-American IDA deputies agreed to bridge the shortfall until IDA-7, this year, by contributing an additional $2 billion. I should like to note that this $2 billion was actually placed in a special fund which restricted procurement to the contributors and other developing countries as a symbolic show of disapproval of the position of the United States. This was quite remarkable since IDA donors only contribute in proportion to the contribution of the United States, pursuant to the 1980 agreement.

Nevertheless, the U.S. breach of the principle of burden sharing continues. At the negotiations for the seventh replenishment, the U.S. proposed a replenishment of $9 billion in response to the Bank's stated minimum amount of $16 billion. Canada and other donor countries sought a compromise of $12 billion but without success. This has precipitated the creation of another special fund for sub-Saharan Africa of $1.2 billion with $100 million coming from Canada.

The downward pressure on IDA funding levels will continue to have its most severe effects on the countries of sub-Saharan Africa, countries in which the average annual income, excluding Nigeria, was only $330 in 1979 and has since fallen .5 per cent each year in real terms. The drought-stricken countries of Africa will have little chance of escaping the tide of famine that individual Canadians are now trying to stem.

Finally regarding the World Bank and IDA, it seems likely that a modest interest charge will be levied quite soon on IDA lending, something which has never been done before, and that maturities will be reduced as a means of supplementing resources.

Surely the Canadian Government must see that the Canadian public is concerned, that many members of the Canadian public recognize the crucial nature of the problems of the developing world and the less developed countries and that they are anxious to see the Government take a leadership role by addressing these problems in Parliament. Just as Canadians have demonstrated their concern about the nuclear threat, they have also demonstrated their willingness to respond to the poverty of the Third World by donating millions of dollars to the starving in Ethiopia and the Sudan.

Another very important question relating to international lending is that of human rights. We in this Party have repeatedly urged this Government and the previous Liberal Government to require Canada's directors, and in fact all Canadian representatives at international financial institutions, to consider human rights abuses when handling loan requests. Just last month I urged the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) to live up to the Government's recent endorsement of a U.N. resolution condemning human rights violations in Chile and by advising Canada's representative at the Inter-American Development Bank to vote against a $130-million loan to that country's repressive military régime. The Minister claims that he does not want to politicize the Bank's lending criteria. The fact is that he is politicizing it when he declines to look at the human rights record of the governments in question. The Government is effectively copping out on the human rights issue, as did the Liberal Government before it.

Interestingly enough, although I was earlier critical of the Reagan administration, even the Reagan administration, under congressional pressure, abstained from voting on the loan to Chile in compliance with its own human rights legislation on international lending. Canada voted in favour of the loan. Obviously there is a need for similar Canadian human rights legislation on international lending.

A major concern of the New Democratic Party is the increasing political interference in international lending. We are particularly concerned, as I have indicated, with the frequent role of the United States in pressuring the IMF, and indeed all international financial institutions, to take a harder line with countries whose political persuasions are deemed unacceptable to the Reagan administration. That is the kind of politicization about which we and the Government should be worrying. Surely this kind of activity is in clear violation of the fundamental principles on which the international financial and trading system was founded; multilateralism, non-discrimination and openness and special concern for poorer countries.

At the World Bank, the U.S. expressed concern not over these principles but over subsidizing utopianism in reference to a loan for collective farming in Tanzania. A confidential internal bank study recommended a squeeze on funds to Nicaragua until more concessions were made to the private sector. I was appalled to learn recently that the United States Executive Director at the Inter-American Development Bank recently threatened to walk out of any meeting that even considered a loan to Nicaragua.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Ms. Jewett: That is what worries us, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure it worries the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, I am pleased to see, is present in the House. A country which has just had a democratic election with the participation of opposition parties in which the Sandinistas received almost the same percentage of the popular vote as did President Reagan, President Reagan is now calling undemocratic and the Hon. Member from the Conservative back-bench is saying "hear, hear" when I point out that the Executive Director of the IADB threatened to walk out of any meeting that even considered a loan to Nicaragua. This $58-million loan to Nicaragua is one of the most investigated loans made in IADB history and one which every other country at the Bank has approved for consideration.

I was even more startled to learn yesterday that U.S. Secretary of State George Schultz has taken the unprecedented step of personally interceding to block this loan on the grounds that it might be used to finance aggression. This kind of intervention is setting a most dangerous precedent for all multilateral institutions and for the whole concept of multilateralism. Of course, the United States administration—though I would hope not the Conservative administration in Canada—would never admit that its $1-billion cover war against the democratically elected Government of Nicaragua, together with its economic blockade of that country, is what has undermined the real economic and social reforms the Sandinista Government has struggled to achieve.

Do Hon. Members not agree that Nicaragua's land reform and literacy programs are among the best examples of a developing country which is achieving significant economic progress for its people? I would say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs agrees with that. Indeed, as we all know he has been very concerned about Canada giving assistance to the possible peace plan in the region and the Contadora process.

Nicaragua is a country which deserves not only assistance from the international financial system, but an increase in Canadian bilateral aid, which continues to be paltry in comparison with other countries in Central America which Canada aids where human rights violations continue to be an enormously serious barrier to development. It is development in the less developed countries with which we should be concerned. I am still concerned about the restoration of Canadian bilateral aid to El Salvador, because there is no evidence that the human rights situation in that country has improved. In fact, most objective observers feel that the situation has worsened.

As I said at the beginning, the international community seems to be moving further and further away from the original goals of the Bretton Woods Agreements. This, together with the weakening support for multilateral development institutions, must continue to be addressed, not only by Government but also by Parliament. I was beginning to detect that when the Conservative Party was in Opposition, and particularly in the words of the Hon. Member who is now the Minister of Finance. Of course, I do not detect that in the words of Ambassador Roche, and in the weakening support for multilateral development institutions on the part of the Reagan administration. Therefore, I would urge that this not be the last debate we have on any international financial institution.

The amendment—which I would say is the only one with which we are having serious problems—will no longer make it possible to replenish funds in international financial institutions by an Act of Parliament. From now on those funds will only be authorized in the Estimates. That is a backward step. I am sorry that step was taken in connection with the regional development banks in March of 1983. I would like to see that rectified. I hope when this Bill goes to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, that we will move to restore the Act to its earlier form, as far as parliamentary approval is concerned. I know that a member of the NDP will propose amendments to that effect.

There is not a lot we can do in this Parliament to improve the operation of the international financial institutions, the World Bank, the IMF, the regional development banks and so on. However, we can draw to the attention of Parliament some of the deficiencies which we feel exist in the operation of those institutions and some of the problems which they are creating for the developing world. In addition, we can urge the Canadian Government to do everything it can, not only to participate in and strengthen the institutions, but to ensure that those institutions are working for the well-being, growth, development and advancement of the less developed countries of the world.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre)—Regional Economic Expansion (a) Domtar—Negotiation of solutions between Prime Minister and Premier Lévesque (b) Domtar—Minister's position; the Hon. Member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson)—Agriculture (a) Potato inspection fees (b) Request for postponement; the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy)—Federal-provincial Fiscal Arrangements (a) Size of equalization payments (b) Request for changes in formula.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. McDougall that Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to address my comments in support of Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof.

The Bill has three main parts. The first part is housekeeping, concerning the consolidation of legislative authority for the three affiliates of the World Bank group; that is the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Development Association and the International Finance Corporation, to be brought under one Act. In fact, this Bill repeals the Act which relates to the International Development Association and incorporates all the references and agreements to that association into the Bretton Woods Agreements Act.

The second matter dealt with in the Bill is the question of providing legislative authority for Canada's participation in the International Finance Corporation—the IFC. Of course, that is something, as the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett) raised a few moments ago, which is in question in the House; that is, the authority for the Government to raise money in that connection. That goes back to a very old principle. In fact, it relates back to the time of King Charles I of England and the whole issue of who had the right to rule—the King as a divine right; or Parliament. The principle enshrined in this bill is that of the Government being accountable to the people of the country through its representatives, the Members of the House.

The third matter dealt with in the Bill, which the Hon. Member for New Westminster-Coquitlam also raised as a matter of concern, is the modification of the means by which parliamentary approval for providing financial assistance to the World Bank groups is obtained. The authority for those expenditures will now be done, on an annual basis, through the Estimates, rather than through amendments to the Act. Of course, that will not eliminate the right of the Opposition or Private Members of the House to examine the amount of money being allocated for that purpose. The Estimates will still go before committees of the House. This will give Members of Parliament an opportunity to examine them closely. If there is a substantial change in the direction or policy of the World Bank group, obviously it will require a further amendment to the Act. That will mean that another Bill will have to be brought before the House, and of course that will provide an opportunity for the Opposition and all Members of the House to debate the matter.

What interests me in particular about this Bill is not the items set out in the amendment—and perhaps they could be called housekeeping items, with the exception of providing additional funds in the Estimates—but the fact that we are talking about the Bretton Woods Agreements. I think this is an appropriate time for all Members of the House to reflect on the significance which Bretton Woods had, not only in Canada but in the whole international scene. The Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) has outlined a number of those facts.

The Bretton Woods Agreements, which emanated from the Bretton Woods Conference of 1944, were aimed at bringing international order to the international economic chaos. The whole conference, which was one of six conferences that took place towards the end of the Second World War, between 1943 and 1945, tried to sort out all of the international problems, not only economic but political, which faced the world at that time. Of course, those six conferences culminated in the San Francisco Conference which enshrined the Charter of the United Nations and the United Nations Organization itself. It is rather interesting to note that in the 40th anniversary year of the United Nations, and having heard just last week from the Secretary General of the United Nations, we should be talking about one of the very significant agreements which was encompassed in that whole international scheme which we now refer to as the United Nations; the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and so on.

● (1620)

The Bretton Woods Agreements created two institutions. One was the International Monetary Fund and the other was what was then called the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, now the World Bank.

Hon. Members of the House will recall that prior to the First World War the whole of our international trade and trading arrangements were based on something which we now feel is a little strange, the gold standard. All monetary currencies were related to the gold standard and all international exchange depended on the gold standard. That system broke down, of course, during the First World War. After the First World War, between then and the beginning of the Second World War, there were attempts to re-establish the gold standard. That caused a great many difficulties as well, and as the world slipped into the Great Depression we came into a period where in order to try to seek some individual economic advantage one country after another devalued its currency as a stimulation for its economy, to the disadvantage of the other countries of the world. Of course, once one country tried that, every other country tried it as well, and that led to a period of economic international chaos.

In the process of recovery after the Second World War, the nations of the Western World tried to establish, or re-establish, some sort of international economic order. That, of course, was what the Bretton Woods Conference and Agreements was all about. That was a conference between 44 nations, as I understand it—Canada was one of those nations—that came to the agreements which are now enshrined in this Bill with which we are dealing this afternoon.

The International Monetary Fund, as has been pointed out, has had its ups and downs over the years. It has had to be modified, its policies changed in order to adapt to continuing world conditions. At the same time, the basis of all of that is the conference and the agreements which were reached at Bretton Woods in 1944.

As far as the World Bank is concerned, other Hon. Members have outlined its activities since it was founded. It was originally founded to give aid to our western allies who had been ravaged by the war. It was then expanded to give aid to some of our enemies in the war. Then it was expanded to look after Third World countries. That really was the beginning, in my mind, of all of the international aid and assistance given to underdeveloped countries in which the developed countries of the world are now involved.

This Act and the agreements which it enshrines and the conference which reached those agreements, all have a very important and significant place, not only in the history of the world but in the history of Canada. I feel we should be very proud that we played a major role in the development of the agreements. In that respect, I believe the debate today gives a good opportunity to reflect on the role we have played, not only in the international economic trading and banking communities but in the entire area of assistance to Third World countries. I hope we will pass this Bill in a hurry, Mr. Speaker, but in doing so, I do not feel we should ever forget the true significance to this world of the Bretton Woods Conference and the Bretton Woods Agreements.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I had to leave momentarily as I may have missed hearing the Hon. Member speak about something I am going to ask him. Does the Hon. Member realize that if the Bill remains as it is now this will be the last chance we will have to debate IMF, World Bank and International Development Association matters in this House?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I wish the Hon. Member had not left the House because I did comment on that point. I indicated, first, that while there would not be an opportunity to debate individual increases in funding as amendments to the Act, there certainly would be an opportunity in committee to discuss the estimates themselves. In addition, if there is some major policy change, that obviously would have to be brought forward as an amendment to the act. In so doing, there would be a chance to fully debate any major change in the structure or policy in that way.

In my view, while I understand what the Hon. Member is saying, it seems to me that there will be an opportunity for that in the future. In fact, I believe all Hon. Members of this House hope that the committee or the task force on reform may also have some thoughts about providing a more meaningful way of dealing with the estimates. In all of those ways we will have an opportunity to deal with this issue, I am sure, on many more occasions.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I share the Hon. Member's hope that the committee system and particularly the examination of estimates will become much more effective than it has been in the past. However, with respect to the larger concerns we all have about the international development, about which the Hon. Member was speaking, he surely is putting it on pretty flimsy ground when he counts on some day having an amendment which would have to come before the House. I would hope that the Hon. Member would prefer some assurance that we would have that opportunity at periodic intervals.

I wonder if the Hon. Member has had a chance to read an earlier speech I made when he was doing his background work for his own speech today? It was a couple of years ago. In my speech I asked for a series of very explicit reports which would be made to the standing committee on the operations of not only the World Bank and the IDA but also on the regional development banks such as the Inter-American Development Bank. Would the Hon. Member join me in some other forum in encouraging that the fuller reports which are now going to be made possible from the World Bank be extended to the other development banks?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I did not have the opportunity beforehand of either hearing or reading the Hon. Member's comments in her previous speech. However, I understand the point she is making. In her own remarks she referred to Clause 7 of the Bill which does provide for the tabling of a number of different reports, those particularly from the World Bank Group. While it does state in Clause 7 of the Bill that those annual reports in particular should be tabled in Parliament, it indicates that it does not exclude other reports. In fact, the wording is "including" the resources and lending of the World Bank Group. It does not in my view exclude the ability to table all the other reports as well. So I think that even within the wording of the Bill as it now stands that opportunity should be present, and hopefully all that material will be tabled on a regular basis. All of us will have an opportunity to discuss it at that time.

I am sure the Hon. Member does not suggest that at some stage we should be holding up funding by having to present an amendment to the Bill which might be delayed. The Estimates certainly are a speedier method of providing the funding which I know the Hon. Member wants to see for these international banking institutions.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway) has shown not only great enthusiasm for the World Bank Group, but also an obviously considerable background of information. He says that if a policy change were made it would of course come before this Parliament. I would like him to comment on a policy shift which has been noted by many commentators, such experts as Professor Cranford Pratt of the University of Toronto who commented that the IMF part of this Group has departed a long way from Article I of its Charter which says that its purpose is to facilitate the expansion and balanced growth of international trade, and to contribute thereby to the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment and real income, and to the development of the productive resources of all members as primary objectives of economic policy.

As Professor Pratt has pointed out, it is well known that the IMF imposes conditions on countries borrowing from the World Bank which contribute only to the prosperity and well-being of the lender countries and have no regard for the well-being and prosperity of the borrower countries. That is a serious shift in policy and I am asking the Hon. Member if he can tell us when that shift was debated in this Parliament.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I would have to take issue with the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap) on the shift in policy of the Bank and the IMF with respect to trying to favour the lender as opposed to trying to favour the borrowers. I am sure that if you were a borrowing nation you would feel that you were hard done by by the international banking institutions and their policies. On the other hand, the lending nations, as all of us know, have gone far out on a limb over the last few years for many of the developing nations and created some real potential difficulties for the economic stability of the more established and developed nations. I think all of us have some great concern here, hopefully not justified, about the loans which many of our own banks have made to underdeveloped nations and the jeopardy in which that puts major institutions. The widows and orphans which I and my friend are so concerned about are thereby placed in potential jeopardy. A lot of them have their money in those Canadian chartered banks.

There is obviously a balance which has to be struck here, but I think we have to take into account that there are two sides to the coin, and it will not benefit the underdeveloped nations to have the developed nations sink under the surface. The only thing that will benefit all of us is the strengthening of all our economic basis so we can all prosper, all have the employment and benefits which I know the Hon. Member would like to see right across the world on an equitable basis.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am quite concerned about the position reflected in the last remarks of the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway). I am also concerned about the shift that my colleague from New Westminster-Coquitlam has spoken about in the handling of the approval of money for the World Bank Group. Until now the Government has come to Parliament every year to ask for more money for the World Bank and its affiliates. It appears that there is now a decision to hide that from view. The Hon. Member for York East and others do not want us to continue to have a full opportunity to examine the workings of these banks. They want it squeezed into the extremely narrow confines of the Estimates debate. He admits that the present system for handling those debates is not satisfactory and he sort of hopes that everything will be all right in the future.

That confirms my uneasiness at this attempt to hide the shift in the policy of the International Monetary Fund which in fact has been quite well documented by quite a number of authorities.

The World Bank and the IMF have been shifting their policies. There is one other shift that my colleague from New Westminster-Coquitlam mentioned. The World Bank recently decided to require that its borrowers should submit to the more stringent requirements of the IMF. Previously the IMF was for the more affluent countries and the World Bank for the less affluent countries. Now the less affluent are being required to meet the same conditions as can be met and dictated by the more affluent. That is a shift in policy, open and overt. The Hon. Member for York East, who does not want to listen to it any more, is mistaken when he says there has been no shift.

There is a policy of changing the role of the IMF in the World Bank to the disadvantage of the poorer countries, and now a policy of this Government of hiding what is going on by taking it further away from public scrutiny. It will no longer be practically possible to point out, for example, how President Reagan has abused the World Bank in the ways that my colleague from New Westminster-Coquitlam just described. It will not be possible to point out how Part II of Article I of the IMF Charter has been completely disregarded. When you examine the IMF conditions applying to Jamaica you find that they provide for cutting wages, cutting public services, raising telephone rates, indeed raising all the costs the people of Jamaica have to pay and reducing their incomes. That is utterly inconsistent with the states purpose of the International Monetary Fund.

The kind of game the IMF and the World Bank are playing is not really very new, Mr. Speaker. It goes back at least 3,200 years. You find it described in the Book of Exodus in the story about how the Pharaoh, dictator of Egypt, took control of the farms, animals and even the bodies of his own subjects. We have been hearing about famine lately in several countries. The Pharaoh took advantage of a famine; he had cornered the grain in the country during the fat years, stored it up, guarded it and then doled it out to his own subjects in return for mortgages on their houses, their farms, their animals and next year's crop. They finally sold themselves into slavery to Pharaoh. That is the pattern of some 3,200 centuries ago, Mr. Speaker. It is clear in that respect that the main governors of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund have read their bibles. There are some other parts they skipped, but they read that part.

The problem with the operation of the World Bank and the IMF has been that from the beginning it was supposed to promote, as a public bank, the reconstruction and development of countries, post war and in the modern period since then. In fact, it generally serves to maintain trade agreements and to create the conditions that favour the profit oriented multinational corporations of the developed countries, and the banks of the developed countries which are the founders of the World Bank.

For example, with regard to agriculture, Robert McNamara, formerly governor of the World Bank—who should know, and whose words I wish the Hon. Member for York East would consider—said, "Throughout the developing world the rural poor have neither shared adequately in their country's programs, nor been themselves able to contribute toward them". He is saying that the development process which was guided by the World Bank has actually contributed to the destitution of the poor. In many countries the change-over from food production for local consumption to the production of cash crops for export has caused the best lands to be reserved for coffee, sugar or cotton to be exported to us, while the desert land is left to feed the people. That pattern has been repeated in the countries of Central America, in the Philippines, and many of the poorer countries in the world, under the guidance of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. It is not just under their guidance, but at their insistence.

The credit arrangements for introducing new techniques of farming, mechanization and fertilizer, squeeze out all but the largest farmers. The small farmers cannot compete. They are forced to sell their land and become tenants, shareholders and sharecroppers on the wealthy estates, or move to the cities and join the growing ranks of the unemployed squatters to whom the multinational manufacturers come to recruit their 25-cent an-hour labour.

A related pattern is seen in manufacturing. The World Bank supports the extraction of raw materials and the creation of export processing zones, which is simply another name for an arrangement to evade such laws as may have been established for the protection of labour, the environment, or even the national economy. These measures have mainly benefited the multinationals and banks of the First World countries and their agents, the elite of the Third World.

Another person in a position to know was Mahbub el Haq, former director of policy at the World Bank. He stated that in Pakistan it was discovered that, "rural urban divisions were sharper than ever and the wealth was still concentrated in the hands of about 22 families". Mr. Speaker, that is what Mahbub el Haq, former director of policy at the World Bank, thought of the effect of the World Bank on his own country.

This trickle-down effect which was supposed to come out of the capital intensive projects just did not result. According to McNamara, it is "pointless and offensive to lecture starving, illiterate, diseased people, with absolutely nothing to sell, about the magic of the marketplace". The marketplace that Mr. McNamara rejected is now being advocated by the present governor of the Bank, A. W. Clausen, a supporter of Reaganomics.

Proponents of the World Bank claim that the export earnings of countries receiving its aid and investment have increased. That may be true, however, they take care not to advertise the fact that the foreign debt of those countries has generally increased even more because of currency devaluation. That has not stopped with the invention of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, as the Hon. Member for York East would have us believe. It just means that the poorest countries are forced to devalue their currency. They are forced to import capital goods; oil, trucks and machinery, and manufacturing components, and are forced to allow the profits of that to be repatriated to countries such as the United States, which control the whole process. Countries already heavily in debt must spend more money to buy the equipment from the multinationals in order to export their own or someone else's raw materials, reworked, to these same multinationals who may then process those materials into manufactured products in still another Third World country where they can force the wages down with the help of dictators such as those that rule in the Philippines and South Korea.

The workers in both the resource producing countries and the manufacturing countries of the Third World too often must work without minimum wage, without unions, without environmental protection, without health and safety laws and with no social services under governments which arm themselves, through the good offices of the United States, against their own people to ensure that the wages and other conditions stay low.

The Hon. Member for York East referred to the danger of bankruptcy among Third World countries. He has implied that our banks loaned them those huge sums of money out of some kind of altruism or generosity. That is nonsense. Our banks loaned them the money because they could get higher rates of interest from those desperate countries than they could get from Canadian people who are not yet quite so desperate. They shopped around and begged those countries to take their loans. Countries such as Brazil, South Korea and the Philippines were considered miracles a few years ago, but recently faced bankruptcy. With the money of taxpayers of Canada and other working people of the First World the World Bank then bails out those Third World governments with a loan that they use to pay the interest on the debts to the First World banks. It is great business for our banks, and for no one else.

The World Bank requires the Third World governments to impose austerity, reducing the buying power of their workers and peasants in order to draw off greater revenues for debt repayment. I call them our banks because they have their head offices in Canada. That is the only sense in which they are our banks, because they do not serve the interests of Canada any more than they serve the interests of the Philippines, Brazil, or Mexico. As a result of that, exports from the First World to the Third World are reduced. They just cannot buy our products anymore. That in turn causes some of the unemployment experienced in countries such as Canada and the United States.

The short-term result is very often growing misery and riots or civil war in the Third World countries. That, of course, leads to another round of fiinancial crises. Bankers are understandably lacking in confidence in investments in countries where there is civil war. Therefore, they raise the interest rates even further and further reduce the buying power of the Third World people. This can only be maintained by increasing the armaments of their governments; arms not to defend those countries against the Soviet Union, but to defend those governments and banks against their own people.

Selling arms is presented to First World countries such as Canada as a remedy for unemployment among our people. The long-term result is growing unemployment and a drift toward war for the people of the First World countries such as Canada and the United States. If that is what the Hon. Member for York East considers aid to those Third World countries, who needs a disaster?

• (1650)

The IMF has taken control of World Bank loans by dictating more harsh conditions than the World Bank imposed before. This Bill removes the operation of the World Bank from public scrutiny and puts it into a corner from which I doubt that even the Hon. Member for York East, despite his goodwill, will succeed in rescuing it.

I hope that when this Bill goes to committee there will be two amendments. There is an amendment that I called for last year, or similar to what I called for last year, that Canada as a participant in the IMF and the World Bank should call for a return to the original policy as reflected in the section that I read. I will read it again, Mr. Speaker: "The World Bank and the IMF are to facilitate in the expansion and balanced growth of international trade and to contribute thereby to the promotion and maintenance of high levels of employment and real income and to the development of the productive resources of all members as primary objectives of the economic policy."

Second, I hope we can have an amendment so that Parliament will still have direct control over the very large sums of money that the working people—our taxpayers—through this Parliament are contributing to outfits like the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of the Hon. Member for Spadina (Mr. Heap). They took me back to a period a few months ago when he and I were on a panel at Upper Canada College. Some of his comments were comments that might have been made at that time. Also, some of his comments are those I have heard before on other occasions in other places. He cited a number of problems that the developing world has, problems they have had for a long time. They are not new. They are problems that have been with them and with us since the beginning of time. I am sure a good many of us, if not all, would like to see safety and health regulations in those countries; he would like to see minimum wages, and I am sure many of us would like to see the trade union movement established there more firmly. All of these things will hopefully come with time.

There have been some examples of success it seems to me in the Third World. I suggest to the Hon. Member for Spadina that perhaps Japan and Singapore might be an examples of that success. I know it may shake him to the very foundation of his soul, but notwithstanding the political systems, perhaps Taiwan is an example of some success; perhaps Hong Kong and perhaps South Korea. I know the Hon. Member would rather see some other types of political organization and political administrations in those locations, but, notwithstanding that, I am sure the Hon. Member would agree that all of those countries are somewhat better off than they were in 1944 when the Bretton Woods Conference was held.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I will take the Hon. Member's remarks, if I may, as asking whether I do not credit the World Bank and the IMF with improving the condition of impoverished countries. I do not consider what has happened in the majority of cases as typical. Granted, even countries such as Great Britain may get loans from the International Monetary Fund. The main operations of the IMF and the World Bank are not exhibited there or in Japan. They are exhibited in a country like the Philippines where during the 1970s, under the direction and control of the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and American banks, real wages were cut in half. The price that workers would pay for rice grown by the local farmers was cut in half. Farmers were driven off their land. These problems have been with us for a long time says the Hon. Member, but that is false. The people in the Philippines were feeding themselves before the World Bank got there. The people in Jamaica were feeding themselves before the World Bank got there. The people in Ethiopia were feeding themselves before the World Bank got there. Their number one problem is the World Bank and the IMF.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I was just listening to my hon. friend. Would he not also agree that many of the so-called rapidly developing nations like Taiwan, South Korea, and Singapore are basically within the ambit of U.S. strategic needs and doctrines? Would he not agree, at least as I read the history of the last many years, where either super power determines that it is necessary for a nation's own security in strategic terms that it will help make possible a certain kind of development, inequitable though it may be, that that seems to make the country more advanced than the way in which the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway) was talking? For example, Peru is not seen by the United States as necessary for the implementation of what it feels to be its security. Therefore, Peru gets no help at all. Would the Hon. Member not agree with that?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, countries such as the Hon. Member has quoted which are not a strategic area are also areas of competition between the two super powers for influence. But one of the super powers has the World Bank at its disposal; that is to say the United States controls the World Bank. This has been demonstrated by documents from the World Bank itself, and also in documents from the American Congress which point out that 85 per cent of the decisions in the World Bank went in the direction the United States asked. This was pointed out in order to answer some extreme far right America-firsters who said that the United States should not put any money in the World Bank. The Government answered them by pointing out that the World Bank was a far more powerful instrument of foreign policy in the economic field than any direct intervention by the American Government itself. Through the World Bank they greatly multiplied their effects, using the money contributed by Canada and other countries. The United States Government itself has admitted that the World Bank is an instrument through which it uses the poor countries for strategic purposes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore (Mr. Boyer) who has one minute.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I had just thought that I had yet another speech I could put in my file entitled "the greatest speeches I have never delivered". As I sat here listening this afternoon to the many interesting and informed comments, I was reflecting on a number of points, some salient, that I wanted to make with respect to the Bill before us. However, the hour now being five o'clock at least this day will pass without me delivering this speech.

An Hon. Member: Better luck next time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Member's Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the House to proceed to item number 43?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

THE SENATE

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE ON SENATE REFORM

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of convening a constitutional conference to explore means of reforming the Senate of Canada in order to ensure that representative, responsible, and democratically-elected institutions have sufficient primacy in Canada to allow them to fulfill the mandate they were elected to implement.

She said: Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to have the opportunity to speak on my first Private Member's motion, the subject matter of which has been the centre of controversy over recent weeks. In the time available today I should like to talk a little about why we are having this debate, about the history and significance of the bicameral system of government under which we operate in Canada, about the need for reform of the Senate, about some of the options which have been put forth, about convening a constitutional conference, and about my own suggested plan of action.

I know there was a debate last Friday on a similar motion of my colleague. Some Hon. Members participated in that debate. It was certainly most enlightening in drawing out some of the significant issues respecting Senate reform. My motion carries on from that motion on Friday to the next step. It asks for a constitutional conference to provide an opportunity to discuss Senate reform with our colleagues from the provinces.

Why are we having this debate? Almost since its inception in 1867 there has been debate and some criticism of the Upper House. I guess our present day crisis with the Senate is not unusual. Recent criticism has been levelled specifically against the Senate for its finance committee's delay in referring Bill C-11, the Borrowing Authority Act, to the Upper Chamber for final approval.

Constitutionally the Senate is well within its right to delay such legislation while it revises and amends a Bill. However, that was not the case with Bill C-11. In that case the delay was not for the purpose of amending the Bill, because the Bill was eventually passed by the Senate without amendments. I think we can only be led to believe that the Senate committee's delay of Bill C-11 was for what appeared to be purely partisan reasons. The Liberal dominated Senate conducted a politically motivated campaign of destruction, frustrating the people's will, as the Bill was passed through the Commons with the unanimous consent of all three Parties. We all know the cost of those of kinds of tactics and the necessity of cancelling some bond issues. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) has advised us that something in the order of $10 million was incurred as a result of that delay.

As a result of that effort and what appeared to be the partisanship of today's Senate, it attempted to exert its power over the Government which has an overwhelming mandate from the people of the nation. That was not the function which the Fathers of Confederation envisaged when provisions for an Upper Chamber were made in the British North America Act, 1867. It was clear in 1867—and I think it is clear today—that there was to be no equality between the two Chambers. Cabinet was to be responsible to the Commons, not to the Upper House. In the words of our first Prime Minister, Sir John Macdonald, the second assembly would "never set itself in opposition against the deliberate and understood wishes of the people". I think we have seen some denial of that basic principle in the past month.

Essentially the Senate was designed to balance judicially the power of the Commons, based on the principles of popular representation, by safeguarding the legitimate interests of the people of the less populous provinces. Over a hundred years ago the Fathers of Confederation were suspicious of the virtues of unqualified democracy. It is interesting to note what George-Etienne Cartier called "a power of resistance to oppose the democratic element". Therefore the Senate represented and was responsible for the protection of several minorities, the people of less populous provinces and the French or English-speaking people of Quebec.

The Senate

Since Confederation the regional role of the Senate has been less significant than anticipated in 1867. This has been due to a number of factors. Certainly the highly centralized set-up under the British North America Act, 1867, no longer exists and protection for the regions has been provided by other bodies such as the courts, the Cabinet and regional caucuses.

I think we are all very familiar with the dean of constitutional issues, the Hon. Eugene Forsey and the article he wrote about reform of the Canadian Senate. He pointed out its functions, and the third one envisaged in the early days was as follows:

> To provide a "sober second thought" in legislation, a check on the "democracy" which the Fathers of Confederation mistrusted, a bulwark against "radical" legislation passed by a House of Commons swept by gusts of popular passion.

That is how they envisaged us acting over a hundred years ago. That really has not come to pass, either. Perhaps that role is no longer significant.

However, the Senate is responsible for the study and revision of government Bills in that it can simplify, clarify and take the time to study meticulously and to scrutinize Bills so as to ensure they meet the needs of Canadian society. The Senate is well equipped to handle this task, as it has a vast reservoir of talented and experienced members as well as the time to devote to comprehensive study of Bills.

The Senate also functions as an investigative body, delving into public questions which the Government may have neglected. Senate committees have been known to do this job very effectively and often at a fraction of the cost of royal commissions or task forces. I feel there is a role for the Senate, performed properly. It can be very effective in the refinement of legislation. That is perhaps the most important function of the Senate at present. Any proposal to reform the Senate must take this factor into consideration. Refining legislation takes experience which can only be gained through some form of continuity in dealing with various forms of legislative processes.

Recent examples of the work of the Senate in this respect have been its reports on poverty, unemployment, inflation, aging, land use, science policy, Indian affairs, trade relations with the United States and so forth. I believe the standing committees of the Senate, in addition to doing this very important work, have also introduced a fairly innovative approach in the pre-study of Bills. I think that is something which should certainly be encouraged.

However, as I mentioned before, there are concerns. Obviously there is a need for change. What are some of the options which have been put forward and about which we have heard in the last few months particularly? One was the proposal to abolish the Senate. This came up again yesterday. Personally I cannot support that. I really feel that the Senate has potential and is a safeguard. If it is working effectively it can perform a very important function. I am not of a mind to get rid of it, and I can support this by two reports—the Lamontagne report in 1980 and the Joint Committee Report on Senate Reform in 1984 which, after extensive hearings and consultations across the land, reached the same conclusion. I know some Hon.

Members will not agree with me, but I do not think what has happened in the past month, the kind of fury which has occurred, provides justification for such a radical change. We do not throw out the baby with the bath water. We try to examine the purpose and deal in a constructive way with the potential for change.

Perhaps the second most popular touted reform has been to have the Senate as an elected body. Again commissions have reviewed various options, and various configurations have been put forward. When I started to look at this issue I think that was my first inclination. One of our present Senators, Peter Bosa, indicated in an article he wrote several years ago on this subject that he started out as an advocate of an elected Senate but after some thought and consideration he too had rejected that.

● (1710)

Again, I look at an article by Professor Burns of Queens University who has done a lot of writing in this area. I found his writing most constructive. He wrote:

> There is a good deal of support for the direct election of the second Chamber . . . More often than not, this seems based more on democratic sentiment than on any base of functional understanding. What has not yet been clarified or perhaps even considered sufficiently in this debate is whether we are seeking to develop another level of representative Government or what is essentially an instrument of control within the governmental structure that is already in place.

We can look at other jurisdictions, Australia in particular which has an elected Senate, and some of the great difficulties there and the frustrations they have been through with Bills. We would have exactly the same kind of problems, indeed worse with an elected Senate than we now have. Professor Burns went on to say:

> The life of a Government could be one of continuing uncertainty, if it were to be responsible to two elected Houses.

A lot of people say that an elected Senate could move us more toward an American system of Government, but there is a sense of confusion. We do not have an American system in this country. I do not think we should be working toward that. We would get into greater difficulty with an elected Senate than we have with our present institution.

There have been a lot of recommendations for changes in the way that appointments are made. There have been suggestions of a House of the Provinces or that the provinces actually appoint some of the Members of the Senate. They would almost be servants of the provinces. The basic purpose of the Senate was not to represent the provinces per se. It was to provide a representation of regional interest. If we introduced that kind of system, we would be creating more difficulties for ourselves. I do not think that is the forum in which we should be discussing federal-provincial relations. From the recent efforts in Regina, we see that there are other ways which the federal and provincial Governments can get together to share and come together with constructive ideas. Having the Members of the Senate appointed by the provinces and, therefore, feeling a sense of accountability for the provincial Governments would not be a particularly constructive option.

Reforms are required. Some are legislative and some are changes in the character and in the attitude of the Senate which would result in a change in public opinion of the Senate. It is important that we have a Senate that does not frustrate the will of a democratically elected Government. That has to be the first and most important issue that we address.

There have been suggestions, suggestions that I would like to support and propose, that certainly the veto right of the Senate should be changed. They should only be entitled to a suspensive veto, short term on money bills and perhaps a longer term on other kinds of Bills. They would have the opportunity to discuss and debate constructively, but could not totally obstruct the will of this House. That is certainly one of the reforms that I would recommend. That of course requires legislation. Although there is not a clear indication, it probably requires the consent of seven of the ten provinces, including 50 per cent of the population.

As well, we should support the recommendations made both by the Lamontagne committee and the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform to go to a fixed term. Personally, I rather liked the suggestion of a 10 year term, with a possible renewal for a further five years. I do not think people should view appointments to the Senate as a sinecure or a reward for life. We should be looking for people who are in their middle years, their vital years, people who are prepared to give up some time to be a part of public policy formulation in this country and who can look at it from a longer term view than perhaps we can in the House, and from a thoughtful point of view. A change in the term of appointment of Senators would certainly be an important change in this respect.

I also support the recommendation that the Senate should be given the power to review regulations. As a Member of the Standing Committee on Regulations and Statutory Instruments, I feel it would be very interesting if a lot of that work was done by Senate committees. They probably have the time. They have the people with the interest in that area to do it more effectively than perhaps Members of this House who are so busy with the myriad of issues with which we have to deal.

Items which would not require legislation but require a change in the way that we do things would be, first of all, the way in which appointments are made, the type of person. Originally, the concept was that the type of person to be appointed to the Senate would be persons of considerable experience and wisdom who would make a commitment to this work. They were not considered to be strictly partisan appointments.

As it was originally conceived, the Senate was not considered to be a purely partisan body. If they are going to receive public acceptance of their work, they have to move in that direction and view issues, not from a partisan point of view, but from the kind of experience and background that each brings to the task.

We need to be assured that appointments are made in a speedy way, that we do not leave vacancies, that there are requirements for attendance in the Senate. Therefore, we would not have the continued public criticism that they do not do their job because they are not there. It should be made a more lively and interesting place than it obviously is now. That kind of life thrown into the Senate might make it possible for it to be televised. You might find somebody who wants to televise it.

Those are the kinds of reforms I would like to see involved with the Senate. As I said, some of these reforms require legislation. Some just require action on the part of Government, some by the Senate themselves and some with the consent of the provinces. This brings me to the point of the necessity of calling a constitutional conference.

Because of the interest that the provinces have shown in this issue and the concern they have, it is important to involve them in the changes that we are going to be putting forward. What better way than calling a constitutional conference? It does not have to be an expensive, fancy thing. It is a matter of bringing together the Premiers and their designates to talk about this issue, to give them a chance to put their views forward and have a thorough public understanding of the proposals that we are making. It is also consistent with the kind of consultative and co-operative approach that this Government is undertaking with the provinces and the people of Canada.

Let me just summarize my points. First, the time has passed for study. We have had lots of them. What we need now is action. Recent events have reminded us that changes are required. As a Conservative, my inclination is and my recommendations are that we should make these basic kinds of reforms, test them, see if they work and ensure that they will maintain the primacy of this House and enable new life and new vitality to be felt in the other place.

My plan of action includes legislation to be introduced to curtail the powers of the Senate, to provide limited terms of appointment, to provide for their right to review regulations, to introduce practices, to encourage Bills to go to the Senate, to invite them in joint task forces, to have Bills sometimes go there before being debated here so that they have time to study them, to ensure that appointments are made of people who will truly contribute and reflect minority views in this country and understand regional concerns, to call a constitutional conference and to ask the Senate to look at itself, to become less partisan and more hardworking and get out and do a little public relations work.

I echo the sentiments of Senator Bosa, who said that Canadians are basically small "C" conservatives. I believe they would prefer and would support a moderate approach to the reform of the Senate. After sober second thought, so do I. We must take care as well that our system of Government does not become too complex and too weighty so that the people of Canada do not understand, and that we lose a sense of accountability. It not only costs more to have a complex system, but there is a loss of public understanding. As Alexander Pope said:

> For Forms of government, let fools contest, Whate'er is best administered is best.

Hon. Members, I ask for your support here in this House, to join together from all Parties with our colleagues in the provinces, with our friends in the other place, to make the kinds of reform and kinds of improvements which will serve the interests of all Canadians.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Hon. Member on her knowledgeable remarks to the House and tell her that, hopefully, the sentiments she expressed before her colleagues are shared by the members of her own political party. She ought to consult the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and explain to him how she envisages the Senate reform, for he seems to be taking this issue rather lightly. He is just bluffing, but I know that the Hon. Member takes it a lot more seriously than her leader does, and I expect she will impress on him the importance of Senate reform.

Mr. Speaker, I find it rather interesting that Hon. Members opposite would raise the issue of Senate reform precisely when, for once, the Senate exercised its prerogatives. As Lord Acton once said: If power corrupts, absolute power corrupts absolutely.

Mr. Speaker, this Government was elected with an overwhelming majority—211 Members—but it has been slightly put off by a responsible Senate, that has been frustrated as the Hon. Member is, so it chose to show off for the galleries. Looking very pleased with himself, the Prime Minister rose in the House and said: We can abolish the Senate first thing tomorrow morning. The day after, of course, on second thought and—

—sober second thought—

[Translation]

—he realized that his joke was not funny at all and that his provincial colleagues were beginning to get impatient with him. Senate reform is much too important to make jokes about it in the House of Commons, they said.

Mr. Speaker, why would the Hon. Member take the floor today to advocate Senate reform? Because, in recent weeks, the Senate has played its true role. The Senate told this political Party and this Government: There are rules and a parliamentary principle which must be respected, a very simple principle whereby the Government should have sought borrowing authority after tabling the estimates.

I should think that is not expecting too much from the senators and the House. The Hon. Member said earlier that it was sheer partisanship, but I would suggest that the senators acted with utmost impartiality.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance reported—unanimously, so Conservative Party spokesmen were in agreement—and recommended that the Senate remain reluctant to approve any request for borrowing authority if such a request is not supported by a budget or by main estimates for the period for which the borrowing authority is being requested.

This message of caution was conveyed to the Government by all senators, including Conservative senators, who said that the Government did not show respect for traditions. Conservative and Liberal senators in the other place said that this was a case of tyranny by the majority. They chose to exercise their powers under the Constitution, precisely to prevent such tyranny by the majority. Perhaps such are the principles endorsed by—

[English]

—small "c" conservatives—

[Translation]

—as Senator Bosa put it, but the minority must be protected.

The Government may have a strong majority and may be facing a reduced Opposition, reduced in number and not necessarily in quality, Mr. Speaker, but I find them rather ridiculous to be put off and frustrated to the extent that what they decide as a Party must become reality, that they must get rid of any potential opposition, particularly the Senate which happens to be the only Chamber in Canada capable of standing up to the Government now and then and bring it back to its senses.

The Secretary of State gave us a good example today, Mr. Speaker. He cannot stand any kind of opposition. The Secretary of State took revenge on the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) and fired her mother who was guilty of upholding the rights of the minority. That is telling us something, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the Hon. Member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): On a point of order. The Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) just mentioned that the Secretary of State fired the mother of the Hon. Member for Hamilton East.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but that is not a point of order. A point of order would have been that the Hon. Member's comments were not relevant, but I made it clear to the Hon. Member that he should speak to the motion and I think he understood.

Mr. Lapierre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think we hit a sore spot.

What the Hon. Member is proposing today is a constitutional conference. I realize she is new to the House of Commons and may not have had an opportunity to read the 1981 version of our Constitution, since otherwise she would have known she does not need a constitutional conference if her Party has any political will.

According to Section 46(1) of the new Constitution, the amending procedures provided under Sections 38, 41, 42 and 43 may be initiated by the Senate, the House of Commons or a legislative assembly. Thus, Mr. Speaker, such procedures may be initiated by the House of Commons. Today, the Hon. Member is suggesting that we try to accomplish everything in one fell swoop, and she ought to realize that past attempts to reform the Senate have been fruitless.

Mr. Speaker, I remember a number of discussions, including several on the Committee on the Constitution, about the Senate's veto powers, and I must admit I was opposed to the idea. I even made some rather impetuous remarks at the time, and do you know who voted massively in favour of veto powers for the Senate? Our hon. friends opposite, when they were on the Opposition side. I remember the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) when he was extolling the virtues of the Senate and the fact that the Senate had veto powers. He was on the same committee as I was, Mr. Speaker. Now they are on the other side of the House and are worried about opposition anywhere in Canada, they have decided to create a diversion by talking about Senate reform.

Mr. Speaker, I think if this Government intends to propose some kind of reform and it has any political will and is not just acting out of a spirit of revenge or on the spur of the moment or out of frustration, if it has the political will to propose some changes in the powers of the Senate, we would welcome such proposals. After all, the true reformers in this House are in this Party. In the past we have shown our determination to reform the Senate. We would be delighted to consider a Bill or a draft resolution, to examine all the details of a draft resolution that would give the Senate powers that differ from the ones it has now. However, this does not mean the Upper House should become strictly a rubber stamp for the House of Commons.

• (1730)

The Hon. Member said there should be non-partisan appointments, and so forth. That is all very well. We are all for virtue and motherhood, Mr. Speaker. But she will have to persuade her own leader to make non-partisan appointments. We have a list of the Senators who have been appointed since this Government came to power, and I must say their curriculum vitae are most eloquent, especially where they enumerate services rendered to the Progressive Conservative Party. That is why I think the Hon. Member either did not see this list or else she is being totally unrealistic. Actually, her own leader gave the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) a bit of a dressing down when he told him the reason he did not understand why the Senate was important was that he was not the Prime Minister. That should have been some indication to the Hon. Member that her leader did not intend to carry out a reform. What he does intend to do is to change the balance as soon as there is a vacancy and to replace a Liberal with a Conservative.

And it is my view, Mr. Speaker, that if the Government is serious, if the Progressive Conservative Party is serious, if that party is truly progressive, if they intend to propose to this House a general process of consultation of all parties as called for by the Hon. Member, then I can give her the assurance that this party will very seriously consider any proposal for Senate reform. We are convinced that the Senate must be reformed, and certainly my friend for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce) might agree with me that if we are to bring in a reform of our national institutions, we might as well discuss the monarchy, if our friends are as progressive as they claim! To the extent that the Hon. Member has referred to institutions that have no democratic reality, I would have like to hear her discuss the monarchy. I think this could be a most interesting subject, especially in the Conservative caucus.

Concerning her suggestion that regional representation is ensured by regional caucuses, I am doubtful about that. And not wandering from the subject, I say we now have a clear-cut case being discussed during every question period. And regional representation does not come from that side of the House either, Mr. Speaker. There is no basis to suggest the Conservative caucus is very active promoting the interests of Quebec in the Domtar case for instance. To that extent, suggesting that those regional caucuses are effective instruments for regional representation, I think the Hon. Member should look at what is being done in the actual world. She might lose a good deal of her illusions.

As far as the constitutional conference is concerned, there is a question of priorities, Mr. Speaker. We are open to Senate reform, we have always been open to that kind of reform, but I would rather have a federal-provincial conference that would deal with the real problems facing Canadians. If you would make a survey in your constituency, Mr. Speaker, and ask what is more important, unemployment or the Senate, I think the answer would be obvious.

If the Hon. Member for Duvernay talks to his constituents and asks them what is more important, the price of gas or the Senate, they will tell him: the price of gas. I am sure that if the Hon. Member for Gaspé (Mr. Marin) were to ask his constituents what is more important, the Senate or fisheries the answer would be obvious, the people in Gaspé are concerned about fisheries.

Mr. Speaker, I could name all the Hon. Members of this House. All of them without exception, including the Hon. Member for LaSalle (Mr. Lanthier). He would tell you that in his constituency the Senate is not a bread and butter issue for his constituents. He would tell you he is amused by the debates on Senate reform in this House, but this is not why he was elected. He never made that many election promises concerning the Senate, and he realizes that if the Government wants to waste its time discussing the Senate, they will lose touch with Canadian men and women.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think it is academic, amusing, and enlightening to hear the Hon. Member discuss a Private Member's Motion over which her leader does not seem to agree at all. We will see today if she is taken seriously by her colleagues, because the test of the Private Members' hour, as you know, Mr. Speaker, is quite simple. But I can assure the Hon. Member that even if I wanted to, I would not have an opportunity to speak until 6 p.m., because my time would have expired, but I can assure her that no Liberal Member will frustrate her, no Liberal Member—

An Hon. Member: You are alone!

Mr. Lapierre: Anyway, there is no problem with that! I can assure her that her motion, Mr. Speaker, will become fact if it depends on us alone. I can also tell her she should persevere . . . I see the Hon. Member opposite who hopefully will contribute to the debate so we may know what the people in his constituency are thinking, whether they favour Senate or forestry. I know that in Abitibi, in those areas, certainly the Senate does not concern that many people, and Canadians everywhere think along the same lines.

Mr. Speaker, the amending formula is quite simple. I think a constitutional conference might succeed if the federal Government took the initiative. There have been dozens of unsuccessful attempts, and if she talks to her caucuses from the other Provinces, because she says they defend regional interests, she will find out easily that the cosmetic changes she is proposing for the Senate are clearly not enough to ensure true regional representation. She will soon find out that the Maritimes, the Western Provinces are fed up with a kind of representation that is strictly based on the number of constituents, as we have in the House of Commons. They expect a different kind of representation for another House of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, there was a suggestion at one point that the Senate might object to its own reform. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie) tried to have us believe that. But the Minister of Justice has no knowledge of the Canadian Constitution. Whether there is a Liberal majority in the Senate or not, if the Government is determined to bring about a true reform, Section 47 of the Constitution allows the House of Commons to pass a resolution, it allows Provinces to pass their own resolutions according to the proportion set out in the amending formula. Because after all Section 47 provides that an Amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under Section 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within 180 days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, nothing stands in the way of the tyranny of the majority. If our colleagues on Government benches want to change the structure and powers of the Senate, we agree with them that it might be a good initiative. We would like to have more details. The suggestions made by my colleague fall somewhat short, but it might be a starting point. In any event, I hope she will not spend weeks and months talking about Senate reform. We have no intention of doing that, nor do most Members who are more concerned with the needs of their constituents. In my opinion, the Hon. Member should have taken the suggestion of her leader with a grain of salt because, as I said earlier, he was just showing off.

I rather doubt that he is seriously determined to change the Senate. Her leader must come to grips with spiralling interest rates, Canada's weakest dollar ever, and an unacceptable unemployment rate, so he buries his head in the sand, like an ostrich, and uses the Senate in a diversionary tactic. But I repeat that if the Prime Minister, Hon. Members and the Minister of Justice have the political will to do something about it, we are open to suggestions, we are prepared to consider new ideas, and you may rest assured that we will not thwart the reform nor the initiative of the Hon. Member. We fully expect her Conservative colleagues to let the clock strike six o'clock without one of them rising to commend the efforts of the Hon. Member who introduced the motion, who thought her leader was serious and who wants to make a worthy contribution. The next few weeks will tell us whether she was right to take the matter seriously. She made a very good speech, we congratulate her and we hope that Members of the Cabinet will give the issue of Senate reform as much consideration as she does.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time I have had an opportunity to discuss this subject. I was the New Democrat who served on the Joint Committee which studied the Senate last year. I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the longer I served on that committee the less respect I had for that institution. I am not speaking about individuals who are in the Senate; individually they are quite acceptable and have great personal track records. However, collectively, the Senate is something which really does not belong in a democratic society.

The image of overpaid Liberal and Conservative fund raisers, campaign managers and defeated or retired candidates who "work"—and I put that word in quotation marks—three days a week and do very little of value, is not too far from the truth. Not too many people realize that in an average week the Senate only sits three days. An average day is usually not a full day.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that we are never going to get reform of that institution as long as it is in its present state. The very fact that the Senate exists means that we cannot have adequate reform of the Senate because there are too many vested interests in keeping the Senate. There is the vested interest of the Senators themselves, who obviously do not want to do away with what could be called a very "cushy" position. There is the vested interest of the Prime Minister who can obviously use the Senate to reward the political faithful as well as keep some people in line, because some day they may be offered some type of patronage award such as the Senate.

I notice that one of my colleagues who sat on the committee which studied Senate reform the Hon. Member for Halifax West (Mr. Peterson) is in the House. I remember that he was one of the Members of the Committee who had the courage at the end of that process to say that we really didn't need the kind of Senate reform which was envisioned and planned last year. What we got after months of study, and after thousands of dollars spent on transporting that committee from province to province across this land, was a report which indicated how difficult and how impossible it is to reform the Senate of this country. The report was supported by all of the Senators, most of the Conservative Members of Parliament and, of course, most of the Liberals—who were the Government at that time—on the committee. It made one of the most ridiculous suggestions in terms of reform of the Senate. It suggested that we have Senators elected for one nine-year term and that they would not be eligible for re-election. I would like to quote from the report itself. The full committee report stated:

> We realize that Senators who serve for a single term would not be obliged to account for their actions to their electorate at a subsequent election.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, one of the values many of the Senators say, as well as the majority of the Conservatives and Liberals, was that these people would be elected once and would never be accountable to the people again. Is that democracy? Is that what we are talking about in this country?

It is even worse than that, Mr. Speaker. I am going to refer to one of the earlier drafts of that Senate reform report which indicates that attitude, and I quote:

> The committee recognizes that Senators would "not be obliged to account for their action". Earlier versions of the report talked of the "threat" of not being re-elected—

The whole concept of that committee was that the Senate was some kind of elitist body that should not be accountable to the public. Other recommendations were just as objectionable. Instead of clearing out the hundred and some Senators who are appointed at the present time, it was suggested that they be phased out so that in three years time we would elect one third of the new Senators; the other two thirds of appointed Senators would stay. And they would have control of the new elected Senate. How can one actually accept reform when the very nature of the reform about which you talk guarantees that appointed Senators would have control of a new and a more powerful Senate? That would scare anyone who believes in democracy.

One of the Senators who did not agree with the recommendations suggested that the report itself was sabotaged, that the report itself was made to guarantee that it would never be accepted by the Liberal Government at that time, or any other Government, and that it had so many holes in it that anyone who studied it would recognize that it would be unacceptable to the Canadian population. So when I say that as long as we have the present Senate we are never going to have reform, I am speaking from some experience of what has happened over the last few years.

We did a study. We did go out and talk with provincial governments in each province. We let learned academics come before us with all of their different ideas. We talked with ordinary Canadians, with labour leaders, with business leaders and various regional groups. We did all of that study. So it has been done and it has been done time after time. However, the recommendations which come forward are not the types of recommendations which talk about real reform. The report we received in the past proves that the Senate does not really want to reform itself and, unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, there are Hon. Members of this House—as is evidenced by Hon. Members who previously spoke on this issue—who really do not want to reform the Senate.

Much has been said about the value of the Senate and the fact that because we have people with great backgrounds, former Premiers, former Members of Parliament, former Cabinet Ministers, and so on, there is a lot of value in keeping a Senate to do all sorts of things. For that matter, the report of the committee from last year emphasized the Senate's reputation as a legislative and issue review body whose research and hearings have produced good legislative proposals. The committee used this function as a raison d'être for continuing a second chamber.

However, that committee deliberately ignored the fact that in the past number of years it has been all-party House of Commons committees and task forces which have done the real research into such issues as Latin America, disarmament, bank profits, minorities, federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, and so on. These committees have done all of those studies which are so important to the actions of this House and to the directions taken by various Governments. These studies were not done in the Senate. Each and every one of those task forces were House of Commons task forces. I think the people who have served on those task forces recognize that they do the yeoman's work for which the Senate has the reputation. They do the in-depth analysis of some of the controversial issues on which the Government wants more research before it comes forward with a legislative proposal or Government policy paper. That is being done and has been done by the House of Commons. It is 20 or 30 years since we have had the Crow report on poverty in this country.

When people talk about the research capacity of the Senate, they are really talking about something which has not been a function of the Senate in the last little while. Other people who have talked about the value of the Senate refer to the fact that it was the Senate which did the study of the security legislation. They say that the security legislation which was introduced by the Liberals—which was unacceptable—was studied by the Senate and found to be unacceptable. Those of us who were in the House of Commons at that time realized that the Government deliberately sent that Bill to the Senate for study because it did not want the House of Commons to study it. The Government sent it to the other place because it did not want us to reveal the holes which existed in that legislation.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the elected representatives of the people of Canada could have done a much better job of showing just how weak that legislation was. That was a deliberate Government move to keep the legislation from the people who were elected to study legislation. So the Government cannot use that as an excuse for keeping the Senate.

• (1750)

The Senate is elitist in its very nature, Mr. Speaker. It is there because of a lack of trust in a popular mandate. We had an election on September 4 for the purpose of letting the people of Canada decide who they want to govern and what mandate they want to give. We do not always agree with the choice of the people; sometimes we do not even like the choices they have made, but we have always maintained that they have that right. To then create another body to control the elected representatives of the people of Canada is completely and obviously undemocratic.

That body is also elitist because of the very nature of the people in the Senate. Two thirds of the Senators, at last count, were either corporate executives or corporate lawyers. Fully 40 per cent of Senators are on board of directors. Certainly most Canadians are not on boards of directors. The very fact that Senators, who are paid full-time salaries, are doing other work would indicate that they are not truly representing the people of this country.

I have heard some of the debate about how the Senate could be wonderful, how it could represent the provinces, how it could solve the problems of regional disparity and somehow protect the French-speaking minority. I remember that that was the original purpose of the Senate, but it has not done that over the years. It has been the provincial Governments which have protected their own interests. It has been provincial Governments with French-speaking populations which have protected language rights. It has been the federal Government which has worked to protect language rights, not the Senate of this nation.

I know there are others who would like to speak on this proposal, but I would like to remind the House of the motion presented by our Leader in the House yesterday which the Government did not allow to go forward for debate. The motion was that this House recommend the abolition of the Senate. I believe that is the only reasoned course we could ever take.

Do people in this Chamber remember that we used to have second Houses in some of the provinces? Does anyone miss them? Does anyone really feel we have lost something by no longer having second Houses at the provincial level? I do not believe we need the Senate. For that matter, for most purposes it has been dead for the last 100 years. It has served no useful purpose, and when it does exercise its powers we all wish it was not there. So we have not had a useful Senate. In some ways I would have to say that at the present time we have a dead body sitting a few hundred feet over there and we have not had the decency to bury the corpse. Instead, we have been looking for a purpose for that corpse. That does not make any sense at all. Let us bury the corpse, and if after that we want to create some new institution, let us do it, but let us get rid of that dead body first.

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a word or two in connection with this motion. It is somewhat similar to the motion on Friday, which I had the chance to speak to, asking the Government to present a motion for reform. Today we have another motion asking that the Government convene a federal-provincial conference to deal with the whole question of Senate reform.

On Friday I outlined my views with respect to the whole question of reforming the Senate. Those who were here or read Hansard will know that I felt the whole issue turned on the question of democracy and accountability. I suggested that there were four ways the Senate could be reformed. The first would be to tinker with it and change the powers of the Senate. That of course would not create accountability on the part of the Senate, and for that reason I rejected it. The second way was to change the method of appointing people to the Senate. Once again that would not create any accountability on the part of Senators and therefore I rejected that as well. The third method was election to the Senate. I pointed out that if we had two elected bodies we would run into a great problem as far as our constitutional form of democracy is concerned. We would create a situation of instability, a situation which existed in France before former President De Gaulle came into power. We do not want that. So that led inevitably to the fourth option, and that was—

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, perhaps you might take it upon yourself to explain to the new Member what happens to the motion if he speaks until six o'clock. I should like to have your guidance, Mr. Speaker, so as to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It must be assumed that the Hon. Member is aware of the Standing Orders of the House.

Mr. Redway: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The fourth option was abolishing the Senate altogether. That certainly is the option I would go for. I think the only way to deal with the Senate is to abolish it.

The motion we have before us today has to do with the method of actually amending the Constitution in order to deal with reforming the Senate. As you know, Mr. Speaker, there is a procedure set out in the Constitution to deal with this situation.

The first step was referred to by the Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre). He referred to a different number, but I believe Section 38(1) of the Act talks about the method of amending the Constitution, requiring that there be a proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada authorized by a resolution of the House of Commons, a resolution of the Senate, and by resolution of the Legislative Assemblies of at least two thirds of the provinces having an aggregate of 50 per cent of the population. My friend pointed out as well that Section 47 of that same legislation refers to the fact that the Senate cannot hold up that resolution for more than 180 days. My friend referred to 280 days but the legislation actually says 180 days.

First of all we start off with the proposition that an amendment can be made with a resolution of this House and a resolution of the Senate. The Senate cannot delay the resolution for more than 180 days. Then we require the resolutions of some seven legislatures representing 50 per cent of the population. That proposition has been questioned recently in the press and, as I understand it, by lawyers with the Department of Justice. They suggest that we would require the unanimous approval of all the legislatures and the Senate because we are talking about changing one of the elements of approval itself, that being the Senate. It is my feeling that that is not the case, particularly when you look at Sections 41 and 42 of the Constitution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION (A) DOMTAR—NEGOTIATION OF SOLUTIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER LÉVESQUE. (B) DOMTAR—MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate during the time set aside for private Members and to tell the House how disappointed I was in the answer I was given by the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens) on March 11 of this year, upon his return from his trip around the world. I was disappointed, because he appeared in the House and repeated the press release he had issued before he left.

Mr. Speaker, I have the impression, as the Hon. Member opposite says, that the Minister has not understood.

From the Minister's reply we got the impression it was as though nothing had happened during the two weeks he was away. However, during that time, his leader, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), had given the House the assurance that he was going to look into alternatives for Domtar.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to give a short history of the Domtar case to show how badly the Minister has failed to understand what is going on. The Minister has no feeling for the interests of the region, the Province of Quebec or of this country.

Mr. Speaker, a project like Domtar which represents an investment of $1.2 billion would mean that the Eastern Townships would be able to save nearly 5,000 jobs. We are talking about 700 employees at Domtar but we are also talking about 2,500 lumber producers and the very existence of the Town of Windsor, which is a single-industry town. Turning down a request just like that is patently irresponsible. It is intolerable for a region like ours which has been suffering from the structural weakness of its economy as a result of its dependence on "soft" sectors such as textiles, clothing and footwear.

Mr. Speaker, we have here an industry that is viable and that is viable this year. The Prime Minister is using this year's profits as an excuse to say Domtar does not need a grant.

Mr. Speaker, remember that in 1982, Domtar lost $10 million. It was not making hundreds of millions in profits.

Remember that in 1983, it worked hard to improve its performance up to $45 million. This year was reasonable, but considering the extent of Domtar's investments, Mr. Speaker, that is still quite good.

In any case, the pulp and paper industry is a cyclical one. When I see the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion blaming the company because it is making a profit and telling the Eastern Townships: Well, you have a company in your region that is making a profit and we are certainly not going to help it. We are only going to help the lame ducks.

If that is how the Minister sees regional economic development, I think he should hand in his resignation "P.D.Q.". Mr. Speaker, to us, regional economic development means having profitable and viable companies. It means that the Canadian Government is willing to participate. This Government has been very fond of talking about partnership and the rest, but they are very reluctant to put their money where their mouth is. That mouth is now accusing the company of ulterior motives. They even want to use the profit concept to destroy Domtar's credibility.

They are even claiming the company is making threats. They even said, and the Hon. Member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Charest) repeated it, that Domtar did not present its case until January.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion received a letter from Domtar, at least a letter was sent to him, on the day he was sworn in as Minister, which was September 17 of last year. And now the Minister jumps up like a jack-in-the-box and says they do not accept ultimatums! But he has had the case on his desk for months! Of course he did not bother to share his information with his Cabinet colleagues or with his Quebec caucus. We know that they were kept completely in the dark about this project that is so very important to the future of Quebec's economy.

Mr. Speaker, today we are informed that the City of St. Paul in Minnesota is willing to offer Domtar 20 per cent of the grant amount if it decides to set up a factory there. I am aware of the Americans' underhand practices. The Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens) said: We cannot subsidize Domtar for fear of antagonizing the Americans. But these same Americans are quick to take advantage of the situation and offer Domtar a substantial subsidy, much lower interest rates and garanteed access to the U.S. market. And of course they offer the company a cheaper labour force, for we have back home some people who have faithfully served the company for 35 years. And all the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion can say is: "I have made up my mind and I will not change my stand!"

● (1805)

Mr. Speaker, I had received from the Prime Minister the firm assurance that he would review the situation and I thought that I could take his word for it. I thought that when a prime minister made a formal statement in the house, that meant something. And I know that many of his colleagues within the caucus have lost their remaining illusions over these past few days. I hope, however, that the Minister will change his attitude and that his Parliamentary Secretary who is aware, I am sure, of the interests of both the province of Quebec and the region which are at stake will provide us with a more brilliant answer than her minister who knows nothing of the situation, nothing of the region's dynamics and nothing of the need to create employment opportunities within the Eastern Townships. I trust the Parliamentary Secretary will do a better job of it than the Minister himself.

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by thanking my hon. colleague for his question, and I shall be delighted to provide an answer.

First of all, it should be clear that the Government is fully aware of the importance of the forestry products industry to Quebec and Canada. This sector employs about 300,000 Canadians across the country. In 1984, shipments were estimated at some $28 billion and exports at about $15 billion. Incidentally, the industry developed its potential through private sector financing. They have never expected subsidies. In fact, they built up their superiority through private sector financing.

Today, some people adhere to the principle that an investment project cannot succeed without a direct financial contribution from the Federal Government. However, this Government's confidence in the private sector is too great to subscribe to such a concept.

Mr. Speaker, if we get into the specifics of the Domtar case, the project in question is supposed to triple the production capacity for fine paper at the Windsor plant in Quebec. Basically, Domtar intends to instal integrated facilities to replace its obsolete plant, a project that will greatly enhance its competitive position on Canadian and international markets.

Domtar is one of Canada's seven fine paper producers and one of three producers established in Quebec. However, there is a very real danger that its expansion project will aggravate market problems within the industry and lead to overproduction of fine paper in Canada.

I agree the industry expects to fight competition on the market, and it is prepared to deal with that. But if the Government intervenes, this tends to change the rules of the game. Through its various enterprises, associations and the forestry industry's advisory committee, the industry made it clear to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion that it was opposed to any direct assistance with a view to increasing capacity, if such assistance threatened to distort the market situation.

Mr. Speaker, according to the rules of the Regional Industrial Development Program, the Government must consider the repercussions its assistance may have on other members of the industry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary but her time has expired.

AGRICULTURE—POTATO INSPECTION FEES. (B) REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity this evening to discuss further the implications of the inspection fees as they relate to farm products, specifically potatoes, as a result of the economic statement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) last fall.

• (1810)

For the past few months Canadian farmers have been made aware of just how severe the federal cut-backs will be. They will be asked to pay an exorbitant fee for inspections. Also they will be hit with fees for services such as agricultural input quality insurance and records of livestock performance. When the Minister of Finance brought down his statement last fall, I do not think they realized exactly what it would do to them. Now they know they are being asked to pay not only a heavy inspection fee but virtually the full cost recovery of those programs.

Last month I received a copy of a letter which was sent by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture to the P.E.I. Potato Marketing Board and the P.E.I. Potato Producers Association. I will not read the entire letter to the House, but I will outline briefly what it indicated to potato farmers of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, in fact potato farmers across the country. It probably affects the farmers of P.E.I. the most, followed by the farmers of New Brunswick. He indicated in the letter that fees were to be charged for the services provided by the Food Production and Inspection Branch of Agriculture Canada for the inspection of table stock potatoes and for seed inspection. Of course this affects all potato producers. The charges were to go into effect on April 1, 1985. However, the Minister indicated in the House and at a general meeting and banquet the other night of the Horticultural Council of Canada that they would not affect this crop year, the 1984-85 crop year.

The charges outlined are very dramatic—33 cents per hundredweight for inspection or certification of table stock potatoes; $130 for registration or licence fees for shippers; for seed stock the charges are to be $25 per hectare for field inspection and seven cents per 50 kilograms for tuber inspection.

A problem is created in that many potato producers, certainly in the Province of Prince Edward Island, grow about 65 to 70 per cent of their potatoes as seed potatoes, because their main market is the shipment of seed potatoes offshore. In times when the market situation offshore is not good, those same seed potatoes go into what we call table stock potatoes. They are shipped either within Canada, to Toronto, Montreal and other destinations, or to destinations in the United States. Thus there could also be a double charge.

If the Government goes ahead with the announced inspection fees, every farmer in Prince Edward Island who grows roughly 200 acres of potatoes will be faced with a cost of $13,000, and that is a minimum. That is a lot of money to an industry which is selling its product in the market-place today at between 1.5 cents and 2 cents per pound below the cost of production. The farmers of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick will be devastated by those costs. They cannot absorb them.

• (1815)

The farmers of this country would like a clarification from the Department of Agriculture as to what is going to take place. For many years, I have believed that inspection fees should be borne by the consumer, not by the producer because inspection fees are a protection for the consumer. My friend from Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) agreed with that statement the other day.

This Government is looking blindly at our agricultural industry, as it is looking blindly at our fishing industry. The other night the Minister made a statement to the horticultural society saying that they inherited a tremendous deficit. The deficit is large, but what did this Government do to impove that deficit situation? The first thing it did was appoint 40 Cabinet Ministers, the largest Cabinet this country has ever had, minus one, since one resigned. It announced an extra $2 million for the Prime Minister's Office and $50 million for new uniforms for the armed forces. These additional expenditures could have been use to eliminate the need for any cuts to our primary industries in this country. The Government could have looked at some of those areas, as well as at other areas.

We agree that we have to control the deficit. You will not get any flak from us on that issue. The question is how to control the deficit. It should not be done on the backs of Canadians who can least afford it. I want whoever is answering the question today to give the farmers some assurance that there will be some sympathy, and some common sense used in the approach that this Government takes toward the primary producers of this country so that they will not be faced with any charges whatsoever on inspection, either in agriculture or in fisheries.

Mr. Pierre Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, let me first say that I am well aware of the concerns being expressed by Prince Edward Island potato producers regarding our proposed fees. As the Hon. Member mentioned in his question, officials from our office and from our Department have met with representatives of the provincial Government and the island potato industry to discuss these proposals. On the national level, we have consulted with the Canadian Horticultural Council on how our proposals may affect their industry, including of course the potato industry.

On the whole, these meetings have been very positive. We have been very impressed with the extent to which industry shares the Government's concern over the federal deficit. There is a willingness to work together so that the agricultural sector can do its share to reduce the deficit.

This is not to say that there have not been concerns brought to our attention by the various commodity groups during this period of consultation. One of the major concerns that emerged was that we would be charging the new fees on some of last year's crops still moving through the marketing chain. This was never our intention and I can tell the Hon. Member right now that the new fees will not be applied to 1984 crops.

[Translation]

Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is very sad that the twenty years of great darkness we have just lived through—fortunately, they ended last September 4—have left us with such a huge deficit that we are now forced to ask all sectors of the economy to make their war effort.

Still we want to find a solution most likely to bring mutual and acceptable satisfaction to the people involved. If, in some cases, the process should take more time than expected at first, we will assume our responsibilities. What we aim to do is to come up with an acceptable solution which will help lower the deficit and with which we can live.

A few days ago, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) announced that we would do our best to soften the impact of the measures and propositions which have been under consideration. But the Hon. Member must realize that we have to operate with a heavy deficit and that we expect to recoup $32 million. That we will try to do while keeping damages to a minimum.

These past few days and again yesterday the Minister held a meeting with national associations to discuss the best ways to put into effect the new procedures which have been proposed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS—SIZE OF EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS. (B) REQUEST FOR CHANGES IN FORMULA

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise to continue a series of questions I started to ask almost as soon as the House began after the election. They have to do with the effect of the formula brought in by the previous Liberal Government regarding federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. I am speaking specifically of the equalization formula which we now know will provide less money next year than it did in the past for four provinces. These are the Provinces of Quebec, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, four of the have-not provinces. Four of the poorer provinces of the nation will actually be receiving less money in equalization payments next year than they are receiving at the present time.

This is not a new issue. We warned the then Liberal Government in 1982 that the legislation would have the effects we are now seeing. We said that Quebec and Manitoba would be receiving less money and that we suspected that there would be other provinces in Atlantic Canada that would also suffer as a result of the Liberal Government-imposed formula for equalization.

At that time, members of the Conservative Party were in opposition. They supported us, and to support that I can quote the words of a number of them. One of them was the now Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Mayer). I will quote the words of the now Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp). He was speaking specifically of the Province of Manitoba as he is the Member of Parliament for Provencher. On March 23, 1982, he said:

—I am questioning whether any government in Manitoba has the ability to provide the service for Manitobans.

He was talking about health care and about the various essential services provided by the province. That was the position he took when he was in opposition. He went on to say:

—on this issue the members of the NDP and the Progressive Conservatives from Manitoba are united.

That was the position of the Hon. Member for Provencher when he was the health and welfare critic for the opposition Party. He is now the Minister of National Health and Welfare and money is still not being provided to the people of Manitoba, Quebec, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Members of the Conservative Party were quick to complain about members of the Liberal Party when they introduced this program. However, I think it is essential that we all know that it is the Conservative Government that is in power now, and it has the power to act. I hope that it will act quickly.

Yesterday when I asked the Minister of Finance a follow-up question on this issue he said that the Government would be acting shortly. The Government has been in power since September 4. It has had the power to act. Every day it delays makes it that much more difficult for the Governments of those four provinces to act on matters that are of concern to them.

Yesterday I mentioned that the Province of Manitoba must bring down its budget very soon. Obviously the Province of Quebec must do its planning. The Provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island must have the ability to plan their fiscal years. We need to know from the Government what it intends to do.

● (1825)

I was very displeased and depressed when I heard the Minister of Finance yesterday say that he thought the federal Government was in a worse fiscal position than the four provinces which are affected by the equalization program. I was asking a question about four have-not provinces. The very purpose of the equalization formula, and the reason equalization is mentioned in the Constitution of Canada, is to provide money and make it possible for the provinces in the poor sections of Canada to provide services. They need money from the federal Government, and the federal Government must realize that when those provinces receives less money in the future than they receive at the present time, obviously they will not be in a position to provide the same level of services for education, health care, welfare and other services such as job creation.

It is very important that the Government act and that it act very quickly, otherwise those provinces will have to make cuts in essential services.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as a Quebecker, I sincerely thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) for entrusting me with the task of replying to the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) who has raised a question about an important federal program, the equalization payments. Under that program, the government unconditionally grants to the poorer provinces some funds to help them provide satisfactory services. This federal program began in 1957, some thirty years ago. Since then, it has been almost automatically extended every five years by the government of the day under fiscal arrangements with the provincial governments.

The equalization program now in effect will end on March 31, 1987 and must be extended by the government before that date. The government considers the renewing of this program a high priority and feels that it is most important to ensure that the new program will attain effectively the original aims of equalization. To this end, extensive consultations will be held within a few months with the provincial governments. Frequent meetings will be held with the representatives of the ten Canadian provinces.

Those federal-provincial meetings will be held at various levels, at the ministers' level as well as the officials' level. All provinces will have the opportunity to state their views on the type of equalization program Canada needs.

Our government will take into account such views when the time comes to make a decision on the kind of equalization legislation that should eventually be tabled in Parliament.

Moreover, those consultations and decisions will be made in a wide context including the entire range of federal transfer programs to the provinces and will confirm the necessity of preserving and even strengthening our Canadian federalism.

Our federal government will indeed help the Canadian provinces through all sorts of transfer payments, including the financing of established programs and the Canada Assistance Plan. Our Estimates for the fiscal year 1985-86, which were tabled in Parliament on February 6, provide for up to $20 billion in cash transfer to the provinces over that period, while the total transfers, including that of income tax percentage points, will exceed $27 billion. These are very large amounts, considering the difficult financial situation which this federal government has inherited from the previous one.

DOMTAR—QUEBEC CONSERVATIVE CAUCUS

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, we are now in our third week of debate and questions regarding the Domtar case, and while the Government has let this drag on, the Prime Minister, as a result of his contradictory statements, created a number of expectations.

We have now reached the point where there seems to be no hope left. Yesterday, it became clear that Domtar might well decide to go to the United States.

Considering the utterly disastrous impact this scenario would have, is it too much to ask of the Progressive Conservative Quebec caucus to break their silence, to stop this passive acquiescence and to take up the cause of their fellow Quebecers? They are betraying Quebec by their failure to act in this very important matter.

On the other hand, the Minister of State (Small Businesses) said in Montreal yesterday, and I quote:

Quebecers should get this straight: The ten Conservative Ministers from Quebec are not working for Quebec but for Canada.

With due respect for this position, which I find abhorrent, I would ask them at least not to work against Quebec in the Domtar case.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

POVERTY—MEMBER'S STATEMENTS IN COMMITTEE

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Hon. Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) challenged statements of a United Church minister who was speaking of the plight of the poor, and the need for social reforms and income redistribution. This Tory MP questioned the legitimacy of support for the poor, claiming that many people are poor by choice.

We must thank him for voicing the traditional attitude of true blue Tories who want us to return to pre-Depression approaches of leaving help for the deserving poor to charity, while condemning others. Being a supporter of the B.C. Socred Government which has increased poverty for 14 per cent of B.C. families while reducing social assistance and services, his views are not surprising.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) reflected these same values when I questioned him about increasing poverty and the growth of food banks. He showed no concern for the victims or the reasons for this deplorable trend; instead he praised charity in true poor law tradition.

Job creation is the antidote to unemployment. Adequate incomes are a solution to poverty. The 1.5 million poor children should not be blamed for not having enough to eat. Citizens pay taxes to Governments to provide opportunities and security for all Canadians. We want government action, not charity.

EMPLOYMENT

QUEBEC'S EXCELLENT PERFORMANCE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House Quebec's excellent performance with respect to job creation and reducing unemployment. On March 8, Statistics Canada revealed that in February, the number of unemployed workers had dropped most in Quebec, which had 12,000 fewer unemployed than in January. The unemployment rate dropped from 12.2 per cent to 11.8 per cent, and this development was due to the creation of 16,000 new jobs. Furthermore, these jobs were largely filled by women.

This is a tangible result of the positive impact of electing a Conservative Government in Canada. Economic renewal and economic growth are once again the order of the day, as a result of the new climate of confidence that has existed since September 4.

Our Government has demonstrated its political will by dealing with the crucial problem of getting women back into the labour market through a program aimed at employment equity.

Mr. Speaker, it is a step forward in economic renewal and a very real step towards achieving economic justice.

FORESTRY

INVESTMENT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA FORESTS

Mr. Ted Schellenberg (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, increased employment is the top priority of the Government. In British Columbia, employment in the forest industry is a primary concern. More than 50 per cent of the economy of my home province is dependent on forest-related activity. One out of every ten Canadians is involved in the forest industry. It is Canada's largest employer.

Our Government will soon be announcing a major reforestation initiative in the Province of British Columbia, incorporating suggestions and proposals from a number of sources, including the mayors of Vancouver Island. Their presence in the gallery today signifies the importance of their proposal, which they call their strategy for survival. Initiated by the District of North Cowichan, the strategy is an investment in our forests—an investment, not a make-work program.

The mayors are asking the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia to farm our forests, not mine them. On Vancouver Island alone, this investment will provide stable employment for 1,100 people. It will also be an investment in the future of our children.

It has been said that politicians lack the political will to initiate such a proposal, because politicians prefer to think in two and four year time spans and it takes decades to grow more trees. However, this Government has strong representation from the West. This Government knows how to plan in terms of decades, because decades from now we will still be the Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberg: I thought my colleagues would like that.

We welcome the mayors of Vancouver Island to Ottawa. Suddenly, Ottawa is not so far away.

EMPLOYMENT

EQUALITY IN THE WORKPLACE

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, the employment equity program announced last Friday is praiseworthy in its intent, but I would like to draw the attention of the House to the very narrow base from which it proceeds and to the unfortunate consequences this may have.

Actually, dealing with the employment equity problem should include making social benefits available to part-time employees, many of whom are women, as Hon. Members are aware.

It would also mean that work should be considered in a broader perspective, since our work is related to other aspects of our lives. For instance, how can we talk about employment equity for women without dealing with the issues of daycare centres and parental leave? How can we talk about employment equity for the disabled if we do not deal with the transportation problem? How can we deal with employment equity if we ignore the training issue?

Unfortunately, these areas were not considered last Friday. Perhaps the Government is waiting for the pressure of public opinion.

In any case, I am afraid that because of these shortcomings, the impact of the employment equity program will be far less positive than the Government has led us to believe.

DISASTERS

CHILE—EARTHQUAKE DAMAGE—ORGANIZATION OF RELIEF MEASURES

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, March 3, an earthquake hit Chile and tremors continued for a long time. Two hundred people have died, a thousand are missing, and thousands more are forced to live in the streets. The homes of 165,000 people are destroyed, along with the Port of Valparaiso and many other buildings along a stretch of 1,000 miles.

The Government of Pinochet has responded by ordering a shoot-on-sight curfew, and surrounding all the slum areas in the country with army personnel ordered to shoot on sight. The Vicariate of Solidarity, led by the Roman Catholic Church but including other churches and also Jews, is doing relief work through its network throughout the country. The Vicariate has an honourable record of serving the needs of the people without bowing to the political demands of the dictator Pinochet.

• (1410)

Thousands of Chilean refugees in Canada, organized through the popular democratic movement, are raising relief funds to send through the Vicariate or through the International Red Cross. I call upon the Government and the people of Canada to contribute generously to Chilean earthquake relief through our churches and the Vicariate, or through the International Red Cross. We ought not to send relief through the corrupt fascist government of Pinochet. He has not only directed the assassination of Chile's lawful President, Salvador Allende—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

PRAIRIE WILDLIFE INTERPRETATION CENTRE—AGREEMENT ON FINANCING

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the priority of the Government is responsible deficit reduction. Canadians cannot long endure $35 billion annual deficits piled one on top of the other. We have no alternative but to reduce our level of borrowing; thus the announcement in early November that the Government can no longer operate the Prairie Wildlife Interpretation Centre near Webb, Saskatchewan.

The Prairie Wildlife Interpretation Centre, which is open during the summer season, attracting some 20,000 visitors and operating under a budget of $260,000, operates at cost to the taxpayer of approximately $13 per visit. The Centre and its programs are an asset to our area, particularly in terms of school and educational visits, and tourism. It provides an opportunity for people to view the unique prairie ecology.

Discussions and negotiations have been ongoing between the federal Government, the Province of Saskatchewan, organizations, individuals and groups during the past four months, with a view to continuing the operations of the Centre under new management, thus preserving the facility and its programs at a considerably lower cost to the taxpayer. I am pleased to note that the federal Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) and the Minister of Parks and Renewable Resources for Saskatchewan have this day agreed to assist in financing the Centre, thus accomplishing the twin objectives of keeping the Centre open and saving the taxpayers' money. This agreement underscores the continuing spirit of co-operation on wildlife matters between the two Governments.

MULTICULTURALISM

APPOINTMENT OF COUNCIL MEMBERS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, a short time ago the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Murta) announced the appointment of 60 members to the Canadian Multiculturalism Council. The CMC has the important task of advising the Minister on policy and on the development of programs relating to all phases of multiculturalism.

The valuable input of the CMC will help us select the proper goals and programs that will best meet the demands and needs of furthering the progress of multiculturalism in Canada, and integrating into Canadian culture the best of the culture and traditions that new Canadians from 85 different countries and regions have brought with them, in order continually to enhance our own way of life.

These are indeed exciting times for multiculturalism. Much has changed in our evolving Canadian society since the original multicultural policies were planned more than 10 years ago. Our objective today is to consolidate the progress that has been made, to push harder for fair representation for that one-third of Canadians who are neither of Anglo-Celtic nor French ancestry, and to assist mainstream Canadian institutions in adapting to the multicultural policy.

We look to the CMC for leadership, for initiative, and for positive input to realize these important goals. I know that, with the excellent talent of the committee members, we will succeed.

POLITICAL PARTIES

COMMENTS OF FORMER LIBERAL MINISTER

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, it was with interest that I read of the musings of Liberal Otto Lang before the membership of the Manitoba Liberal Party. I was surprised by his indication that a number of the policies and programs put into place by his Government do not seem to be working as they should. He implies that a number of programs created to serve as a solution have worked to the detriment of individuals, of Canadian economic life, and of universality and the right to strike.

Mr. Lang is right when he says that Canada's current economic system does not encourage work or personal initiative. He must be glad to know that this Government came to that realization some time ago, and has been working to return initiative and hard work to the Canadian spirit.

What brings about this sudden change of tune? Is Lang speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada, or on behalf of himself? Is he the deliverer of messages, the tester of waters, to see if Liberal supporters will move to the right, currently a far more comfortable position, or is Mr. Lang now reflecting an adopted change of attitude on the part of the Liberal Party? Will he be suggesting to Canadians that the Liberal Party was wrong?

Mr. Lang's comments made interesting reading. However, why are these comments coming from him and not from the Party Leader? Could it be that the Party, or what remains of it, is fundamentally split, or could it be that it does not care to have its Leader make such fundamental statements?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TERRORISM

SEIZURE OF TURKISH EMBASSY IN OTTAWA—SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and it relates to the tragedy at the Turkish Embassy yesterday. A Canadian citizen is dead, and the residential community of Sandy Hill in Ottawa was threatened. The Deputy Prime Minister acknowledged in the House yesterday that a security gap did, in fact, exist.

How can the Deputy Prime Minister say, as he did in the House yesterday, that "The security arrangements were those that could best achieve security for the Embassy"? How can the provision of one outside security guard from a private firm be considered to be adequate security?

Does the Deputy Prime Minister agree with the futility of the statement of the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs when he said: "There is no defence against these types of attacks"? Has the Government thrown up its hands?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): No, of course not, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. gentleman knows that, whatever degree of security is provided in any given circumstance, if breached, it compels one to the logical conclusion that it was not enough. Wherever there have been similar instances throughout the world, despite far more intensive security arrangements than those which exist here, and in far different circumstances, when they are breached, they are breached. One must question the adequacy whenever there is a breach.

With respect to the satisfaction which the right hon. gentleman mentioned, the arrangements at the Turkish Embassy were very recently reviewed, indeed as recently as last month. At that time the Turkish Embassy expressed satisfaction with the security arrangements. It would be inappropriate to make any assumption other than that the Turkish Embassy, in expressing satisfaction, was expressing the views of the Turkish Government.

PROTECTION OF EMBASSIES—RCMP REPORT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I find it rather sick that the Solicitor General yesterday, in defending the Government's measures in protecting that Embassy, descended to a criticism of the former Liberal administration. By way of preamble, to match the time you allowed the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —the previous Liberal administration left the new Government new legislation, namely, Part IV of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act, which gave the Government more enforcement procedures. In the 1984-85 Estimates, the Government brought before Parliament a $14.1 million item which improved security systems and measures at foreign embassies. The former Solicitor General, the Hon. Member for York Centre, ordered a report from the RCMP which he did not receive—contrary to what the current Solicitor General has said—but the present Government received it the moment it was sworn into office. That report recommended the upgrading of the physical protection of embassies in Ottawa. Why then, in view of this reinforcement, was no action taken?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the exchange we had yesterday, and the one today, will be kept on a non-partisan basis, having regard to the nature of the incident, which is historic for Canada, which occurred yesterday.

With respect to the report to which the right hon. gentleman referred, that report came out in June of last year and it was acted upon.

In response to his first question, I indicated to him that the security arrangements at that particular Embassy were reviewed as recently as last month. It was with the results of that review that the Turkish Embassy concurred.

● (1420)

Again I re-emphasize that, as tragic as the events of yesterday were, one can question the adequacy of security, whatever the degree, whenever that security is breached. The whole matter is now under intensive review with respect to the circumstances of yesterday and how we can best address the provision of security to all of our embassies in the future.

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have noted the Deputy Prime Minister's remark about the non-partisan aspect of security measures, and that would have been the procedure followed in this House had not the Solicitor General decided to open up the question, dodge responsibility for his Government, and try to lay it on a previous Government. I am suggesting quite clearly to the Deputy Prime Minister that this Government failed to act quickly enough to implement the report with the money which had been left at the disposal of the Government. Yesterday's attack should have been anticipated in view of the previous incidents having to do with the Turkish Embassy. It is clear that the terrorists seized that Embassy rather too quickly and too readily.

Therefore, my question to the Deputy Prime Minister is: did the Government fail to act on the specific measures suggested by the RCMP in that previously mentioned report, to upgrade the protection for the Turkish Embassy and other embassies? And if action was taken, when was it taken? The Deputy Prime Minister mentions a month ago. I would like a little more specific response to the general nature of that report.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Well, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is not going to get specific details of that report. He knows full well that it would be prejudicial and inimical to the interests of security itself—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): If we get some straight answers, then security will be improved.

Mr. Nielsen: —to be discussing that kind of detail on the floor of the House of Commons. I have said twice now, in response to the right hon. gentleman's questions, that a revision of the degree of security at the Turkish Embassy was made as recently as last month, at which time increased security was provided. Whatever the degree, the Turkish Embassy expressed satisfaction with that degree. Surely the right hon. gentleman is not suggesting that we should not accept the views of the Turkish Embassy as reflecting those of the Turkish Government.

CONTENTS OF REPORT

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister claims that the Turkish Government, through its embassy, expressed satisfaction at the security measures taken. I suppose if there were any increase there would be an expression of satisfaction. However, this morning in the Parliament of Ankara, according to a CP report, the Minister of State, Mesut Yilmaz, speaking for the Government, was very critical of Canada for not providing adequate security at the embassy here.

Would the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House if that report—which was received not last June by me but was submitted to the Solicitor General for the first time after the election—recommended increased measures of security at the Turkish Embassy which were not taken? Perhaps some were. But did the report recommend measures on which the Government refused to act?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): I would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that the former Solicitor General would have had more discretion than to put a question the answer to which, he knows, would elicit security details—

Mr. Broadbent: That is not so.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): The answers are not dangerous.

Mr. Nielsen: —which simply would not enhance security arrangements at all, if addressed. The hon. gentleman makes the assertion that he did not receive a report last June which was prepared certainly at the behest of the last Government, and most likely at the Hon. Member's request. I see the Hon. Member nodding in the affirmative. If he did not receive the report in June, he certainly should have. He was in office until September.

With respect to acting upon the report itself, indeed it was acted upon, as I have said three times now to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): One outside security guard.

Mr. Nielsen: As recently as last month those security arrangements at that Embassy were revised, and revised to the satisfaction of the Turkish Embassy.

IMPLEMENTATION QUERY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are certainly many things done in the interests of national security where the public interest is not served by making them public, but in this case I think national security would be served and enhanced by getting some straight answers. Is the Deputy Prime Minister aware that this morning, after the Solicitor General's statement, the Ministry confirmed that the report was not prepared in June but later, and that it was submitted to the New Government, not the Government or the Minister who commissioned it? I want to ask him again: were there measures recommended in the report which were not implemented?

• (1425)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): And I am telling the hon. gentleman again, who should know better than to ask such a question, that any answer with respect to security arrangements, at that or any other embassy, would prejudice those security arrangements. What comfort or aid would that give to those who might have in their minds thoughts such as those which obviously existed in the minds of those who have been arrested and charged now? If they had the details which the former Solicitor General is asking be produced, what a comfort it would be to them. I suggest it would do nothing to enhance any security arrangements for the embassies if we followed that irresponsible course.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR SECURITY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in his answers today the Minister has told the House a number of times that the Turkish Embassy was happy with the security arrangements that were made. We have heard this morning the official view of the Turkish Government, expressed in Ankara, that it is not happy. However, I suggest that whether the Government in Ankara is happy, or whether the Embassy here is happy, is irrelevant.

The question is this. Would he not acknowledge to the House that Canada has signed an international agreement that obligates Canada to provide fully adequate security for embassy personnel? If he acknowledges that, would he also tell the House, in light of his admission yesterday that there was a gap in the security, why has the Government not done more in the last six months to protect the people in the Turkish Embassy, as well as other embassies?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first I acknowledge that it is Canada's responsibility to provide security for these embassies. We can start from that basic premise, with which all of us agree. With respect to my responses yesterday, I used the term "gap". It could just have easily been "breach". The fact is that security was breached. Logic compels you to that conclusion after yesterday's events. But in discharging its responsibilities to provide security to these embassies, I am sure the hon.

gentleman would be the first to agree that we cannot provide a degree of security which would turn these embassies into armed camps. Even if we did that, logic also compels one to the conclusion that, regardless of the degree, it could be breached. If it were breached, the conclusion must be that it was not adequate.

I reiterate that the Turkish Embassy, speaking on behalf of its Government, expressed satisfaction. The use of the term "happy" is that of the hon. gentleman, not mine.

MEASURES TAKEN IN WASHINGTON

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, there are some Governments around the world which have responded appropriately to the seriousness of the situation when it comes to certain terrorist groups within the Armenian community taking violent action against the Turks. The Pinkerton guards who have been provided to the embassies have very limited training. They are given a revolver, and then told explicitly not to use it in terms of protecting embassy personnel. Does the Minister consider that adequate to meet the needs of the Turkish Embassy, particularly during the past few weeks?

In the last two years the Americans have added, to the Turkish Embassy in Washington, two armed guards who are not Pinkerton employees but members of the U.S. security service force who are trained to protect embassy personnel, using weapons if necessary. Is that not a more effective kind of protection which could deter terrorist activities?

• (1430)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, without in any way accepting the preamble to the hon. gentleman's question, I am aware, as is the Government, of the criticisms with respect to the use of Pinkerton security guards. That is one of the several matters that are under very active consideration at this moment. We are considering whether that system should be retained, improved upon, or indeed whether some other system should be put in place to meet our security obligations with respect to our embassies.

RCMP REPORT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister confirm that the report which was prepared by the RCMP and submitted to the Government last summer said that the previous Government awarded the contract to Pinkerton simply because it was the lowest bidder, and that that is an inadequate basis for providing protection? In fact, in the report they recommended that the RCMP be involved in providing that protection. Would the Minister confirm that that recommendation was in the report?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman was here and was listening to the questions of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, and to the questions of the former Solicitor General. Yet he puts the same question again, which elicits my same response that it would be inimical and would prejudice the security of the Embassy to reveal, in a public way, any details with respect to security arrangements at the Embassy. As I did yesterday, I will again today offer to meet with the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, as Privy Councillors, knowing that they have an oath in place in this regard, to discuss with them and to obtain their ideas on the security arrangements with respect to our embassies.

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to make the mistake of going to the Deputy Prime Minister on this subject. I will turn to the Solicitor General and ask very directly whether all the security measures which were recommended in the report were, or were not, implemented. Yes or no. We want no details. Were they implemented, yes or no? The Deputy Prime Minister seems to think we want details. He is anxious to get up, but my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we all know the purpose of the hon. gentleman asking that question. I have answered it with respect to questions put to me by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, and with respect to questions put to me by the former Solicitor General. I have now answered it with respect to questions put to me by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Could we hear from the Minister responsible?

Mr. Nielsen: It is not the intention of the Government—and I am speaking on behalf of the Government—to make public, or discuss publicly, any details of any report with respect to the security arrangements at that Embassy. It would not serve the public interest to affirm, or otherwise, whether any, some, or all of the recommendations in that report have been implemented.

Mr. Johnston: I agree that the purpose of the question is clear, Mr. Speaker, but so is the purpose of the response.

REPORT INQUIRY

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back to the Solicitor General for a moment, if he has the courage to answer this question, which I think is very straightforward. Obviously, if all the measures in the security report were implemented, the report itself was defective in view of the incident of yesterday. The real issue is whether or not they were implemented, or whether everyone should go back to the drawing board and produce another security report on the security of embassies in Ottawa.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry the hon. gentlemen opposite treat this matter so frivolously in view of the outcome of yesterday's events. The answer is repeated. I again emphasize my willingness to brief fully the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party with respect to the entire range of security measures and, hopefully, to gain their helpful input in a constructive way, knowing full well that both gentlemen are bound by their oath as Privy Councillors to keep such matters secret.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We don't want to brief the terrorists.

AWARENESS OF POTENTIAL THREAT TO TURKISH EMBASSY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Was the Government aware of the high alert status that the international intelligence community was providing around the world with regard to the potential threat to the Turkish Embassies and Turkish communities, as a result of the most recent court actions in France? If the Government was aware of that, did it choose simply to ignore it in the case of the Turkish Embassy in Ottawa?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Of course we were aware, as was the previous Government, of the facts which were embodied in the question of the hon. gentleman. I indicated to previous questioners that changes in the degree of security at the Turkish Embassy were brought about as recently as last month in response to that situation. I again emphasize that, after those changes were brought about, the Turkish Embassy officials themselves expressed satisfaction with them.

ADEQUACY OF PROTECTION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, is it the opinion of the Deputy Prime Minister that adequate security can be provided, in a case of a high alert situation, particularly where threats have already been made publicly and conveyed through the international intelligence agencies, by providing one man with one gun and five bullets, and an order not to shoot?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is a careless question.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): In all fairness, Mr. Speaker, I do not accept those facts as set out in the hon. gentleman's question. They may well be so, but surely that is a matter that is more properly left to the review process which is now ongoing. I would think that the Leader of the Hon. Member's own Party, and the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, would want to participate in that process and to come forward with their constructive suggestions. I would suggest to the Hon. Member that it does no one any good, least of all those who we are seeking to protect with these security arrangements, to brief terrorists rather than the right hon. gentleman or the Leader of his own Party.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE ON MEASURES TAKEN

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would think the Deputy Prime Minister knows full well that if we were to share that briefing he would, in effect, co-opt us, thereby preventing us from putting proper questions in the House of Commons. That is not the way it is going to happen.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Such irresponsibility.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The way the Deputy Prime Minister has intervened this afternoon to protect the Solicitor General reminds me very much of Alexander Haig saying: "I'm in charge here".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Foster: Erik's got the guns.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has a question, please?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Does the Deputy Prime Minister not feel that national security could be enhanced if this Parliament and the country could be assured that proper response was made to that report, and that proper action was taken by the Government? We do not want the details. We just want an assurance that everything that could have been done was done.

• (1440)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow to pass unnoticed the expressed view of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that I have no responsibility in speaking on behalf of the Government in matters of this nature. That is what he is suggesting when he criticizes me for responding on behalf of the Government, which I believe I have a responsibility for doing, notwithstanding the extremely capable and responsible Solicitor General.

With respect to the enhancement of security, there can be no question that any security arrangements can be enhanced. Yesterday's incident proves that. The incident in the British Isles proves that. The incidents elsewhere around the world are proof of the fact that any security arrangements can be improved. But that is precisely the reason for our ongoing review at this very moment.

Oral Questions

NORTH AMERICAN AIR DEFENCE

PARAGRAPH DELETED FROM AGREEMENT

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Minister knows that in 1981 the Liberal Government removed from the NORAD Agreement the clause stating "This agreement will not involve in any way a Canadian commitment to participate in an active ballistic missile defence". This was on the grounds that it was no longer necessary.

In view of the most recent developments, in particular the implications of SDI for the ABM Treaty of 1972, can the Minister assure the House that this clause will be included in the Agreement that the Government plans to sign this weekend with the United States on the modernization of the DEW Line?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that paragraph was deleted at the time because it was not relevant at the time. Nothing has happened to make it relevant. We do not propose to add irrelevant paragraphs.

Ms. Jewett: Then the Minister has not heard all the concerns discussed widely throughout the country about the possible implications of star wars for the ABM Treaty.

CANADIAN POSITION

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister and the Government refuse to put the clause in, is he saying to the whole Canadian public that the door is open to Canadian participation in an active ballistic missile defence?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what I am saying is that the Government of Canada supports the provisions of the ABM Treaty and intends to continue to do that. There is no need to add redundant language simply because members of the New Democratic Party and members of the Liberal Party in the House of Commons—

Ms. Jewett: It's the Canadian public.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —knowing the facts, want not to pay attention to those facts, but instead want to abuse their public positions to sow fear in the country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Jewett: Don't be silly.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DOMTAR—POSSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT PAYING INTEREST ON LOAN

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns Domtar and is, of course, directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion.

In the past few days, the Minister made it clear to the House that there was no question of the Government granting Domtar a direct subsidy of $100 million.

However, the Hon. Member for Sherbrooke is telling people in the Eastern Townships that the Government is considering the possibility of paying the interest on a loan that would be contracted by Domtar.

Has this alternative actually been discussed with Domtar, and is the Government seriously considering it for this case?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Hon. Member was not in the House at the time, so I would remind him that in response to another question I mentioned that I will be meeting with the Forestry Advisory Council early next week to discuss the needs and the projections that they see for their own forestry industry. It may be that out of those discussions there will be some type of universal program that we can identify that might be helpful as far as the federal Government is concerned.

If Domtar could fit within this context, of course we are quite willing to work out any arrangement that would be acceptable to Domtar.

As the Hon. Member knows, our Prime Minister and the Premier of Quebec have had discussions, and presumably those discussions will continue after the Prime Minister returns from Moscow.

In due course we may have something to announce with respect to Domtar. I want to assure the Hon. Member that the matter is under consideration but there is nothing of a particular nature to announce at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

REFUSAL OF GRANT TO DOMTAR—REQUEST FOR REASONS

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond-Wolfe): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

When we say Domtar, everybody knows we are talking about fine paper, and as far as fine paper is concerned, there is more or less a balance between imports and exports, which is not the case for newsprint.

Could the Minister explain to the House why he is refusing to subsidize Domtar, which is in the business of making fine paper, while not long ago it did approve a grant of $40 million for Kruger when it acquired the Bowater plant in Corner Brook, Newfoundland, a company that does produce newsprint, most of which is for export?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would only say to the Hon. Member that our Department handles hundreds of applications from various companies across the country. On average, about two applications are turned down for varying reasons, for every application that we accept. Unfortunately, Domtar was one application that was turned down. I would only suggest to the Hon. Member that it would be absolutely impossible to review in the House, as he suggests, the reasons for each rejection, one by one.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF BEER STORE LABOUR DISPUTE IN ONTARIO

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He is aware that there is a labour dispute with regard to beer stores in Ontario, and that there has been the import of American beer into the province. Could the Minister possibly talk to his provincial counterpart about the purchase of beer within Canada, in order to help the hotels and motels in this province?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give my hon. colleague the assurance that under our packaging and labelling legislation, specific information must be given on various products, which includes bilingual labelling and volumes in metric. The Government intends to monitor the situation very carefully to see to it that these products are labelled accordingly, and as soon as we have reached any conclusions, we shall inform those concerned.

SHIPBUILDING

QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion concerning government support for a key industry in the province of Quebec.

Last Friday, the Prime Minister said in Quebec City that the Government had not decided whether it would be taking special measures to rescue shipyards in Quebec and the rest of Canada. He was very pessimistic about the future of this industry.

Does this mean that the Government now intends to withdraw its support for our shipyards, as it has withdrawn its support for Domtar?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is very much to the contrary. The Hon. Member must have noted that the Davie shipyard in Quebec has recently been purchased by Versatile and, as a result of their application to us, I am pleased to inform the Hon. Member that we were able to agree to a loan of $15 million with respect to that purchase, that will be repaid when the TRUMP Program is fully completed by Davie Shipbuilding. In short, that is an instance where we were able to help. I am very pleased that we helped, and I am sure that the House would be enthused to hear that we are doing things in Quebec.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ELECTION CAMPAIGN SPEECH

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. Can he explain the contradiction between the pessimism demonstrated by the Prime Minister with respect to the future of the industry and the fact that in August of last year the Conservative Party said in its campaign promises that a top priority would go to the creation of a more viable and prosperous shipbuilding industry? How does he explain that contradiction? Where is the $75 million, not $15 million, that was promised to shipbuilding in the Empire Club speech, and which could be creating jobs in Atlantic Canada and Quebec today?

● (1450)

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the Hon. Member that our Prime Minister, being Irish, is always optimistic.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: In connection with the shipbuilding industry, as the Hon. Member may know, we have had ongoing discussions with that industry. I think in due course he may be most pleased with some of the proposals which will be agreed to, to ensure that the shipbuilding industry will become viable in coming years.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

ADVANCE PAYMENT OF RENTS

Mr. Tom Hockin (London West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. It is a question which could save the Government of Canada millions of dollars. Will the Minister continue the wasteful practice of past years of paying many days in advance, each month, for properties it is renting in Ottawa and across the country?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. de Cotret: If Hon. Members would like to know the answer to the question, I would be very pleased to give it to them. In recent months we have undertaken a very thorough review of the whole issue of cash management within the Public Service, our agencies, and our Crown corporations. I am happy to announce that measures that been taken to ensure that new directives will be applied to maximize the usefulness of the cash we have at our disposal to the Treasury, which will amount to several hundred millions of dollars per year in savings to the CRF.

ENERGY

NEGOTIATIONS WITH WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the deadline for an agreement with the western energy producing provinces is March 31—and the Minister will acknowledge the importance of maintaining that deadline for the economy of the country—could the Minister assure the House that an agreement with these provinces will be reached by March 31?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Hon. Member that talks are proceeding very amiably. As I have said before, we are into the most difficult part of the negotiations. I think it should be clearly understood in the House that all the parties to this negotiation—the provinces and the federal Government—are breaking new ground because we are attempting to go to a process of deregulation from a highly administered system. The impacts of that have to be very carefully studied. That work is continuing regularly. I am certain the deadline will be met.

PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, we have heard conflicting positions from various members of the Government on the fate of the petroleum and gas revenue tax. What position is the Government taking with respect to the petroleum and gas revenue tax in negotiations with the western energy producing provinces?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Hon. Member that he could not have heard conflicting positions on energy policy from members of this Government, because there is only one energy policy of this Government, and it is supported by all of us.

FOOD AND DRUGS

CANADA-UNITED STATES DISCUSSIONS—GENERIC DRUGS ISSUE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to press reports, President Reagan has joined with multinational drug companies to seek changes in Canada's generic drug laws and will be discussing this question with the Prime Minister on Sunday. Could the Minister give the House guarantees that Canada will sign no agreement on generic drugs, or give no undertaking to the United States to change our patent laws in advance of public or parliamentary participation in the process?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to give my hon. friend the assurance, as I did last week in answer to a previous question, that we shall protect consumer interests at all times and that all groups will be consulted before any agreement is signed.

[English]

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY PARTICIPATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister. Given the fact that the Minister and his Department have permitted or encouraged discussions between the two types of drug manufacturing organizations, without participation by consumers' organizations or other interested parties, will he give assurances that there will be no agreement made, or no changes in law, without full participation by Members of Parliament and by interested groups such as the Consumers Association?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the Hon. Member that we had a meeting with representatives of the Canadian Consumers' Association last week, at which time we gave them the assurance that no changes would be made before consultations had been held with this group.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

ANNOUNCEMENT OF QUOTAS AND PRICES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Traditionally the Government has announced opening quotas and initial prices for western grains around the first of March. This is essential information for farmers in planning their seeding and so on. We are now within about a month of seeding commencement in western Canada. Could the Minister end the uncertainty which exists as a result of not providing this information, and immediately announce the initial prices and quotas for the new crop year?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board)): Mr. Speaker, indeed the Hon. Member is correct that in the past the previous Government attempted to get them out by the first of March, but in some cases it did not get them out until well into May when seeding was under way. We are presently going through the process of setting initial prices. The Hon. Member will be happy to learn that today we are putting to press a revised form of the pre-seeded acreage report, which we feel will be of much more use to prairie producers than the one that was put out previously and was largely political propaganda.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

ADVANCE PAYMENTS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I note the Minister is not prepared to announce the initial quotas and prices today. Could he assure farmers that the initial prices and quotas will be at least as high as last year? Would he be prepared to indicate that the advance payment under the Western Grain Stabilization Program will be made within the next month, and that it would be at least $700 million?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board)): Mr. Speaker, with regard to initial prices, it is well known that grain prices around the world are suffering. We will do the best we possibly can with initial prices. The Hon. Member should know with regard to quotas that there is every indication that for the rest of the crop year there will virtually be open quotas because of the fact that we suffered a poor crop. It looks very good for high quotas for the coming year. With regard to an interim payment under the Western Grain Stabilization Act, we have the mechanism in place and we expect to have cash in the hands of producers well before the first of May.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH CANADIAN SPACE AGENCY

Mr. Allan Pietz (Welland): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. The Aerospace Industries Association of Canada in public statement recently called for the creation of a Canadian space agency to eliminate what the Association termed as fragmentation in the management of Canada's programs and policies with regard to space. I should like to ask the Minister for his response, and what his recommendation to the Government will be regarding this suggestion.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Hon. Member's question. We all recognize and appreciate the commitment of our aerospace industry to the economic development of the country over the past 25 years. We are looking seriously at recommendations submitted by the Aerospace Industries Association and by other interested groups. We would take note, particularly, of the suggestion that a committee of Cabinet should co-ordinate the work of such an agency. Indeed that is the role of the Cabinet committee on economic and regional development at the present time and the interdepartmental committee on space. We will continue to manage our space program effectively.

TRUST COMPANIES

PIONEER TRUST—PLIGHT OF UNINSURED DEPOSITORS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the government Member who answers on behalf of the Minister of State for Finance, and written notice has been given. Since the collapse of Pioneer Trust on February 7, there has been considerable speculation about the fate of uninsured depositors. Can the Government inform us if there are still ongoing negotiations with the Government of Saskatchewan that can result in some compensation to the many uninsured depositors?

• (1500)

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I want first to thank the Hon. Member for the notice given. As the Hon. Member knows, there have been numerous discussions between the two levels of Government. I want to assure the Hon. Member that CDIC has taken steps to reimburse all insured depositors up to the insured limit. A great many of them have already been reimbursed. With regard to the uninsured depositors, the Hon. Member will recall that on Monday last the Minister of State for Finance replied in this House that the CDIC cannot, under its legislation, directly pay off uninsured depositors.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, over the weekend there was a Canadian Press story which stated that the Government will institute a public inquiry into the demise of Pioneer Trust. We understand the directions were given by the Prime Minister's Office. Can the Minister assure us that such an inquiry will indeed take place, and can he tell us who will head the inquiry?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I cannot either confirm or deny that. I am more than willing to take the question as notice. I can state that no specific instructions were given by the Prime Minister's Office to have officials conduct a hearing with respect to uninsured depositors.

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the petition presented by the Hon. Member for London-Middlesex (Mr. Clifford) by filing with the Clerk of the House on Tuesday, March 12, 1985, meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

NORTH AMERICAN AIR DEFENCE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to inform the House that the Government has approved an agreement with the United States under which the two countries will take part in a joint program to modernize the North American Air Defence Surveillance and Warning System. Documents constituting the agreement will be signed in Québec City on March 18 by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) and myself. These documents will be tabled in the House of Commons following signature.

The agreement provides for the establishment of a warning system around the perimeter of the North American continent which will be capable of detecting aircraft and Cruise missiles penetrating North American airspace at high and low altitudes within the atmosphere. This modernized system will consist of over-the-horizon backscatter radars, located in the United States and covering the eastern, western and southern approaches to North America. In the north, there will be a new and improved DEW Line—to be called the North Warning System. Most of the North Warning System will be located on Canadian territory. The new radars will permit Canadian forces interceptors—CF-18s—to identify and, if necessary, engage intruders on the perimeter. North Warning will enhance our sovereign ability to control access to Canadian airspace.

In concluding this agreement, we will be taking an important step forward in ensuring that Canada can carry out the responsibilities we share with the United States for the defence of North America. The agreement we have reached reflects the essence of the partnership between our two countries which share the continent—sovereign allies, independent neighbours and close friends. It is an agreement which serves both nations well. Under the new arrangements, Canada will, for the first time, fully exercise its national defence responsibilities on its own sovereign territory and within its own sovereign airspace.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I want to emphasize the importance of fully exercising sovereignty in our north. The DEW Line has served Canada well, but Canadians do not control it. The DEW Line is operated by the United States Air Force. Canadian involvement has been limited to small detachments of Armed Forces personnel at three of the 21 DEW Line sites in Canada. The North Warning System will be a Canadian-controlled system—operated, maintained and manned by Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Canadian sovereignty in our north will be strengthened and assured for the future. The agreement will present Canada with significant economic challenges and development opportunities. Canada will be assuming responsibility for over-all program management and systems integration of the North Warning project. Design, acquisition, installation and integration of all associated communications in addition to all construction in Canada will be undertaken by Canadians and by Canadian industry.

The industrial benefits from this project will, at the very least, equal national expenditures on it. More than 11,500 person-years of employment will be generated in the communications and construction industries during the eight-year modernization program.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I am confident that the project experience will help open world markets for Canadian industry, and for our highly skilled communications industry in particular.

I would like to make it clear that these radars are neither designed nor sited for the detection of ballistic missiles or of other events in space. This is an important distinction which many fail to make. The new long-range radars which will form part of the North Warning System will have essentially the same range of surveillance as the existing radars of the DEW Line. The new long-range radars will differ in that they will incorporate the most modern technology, and they will provide information on the direction, height and speed of aircraft entering their coverage. This information will permit Canadian forces interceptor aircraft operating from northern airstrips to identify and control potential intruders.

The short-range radars in the North Warning System are designed specifically to provide detection of aircraft at low altitude, to close the serious gaps in the present system.

There is no responsible alternative to modernization. Major components of the existing system are technically obsolete and increasingly difficult and expensive to maintain. Most important, the present system is no longer adequate to meet the modern bomber and Cruise missile threat.

It was Canada which initiated discussions with the United States on the need for a joint approach to modernize the air defence warning system, which is continental in scope. The question of modernization has been under review and study between the two countries since 1976. The approach adopted in the agreement is the result of an independent study, jointly funded by Canada and the United States, which was completed in 1979, and is the result of close consultations between the defence authorities of both countries.

The cost of the over-all modernization project will be in the order of $7 billion. The United States will be bearing some 88 per cent of this cost. The $1.5 billion estimated cost of the North Warning System component of the over-all program is to be shared, with Canada paying 40 per cent and the United States 60 per cent. The cost of operating and maintaining the North Warning System is to be shared on the same basis. However, Canada will be completely responsible for the actual operation and maintenance of the system in Canada, a major change from the agreement in effect for the DEW line.

Most of the radar stations in southern Canada which are now part of the Cadin-Pine Tree Line will need to be closed. These stations are of little military value now and they are very expensive to maintain and operate.

We recognize the social obligation to those communities which have come to derive much of their livelihood from these old stations. As a result, we have reached an agreement with the United States to share the costs of closing the stations of the obsolete Cadin-Pine Tree line, Canada paying 45 per cent and the United States paying 55 per cent. Assistance, with the social and economic costs borne by these communities as a result of closure, will be taken into account in the cost-sharing arrangements. I will be working very closely with my Cabinet colleagues, with the provinces and, most important, with the communities concerned to help those people affected by the closures.

Throughout the negotiations, the Government has sought to re-invigorate the Canada-United States defence partnership while at the same time enhancing Canadian sovereignty. This agreement on North American air defence modernization is tangible evidence of this Government's commitment to strengthen Canadian defence capacity and to ensure Canadian control of its defences.

Let there be no misunderstanding. By this agreement, Canadian sovereignty has been enhanced, including sovereignty over Canadian territory, sovereignty over Canadian defences, sovereignty over Canada's North and sovereignty over our own airspace.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: As Deputy Prime Minister, as Minister of National Defence and as the Member for Yukon, I am proud to make this announcement to the House and to the country today.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nippissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, we have just been advised by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) of a major agreement concerning Canada's future defence needs. It is an agreement that will possibly change our international stature in the world and is to be signed in Quebec City on March 18, this weekend, with very little consultation with Members of the House of Commons.

It is rather ironic that one week ago today, I posed a question to the Minister of National Defence asking him if he would appear before the External Affairs and National Defence Committee. At that time, he said he would if he were to be invited to do so by the Steering Committee.

The Minister is not even listening to me. That shows the importance he is giving to this statement.

The Minister gave me a commitment that he would attend a meeting this week. He was invited to do so by the Steering Committee, which met at 3.30 one week ago today. Both he and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) have been present in this House every day this week, yet neither one of them will consent to attend a meeting of the committee. The names of both Ministers came up at the Steering Committee meeting.

I would like to make one thing very clear, Mr. Speaker. We in the Liberal Party agree that the North Warning System must go into effect for surveillance purposes. There is no question in my mind about that at all. However, there is one thing that I wish to point out very succinctly today, and that is, that the Minister of National Defence should send the previous Liberal Defence Minister a thank-you letter for all the homework he did on this agreement in order that the present Minister could announce it today.

I have what I consider to be a very valid question of privilege. I received this seven-page announcement as the bells were calling Members to the House this afternoon. That gave me no opportunity to discuss the matter with my Party colleagues and my Leader. I think that this was a great discourtesy and I feel that the Minister should certainly take that into consideration in the future.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hopkins: I am hearing some comments from Members across the way regarding my remarks. However, we are discussing today a $7-billion program. Surely a seven-page announcement deserves more than one-hour's notice since every Member of the House is responsible to the people of Canada.

As I mentioned, this agreement will be signed after only one short meeting of a House committee at which there was no opportunity to call witnesses. Moreover, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs refused to attend meetings this week. We in this Party, like Canadians from coast to coast, are concerned that this modernization will lead directly or indirectly to an involvement in the star wars initiative that has been mentioned on many occasions.

In the past, Canadians bought a limited defence package, which later turned out to be a monster containing the Bomarc missiles. That was done by a previous Conservative Government. Canada should not be put in such a position again. This Parliament and Canadians should not be forced to accept and endorse a secret agreement which could alter our lives forever.

In particular, I would like to point out that the Minister of National Defence mentioned surveillance of the North and our CF-18 fighter aircraft. As everyone in the House knows and as all Canadians know, these aircraft were purchased by the former Liberal government. That agreement was signed. Contrary to all statements in the press about cost overruns, it has now been found that the aircraft may well come in under cost.

There are some serious questions brought up by the Minister's statement. Have the aboriginal people been consulted on this agreement? What has been their involvement? Will they be consulted? Does this agreement contain a specific clause to protect Canada from becoming automatically involved in further advanced technology down the road without proper consultation and without a decision being made by a future Canadian Government? Can we knock out a Cruise missile with a CF-18 Sidewinder or a Sparrow missile? If we cannot do so, will we require nuclear warheads to do so? If we did so, would we be breaching the Anti Ballistic Missile treaty? This would place Canada in the position of playing a leading role in destabilization.

• (1520)

Will the Minister, even at this eleventh hour, agree to hold immediately an emergency meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to review in detail the proposed agreement with the aid of outside, independent experts? If he will not agree to an emergency meeting of the committee, will he agree to the immediate postponement of the signing of the accord until Canadians, including the Canadians in Parliament, have had an opportunity to review in detail the agreement before the appropriate parliamentary committee? Surely, that is not asking too much. We have heard a lot about open Government in Canada—

Mr. Malone: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: The Hon. Member can clap, but we have a $7 billion secret agreement which is being signed without consultation with the Parliament of Canada. That is open Government!

Will the Minister assure the House that there is a clause in the proposed agreement which will guarantee that in no way will the modernized system be used to support or complement the Strategic Defence Initiative? Canadians want a 100 per cent guarantee that there will be no linkage between the agreement and SDI. Will the Minister guarantee to the House that there will be a clause in the agreement which will ensure an automatic review of the agreement—it is very important and we had this with NORAD—at least every five years by the Parliament of Canada and that, if so desired, Parliament may revise any part of that agreement on one year's notice? That is not asking too much when we are talking about Canadian sovereignty.

There is one other item which I would like to mention, that is, the Cadin-Pine Tree stations which will be closed. I note in the agreement that the Government has given a commitment that it will liaison very closely with communities which are built around the Cadin-Pine Tree Line. We welcome that. We will watch carefully to make certain that that commitment to those small communities in Canada is entirely lived up to.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to thank the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) for bringing back the old tradition in the House of ministerial statements on motions, to give members of the Opposition a chance to comment on major policy statements. However, I hope that the Minister will not limit his involvement with this side of the House simply to a seven-page document. I hope we can call on him at any time that is reasonable and feasible to come to a committee hearing so that we can spend several hours discussing this very, very vital and important policy.

The Government has stated that it is necessary to upgrade the old Dew Line because it is outdated. The Senate committee pointed out that gaps in radar could allow Soviet bombers to attack North America. Therefore, the Government believes that it must counter that threat to protect our sovereignty. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said that the previous Liberal Government had compromised that sovereignty by neglecting Canada's defences. He is only partly right. The Liberals did neglect our defences, there is no doubt about that. They are responsible for the threat which we must counter with a new North Warning System, but not for the reasons which the Prime Minister mentioned earlier.

The reason the Dew Line has to be updated is the new threat of Soviet bombers armed with Cruise missiles. Canada helped to usher in the era of the Cruise missile. The Government's Defence Industry Productivity Program gave Litton Systems the money to develop the guidance system for the Cruise missile. The defence production sharing agreement allowed that technology to be exported to the United States to build the Cruise missile. The umbrella testing agreement allowed the Cruise missile to be tested and perfected in Canada. Of course, now it has come back to haunt us.

Naturally, the Soviet Union matched the U.S. by developing its own Cruise missile system. So now Canada has to spend up to $800 million to build a North Warning System to defend itself against a weapon that it helped to develop. That is the Government's idea of job creation? I think it is slightly mad!

Now I have mentioned it, let us examine MAD—Mutual-Assured Destruction. That is the nuclear deterrence which has kept peace for 40 years. But it cannot last forever. Now there is a chance that the Soviet Union may offer to cut its offensive weapons in return for U.S. cuts in star wars. But the U.S. insists on developing yet another new weapons system. No one knows where SDI will lead or how it will affect arms control, but we do know some of the potential dangers. SDI may split the Western Alliance if the U.S. turns down cuts in Soviet weapons because it wants to develop star wars. The U.S. may violate the ABM treaty if it goes ahead with the Talon Gold Test in 1987, and the Soviets may counter SDI by MIRVing their ICBMs and adding more Cruise missiles.

In Question Period this afternoon, the Hon. Member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett) asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) if the clause which was taken out of the NORAD Agreement by the Liberals in 1981 would be returned this weekend in Quebec City. I would like to quote the Secretary of State for External Affairs word for word. He said, "This agreement will not involve in any way a Canadian commitment to participate in an active ballistic missile defence". That clause was taken out. I would ask the Minister of National Defence, will he insist this weekend that that clause be returned to any new NORAD Agreement? It is fundamental to the future development of star wars. Without that clause—and the Minister once again spoke about our sovereignty in our airspace—it is absolutely hollow. That clause must be put back into the NORAD Agreement. That is all there is to it. It is very simple.

It will affect Canada in many ways. The submarines and bombers armed with those Cruise missiles will threaten from the Arctic. Still, the Government insists on the following: One, that SDI is only research. Can anyone in their right mind sitting on the other side tell me that the United States will spend up to $25 billion on blackboard and chalk, and that it will not develop the system and then deploy it? It is utter nonsense. How naive can the Government be? Two, the Government insists that the Dew Line update is only a warning system. Three, there is no connection between SDI and the North Warning System, and, four, there may be inadvertent consequences, but we can get out of them. This, too, is absolute nonsense.

Yesterday in the House I described how NORAD and the U.S. Air Force were already merging space and surface warning systems into a NORAD/Space Command. It is a combined command. The system will pick up a threat detected by either satellites or ground-based radars. It will then co-ordinate the defensive response. In other words, the two systems are already combined. In other words, the upgrading of the North Warning System is, in fact, already a part of star wars. A star wars system could counter ICBMs, and fighter planes can counter bombers and Cruise missiles.

In that context we should ask, is it a coincidence that the North Warning System will upgrade northern bases for CF-18 fighters? Is it a coincidence that the Government is considering buying an additional 20 CF-18s? Is it a coincidence that the U.S. is developing a "look-down, shoot-down" radar so that fighters can knock down Cruise missiles? No. The Americans know that SDI will have to counter the air-breathing threat that can slip under space-based weapons. That is the inadvertent consequence of adopting a defence strategy.

The U.S. is adopting that strategy with the Strategic Defence Initiative. NORAD will have to be a part of that strategy. The North Warning System will be a necessary component of the defensive strategy. The Government should make it its business to know about these "inadvertent consequences". The Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs should investigate them and report to the House or to the appropriate standing committee of this House.

• (1530)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the Government has the right and the obligation to consult with the United States about future activities of our defence alliance. That obligation is set out explicitly in the current NORAD Agreement. The Government must take that obligation seriously if it intends to govern responsibly.

The scientific world is leading the military world which, in turn, is leading the political world down a dark path about which most of us know very little, and we should have the courage to admit it at this stage. We should make sure in this country that there are built-in safeguards so that we do not get sucked into the Strategic Defence Initiative, which I feel is more appropriately called star wars, because that is exactly what it is. It is space-based, space-launched warfare.

Believe me, Mr. Speaker, when American scientists are now talking in terms of not a few hours of response, not a few minutes, but in terms of a few seconds, where are we going? I hope the Minister will make it abundantly clear to President Reagan this weekend that we want that clause put back in NORAD and that we want control over the North. Yes, we are prepared to share early warning information with our allies, but we are not prepared to go along with the star wars holus-bolus without knowing where it is going to take us, because it is the most destabilizing defence offensive system which has ever been devised by man to date.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) on what is a very serious day in the life of this country. We are now taking a very radical departure and making a change in the whole foreign policy defence standing which Canada has adopted in the past 30 or 40 years. We regret deeply, as my colleague has already stated, that this major departure in our position has been taken without effective consultation in this Parliament.

By the words the Minister has brought to this Parliament this afternoon, is he now saying that this Government agrees with the change in North American defence strategy as announced by the United States President and several defence officials that they will no longer rely upon the question of deterrence as a form of stability and security but will now be pursuing an active defence system for North America which will in a sense break the pattern over the past 30 or 40 years? Are we now committing ourselves to that defence policy, as already announced by the Americans and the U.S. Secretary of Defence in front of Congress to justify its participation in the North Warning System? Does the Minister not believe that that will now result in a major militarization of northern Canada, with the placement of a number of military facilities, communications systems and networks? Is this Government now saying that it is prepared to agree with that change in defence policy without ever having had it debated or discussed in this Parliament and without any opportunity being given to Canadians themselves to know the implications or consequences?

It is very important to know at this point in time—perhaps because we are denied the opportunity in committee to have this kind of debate—if the Minister is saying that this Government does agree with that fundamental change in defensive policy and agrees with the U.S. President and the Secretary of Defense that they are now pursuing an active defence system and are no longer relying upon the deterrent basis for security in North America?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the point has been made by the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner), the Hon. Member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) and now, surprisingly, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), that there has been no opportunity to discuss this matter in Parliament. The last time I looked, the standing committees were still part of this Parliament and the matter has been before the House of Commons Standing Committee. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) told the committee that he was prepared to sit there for as long as Hon. Members had questions, but they ran out of questions.

The matter has also been considered by the Senate Committee. It is being considered now. There is no doubt in my mind that it will again be considered before the end of the supply period in this semester by the committee. It is not true what the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior says, that there has been no commitment to appear before that committee. I have given that commitment, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already been there. I do not know what arrangements he has made, but chances are that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has agreed to appear again.

With respect to the consultation process, I might point out that the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry was a member of the Government—not of the administration but of the Government—which commenced these negotiations in 1976. He was part of an administration which was active in those negotiations. What the Hon. Member is saying now, that there should be a consultation and that he should be the recipient of further and better information on the North Warning System, rings a little hollow, to use, I believe, his phrase, unless it was that of the Hon. Member for Brant.

The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry knows full well what the North Warning System is all about. I agree with the Hon. Member for Brant—and it seems to be evidenced by the intervention of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry and the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior—that very few people know very much about what they are discussing. That is quite obvious after listening to the intervention of one who should know better, namely, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry, who, it appears, does not know his atmospherics from space. He does not know what is on top of the ionosphere and what is below it. NWAS has nothing whatsoever to do with—

Mr. Axworthy: Nonsense, you had better read what Weinberger had to say.

Mr. Nielsen: The Hon. Member says "nonsense". Fundamentally, the North Warning System replaces a system which was put in place under a Liberal Government, the DEW Line, and under a system put in place by the Liberal Government of the day, the Pine Tree Line.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): That's what they are telling you today, Erik.

Mr. Nielsen: With respect to sovereignty, I do not hear those Hon. Members now howling about sovereignty. My goodness, when I first came here under the Diefenbaker Government, Ministers of the Crown had to make an application to the United States management corporation even to visit those sites on our own Canadian territory. That is the Liberal idea of negotiating the security of Canada's sovereignty over our own lands and airspace. That is not the case here.

Mr. Speaker: Order. With great respect—

Mr. Axworthy: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No, I am going to try to recognize everyone who has risen. My normal practice is to try to recognize everyone who has a question. If there is time, I will allow supplementary questions. I would encourage everyone to be brief so that those Hon. Members may get a chance to ask supplementary questions.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, as you know we have had no hearings on this agreement, none whatsoever, and actually only one hour in committee with the Minister. This has put us all in the position of having to use whatever occasion there might be to get information from the Government.

The Minister has said previously, has said again today and keeps reiterating, that there is no connection between the modernization of the DEW Line, the so-called North Warning System, and the development of the star wars, the Strategic Defence Initiative. Both the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) keep saying this. Has the Minister, or have his people, ever read the minutes of the Armed Services Committee of the U.S. Senate when defence estimates are before the committee? If he or his people have read those minutes, does the Minister not know that last year, in the discussion of defence estimates in the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee, the Department of Defence said that "space defence and ballistic missile defence involve the Canadians"? Specifically, is the Minister aware that during the same hearing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Ms. Jewett: —a modernized DEW Line—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An Hon. Member: Have more respect for the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: Can I encourage the Hon. Member to make this her last question? She has taken two and a half minutes now.

• (1540)

Ms. Jewett: I was coming to it. It is extremely important, Mr. Speaker. Is the Minister also aware that in the same hearings it was stated that a modernized DEW Line as well as the space shuttle are "collateral benefits to the Strategic Defence Initiative"?

Mr. Nielsen: I do not know how many times it has to be reiterated in order to get through to Hon. Members opposite. It does not make any difference how many times it is done because they will still, to use the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, abuse their position in the House by deliberately attempting to create a situation which does not exist. The Member herself does not know the difference between a radar system and the space system, obviously.

The complete answer to her question, quite apart from the answers which have been given by myself and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is contained, as I put on the record before, in a press release issued on behalf of the United States Government by the United States Embassy here in Ottawa dated March 7. It refers to misleading reports deliberately enhanced by members of the Opposition for questionable motives. That release stipulates, and I am quoting it again:

> With regard to the upgrading of the DEW Line and its replacement with the North Warning radars, the Department can state clearly and categorically that the North Warning System being planned by Canada and the United States is not part of the Strategic Defence Initiative Program.

Now I do not know what can be clearer than that, Mr. Speaker. It is not going to help to continue to repeat it because they are just going to continue to try to play Marrying Sam in trying to create the bride and groom of SDI and NWS, which is totally untrue. Again I wish they would stop abusing their position as Members to propagate that absolute tripe.

Air Defence Modernization

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, to set the Hansard record straight, my colleague who responded to the Minister's statement was the Hon. Member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins), not Cochrane-Superior.

What the Minister has announced today, Mr. Speaker, is nothing less than a mega-project for northern Canada. The impact is bound to be significant. There is no mention at all in the Minister's statement about an assessment of the impact on aboriginal peoples. Is he able now to detail for the House how this consultative process will work with aboriginal peoples? I notice there will be 11,500 person years of employment created in communications and construction. By what means will be aboriginal people have an opportunity to participate in these jobs?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for confusing the Hon. Member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins) with the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner). I certainly would not want to add to their joint confusion.

As I indicated in my statement, the broadest possible consultation is going to take place between the Ministries, including the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) and, very important, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald). We are most conscious, myself particularly, of any impact the project will have on our aboriginal peoples.

I suppose the short answer is to assure the Hon. Member that I will insist during the progress of the whole project that not only the socio-economic impact on our native peoples is thoroughly taken into consideration, but also the job opportunities which might accrue to them, which are of a considerable magnitude.

Mr. Jardine: Mr. Speaker, I know the Minister appreciates the economic impact that the closure of the Canadian Pine Tree Line will have on the communities affected. Can he elaborate further on what assistance the Government will be giving to the communities and people so affected?

Mr. Nielsen: That will be of particular concern to the consultation process which I just described between the Department of National Defence and the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I have also had the suggestion that it would be useful to meet with some of the local officials in these communities. I think that was a worth-while suggestion. It should also, I think, be emphasized that while there was no obligation to do so, at our suggestion in the negotiations leading to this agreement, the United States has agreed to assist us financially in dealing with the minimal-socio-economic implications resulting from this project. I think that is a significant display of the determination of the two countries to address our mutual concerns in achieving the objective of modernizing this system.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up on the question asked by the Hon. Member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Jardine) regarding closure of the Pine Tree Line. As the Minister knows, there is already severe unemployment in Atlantic Canada. I respect the Minister's wish to have consultations on these matters, but there is no way that consultations are going to make up for the loss of jobs and economic activity. These losses would be a very severe blow. There is a possibility that there will be new West Coast and East Coast defence systems. Has the Minister given any thought perhaps to turning existing installations on the Pine Tree Line into new defence systems?

Mr. Nielsen: Indeed, I thank the Hon. Member for raising that aspect of the project because it gives me the opportunity to tell him and Members generally that the present closure plans with respect to the Cadin Pine Tree Line would affect some 17 of the 24 stations and some 3,725 jobs. Of those jobs, 1,975 are military positions which can be redeployed to higher priority uses in the defence program. Another 1,027 positions are those of civilians directly employed by DND. The vast majority of these can be employed at other DND locations if the employees are willing to move and if the Department is in a position to retain the person year authorizations to redeploy them. This leaves 722 civilians living in the communities whose jobs depend on the stations. Of these, 275 are dependants of military personnel. There are DND programs to assist employees to relocate and I will be forming a committee with my colleagues, including the Minister of Employment and Immigration, to ensure that we make full use of the wide variety of adjustment, retraining, relocation, job search and income support programs available, both within the federal and the provincial Governments, for those in need of assistance. We will be working closely with the provinces and the communities affected in developing programs for each individual community.

Might I just add very quickly that those stations in the Atlantic areas are the least affected by the entire project.

• (1550)

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask for a comment from the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) on the process. Many Members of the House are pleased that we had the opportunity to peruse this agreement and discuss it on Statements by Ministers. We operate under a process by which a small group in the executive is entitled to sign international agreements with long-term effects which are not brought before Parliament for consideration, when in fact our partner with whom we are involved in many of these agreements does have an opportunity to present that material to elected legislators for their consideration.

Is the Government considering a process whereby documents such as this one and the interception agreement made on the West Coast would become subjects for discussion in Parliament to give legislators in this forum an opportunity to take a serious look at the implications which this and other agreements that the Government has already signed would have for Canada in the long term?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, that is the second time in as many days that a member of that Party has held up as an example the desirability of adopting the United States system of Government. That is not our system of government. If what he is suggesting were to come about, it would cause serious and broad changes to our system of government. It is certainly not within my responsibility, nor within that of the Government, to invoke any system other than that which has developed within our country since Confederation. The fact of the matter is that the Government is charged with the responsibility of making these decisions. There has been consultation as I have described. That is part of the parliamentary process. With that foregoing explanation, the simple answer to the Hon. Member's question is no.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question to the Minister of National Defence and Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), and make sure that both the question and the answer will be conveyed to the President of the United States (Mr. Reagan) who will be making a historic visit to Quebec City next weekend. Therefore, I will ask it in English.

[English]

What plans or arrangements are there to provide landing or dispersal facilities for U.S. aircraft in times of crisis or in wartime?

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry, I did not get the entire question. I wonder if the Hon. Member would put it again quickly?

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): My question is, what plans or arrangements are there to provide landing or dispersal facilities for U.S. aircraft in times of crisis or in wartime?

Mr. Nielsen: Under the existing arrangements between the two countries, there are arrangements for United States aircraft to use Canadian bases. That will be extended as the new air facilities, the ground facilities to accommodate the modernization of the system, are expanded in northern Canada. The same provisions of the existing arrangements would be expanded to accommodate those new purposes of NWS.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask a supplementary question because I did not receive an answer from the Hon. Minister of Defence (Mr. Nielsen) on the first question. He spent his time hashing over some old history. I simply want to know from him, because it goes to the very base of the announcement he made today, whether the Government is now signalling its clear agreement that the change in strategy, change in approach and change in defence thinking that was announced a year ago by President Reagan, and has since been endorsed by Secretary Weinberger, which says that we are now moving from deterrence to active defence and that the North Warning System is a part of that very fundamental change in military policy, is now the policy of the Government of Canada?

Mr. Nielsen: There he goes again distorting the actual facts. He knows that is a distortion because his Government initiated these discussions. All we are doing is bringing about the formal conclusion to an agreement which he and his Government brought to 99 per cent of completion.

Mr. Axworthy: That is a cop-out.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister might focus on the key part of the question that I raised previously. Certainly it would not change the nature of government to lay the document before the House and allow Parliament to take a serious look at it. That is ultimately done in the United States. The Government would still have the opportunity and responsibility to make the decision. With regard to the Canada-U.S. salmon interception treaty, it was stated for the record by a Cabinet Minister that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) never read the document and that it went through Cabinet in 30 minutes. This process is unacceptable.

Has the Deputy Prime Minister, who when in opposition fought this abusive use of power, now changed his standards to the point that he would not provide information to Parliament and the people of Canada in advance of making his decision?

Mr. Nielsen: I can understand the frustrations of the Member, being as he is a member of the Opposition where he will likely remain for as long as he is here.

Mr. Skelly: You spent a long time here yourself.

Mr. Nielsen: The Hon. Member is suggesting a fundamental change in the system. It would be presumptuous of me or of the Government to make that kind of decision unilaterally. I am sure that he would be the first to howl. At the moment the Prime Minister has appointed a committee headed by the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), which includes a distinguished member of the Hon. Member's own Party and members of the Official Opposition, which is studying this very kind of question. I would suggest to the Hon. Member that he might make more effective and constructive suggestions regarding changes of the depth that he has in mind if he would attend and make his views known to that committee and assist in bringing constructive recommendations out of that committee back to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to recognize Hon. Members from Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) and Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan) on supplementary questions and the Member for Calgary East (Mr. Kindy), and then I am going to end the questions and comments period.

Mr. Penner: In his response, the Minister used the word "confusion". I think he is confused about his own statement. Nowhere in this statement is there any reference to the socio-economic impact regarding the modernization program to which he referred. There is reference to the closing of the Pine Tree Line sites. Where can Members of Parliament learn about the impact that this will have on northerners, and how they will be enabled to respond adequately to that impact and take advantage of the opportunities that will be provided? Where are the detailed plans for that? If they are not ready now, how quickly will they be ready? How will Members of Parliament be able to study those plans in order to get this information into the hands of northerners, who are deeply concerned about it?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate and fully understand that concern, as the Hon. Member knows. However, that is the kind of question that he will have the opportunity to put to me in the Standing Committee. I would suggest that that would be the place to discuss the kind of detail which he anticipates in the question. I am sure that he will agree that in a statements and questions mode such as this there would simply not be the opportunity to answer the question he put in a fair way. If the House has the time, Mr. Speaker, I have 15 pages that I could read to the Hon. Member, but I do not think it does.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) mentioned that 17 of the 24 Pine Tree Line stations would be closed. Could the Minister tell us which stations are going to be closed, or which ones are going to be left open, or perhaps both?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I think I can best answer that question by focusing on the ones that will remain open. Those will be five sites; Holberg in the west, and Gander, Goose Bay, Sydney and Barrington in the east. It will be necessary to maintain those stations in order to maintain surveillance on our coasts until newer radar coverage is proven. The two sites at Cold Lake and Mont Apica are essential to air training programs.

• (1600)

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the effect of that agreement on our independence. Will we remain an independent nation or will the Americans have all of the input into this agreement? Will this enhance our sovereignty or diminish it?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, in response to the Hon. Member for Calgary East (Mr. Kindy), I think perhaps the best way I could answer his question would be to say that under the agreement, Canada will be exercising its national responsibilities on its own national territory and in its own national airspace by controlling, operating and maintaining those parts of the North American air defence system located in Canada.

In keeping with the strengthening and maturing of our sovereignty and our responsibility, Canada will also be responsible for all of the system's construction and all of the communications in Canada. Canada will operate and maintain all the elements of the system on Canadian territory, which is a change from the previous arrangements under the DEW Line. I am sure the Hon. Member will recognize the significance of that distinction.

PETITIONS

GASOLINE PRICE INCREASES IN QUEBEC

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Duvernay): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 494 residents of the towns of Beebe, Rock Island and Stanstead. The petition has been signed by people who, during the program aired by Sherbrooke radio station CHLT 63, have denounced the latest retail price increases of gasoline in Quebec which, for too long now, have been doubly penalizing people who live close to the American border.

Given the excessive price of gasoline, the petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to convince the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Côté) to intervene in this case by enforcing laws on combines and free competition.

I present the petition and strongly urge the Government to give it due consideration.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 52, 152 and 181.

[Text]

RCMP DEPLOYED IN NEW BRUNSWICK AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 52—Mr. Howie:

With respect to the number of persons employed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and deployed, during the last two years, in each of New Brunswick and Newfoundland (a) did the number deployed decline and, if so, for what reason (b) what total number of persons were deployed in each of the years and what total amount was paid to the Government for their services (c) what rate per person was charged for police services?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Solicitor General of Canada): (a) Yes. In New Brunswick, expansion of the New Brunswick Highway Patrol resulted in a corresponding decrease in RCMP personnel. In Newfoundland, expansion of the Royal Newfoundland Constabulary has also resulted in a decrease of RCMP personnel in the St. John's area.

	Regular Members
	* (Including R/M's, S/Csts., C/M'S)	* P/S	Total
1982/83
New Brunswick	543	98	641
Newfoundland	667	98	765
1983/84
New Brunswick	521	98	619
Newfoundland	634	114	748

For fiscal years 1982/83 and 1983/84, the Province of New Brunswick reimbursed the Government of Canada $15,317,-361.79 and $15,773,529.86 respectively. The Province of Newfoundland reimbursed Canada $22,355,518.38 and $22,715,-559.52 respectively for the same periods.

(c) A rate per person is not struck in relation to total police services in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Newfoundland.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE

Question No. 152—Mr. Friesen:

1. In each office of the (a) National Headquarters in Ottawa (b) Pacific Regional Headquarters (c) Prairie Regional Headquarters (d) Ontario Regional Headquarters (e) Quebec Regional Headquarters (f) Atlantic Regional Headquarters of the Correctional Service, what is the total number of employees (administration, policy advisors, stenographers, clerks, etc.)?

2. What prior experience or training in the Correctional Service did the Commissioner have before his appointment to that position?

3. Was the senior officer (the regional director) of the Correctional Service reclassified to Assistant Deputy Commissioner level, just shortly before the announcement of the 6 and 5 program and, if so, what was the attendant increase in the salary scale for such a change?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Solicitor General of Canada): In so far as the Correctional Service of Canada is concerned:

1. (a) National Headquarters — 654
   (b) Pacific Regional Headquarters — 147
   (c) Prairies Regional Headquarters — 102
   (d) Ontario Regional Headquarters — 208
   (e) Quebec Regional Headquarters — 189
   (f) Atlantic Regional Headquarters — 82

2. At the date of the question, the Commissioner was Donald R. Yeomans who was appointed on December 9, 1977. At that time, Commissioner Yeomans had no prior experience or training in the Correctional Service.

3. The Regional Deputy Commissioner positions were converted from SX to EX on April, 1981 as a result of the government's decision to introduce a new management classification plan in the Public Service. Accordingly, all SXs in the Government were converted to EXs as a result of this decision.

The salary range for each Regional Deputy Commissioner is as follows:

Region	Level
Atlantic	SX-1 to EX-3
Quebec	SX-2 to EX-4
Ontario	SX-2 to EX-4
Prairies	SX-2 to EX-4
Pacific	SX-2 to EX-4

Salary Range

SX-1: $36,800 to $50, 000
SX-2: $41,900 to $57,100
EX-3: $51,500 to $60,800
EX-4: $56,400 to $66,200

RCMP EXPENDITURES

Question No. 181—Mr. Stackhouse:

1. In (a) 1980 (b) 1981 (c) 1982 (d) 1983, what were the expenditures of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

2. In 1983, what were the expenditures on drug enforcement?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Solicitor General of Canada):

1. (a) 1980/81 — $598,733,000
(b) 1981/82 — $650,867,000
(c) 1982/83 — $729,050,000
(d) 1983/84 — $801,737,000

2. Drug enforcement expenditures in 1983 were $45,371,000. It should be noted that this expenditure does not include expenditures incurred by members of the RCMP employed on duties other than drug enforcement but through the nature of their duties become involved in drug enforcement activities.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hnatyshyn (for Mrs. McDougall) that Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Bretton Woods Agreements Act

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.

There is no question that the financial structure of a country is inseparable from its social justice. Although this Bill proposes technical amendments to our structural relationship to these institutions, we should also consider the functions of these institutions and what they stand for, not only in Canada and in the western world but particularly in Third World countries. When we support the institutions that make up the financial structure of the world, we also support their economic decisions which have wide ranging effects throughout those less developed countries.

Quite often, the institutions and organizations that are addressed in this Bill provide a human element in this financial structure. While some say that this human element is particularly unfeeling occasionally, the charters of these institutions have indicated that the intent of this human element was to make it possible for western countries to assist the less developed countries.

Those who support these institutions would cite the conditions that are imposed on populations in support of possible developments as part of the infusion of financial aid to different parts of the world. I think I would agree with those people.

Perhaps some Third World countries are finding it increasingly difficult to accept those conditions that are imposed on them by these institutions. When we are considering our support for these institutions, perhaps we should consider those conditions that are being imposed by these institutions that come under the IMF and the World Bank.

One Prime Minister has accepted over the years financial assistance from the IMF and World Bank. Recently he was faced with the strong suggestion that his country adopt some austerity measures, and so because of his country's need for support from the World Bank, he suggested that his country would have to put up with food riots. This is a particular example of how organizations such as the International Bank for Construction and Development, the International Development Association and the International Finance Corporation are becoming deeply involved in the internal development and structure of countries which they are supposed to help. I make these statements by way of introduction because I believe that we in Canada have a role to play in the control which finance has in the world. Finance is becoming a dictator of economic development and consequently a dictator of social justice in large parts of the world.

Canada was once a colony, but colonialism is unacceptable to us. It is part of our heritage, but we have come out of it very well. We have come out of it because our mother country was not too distant from us in ideology and cultural development. Most of Canada was settled by people from Europe who had the same traditional structure of democracy or close to democracy. They were from areas with the same political structure and in some cases somewhat the same economic structure. The mother country, in the process of colonizing Canada, expected it to be a supplier of goods. Basically we developed in that mode, but now we have removed ourselves from political and economic colonialism. Although exploitation was part of the reason for the development of the new world, Canada and the United States, it did not work that well in the end, as far as mother countries were concerned.

In many Third World countries the situation was quite different. Exploitation was imposed in the sense of making use of part of the social structure of those countries to provide European countries, the colonial masters, with the materials they needed to become rich and powerful, with very little effort being made to establish a long-term economic structure to help Third World countries survive. In Third World countries one kind of colonialism has been traded for another. The political colonialism of the past has been traded for financial colonialism and for industrial colonialism—for economic colonialism, if we take them together. Sometimes the mother country has been replaced entirely by faceless multinational corporations, which do not even have the basic interests of the colonial masters of the past. They are faceless corporations which have a bottom line mentality, and any expense which might reduce their profits is considered unacceptable.

If we travel through many Third World countries, we find in the minds of the people—and sometimes even in the minds of their Governments—that the economic colonial master is generalized as the West. In the past, the West has been the basis of the money which has gone into the institutions which are supposedly lending money for the good of these countries or in a suggested attempt to let them develop on their own. Also we find something which concerns me greatly, the almost unlimited arrogance of the West. That arrogance is imposed upon these countries by the institutions which are being supported in this Bill. I have worked in the Third World long enough to know that those countries have found themselves in a position of having to accept money. Since that is so, the World Bank immediately imposes conditions on how the money will be used. In many cases it is not used in the best interest of the country, but in such a way as to increase trade with the western countries that support the IMF and the World Bank. That arrogance is manifested by their actions across the Third World and in the actions of the World Bank in the control of capital in such a way that the dictation of how the money is used has changed the social stucture of the countries using it. These countries have experienced the imposition of colonialism of a different kind by the World Bank and the IMF, but it is colonialism all the same. Instead of political colonialism, it is economic, financial and, to some extent, cultural colonialism.

I should like to refer to the net result of this. I say "net result" because sometimes the original idea was worth-while and even the structure was worth-while. However, the net result has been hindrance rather than help. These institutions, through their control of capital, have imposed various kinds of trade on the countries to which they have lent money. In many cases, when a country receives a loan, it finds that aid from western countries which support the World Bank is reduced because it now has money to buy the product which it normally received in the form of aid. However, it is not quite given enough and is forced to buy from countries which support the World Bank. It finds itself unable to penetrate markets where it could purchase cheaper goods.

By supporting loans from the World Bank, the western world has indirectly forced these countries to buy western world products and to continue to buy those products, sometimes at a much higher cost than they would have paid had they been able to buy on the world market. Also, acceptance of these loans allows no break in the servicing of them. These countries are already in trouble, but there is no break in the servicing of the loans until they find themselves in a position where they are unable to repay them. When they reach that point, they no longer have control of their economy. It is then controlled by the IMF and the World Bank. After they have borrowed, they find themselves subject to circumstances imposed by these institutions.

Lately we in this Parliament have been looking at farm financing. It has bothered me greatly that there is an amazing parallel between what has happened to these countries and what has happened to the farmers in those countries. They accepted loans which are now causing them trouble. They find it difficult to survive. That is exactly what happened to these countries. They accepted loans on the understanding that these magnanimous institutions would help them. They now find that they are unable to repay these loans. They are in trouble and are being forced to do things which they consider to be as a result of an injustice.

History has shown that these western supported and controlled institutions will, if the country is unable to repay, intervene, not on behalf of the client country, but on behalf of the financial institutions which support them. It is to be expected, except that the charter says that these institutions were put in place to assist the client countries, not the banks or the countries that supplied them with the money.

We in this Party are not debating this Bill in an attempt to stop the marginally effective operation of the international financial structure. We know we cannot do that. After the length of time it has been in place, we recognize that it is necessary for it to continue. Let us not kid ourselves that any of these institutions operate on behalf of Third World countries. Let us recognize that these institutions are effectively assisting the financial and economic colonialism of the Third World.

This country, and I suppose the whole world, should recognize that the IMF continues to use its leverage to contravene the very reasons for which it was set up. The financial and economic colonialism which is now in place impedes other countries, including our own, from assisting in economic development. We find that aid from Canada is more difficult to give because it affects the financial structure under which these institutions operate.

We will pass this Bill and send it to committee, but we understand that the institutions that we are supporting are inadequate. Over the years, the very thrust of their charters has changed. They are no longer there for the benefit of Third World countries.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments on the speech of the Hon. Member? The Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) in debate.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Mr. Speaker, as most Members know, it was in July 1944 that Canada, along with 27 other nations, met at Bretton Woods in the United States in an attempt to promote domestic economic prosperity through international co-operation, a very worthy undertaking indeed. The establishment at that conference of the International Monetary Fund and of the World Bank is considered to be the most significant result of that Bretton Woods conference.

Today we are debating Bill C-30 which, among other things, very simply will continue to provide financial assistance to the World Bank group annually by way of the Estimates rather than through statutory amendments. I suppose that is an efficient way of meeting our commitments. I should tell Hon. Members that the World Bank group is composed of several institutions, not just one. They have a common objective, that is, to help raise the standard of living in developing countries by channelling financial resources from developed nations to the so-called developing world.

Canada was one of the founding members of the World Bank. At this moment in our history, a message has to go forth around the world that we here in Canada have a federal deficit which is so large that it has become a serious obstacle to achieving economic prosperity within our own borders.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Who gave it to us?

Mr. Penner: I will come to that. Unless we get our financial house in order and unless we do it quite soon, we will be in no position at all to assist the World Bank or to provide aid to any developing country, no matter how badly it needs it and no matter how much we want to provide that aid.

My hon. friend wants to know about those deficits and how they came about. Past federal administrations incurred these large deficits in the quite rightful effort to soften the effects of the recession upon our citizens. I would say that it was a noble and even worthy public policy, except that it was based on a false premise. It is very easy to say that in retrospect, with the wisdom of hindsight. The false premise was in the approach of Herbert Hoover that prosperity was just around the corner. Whether we like it or not, I think the corner is here. I think recovery, as much as we are going to have it, has taken place. This, in all likelihood, is our prosperity, but the deficit is still with us and it continues to grow.

I know that no one really wants to discuss this issue at any great length. It is a very inflammable public issue. Nevertheless, it is true that we in Canada are on the verge of a serious financial crisis. I believe that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) knows this. I also believe that some of his more politically aware colleagues want to sweep the whole issue under the parliamentary carpet. This deficit is undermining the Government's ability to use fiscal policy to respond to economic issues of the day, current economic issues. The response to which I refer is, of course, mainly in the domestic field, but since we are debating the Bretton Woods Agreement, I have to remind Hon. Members that it has an international aspect as well.

Canada today should be in a position to put forward long-range economic policy directions. Every Government wants to do that if at all possible. Included in those directions would, of course, be some response that would echo our concerns for the North-South relationship, the flow of aid and assistance to the developing world. We cannot fashion such policies. We cannot point ourselves in such directions unless we find a way of overcoming the severe handicap to economic prosperity which is being created by the federal deficit. Allow me to quote a professor at Queen's University in Kingston who said:

> Unless there is a credible strategy to bring the deficit under control, other policy initiatives that are taken in the coming year will have little chance of being brought to fruition.

That statement was made recently by Professor Douglas Purvis of Queen's University. May I suggest that we need today in Canada a fair, reasonable and very constructive anti-deficit policy. Unless we get one from the Government, there is not going to be any bright future for us or for anyone else in the world who looks to Canada for assistance and aid. Canada, of course, is not the only country with this problem. Many other countries have a deficit problem.

• (1630)

We all know that there are no easy, workable solutions to this serious issue. Gradual expenditure restraint has been tried on several occasions and has failed. I believe that one reason it fails is that so often there are Departmental officials who have the devilish ability to select the most politically sensitive programs to be cut. What a clever and devious way this is of protecting their own backsides. It is nothing short of sabotage.

I believe the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is guilty of this. Expenditure cuts have been imposed on the CBC and it has picked children's programs and programs for minority groups to cut. I know exactly what it is doing. The same thing can be said for the Department of the Environment. It cut the Canadian Wildlife Service because it knew there would be a great outcry against that kind of expenditure cut. It is nothing short of a way for officials to sabotage government policy.

The other alternative to the issue of the deficit is large across-the-board increases in taxes. We know that that would not be the answer either. It could be very disruptive and could even be harmful to a recovery which has been described as being fragile. That is not a bad description.

Our deficit is much more than cyclical in nature. It is to a very significant extent structural in its character. What does that mean? It means very simply that we are locked in to a set of circumstances, commitments, obligations and financial entanglements from which we cannot very easily extricate ourselves.

There are many outdated policy directives that now have the status and stature of sacred cows. The effects of many of these old policy decisions in today's setting are unproductive or even counterproductive and yet we go on living with them. Our expenditures grow, our deficit increases, our national debt mushrooms and we live with the consequences. That which needs particular attention at any given time is ignored. Why is it ignored? Simply because there is not enough money. Interest rates remain volatile, unemployment rates shockingly high and economic growth wavers between slow and stalled.

Despite all of this, and this is what concerns me so much, there is a large body of opinion in Canada which takes an entirely passive view of the deficit. Their view goes something like this: "Well, the economy is weak; therefore, we have a deficit". Has it ever occurred to any of these so-called economic thinkers that they ight have their analysis in reverse? Is it possible that we have a huge deficit; hence our economy is weak? Some more astute observers of the scene have noticed that the deficit is in fact malignant and that we are paying a very huge cost for this deficit, not just in terms of dollars, as serious as that may be, but also in the form of lost jobs, incomes and economic opportunities.

I do not need to remind the House that budgetary deficits in and by themselves are not necessarily unacceptable. Sometimes spending must of necessity exceed revenue. However, it is axiomatic that a manageable balance can be restore in the future. The rule is that we run deficits during recessions and have them offset by surpluses in times of economic expansion. However, as I said earlier, we are now having our economic expansion. This is it. Yet our deficits continue. It is madness. More than that, we are foreclosing on the future of generations that will follow after us. The only thing that is saving us from national bankruptcy at this moment is the taxing power of the federal Government. At any time, the federal Government may make a grab. However, the situation may become so serious that the Government may grab nearly everything and there will still not be enough.

Flying now and paying later may be okay if one just takes a few flights every year, but we have gone into continuous orbit using a credit card that has no limits. The largest amount of money ever to be spent by a Canadian Government, $105 billion, is to be spent by the Government this year. That is well in excess of $4,000 for every man, woman and child in the country.

It was President John F. Kennedy who once said that his country needed a national purpose and he identified that purpose as putting a man on the moon. Here in Canada we do not need to search around for a national purpose. We do not need to look for a challenge; we have one staring us right in the face. Our national purpose and challenge ought to be avoiding crossing that dangerous threshold between a fiscal problem and a fiscal crisis. The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) must enlist the support of every Canadian in an all-out effort to avert such a crisis.

In carrying out this national goal, there must be fairness and justice. If we want the same level and quality of federal services, we will have to pay the costs. Perhaps we can do some careful weeding in our garden of services. Of course we all want equity. We should also demand efficiency. The burdens which are created by deficit reduction must be borne by the strongest elements in our society and not imposed upon the weakest. Sometimes it is so much easier to choose the weaker elements because their political voices are so soft in comparison to those of the powerful lobbies that operate in and around Ottawa. There will be no political support for major reforms in revenue and expenditure unless the impacts are distributed fairly.

If I may return for just a moment to the words of Professor Purvis, he has said:

—"deficit reduction is clearly going to require statesmanship and tough leadership."

In 1983 the national debt was double that of 1978, and five times that of 1973. Clearly we are not a Brazil, an Argentina or a Mexico. However, we should note carefully that when interest payment obligations exceed the capacity of the Government to generate revenue, the Government loses its ability to creatively manage and direct its economy over time.

I have heard people say that it is ridiculous to imagine that at some point in time, one-half of our federal revenues will be needed to make interest payments. It does not sound so ridiculous any longer. We are moving rapidly in that direction. If we lose the capacity to set economic policy independently for ourselves and if we lose domestic control, then perhaps our relationship with the World Bank may become significantly altered. It may be quite different from what it is now. Instead of us being a contributor to the World Bank, perhaps it will feel obliged to assist us. Perhaps our costly garden of services will be analysed by the World Bank and it may decide what kind of selective weeding should be done. It may be the World Bank that comes to us and suggests an appropriate price for our wide variety of products and services which are in the public domain. Under such circumstances, our relationship with the Bretton Woods Agreements to which Canada was a signatory and to which we are now a significant contributor would take on an entirely different meaning. It is a meaning that would not be good for Canada and one that Canadians would not like at all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments, on the speech of the Hon. Member? The Hon. Member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby).

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, I have both a question and a comment for the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr.

Penner). First, I would like to indicate my support for the Member's comments when he related the matter of the national deficit and debt in Canada and other nations in the world to Bill C-30. The Bill really concerns the International Monetary Fund. We must be concerned about the stability of that fund. Therefore, there is a very substantial connection between the matter of national deficits and debts to the subject-matter of the Bill.

What was even more relevant in the Hon. Member's presentation was his reference to the control of the finances of Government by the Public Service, as opposed to the Government of the day and, indeed, the Parliament of the day. I want to underline some of the sad things the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior pointed out in that connection. He was right to mention the fact that in the past the will of the Government, in terms of debt reduction and deficit reduction, has been thwarted by officers of the Public Service. I think it is right and proper for the people of Canada to know that.

There are illustrations of that from the past and there are illustrations of that at present. The honest effort of the Government of Canada to reduce the amount which is spent by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been placed in jeopardy by some of the specific things the CBC has done. I have seen it in my constituency of Halifax West. However, I could give the House a better example.

In this House of Commons we have a Parliamentary Broadcast Service which is threatened by the officers of the CBC. Those officers intend to change the parliamentary broadcast which is now being watched by Canadians. If that is not an attempt to call undue attention to an honest effort to reduce the amount of money which is spent by the CBC, I do not know what is. It is an attempt to thwart the will of the Government which is representing the will of the people of Canada. It is an attempt to impose the will of the management of the CBC.

I would like to mention another important example to reinforce what the Hon. Member has said. In the Province of Nova Scotia, CN Marine has stopped, as part of its expenditure reduction, the services provided by the Bluenose Ferry between the Province of Nova Scotia and the State of Maine. This will amount to a saving of $3.4 million. Well, I have a message for CN Marine and Canadian National. If they want to save $3.4 million, they should not reduce the service provided by the Bluenose Ferry which as my colleague from South West Nova knows, is vital to his area. CN should cut out the advertisements on national television which tell us that Canadian National is a transport company which is in business for Canada. I do not need to be told by Canadian National that it is a transport company in business for Canada, at cost of millions of dollars, when that same organization is cutting out a vital service to Nova Scotians, particularly those in the fishing industry. That is the kind of activity which is designed to thwart the honest desire of the Government of Canada, and the people of Canada, in reducing the amount of the national deficit and debt.

I would like to ask the Hon. Member a question. Has he seen any difference in the Public Service of Canada, or the will of the Public Service, to thwart Parliament and the Government of Canada, notwithstanding the clear demonstration of the people of Canada, who told us in the September election that what they wanted was more responsible control of the financial management of the country? Does he see the Public Service of Canada responding to that clear request from the people of Canada?

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, that is an interesting question. I indicated in my remarks that the deficit was structural and not only cyclical in nature. I believe the same analysis could be applied to the Public Service of Canada. I think there are some very serious structural defects in the Public Service of Canada.

One of the things which has concerned me about the Nielsen Task Force—and Members opposite will be able to get information on this much more readily than I—is whether it is simply looking at the benefits and cost-effectiveness of programs, or if it is going much deeper and looking into the entire structure of the Public Service of Canada to determine, if significant cuts are desired, if there are certain aspects in the manner in which the Public Service conducts itself which would be very effective in the long run.

I would like to offer one suggestion. When the Nielsen Task Force findings are made public, we will find out whether there is any reference to this. What actually goes on in government Departments in the heavily-staffed policy divisions? Have we ever seen one small drop of policy come out of any of them? Usually, policy is much more effectively made by a handful of people in a Minister's office, or within the ranks of a political Party. But, how much workable, useful, applicable policy ever comes out of government Departments with their very large and expensive policy divisions? That is what I had in mind when I spoke about structural defects in the Public Service. I am very hopeful that the Nielsen Task Force will not eliminate or forget to apply its analysis to that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment and an invitation for the Hon. Member.

I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner). I think he has given us an introduction to the Budget debate which will probably be brought down in April. I think it is very encouraging that he said prosperity is here. I would like to agree with that. I believe the people of Canada on September 4 took a major step in ensuring that prosperity would return to the country.

He also said that we would sweep the deficit under the carpet. I disagree with that. On November 8, $4.2 billion in cuts was introduced by the Government. The Government has stayed with those cuts. The Government has not deviated from that introduction. The signal that the Government would live within its means was very clear. It is doing that. I dare say, it will exercise further fiscal restraint in reducing the deficit even further in the months and years ahead. We have to get our act under control and live within our means. By doing that, not only will we be able to supply more to needy Canadians, but, as the Hon. Member mentioned, we will put ourselves in the position of being able to offer more to needy people in developing countries. We must live up to our international responsibilities through agreements such as the Bretton Woods.

I would like to extend an invitation. The Hon. Member sounds very much like a Tory these days. I congratulate him on that. I would like to invite him to join this Government and occupy the seat behind me. I would be very happy to have him do that whenever he so wishes.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, first, I would advise the Hon. Member to take a look at his Government's spending Estimates. He thinks the house is in order, but if the Government is spending $105 billion with a deficit which is rapidly approaching $40 billion dollars, the house is not in order. It is true that cuts were made, but the Government has also made some big new expenditures. It has dressed up the military in brand new uniforms, it is contributing to the modernization of the Dew Line, for who knows what reason, and the deficit and the national debt continue to grow. Therefore, before the Hon. Member extends an invitation for me to sit beside him, he had better do a careful analysis of the Estimates. I can tell him, if that is getting the house in order, it is a very lackadaisical way of going about it.

● (1650)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, are we to take it from the comments of the Hon. Member that he is in opposition to the changes in spouse's allowance, the increase in veteran's pension and the reduction in the sales tax on farm fuels and primary producers? Is he saying that he opposes those measures?

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, what I would be most interested in knowing from the Hon. Minister is where he is going to get the money to put all of those trains back in operation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period for questions and comments is now terminated. We shall resume debate.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would like to take over what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) was going to say. I put it to the House that when we listen to the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) speak, he really does sound like he should be sitting next to those Hon. Members opposite. I venture to say that had we put a bag over his head before he began to speak we certainly would not have known whether he was a Conservative or a Liberal. We have maintained in the House all along, Mr. Speaker, that there really is no difference between the Liberals and the Conservatives.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) has the floor.

Mr. Skelly: When we look back over the last Parliament, Mr. Speaker, we certainly realize that the decimation which Hon. Members of the Liberal Party underwent during the last election was substantially as a result of their attempts to disguise themselves as Conservatives in the very unpopular programs they produced. One thing the Conservative Government has in common with the Liberals is that it has the knack of taking a Liberal catastrophe and making it worse. Had I the time, and were we considering a different sort of order of business before the House, I would be prepared to elaborate on that.

I would like to examine the Bill before us in the context of sovereignty. An Hon. Member of our Party who spoke previously indicated some serious elements of concern about the sovereignty effects of these particular funds and the role which the United States plays in world development through these agencies, the large voice it has in it and the kind of philosophical approach it takes to providing assistance. He did raise the critical question of sovereignty. Before I move on I would like to take a look at the question of sovereignty in a broader context, and then in summary look at the Bill in that way.

Let us consider the idea of Canadian sovereignty. In the seven months the Conservative Government has been in power we have probably seen a greater erosion of Canadian sovereignty than since the time of the second world war. In those seven months we have probably lost more in Canadian sovereignty, moved further backwards, than we have since the second world war. I would point to the announcement today by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) with respect to the new agreement with the United States. Of course, the United States is our partner in the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the international finance agencies. It has the largest say and dominates the over-all game plan, and if one doesn't play its way it takes its marbles and goes home, as it has done in other international agencies. The American philosophy prevails. It is the philosophy of President Reagan, and when we come to this defence agreement, we know full well who is calling the shots.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that during questioning in the House the Government was unwilling to put the documents before this Parliament under some thin guise that somehow it would profoundly change the nature of Government in Canada. That is absolute, patent nonsense. It would simply give legislators in this House the opportunity to examine things which affect their sovereignty.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), in upgrading the north warning system, is becoming involved in cost-sharing with the United States on American military hardware, on an American military defence program and an American worldwide defence strategy about which the Americans make the decisions. That is an erosion of Canadian sovereignty. It is a long-term binding agreement which apparently has no safety valves which would allow us to get out of it in an appropriate manner.

We are in serious trouble with this Conservative Government. It is not just content to flag $7 billion to the United States in its worldwide arms and defence strategy. We have made acquisitions in the United States of the Auroros program. We spent $1 billion plus in looking at new offshore patrol aircraft for which we are allegedly receiving benefit. But we did not do that with a defence plan in mind. We have not seen a policy direction from the new Government on the role the Canadian Armed Forces will play and what Canada's role should be in an international context.

We have expended more than $1 billion for offshore patrol aircraft without a policy statement from the new Government. Indeed, if my memory serves me correctly, we had not received one from the previous Government since the early 1970s. The Canadian public has no idea where we are going. This Parliament has no idea where we are going. A dollar will get you a doughnut that this Government does not know where it is going.

What is happening is that this Government is being dictated to by the Americans who say, "We have the plan, we have the worldwide strategy. You will lock into it and we will produce your equipment and give you some offsets". We have purchased a fighter aircraft at a cost of several billion dollars. We don't know what that fighter aircraft is being used for. It does not fit into any over-all defence plan on a worldwide basis, because Government has not produced a defence plan.

At one point an Hon. Member—I don't know whether or not he was a government member—with tongue in cheek was pointing out that McDonnell Douglas Canada Ltd. had promised to give Canada a $300 million tourism program as an offset. I believe one of the Hon. Members of the Conservative Party was suggesting that a useful role for the CF-18 might be to take the aircraft around the country from fair to fair and give rides in it. That might provide as much use as it is providing in many quarters today. I am sure it was just a tongue in cheek remark, but what I believe he was getting at, Mr. Speaker, is that we do not have a game plan for Canada's role internationally in a defence strategy.

Where do we fit in? We don't even have a national defence plan. The last time we saw something in writing was 15 years ago. That is almost as far away as the industrial revolution. It is time this Government put a plan before this House. That should be done before we expend billions of dollars more without knowing where we are going, except that we are just locking into Uncle Sam's plan and his worldwide concept of how things should be run. We are locked into President Reagan's game plan. That should make anyone's blood run cold.

We are going to spend billions of dollars buying a frigate if the Government manages to get it back on track, and there are a lot of pitfalls there. We are buying a lot of technology from the United States. We were hoping that one of the side benefits will be to put Canada's shipyards back in action, but the Prime Minister of Canada, in an interview the other day, said he would like to get rid of the subsidies on shipbuilding in this country. I wonder what some of the more outspoken Hon. Members of the Conservative Party who have been fighting for this for years are telling the Prime Minister behind closed doors.

We don't have a Canadian defence policy put before this House and the country. Those billions of dollars are being expended across the line and we would certainly like to have some idea of why. We would like some assurance from the Government that in fact we have not lost our offset because of the bungling of the previous Government in letting the contract. We would also like to know if the Prime Minister is serious about wanting to gut the Canadian shipbuilding industry by cutting off all the subsidies being used in an attempt to make this a competitive and restructured industry in a very brisk and difficult international market.

The long and the short of the defence message today was that this Government does not know where it is going. It is expending billions upon billions of dollars for defence hardware and new uniforms without a defence plan. The only possible option is to tie into Reagan's plan. Frankly, a lot of people in this country do not want to have anything to do with that plan which is bringing this world closer and closer to the brink of destruction. This is a profound loss of Canadian sovereignty. We have an opportunity to play a meaningful role in the world community in moving toward permanent peace and disarmanent. But this has been compromised by this Government. We have had seven months of compromises. If we give them five years who knows what this country will look like? Who knows what our independent status in the world will be? Certainly the Liberals damaged it sorely, but the Conservatives may be out to lay it to rest.

While dealing with the topic of Canadian sovereignty, Mr. Speaker, another question is that of the gutting of the Foreign Investment Review Agency. This ties in with the International Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the International Financial Agency. The Bill before us today represents a serious encroachment on Canadian sovereignty. Let us look at the context within which the Government is developing this type of legislation.

It was a philosophical decision which gutted FIRA. The Government said Canada was open for business. By that it means open to the multinational corporations which have presented a worldwide problem with their lack of regulation, specific investment purpose or benefit to the country concerned. These companies are unfettered and will begin to buy up constructive Canadian businesses; sometimes close them. Sometimes they will turn the course of these businesses in a totally different direction. For example, we know the track record of these corporations in funnelling interest payments and dividends out of the country. They purchase parts for assembly only in Canada, which means a loss of Canadian jobs. This type of activity means a further weakening of the Canadian economy.

In seven months the Conservative Party has done more to weaken this country and discourage confidence than we have seen in a long, long time. They should take a look at the record of Premier Bennett in British Columbia. There we see a philosophical rigidity, a fixation on a restraint program. I fear for British Columbia when this federal Government and the effects of its philosophical fixation on restraint are joined with those of Bennett in British Columbia. We will rue the day that either one of these Governments was elected.

This is not just a question of the Conservatives and Socreds making a horrendous mess of the country. We are allowing them to sell out the independence of this nation, and that cannot continue. The one encouraging thing is that the Committee for an Independent Canada is beginning to form again. This time it will have strength, and the Conservative Party and its attempts to sell out Canada's sovereignty in a political and economic sense will be the direct target of that agency. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I was just indicating the number of minutes the Hon. member has left. The Hon. Member still has the floor.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I always appreciate the assistance of the Chair and recognize what a magnificent job is being done.

Some Hon. Members: More.

Mr. Skelly: It is a great help to all Members in here.

The salmon treaty, Mr. Speaker, was an interesting example of how this Government was in an incredible rush to sell the country out. In the old days we allowed American jurisdiction over about one third of the coast of British Columbia. We sat on a joint committee with them. For the privilege of doing so, and a few other minor things, they could take half of a certain species of fish which went into the Fraser River. This meant millions of dollars a year free. They could also help in the management of our fishing territories and we would have to go along with them. That was an erosion of sovereignty which took place years ago. In fact, it may have been done under a Conservative Government, I would have to check my book.

What the Conservatives propose now is that instead of controlling a third of the coast of British Columbia the Americans now shall have jurisdiction over the whole coast of British Columbia; the whole fishing plan, and that is an enormous erosion of sovereignty. Canadians were hung out to dry by that treaty because, in the haste to get something together to give to President Reagan when the Prime Minister meets with him in Quebec City this weekend, the Prime Minister insisted this treaty go ahead, no matter what shape it was in. As time went by we found out that this important treaty, this complete erosion of the sovereignty over an important Canadian resource on the West Coast, went through Cabinet in 30 minutes. I wonder if the Minister of Transport even bothered to read the document or became informed on it. Can he confirm today that it went through Cabinet in 30 minutes and that the Prime Minister never even read the document?

It was indicated in the media that the Government knew there were very serious problems with the treaty, but the Prime Minister wanted it very, very badly. What kind of a Government is this? It is one that does not care about Canadian sovereignty. It is prepared to take the welcome mat, roll it over and turn Canada into a door mat. I suggest that this Bill is another example of that attitude, and we should examine it very clearly for its Canadian sovereignty implications. The Conservative Party's contempt for Parliament is such that I do not think that we can defend against these continued erosions of sovereignty.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments on the Hon. Member's speech?

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, in offering a comment on the speech of the Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) I won't complain that he failed to deal with the matter of the—

Mr. Skelly: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. Do I have to accept a comment from a person who is politically biased?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby).

Mr. Crosby: I don't admit to political bias ordinarily, but in the case of the Member for Comox-Powell River I'm only too pleased to say that I'm biased, not so much against him but what he and his Party stand for, and that's why I'll begin by offering not to complain about the fact he didn't deal with the International Monetary Fund and its threat to its stability caused by national debts across the world, but particularly in Canada, and the need for deficit reduction, I won't complain that he didn't deal with those things. But I will complain that the thrust of his speech was to complain about the Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) who made one of the better speeches I've heard in the House of Commons. He complained that he was sounding like a Tory. How is that for political bias? The Members of the New Democratic Party, those armchair socialists who purport to represent a political element in Canada, cannot get it through their heads that there is no philosophy of politics that demands debt reduction. There is a will on the part of the Canadian people to demand financial responsibility of the Government. That is what the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada is responding to. My colleague from Cochrane-Superior was responding to the need and desire of the Canadian people for financial responsibility in government. I would like to tell the Member for Cochrane-Superior and the Members of the New Democratic Party, those armchair socialists of which I speak—

• (1710)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order please. I think the Hon. Member is addressing his comments to the speech of the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly). I would hope the Hon. Member would address his remarks to that particular speech.

Mr. Crosby: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really was addressing my remarks to you. I want you to tell that armchair socialist from Cochrane-Superior that we can best aid the people of Canada in social programs and social services by providing the best of all social programs which is full employment. We will only get full employment if we have financial policies at the national Government level that create the kind of economic atmosphere that will allow the private sector to create that employment.

I beg you, Mr. Speaker, to instruct Members of the New Democratic Party, and try to get it through to them that this is what the people of Canada want. That is what the Parliament of Canada must do. That is what the Government of Canada is trying to implement. It is the will of the people. It is not any political philosophy. We are not burdened with the political philosophy of the New Democratic Party which insists on nationalizing industry and on doing for Canadians what they can do for themselves.

Having completed that comment, Mr. Speaker, I will ask one question. Why does the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River and his colleagues in the New Democratic Party continually refer to programs like the F-18 fighter program and the Patrol Frigate Program as being harmful to Canada and the people of Canada. What is his attitude toward the closure of Chatham Air Force Base? Is he in favour of that? Does he want the people of Chatham in New Brunswick to suffer the pains of unemployment and economic distress because of the closure of that base? Is he and the Members of his Party in favour of that kind of government action? Let us hear his views on national defence?

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, the sound and fury of the Hon. Member as he came to his point confused me somewhat. I would like to paint a thumb-nail sketch on political science for the Hon. Member.

The reason the people of Canada dumped the previous Liberal Government on its nose was not because of the anal retentive mentality that the Conservative Party has with its fixation on debts and budget problems. I look at the Government of Manitoba and see that it is doing well. The deficit of Saskatchewan was well in hand. They did not have a serious problem until the Conservatives came in and wrecked it.

The dilemma here is that the arrogance and near autocracy of the last Government was so serious that the people of Canada wanted to dump it. It was thrown out because of its absolute unwillingness to listen and to get involved in the kind of dialogue that there should be in the political process.

As a matter of fact, in the last few years the Liberal Party tried to disguise itself as a Conservative Party. I think the Conservative Government of Canada is making a tremendous mistake. These people were thrown out for compromising Canadian sovereignty and the Conservatives are making it worse. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, that sad lesson of history is going to be learned by the Conservative Party again. It faces a mandate for constructive change, not the destructive activity that is going on. We will see what happens when their five year period comes to an end. They must get that fixation on debts and deficits off their mind and consider how they can constructively get the country back to work so that people can pay the way of the country. We will then be on the road. But so far there is no sign that they have learned that lesson. I fear that the country is in further trouble financially, and in terms of its sovereignty.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the comments made by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly). Judging from some of the remarks we have heard on his speech, I feel that the Hon. Member should clarify one or two items.

Would he not agree that the New Democratic Party is also concerned with the deficit, but that it proposes that we should lower the deficit by collecting the revenues that should be collected, which the previous Liberal Government did not collect and which the present Conservative Government certainly is not collecting? If we collected only the deferred taxes owed by the corporate sector we could wipe out most of the deficit of this year. We must deal with the deficit, not by cutting programs but by collecting the taxes which should have been collected in the first place.

The second point I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker, was that for all intents and purposes democracy is dead in the City of New York. It is dead because decisions of the purse are no longer being made by the City Council of the City of New York. Those decisions are now being made by a group of bankers and financiers who control the expenditures of the City of New York. Surely we begin to lose our sovereignty and political democracy if we allow ourselves to fall into the hands and powers of the financiers. Would my colleague care to comment on the two points I have raised?

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, my colleague from the New Democratic Party has hit the problem on the head. Being from Saskatchewan, he knows that under CCF and NDP governments that province had tremendous years of success in managing the deficit. They managed their deficit better than has any Conservative government. The same thing has occurred in Manitoba.

It will be unfortunate if the Conservatives fail to learn that we need a constructive and moving economy giving people the opportunity to work. We do not need the vision of this country that the Conservatives are perpetrating right now. They are cutting for the sake of cutting and exercising restraint that is harming thousands of people. They are compounding what the small-minded provincial Conservative governments are doing in their jurisdictions. We need an open and fresh approach to the problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period provided for questions and comments has now expired. The Hon. Member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan).

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act. While the recommendations and changes are mostly house-keeping measures, there is one very significant feature that we should keep in mind. That is the change in authority for expenditures which will now be through the Estimates rather than through amendments to the Bill. That is very significant because it takes away one of the few opportunities, if not the only opportunity, to discuss in the House the problems of financing of the Third World and the needs of the impoverished countries in the world. It takes away our opportunity to deal with this very important question which we, as a democratic country and a very fortunate people, should examine from time to time.

The enactment of the Bretton Woods Agreements in 1944 set up the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. These were two very important agencies. At that time it brought the world out of a financial crisis. I do not think there has been any meeting or organizational restructuring that has been more important to the financial structure of the world than were the Bretton Woods meetings in 1944.

The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund were deemed to be the vehicles through which the financing, restructuring, the tempering and development of finances in the world were to take place. On the one hand, the International Monetary Fund would provide short term balance of payments financing to assist countries in maintaining the par value of their currencies without having to resort to undesirable deflationary measures. On the other hand, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which was really the only feature of the World Bank at that time, would provide long term loans to assist countries in restructuring their economies after the devastation of World War II and to promote long term structural change. This was a tremendously important feature at that time. I think it is fair to say that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development has achieved those results and that these two groups have been very successful.

However, times change and so does the world. The needs in 1944 are not necessarily the only needs that exist at the present time. The loans that are directed toward the developing countries through the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development are to countries in more advanced stages of economic and social growth. There is no mistaking that this is providing a very real need, but many very poor nations seem to be falling between the financial planks and are not being covered by the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development or the International Monetary Fund, which I will refer to later.

Financing through the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development gives financing through conventional means with guarantees by the member countries. This is very important. The loans are based on financial considerations, which is also important, with respect to certain aspects covered by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Later on, the World Bank formed a second agency called the International Finance Corporation. Its function is to assist the economic development of less developed countries by promoting growth in the private sector of their economies and helping to mobilize domestic and foreign capital for this purpose. It is extremely important to develop the private sectors of these countries. This undoubtedly provides a vehicle, in addition to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which has been of assistance to Third World nations.

The third agency of the World Bank which is most important to the countries that need assistance the most is the International Development Association. IDA assistance is concentrated on the very poor countries, such as those in 1982 which had an annual per capita gross national product of less than $805. There are more than 50 countries that are eligible under this criteria. This is the group that is suffering the most and is not receiving the attention in the world presently that we in the Liberal Party believe they should be receiving.

Only 2 per cent of the gross domestic investment in the recipient countries comes through the International Development Association. In 1980, for instance, only 2 per cent of the domestic investment in India and Pakistan—the first and third largest recipient countries—was through the International Development Association. These are countries which need assistance badly.

The situation gets worse. The sixth replenishment is the sixth recontribution of all the member countries of the International Development Association. As a result of the slower than anticipated contribution from the sixth replenishment, lending in 1982 declined in current dollars to a level 34 per cent below the level of 1980. In 1983, it was still 13 per cent below the level in 1980. This is an absolute decline in contributions to the International Development Association which is having a tremendously detrimental effect on the Third World, particularly those Third World countries that need help the most.

There has since been a seventh replenishment. This total of $9 billion represents a major reduction in the concessional resources available to the worlds poorest countries. It is 25 per cent lower in nominal terms, and 40 per cent lower in real terms than the sixth replenishment in 1979.

Partly because of China's membership, this reduction in the seventh replenishment from the sixth replenishment represents a 70 per cent cut in real per capita terms. On the one hand there are the increased needs of these very poor countries while, on the other hand, there is this reduction in contribution through the International Developmental Association. This is a very serious situation which unfortunately is not receiving the proper attention.

Let us examine the allocation through the International Development Association. If we were to look at the strict application of its allocation criteria, with the $9 billion total, more than three-quarters of the total International Development Association resources would be allocations to India and China. This means that a ceiling must be placed on the funds provided to China and India. Countries such as India would have to borrow more from the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development as well as from commercial markets, because it will not be able to receive the same amount it had received previously from the International Development Association. This could mean that by 1986, borrowing on markets may account for over half of the dispersements to India. India cannot afford such a situation.

Between 1981 and 1983 the per capita incomes of the sub-Sahara African countries declined. Since then, we know the conditions of these sub-Saharan African countries. It is a human disgrace for these conditions to exist at this time, and to have allowed this to happen.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Cochrane-Superior (Mr. Penner) talked about the deficit. His remarks were very important and well appreciated by Members of the House. However, we must not consider the deficit only, because the problem does not end there. There are problems in Canada with respect to the needs of low income Canadians, those who are unemployed and pensioners. There are problems in areas of this country which are experiencing economic difficulties and suffer from severe regional disparity. Of course, there are the problems of these very poor nations in the world today, particularly those that are receiving the funds from the International Development Association.

These African countries cannot restructure their finances on their own. Africa's share in the International Development Association rose from 25 per cent in 1980 to 37 per cent in 1983. Even by increasing Africa's share a further 5 per cent over the sixth replenishment and taking the seventh replenishment which exists now, sixth replenishment levels would yield less additional resources from the $9 billion in the International Development Association than retaining the $12 billion share which exists with the sixth replenishment. Even now, with the seventh replenishment, if we increase Africa's share by 5 per cent it would not make up for what Africa received under the replenishment in 1979. Africa will have a 21 per cent reduction in real terms compared with the commitments in 1979 in the sixth replenishment. This will not only apply to Africa but to other countries as well.

It is an extremely serious situation as 40 per cent of the loans of the International Development Association have gone to agricultural projects and 25 per cent to human development projects. Where will it end? We are seeing the situation now. We see tragedy in Ethiopia. We see the tragedy in other sub-Saharan African countries. The question is, what are we prepared to do about it?

We in Canada, as can be the case in other countries, can ignore it. However, it is very difficult to ignore. I find it extremely difficult to ignore. It bothers me considerably. What will the world position be? Will we continue to send the relief aid which is necessary? We cannot let people die by the millions, as would be the case otherwise. What will we do to restructure the lives and the countries of these people? Will we allow the situation to continue to deteriorate? Will we allow it to become so awesome, so completely tragic and catastrophic that world opinion, and the opinion in this country, will only respond to the most frightening and serious situations? Will we allow the situation to deteriorate to the point where hunger, which was considered a travesty 10 years ago, will no longer be considered frightening? This is what will happen if attention is not paid to this very important question.

Through the amendments to the Act we will allocate funds to the World Bank through the Estimates. We in the House of Commons will not have the chance we had in the past to debate this very important question. It will be another lever which will disappear, another opportunity for Members of Parliament to speak, research and inform people across the country of the seriousness of the problem which exists and will continue to exist. The situation will get worse.

The International Monetary Fund provides a very real function. What the World Bank does not do through its three agencies the IMF will do. However, the IMF is not reaching African countries. Its record is particularly bleak in sub-Saharan Africa. Its programs have fallen well short of the targets. For instance, the growth target of the IMF in these countries was reached in only five of the 23 African programs; the inflation target in only 13 of the 28 programs; the trade target in only 11 out of 28 programs. The association between IMF programs and net bank borrowing is much stronger for low development countries. The point is that the IMF is not reaching these countries.

What are we prepared to do? I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) will discuss this question at the summit with the President of the United States. It is a concern. We as Members of Parliament or as Canadians cannot completely ignore this question. We must have it as a consideration in addition to our problems with respect to the deficit, unemployment, people with low and fixed incomes, and regional disparity. If we do not, the problem will get worse. As a matter of fact, it is worsening at a geometric progression, not an arithmetic one. This is a serious situation, and it has to be kept before the House of Commons and before the country.

I hope we in the House, although we will be losing the opportunity in future years to discuss this question through amendments to the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, will from time to time continue to discuss this very important question. All we are doing now is fighting the results. We are attacking the symptoms, not the core problem or reasons for starvation. We are not attacking the reason for Third World countries, particularly the poorest of them, continuing to lose ground to the rest of the countries of the world.

There are Third World countries which are making progress, a lot of them at the expense of Canadian industry. We are importing their goods, and products made in this country are being forced out of the market. These are the countries which people will use as examples of progressing Third World countries. However, there are at least 50 Third World countries which are not progressing, that are falling further and further behind the rest of the world. This must receive the attention of the House of Commons, of the Government and of other Governments concerned about fellow human beings. Once again I asked the Prime Minister to discuss this matter with the President of the United States in Quebec City. I hope we will continue to be able to debate this important question in the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Mr. Garneau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member who spoke just now whether one way of maintaining the debate to which he referred could be, when discussing the Bill in committee, to avoid allocating funds exclusively through the Estimates and to maintain the system of amendments in the House, as was done in the past.

[English]

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his suggestion. I hope this matter will be raised when the Estimates are before the committee. As Hon. Members of the House will know, it is optional what aspects of the Estimates, if any, are discussed in meetings dealing with them. There is no assurance that we will actually discuss this question. As is the case with most questions, they may not be discussed on the Estimates at all because in the opinion of members of the committee they may not be topical enough. I hope this will not be the case, but that this question will be given priority and will be discussed. Perhaps members will agree to have a discussion from time to time on the urgency of this question. I know the Hon. Member is one who would discuss this question in meetings of the committee dealing with the Estimates.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague, but first I want to congratulate him on his excellent speech.

● (1740)

I would like to ask the Hon. Member if he is aware of the comments by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to Fortune magazine regarding the performance of the economy of this country. I know that the Hon. Member is very concerned about this. Some Members have spoken on it today. In particular, I want to ask my colleague what he thinks of the following comments which the Prime Minister made regarding the charge by political opponents that the Prime Minister put Canada up for sale. The Prime Minister is quoted as having replied:

> Who wants to buy it? What is there so compellingly attractive about Canada that causes us to think that anybody is going to rush in simply because somebody says, 'I'd like to do business with you.' We do not have a very good track record. Our products have not been of the highest quality. Our deliveries have been lacking in reliability. Our expertise has been in large measure borrowed. Our technology has been purchased. What the hell makes us so special? If somebody wants to buy some oil, somebody wants to buy some wheat, hell, we're in the business—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I will allow the Hon. Member to comment, but I feel that questions should be directed to the hon. gentleman on the Bretton Woods Agreements. They should be a little more relevant than that.

Mr. MacLellan: I feel what the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria) said is very relevant. What is happening is that we have a very fragile economy in the world today. We have contributing nations on which these poorer nations depend. If we cannot maintain a very strong western economy, then there is nowhere that these countries can turn for assistance. This is going to be a very vital question.

What is happening today is that the western economy is being held up by the economy in the United States. This is based completely on confidence alone. There is no reason that the American economy should be that much higher than the economies of other countries in the western world. It is based on armaments, missiles and bravado. If this house of cards starts crumbling, the economies of all the western countries are going to suffer.

The Prime Minister has gone to the United States and said "We love the way you are handling your economy. You are the model for all of us." Some model! That gives us no reason to believe that this Government has any idea what it wants to do to strengthen the Canadian economy. It is very tragic. He has hitched our star to the American economy when there can be absolutely no benefit to Canada, other than to lose jobs through Investment Canada and his open door policies. If the American economy falters, the Canadian economy will suffer much more than it would had the Prime Minister not adopted what I consider a very foolish procedure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there any other questions or comments on the Hon. Member's speech?

[Translation]

The Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps).

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we are in the House today to consider the policies we shall pursue during the next four years as well as our obligations to the International Monetary Fund and especially to less developed countries.

However, there is a major problem to be considered in such a debate, and it concerns not only our expenditures under the Bretton Woods Agreements but also the state of the American dollar and U.S. interest rates which are a very major factor in our international economy. Mr. Speaker, if we look at the results of the monetary policy being pursued by the United States, it is clear that some less developed countries are becoming more and more "strapped" with respect to their ability to generate capital, either for domestic or external development. It is a fact that even when the Bretton Woods Agreements were signed in the forties and since then less developed countries have had trouble sustaining imports and developing their capability to export to industrialized countries like Canada and the United States.

It is also a fact that these countries have tremendous financial problems and a large per capita debt, problems that are more difficult to solve and far more serious than those we are seeing here in Canada today.

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the Progressive Conservative Government is unwilling to accept the policy of the former Liberal Government and the policy of the international community, which is that in order to improve our international monetary system which does not only depend on the International Monetary Fund but also on the exchange rate of the American dollar and the price of gold, we would also have to develop a comprehensive plan to help these less developed countries strengthen their economies.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this Government refuses to consider an over-all plan or to participate in wide-ranging negotiations in an attempt to help intolerably indebted countries. What do they say? They say: We are going to examine each individual case, we will study each file in due time. The Government should act responsibly as a world leading country and say that Canada will help all underdeveloped countries extricate themselves from the economic vice-grip which is strangling them. We should not hold our breath, Mr. Speaker, because unfortunately this Government and its financial policies are directly linked with the policies of the United States Republican Conservative administration. It is quite obvious that the American Government already knows that the Canadian Government would like to follow in its steps. Who can forget last week's incident when Mr. Nitze, the American representative, was scheduled to meet with the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney), he was to have a meeting with our Prime Minister, but he had the nerve to sum up their meeting before it even took place! Mr. Nitze told the Canadian nation: "We had challenging and constructive discussions", but he said that even before the discussions took place!

Mr. Speaker, we did not see the Prime Minister react when he was reminded of that incident here in the House. Did the Prime Minister deny or reject the statements made by Mr. Nitze? No, Mr. Speaker, because he is behaving like a little dog on Mr. Reagan's leash, the President of the United States, and he simply cannot play in the major league when it comes to economic independence, monetary policy and defence policy. Mr. Speaker, we have heard the Progressive Conservatives claim that the former Liberal Government made mistakes. Some Members in the House say that we made mistakes, but I would like to point out that as a Liberal Member—and I think all Canadians will endorse my remarks—I am proud of the work we did as a Party and as a Government during the North-South dialogue which was initiated by our former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau. And I think that even the Conservative Members should recognize the leadership in that dialogue, not only of the Liberal Party but also of the Canadian Government before this Prime Minister came to power.

We know for instance that in 1981, our Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau was one of the chairmen, or co-chairman of the Cancun Conference which discussed specifically the economic problems of Third World countries and developing nations.

Over the last six months, unfortunately, since this Conservative Government has come to power, we have seen that Canada is no longer reflecting an independent policy on the international scene in fiscal, monetary and defence matters.

Even Conservative Members, Mr. Speaker, and I remember for instance that a former member of the Committee for an Independent Canada, our present Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald), believed when she was in Opposition that it was very important that Canada should be considered politically and economically independent of the United States, in such matters, for instance, as foreign investment. But the day she became a minister of the Crown, her views changed altogether and no longer is she prepared to fight in Cabinet to ensure a Canadian policy on investments.

Mr. Speaker, I was appalled this week when a great Canadian, who has been fighting for our independence for the past 15 or 20 years—and I am referring to Mr. Mel Hurtig from Edmonton—upon coming before the Committee to discuss precisely this Government's silliness with its new legislation on Investment Canada, was asked by Conservative Members what right he had, and who had invited him to appear before a Committee of Parliament. Mr. Speaker, when a person who is known nationally and he has been known for years to speak in advocacy of Canada, of our culture, of our economic independence—I think that he had a right indeed to appear before the Committee, especially when he was there after being invited by the Committee.

Mr. Speaker, I can hardly believe the Conservatives' unwillingness to recognize their attachment to the economic policies of the U.S. government of which they are so proud, and we can see their impact on our domestic economy: the thousands of jobs which the Prime Minister had promised never materialized. The reason they never did is that this government, contrary to the statements made by the Prime Minister at the time he was a candidate to his party leadership and to the position of leader of this government, would rather let Canadians lose their jobs instead of standing up and allowing the Canadian dollar to float freely.

Such, gentlemen, is the policy of the Conservative government which links itself so closely to the conservative government of the United States that one does not see any difference.

During the election campaign, Mr. Speaker, this government made a number of promises to developing countries, and I should like to mention a few, for Conservative members might have forgotten them. For the information of those who are interested in the promises this Conservative member has failed to keep, and there are many, I should like for the record to mention a number of promises which I have found in a little pocket politics—

• (1750)

[English]

It is called pocket politics. I call it American pocket politics.

The Government of the country made certain commitments when it was in opposition. It made certain commitments when it was seeking the confidence of the Canadian people. I would like to cite for the record those particular commitments so we can be assured that they will not be forgotten and left on the trail of the other broken promises made by the Government.

The Conservative commitment was to respect our international commitments, to increase Canada's official development assistance to .7 per cent of the Gross National Product by 1990, to deliver a greater share of this assistance through non-governmental organizations, to make our foreign aid and development assistance programs more effective, to review foreign policy by seeking input from the Canadian public and to develop stronger trading relations without limiting the access of developing nations.

There is much work to be done to achieve those goals. There is certainly much work to be done if the Canadian Government is serious about its commitment to allowing the less developed nations an opportunity to get out of the economic vice-grip which was been levied upon them by current market conditions on an international scale. That will only happen when the Government throws off the mantle of its inferiority complex which was so aptly illustrated by the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) comments to Fortune magazine.

The Prime Minister and the Government do not bellieve that Canadians can compete on the international market. That was made quite clear by the comments read into the record by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria). The Government is in fact suffering from an inferiority complex and believes that the only way it can establish its superiority or equality is by breaking down the borders and telling the United States of America that there is absolutely no difference between their country and our country. In fact, it believes it can do this not only by opening the doors but by putting us up for sale.

I believe that the Canadian public recognizes the uniqueness of our cultural institutions and our economic input. I also believe that the Canadian public recognizes that the best job creators in the country are products which are made in Canada for Canadians but which can compete with any nation in the world on the international market.

I do not believe that the results of this Government's initiatives will bear fruit. In fact, I fear the exact opposite. My fears are that when the so-called Investment Canada Bill—a Bill which I would have preferred to be called "Abandon Canada"—comes to fruition, we will see a branch plant mentality in this country like we have not seen since before the work that was done by the Committee for an Independent Canada.

We in the Liberal Party agree and understand that we have committed certain sins for which we paid dearly on September 4. However, we believe that the Canadian people have a basic understanding that our role is not only to prop up ourselves, not only to fill our own bellies, not only to enhance and encourage the Canadian economy, but also to show leadership in the international monetary and economic systems. This kind of leadership is not being shown by a Government that is being led around on a leash by the President of the United States.

Our Party has a history going back not only to the Cancun conference, but to the 1950s and the 1960s. At that time, it was the Liberal Party, over the dead bodies of many Conservatives, that insisted that we had a responsibility to share and share alike with our brothers and sisters across the world. It was the Liberal Party that, when times were tough, continued to send money to Ethiopia, even though certain Members who are now sitting on the government side of the House blamed and criticized the Liberal Party because it was sending money to our starving brothers and sisters across the world. We will protect that heritage and we will not allow the Government to destroy the initiatives and abilities that have shown that the Liberal Party has a chance to make this a better world for Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the Hon. Member. Before I call it six o'clock, I would like to remind the Hon. Member that if this Bill is called tomorrow she will have eight minutes remaining, plus the 10-minute question and answer period.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, March 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hnatyshyn (for Mrs. McDougall) that Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned yesterday evening, we had had a chance to inform Canadians about the problems facing developing countries and the measures that should be taken by this Government to help those countries. The International Monetary Fund does have a role to play but we must realize there are other agencies as well that have a specific role to play in this area and must do so if we are to have a stronger and more effective world economy.

[English]

When debate was terminated yesterday, I had had an opportunity to outline some of the areas in which past Liberal Governments in Canada had had an opportunity to play a major role on the international scene, particularly with respect to the North-South dialogue, the Cancun conference and the role of the former Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

I think it is incumbent upon all of us that we not rest on the laurels of past administrations. I think it is extremely necessary that the Government take the lead in the area of international monetary equality. To that end, the International Monetary Fund has a very important role to play, but there are other mechanisms which in fact must be better utilized if we are to have a world economy that can flourish. I refer specifically to the role of UNCTAD in the negotiations to allow Third World and less developed countries to enter the more highly developed North American markets.

Because of the economic superiority of the consuming countries or the developed countries with respect to commodities, the developed countries have tended to monopolize the areas of transportation, marketing distribution and processing of commodities. As a result, the underdeveloped countries receive only a small share of the final selling price. As a matter of fact, UNCTAD has estimated that if local semi-processing was used for 10 commodities in order to get them out of the raw material mentality, which unfortunately seems to characterize the current exporting approaches of this Government as well, they could provide to less developed nations 1.5 times their present earnings. That has not occurred primarily because barriers to such activities have been erected through tariff structures imposed by developed countries. I think the new Government will have to show to the Canadian people that it is taking some initiative and it should put this issue on the bargaining table at the "blarney summit" that is coming up this weekend for the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) and the President of the United States.

I think it is clear that our roles and responsibilities extend beyond our own frontiers and beyond our own continent. They must reach out to those countries that are now trying to divest themselves of an incredible internal debt load and, through organisms and mechanisms like the International Monetary Fund, the Cancun conference and UNCTAD, are trying to have an opportunity to share in the massive world markets for commodities such as those I have just mentioned. Unfortunately, the activities of the first few months of this Government have indicated that the Government does not seem to have the same kind of vision of the world economy as past Liberal Governments. For example, I am thinking of the relevant Conservative commitments that were made during the election campaign to which I referred yesterday.

The Government has promised to review foreign policy, seeking input from the Canadian public, but at the same time the Government has put its good housekeeping seal of approval on a foreign policy which runs lock-step with that of the United States of America. Instead of going to the Canadian people and asking them if they want to have an independent cultural policy, an independent economic policy and an independent defence policy, the Government has made commitments which clearly indicate that its intentions are merely to mirror the kind of socio-economic policies and defence policies of our neighbour to the south.

• (1110)

[Translation]

When this Government was making its many promises during the election campaign, it also said there were going to be consultations with all Canadians on the economy and on our international relations with the International Monetary Fund, for instance; and there were going to be consultations with all Canadians to find out what they think about the Government's foreign policy with respect to defence.

What happened? Today, after six months in power, the Government has become so closely allied with the conservative administration in the United States that we do not even have a chance to develop an independent foreign policy. Mr. Speaker, I know for a fact, that especially among the Conservative Members from Quebec, who promised a new era and new opportunities for Canada—I do not think Quebecers are anxious to become so closely allied with our American neighbours that we will no longer have a chance to preserve our own culture. For years, Quebecers have been fighting to preserve their own culture and their independence in the economical and cultural sphere. And look at what happened. As soon as the Conservative Government was elected after its many promises to protect that independence, we see the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada getting together to adopt any agreement they please, without really getting a Canadian consensus.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a Canadian. I think all Canadians have the ability to develop this country's economy, bearing in mind our neighbours in developing countries. Unfortunately, this Government, under the leadership of the Prime Minister, prefers to ignore this, which was made abundantly clear in an article published in Fortune. I think that we in the Opposition have a duty to convince the Government that Canadians can build a much stronger economy with their own resources, based on their own needs and those, not only of the United States, our neighbour to the South but of all developing and semi-developed countries, according to the policy established by the previous Government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Châteauguay (Mr. Lopez), for questions or comments.

Mr. Lopez: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I must say I was flabbergasted to hear the comments to the Hon. Member who just spoke, continuing a speech she started yesterday evening. Her comments today were rash and irresponsible, and I was astonished at the lack of respect she showed and indeed insisted on showing towards the Government, the Right Hon. Prime Minister and all Canadians. I think that in her comments, the Hon. Member has not only shown a lack of respect for our Prime Minister but also for the House and all Canadians who have placed their trust in us. And when I speak of trust, in the Government and in our Prime Minister, I need hardly add that Canadians gave us that trust of their own free will, and they are doing so more and more.

I understand the feelings of frustration on that side of the House among Members who fortunately are no longer as numerous as they were. I hope the trend will continue. In fact, they do not need us to reduce their numbers, since it would seem they are doing a pretty good job themselves.

Yesterday, when they were discussing the poorer countries and declaring their solidarity with the developing countries, I know why they were doing that, because considering the attitude of the Liberal Government, if it had continued in the same vein, Canada would soon be one of those countries. With the legacy they gave us, they have already brought this country one step closer to poverty and to a situation where Canada would no longer be providing assistance but would itself be obliged to live on charity. That would soon be the case if we had continued in the same vein and embraced the same policies as the Liberal Government. Everyone knows that they brought this country to utter chaos. There was a time, fifteen years ago, when Canada ranked second in the world, and now we rank seventeenth. It is downright embarrassing to see a country like Canada deteriorate at the rate it has, despite its abundance of resources of which all Canadians are proud.

• (1115)

We are all proud of our Prime Minister and of a Government that, I believe, and I think all Canadians will agree, is the best government Canada has ever had. I think we should all support and stand behind and be proud of our Right Hon. Prime Minister who is an honour to us all. I realize this does not sit well with the Liberal Party, and it will sit even less well if that Party continues to denigrate the representatives of the people of this country. I think there is no doubt in anyone's mind that this is the best Prime Minister Canada has ever had!

Ms. Copps: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate . . . I do not think the Quebecers who are involved in the Domtar case think our Prime Minister is the best one we ever had. There are many Quebecers in this House, even among the Conservatives, who will say that is not true.

Furthermore, we have here a new Member who, with respect, does not really understand the workings of Parliament, because if he did, he would never tell the House that I have no respect for Parliament. He would have known, in the words of a Former Prime Minister of Great Britain, Sir Winston Churchill, that "it is the right and responsibility of the Opposition to oppose". And if the Hon. Member for Châteauguay (Mr. Lopez) is unable to understand why I am doing so as a Liberal, I am afraid I cannot help him. The Hon. Member truly reflected the spirit and attitude of the Conservatives when he said today in the House that he did not want to continue in the same vein as the Liberals with respect to Canada's foreign policy.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one thing clear for all Canadians. We have seen how in the case of Ethiopia, Canadians have shown they have a heart when they see the problems of other countries. And we cannot compare Canada's economic situation with that of Ethiopia. However, it is clear what the position is of a Member of this House who says that if they had continued in the same vein as the Liberal Party, Canadians would no longer have a country. It was the Liberal Party that in 1982, 1983 and 1984, when we had problems in this country, decided to continue giving foreign aid. We continued our aid to Ethiopia, against the advice of many Conservative Members who were clearly only thinking of themselves and who cannot consider the countries of the Third World.

Mr. Plamondon: Like my colleague, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised by the remarks made yesterday and today by the Hon. Member. You mentioned an over-all plan, yet you know full well that two countries, the United States and the U.S.S.R., can hardly agree to sit down together to talk about disarmament. Highfaluting remarks on that issue come easy, but you know that all the travelling done by the former Prime Minister did not accomplish anything, except perhaps increase our deficit.

Yesterday you said something about giving the example to other countries. First we ought to show them that we can properly manage our own affairs and cut down our deficit. Then we might be in a better position to help them even more, and the only way to do that is to follow the policy which has already been advocated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson).

You referred to independence with respect to the United States, and yesterday you even said that Canada was like a small dog on a leash. Those words come as a surprise to me. Was it not your Prime Minister who took it upon himself to put Quebec in its place when that province wanted to seek independence? You talk about Canadian independence, but what did the Prime Minister you bragged about yesterday do when Quebec was talking about independence? He said no way and put the province in its place. He lied from every podium during the referendum campaign and then stated that we would have a new agreement, but this agreement has not yet—

• (1120)

Ms. Copps: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think I did hear the Hon. Member say that our Prime Minister had lied. I suggest that is a breach of the Standing Orders and I would like him to withdraw his words immediately.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon) to withdraw his words.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully withdraw the words to the effect that the Prime Minister had lied; let us just say that those misleading words—

Ms. Copps: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) on a point of order.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member ought to withdraw without reservations, in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the Hon. Member to withdraw his words without using the word "misleading" in the remarks he made after withdrawing the offending words.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I shall respectfully withdraw the comments that you are asking me to withdraw and continue by saying that the Hon. Member also spoke about certain promises, for instance. We are told that we are breaking our promises even though, after six months in power, we have already kept more promises than the former Government did in three years. I am thinking, for instance, about the extraordinary speech made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) about the status of women. And what about agriculture? What about the incentives for small businesses? Dear colleague, you should remember the promises made by your own Government in 1980 after you had defeated a democratically elected Government, when elections were held in February at a cost of $105 million because of four promises made by your party. The first promise was not to increase the price of gas because the previous Government had had the honesty—

[English]

Miss Nicholson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since this Member apparently does not know the rules of the House, perhaps you would be kind enough to remind him that he should address the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon).

Mr. Plamondon: May I continue, Mr. Speaker? I was saying that the Hon. Member has said that we did not keep our promises and I was reminding her of the four promises made in 1980, including a promise to reduce the deficit, which then amounted to $13 billion and which has now reached nearly $35 billion.

We were also promised by the party opposite that Government expenditures would be controlled. These expenditures then amounted to $62 billion and they now amount to $105 billion. We were also promised that unemployment would be brought down. This is why a duly elected government was defeated, but the only result was to double the unemployment figures.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member. I would like to give a few moments to the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) for a reply, but I also want to remind the Hon. Member that his comments and remarks during this period set aside for questions should relate to the speech made by the previous speaker. I therefore recognize the Hon. Member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, my comments will be very brief. I find it rather surprising that the Hon. Member should want to discuss Liberal promises dealing with the economy and the deficit. We remember quite well the current Prime Minister saying before the election that he would create thousands of jobs and would tighten his own belt. We now see what has happened. The unemployment rate is even higher than before. Our deficit will be the highest in the history of Canada. The dollar has reached its lowest level ever and the Prime Minister now has the cheek to increase the budget of his own office by—

Mr. Plamondon: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon) on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, if I could not say that the former Prime Minister had lied, I do not think that the Hon. Member should be able to say that the current Prime Minister is being cheeky.

Mr. Rossi: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would like the Hon. Member to sit down. I do not think that there is any need to hear him. I do not believe that the comments made by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East are unparliamentary. She can therefore continue her comments.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, it is rather sad to hear the Progressive Conservatives tell us that we have to tighten our belts at a time when the Prime Minister has the cheek to increase his own budget by 54 per cent. It will destroy the credibility of this Government which is already bankrupt after six months in power.

• (1125)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is now over. We will resume debate with the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am going to return to discussion of the Bill specifically. I think it is appropriate that we use this opportunity at second reading to discuss the principle of the Bill. We will have an opportunity in committee and later to study the clauses of the Bill individually, step by step. I would like to take a few minutes today to put a few of my thoughts on the record. I do not want to rehash what other Members have spoken about, but I do want to set some of my concerns in context. I would like to take a few moments to discuss why we feel it is necessary to introduce Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof.

As most Hon. Members know, the name "Bretton Woods" goes back to 1944. Just as World War II was winding down a group of people met in a small town in New Hampshire called Bretton Woods. It had become very clear to the international community that there was a need for discussion in the post-war period regarding the international financial and economic environment. Countries were acting independently on monetary policy. They were acting independently on a number of global economic and financial issues. There was a need to bring the players together to discover whether there was a common policy that they could agree upon which would bring some stability to the international financial and economic world.

Out of that meeting called by the United Nations in New Hampshire in 1944 two institutions arose. The first was the creation of the IMF, the International Monetary Fund, to bring some monetary stability to the world. At that time, in an effort to enhance their export abilities, a number of countries were devaluing their currency. This was causing all kinds of inequalities in the financial market-place. The intent was to bring some monetary stability to the world so that currencies would not be changing value overnight to give a particular country some advantage. In a sense the IMF became an international bank. Over the years as many as 140 countries participated in providing money to the banks to be used to stabilize currencies. The contributions enabled every country to have allocated to it an SDR, a special drawing right. At a time when there was a balance of payments deficit as a result of countries importing more than they were exporting, they could draw on the IMF in an effort to correct this imbalance.

The second institution which was set up is called the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Over the years it has come to be known as the World Bank. It was set up at that time to assist primarily western Europe and Japan to rebuild their war-torn economies. It was to assist them in the financial development of the needed infrastructure. Since then, as we all know, it has come to be something quite different. The World Bank now focuses almost all of its energies on assisting the developing countries, the Third World—or Fourth World countries, as some people refer to the harder pressed nations—in developing the appropriate infrastructures that will allow them to get on with expanding a developing economy.

In 1956 it became clear that there was a need for a bank to be set up to help the private sector. There was a need for something other than simply building roads and putting in port facilities for an economic development infrastructure. There became a recognized need to assist the private sector that was operating in the Third World. Therefore, the International Finance Corporation was established. It would lend money to the private sector primarily in these developing countries. This was a first opportunity for a major bank to take an equity position so that the bank and a private entrepreneur could form a joint venture to develop a facility in the Third World. The IFC enabled this financing to take place.

● (1130)

In 1960 the International Development Association was established. Its primary purpose was to provide a soft loan window with the World Bank, particularly for those countries facing special problems with respect to the development of their economies and the necessary economic infrastructure. Loans with virtually no interest are provided to those countries along with very encouraging payback programs.

Bill C-30 does three things. First, it authorizes the participation of Canada in the IFC. We have not had the enabling legislation to participate until now and have only been contributing as a reflection of Canada's good will. This Bill will provide us with the legislative framework and authority to participate formally in the IFC.

Bill C-30 also consolidates all of the various authorities under this single Act. This is very important because it allows Parliament to discuss the whole matter of Canada's role in assisting other countries, particularly developing countries.

We are concerned that as a result of the legislation, the authorization for our contribution to organizations like the IMF will change, to simply be reflected in the estimates along with all other departmental estimates. Each year the estimates will reflect whether the Government either increases or decreases its contribution to these international agencies.

We in the NDP are not always impressed by the way Canada has participated in organizations like the IMF. In fact, we are not necessarily impressed by some of the actions taken by the IMF and other international institutions or agencies with respect to their treatment of the developing nations. Therefore, we are concerned that including this financial authorization as an extension of the estimates process will remove some of our opportunities to express our concern and hopefully assist the Government in implementing more progressive policies for organizations such as the World Bank and the IMF.

Bill C-30 is basically an administrative Bill. It is not particularly revolutionary in its objectives and does not particularly change the course that the Government has taken in the past. However, we have some reservations about the Bill and that is why we are anxious to finish second reading now in order to send it to committee where we will have an opportunity to raise these concerns in more detail.

Some of my colleagues who have spoken before me have flagged a number of the concerns regarding the role that Canada plays in organizations such as the IMF. We are concerned about the behaviour of some of these organizations. For example, let us examine how the IMF has treated different countries. Chile and South Africa are countries that have human rights policies that we abhor and that no progressive country can accept. When the IMF makes a multimillion dollar loan, or loans in some cases amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, to certain countries that maintain an oppressive human rights atmosphere, we must recognize that as a result of our financial contribution to the IMF we are participating in that oppressive atmosphere. When the IMF assists these countries or when other organizations assist the private sector in those countries, Canadians through their Government's involvement are participating in these acts. Canadians should be reminded of that fact.

For every dollar that is lent to countries like South Africa, Canadians will pay three cents, or 3 per cent of that particular loan. In many ways we are perpetuating the oppressive regimes and human rights policies in those countries by maintaining the status quo or ensuring that those who have created these policies remain in power and in positions of influence. I think it is important that we recognize that we are in fact a part of the apartheid process by contributing to its continuation.

The IMF has special drawing rights, known as SDRs. Those who make the major contribution to the IMF obviously have the most power. In other words, those who pay the piper call the tune. In this case, the United States is overwhelmingly the major contributor to the IMF. We have seen the United States, with some of its First World allies, put pressure on the IMF to ensure that certain countries are supported while others are not.

We need only go as far as Central America, a troubled part of the world, to see an example of how the IMF has treated the regimes in El Salvador and Nicaragua. The IMF has been very supportive of the regime in El Salvador and has given hundreds of millions of dollars in support of that country's efforts at economic development. While we could debate at length the value of some of that economic development in El Salvador, the point is that the IMF has been a major supporter of that country, which I suggest causes great concern when it comes to its human rights, free elections and so on.

Nicaragua is virtually next door to El Salvador. The IMF has said that that country does not need assistance in developing its education or its rural roads, its water supplies or its sanitation systems. This is a country that needs help in all of these areas. It is a country in which a Government has been duly elected by its people and is doing whatever it can to assist the development of its economic infrastructure. It is attempting to educate its people. The IMF is saying that it will cut off aid.

The World Bank has circulated an internal report in which it decided that three of its six sections in lending to Nicaragua will be cut off. One of those is the very important sector of education. All Members are aware that without education in the developing countries it is impossible to have real economic development. Much of the economic development is simply a transfer of First World development to the Third World. We anticipate that the Third World will then be able to develop and thrive on its own. However, that is not the case. They cannot develop without the education and training that goes hand in hand with economic development.

The IMF has told Nicaragua that it does not need assistance for developing its education, its roads or a transportation infrastructure in its country. It has said that Nicaragua does not need assistance in developing a better water supply. Most people in countries like Nicaragua do not have running water or easy access to clean water. They do not have access to water other than walking long distances to get it.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Thanks to the Somozas.

Mr. Riis: As my colleague from, Brant (Mr. Blackburn) says, thanks to the Somozas. That is the type of regime that was not interested in assisting the people of Nicaragua. We can say the same thing about other Central American and Latin American countries as well. These international agencies that we support financially are making decisions that in a sense reflect, if I can use the term, the rather extreme right-wing view of the Reagan administration. What we are saying is that Canadian taxpayers—I am just talking about the ordinary Canadian citizen who pays taxes and provides us with most of the tax revenue—are funding the IMF, the World Bank and other institutions which are supporting, by definition now, the right-wing regimes of the world at the expense of the non-right-wing regimes. Some countries are receiving assistance. The private sector in some countries is receiving assistance but in other countries that support and assistance is being removed and cut off.

• (1140)

It is important for Canada to recognize that we are part of a process that is making the poorer nations poorer and the richer nations relatively richer. We are part of the process that is widening the gap between those who have and those who have not. We have seen that happen in countries like the United States and Canada. A report the other day pointed out that the gap between the rich and the poor, using those general terms in our society, is increasing despite many, many programs that we have introduced over the last number of decades, and we have not brought together those extremes in our society. In fact, they have grown further apart than ever. What has happened within Canada and within the United States is now happening on a global scale. The poor countries are relatively poorer than they were when organizations such as the IMF and the World Bank were introduced in the 1940s.

Those are some of my concerns. I realize today is the day that we speak about this Bill only in principle. That is why I have flagged only the principle of the Bill and some of the concerns of that principle we have as New Democrats. In committee we will be much more specific as to how we feel this Bill should be changed to ensure that Canada plays a much more active and progressive role, in the development of the policies of these particular agencies.

Canada, in my estimation, has been relatively mute when it comes to the IMF and the World Bank supporting what is going on in Chile today and not supporting those organizations in the early 1970s when there was a different political regime in that country. For example, when the Allende Government was elected by the people of Chile—and I want to emphasize that it was a government that was elected in an open election by the people of Chile—the institutions which we have been addressing today cut off support to that country simply because the government in power did not sit well with the American administration of the day. The people of Chile chose that government. I wonder whether Canada should have stood passively by when these critical funding institutions said: "We are cutting off support now that you have had a change in political orientation". This is just the same as El Salvador and Nicaragua. One obtains support from the IMF and the other does not obtain support from the IMF.

I think it is important that while this is a reasonably straightforward administrative Bill that simply consolidates existing legislation and makes a change in how the sums of money that Canada contributes is evaluated each year—in other words, using the estimates as opposed to Parliament's authority—we do have some concerns about Canada's ongoing participation in these organizations. We support these organizations in principle. We support the role of Canada participating as a major player, but we want to see Canada take a much more progressive and active role in developing policies within these organizations such as the IMF and the World Bank that will assist them in ensuring their lending practices, their financial support practices, are equitable and that they assist the people of the developing countries as opposed to maintaining certain political regimes at the expense of other political regimes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments?

[Translation]

The Hon. Member for Châteauguay (Mr. Lopez) rises for a question or a comment?

Mr. Lopez: I am glad to rise again today to deal with this issue, Mr. Speaker. I want to congratulate the previous speaker for his remarks which were much more proper and in order than those expressed by the Hon. Member who rose before him last night and continued her remarks this morning. I commend him, and he can certainly take credit first of all—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I might remind the Hon. Member that he should direct his comments or questions to the remarks made by the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), without any reference to those made by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps). The Hon. Member has again the floor.

Mr. Lopez: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is because there was a connection between their respective remarks and I meant to continue in the same direction. I am somewhat concerned about the fact that the Hon. Member seems to worry a lot about the need to help the poor and the developing or underdeveloped countries of the world—mind your, I have nothing against that—but I feel that all Canadians and all members of Parliament should be concerned first and foremost with their own economic situation. Because charity begins at home, we should not be interested first in what is going in the outside world. His remarks, however, were quite consistent with the political thrust of his party which is to help socialist or communist countries or, rather, countries with socialistic or communistic leanings, which is understandable. But it is not in Canada's interest to help most everybody, including the socialists and the communists, at the expense of our own economy and that of the Americans who are truly our closest allies. I suggest that Canada and all Canadians should take a direction which favours us and our allies first, as well as enhance our economy which has close links with the U.S. economy. To adopt another direction would be to go against all Canadians and all North Americans' best interests, which is contrary to our principles.

[English]

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): What a statement! Where did he come from, the Nineteenth Century?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the view held by the Hon. Member. I do want to thank him for his original set of statements. One's first reaction is to respond very harshly but I think the question is too important to respond in that vein.

Canada's economy is based by and large on Canada's participation in the global economic community. The day when Canada could think of itself as an economic and financial island, one unto itself that could develop quite independently of what is going on throughout the rest of the world, has long since past. As a matter of fact, it never did exist. When one goes back to the very beginning of the kind of western economy that we have come to know in this part of the world called the fur trade, the way of life of Canada and the health of our communities was dependent upon our ability to use that resource and export furs to Europe and China.

That same economic approach has not changed up to today. The ability of Canada to sell its goods to other countries and to import goods from other countries, both finished products as well as raw products, is integral to our economy here. We are one of the major trading countries of the world. As a major trading country obviously we depend upon the ability to interact with other nations. We do. Our track record has been relatively positive over the years. The way our economy will improve in the years ahead is to continue in that same vein.

That is why we are concerned about all of the protectionist policies that the Reagan administration is implementing in the United States. Almost every sector is either having protectionist policies introduced today or is having them contemplated, whether the sugar, the copper, the forest products or the fish sector. You name it, Mr. Speaker. In that great free enterprise, that free trade country is acting quite contrary to what it says.

I do not think Canada necessarily wants to get into that same mentality. When we hear people say that charity begins at home, of course it does. The point is our healthy Canadian economy depends upon our participation in a healthy global economy. It means that by assisting others in certain kinds of ways, not only does it assist them, but in the long term and in some cases even in the short term it assists us.

• (1150)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is as follows: Mrs. McDougall, seconded by Mr. Merrithew, moves that Bill C-30, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and to repeal the International Development Association Act and amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

OIL SUBSTITUTION AND CONSERVATION ACT
CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, March 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of Bill C-24 today, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act. Since the CHIP program commenced in 1977 and continued to the end of 1984, 179,660 grants were made in my home province of Alberta to the value of nearly $65 million. COSP grants in my province to the end of January, 1985 amounted to some $3.8 million. The CHIP program has undoubtedly contributed to the conservation of energy, but so have the people of Canada made such a contribution, some conscientiously by lowering their thermostats and some by lowering their thermostats for economic reasons. I may say that the latter had to do so through the failure of the previous Government and its disastrous National Energy Program to move more rapidly toward energy self-sufficiency.

It is my hope that our citizens will support this Government's effort to cope with the deficit and continued activities to reduce the consumption of energy. My Government believes that oil security cannot be achieved without the commitment and involvement of every Canadian. The federal Government reduced its energy consumption 5 per cent from 1981-82 to 1982-83 and realized a total reduction of more than 21 per cent since launching its internal conservation program seven years ago. This represents a total saving in consumption of some $515 million since the base year 1975-76 and $150 million during the reporting period.

Persuading people to have their homes checked out for heat loss was an idea that fitted well in the energy conscious 1970s. It was helped by the two programs that are now coming to an end and by the home energy audit which will check the insulation and heating system of a house as well as pinpoint any places where heat is escaping. Many electrical companies offer this service and recommendations based on the audit are given verbally or are based on a computer printout.

CHIP inspired the creation of private air leakage control companies which also offer audits and follow-up sealing and insulation work. I am confident that with these initiatives, there is enough public information available to support Canadians continuing energy conservation and their demands for audits and sealing work in the future.

There has been little quantification available in the public domain of the economics of energy conservation, its potential market, its impact on energy demand and on the economy, its costs and its benefits. This may not have been undertaken because conservation has not received much recognition as a supply option in the sense that energy conservation delivers the same standard of living as using more energy. Perhaps it has been because energy conservation is generally not perceived as a business sector in the way that traditional energy supply industries are. Consumer enthusiasm about energy conservation must be fostered. Consumer expectations of stable energy prices and abundant energy supplies increase the vulnerability to possible price shocks and shortages in the latter part of this decade in much the same manner as occurred prior to the second world oil shock.

In calling upon Canadians to practise energy conservation, I am not excluding the ongoing research and introduction of forms of energy other than the traditional ones. I would emphasize that energy savings are permanent. The net savings in expenditures on energy consumption mean that more funds are available to the consumer for investing in business and spending within their own areas and communities. Although the employment aspects of energy conservation are a very important consideration, especially during the present period of high unemployment, energy security and efficiency of capital use are other essential issues that warrant serious consideration of an aggressive energy conservation industry.

So far as conservation in the industrial sector is concerned, fiscal measures are not required to help finance these investments, unlike the huge mega energy programs which need substantial government royalty and tax relief in order to ensure their economic viability due to their size and mammoth cost. Lower energy bills and lower borrowing costs mean increased consumer expenditures and hence increase economic activities. More capital can be available to the business sector for investment which leads to more vigorous economic growth and more jobs that can be generated.

We in Canada have massive quantities of indigenous coal and shale. We have technically trained and educated people who can do the job; but to make these resources work for us, we need a triple play approach to energy policy conservation, deregulation and technology development. Deregulation will give petroleum companies better incentives to seek new domestic discoveries and to use enhanced recovery techniques. Beyond that, it will permit major efficiencies in what has become a tortuously controlled distribution system.

The savings to the Government on the termination of COSP is $424 million between now and 1988. On the CHIP program, it is $376 million during the same period. The Liberal Government spent $1.4 billion of taxpayers' money on these programs to the end of 1984 on which the return from income tax was only $300 million. The net increase in the deficit and the burden on the taxpayers was over $1 billion.

I agree that the issue of energy conservation was brought to the fore by the programs, but it is now up to all Canadians to take over the responsibility in continuing the effort to reduce the current exorbitant deficit. Canadians might think of economic challenges in terms of a team effort. Canada needs to be as competitive in the international economic arena as our Olympics representatives proved themselves to be in the world sports arena. Shared goals are the only basis for teamwork. This Government is moving toward stable economic growth, sustained for the next quarter but ideally for the next quarter century, the type of growth that would place Canada among the world's top three industrial nations in terms of income per capita, rather than being in sixth place as it now is.

In this Government's commitment to co-operation and consultation rather than confrontation, it strives to develop a shared view of our economic strategy and to adopt policies that will allow the private sector to sustain growth. The previous Government became bemused with debating trade-offs between wealth creation and wealth distribution, but we can no longer take wealth creation for granted. I believe Canadians are beginning to look realistically at our problems and this is the first step toward their resolution.

Canadians today are pre-occupied with two subjects: interest rates and jobs. No specific job-creation scheme, vital as it can be, is as important as creating a general environment hospitable to economic growth. The private sector must be stimulated because it is the private sector that can do it.

There is evidence that entrepreneurs in independent business have created 70 per cent of the new private sector jobs in recent years. The private sector is creating jobs. As the Government proceeds to reduce the deficit, it can create many, many more jobs. Control of the deficit, thus allowing economic growth, is the source of meaningful, permanent and productive jobs for Canadians which allow Canadians to support themselves without leaning on their fellow unemployment insurance contributors.

It is an acknowledged fact that both deficits and unemployment will decline substantially if the Canadian economy grows at a reasonable pace. The persistent growth in deficits, uninterrupted since the mid-1970s, has become a serious impediment to reduced unemployment. Job creation and training initiatives as introduced by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) were needed for specific groups and most notably for our youth. But government spending on such national priorities must be financed by cuts in other budgetary envelopes. Individuals and corporations will both have to look less to the federal Government for assistance, subsidies and guarantees.

Bill C-24 is just one step in returning self-reliance to Canadians. The change in our attitude toward the role of government will have to be significant. That does not mean that we should return to the days before Governments provided a safety net of assistance to the unemployed, the poor, the sick and the others in need of help to achieve at least a minimal level of social well-being. There must, however, be greater self-reliance on the part of everyone else. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) has stated, either we make certain sacrifices now or we have larger deprivations imposed upon us in the future. Spending cuts do not have to be inhumane but it is inhumane to leave our economic affairs in such a state that we saddle our children and their children with a crushing burden of debt.

Canadians have placed great emphasis on economic independence in the past, both nationally and provincially, and there must now be awareness of economic interdependence among countries, provinces, businesses, labour and government. One-third of our national income and one-quarter of our jobs depend on exports. This means that we must meet international competitive standards and maintain good relations with our trading partners, principally the United States. We must recognize the close links between the provinces. There must now be a Canada policy rather than policies of individual provinces. Improved co-operation is indispensable.

We must address the appropriate role of government. We must get our fiscal house in order. We must attack the huge deficit right now. We must all make sacrifices if Canada is to be put back on a sound financial basis.

The COSP and CHIP programs have been successful. They provided grants to allow Canadians to convert to a cheaper form of heating fuel and also to insulate their homes. But let us face reality: these programs have served their usefulness. Canadians must now run their own affairs and make their own decisions. The foundations of a new fiscal policy are being laid and some hard facts must be accepted. Canadians working as a team can help our country reach its growth potential and they can build the future for this great country.

My support for Bill C-24 is unqualified. The Government trusts in this way and in others that it can prepare Canadians to do their share in renewing the strength and the vigour of our economy, something which is so essential to the future welfare of us all.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments? Resuming debate.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When you called Bill C-24, Mr. Speaker, I was not in my seat. However, I had started my speech the last time this Bill was before the House. I would seek the unanimous consent of the House to be recognized now so that I might finish my remarks this afternoon.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We agree that the Hon. Member should be put in the position of speaking in the regular way. By all means, we give our consent to his proposal to speak.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) wish to rise on the same point of order?

Mr. Gauthier: We agree that the Hon. Member should have the floor for his remaining 16 minutes.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand there is unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well. I now recognize the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong).

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I give my special thanks to the Hon. Government House Leader, the Liberal Whip and all Hon. Members for extending this courtesy to me.

We are dealing with Bill C-24, the Act that would terminate the home insulation program and the Canadian off-oil program. When I spoke previously, I quoted from the submission of the City of Whitehorse of June, 1984 to the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. The submission claimed, based on figures from Statistics Canada and the national energy program update, that some $17.2 billion had been committed and spent by the end of 1983 on the National Energy Program and this has resulted in production of only some 28,000 barrels of new oil per day. At that time I asked Hon. Members to compare this with the some $1.3 billion that has been spent on the home insulation and off-oil programs. I stated that those programs had saved some 65,000 barrels of oil per day. More recent figures supplied by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources put that figure at closer to 75,000 barrels of oil per day.

The total energy savings attributed to the Canadian off-oil program, COSP, are estimated at roughly 70,000 barrels of oil per day. If a 65 per cent incremental value is assumed for COSP, the incremental value calculated for CHIP but not necessarily appropriate for COSP, then the oil savings attributed to this program becomes roughly 45,000 barrels per day. For CHIP, the total energy savings attributed to work under this program are estimated at the equivalent of 45,000 barrels of oil per day. In the absence of CHIP, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources estimates that 65 per cent of these savings would not have been achieved. Thus CHIP is calculated to have resulted in incremental energy savings of the equivalent of roughly 30,000 barrels of oil per day. That 30,000 barrels of oil per day from CHIP and the 45,000 barrels of oil per day from COSP add up to 75,000 barrels of oil per day saved by these two programs.

The cost figure of $1.3 billion for these programs is not entirely accurate either. One-third of these grants have flowed back to the provincial and federal Governments in the form of taxes. In fact, the program in part is a transfer program to the provinces as the provincial Governments tax these programs as well. Let us put the real cost to the Government at some $900 million. This expenditure of $900 million has produced a saving of some 75,000 barrels of oil per day. Put in another way, that amounts to a reduction in equivalent oil demand of between 25 million and 30 million barrels of oil per year.

In terms of cost per barrel, Dr. Hollbach, appearing before the Senate committee on behalf of Energy, Mines and Resources, noted that for the older, poorly insulated and weather-stripped homes, the energy savings could be had at a cost of $5 per barrel equivalent. Under some circumstances, the cost could be as low as $2 to $3 per barrel of oil equivalent. Many energy savings were possible at a cost which was less than $20 per barrel. Let us now compare that with the cost of bringing in new energy supplies.

The cost of bringing new energy supplies into the Canadian energy system is debatable, but the following figures are held to be approximately representative: Venture gas, $35 per barrel of oil equivalent; Hibernia, $30 per barrel, and Lepreau II, $70 per barrel of oil equivalent. Dr. Hollbach of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources noted in his testimony before the Senate committee that there were a number of conservation measures which could be taken that would cost considerably less than $20 per barrel of oil equivalent in terms of energy saved. In terms of costs, on the conservation side we have oil which is equivalent to $5 per barrel. On the supply side it costs $35, $40, or $70 per barrel of oil equivalent. There is no comparison.

We could look at the jobs which are created per $1 million spent on energy conservation versus increasing the energy supply. These figures come from a Canertech Incorporated study entitled "Market Potential and Economic Impacts of Energy Conservation in the Canadian Residential Commercial Industrial Sectors", which was published in 1983. The number of jobs created per year of direct employment by energy conservation was 20.2, and the number of jobs created by the energy supply sector was 5.8. If we look at the indirect employment, the total indirect employment and the induced employment crated on the energy conservation side, we see that for every million dollars spent, some 35.8 jobs were created, whereas in the energy supply sector only 18.9 jobs were created. Again, there is no comparison.

Therefore, reducing demand by conservation as opposed to increasing supply is far less expensive to Governments. It creates twice the number of jobs, the energy savings are permanent and the benefits go directly to the Canadian people rather than to oil companies and banks. There is no comparison. Yet the Government is insisting, with Bill C-24, that the energy conservation side must be destroyed, and it is not lifting a finger on the energy supply side. There is no justification for Bill C-24.

We have heard Government spokesmen claim that Bill C-24 is necessary in order to reduce the deficit. The Government Member who spoke previously used that argument. She said that the deficit had to be reduced in order to get Canada back on its feet financially. Yet the figures which I have presented this morning illustrate that conservation saves the Government money. The National Energy Program is costing the Government billions of dollars, but the Government has refused to touch that program.

I have attempted to obtain figures which would indicate how much the Government has saved in the Oil Substitution Program. That program has cost Canadians hundreds of millions of dollars. The energy savings of the Canadian Home Insulation Program and the off-oil program have saved the Government millions of dollars in oil subsidization payments. Unfortunately, accurate figures are not available to indicate how many millions of dollars the Government has saved. I have placed a question on the Order Paper, and hopefully some time in the future the Government and EMR will be able to provide accurate figures. But to claim as the Government has claimed that Bill C-24 will save the Government money, is false economy. It just does not work that way.

We note as well, in comparing the cost of supply versus the conservation side, that the economics are in favour of conservation. We could look at nuclear energy. Over the years the Government has spent billions of dollars on the nuclear program. Yet that program has produced very litle energy. The energy which it has produced has not been cost-effective. In Ontario it is estimated that by 1990 the accumulated deficit in its nuclear program will be close to $60 billion. The Darlington nuclear reactor has cost $11.8 billion, and $4.8 billion of that is in interest charges. Who benefits? Of course, the banks. The number of jobs that Darlington will create is a far cry from what $11.8 billion would create if that money was put into the conservation area. The total energy which one nuclear reactor produces does not compare with the energy which we would save if we put that same amount of money into conservation. Conservation will save more energy than a nuclear reactor will ever produce. The question is: Why do governments insist on going into megaprojects, off-shore oil projects and tremendously costly nuclear projects which produce energy at the equivalent of as much as $70 per barrel or per barrel equivalent, and yet ignore the conservation side?

We must ask the question: Who benefits? The home owner benefits from conservation. Home owners save on their utility bills. But if we go the nuclear route, who will benefit? Certainly not the home owners. They will eventually have to pay the $11.8 billion to build the nuclear reactor at Darlington and they will have to pay $4.8 billion in interest charges. Who benefits? Of course, the banks, because they will collect the $4.8 billion in interest charges. It just does not make sense.

I am concerned that the Conservative Government is following the path of exploiting home owners and helping oil companies and banks rather than ordinary Candians at home. One would tend to think that Conservatives are concerned about conservation. They are not concerned about conservation. Certainly Bill C-24 points out that fact. It does not make sense. It will not reduce the deficit. In fact, it will increase the deficit because the amount of money which the Government will have to spend to bring in new supplies of oil and energy will be much more costly than it would be to follow the conservation route.

The other matter which dismays me is the Government's destruction of alternative energy programs. Canada has begun to develop a leadership role in developing new technologies. Government spokesmen have said that the private sector will now have to take over, that the Government can no longer support alternate energy programs in wind, biomass and so forth. When the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Siddon) appeared before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, he stated that ten years was a long enough period and that since the new technologies had not proven themselves in that ten-year period, it was therefore the Government's decision to cut further research in alternate energy programs.

The Minister, who is an engineer, should know better. First, it is incorrect to say that those programs have not proven themselves. A fair number of those programs are on the brink of becoming commercially viable. Several are past the point and have become economically viable. If a ten-year span is what the Minister demands, I wish he would use the same measurement for nuclear energy. It took 30 years of experimentation, Mr. Speaker, before the first reactor was ever put onstream. We are willing to spend billions of dollars in researching nuclear energy, yet we are not willing to spend 10 years doing the research on alternate energies, on small-scale energy projects which allow the self-sufficiency of individual consumers and smaller communities. The commitment is to the megaproject which is costing hundreds of billions of dollars, not to the small-scale projects which produce more jobs, which are more efficient and more environmentally sound. These projects get scrapped while the high cost projects get supported by this Government and, I should say, by the former Liberal Government as well.

● (1220)

The Liberals were the ones who poured the billions of dollars into the National Energy Program. I will give them credit, Mr. Speaker, for supporting the alternate energy and conservation programs, but in terms of the total scheme of things, these were considered as minor projects compared to the megaprojects.

It dismays us in the New Democratic Party that the Government has chosen this route. It flies against the philosopy, surely, of many of the Hon. Members opposite who are Conservatives in the small "c" sense and who believe we have to move into a society where we can begin to conserve and husband our resources. The Government is destroying that philosophy with Bill C-24.

There is considered to be an oil glut in the world today. The demand for that product today is not as high, compared to its supply. There is no scarcity at present. People are not lining up at the pumps. But common sense tells us that this is only a temporary situation. Oil is a finite resource which eventually will run dry. We must put in place alternate energy sources. Or are we going to lay back and wait until the crisis is upon us again before we begin to act? Surely a forward-looking Government must realize that the day will come again when oil energy will be in great demand. We have the time right now to prepare for that day.

What this Government has done in Bill C-24, and in the cut-backs to research and development in alternate energy, is to prevent us from being prepared for that inevitable day when again oil will be a scarce commodity and will carry a high price tag. I urge Hon. Members of the Conservative Party who really believe in small "c" conservatism to make their views known and vote against this Bill, and in so doing express to the Minister and to their own Government their dissatisfaction with this Bill.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I am always interested when certain Hon. Members of the New Democratic Party rise to speak in this House. They are always zeroing in on nuclear energy which is one of the most successful stories in Canadian high technology today. The Hon. Member talks about energy. If he would talk to the leading scientists in the nuclear field, they would tell him that not only do we need nuclear energy for peaceful purposes but we also need the alternate sources of energy, as well as conservation.

There is no argument with that. But does the Hon. Member not realize that the nuclear reactors at Pickering produce far more energy than Niagara Falls ever did? Does he not realize that industrial development would not have occurred in central Canada without that massive source of energy? Would the Hon. Member not agree that there are probably some Americans on the eastern seaboard who went into darkness a few years ago who would have been very grateful if they had had the same safe system?

Something that always bothers me about this issue, Mr. Speaker, is that nuclear energy for peaceful purposes is quite often equated with nuclear armaments for destructive purposes. There should be no relationship between the two because Canada has gone the peaceful route. Does the Hon. Member not realize that the years which have been spent on nuclear energy research in Canada have not just been spent on experimenting with nuclear reactors? The cobalt therapy unit which was developed at Chalk River, Ontario, is one of the leading cures for cancer today. All kinds of companies go to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited to sign contracts for Atomic Energy of Canada to do the research these commercial companies are not able to afford. I would like to put on the record today, Mr. Speaker, that a far too narrow approach has been taken toward nuclear energy in Canada by my hon. friend. If he is sincerely interested in the high-tech industry in this country, he should really get some briefings on its broader scope.

The National Research Council started what is today Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. I agree with the Hon. Member that the NRC has been badly chopped by the present Government. However, in no way should we downplay one of the greatest success stories in nuclear energy in this country, and it does have a lot to do with the environment as well. Candu reactors are safe. That has been proven by the so-called incident at Pickering. They are capable of improvement and any errors can be corrected. We have the expertise and the technique to do it and it was indeed done at Pickering.

Let us not be negative about our successes in high technology in this country, and the safety factors which are built in, and at the same time complain about the expenditures and lack of energy generally in this country, because this country would not be what it is today in industrial development if we did not have that back-up source of nuclear energy in Canada.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I would first like to say that I made the nuclear comparison in terms of refuting what the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Siddon) said in front of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. He said, and I quote:

> In many cases, after some 10 years of funding, it has become evident that, particularly in the areas of solar and wind energy, the return on that investment was not evident.

I was pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that the Government was willing to forgo any further research and development into solar and wind energy because, according to the Minister, there was no return on investment in a ten-year period. Yet Governments, both past and present, are not willing to use the same measurement on nuclear energy. Research and development on nuclear energy has been going on for much longer than ten years. In fact, 30 years is more accurate.

The second point I would like to make to the Hon. Member is in terms of cost effectiveness. Nuclear energy has certainly proven to be a very expensive technology. It is not cost-effective at all. We have white elephants both in Canada and in the United States which are costing hundreds of millions of dollars. We have a nuclear power plant in the Maritimes and I am sure the people who initiated that program wish they had never gotten involved. We have a plant producing heavy water that nobody wants and nobody needs, at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars. The Hon. Member says that nuclear technology is a safe technology. Why, then, did the previous Government and this Government refuse to allow an open inquiry into the industry?

Time and again, Mr. Speaker, we hear stories of breakdowns in nuclear reactors. Finally last week we read some of the minutes of the Atomic Energy Control Board obtained by the Ottawa Citizen through the freedom of information legislation. The minutes reveal some of the horror stories which have occurred behind closed doors.

No, nuclear power is not safe. We do not have all the technology in place. We have not discovered a way to deal with its wastes. It is not economic, especially when compared to conservation programs. It just has not made sense, it has not added up, yet the Government continues to pour money down that hole while at the same time cutting off the nickels and dimes that were spent on conservation. I do not understand the economics and I do not think the people of Canada understand.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, that pretty well lays the NDP policy on the line. It will be interesting to see what the union leaders in the nuclear industry think of that statement.

As far as cost effectiveness is concerned, would the Hon. Member not admit that any useful in-depth research into energy is indeed expensive in the beginning? The NDP is always talking about commitments. Well, if you are going to start a long-term research development program like atomic energy, you have to make a long-term commitment. I will tell the Hon. Member that the long-term benefits of nuclear energy in this country in the future will far outweigh the costs which have initially gone into research and development.

I am amazed at the NDP. Some of them are more conservative than the Conservatives because they fail to move ahead and are always bringing these tactics of fear out in front of the public. They are trying to win their case through irrational and emotional arguments rather than by logic. Anyone in this House who does not think we need nuclear energy in the future is being very short-sighted about the future development of this nation of ours.

Mr. de Jong: I note that both Conservative and Liberal Members applaud that statement. It is that type of thinking that scares me and I think the majority of the Canadian people. Utility company after utility company in the United States is on the brink of bankruptcy because of their investment in nuclear energy. Stating that this is the most cost-effective way to go is an invitation to Canada to follow down that road and over the precipice. It is as though we cannot learn from the American companies which are going bankrupt because of the tremendous cost overruns and the inadequacy of the technology. They want us to follow them like lemmings. It appears that only the NDP is saying that we are not that stupid.

Mr. Lewis: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I rise to bring to the attention of the House that the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), who usually has his foot in his mouth, has it on his desk.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I have both feet on the floor as usual, while I listen to one of the best speeches I have heard in the House of Commons. The Hon. Member would be wise to pay close attention.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Resuming debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I will try to keep my feet solidly on the floor.

I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak today on such an important matter as the conservation of energy, of "our energy". For years Canadians have been preparing for conservation, and thanks to programs introduced by the previous Canadian Government we have managed and are still managing to redirect and save a significant part of our energy resources.

Clearly, with this Bill intended merely to eliminate certain programs, we can no longer make any projection for the future, we can no longer assume that we will still be able to realize any further energy savings after this.

Indeed, the Tory Government is coming in with a hasty and ill-advised proposal to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act.

Bill C-24 is a hasty, ill-advised proposal for the simple reason that the Tory Government has failed to analyze the impact of the cuts introduced in those two programs. Such a failure is unforgivable, Mr. Speaker, because it has wrought surprise and panic among consumers, and discouragement in private business.

Let us first look at the Canadian Home Insulation Program, the CHIP program.

It is worth mentioning that this program was established under a Liberal Government. It was brought in to save energy and provide greater comfort, and this has nothing to do with luxury. It is a matter of need, of necessity.

As you are no doubt aware, Mr. Speaker, that with the damp, cold winds sweeping over the Maritimes, people must have very well-insulated homes. Under that kind of geographic and weather conditions, obviously efficient home insulation is essential and even vital in some areas. Although this may come as a surprise, there are still thousands of Canadian homes that do not meet minimum insulation standards. The insulation program, for instance, was intended for owners whose homes were built before September 1977. Statistics provided by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to your Department of Energy, Mines and Resources show there were more than 7 million homes with inadequate insulation and therefore eligible for the Canadian Government Insulation Program. Of those 7 million, 190,000 were in New Brunswick and when a province with a population of 706,000 has 190,000 badly-insulated houses, clearly an assistance program is needed.

The Government of the day understood the situation and introduced its insulation program, and 35 per cent of eligible Canadian homes were accepted under the program. In New Brunswick, 35 per cent of the work has now been done and this means that there are still 65 per cent of homes that do not meet the minimal insulation standards. Therefore this is no time, Mr. Speaker, to axe the program.

Well over five years were needed to do the job of insulating 2.5 million homes across the land or 35 per cent. How does the Government opposite hope to complete the other 65 per cent of the work by next year? This is all the more unthinkable considering that under the Liberal Government, the federal contribution had been set at 60 per cent for each claim to a maximum of $500. Now, under this new Government, the Minister has announced, without further ado, that the federal grant would be slashed down to 27 per cent as of April 1st, 1985. That policy is unacceptable. The Government is bent on cutting everywhere. This is asking too much from the people within such a short period of time.

Clearly, since those cuts were announced last November, there is a general panic among homeowners whose residences need to be insulated and who cannot afford the total cost of an insulation job. And with the federal grant cut down to 30 per cent, consumers will have to pay more money, which means that there are Canadians who will not be able to pay the extra costs that were not included before November, 1984. In other words, less Canadians will benefit from the insulation program from April 1st, 1985, onwards. This is bad, Mr. Speaker, but the Government opposite does not seem to care.

Unfortunately, that is not all. The cut in the insulation program has other implications that are just as negative. Has anyone in the new Government ever thought that by announcing all of a sudden a 30 per cent cut in the federal contribution to the insulation program, and the complete withdrawal of the program for 1986, Canadian consumers will all try to apply for the program before March 31, 1985? Therefore, such a volume of unexpected applications will lead to a glut of orders far exceeding the current capacity of private companies doing insulation work. According to figures supplied by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, there have been 84,000 applications for grants under the insulation program between November 8, 1984, the date of the announcement by the Hon. Minister Wilson, and December 31, 1984. If we are to rely on statistics, officials of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources told us that between January and November 1984, there had been 218,253 applications under the program in those 10 months. If you divide the number of applications by the number of months, you get an average of 21,825 applications each month. During the two months following the announcement by the Minister of Finance, there were 84,000 applications, which is twice as much.

Striking figures like that are due to the fact that as soon as April 1985, the government will pay only 30 per cent of the expenditures. However, Canadian people cannot be blamed for this rush. We should rather blame the government for failing individuals in need. The Conservative government not only refuses to help people but in addition it leaves the problem in the hands of contractors who will simply not be able to meet the demand, which is suddenly beyond their control.

For example, in December 1984, the office responsible for the Home Insulation program in Fredericton received 1500 calls. This was a 25 per cent increase compared with the average number of calls of 1100. Homeowners fear that they will be unable to take advantage of the program and will have to pay more. As for contractors, since November they have been working seven days a week and are afraid that they will be unable to complete the work by March 31, 1985. This is inhuman and it is difficult to believe that a government which claims to be so close to the people turns a deaf ear to alarmed pleas. In short, I strongly object to the Government's intention to reduce its contribution to 30 per cent as of April 1, 1985, and I stand even more firmly against any attempt to terminate the Canadian Home Insulation Program on March 31, 1986. To this day, it has been the federal Government's most important energy conservation program whose main purpose was to help Canadians taxpayers. The program was not an expenditure.

A responsible Government should absolutely not aim for anything less. The previous Government managed to save energy and keep the people warm. I challenge this Government to do the same thing. In any case, it is quite obvious that the Government is headed in the wrong direction.

Did you realize, Mr. Speaker, that programs such as CHIP and COSP have created employment? Both programs had been designed to spur private sector development and expansion. The two million-odd homes which have been insulated enabled small- and medium-size businesses to prosper. These programs gave young people and other Canadians an opportunity to work and do their share on Canada's labour market. In areas such as New Brunswick, those programs have certainly made a significant contribution to the economy. By pulling businesses out of the doldrums, they created jobs and put commercial undertakings and the whole province on the road to recovery. As you know, Mr. Speaker, when the Canadian labour force is underemployed as it is now, it is the responsibility of the Government to take every means to create jobs. Job creation is not a cinch, of course, and it seems that our Government, devoid of experience in that field, will learn at our expense.

We have to be aware of our own economic forces, and CHIP and COSP were two of those forces. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, the more I try to understand why they want to do away with those programs, the less I succeed. I hope that my arguments will convince people who want to help make this country more prosperous that we must motivate Canadians if we want them to support our efforts.

That being said, I must admit that so far I have not given as much consideration to the other program which they threaten to abolish in 1985, the Canadian Oil Substitution Program. Naturally, all the objections I just raised apply to this program as well.

Since November 8, when the Government unexpectedly announced that COSP would be terminated on March 31, 1985, it has been like a stampede—interested homeowners want a Government grant, no matter what. The more applicants, the more grants, naturally. Once again the private sector will have to work overtime to beat the deadline and avoid the wrath of customers. Indeed, the program will end March 31 and so will the grants. In addition, contractors will no longer have any contracts after the deadline, or at least they will not have as many. The many contractors who hired more staff will have to lay them off, so employment will take a nosedive.

If the Government knew that this program was too costly, why did it not compromise and put off the deadline an extra six months? It seems that the Government has taken a one-way approach. He does not seem to be affected by the fact that consumers and contractors are greatly disturbed. Yet, would the excessive demand being faced by the private sector not justify an extension of this program? This is a question of logic, but unfortunately, there is a tendency to act illogically.

• (1250)

For instance, in their lack of logic, the Members opposite have forgotten that the oil substitution program is the most important of the three existing Federal programs in this sector. They have also forgotten that they are increasing the prices by 1.9c. a litre at the same time as they are eliminating the oil substitution program. Mr. Speaker, not only will Canadians no longer conserve energy, but this energy will be even more costly than before. This is nonsense.

In the last ten months, 7,609 houses have been converted from oil heating to electric, wood or propane gas heating or to another system in New Brunswick alone. The national total is assessed at 178,800 homes with a converted system. This is a lot and it represents a great energy saving.

We have to accept the figures. No one can deny that the insulation and oil substitution programs have been and would still be contributing a lot to our economic growth, the conservation of our energy and the welfare of Canadians. These were the objectives of the previous Government and they have been reached. Today, all that we are asking of the new Government is that it support these objectives and make the decision that we have suggested.

I am convinced that this Government will have enough vision to realize that what we are saying makes sense.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon).

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I was rather surprised to hear the argument raised by my New Brunswick colleague. He speaks about extending the program. He mentions the need for this program. However, he is forgetting something important in my opinion, namely the fact that this program was basically temporary, because when it was developed, its purpose was to help those people who cannot afford to convert their heating system or to insulate their homes.

On the other hand, a responsible Government like the one which has just been elected must consider the fact that we have a deficit of $38 billion, and that certain programs have already helped hundreds of thousands of people, as you said yourself in your speech. You quoted a figure of 21,000 people a month, which means 21,000 homes every month, and you said that the announcement that this program would disappear a few months before it happened has allowed some 42,000 people to present an application. It would seem that all those who really wanted to apply under this program have done so and that our responsible Government must now deal with other issues. In this optic, my dear colleague, I wonder whether the priority should not be to create jobs, as our Government is doing through the reforms it is promoting in the small business sector, for instance, so that people will be able to afford to insulate their homes or to change their heating system, instead of the Government maintaining this program which, for all practical purposes, has already met its objective.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. Robichaud).

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the comments made by my hon. colleague, who is more interested in the cutbacks made by the Government than in the help these programs have provided.

When he asks whether it would not be better to consider other programs for job creation, I must say yes, but I would like to ask the Hon. Member: Where are the programs and where are the jobs? Today, there is a need in this country for the programs we are considering, and it is a real need and there are jobs to be had. Why not let people do this work and have the jobs we need so badly? These are real jobs, not paper ones.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon) have a supplementary?

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. colleague has been away from the House too long, when I hear him referring to new programs. In fact, I think he just got back from Cameroon. I must admit I was on the same trip, but when he refers to a program to help small businesses, I believe the Minister of State (Small Businesses) (Mr. Bissonnette) has talked about employment programs, and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) has talked about jobs, permanent jobs. When the Hon. Member refers to job creation programs, and he says this was a job creation program, these are not the kind of jobs Canadians want, and they made this very clear on September 4, since we campaigned on the issue of creating permanent jobs and not the kind of temporary employment provided in these assistance programs. I think the focus of the program was good. However, now that the program has done what it set out to do, we must concentrate on creating permanent jobs and use the funds to get rid of the deficit we were left by the former Government and promote the creation of permanent jobs.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, once again, I agree with my hon. friend that we all want permanent jobs. But since in our part of the world there are no permanent jobs, people will take on any kind of work, whether it is temporary or seasonal—they want work! If I could be sure that we would get the jobs, the tens of thousands of jobs we were promised during the election campaign, I would say: Congratulations. However, I and the people of my riding are still waiting for these permanent jobs.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment. I have something to add in response to what was said by the Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon).

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would remind the Hon. Member that he must address his questions and comments to the speech by the Hon. Member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. Robichaud).

[Translation]

Mr. Waddell: Ah yes, that is a problem. I would like to ask the Hon. Member who spoke, perhaps in English—

[English]

I just heard the Conservative Member say that the program has done its job.

[Translation]

The program is finished.

[English]

The need has been met. Yet the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) said in Vancouver just the other day, in a speech on March 8, that an existing residential housing energy cost could be reduced by up to 30 per cent through conservation investment. How would he explain those words of the Minister in response to what the Member has said? Does he have any indication in his riding of how poor people really need the Government program to continue the conservation measures?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the Hon. Member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. Robichaud) to answer the question this afternoon.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIME FEED FREIGHT ASSISTANCE

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in January of this year the Maritime Farmers Council made a submission to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) outlining the crisis situation that exists on the East Coast in the livestock industry.

In 1941, when the Feed Grain Assistance Program was introduced, 90 per cent of the cost of transporting grain to eastern Canada was paid by the federal Government. By 1976 the level of assistance had fallen to 59.3 per cent. By 1985 Feed Freight Assistance covers only 19 to 28 per cent of the transportation cost of Ontario corn, 26 to 33 per cent of the transportation cost of western grains, and none of the cost for protein concentrates.

Little or no research is being done on making use of the agricultural potential of the maritime provinces to allow them to achieve self-sufficiency in livestock feed production. The industry is in a crisis situation with feed costs $60 a tonne higher in the feather industry, $47 a tonne in the dairy industry, and $37 a tonne in the pork industry.

The Maritime Farmers Council has received the support of all three maritime provinces for its proposal that transportation costs assistance be brought up to the 1976 level of 59.3 per cent, and be indexed until self-sufficiency in feed production is achieved. In the meantime, the industry is in an emergency situation and needs the immediate support of the federal Government until changes to legislation can be introduced to increase the level of assistance. I would request that the Minister take immediate action in this regard before more Canadian farmers are forced out of their livelihood.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

BRAVERY AWARDS FOR IROQUOIS DESTROYER CREW MEMBERS

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth): Mr. Speaker, unlike the previous Government whose leader, according to Ottawa's paper The Citizen, gave the Armed Forces a priority level below the support price of hogs, this Government gives top priority to our Armed Forces, and has demonstrated its care through action and promises.

Our Armed Forces personnel are highly trained professionals, working with inferior or outdated equipment, but when their professionalism is combined with raw courage, exceptional achievements are possible.

On December 5, 1983, the crew of the freighter, Ho Ming, caught in heavy seas off the coast of Newfoundland, was forced to abandon ship. The Canadian destroyer, Iroquois, responded to the distress call of the freighter and launched a helicopter and two zodiac rubber rafts for the rescue.

The rescue was extremely dangerous, as the sea was swelling 12 metres. Sub-Lieutenant David Finch sustained a chest injury when he was pinned underneath a steel ladder during the rescue, and Ordinary Seaman Michael Bouchard was thrown into the freezing waters. Two crew members of the Ho Ming were also thrown into the water, and Able Seaman Dennis Morrison and Sub-Lieutenant Finch re-entered the water to save their lives.

Six crew members of the Iroquois are being awarded the Star of Courage, Canada's second highest bravery award, for their actions in this rescue. Six more will receive the Medal of Bravery, the third highest award.

It is not often that Members of Parliament from Ontario have the opportunity to speak on naval issues, but I am pleased that one of the men receiving the Star of Courage, Lieutenant Finch, is my constituent—

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

DISASTERS

ASSISTANCE URGED FOR GLACE BAY, N.S.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, once again I feel it incumbent upon me to raise the issue of the disastrous economic situation in Glace Bay and the surrounding areas.

As all Members are aware, the town has suffered two serious set-backs in the past several months, with the fire at the Highland Fisheries Fish Plant and the fire at the Number 26 Colliery, leaving 1,500 people out of work. While we were encouraged with the Minister of Employment and Immigration's (Miss MacDonald) recent announcement of $2.7 million to meet the immediate crisis, it falls very short of what is needed. What is needed for the town of Glace Bay and surrounding areas is a long-term reponse.

I urge that the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens) and his Government strongly consider and take action on the following: first, the provision of a pre-retirement plan for miners who are 55 years of age and over, second, an early decision for coal development in Glace Bay, and third, a federal-provincial development agreement in order to provide some short-term assistance for much needed infrastructure as well as trying to diversify the economy of Cape Breton. Monies ought to be made available for forestry, tourism, small business, agriculture, research and development, and fisheries. Yes, much money is needed for human resource training and retraining.

These initiatives are realistic. These initiatives deserve the consideration of the Government and the co-operation of the Province of Nova Scotia, and I would ask that the Minister move forthwith.

ALBERTA CATTLE FEEDER INDUSTRY

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, movements of Alberta replacement cattle into the U.S. market since the beginning of this year are alarmingly high. Up to February 25, 7,377 head of feeder steers and heifers were exported because of lower costs of production and better investment returns. It can be estimated that the total loss on exported feeders has amounted to in excess of $21 million just on the value added.

If this trend continues, it could very well result in the closing of one or more packing plants in the future.

There would also be a loss in feedlot employment, loss to the agriculture-service industry and to all the various multiplier effects the feedlot industry has within the province.

With the direct grain freight subsidy to the railroads, Alberta feeders are operating at a cost of production disadvantage of $35 per feeder. Barley in the Calgary area is 47 cents per bushel higher than would be the case if there were a change in the method of payment. Seventy-three bushels of barley, which is consumed to finish a 650-pound steer to 1,050 pounds, at 47 cents per bushel, amounts to the $35 disadvantage which I have mentioned.

These problems could be solved, Mr. Speaker, by changing the method of payment to the pay-the-producer solution, without causing any deleterious effects to the grain producers.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

PRENTICE-HALL CANADA

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw attention of the House to a major opportunity facing the Government in the cultural development of Canada. I refer to the review of the Foreign Investment Review Agency of the Gulf and Western takeover of Prentice-Hall publishers, and the opportunity for the Cabinet to ensure that Prentice-Hall Canada becomes a Canadian company.

In the Investment Canada legislation now at committee stage, there is specific provision for screening of foreign investment in industries "related to Canada's cultural heritage or national identity". Prentice-Hall Canada meets this criterion. It is a major publisher in our country where only 25 per cent of books sold are Canadian, a figure which has not changed for 10 years.

Several Canadian publishers have expressed interest in acquiring Prentice-Hall at its estimated value of $20 million.

The Association of Canadian Publishers, in an appearance before the House committee on regional development, called on the Government "to express its commitment to Canada's cultural industries" by allowing the patriation of Prentice-Hall. The Association also made recommendations to strengthen the legislation by giving Canadian purchasers more time and opportunity to acquire cultural institutions.

The Cabinet decision on Prentice-Hall will signal whether the Government has a serious commitment to Canadians controlling our own cultural destiny.

In 1976 General Publishing was able to acquire Simon and Schuster Canada after a FIRA ruling. We are now waiting with interest to see if this Government will follow this clear and positive precedent of putting Canadians first.

HEALTH

MEASURES ADVOCATED TO PHASE OUT TOBACCO SMOKING

Mr. Stewart McInnis (Halifax): Statistics are instructive, Mr. Speaker. The great majority of peopfle who die of lung cancer are smokers. Smoking also contributes to other cancers, cardiac problems, and kidney disorders.

It is also a fact that the manufacture and distribution of tobacco products are not a trivial part of our economy, and an abrupt change in the laws about smoking would really hurt in many areas.

The following suggestions are sort of an à la carte menu. Some, or all, of the following could be implemented.

First, all advertising and publicity, including sponsoring of sports or cultural events, by tobacco companies, should be prohibited. Such a provision should come into force about a year after the legislation is passed in order to give publishers and others a chance to find other markets for their advertising space.

Second, a tax should be implemented, roughly equal to the amount that tobacco companies have been spending on advertising. The money from this tax would go into a fund, the purpose of which would be to help growers and manufacturers make the transition to other products.

Third, a standard drab packaging should be implemented for all tobacco products, perhaps the kind of black and white lettering you see on no-name merchandise.

Fourth, the distribution of tobacco products could be restricted making them available only through provincial government liquor outlets, for example.

Granted the economic impact is a reason for proceeding slowly with these measures, but it is not a reason for doing nothing.

AGRICULTURE

SNOW DAMAGE SUFFERED BY PEACE RIVER FARMERS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, Peace River farmers in northern Alberta and British Columbia have about half of their crops caught under the snow. While some of the grain left over winter can be recovered, there will be high losses in bushel weight, and substantial losses in quality. Yes, they have access to crop insurance, but so did farmers in northeastern Saskatchewan, when they were flooded out last year, and they got disaster relief payments. When flooding occurred in northeast Saskatchewan, Conservatives in opposition said that a disaster area should be declared immediately and would be, if they were the federal Government.

The fact is that provincial Governments decide whether to declare a disaster area. Because of the unique geography of the Peace River area, both Provinces of British Columbia and Alberta must move together. Why won't these two Governments join in an application to the federal Government for the Peace River area to be declared a disaster area? What are they waiting for? Perhaps another election. That is what it took to get action for the flooded-out farmers in Saskatchewan. It is time these Governments began to fulfil their responsibilities to farmers in distress. Where is the advantage in having Conservatives in Ottawa, and Conservatives in Edmonton and Victoria, if they only co-operate in doing nothing?

CANADA POST CORPORATION

LACK OF SERVICE FOR MEDICAL CENTRE

Mr. Gerry Weiner (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, statements in the press have given Canadians the impression that the recent agreement between Canada Post and its union guarantees Canadians their mail delivery.

Every riding in this country contains Canadians denied mail service. Canada Post has done something no other institute can legally do. It has created second class Canadian citizens, second class because they have invested in Canada's future and purchased new homes. Is this the way to treat Canadians who believe in the future?

The situation is so bad that a new medical centre in my riding is denied mail service that buildings on either side receive. There are 35 doctors, plus a new children's clinic, which cannot get mail service. An entire medical centre is denied speedy access to test results. Blood tests are hand-delivered by patients. Why? Because the post office marks them "return to sender" and does not deliver to their building.

This type of disgraceful behaviour by a Crown corporation cannot be allowed to continue. I urge the Members of this House to put pressure on this corporation so that there will no longer be two classes of Canadians and that all Canadians will get mail service, service we all pay for as taxpayers.

HOUSING

SUBSIDIES FOR RENOVATION OF CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING UNITS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, last week, representatives of housing co-operatives in the Montreal area, of technical support groups for social housing and of Canada housing co-operatives sat in the office of the Hon. Member for Verdun-Saint-Paul (Mr. Chartrand) to show their disagreement with the Minister responsible for Housing in Canada about the possible suppression of subsidies paid for the renovation of co-operative housing units.

Mr. Speaker, should the Hon. Members of this House take such a decision, there is the danger in the first place that housing co-operatives will disappear and secondly, that there will be a rather substantial increase in rents for social housing. I therefore ask all the hon. members of this House to suggest to the Minister responsible for Housing—

Ms. Copps: He is not listening!

Mr. Malépart: —who is not listening—to refrain from such action, to maintain the funds earmarked for that purpose and to borrow from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) some $5 million from the $100 million required to implement the stupid decision to send more soldiers in Europe.

AUDITOR GENERAL

FEDERAL COURT ACTION—DEPUTY MINISTER'S SUBMISSION

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, Parliament has a new champion. It is not a duly elected Member of the House of Commons or even an appointed Member of the malignant Senate. Our protector is a bureaucrat, even worse, a lawyer. He is the Associate Deputy Minister of Justice, Ian Binnie. Mr. Binnie exhorted the Federal Court of Canada to dismiss the claim of the Auditor General. Kenneth Dye, he says, has assumed leadership of an extra-parliamentary non-elected Opposition. The Auditor General does not need me to defend his actions with respect to Petro-Canada's takeover of Petrofina against this outlandish and arrogant criticism. But I have a message for Mr. Binnie, virtually everyone of political integrity supports the Auditor General in his search for truth. The only reservation is whether the investigation should extend to areas protected by secrecy in the public interest.

There is a delicate balance between the public's right to know and the necessity for cabinet confidence. Mr. Binnie does not aid the rendering of judicious decision by attacking the person and clouding the issue. The real victim of Mr. Binnie's outrageous invective is not the Auditor General or Parliament, but the judicial process.

TERRORISM

SEIZURE OF TURKISH EMBASSY IN OTTAWA—SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in refusing in clear terms to answer questions about protection of foreign missions arising from the Turkish Embassy tragic incident, the Deputy Prime Minister said that he was trying to protect national security in not giving us clear answers. My suggestion to him is that he cynically tried to cover up government incompetence.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): He told us that a month ago security over the Turkish Embassy had been reviewed. He did not tell us what we have learned from Ankara, that 10 days ago the Government was advised by the Turkish Government to increase protection at the Turkish Embassy. Since the Deputy Prime Minister advised this House that he is in charge of these matters rather than the Solicitor General, did he tell the Prime Minister of the warning from the Turkish Government about increased terrorism, and did he, or the Prime Minister, then order increased surveillance over the Turkish Embassy?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can understand, as I am sure all Hon. Members of this House can understand, the shock and dismay of the Turkish Government in Ankara over the events with respect to the incident at the Turkish Embassy here. However, that does not alter for a moment the facts as I have described them in response to the questions yesterday, that an intensive review was undertaken, not 10 days ago, but last month. I can assure him that was the communication that we had directly with the Turkish Government through its Embassy. After that intensive review, the Turkish Government, through its Embassy, a month ago expressed its satisfaction with the security arrangements which were made with the Turkish Government through its Embassy at that time, a month ago.

RCMP REPORT—STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO SOLICITOR GENERAL

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are referring to a communiqué apparently directly from the Turkish Government in Ankara, 10 days ago. If, as the Deputy Prime Minister attempted to explain to the House yesterday, in answering a question on whether or not the RCMP report on the international terrorism situation in Canada has or has not been implemented, that to answer that question would offend national security, which is what he suggested—he claimed that any statement on the matter would jeopardize security—why did the Solicitor General, when he left this House yesterday, tell reporters that that same report had not yet been considered by Cabinet? If security is indeed involved, will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether that statement by the Solicitor General was a breach of national security?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman knows after my responses to him yesterday, I made the offer to him and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, who was in his seat at the time yesterday, certainly not the day before when a similar offer was made to him, to brief them fully as Privy Councillors with respect to the ramifications of all of these matters, but they chose not to follow that constructive course. They choose not to be a part of finding effective solutions. They choose rather to urge us, as a responsible Government, to make disclosure of security arrangements which are being recommended or are to be considered for the protection of our embassies. I do not think that is helpful at all.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CABINET REVIEW INQUIRY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that is absolute nonsense. What the Deputy Prime Minister suggested was that he take me and the Leader of the New Democratic Party into his confidence under oath, hoping that this question would disappear from the floor of the House of Commons. This question will not disappear from the floor of the House of Commons.

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker, this is an important question. The Deputy Prime Minister told me three times yesterday that the RCMP report on increased terrorism had been acted upon. He said he told me that three times. Then, in response to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Saint-Henri-Westmount, he said—

Mr. de Cotret: You got it right.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I always get it right. He said that it would not be in the interests of national security to say whether or not the report had been acted upon. This occurred about 15 minutes later. Then the Solicitor General left the House and said that that report had not been acted upon and had not even been considered by the Cabinet.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): My question—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Now that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has arrived at his question, please let him put it.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I know your patience is elastic because of the seriousness of the issue.

In view of the discrepancy between the Deputy Prime Minister's remarks to the House and those of the Solicitor General on leaving the House, will he get his act together and tell us whether the RCMP report has been considered and reviewed by Cabinet, or not? I would ask him to please give us a clear answer. I will assure him that it will not endanger the national security of the country.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I very much doubt that the right hon. gentleman is in any position to advise me to get my act together. In any event, the answers I gave him yesterday still stand. It is the view of the Government that it is not in the interests of discharging the Government's responsibilities for the protection of embassies to be entering into this kind of exchange on the floor of the House of Commons.

With respect to the briefing which he dismissed yesterday, and in which he did not want to participate because it would somehow compromise his ability and that of the Leader of the New Democratic Party to ask questions in the House of Commons, that is precisely why there are traditional areas in which the Leader of the Opposition is taken into the confidence of the Government. It is so that he, as an officer of the House, can be made fully cognizant of the problems, and hopefully—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): You should set this one to music.

Mr. Nielsen: He says that I should set it to music. It is far more serious than that kind of frivolity. Once again, the matter is now under intensive review. We hope to arrive at an early solution. The Government would welcome the Right Hon. Leader's input and that of the Leader of the New Democratic Party in arriving at those solutions which would provide the kind of security measures for our embassies which the country expects, and which we have a responsibility to provide.

NORTH AMERICAN AIR DEFENCE

NORTH WARNING SYSTEM—CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence and Deputy Prime Minister. Last week in committee when we were preparing the agenda for the study of the Estimates, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister said that the Minister was not well enough briefed to come before the committee to explain the North Warning System agreement and its relation to star wars. Now that the Minister has signed it, I would hope that he has been briefed. Why does he not come to the committee this afternoon to debate the issue about which The Globe and Mail has said, "start debate before it is too late"? The Canadian people want to know why the Government refuses to explain to the House of Commons this $7-billion agreement that might change the future of our policies for the protection of our territory and our sovereignty.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the Hon. Member would ask that particular kind of question. He was a member of the Government throughout the negotiations which have taken place from 1976 onward, and which have culminated in us reaching an agreement on this very system. For over nine years the Hon. Member was privy to all—

Mr. Chrétien: I didn't sign it.

Mr. Nielsen: He certainly did not sign it. That progress will be made on March 18 when the agreement will be signed. With respect to exposure, it has been before the Senate committee and the committee of the House of Commons at which the Secretary of State for External Affairs was prepared to answer all the questions of Members. However, Members ran out of questions. With respect to my going before the committee, I will go at the earliest possible opportunity.

[Translation]

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I am quite surprised by the reply the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence has made. Last week, his Parliamentary Secretary indicated that the Minister was not sufficiently informed. This agreement will be signed this coming Sunday. We are told on the one hand that airports will be built in Northern Canada, and on the other hand that the North Warning System is only a radar line to watch over the Canadian North. Well, Canadians are asking a number of important questions, including this one: Could the Minister attend today our committee meeting, scheduled for 3:30 p.m. to provide some answers, in order to satisfy Canadians that we are not irrevocably jeopardizing Canada's future and allowing it to be locked into the Star War program which the Parliament of Canada firmly rejected as recently as last spring.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Yes, Sir.

TERRORISM

SEIZURE OF TURKISH EMBASSY IN OTTAWA—TURKISH GOVERNMENT WARNING

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Did the Turkish Government notify the Minister or any officials of his Ministry with regard to its concerns for the safety of the Turkish Embassy in Ottawa prior to the recent terrorist attack?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that question has already been answered by the Minister of National Defence. There was a request made in mid-February. There was a response made by the Government of Canada which was deemed satisfactory at the time by the Turkish Embassy. There has been no communication with the Turkish Embassy or the Turkish Government since that time.

LETTER TO SECURITY AGENCY PERSONNEL

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, is the Secretary of State aware that one week before the attack took place, Pinkerton's sent a letter to its operatives who were guarding the Turkish Embassy, informing them that they had to be more vigilant during this high-risk period? Does the Minister feel that that was sufficient to meet the risks that were brought to the attention of the Government?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such letter. It is precisely for that kind of reason, and for other very obvious reasons, that the invitation has been extended to the Leader of the Hon. Member's Party so that he may be fully briefed on the matter. Hopefully he can make constructive suggestions with respect to finding adequate solutions.

TRAINING OF AGENCY PERSONNEL

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, let me ask the Deputy Prime Minister, if he is interested in holding a meeting with my Leader, if he would be kind enough to put, in a letter to us, what it is that he intends to discuss and the parameters of the meeting? Many times I have heard in the House offers to do things that never materialize. Is the Deputy Prime Minister—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Have Ed show up. He'll find out soon enough.

Mr. Deans: What is he supposed to do, stand outside the door and wait to be invited in?

Is the Deputy Prime Minister aware that the training requirements for Pinkerton's guards guarding the embassies are three to four hours of instruction in the law regarding the handling of guns, and three to four hours of target practice, and that that is it?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): With respect to the last question, if the hon. gentleman would send me a copy of the letter to which he refers, I am sure it would be most helpful.

With respect to the training, as I answered yesterday in response to a similar question, naturally training, or indeed roles with respect to the provision of security at our embassies, is one of those matters that is under intensive review at this very moment, the object being to ascertain whether or not the facts alleged by the Hon. Member are so. They may be so and they may not be so, but surely that has to be the subject matter of the kind of intensive review of which I speak.

• (1430)

Again, I would invite them to participate. Surely I do not have to send the right hon. gentleman and the Leader of the New Democratic Party a formal, embossed invitation to meet with me. Surely this exchange in public, on the floor of the House of Commons, should be sufficient. If they are at all interested, all they have to do is communicate with me and I will see to it that such a meeting is set up.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NORTH AMERICAN AIR DEFENCE

NORTH WARNING SYSTEM—SIGNING OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence informed me that he did ask the Minister of National Defence to appear before the committee and that he could not attend this week. However, he has just said yes, that he will now go, and he said yes to me last Wednesday. What is the conflict?

Yesterday we were told that the North Warning System agreement would be signed this weekend in Quebec City, after only one hour and 40 minutes of very general discussion in committee. Naturally, it is an absolute understatement to say that many crucial questions have not been answered. Will the Minister assure Canadians that there is a clause in the agreement which will, without any doubt or reservation, protect Canada from being tied into future technological developments which Canadians may not want?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday—and certainly in the press package which was delivered and which the Hon. Member has in his possession—immediately upon the signing of the agreement it will be tabled in the House and made public. It may be referred, or taken up on its own initiative, by the standing committee. At that time the answers to all of the questions will be readily apparent and the provisions of the agreement will be public knowledge.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW PROVISION

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, we will be waiting for the Minister at 3.30.

The existing NORAD Agreement has built into it a periodic five-year review by Parliament. Will the Minister now assure Canadians—and don't cop out because we deserve answers today before it is signed—that the agreement for a North Warning System will have a five-year review provision in order that the elected representatives of the Canadian people can examine it? Surely those are questions to which we should have answers before the ink is placed on the agreement.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can see no reason, if the standing committee so chooses, that it should not examine the provisions of the agreement every year—not every five years, but every year.

REQUEST THAT AGREEMENT BE TABLED

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of National Defence. He has just announced this afternoon that he will be attending a meeting of the defence committee today at 3.30. Is that correct?

Mr. Nielsen: No.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Therefore, my question is: when he does go before the committee, or if he does not go before the committee, will he at least table in the House the exact wording of the agreement before it is signed? I put that to him, not only as the Minister of National Defence, but as a professional lawyer. Would he advise a client to sign a contract without first reading the wording?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with respect to my appearance before the committee, information has been conveyed to the chairman with a firm committed date for my appearance. I am trying to arrange my schedule to appear sometime next week. If that is at all possible, I will do that. I would be delighted to do that.

With respect to making the agreement public before it is signed, as I indicated yesterday, the agreement is to be signed in Quebec city on March 18. It will then be made public and tabled in the House of Commons.

AGREEMENT PROVISIONS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, obviously, to a democratic parliamentary body that is totally unacceptable.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): This Government was supposed to have a new wave of openness. Could the Minister of National Defence go part way? What specific wording in the proposed agreement precludes Canada from participating in a star wars defence system as an inadvertent consequence of signing? Could he at least give us the words which would provide that protection?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it may be unacceptable to the hon. gentleman, but the form of government which we operate under in this country permits—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Secret.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, the right hon. gentleman has been away for ten years, so maybe he doesn't know.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Sign first and tell us later. I love it.

Mr. Nielsen: All of the elements of the agreement were in my announcement yesterday.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): No way.

Mr. Nielsen: The reason they do not believe that is so is because they refuse to accept what is stated here. I can understand the Hon. Member wanting to look at every "t" which is crossed and every "i" which is dotted, but I certainly cannot understand those in the Official Opposition, including the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry and the former Minister of External Affairs, putting that kind of question. They were the ones who negotiated that very agreement for nine years. They cannot stand here now and tell us they do not know anything about it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SINAI—REQUEST FOR PEACEKEEPING CONTINGENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would say by way of preamble to Members opposite that the reason we are so curious to know is that, if we were there signing that agreement, it would have been in the national interests of Canada. But, with the flip-flops they have had, we are not so sure.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question on another important matter to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the recent discussions which were held with the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Israel, and requests which we have received from other allies, such as the United States and Egypt, concerning the commitment of Canada to replacing the Australian contingent in the Sinai Peninsula peace force, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs able to tell us today whether, on behalf of Canada, the Government will make that commitment and become part of the peacekeeping unit in the Sinai?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his question. He noted appropriately that the request has come to Canada from both Egypt and Israel, as well as other countries which are interested. He will know that the Australian commitment ends in slightly less than 13 months. The Government of Canada is seriously considering the request. We expect to have a response for the requesting Governments within the next few weeks, certainly in time for decisions to be made by the countries which might be affected.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Minister for that response. We can take from the response that the Government is considering, in a positive way, the possibility of becoming involved. We would like to know, at this point in time, what kind of planning is taking place, both within the Government and with our allies, in terms of the composition of the force, the kind of contingent which might be brought forward, and the kind of commitments which would be required. Can he give us some indication of what those requests were and whether in fact we are now in a position to respond to them?

• (1440)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, contrary to the practice of former Governments, I have made it a practice on matters like the North Warning System, the Strategic Defence Initiative, and others, to call the House of Commons into my confidence, when there is something to announce.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is a practice which this Government has renewed, and which we intend to continue. We are now at a stage of actively considering the request. Once that consideration is completed, I will advise Hon. Members of all aspects of that decision.

Oral Questions

ACID RAIN—CANADA-UNITED STATES DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. According to today's press reports it looks as if the highlight of the summit meeting this weekend between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States will be yet another agreement to study further the effects of acid rain in this country. Acid rain has been studied to death, and the last thing we need in our country, or in the United States, is a further study. Would the Minister assure this House that when the Prime Minister meets with Mr. Reagan this coming Sunday he will demand that the U.S. Government not just enter into another study but provide some concrete program finally to find a solution to this very serious problem?

[Translation]

Hon. Suzanne Blais-Grenier (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if my hon. friend from the New Democratic Party would compare the performance of the previous Government with what we have accomplished over the past six months, there is ground for optimism.

[English]

Mr. Young: We know what the previous Government did, and you are not doing much better.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT DEMAND ACTION

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): What we want to know from the Minister of the Environment is whether members of this Government are going to stop being a bunch of pussycats on this issue—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Young: —and demand that the U.S. Government finally do something about acid rain?

[Translation]

Hon. Suzanne Blais-Grenier (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure how to answer that question. Recent polls have indicated, I believe, that Canadians are quite satisfied with this government's approach, and that is the same approach we are going to adopt this coming Monday in Quebec City.

AGRICULTURE

CATTLE INSPECTION FEES

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. The proposed inspection fee of 67 cents per head of cattle, or a minimum fee of $125 for less than 100 head of cattle, would be a severe blow to small, provincially inspected plants which now have Agriculture Canada grading. Will the Minister look into the suggestion made by the Ontario Freezer Meat Association that the meat inspection branch have its provincial inspectors do the grading in plants at the time they do their inspection?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question of the Hon. Member, and I certainly appreciate his concern and the recommendation. I must, however, indicate, Mr. Speaker, that in the Provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Nova Scotia, I believe, we have federal-provincial agreements whereby we do share grading and inspection services. However, in the Province of Ontario the provincial plants are inspected under provincial jurisdiction and by provincial inspectors.

I met with the provincial Minister of Agriculture for the Province of Ontario this morning. He did not raise this issue. I share the Hon. Member's concern and, indeed, I can assure him that we will continue to work together so that we can maintain the high standard of inspection and grading. Perhaps we can even improve that system. By working together we will be able to work out some economies, both on the public and the private side.

MARITIME FARMERS' COUNCIL'S REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY FUNDING

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. As the Minister knows, the pay-out annually under the Western Grain Transportation Act and the Western Grain Stabilization Program is about $600 million. We on this side of the House certainly do not disagree with those expenditures. However, would the Minister explain the fairness, if you will, with regard to denying the request of the Maritime Farmers' Council for emergency funding in the amount of $13.5 million?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Hon. Member must be greatly misinformed because at no time have I ever denied the request of the Maritime Farmers' Council with reference to additional feed freight assistance. We are having ongoing discussions with representatives of the Maritime Farmers' Council. At no time have I ever rejected such a worth-while and legitimate request.

TIMING OF DECISION

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. I suggest to him that this inordinate delay in acting upon the request is tantamount to a refusal. In view of his previous statement, would the Minister undertake to assure this House by March 20 or March 25 that he will have a firm commitment in writing for the Maritime Farmers' Council who are requesting a meagre $13.5 million for emergency funding? Will the Minister give us that assurance?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would love to give such an assurance but, obviously, common sense would dictate that it would be impossible for me to provide it at this point in time.

FISHERIES

CANADA-UNITED STATES SALMON TREATY

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans admitted on the public record that the Canada-U.S. Salmon Interception Treaty went through Cabinet in 30 minutes. He admitted on the public record that it was riddled with problems but that the Prime Minister wanted it very badly. One of the Prime Minister's main concerns was how fast could the Cabinet get back to the Americans with it. Does the Deputy Prime Minister believe that this is the way for a responsible Government, or an independent nation, to make an international treaty? Does the Deputy Prime Minister believe that that is the appropriate way to make an international treaty?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the appropriate way to make an international treaty is exactly the process which was followed in this case. After many years of negotiating, and after getting around the difficulties of two years ago when the American Senate was not prepared to accept the draft agreement which had then been reached, a negotiating team was set up which represented every user group on the west coast of British Columbia, and all interest groups. As a consequence of that, an agreement was reached. Under our parliamentary system it was then my responsibility to advise the Cabinet, the Government of our country, on whether or not that was an appropriate treaty to enter into. I took that responsibility and I gave that advice.

I say to the Hon. Member that this is not the American system. The United States has a republican democratic form of government. We have a parliamentary democratic form of government.

Mr. Skelly: I might say that this is the most offensive mechanism that I think any democracy has seen.

YUKON FISHERY

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): My supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Article 8 of the treaty says that Canada and the U.S. must reach a specific agreement on the Yukon fishery before the treaty comes into force. The Minister today in committee admitted that no such agreement was in place. Would the Deputy Prime Minister admit that the Government bungled this treaty and it is likely, if this treaty is to come into force, it will have to give away the Yukon fisheries?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member, who is from the West Coast, is better at making statements than he is at reading the text of the treaty. The treaty does not say that Canada and the United States have to enter into an agreement on the Yukon River. What it does say is that both sides will set a range to establish a beginning of negotiation, and they will then meet in October of this year to talk about the Yukon River. The difficulty is that my hon. friend keeps confusing the setting of a range of fish available to either country as a beginning to negotiations with that of a commitment to settle the matter, when it cannot be settled without the negotiations the treaty clearly implies.

CRIMINAL CODE

GAMBLING PROVISIONS

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. I ask the Minister if there is any intention to remove or amend the gambling provisions of the Criminal Code to legalize gambling machines, casinos, or other public gaming places?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we have a very rowdy opposition. There is no present intention to do what the hon. lady refers to in her question. However, there is a request from one of our provinces that certain changes be made—

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Which one?

Mr. Crosbie: —which we have under advisement. It shall remain secret until I reveal it in the next installment.

HOUSING

DECISION TO CUT BUDGET FOR HOUSING RENOVATION PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister responsible for Housing in Canada. Last week, spokesmen for the housing co-operative societies of the Greater Montreal area staged a sit-in in the office of the Hon. Member for Verdun-Saint-Paul, to protest the $4.5 million cut announced by the Minister in the housing renovation program that was related to co-operative housing. Can the Minister tell us whether he is aware that if he stands by that decision, he runs the risk, first of killing co-operative housing in the Greater Montreal area and in all Canadian urban centres, and, second, of witnessing a significant rent increase?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for assisting me in clarifying something which may be unclear in his mind and in the minds of his constituents. There has been no decision made by the corporation on the disposition of non-profit RRAP to which the Hon. Member refers. It is included, along with other programs, in the study that this Minister and the corporation are doing. I would also suggest to the Hon. Member that the decisions made by a Crown corporation are not decisions made by a Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKnight: The Hon. Members were here when we passed the amendments to the Financial Administration Act, Mr. Speaker.

I suggest to the Hon. Member that I am working with the corporation, with the group from his very city whom I met last night, and with the Co-Op Housing Foundation, to find ways, given the fiscal constraints facing this Government, to provide housing units for those in need in Canada.

[Translation]

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT GIVE SUPPLEMENTARY FUNDING

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Rather than looking where to make cuts in social housing programs, would the Minister have the courage to do what the former Minister responsible for Housing under the previous Government did, that is get to the Minister of Finance and ask him to provide his Department with extra funding rather than invest $110 million in sending soldiers to Germany?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would only answer questions which are my responsibility. However, I would suggest to the Hon. Member that this Government will not cut co-op housing by 41 per cent as was done by the previous Government. I will inform the Hon. Member that, with co-operation from those who are committed to providing housing in this country, this Government will provide more units in the co-op housing field than that Government did last year, and for fewer dollars.

HUMAN RIGHTS

GRANT PROMISED TO "ACTION-TRAVAIL" GROUP

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In November, the Minister announced a $50,000 grant to "Action-Travail", a group that is supporting women who want jobs with the Canadian National. But the said group has not yet received that money. Can the Minister tell us now when his Department will dish out that money so that those women may take their case to the Human Rights Commission?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I recall making that commitment. If they have not received the money already, they certainly will do so. The mighty arm of the law will come to their assistance.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS' APPEAL

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear that a cheque will be written out this afternoon and forwarded immediately.

Would the Minister comment on the peculiar way this has been arranged? On the one hand, taxpayers are paying the Human Rights Commission to deal with equal pay and insist on an affirmative action plan at Canadian National. On the other hand, the taxpayers are paying both Canadian National to appeal that decision and the women concerned to continue the case against the appeal. Would it not be better for the Government simply to order Canadian National to institute a realistic plan of action and get on with the matter of hiring women in sizable numbers in Crown corporations?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the Hon. Member does not seem to understand, and I would have thought she would have, how the Human Rights Commission works. If it thinks there is a reasonable complaint that should be examined, the Commission establishes a human rights tribunal and the tribunal makes a decision. Canadian National is receiving no money from the taxpayers to undertake its appeal. It is a Crown corporation which generates sufficient funds to operate, and it does so independently of government. It is financing its own appeal.

However, the Government, because of its sympathy for the position of the women involved, and because there are important points of law to be determined in this matter, is assisting them to finance their appeal. I think every Member of this House should applaud our action in that regard.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS REORGANIZATION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and deals with human resources management. The Minister knows of a purported reorganization of the Economic Development Directorate of his Ministry into what is to be known as a new Economic and Commercial Analysis Directorate. He also knows from reports of the staffing associations that certain staffing procedures have not been observed in this regrouping, indeed some have been judged to be illegal and have been appealed to the Public Service Commission. Will the Minister bring the House up to date on this reorganization and assure us that it is a real reorganization, not a phony one to favour some preferred friends?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the question is appropriate because there has been a complaint. As Hon. Members know, there is a procedure, and it is being followed. I want to assure the Hon. Member that the reorganization to which he refers is being done on the basis of increasing the competence and delivery of services and programs by the Department.

My hon. friend invites me to make a comment which I do not think is appropriate for me to make at this moment because the matter is in a, if not judicial process, a quasi-judicial process, and I will of course abide by the outcome of that process.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, having worked with the Minister, and knowing him to be a fair man and one who respects the law, will he personally intervene in this case if an employee of his is judged to have been laid off irregularly?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I think it is my responsibility as Minister to guard with diligence the welfare and working conditions of employees within my Department. I will do that. I am quite prepared to meet with the Hon. Member and discuss the matter further, but I think it will become clear that we do not have a question here of anyone being laid off in the sense of losing their employment in the Department.

ENERGY

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy. The energy negotiations between the Conservative federal Government and the Conservative Governments of the producing provinces have bogged down for the second time. The Prime Minister promised in his famous red barn speech that a Tory Government would completely eliminate the petroleum gas and revenue tax. It is well known that Conservative Premier Peter Lougheed wants to hold the Government to this promise. Are the Minister of Energy and her Government still committed to the complete elimination of the petroleum and gas revenue tax in an energy agreement?

● (1500)

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I say almost daily in the House, negotiations with the western producing provinces are going ahead. There is a meeting today in Calgary. There was a meeting yesterday in Ottawa. At such time as we conclude an agreement I will so report to the House.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I am concerned that the Prime Minister has opened the red barn door and let out the Minister of Finance's horse.

GOVERNMENT REVENUE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): In view of the fact that the spending Estimates indicate that the Government expects to get more revenue from the oil and gas industry than last year, how does it expect to increase its revenue without breaking its promises and holding on to the PGRT?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I said, I am not going to negotiate in public when I am negotiating in private with the Energy Ministers. In terms of the Estimates, if the Member will take a good look at the Estimates he will notice that there are PIP payments which must be made as we promised.

CLERK OF PETITIONS' REPORT

GASOLINE PRICE INCREASES IN QUEBEC

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED THREATENING REMARK OF MR. McLEAN—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: I am now ready to rule on the question of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) on March 12, 1985. The Speaker, as Members know, does not judge the issue. Only the House can do that. The Speaker must simply decide whether, on the evidence available, there is a case sufficiently strong to justify the setting aside of the regular business of the House and taking it under immediate consideration.

The Chair has a very delicate situation to deal with. The Hon. Member for Hamilton East sincerely believes that her privileges, and those of all Members, have been violated as a result of a press report of a statement attributed to the Secretary of State (Mr. McLean). I do not think it would be going too far for me to indicate that, given what I read in the press, I can thoroughly understand why the Hon. Member for Hamilton East and other Members were distressed.

Privilege is itself an exception from the normal law and falls within carefully prescribed and narrow bounds, as the Hon. Member indicated herself in her submission. As she also indicated, the question I must decide is whether there is prima facie evidence of a direct threat which attempted to influence Members' actions in the House. The action that is complained of is a statement to a reporter. There are, therefore, two issues: one, would the statement, if made, constitute a breach of privilege; and two, the prior issue, whether the action complained of in fact occurred.

As her evidence that such a statement was made, the Hon. Member relies exclusively on the newspaper report. Hon. Members will know that the Chair has seldom, if ever, given much import to such reports for reasons every Member who has ever been misquoted will understand all too well. In such cases the first question for the Chair is, therefore, the quality of the evidence.

In this case the remarks of the Hon. Secretary of State indicated clearly that the Minister does not deny saying the words complained of. However, he did also say that the report placed his words "in a new context", and that he did not make the threat which has been inferred from the way in which he was reported. As Hon. Members would expect, in a factual conflict between a report in the press and the statement of a Member to the effect that he or she has been improperly quoted, the Chair must always take the word of the Member. I do so in this case. No further issues need be resolved therefore, and I rule that a prima facie case of a question of privilege has not been made.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. friend what the business of the House will be for the ensuing week.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to announce that I will be allotting next Tuesday as the sixth Opposition Day in the current period of supply.

With regard to today, tomorrow and next week, it is my intention to call the following Bills in this order: Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act; Bill C-27, an Act to amend certain Acts having regard to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; Bill C-25, an Act to amend the Agricultural Stablization Act; and Bill C-19, an Act respecting the reorganization of Bell Canada. It is also possible, Mr. Speaker, that pursuant to the agreement reached on the floor of the House with respect to debate on Bill C-32, and depending upon the deliberations of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, I could move the resumption of debate on Bill C-32, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act.

Therefore, I will continue to monitor the progress being made with respect to legislation. If changes are to be made in the order of business that I have just announced, I will give the House the earliest possible notice of that.

TABLING OF DOCUMENT ENTITLED "GIVING GREATER POINT AND PURPOSE TO THE FEDERAL FINANCING OF POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND RESEARCH IN CANADA"

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 46(2), I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a paper entitled: "Giving Greater Point and Purpose to the Federal Financing of Post-Secondary Education and Research in Canada."

PETITIONS

FISCAL ADVANTAGES TAKEN FROM CORPORATIONS

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, to the Honourable House of Commons in Parliament assembled, I have the honour to present on behalf of some Canadian citizens a petition dealing with the power of Parliament to use fiscal advantages taken away from corporations and reinvest them in the interests of all Canadians.

FIXING OF COMPETITIVE GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Duvernay): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 59 gas retailers from border municipalities in the constituency of Brome-Missisquoi. The petition is signed by gas retailers operating near the U.S. border who are humbly asking Parliament to instruct the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Côté) to set a competitive price for gas in their area in order to uphold the right to free competition.

I urge the government to accept that request and take action.

MOTIONS TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 30

Mr. Speaker: I have received two notices of motions under Standing Order 30 and I propose to hear them in the order in which they were received. The Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien).

NORTH AMERICAN AIR DEFENCE AGREEMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Pursuant to Standing Order 30, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of dealing with an important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the signing four days from now of an agreement between Canada and the United States concerning a warning system in the North.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, in light of the debate in the House, I think it is very very important that we debate this situation. Today the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) said he was going to come to the committee. Afte that he said he was not going to come to the committee. Everyone in the nation is confused. The press is asking for a real debate before the agreement is signed. That is why a debate is urgent; there will be no other occasion since the deal will be concluded this Sunday.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1510)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I have been given advance notice by the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice of his intention to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 30 to deal with an important matter requiring urgent consideration.

The matter referred to in his notice is indeed very important and is held by the Hon. Member and several of his colleagues as deserving urgent consideration.

I must say, however, that the signing of such an agreement between Canada and another country for the defence of Canada could hardly be considered, in view of the present circumstances, as being really urgent. Clearly, the decision to sign or not to sign such an agreement is the prerogative of the Government. Hon. Members can no doubt complain that the matter was not debated in the House, but the fact remains that such an agreement is a policy decision that should be considered during ordinary debates.

Moreover, there will certainly be an opportunity to deal with this issue very soon, because there are two allotted days left for the consideration of the business supply during the current period.

I must therefore declare that the request made by the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice does not meet the requirements of Standing Order 30.

[English]

IMPENDING SIGNING OF AGREEMENTS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, as you know, I also filed with you my intention to move that three matters of urgent importance require the House of Commons to adjourn now in order that we can discuss, in order, the following questions. The reason I suggest that each case constitutes an emergency is that the signing of three agreements or treaties with the United States will take place over this coming weekend.

The three agreements are as follows: an agreement on the salmon fisheries; an agreement on the question of acid rain; and the agreement with respect to the matter raised by my colleague from Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), the North Warning System Defence Agreement.

I believe this is an emergency because the agreements in question have been debated and discussed by the Congress and the Senate of the United States but they have not been debated or discussed by the Parliament of Canada.

My second point is that there is in fact a serious disagreement over the intention of the North Warning System Defence Agreement itself. In fact, there is a conflict in interpretation between those learned commentators for the U.S. and certain members of the administration of the United States Government and the Government of Canada as to the ultimate results of the signing of this agreement. Therefore, this must be debated by the Parliament of Canada in order clearly to determine what will be the ultimate consequence.

Mr. Speaker: With great respect, the Member is putting me in terrible difficulty and he knows it. The Standing Order stipulates very clearly that his right to make a statement at this point is to present to the House the statement he has sent me in writing. The Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) presented me with the same difficulty. I am therefore attempting to allow the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) the same leeway that I allowed the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice. The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain is now putting me in difficulty.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to you and the House if I am overstepping the bounds but I thought it important to point out why I consider the matter to be an emergency. However, I will not continue with that. I want to suggest, as I have indicated in the letter, that it is of vital importance that these treaties or agreements be looked at by the House in advance of the signing.

Mr. Speaker: With great respect, I take it that the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice was indicating earlier that my disagreement was that I in fact granted the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain more leeway than I granted the Hon. Member for Saint-Maurice in diverging from the statement. That is fair enough.

However, Hon. Members will know in the future that applications under Standing Order 30 are to be made to the Speaker in writing. It is in that letter that the arguments should be made so that the Speaker may have some prior opportunity to think about the matter. The rule very clearly says that the argument made now should not diverge from that which is given to the Speaker in advance.

Indeed, the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain gave me notice of his intention to request an emergency debate on three important matters. As must be clear to the Hon. Member, the matter of substance which he has raised has already been dealt with in my previous ruling. As I have already indicated clearly, the concluding of an agreement is a policy decision and policy decisions are matters for normal debate. In addition, an application for a debate under Standing Order 30 should propose one subject only, a single specific matter on which debate should be concentrated. Proposing the same matter three times is not one subject.

I must therefore rule that this application does not meet the requirements of Standing Order 30.

Mr. Deans: On a matter of clarification?

Mr. Speaker: Is the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain rising on a separate point of order?

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a separate point of order because I did not understand the ruling. Would the Speaker clarify one aspect of it? I am not challenging the ruling, I am simply asking. The Speaker indicates that one cannot raise the same matter three times. I am raising three separate matters.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I misspoke. I concede what the Hon. Member is saying.

The point I was trying to make is that Standing Order 30 allows the raising of a specific matter for debate. If the Hon.

Member says he raised three different specific matters, it would clearly be a violation of Standing Order 30, which requires one specific matter for debate.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Question No. 164—Mr. Stackhouse:

1. How many men and women are serving in the Canadian Armed Forces?

2. How many (a) men (b) women are (i) Brigadier-Generals or higher (ii) officers lower than Brigadier-General (iii) non-commissioned officers (iv) privates?

Mr. Robert Wenman (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The following figures represent the strength of the Canadian Armed Forces Regular Force, as of December 31, 1984:

1. Men — 76,370
   Women — 7,260
   Total — 83,630

		(a) Men	(b) Women
2. (i)	Brigadier-Generals or higher	122	0
(ii)	Officers lower than Brigadier-General	15,641	1,276
(iii)	Non-Commissioned Officers	44,969	3,740
(iv)	Privates	15,638	2,244

WOMEN EMPLOYED BY CORRECTIONAL SERVICE

Question No. 218—Mr. Howie:

As of the last date for which information is available, what proportion of the employees of the Correctional Services were women?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Solicitor General of Canada): Twenty-six per cent.

STUDIES REGARDING CHILD ABUSE

Question No. 241—Mr. Howie:

From January 1, 1984, were studies regarding child abuse and neglect done for the Department of the Solicitor General by (a) departmental personnel (b) outside consultants and, if so, what are the names and publication dates of the studies?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Solicitor General of Canada): No. (a) and (b) Not applicable.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

OIL SUBSTITUTION AND CONSERVATION ACT CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: Questions, comments or debate?

Mr. Waddell: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The Table advises me that as we adjourned a question had been put to the previous speaker. I understood the question was put to the Member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. Robichaud). It would now be appropriate for the Hon. Member to respond. Therefore we would now proceed to other questions or comments.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I had put the question. There was time left to comment on the matter and I wanted to point out that I had talked to the Hon. Member—

Mr. Speaker: What is the point of order?

Mr. Waddell: I want to explain why the Member is not here. I had put a question to the Hon. Member since there were a couple of minutes left. I had a chance to talk to him and I indicated that it would be no disrespect to me if he was not available to answer my question because I knew he was busy. I just wanted to put that on the record because we might be looking for him.

Mr. Speaker: In that case I think we must move to further comments in the remaining period and, with great respect, shall we leave out any further comments about where the Hon. Member is? Comments on the Hon. Member's speech? The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy).

• (1520)

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, we all know how very important Bill C-24 is to the development of energy conservation. We have seen in proceedings in this House that there are events which take great precedence over this particular matter. Therefore, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray):

That the House do now adjourn in protest against the lack of opportunity to debate the critical—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a motion under the comment or question procedure is entirely out of order.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Resuming debate.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With the utmost respect, Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a point of order concerning the matter that just transpired.

Mr. Speaker: I have already ruled. With great respect to the Hon. Member, I have ruled.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, with great respect to you, the basic principle of Canadian and British justice is to hear the other side, and it is time for you to do so.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the Hon. Member to resume his seat.

I have indicated to the Member clearly, as is my obligation when a motion is moved before the House, whether such a motion is in order. Hon. Members must move that motion—I think the Opposition House Leader knows that full well—when in possession of the floor for debate.

I think that matter is well known. If the Hon. Member would like me now to back up and give the Opposition House Leader a chance to indicate why he believes such a different matter would be appropriate, in this one case I will do so. But the Opposition House Leader knows full well what my initial view is. On that basis, since the Hon. Member seems to think that by knowing the rules I am somehow being unfair to the Opposition, I will now let the Opposition House Leader indicate his case.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, it is the understanding of myself and my colleagues about the rules that a motion to adjourn the House is in order when there is a question before the House. There is a question before the House, and that is whether this Bill should receive second reading. The rule does not say that the Member must have the floor for debate. It says simply that there has to be a question before the House. I invite you, Mr. Speaker, to look at Beauchesne and I would be happy to send forward the reference.

There is a question before the House for debate. My hon. friend, the Member from Fort Garry, had the floor. Therefore, I submit with the upmost respect that this motion is fully in order and it is something that is capable of being accepted and should be accepted.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I think I want to make just a couple of observations with respect to the point put forward and in support of what I anticipate will be your judgment, which I think is correct.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): What does that mean?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Speaker has indicated preliminarily he believes that on questions and comments, which is a procedure which was developed under the provisional rules under which we now operate, a motion to adjourn the House is not appropriate. I simply say I can understand that in terms of logic. I want to put forward on the basis of the rules and the element of logic and fairness that the provisional rules do provide for this part of our debate, but the debate is in addition to what is a traditional debate in the House of Commons.

I think you would probably be inclined to agree, Mr. Speaker, that if a Member has the floor in the course of debate itself, clearly at that time I suppose the motion would be receivable. But when we have a question and answer period, an analogous situation, it is clear you cannot use the period of questions and comments as an opportunity to move a motion to adjourn the House. It is not contemplated. It is not part of our particular procedure and rulings. I would say to the Hon. Member that if he would have a little patience and if the Liberal caucus would mind staying around, eventually I suppose in the course of this debate they will get the floor. I do not agree with anything the Liberals say—

Mr. Gauthier: Neither do we with what you say.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —with respect to the legitimacy of the motion they made nor with their attempt to disrupt the House, which I think is regrettable. I ask them to observe the rules, and if they are going to use diversionary and obstructive tactics, I say to them at least have patience and wait until they get the floor legitimately.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, in providing my contribution to this point, I would like to bring to the attention of Your Honour Citation 283(1) of Beauchesne. This citation is found on page 91 of the Fifth Edition. It reads:

(1) A motion "That the House do now adjourn" is always in order but no second motion to the same effect may be made until some intermediate proceeding has taken place.

(2) A Member may not use a point of order to secure the floor in order to move the adjournment of the House.

This is a specific case where a motion to adjourn is not in order. As Beauchesne does not enumerate any other situation or conditions where a motion would not be in order, I suggest to Your Honour that this would be the only case where a motion to adjourn the House would not be in order.

Citation 283(4) reads:

There must be some question before the House for a Member to move a motion to adjourn the House.

I respectfully suggest that there was a question before the House. That appears to be clear. I do not think it has to be demonstrated. Your Honour was in the House and able to ascertain that there was a question before the House. I specifically draw the attention of Your Honour to the fact that Beauchesne says that a motion "that the House do now adjourn" is always in order.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I admire the creativity of the argument. I am sorry, I thought the Hon. Member had concluded.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): I wanted also to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 29 which is found on page 20 and reads:

A motion to adjourn, unless otherwise prohibited in these Standing Orders, shall always be in order—

I will not read the last half of the paragraph which is irrelevant to what we are discussing.

With all due respect, I would ask Your Honour to reconsider the motion moved by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) and to allow the motion.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: That is creative but it has not changed my mind. I will make it simple. The Hon. Member reads Standing Order 29 which supersedes the citation in Beauchesne because it refers to leave to move the adjournment of the House—the Hon. Member made this point himself—"unless otherwise prohibited in these Standing Orders". The prohibition in the Standing Orders relates to what is appropriate during the ten-minute question and answer period after a debate is concluded. That was brought into our rules on an experimental basis in order to allow not debate but specifically, if one wants to go back as far as the original committee report, questions and comments. It specifically says "for no other purpose".

Therefore, while the Hon. Member may seek the floor under debate when it is the Hon. Member's turn to speak on the matter, a motion to adjourn would be in order at that time. But a motion to adjourn during the comment and question period, specified in the rules because Standing Order 29 says that a motion to adjourn is in order unless the Standing Orders specify otherwise.

On that basis, I rule the motion out of order.

Questions and comments being concluded, debate.

Mr. Axworthy: Can I be recognized for debate, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: No. The first Member who rose for debate was the Hon. Member for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce).

• (1530)

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Duvernay): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to take part in the debate on Bill C-24 dealing with oil substitution and conservation and also with the Canadian Home Insulation Program. I have a few specific remarks to make in support of this Bill.

I would like first to briefly outline the thrust of this Bill, which actually has two distinctive aspects, so that its practical impact once it is passed and enacted may be better understood.

First I would therefore like to stress the fact that this legislation, to amend to Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, relates to the Conservation and non-petroleum sector.

Cutting down on the use of oil and energy generally in Canada remains a major national objective for this Government. The Conservation and non petroleum sector—GNPS as we call it—effectively contributes to the security of supply sought by the National Energy Policy, by improving efficiency in the use of all energy sources, by developing these sources and by turning to energy sources other than oil.

It was under the guidance of the Energy Conservation and Oil Substitution Branch that those two specific programs were implemented for the purpose of helping Canadian homeowners reduce their heating costs by having their homes adequately insulated as provided for by the Canadian Home Insulation Program (CHIP), promoting alternative fuels, and the Canadian Oil Substitution Program (COSP).

Implemented in 1980, the COSP program provided for the payment of taxable amounts of up to $800 for the conversion of any oil heating equipment to natural gas, electricity, propane, wood or any other renewable energy. We should remember that under the existing act, the program will come to an end on December 31, 1990. On the other hand, the CHIP program, implemented in 1977, provides for the payment of taxable amounts of up to $500 for the insulation and draught-proofing of existing houses.

After an exhaustive review of the operation of those programs, it is readily obvious that the time has come to change them, in view of the new energy and economic context that now prevails in this country.

As announced in the economic and financial statement of November 8, 1984, basic changes are called for in the operation of those two programs. The proposals included in the legislation now before the House would provide for the program expiration date to be changed from December 31, 1980, to March 31, 1985. As far as the CHIP program is concerned, it is to be phased out in two operations. That program will therefore end on March 31, 1986, rather than on December 31, 1987. Let me add that these proposals now before the House will be implemented progressively because in both cases the Minister, further to recommendations made by the officials in charge of the work involved in achieving the objectives of both programs, is allowing for additional delays in order to help consumers ascertain the good quality of the work done by the contractors, primarily under the Canadian Oil Replacement Program.

In the case of the Canadian Home Insulation Program, the federal contribution against eligible costs will be reduced in the first instance from 60 per cent to 33⅓ per cent, as of January 31, 1985. The industry and the Government are planning to terminate this program that will be definitely cut off in its second stage on March 31, 1986. Therefore, the reduction of the Government contribution to the costs of this program is a natural and important step towards an adjustment of our energy policy.

While being aware of the impact of those programs, introduced at a time which I often called the "illusion of scarcity", $80 a barrel, when the price of oil was ever increasing and Canadian homeowners hardly knew about oil substitution, we are prepared today to support Bill C-24 which brings about some changes through a gradual withdrawal of COSP and CHIP programs, with a view to making profitable the framework of the Canadian energy policy.

These measures are all the more necessary that at present, both programs are about to come to an end. As far as oil substitution is concerned, the Canadian people understand a lot better now than 7 or 10 years ago the benefits of energy conservation. They have been able to benefit from it by reducing their heating bills and ensuring a better comfort at home through COSP which, at the end of 1984, had achieved 96 per cent of its goals. The Government contribution and energy savings due to changes made under the CHIP program are outstanding as well. Estimated at about 28,500 barrels of oil a day, the fallouts of this program are reflecting the age of houses that have fully benefited from insulation and airtightness in the various provinces as well as the cost of energy which varies between our regions.

In both regards, the Atlantic region has been the main user of the home insulation program, under which an average of 80 per cent of houses eligible in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia have been insulated. In Quebec, Ontario and the Western provinces, about 30 per cent of houses have benefited from this program. Those remarkable rates prove that the Government money has been used to good purposes. However, those programs have lost some of their effectiveness since then. It would therefore be useful for the whole country, instead of making new financial contributions to those programs, to promote some substantial progress in the area of research and new technology which will enable us to tackle the ever existing problem of renewable energy resources and their management.

It is with the general agreement of the Provinces that we are supporting this legislation today, because is has now become essential in the present economic circumstances not to duplicate our efforts in identifying adequately the needs of our future program on the rational use of energy in the home.

Finally, let us not forget that we can and must no longer continue to have borrowed funds handed out by the Treasury as grants to consumers. In order to make sure that investments in energy conservation are continued, it is obviously better that the Government, having beforehand seen to it that the investments in that area are put to good use, should act as a catalyst sensitive to the information needs of users and suppliers, to the technical problems still unresolved, and to the improvement measures which could still be implemented with regard to the use of energy.

Quite obviously the Government can no longer afford to subsidize consumers, and the Bill now before the House is a necessary and essential step in our quest for a fresh approach in that field. Since it was an illusion, it is imperative that we avoid all waste which may stem from the lower efficiency of the programs introduced a few years ago and from duplication which is due mostly to the existence of similar federal and provincial energy conservation programs.

Having decided to examine the results achieved so far under energy programs and projects, we would like to make some progress in energy conservation in Canada, primarily by using the money we might save by terminating those two programs. It has been estimated that we will save something like $180 million in fiscal year 1985-86, and $315 million in 1986-87.

It is because we aim to strengthen our structures in the energy conservation sector that we support Bill C-24. This is our way to assume our responsibilities with respect to the over-all Canadian energy conservation issue, and we are preparing a better future by trying to make Hon. Members consider this Bill as being more than a simple change of course in our home energy conservation program.

We are getting ready to redefine our energy policy so that, in future, Canadians will no longer have to face such costly heating bills. By eliminating programs which are already obsolete and which no longer meet the requirements and standards of our current energy sector analysis, we will make room for new incentive measures.

The so-called oil shortage denounced by the former Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Lalonde, was indeed nothing more than an illusion. The positive aspect of that incident is that all Canadians had an opportunity to find out that there are other energy sources besides oil—black gold, as it is sometimes called.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: I know that the Hon. Member is a very reasonable Member even if he does have some incredibly hot old cars that he keeps as a hobby. By hot I mean good looking old cars, not stolen old cars.

I wonder if the Hon. Member and his colleagues would be prepared to consider a proposal. I have a number of letters from constituents, as does the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Epp) and the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy). We have also discussed this matter with other Members of the House.

These programs are to be cut off at an arbitrary date, but there are businesses in northern Canada which are still ordering parts for people. They must get these parts shipped in but they will be cut off by the deadline. There are other places in which pipelines are being built and the program is being cut off too early. I do not want to see this program cut off at all. There are other people who are lining up to get contractors, but the contractors are all booked up to the deadline.

Would the Hon. Member and the Government be prepared to consider extending the deadline for cutting off the program? I could show the Hon. Member in committee that there is sufficient need for it in the outlying areas where people will be done a great injustice because they do not have the same opportunity as Canadians in other parts of the country. Would the Hon. Member and his colleagues be prepared to consider that if I can show that kind of evidence in committee?

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to remind the Hon. Member that my cars are not "hot". I built them with my own hands. And when he says he received a number of letters, it worries me, because when my hon. friend has letters, that is something to worry about.

As far as the question is concerned, I think the subject has been abundantly discussed in committee. I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister, to whom I put the same question, and there was a very thorough discussion. We were promised that for contracts signed before November 8, the deadline could be extended beyond March 31, but for contracts signed after November 8, it was agreed—and that was the solution the majority of the committee decided on—there would be no extension.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria), for questions or comments.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the question put by my hon. colleague a little earlier, and it is this: In a number of cases in the province of Ontario, and especially in Eastern Ontario, electric furnaces were installed by contractors, and Ontario Hydro's list of people where it has to carry out inspections before March 31 is so long that there will be no final inspections. This is a situation where the contractors acted in good faith but people will not get their grants because an agency of the Conservative Government of Ontario is unable to provide this service. Could the previous speaker tell the House whether he thinks this is fair?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce).

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, either my hon. friend is not telling the truth or he is misinformed.

An Hon. Member: He is not telling the truth!

Mr. Della Noce: No, Mr. Speaker. Because if I remember correctly, what we said in committee was that the deadline for inspections would be extended, and that was the whole point. In fact, the inspections were not the only problem, and in any case, the party the Government belongs to is totally irrelevant. As I was saying, there was another problem namely with natural gas, because the ground was frozen, and that is something beyond our control.

It was agreed in committee that the deadline for inspections would be extended in such cases.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the subject introduced by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). In northern Manitoba and in the City of Flin Flon in particular, people applied for assistance after November 8, but because of the nature of living in the North, in remote or farm communities or elsewhere, they cannot get the equipment installed by March 31. Certainly they made the application after November 8, but they do not live in Toronto or in the City of Montreal, they live in remote areas. It will take time to get that equipment put in place.

If the Government is going to be strong-headed and abolish the CHIP and the off-oil programs, that is its business and it can take the blame for doing so. However, why punish people in the North? Why not extend the deadline for the program so that these people will have the same chance to qualify as people who live in some of the larger cities in this country?

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member will understand that when this question was asked, a few words were said indicating that we have to treat everyone equally and we cannot draw a magic line somewhere. I think that makes sense. Some people do not understand that and want us to believe that we must draw a special line at a certain place. I do not think it is possible to do so. The Hon. Member can read the speech made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister who spoke about that matter. If the Hon. Member were to read that speech, he would get the answers.

• (1550)

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) rise for a question or a comment?

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the speech of the Hon. Member was a most interesting one. I have a question for him since we have been speaking of house insulation. He knows that thousands of Canadians, and more precisely 80,000 Canadian families, are still facing the problem of urea formaldehyde foam. And he knows also that his colleague, the Honorable Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Côté), has received representations about the UFFI. Could he tell the House whether or not he secured funds for the victims of the UFFI before this program is abolished and budget cuts are made by his government? Those people were supported by the Hon. Member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who advocated full compensation for them when he was on this side of the House. Did the Hon. Member for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce) make sure that that full compensation requested by his party when they were in the opposition will be granted now that they are on the government side?

Mr. Della Noce: I thank my colleague. As I said a moment ago, the program was fully operational, and I could see that my colleague was quite pleased about it, because it is a fact that it went well. However, the problem just raised by my colleague is one which we have inherited, we got stuck with it. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Côté) is looking into it, and it seems that he has taken the issue very seriously because he has already raised the matter with our energy committee. I am confident a solution will be found, but I cannot say any more about it because we are still searching. But I remain confident since the Minister went to the trouble of consulting us to seek our views.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to listen to the Hon. Member for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce) who, in my opinion, is one of a handful of Conservative Members who is objective and does not spend his time congratulating himself. He said—and just admitted again—that it was an excellent program which met the needs of the people, and he also admitted that a great many Canadian men and women could still use it to insulate their home. He went on to say that his Government has been left in a financial mess by the previous administration, but would he not agree that his Government would have been better advised not to spend $56 million to change the colour of our military uniforms, and $110 million to send our forces spend their money in Lahr, in Germany, that it should have given those millions of dollars to Canadians, knowing as he certainly does that the home insulation program made people spend less on energy besides creating jobs in all regions of Canada?

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, that is just like my colleague, he simply will not give up rehashing the issue of military uniforms. I want to confine my remarks to petroleum. Should he go over my speech, he would find out that I did not denounce the program, I said that enough is enough, that we must think about something else. Everything comes to an end.

With respect to insulation, my colleague knows that the program will last for a while yet, he should know that it will continue for another year so that Canadians will have further opportunities to use it, but the program cannot remain unchanged until 1990. I was never taken in by the illusion of the former Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I will remain convinced that it was just that, an illusion. I liked the program, sure, but illusions I could do without. Illusions are over!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has now expired. I will recognize the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) on debate.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to make some comments on the Hon. Member's speech because I disagreed with some of the things he said. I want to tell him that when I referred to his cars as "hot cars", I meant fast, beautiful and worth collecting.

There is another matter which arose in the House this afternoon about which I am very concerned. While this Bill about oil substitution is very important, the Government has entered into several agreements concerning defence, fisheries and other things, which have taken away the sovereignty of the country. It is a fast public relations exercise for the American President. That is not the way we in the NDP believe Canada should be governed.

Accordingly, we will take the only move which we can. Therefore, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Waddell) which was negatived on the following division:

HON. STANLEY KNOWLES

FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION AS HONORARY OFFICER OF HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: Before exercising my duty pursuant to Standing Order 45, may I advise Members of a happy event. We should have done it yesterday perhaps, but we did not have a vote. A year ago yesterday, we elected a certain gentleman here as honorary officer of the House. I thought Members might join with me in wishing him first anniversary wishes.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

OIL SUBSTITUTION AND CONSERVATION ACT CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: Resuming debate. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Questions or comments?

Mr. Speaker: Presumably questions and comments are at the end of the speech.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. About an a hour and a half has elapsed during the ringing of the bells. I wonder if you would take under advisement the question of whether that time counts with respect to discussion on the Bill. I just raise this by way of preliminary observation. Under Standing Order 75C, there has been a judgment rendered by your predecessor that during that particular proceeding the time which elapsed during the ringing of the bells counted in the time allotted under those particular rules.

It would be interesting for you to consider, in view of the fact that the motion to adjourn the House was made in the context of this debate and subsequently came to vote, whether the time that has elapsed during the ringing of the bells should be included in the calculation of time under the rules.

I know that the normal inclination of the Chair will be that where it is appropriate to expedite the passage of legislation, if there is any question in one's mind, one will make sure that the due process of consideration of the Bill will be given favourable attention as opposed to allowing diversionary or obstructionary tactics to interfere with the due process of the passage of legislation through the House.

I do not want to speak for another five minutes, but I think it would be appropriate for Your Honour to consider whether, in view of the precedents on the books at this time, that time should be counted.

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker has been told in the past that he sometimes rules on these matters too quickly. I think in context I will take the matter under advisement, and I accept the fact that the Hon. Member was trying to speak right through to five o'clock.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to Your Honour when you said that you want to take the matter under advisement and render a decision later. Before rendering an appropriate decision, you may want to hear a little more. I would point out that there is a danger attached to the proposal made by the Hon. House Leader. Some day during a debate that may be extremely embarrassing to the Government. It may call the adjournment of the House and expect that to be counted as time in the debate. I would like you to have both sides of the story before making a final decision.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, the Government House Leader, has a great sense of humour, but when it comes to making a great argument on a point of privilege, with all due respect, he has been less than convincing today. I respectfully suggest that he should not be allowed to have his argument stand in such a way as to mean that my silence on behalf of the Official Opposition can in any way be taken as assent to a very spurious argument.

The Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) has made an excellent point. If the argument of the Government House Leader were accepted, it would be open to abuse by a Government which wished to choke off debate. That could never have been the intention of the rules or of any precedents with respect to this matter.

In conclusion, I would respectfully say that the argument of the Government House Leader is particularly specious and in bad odour on a day when government Members prevented or were unwilling to agree to a full and open debate on a very important matter, namely, the terms and conditions of the agreement on the North Warning System.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to enter into any discussion of this matter. I considered it to be such nonsense that I anticipated a ruling indicating that that was the case. Lest my silence, which would be my normal posture, were to be interpreted in any way as agreement with the Government House Leader, I want to say that the points raised both by the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) and the Opposition House Leader, the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), are valid. In addition, I suggest that we would have been willing to have spent the last hour debating the treaties that this Government is denying the House of Commons and the people of Canada an opportunity to see and to understand.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on another point of order.

Mr. Speaker: There being nobody else on this point of order, I will recognize the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) on a separate point of order.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, since the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) started his speech with an adjournment motion, may I assume that we can now begin our 10-minute questions and comments on his speech? Is that correct?

Mr. Speaker: Let me suggest that that matter will be dealt with when we return to the matter. It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

NATIONAL PARKS

ADVISABILITY OF ESTABLISHING NATIONAL PARK AT SOUTH MORESBY, QUEEN CHARLOTTE ISLANDS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of continuing negotiations with the British Columbia Government to find ways, in cooperation with the Native people, of creating a national park at South Moresby, in the Queen Charlotte Islands, as urged by UNESCO.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for having put the motion before the House. This motion in essence boils down to the desirability of the Government and the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) continuing negotiations with the British Columbia Government so that ways can be found to create a national park and possibly a national marine park at South Moresby.

South Moresby is truly one of the few remaining examples of the greatness that nature is capable of producing. It encompasses some 139 islands and includes 43 freshwater lakes. On those islands are found some flowering plants which are unique in the world. Virgin rainforests, red cedar, Sitka spruce and western hemlock are found on those islands. As well, yellow cypress, which rank with the largest remaining trees in the world, are found there. There are some 16 kilometres of coastal shoreline, which is home to whales, porpoises, seals and sea lions. We are informed that it is also home to 25 per cent of all nesting sea birds on the Canadian Pacific, including the peregrine falcon and the bald eagle. Seven land mammals can be found in South Moresby, including the world's largest black bear and the unique pine martin with orange under-fur. There are over 50 salmon-spawning streams in the South Moresby region.

South Moresby is nationally significant both from the land and the marine perspective. We have an opportunity to protect significant cultural heritage and values that are associated with the Haida culture. In addition, South Moresby is of international significance. It has been recognized by UNESCO which has urged Canada to do all that is in its power to preserve the area not only as a national heritage region but as a world heritage region.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, as you are one of the privileged few who have had the opportunity of visiting South Moresby, this area has an overwhelming beauty unmatched in the world today. Each island has a character distinctive unto itself. At this point, I would like to pay tribute to the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) who in 1980 put forward a motion for the retention and protection of the original beauty of this particular area.

The position of the native people regarding South Moresby is a very significant one and must be put on record. It is that South Moresby is regarded as a critical area for the retention of their cultural heritage, and the area is covered by the Haida land claim. The Haida people support the creation of a wilderness area wherein they would have the right of traditional resource use. They welcome the concept of the creation of a park in a way that would strengthen their ways of life and their economic activities.

The Government of Canada put forward a proposal to the Government of British Columbia to explore together the possibilites of creating a national park and a national marine park in the South Moresby area, possibly complemented by a provincial park. This proposal was made in response to the South Moresby land use alternative report released by the British Columbia Government in February, 1984. Subsequent to that, the British Columbia Cabinet announced its intention to visit the islands, and a group of five Cabinet Ministers did so in June of last year. However, to date, to the best of my knowledge, we are still waiting for a decision to be made by the B.C. Government as to the future of these islands while logging continues. If the British Columbia Government rules against the preservation of South Moresby as a national park or a national marine park, logging of the island will continue unabated.

I would like now to paint for you, Mr. Speaker, a brief global picture of the logging situation according to the latest figures we were able to gather. In 1984, trees were felled throughout the world at a rate of some 50 acres per minute. In the past 30 years, we have cut over one-half of the earth's virgin forests. The deforestation of the past 75 years has resulted in the loss through erosion of an estimated 75 billion tons of topsoil. It is against this background that we must look at the virgin forests that we still have in Canada and decide on the merits of retaining them for future generations.

Logging on the Queen Charlotte Islands is an example of the over-exploitation that is taking place in all of British Columbia. Habitat destruction has taken place on a very large scale. Recent studies show that six times as many landslides occur on logged sites as on natural sites. This is one of the reasons why the people on Meares Island have recently registered such a strong public message against logging on their island. It is understandable that they are opposed to logging on their island in the light of the experience of the communities along the British Columbia coast so far.

Of course, we are running out of time, and the time to act on South Moresby is now. That is why, through this motion, I am asking the Government to continue the efforts and negotiations already started. In this context, I am glad to report that in June of last year, on the eve of the federal election, the Hon. Member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin), the present Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment, outlined the Conservative position in a letter to the Islands Protection Society, the Queen Charlotte Islands environment group that champions the South Moresby cause. The Hon. Member for Bruce-Grey wrote the following:

> I would like to confirm that the area is viewed as a unique and sensitive natural ecological system that deserves respect and protection, and we feel a "Canadian" responsibility . . . In short, the federal Progressive Conservative Party, if in a position to do so following a federal election, would be prepared to actively participate with the British Columbia Government in the establishment of a "park at South Moresby".

I am sure the Hon. Member for Bruce-Grey is still of the same opinion and that he did not make this suggestion out of greed for power. He did not need to do that. He did it because he felt very strongly about this issue, and I commend him for having done so.

More recently, on February 7, 1985, The Vancouver Sun quoted the Hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) as saying:

> I couldn't care less if it's a national park or a provincial park, or anything else. I would just like to see a park.

● (1710)

Those two Members are to be congratulated and supported for having made these statements. Of course, the question is whether the spirit which they have expressed is shared and supported by the Government which they support and represent.

I would like to draw to the attention of the House to the fact that the preservation of South Moresby is supported by hundreds of organizations which represent hundreds of thousands of members. I would like to mention a few. Those organizations include the Alberta Wilderness Association; the B.C. Native Brotherhood; the B.C. Wildlife Federation; the Canadian Association of Smelter and Allied Workers Union; the Canadian Nature Federation; the Confederation of Canadian Unions, B.C. Council; Elsa Canada; the Federation of Mountain Clubs of B.C.; the Federation of B.C. Naturalists; the Federation of Ontario Naturalists; the Friends of the Earth; the Friends of Ecological Reserves of B.C.; the Graham Island East Coast Farmers Institute; the Haida Nation; the Islands Protection Society; the National and Provincial Parks Association of B.C. and Canada; the Northern Trollers Association; the Ottawa Field Naturalists; the Outdoor Recreation Council of B.C.; the Pacific Seabird Group; the Progressive Conservative Caucus of B.C. and Canada; the Prince George Naturalist Club; the Pulp and Paper Woodworkers of Canada, Local 4; the Queen Charlotte City and Skidegate Landing Advisory Planning Commission; the Queen Charlotte Islands Tour Operators Association; the Saskatchewan Federation of Naturalists; the Sierra Club of Ontario and of Western Canada; the Simon Fraser University Student Society; the Tourism Industry Association of Canada; the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union, and the World Wildlife Fund. Those organizations have gone on record in support of creating a lasting place in the form of a park on South Moresby for present and future generations to enjoy.

Inevitably, when tackling this issue, one must consider the question of the exploitation of our forest. As we all know, in British Columbia, 120,000 hectares of mature forest land are cut every year, while only 50,000 hectares are replanted, not all of them successfully. There is a need for the MacMillan Bloedels of this world to start managing our forests in a manner which would take into account the necessity of rotating the yields and the necessity of better managing the public lands which have been given to them for their utilization. They must acknowledge that we can no longer permit the creation of lunar landscapes whenever deforestation is launched. There must be a commitment to ensure that there is growth for future yields on the same sites. They must consider, when cuts are taking place, the damage to spawning grounds, habitat destruction, native rights and cultures, the logging which is so profoundly resented, the damage which is caused to anchorage facilities, the spawning grounds which are wiped out, and the long-term, serious effects which it will have on the tourism industry.

The time has come for us to look at the way in which we exploit our natural resources. We must ask ourselves if we should draw the line and stop logging and cutting the few virgin forests which are left in Canada. We must better manage the lands and the forests which we have already started to exploit. I am sure that can be done on a rotating basis in a manner which will permit us to do better on the lands which we have already started to harvest, and in a manner which will permit the rotation of the lands which have already been assigned to forest utilization. We must call a halt once and for all to the exploitation of the few virgin sites which we still have in this country, which are the objects of immense interest, for ecological and other reasons, to Canadians and the global community. South Moresby is one of those areas.

Over the years we have allowed greed to play a major role in our approach to forests and our desire for an industry whose approach has been more one of mining the resource than of ensuring a careful, thoughtful, long-term approach in order that the cycle would occur again and provide harvests for future decades. We must respect the frail ecological character of those areas, particularly the ones along the West Coast.

It is clear that the survival of man is dependent upon our approach to natural resources. That argument has been valid for centuries, but it is becoming more and more so as we begin to approach shortages in our natural resources. We must ask ourselves whether the time has come for us to rethink our approach with respect to forests. We must find ways to preserve the forests which have not yet been touched by man and which are, in a way, the object of this debate.

It is clear that there are certain areas which must be left intact. It is also clear that Governments must accept their responsibility and make every effort to preserve our heritage for future generations. That is what the debate on South Moresby is all about. It is a unique site which has attracted the attention of former U.S. Presidents who have visited the site during their vacations, as well as of other outstanding personalities of the world who, like all of us in this Chamber and across the country, have a sensitivity for the beauties of nature and the ecological richness that the Islands offer in one of the most remote areas of our beautiful nation.

I urge the Government to keep the promise it made during the election campaign, through the Hon. Member for Bruce-Grey, and to heed the call in The Vancouver Sun for the creation of a park, as expressed by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. What is needed is a negotiation process with the provincial Government of British Columbia for the creation of a national park.

Beyond the question of that particular location, is the vexing issue of how we manage our forest resources. I know there is increasing public concern about the way in which we handle our forest resources and the profoundly-felt necessity that we must draw a line between the sites which have already been commerically exploited. We must make a provision for the areas which have not yet been touched so that they will remain available to future generations.

● (1720)

South Moresby is a classic example. Meares Island is another one. Evidently the public and the native people are very concerned about this matter. It is the responsibility of the provincial Government in the first place, but it is also the responsibility of the national Government, particularly when the request is made by an international body like UNESCO. We should listen to the messages that are coming to us from the public and make provisions for the future. I believe that as a nation we will be that much more rich and endowed if we are able to one day inaugurate and include in the second centennial of Parks Canada a real gem, the potential park of South Moresby, because it is one of the most unique sites in the world. A national park at South Moresby would be a special attraction for Canadians and for all the inhabitants of this globe who enjoy and love the beauty of nature. I am sure that all Hon. Members will concur with my conclusions.

Mr. Waddell: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, about the order of speakers. I have not had a chance to talk with the Parliamentary Secretary. I will be speaking on the Bill from my Party's point of view, and I wonder if he would not want to wait until I had made my contribution, following which he could reply perhaps to both Parties. Or does the Hon. Member want to keep to the order of speaking now?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the Hon. Member is going to make some sort of arrangement, he should do it before Private Members' Hour. I did not see the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) rising. I saw the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment (Mr. Gurbin) rising and, therefore, in order that we can carry on and not waste any time in this Private Members' Hour, I will recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we did not have an opportunity to discuss the Hon. Member's suggestion previously. I think it is a useful suggestion and I will keep it in mind for another occasion.

I was most interested in the comments of the mover of the motion, particularly because of his past experience with this issue and the responsibility he has had along the way for environmental issues. I believe his comments bear considerable weight on that ground alone. A number of environmental problems exist in this country, a number of opportunities have been missed historically and a number of wrongs need to be righted. I would like to indicate as clearly as I can, Mr. Speaker, that the sense of this motion itself is something which I can support, and I feel that probably all Hon. Members of this House can support this Bill with very little difficulty.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gurbin: There is no argument with many of the details which the Hon. Member has placed before us in terms of geography, the uniqueness of the area and the real importance that area has from an ecological point of view. However, I take exception to the premise that what is in the motion has not already been accomplished. There is the suggestion that commitments, or interpretations of commitments, may not have been fulfilled by this Government. I can give several recent examples to the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), Mr. Speaker, which pertain directly to this point.

I am sure the Hon. Member will recall that during an Opposition Day one week ago commitments were made by members of the Government on the control of acid rain. During the election campaign there were commitments made that within a period of six months the Government would bring forward an action plan which would provide tangible and real progress in the control of acid rain in this country. That was a commitment which was made, and this Party, this Government, has fulfilled that commitment to the letter. The Government has fulfilled almost precisely the tone and intent of the commitment. We have fulfilled our obligation to the Canadian public, and we intend to make sure that legislation will be enacted in that way. There are other examples of commitments we have fulfilled which relate not only to acid rain but in terms of the CN double-tracking and a broad range of issues which developed and were difficult to deal with because appropriate action had not been taken in the past. If action was taken in the past, it was too slow or inappropriate, which put at risk a number of areas including the environment. Lack of action put at risk native rights and economic development in the West as far as the double-tracking was concerned. Because of the fact that commitments have not been fulfilled in the past or in terms of process had not been conducted properly we are left with these problems. I know the Hon. Member will be interested in the fact that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), because of the interventions he was able to make, is in the process of working out a conclusion to what was a totally unsatisfactory situation from almost everyone's point of view. So it looks as though we are going to solve another one of the problems we were left with.

The Hon. Member mentioned commitments made by the Progressive Conservative Party during the last election campaign to groups which were interested in establishing a national park in the South Moresby area. I can tell the Hon. Member that the commitment made during the last several months has been fulfilled. The Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) has had at least two meetings directly with the Minister of the Environment of British Columbia and is actively trying to develop a program which would see that area become a protected area. As the Mnister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Fraser) indicated, it will be protected on some basis, but there are a number of options to be considered. The final conclusion depends on continuing discussions and decisions which need to be taken by the Government of British Columbia. But our commitment has already been fulfilled. It is another example of action rather than just discussion.

We have had in the past many examples of recognition, for instance that of the terrific abuse of our forests historically. I personally have had meetings with native groups from different areas and they have told me about the great abuse of our forests in the past. That abuse cannot be corrected in one month or six months, Mr. Speaker, because it has developed and evolved over many years. During the last 16 years, the Government of Canada has been controlled by one particular Party. It has been controlled in part by Hon. Members who were Ministers of the Crown and who, despite good intentions, good words and, perhaps, even good understanding, were really incapable of achieving action which would result in the saving of the areas of importance in an ecological sense as well as from a forestry point of view. There were things which we would have liked to have seen accomplished in the past which have not been accomplished. The Minister of the Environment is in the process now of negotiations and discussions with the Minister of the Environment of British Columbia.

• (1730)

I think the Hon. Member who moved the motion would be interested to know that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) recently visited the Queen Charlotte Islands and the native group in that area. That Minister made his views known to the Minister of the Environment. He is very supportive of the idea of protecting the area from undesirable development, yet he is looking at it as a possible area for tourism and a potential pilot project for allowing a native band to control or manage an area. I do not know if all those things can be accomplished, but I wanted to add the Minister's name to the list because he has made the effort to visit the Islands and discuss the problems with the native groups affected, and his comments have been related to the Minister of the Environment. That makes three Ministers of the Crown who have indicated their support for a reasonable resolution of this opportunity, which this is, on behalf of the Canadian environment and the Canadian people.

It might be helpful, Mr. Speaker, to explain how a national park might be developed. While we were in opposition, we indicated a very clear disposition to assist in the continued development of a national parks system in Canada. In the last month of the last Parliament we supported on very short notice an amendment to the National Parks Act which established a new national park in the Mingan Islands. At that time, the Hon. Member for Davenport was the Minister, although I think he was absent. In supporting that motion we indicated our support for expansion when possible of the national parks system. In addition to that, however, there is a process which needs to be understood. It is not a unilateral process. It must be undertaken in co-operation and in conjunction with the provinces, and this is precisely what has been undertaken with the province of British Columbia. If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, given the kind of relationship this Government has established with the provinces, we have an excellent opportunity of achieving the maximum degree of co-operation with the provinces as compared to other Governments in the recent past. If we continue that kind of constructive relationship, we can except to get the most positive and favourable results.

Parks Canada has defined 48 natural areas across the country in conjunction with future park expansion. Each one has specific attributes. Included in this is South Moresby which has been clearly identified by Parks Canada, and this is part of the process which can ultimately add to the establishment of a national park there. For reasons the Hon. Member has already mentioned, this area is certainly unique in Canada and perhaps in the world. It has been called by many groups the second archipelago. I have not had the opportunity of personally visiting that particular piece of the Canadian landscape, but I have seen an excellent selection of well-documented presentation slides which exposed me to flora and fauna which I did not really know existed in Canada. So there is no question that we have a unique opportunity, but clearly we must follow a process in co-operation with the province and native groups as well as the long list of environmental groups concerned.

The Hon. Member indicated that the Parks Canada centennial could be recognized in this way. He will know that the first national park in Banff 100 years ago was created almost by accident, and I do not know that anyone really could have anticipated the extent to which we have developed a national parks system across this land. But with 31 national parks, as well as a number of areas under active consideration to become parks, I think it is a particularly appropriate time to recognize the contributions made over many years by many individuals, groups and Governments to the development on behalf of the Canadian public of a system of parks that we can all be proud of.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back a little to commitments and obligations and to the premise of this motion. I do not think the motion is completely redundant in that the Hon. Member is using this opportunity to bring forward his views and those of others, and I am happy to have had the opportunity to express mine. But the motion really lacks anything extraordinary over and above what the Minister of the Environment has already done, is continuing to do, and will hopefully be able to bring to a successful conclusion in the future. So the motion has really little place in the whole scene, if you will. It is in and of itself redundant. The thought is genuine, I am sure, and it is supported by the Government and is being acted on by the Government, which, again, is in contrast to the past.

Mr. Caccia: When will you announce the park?

Mr. Gurbin: The Hon. Member knows this is not a process which is put on an exact schedule or time-frame. He was the Minister of the Environment for a period of time. I cannot remember exactly how long his predecessor was there, but I believe it was several years. This process was not started yesterday and will not finish tomorrow. If we continue with the positive approach and constructive dialogue which the Minister is undertaking, I hope we will have a positive conclusion in which we can all take some satisfaction.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on behalf of the NDP and on my own behalf because I visited this area a couple of times. I want to say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Gurbin) that I am really disappointed in the attitude he took in his speech. I would ask him to reconsider.

As I understood his speech, he said he can support the motion. Those were his words. However, he thinks the motion is redundant and therefore the Government is not going to let it through today. That is what I understand from his speech. He feels that the process is going ahead and therefore we do not need the motion.

● (1740)

Mr. Speaker, do you recall my bringing forward a motion in the House to acknowledge what the Chinese Canadians had done for Canada? You were speaking for the Conservative Party at that time. You and I convinced the Government that it would be an important signal if the Government let that resolution through. The world would not end because that resolution went through, or a new world would not be born. However, Mr. Speaker, it gave a signal to our Chinese Canadian community. I have heard that motion talked about by that group. I have heard people from that group mention speakers from all three Parties. The Government was big enough to let the motion go through.

Contrary to what the Parliamentary Secretary is saying, it is a very important signal to allow this resolution to go through. The Government is getting a bad reputation on the environment. I know that it has done something with acid rain, but the impression of the Canadian public is that the initiative on acid rain was taken very quickly in order to have something with which to meet President Reagan. The Government does not have a good reputation on the environment. The first cut-backs were in the environment area. The reaction of the Canadian public was absolutely fascinating. There was real public opinion out there. It was not just Members of Parliament getting up and shouting. There were letters and a genuine swell of public opinion. It was reflected by the Government's own back-benchers who said that the Minister had better review those cuts.

Canada has changed. The environment has come of age in Canada. The work done in the 1960s and 1970s has come to fruition. Canadians are not anti-development. However, a modern Canadian is very conscious of the fact that he or she wants to live in a good environment. Canadians also know that we probably have one of the best environments in the world and they are not prepared to let that environment go to waste. That was the message, and if the Government did not hear that message it will have some political troubles and it is indeed deaf.

I am tired of hearing the Government say that the Liberals had 13 or 16 or 33 or 85 years, or whatever they had. I was critical of the Liberals. I know they had a lot of time. It so happens that the Member who introduced this motion is a former Minister of the Environment. He served in that capacity for only a short period of time, but he was very distinguished as Minister of the Environment and showed great promise. Let us not have any more of this needless, partisan rhetoric. This is not a partisan motion. The motion says that:

> the Government should consider the advisability of continuing negotiations with the British Columbia Government to find ways, in cooperation with the Native people, of creating a national park at South Moresby, in the Queen Charlotte Islands, as urged by UNESCO.

It is not a partisan motion. It takes time to do these things, as the Parliamentary Secretary said in his own speech. Would the Parliamentary Secretary please grow up and have the Government grow up and approach these matters in the way in which they should be approached? They are not in opposition any more. They are the Government. They are it. They can do it. If the Government is in favour of the resolution, why not pass it? It is a very important signal.

As I said, I have been to that site. That does not make me anything special, but I would like to make some comments about what it is like. As the Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) said, I presented Private Member's Bill C-454 in the last Parliament. A group called the Western Canada Wilderness Community interviewed 94 MPs in that last Parliament. Seventy-five were in support of the Bill, one was not in support, and 19 were non-committal. There was support at that time and there is support in the House today.

South Moresby Island is internationally recognized as an outstanding biological, geographical and cultural area. The Member for Davenport covered a lot of ground, but I do not think he had time to tell you what that means. The UNESCO convention is a treaty among 60 nations which recognizes that the world's natural and cultural heritage transcends national boundaries and must be identified, protected and preserved for future generations. Among the world heritage sites are the pyramids of Egypt, the cathedral at Chartres, the ancient city of Damascus, the centre of Rome, the Galapagos Islands, Mount Everest National Park in Nepal, Yellowstone National Park, and Venice.

We want to add South Moresby Island. It has been determined, by an international organization, that that area of Canada is of that standard. We should be pretty proud of that. The coastline of South Moresby has exposure to both the Hecate Strait and the open Pacific. It has a rich variety of shorelines including sea caves, sandy beaches, tidal falls, hidden coves, shallow reefs and safe anchorages. The area contains a remarkable variety of intact ecological systems ranging from the San Cristoval alpine environment to the freshwater Victoria Lakes and from the Skincuttle Inlet marine gardens to the bonsai forest of Gowgaia Bay.

Moresby Island is home of the world's largest subspecies of black bear and the rare peregrine falcon. The unusual salt marshes are part of the migratory flyway of the Pacific Coast, and there are numerous highly productive salmon streams. The virgin rainforests of the area have Canada's largest and tallest red cedar, sitka spruce and western hemlock. Moresby Island was inhabited by the Haida Indians until the last century and includes numerous archaeological and village sites.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you have seen the picture of the totem poles which are falling in the rainforest on Anthony Island. It is a very famous picture which has been shown in many different books. I will try to explain what this is like to Canadians who may be watching on television. Canadians who live in Davenport, Toronto or Montreal have seen the beautiful scenery on the show The Beachcombers. That scenery is just north of Vancouver at Gibsons. As one goes farther up the coast, the scenery becomes twice as good. It becomes even better than what is seen on The Beachcombers. If one goes up to South Moresby Island, the scenery becomes absolutely magnificent. It becomes more than magnificent, it becomes magic.

I once worked for the Berger inquiry on the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. I heard native people speak about the land and the trees. It took me a long time, but I came to understand that for them the trees and the land were actually living. It is not as if it was us, the trees, the land and the animals. For them we are all equals. The trees have a right, the land has a right, the streams have a right, the human being has a right, and the animal has a right. It is almost as if we were all equal.

We in southern Canada could learn from the native people to feel in touch with our land. It is really part of being Canadian. Most Canadians do not live in the North or on the West or East Coasts. They live on a small strip of land near the American border. Canadians understand that we are a northern people and therefore support the preservation of this park.

● (1750)

The Hon. Member for Davenport comes from an urban constituency in Toronto. People from the Queen Charlotte Islands have questioned the credibility of people from Toronto with respect to environmental issues. They do not work as loggers or in other professions in areas like the Queen Charlotte Islands. I have constituents in Vancouver-Kingsway who work as loggers and at other professions in the forests. Therefore, it is my political responsibility to consider the effects of these questions on people who are loggers and so on. Therefore, perhaps I can comment on that aspect with more credibility than the Hon. Member for Davenport. I have met with the International Woodworkers of America and I have met with the loggers.

We are not unrealistic. We do not want to have a virgin North where the entire coast is frozen into a museum-like state. We want logging to take place in the forests, but not at this particular area. As the Hon. Member for Davenport says, there must be proper forest management with respect to logging, reforestation, marketing and the processing of logs in Canada. These all form part of a forestry policy that should be in place.

There are certain areas of our country that are virtual miracles. South Moresby is one such area. This area should not be part of the controversy between logging and environment.

I have visited that area. The first sight of the Queen Charlotte Islands is breathtaking. The Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) owns a log cabin on the Tlel1 River in the Queen Charlotte Islands. South Moresby lies to the south of the Queen Charlotte Islands off the West Coast of Canada. Those from the city who visit this area can sense the age of the trees and feel the magic that Emily Carr captured in her magnificent paintings of the rainforests. For instance, falling asleep in a cabin in a rainforest is almost a mystical experience.

I will conclude my remarks soon in the hope that the Government will allow this motion to pass today. If it is serious about helping the process, it will do so, because the motion simply asks that the House support the continuing process. It is a signal to the Government of British Columbia and all Canadians that we in the House are concerned about South Moresby Island and the environment in general. It is also a signal that the Government is concerned.

I suggest that the Government would receive support from many Canadians if it would allow this motion to pass. The Government would not be committed to any firm action but it would send a signal that it is concerned. The Russian writer, Alexander Solzhenitsyn, once said that any village greybeard will tell you that a dozen worms can only gnaw at one apple for so long.

The Hon. Member for Davenport is saying that Canadians should continue to be aware that we must maintain some of the great environment that was given to us. We are one of the few remaining countries in this hemisphere to have the opportunity to maintain this extraordinary environment. We are fortunate to be able to do so in order to be able to pass it on to future Canadians.

We must give that signal to Canadians today that we should preserve this magnificent jewel which is part of our richness and heritage. Let the Government have the courage to pass this resolution and send a signal to Canadians and the Government of British Columbia that we want South Moresby made into a national wilderness park.

Mr. Gérald Comeau (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I certainly regret that the Hon. Member opposite did not leave me much time to speak on this motion because I consider it extremely important.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the southern tip of Moresby Island is a very beautiful area having and great heritage value, by reason both of its national resources and its cultural treasures. Parks Canada indeed has identified the southern part of Moresby Island as a land and marine area of national importance.

Preserving that part of the Canadian heritage has become a prime concern of environmental groups since the early eighties. The southern part of Moresby Island also has drawn the attention of nature lovers and of the public in general, both in the United States and elsewhere in the world. The long-term protection of certain natural resources that are unique to that area would be considered a major achievement, both in Canada and on the international scene.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is a good thing for Canada that additional national parks be created; we still lack several of them. Our national parks are more important now than they were a hundred or even 50 years ago. With the constant sprawling of our urban areas our parks are acquiring greater importance.

Nothing can replace nature. We only will have in the future what we are preserving now. In our national parks, nature becomes the heritage we are passing on to future generations.

We are part of nature and our civilization has its roots in it. It has moulded man's culture and influenced most of mankind's economic, artistic and scientific achievements. To live in harmony with nature is our best hope of promoting the development of our economy and of our creativity, of enjoying relaxation and recreation.

Respect for nature may help us find solutions to the acid rain problems and make sure that our streams and rivers and also the air we breathe will cease to be poisoned. National Parks are essentially one aspect of the preservation of our environment. Those are privileged places protected by the National Parks Act for the benefit of present and future generations.

The Minister of Environment (Mrs. Blais-Grenier) will be guided by those principles and by the National Parks Act when dealing with Canada's national parks. Of course, she is also subject to certain constraints, such as available funding.

To put matters simply, this Government's expenditures must be controlled. There must therefore be some restrictions, which means that we must put our dollars where our priorities lie.

One of the priorities of the Minister of Environment is to maintain the magnificent national parks—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 45 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—NEGOTIATIONS WITH WESTERN PROVINCES. (B) PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Question Period I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) about the Government's position with respect to the petroleum and gas revenue tax and the present negotiations with the three western provinces. I pointed out to her, as something that she knows, as does everyone in Ottawa, that there are varying opinions with respect to the future of this petroleum and gas revenue tax in her own Government. She said:

> I can assure the Hon. Member that he could not have heard conflicting positions on energy policy from members of this Government, because there is only one energy policy of this Government and it is supported by all of us.

That is not the case. It has not been the case for some time and as time goes along it is becoming less and less the case.

First let me go to the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) who was not Prime Minister on July 8 when he spoke in Edmonton just three days before the election was called. He said:

> We're going to replace the front-end PGRT with a profit-based tax system.

Nothing could be clearer than that. That was the statement.

If you look at the Progressive Conservative election platform, during the election campaign Mr. Speaker, they called for the implementation of a tax system that recognizes bottom-line profits as the bottom line for assessing taxes in order to stimulate the investment needed to bring on new energy resources. That was the Progressive Conservative platform during the election campaign.

On October 26, 1984, when asked about the timetable and the replacement of the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said:

> Until world prices stabilize, we'd rather be slow than sorry especially on the big ticket items like exploration incentives and changes to the tax regime.

Already we are seeing a waiver of what was promised by the Prime Minister before the election campaign and what was stated in the Progressive Conservative election platform.

To go a little further, I would like to mention the statement during the election campaign of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. She said that the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax was "one of the most devastating fiscal highjacks that has ever happened to any region of the country, and the most hated word in the West". That was the bravado of the Progressive Conservative Party prior to and during the election campaign. That is not the case now, not at all.

We have talked about the situation. There is a great deal of difficulty now. The Minister of Energy for Alberta was in Ottawa recently. He did not even meet with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), yet he met in Toronto with the Minister of Energy for Ontario. The Minister of Energy for Ontario said "believe it or not, Lougheed is insisting that Ottawa make good their promises in the next budget, then maybe he'll talk about what he's prepared to give up". Then he spoke in terms of reduced royalties and lower natural gas prices. There is obviously a discrepancy here. I feel very strongly about this.

As a Liberal we heard criticism after criticism from the Progressive Conservative Party when it was in Opposition about the PGRT which the Liberal government had implemented. They could not say enough bad things about that tax.

● (1805)

Then the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the energy critic prior to the election, had the benefit of speaking to people in the energy sector and seeking their advice. Her statements during the election campaign and after are clear. The Prime Minister knew about the deficit. When he spoke in Newfoundland in August, he practically hit the deficit to the penny. Therefore, there can be no statement now from the Government that the deficit is the concern.

What we have is a Government misleading the energy sector in western Canada to secure its support and, even worse, misleading the people of western Canada to gain their support during an election campaign and to belittle and berate the Liberal Government over something that they may very well had been planning to follow even at that time, if they were privileged with the opportunity of serving as the Government. That is a treachery. Regardless of what one thinks of the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax, there was a misleading of the people of western Canada in this regard.

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised that the Hon. Member has chosen this particular forum in which to raise his concerns about details relating to the current energy negotiations with the western producers. He is always a little out of character when he gets so irate, at least he puts on a great show of being irate. We in the House all know that he is not like that at all.

In responding to questions yesterday in the House, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) very candidly stated that negotiations have reached a sensitive point in the bargaining process. I might as an aside remind the House that the Hon. Member delivered the same speech about a week before the Newfoundland agreement was signed, how terrible it was and how it was going off track. That came back to haunt him. I am sure this one will as well.

She emphasized that some hurdles could be anticipated at this time since we are involved in a highly complex regulated system which is being deregulated. Nevertheless, the Minister stated that she was confident that an agreement would be struck by the end of March. Again, today in this House she indicated that negotiations are going ahead, with meetings taking place yesterday and today.

I am surprised that the Hon. Member would say that the Alberta Minister of Energy is ignoring her. In fact, my Minister talked to all three Energy Ministers from the producing provinces today. She will announce an agreement when it is duly concluded. We on this side of the House share the Minister's confidence that a new and beneficial agreement is in the offing.

This Government has been committed to the expeditious resolution of outstanding energy issues. We moved quickly and effectively at arriving at the Atlantic Accord, which the Hon. Member remembers all too well, and we intend to reach an equally just and honourable agreement with the western provinces, which deserve it. This Government has attained a high level of success in negotiations to date because we are operating in a conciliatory environment, something that was markedly lacking during energy negotiations that were carried out in the early years of this decade.

As the Minister of Energy recently stated, the federal Government is working very diligently at putting our energy policy house in order.

Mr. Waddell: You're not in Opposition now.

Mr. McDermid: If the Hon. Member does not be quiet, I'll push the down button on his elevator shoes.

We intend to put the oil and gas industry on a predictable footing where market forces govern both producer and consumer. Most important, this must be done in a manner that will benefit all regions of this country. The Minister of Energy has stated on many occasions that she will not carry out negotiations in public, and we readily respect this stance. We are buoyed by the progress being made in these negotiations and are confident that we will have formalized a new energy pricing accord with western producers in the not too distant future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) I believe is next. Was there not an agreement?

Mr. Kaplan: I can speak now, if the Government is ready.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Was it not agreed by unanimous consent?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I understood that an agreement had been reached as I was replying on both of the Government's responses. The change of order had been agreed to at some time around five o'clock.

• (1810)

Mr. Cassidy: That is okay then.

TERRORISM—ROLE OF CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE. (B) SURVEILLANCE OF ANTI-TURKISH TERRORISTS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it clear before I begin that I had no difficulty with the original arrangement. However, I am happy to proceed now.

I would like to inform the House that many questions have been asked in the last few days about the responsibility of the federal Government in relation to the Turkish Embassy tragedy which occurred this week in Ottawa. Questions have been asked, but I would say that there is considerable dissatisfaction with the answers that have been given. The Government has not yet fully acquitted itself for its responsibilities in this matter.

There was an interesting reflection made on the attitude of the Solicitor General (Mr. MacKay) on this question the other day when he believed for a short period of time that a certain security report which I requested had in fact been delivered to me in the month of June, about two months before the change of Government. At that time he waxed very indignant that I had received the report and sat on it for two months without doing anything.

It appeared later during the day, as confirmed by Ministry officials, that I had not in fact received the report in June, that it had not been presented to the former Government at all, but that it had been presented as a new document to the new Government. The Minister was ready to criticize me for not having responded in two months when he thought I had had the report for two months. We learn now that he was the first politically accountable person to receive the report, and from September until now, more than six months, it had not yet been taken to Cabinet.

I commissioned that report because I believe that security at foreign missions needed to be upgraded, and I wanted the advice of the RCMP on how that security should be upgraded. Six months after the Government received that advice it still has not gone before Cabinet, and a terrible tragedy has occurred involving the death of a Canadian and serious injury to the Turkish ambassador. It has also embarrassed the Canadian Government considerably before the Turkish Government. I would like to elaborate on that for a moment.

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) said that Turkey was satisfied with some increase in security arrangements that were made a month ago. That was contradicted from Ankara. We learned that the Government of Turkey, through Ministers in the Turkish Assembly, had indicated that it was not satisfied with the amount of security that was provided by the Canadian Government for its mission here. The Ministers say that 10 days ago they warned the Canadian Government of the possibility of a terrorist attack on their embassy.

It is clear from the answers the Government has given that, whatever it did one month ago, it certainly did nothing 10 days ago when news of a possible terrorist attack on the Turkish Embassy was given to Canada. If we saw evidence of it in the arrangements that existed and were made public at the time of the terrorist attack, what the Government did one month ago was not much. It seems to me that in the range of security responses and precautions that could be taken, what should be taken in relation to an embassy with regular threat assessments is action of a much stronger nature than that which seems to have been taken in the case of the Turkish Embassy.

The question that has still not been answered by the Government, which claims that Turkey was happy with the arrangements made one month ago, even though that has been contradicted by Turkey, is whether or not the Mounties were happy with the arrangements that were made one month ago. Were those arrangements the ones that were recommended in their report?

I can see the Parliamentary Secretary preparing to rise to indicate that he does not have to tell us what security arrangements were made on the grounds of national security. I agree with that. I think there are 100 questions I could ask that I should not ask and for which answers should not be given. However, the question of whether or not the RCMP were satisfied with the security arrangements and whether or not they conformed with what was recommended for the Turkish Embassy, particularly at a time of a specific threat assessment which was brought to the attention of the Government by the Turks, ought to be answered, because I believe the Canadian people are entitled to an assurance that those security arrangements were made. If they are not, they should be entitled to the resignation of the Minister.

• (1815)

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, of course, this is a very serious subject. Any suspected terrorist activity is a threat to our security, and as such is within the mandate of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service to investigate. I might say that the Hon. Member took some poetic licence in that he did not hold his comments to the specific question which he asked the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) in the House. That question is to be found at page 2929 of Hansard.

The priority given to the investigation of any particular group by the Service would be consistent with and appropriate to the degree of the threat posed. The record of terrorist acts claimed by anti-Turkish groups in other parts of the world, as well as in Canada, is well known and is a clear indication of the level of threat these groups represent.

I would like to take this occasion to raise my strong concern with the nature of the Hon. Member's question, which I find, in light of his earlier responsibilities, to border on being irresponsible. As the previous Solicitor General, the Hon. Member knows full well that public discussion of security threats and the Government's response to those threats is not in Canada's interests or in the interests of those who may be the subject of such threats. In light of these well-understood and accepted principles, I would strongly urge the Hon. Member to consider very carefully pursuing any further questions of this nature in the House.

In light of the respect which the Solicitor General (Mr. MacKay) has for these principles, I am sure the former Solicitor General would agree that it would be irresponsible for the present Solicitor General to provide any further indication of the extent or nature of any ongoing investigations or surveillance which is being conducted by the Service. I would like to repeat what I have already said. The priority given to the investigation of any particular group by the Service would be consistent with and appropriate to the degree of the threat posed.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION (A) GOVERNMENT AID TO DOMTAR. (B) IMPORTANT ECONOMIC PROJECTS FOR QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate you for your intervention in French. We are dealing now with the subject matter of a question which I put on March 4 and to which the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) replied in the absence of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens). It is about the Domtar Corporation and the federal government's failure to intervene in the corporations' investment project for the Eastern Townships, a project of utmost importance for the economic development of this region and the province of Quebec as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, the Domtar issue has been raised many times in the House over the past two weeks, and I must tell the Parliamentary Secretary that the government's replies have been unsatisfactory, not only on March 4, but every single time we have heard about this matter.

On that date, I asked whether the government was looking into the possibility of becoming a shareholder in the Domtar Corporation, and whether this was one of the alternatives being considered. Moreover, I was seeking the assurance that it would not discriminate against that company on the ground that 45 p. 100 of the shares were held by agencies of the Quebec government. I never had any answer to the first question, and so far, the government has seemed unwilling to reply to this question: What options are being considered to salvage this important project which is necessary to the economic stability of the Eastern Townships?

Also, last Friday, the Prime Minister met with the Quebec premier. He had promised to discuss the Domtar project with Mr. Lévesque, but his pockets were empty, and he had nothing to offer. Mr. Lévesque has therefore had to admit that he has received nothing from the Federal Government for the Domtar project.

Indeed, we learned during the weekend that Domtar was now considering a major investment in Minnesota, which would mean a lot for the fine paper market in the United States and effectively prevent this project from going forward in the Eastern Townships, even though it would benefit the economy of Quebec and create jobs for Quebecers in that region.

However, what disturbs us is the contradiction between the official statements made by the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

Last November 8, Mr. Speaker, the Department announced the changes to be made to the Industrial and Regional Development Program. Among the changes introduced last November 8, apparently as part of the new governmental policy, the Department stated that, in the future, Crown corporations would not be entitled to any subsidies. This policy was confirmed in the estimates of the Minister which were published only two weeks ago. This is indeed departmental policy and it is quite clear that departmental officials understand this to mean that Crown corporations and their subsidiaries, such as Domtar, will no longer be able to receive subsidies or financial assistance from the Government. However, when we asked the Prime Minister about it, he said: "No, that is not my policy." In fact, on March 1, he said that this was the interpretation of the departmental officials not his own nor that of his colleagues. These interpretations are completely contradictory, Mr. Speaker.

Even more recently, on March 11, the Minister finally came back to the House, and in reply to the questions addressed to him, he said that these two statements, namely that of the Prime Minister to the effect that Domtar could receive subsidies, and the statement of his department that a company such as Domtar would not be eligible or entitled to subsidies, were quite consistent with each other, in spite of the obvious contradiction.

Second, Mr. Speaker, what disturbs me as the spokesman for my Party, is not simply the discrimination directed against a Crown corporation or its subsidiary, but also the discrimination against poor provinces and especially the Province of Quebec.

In Quebec, the industrial structure is quite different from the one in Ontario, for instance, because of the Caisse de dépôt et de placement du Québec, because of the intervention of the Société générale de financement, and because the public sector is involved in provincial industries in a way unparalleled in other provinces. This fact was ignored in the policy announced by the Minister on November 8.

Mr. Speaker, this is why we are not satisfied with the replies of the Government.

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the question put this evening by the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) is, I think, related to a question that has already been answered by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret). The Hon. Member also mentions questions that were not answered by the Minister or the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). In each case, considering the information available and the questions that have been put in the House, I would advise my hon. friend to review his notes, and I would also like to point out that during the adjournment debate on Tuesday evening, I answered a question put by the Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre).

In my answer I mentioned the situation at Domtar and the reasons behind the Government's decision. I would urge my hon. friend to look up all the answers that have been given on the subject and to refer to Hansard of March 12, 1985, where I answered a question of our Hon. Member for Shefford about Domtar.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is appropriate, since the House will not be sitting on that day, to indicate that St. Patrick's Day falls on Sunday. This day is very dear to everyone who is Irish or wishes they were on that day. St. Casimir's Day was of course on March 4 and I celebrated that quietly. I am getting ready for the days of St. Vladimir of Kiev and St. Stanislav of Cracow, patron saint of Poland. St. Stanislav has come up strong on the calendar of Saints under the present Pope, but I can assure you that St. Patrick will continue to be revered wherever there is a touch of the green or a bit of the blarney.

May I take this occasion to wish all Members and staff of the House and the media the top o' the morning. I mention the media because not only are they aware of the blarney, they bottle and sell it for a living. And so a tip of the hat in honour of the day and the Saint himself for all those of Irish background, whether they come from Riviere du Loup, Killarney or Byelorussia, which is a suburb of Tralee.

The "ayes" have it, and this Sunday the "ayes" will be Irish "ayes" and they will be smiling when those two Irishmen who are going to Quebec City shake hands in honour of the day and St. Patrick.

EMPLOYMENT

REQUEST THAT APPLICATION DEADLINE BE EXTENDED FOR CHALLENGE '85

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, on February 6, nearly two months later than the usual date, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) announced the Challenge '85 student summer job program. Three weeks later, the minister set first March 15, and then March 22, 1985, as the deadline for participating in this program, leaving interested individuals and organizations with only three weeks to submit projects or employment applications. Several groups within my riding have indicated to me that the March 22 deadline does not allow them enough time to submit a project under the new Challenge '85 program.

If the Hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration is really serious about her program, she should extend the deadline from March 22 to April 22, in order to allow interested organizations to submit projects which meet the new requirements of Challenge '85. Does the government really want the Challenge '85 program to succeed, or is it simply trying to blind Canadians to the fact that the Conservative elite just does not want to help our young people find jobs?

If you believe in your program, give it a chance.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN CANADA

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Parliament from Edmonton I am deeply concerned with the continuing decline in employment in my city, as well as in all of western Canada. The latest Statistics Canada information has revealed that Edmonton has the highest unemployment rate of any city in the West. That is a travesty for the people in my city.

The unemployment rate in Edmonton is 15 per cent—in construction it is 43 per cent, and in manufacturing it is 30 per cent. The high rates of unemployment, no matter how one looks at the matter, are a direct and unquestionable consequence of the odious National Energy Program which the Liberals perpetrated on western Canada.

Edmonton has one of the highest vacancy rates in Canada. It has empty office buildings and empty apartment buildings. People are leaving Edmonton in a fruitless attempt to find employment. In Edmonton East there are 8,000 fewer people today than there were five years ago.

I urge the Government, in the strongest possible terms, to take decisive action now. Western Canadians have confidence in government, but that confidence is not limitless. I came to this House because I felt the effects of the previous Government's disastrous energy policy. Let us now demonstrate that we have the courage and the foresight to take full economic measures to stimulate development, to reverse those staggering figures, and to get the people back to work.

INDUSTRY

ANNOUNCED CLOSURE OF JOHN INGLIS PLANT IN STONEY CREEK, ONT.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the John Inglis Company has announced that it will close its plant in Stoney Creek, Ontario. That will mean the loss of 600 jobs for people in the Hamilton area.

That same company received $3 million from the previous Government in order to effect to take-over of the bankrupt Admiral Corporation. At that time I requested that there be clear job guarantees attached to the granting of that particular sum of money. The Government did not put those provisions in place, and the end result has been exactly what we predicted, the Inglis Company used the money to fund the expansion of its operations in lower wage areas, and used the money to create unemployment in the Hamilton area for the people who have been building the products which Inglis has sold for many years.

I would ask this Government to take action now, to meet with the John Inglis Company, bring to its attention that this kind of conduct will not be accepted by the Government of Canada, and that if the company will not put back in place the jobs which it has proposed to take away, the Government will reclaim the money which that company was given.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPENDING VISIT BY UNITED STATES PRESIDENT—QUEBEC

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, thanks to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney), at the end of the week, on March 17 and 18, the Province of Quebec will be hosting an historic event.

Mr. Speaker, the summit meeting between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada is particularly significant for the people of Quebec. We would have to go back as far a 1944 in Quebec's history to find a meeting as prestigious as this one. The entire international press will be covering this event, and for a few days, Quebec will be the focal point of the world's attention. Mr. Speaker, this is a unique opportunity to acquaint millions of viewers with the warmth and cultural riches of the people of this province.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that this event must bother our hon. friends opposite, who over the years have slowly but surely succeeded in letting our relations deteriorate and destroying a friendship that is so essential to the harmonious economic development of our two countries.

Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are convinced it is both healthy and desirable that two great democracies that share the same continent, that two sovereign nations should entertain cordial and harmonious relations. I say three cheers for the Prime Minister!

EDUCATION

PROVINCIAL EXPENDITURES ON POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, Liberals on this side of the House agree that federal funds which are targeted for post-secondary education must be used for that specific purpose and not skimmed off for other purposes by provincial Governments. That was one of the major concerns which prompted the previous Liberal Government to commission the Johnson report on post-secondary education.

Since that report was commissioned, the situation has taken what could be called a more conservative twist. In the Province of Ontario, the Tory Treasurer made a grab into the pockets of the students and called for major increases in the cost of tuition. At the same time, while the Province of Ontario will get a 7.4 per cent increase in federal funds which earmarked for post-secondary education, it plans to pass on only five 5 per cent of that amount and steal 2.4 per cent from Ontario colleges and universities.

The Conservative federal Government has already shown a marked antipathy toward post-secondary education. It has cut back federal research grants for scientific, medical, and environmental research. It has cut back the student loans program which assisted students in paying their tuition. It has massacred the Centres of Excellence Program and removed it from existence. What we are seeing is the emergence of an elitism against those students who are financially less well-off than their richer counterparts.

Through its own cuts the Conservative Government has badly weakened the post-secondary education system at a time when it is acknowledged that education and training are the keys to jobs and economic development.

ENERGY

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS—CALL FOR MARKET BASED PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to lend my support to the negotiations which are ongoing between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) and the oil-producing provinces, which will achieve the deregulation of crude oil and natural gas. Allowing domestic wellhead prices to match world prices is in complete agreement with our Party's promise of deregulation.

• (1110)

In the present regime at world levels, the domestic price is static and unable to respond to market forces. This is the real problem. The administered pricing regime left to us by the previous Government is outdated, too complex, and discourages investment. The implementation of a market based oil and gas price system will provide benefits for my riding and for all of Canada. This will help in creating a positive environment which would allow us to strive to reach our unlimited economic potential.

Unemployment in all regions of the country has escalated to record highs, a problem with which all members of this House are concerned. In Sarnia we have witnessed a level of unemployment which is higher than any other time in history, a most distressing factor. I am encouraged by these negotiatons, and I feel they will aid, in the long-term, the unemployed of our country.

I encourage the expeditious initiation of deregulation of feedstocks for the petrochemical industry, and a change to all the other elements of the existing system which impose such severe limits—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

EDUCATION

INCREASED UNIVERSITY FEES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, last week the President of the University of British Columbia resigned in protest against the anti-education policy of the provincial Government. On April 1, UBC students face an average 10 per cent increase in tuition fees, on top of a 33 per cent increase last year.

The province no longer makes grants available to needy students but forces them to go deeper into debt while they face greater difficulty in getting employment.

Yesterday in its so-called recovery budget the "know nothings" in Victoria cut an additional 5 per cent from university budgets. The Johnson report on federal financing of post-secondary education shows that the provincial Government of British Columbia has reduced its share of post-secondary funding by 25.4 per cent since 1977-1978, making it the worst offender of all of the provinces.

Education can no longer be considered a leisurely option for a small elite who can afford the high fees. Post-secondary education is essential, not only for individuals but also for all of our provinces and our country if we are going to survive in tomorrow's economy. The Secretary of State (Mr. McLean) and the Government must protect the federal investment in post-secondary education in British Columbia. It is not enough to consult—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the Hon. Member that his time has expired.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VISIT BY UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize in the House today the importance for Canadians of this visit by the President of the United States, Mr. Reagan, to Quebec City this weekend.

The President's visit to Quebec City will show our neighbours to the South that since September 4, we now have a truly Canadian Government that includes all ten provinces and all cultures. The fact that the previous Government never succeeded in uniting all regions in this country has caused considerable harm to our economic development.

By treating all regions as part of one nation, the present Government is ensuring that our country will maintain its position on the international scene and promote investment in this country. We are hopeful that this visit will generate positive results for the future and prosperity of our country and all its citizens.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

RETENTION OF CBG GANDER STATION

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, today the CBC will be reversing one of its cuts. In a public statement this afternoon the CBC will state that CBG Gander will remain on the air.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that my CRTC intervention will now be withdrawn, and the legal position based on the constitutional arguments will be forgotten. These cases were being prepared by the deputy Mayor of Gander, Mr. Winston Baker, who happens to be my brother, by the way.

On the basis of this reversal, Mr. Speaker, I have a duty to thank the many petitioners, the many hundreds of persons who wrote letters, and to congratulate the Gander Town Council, the mayor, the d'Avignon Players, and the CBC management, present and past, who helped, especially Mr. Cliff Hierlihy. I would like to thank the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications, the Hon. Member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott), the Member of Parliament for Edmonton South (Mr. Edwards), and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie) and his staff—

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—ACCESS TO U.S. MARKETS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to welcome the Prime Minister home from Moscow—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —where he attended the state funeral on behalf of the Canadian people. Because of the two-hour meeting he is having with the U.S. President this weekend, I would just say by way of comment that we are grateful that the hostages in Kingston have been released and we hope we can have a report in due course from the Solicitor General on that particular issue.

The press was briefed yesterday, Mr. Speaker, by the Government on the agenda and purpose of the Canadian Government, led by the Prime Minister, in this weekend's two-hour meeting. However, Parliament has not been briefed. We have not seen an agenda. Therefore I ask the Prime Minister if he would indicate to the House what he is attempting to accomplish, particularly on the matter of trade. Will he be asking the President for guarantees on the admission of our steel into the U.S. market, as well as our forest products? Will he be reviewing the auto pact as it relates to the ending of American quotas on Japanese car imports? Will he be dealing with these matters at the Quebec city meeting, and what type of arrangement does he hope to achieve with the President on the very vital issue of trade?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I thank my right hon. friend for his words of welcome, which I appreciate.

During the 10 or 11 hours I will be spending with President Reagan I will be discussing, both in formal meetings and in têtes-à-têtes, the points we have on the agenda. Regarding trade, because our discussions and negotiations are still ongoing and hopefully will conclude in Quebec city, we hope to secure a declaration, or arrangement, which would ensure more secure access of Canadian goods, including steel and other products to which the Right Hon. Member referred, as well as the elimination of irritants between us. These include the undertaking to be more forceful in regard to protectionism which has been rising in the American Congress, and to lay the groundwork for a more productive and helpful trade arrangement between Canada and our largest trading partner in the world, namely, the United States of America.

As my right hon. friend knows, there are in excess of three million jobs which depend very heavily on the maintenance and enhancement of an excellent trade relationship with the U.S.A. This is our greatest friend, our best trading partner in the world, and we plan to take steps to improve both the climate and the trading reality.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

This is the reason why I asked the question, because the Prime Minister appeared to be ready to capitulate on the acid rain question. Is he willing to admit that his meeting with the President of the United States will have been a failure if he does not come out with an agreement that will put a stop to acid rain? Are we going go get a deluge of nice words, or will Canada insist on an agreement providing for joint legislation, or on a treaty to clean our mutual air, something solid and concrete for us Canadians?

● (1120)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): As far as acid rain is concerned, we inherited from the Liberal Government a situation on which there has been absolutely nothing done by that Government. Absolutely nothing, strictly zero. That is what we started with. Since we came into office, we have been working on that, and I think many members of this House have had an opportunity to favourably comment on the initiative taken by the Minister of Environment on a national program—

[English]

Mr. Caccia: You are continuing the Liberal work.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: Oh, the Hon. Minister who could do absolutely nothing! Recently, one could read in the newspaper Le Droit that the problem with the Liberal Government was that the former Minister had no influence whatsoever with his colleagues in Cabinet. This is why nothing could be done. Under the circumstances, any progress would be a major accomplishment. But we are going to try and set in motion a process which will force Americans and Canadians to clean out our common environment. That is the responsibility of any Government. We accept the responsibility of taking action here at home, and we will try to better convince the Americans to act both in their national interests and international interests of our two countries.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, we shall be waiting for the results, even though the Prime Minister is trying to rewrite the true history of this situation.

[English]

STRATEGIC DEFENCE INITIATIVE—PRIME MINISTER'S MEETING WITH U.S.S.R. LEADER

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is reported to have agreed to convey Mr. Gorbachev's concerns about the Strategic Defence Initiative proposed by the United States, to President Reagan this weekend. Did he indicate to the Secretary General in Moscow that the Canadian Government had taken a position endorsing and supporting this Strategic Defence Initiative? If so, did the Secretary General feel that the Prime Minister could act as a broker in this particularly delicate situation? Will the Prime Minister tell the President of the United States that he disagreed with the Soviet Union's position, which is to place that item on the agenda for discussion by the two superpowers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can tell my right hon. friend, with regard to the position that the Government of Canada has adopted on the research component of SDI, in bilateral discussions with all of our NATO allies the position of Canada was widely applauded and supported by all of those who believe in freedom and democracy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: There was a general view among our allies that to do otherwise would be to diminish the capacity of the West to engage in the kinds of substantial negotiations that we hope will be beneficial to all involved.

I had an excellent meeting with Secretary General Gorbachev. I conveyed to him the genuine desire of Canadians everywhere, and of all political Parties, to contribute positively to the search for a durable peace. I underlined the concerns that I have heard expressed in the House of Commons by many Members in all political Parties. There can be no doubt as to the national will of the Government of Canada to play a constructive and positive role in this area. He was very grateful, I think, not only for our interest but our commitment to the process. I was very glad of the opportunity to have contributed, however modestly, to that process.

CANADIAN EXPORTS—U.S. SURTAX PRESSURE

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister knows, the United States is anticipating a massive trade deficit in the current year. Conservative estimates put it at about $123 billion or $125 billion. There are indications that there will be growing pressure for a surtax on imports, for example. That is the rumour this week. As the Prime Minister knows, that would have disastrous consequences for the Canadian economy. He will recall that when that was done in 1971 we lost something like 40,000 jobs overnight. This would be much more serious.

I hope that the Prime Minister will seize this opportunity at the summit conference with the President to discuss this specific issue, warning him of the dangers that it poses for the economy. I hope he will seriously address the kinds of subjects raised by the Leader of the Opposition and that it will not be like the First Ministers' Conference, to which I was an unhappy witness, which was simply an extended photo opportunity. Can he give us that assurance?

• (1125)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I know that my hon. friend from Westmount—unless he has moved to Saint-Henri in my absence—was unhappy with the First Ministers' Conference. He is usually unhappy when he is sitting in the audience.

The First Ministers' Conference seemed to please both the Canadian people and the Canadian Premiers. Of course that would be a matter of great concern and dissatisfaction to the Liberals.

I can assume my hon. friend that we are fully aware of the importance of the trade issue, which is why we have been working very hard to enhance our relationships and to place Canada in a position where we would not be subject to the sort of initiatives to which my hon. friend refers. We are looking for an opportunity to make sure that our bilateral trade relations are enhanced and not in any way affected adversely.

THE ECONOMY

NATIONAL CONFERENCE AGENDA

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Just as an aside—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Johnston: —the Prime Minister is a former resident of Saint-Henri-Westmount. When he returns to that riding, which I hope will not be in the too distant future, I will be happy to explain the geography of the riding to him. On his return as a private citizen, that is.

[Translation]

Therefore, I would have a second question, this time for the Minister of Finance.

Next week, Mr. Speaker, we will have a show here: the National Conference on the Economy. Some 136 persons have been invited to attend. According to the agenda I have seen, several questions will be dealing with our relations with the United States. I would like to know whether the Government will already have taken a position. Five days before the Quebec Summit, will the Government delete those questions from the agenda, or are we right in assuming that this meeting here in Ottawa next week will really be some "showbiz".

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition will provide a seat for him, and that the Hon. Member will come to the conference to see for himself the views of a wide range of Canadians. It will probably be the most expansive discussion of economic matters that this country has seen in its history. It will contribute tremendously to the understanding of the various economic issues, and their complexity and interrelationship, as well as contribute a lot to the policy-making that the Government is faced with in the coming weeks.

The specific answer to the Hon. Member's question is no, there will not be decisions taken in the meetings at Quebec city that would foreclose on the wide range of matters that will be under discussion. We will be looking very closely at the results of this conference in the budget preparation, as well as other matters of policy-making. We have high expectations for this meeting, and I hope that I will see the Hon. Member there.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by adding my welcome to the Prime Minister on his return from his important trip.

Recently in the House the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the former Minister of Defence said that before there would be the locating of any U.S. nuclear weapons in Canada, the prior consent of the Government of Canada would have to be obtained. Is this still government policy?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is still government policy. It will continue to be government policy.

Mr. Broadbent: Since the following questions pertain directly to the summit meeting involving the Prime Minister and the President of the United States, I hope that the Prime Minister will answer.

• (1130)

DEPLOYMENT OF UNITED STATES AIRCRAFT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, it is stated in the regulations of the Strategic Air Command of the United States that there will be automatic deployment of aircraft carrying nuclear weapons to Canada under certain circumstances, without consultation. Once again, Mr. Speaker, we have a contradiction in terms of what the United States is saying on important matters and what is being said by the Government of Canada. My question is for the Prime Minister. Considering we now have contradictory statements on the linkage between star wars and the modernization of the DEW line on the one hand, and a contradiction on the deployment or locating of aircraft bearing nuclear weapons in Canada between what we are saying and what the U.S. is saying, does the Prime Minster not realize that the people of Canada have a right to see, in clear-cut writing, what we are committed to, before he signs any agreement with President Reagan?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is being unfair. I suspect that he probably knows there is an element of unfairness in his suggestion.

The question of an alleged linkage has been dealt with very categorically. I think it is generally acknowledged by reasonable observers that there is none. I know that some people have a political interest in trying to draw one, but there is no such linkage. By and large I think any objective observer knows that.

With regard to the question of sovereignty that my hon. friend talks about, there is some proof in that. We have inherited a position where our predecessors, over the years, signed international agreements without the necessary provisions for Canadian sovereignty. We are trying to correct that in a very substantial way to make sure that the independence and the integrity of the national sovereignty of Canada will be protected at all times and in all circumstances.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): The Prime Minister has just given it away, Mr. Speaker. He has acknowledged that, in terms of an agreement entered into by a previous Liberal Government, the United States will have a right to locate nuclear weapons in Canada without agreement by the Government of Canada. That is part of our concern.

Is the Prime Minister willing to continue to buy a pig in a poke? The U.S. Secretary of Defense, a major advisor on strategic policy to the United States Government, and a State Department official briefing Canadians, say there is a linkage between star wars and modernization of the DEW line, whatever the Canadian Government has to say. Instead of being sort of kid brother to the United States, why does the Prime Minister not establish a policy of being a good neighbour? Why does the Prime Minister not get all of this in writing so the people of Canada know what the Government of Canada is committing itself to?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend has clearly established the validity of my assertion with regard to the argument of unfairness. He promptly stood up two seconds after me and distorted something that I had just said. That is the problem with the NDP. If the Hon. Member's Party wants to join NATO they had better get their act straight.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: Read Sam Slick.

Mr. Mulroney: The next time the NDP forms a Government in Canada and it is called upon as a member of NATO, its friends will want to know where the NDP stands. Stand up and be counted.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: We are not Reagan's poodle.

Mr. Mulroney: In point of fact we have no lessons to learn from the NDP in terms of protecting the integrity and sovereignty of this nation. It was a Conservative Government, and a Conservative Party headed by the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, that took on the Liberals on the question of nuclear arms in Canada—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): He brought it in.

Mr. Mulroney: —and it was the Liberals, not us, who went against the interests of Canadian sovereignty. The Conservatives will always defend the sovereignty of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: It was wonderful rhetoric, but what does it mean?

NORTH AMERICAN AIR DEFENCE

NORTH WARNING SYSTEM—PRIME MINISTER'S DISCUSSION WITH SOVIET LEADER

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address questions to the Prime Minister, who seems to be having a wonderful time this morning rewriting history. As he well knows, it was Prime Minister Diefenbaker who signed the agreement to put nuclear weapons on Canadian soil. That is history, not his version of it.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Where is Otto Lang?

Mr. Axworthy: What we want to raise with the Prime Minister goes back to the discussions he had with the General Secretary of the Soviet Union.

In those discussions did the Prime Minister communicate that his Government has now agreed to accept the new American version of North American defence that incorporates not only the star wars program but also a major new ground based defence system that is designed to set up a screen rather than relying upon deterrence? We have not been able to get any answers from the Prime Minister's Ministers in his absence that this is now the new government policy. What we need to know, Mr. Speaker, before that agreement is signed in Quebec city, is whether this is now the policy of the new Conservative Government of Canada? Is the Government now agreeing fully to the new defence strategy enunciated by President Reagan and by Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger that there will be a brand new strategy of defence that will involve a major introduction and involvement of military developments in the northern part of Canada?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Somebody elect Tom.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am impressed with the temerity, there is no better word, of the Hon. Member. The Hon. Member's Party signed an international agreement with the United States wherein Canadian Cabinet Ministers had to seek American permission to go to the Canadian North. That is the way the Liberals abdicated their responsibilities. I can tell the Hon. Member that that will never happen with a Conservative Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Member: It was Pearson who did that.

Mr. Mulroney: I want to say to the new critic for external relations for the Liberal Party—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Tom's brother.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: I wish I had said that.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What about Otto's friend?

Mr. Mulroney: Otto's friend.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs, with great clarity and strength, has set out the position of the Canadian Government on that. I know that my hon. friend is not satisfied. He would like it to be otherwise. He would like the issue to be befuddled so that he can try to score a few political points, but Canadians are not having any of it.

The position set out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is the Canadian position, the hallmark of which is clarity and the preservation of Canadian independence and integrity.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, the problem with the Prime Minister is he judges other people's motives by looking in the mirror. Not everything is motivated by pure partisan political objectives.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNITED STATES STRATEGIC DEFENCE INITIATIVE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that there are millions of Canadians who are deeply disturbed by the actions of this Government in endorsing the star wars proposal. This Opposition is speaking for those Canadians. We want to know whether at Quebec city the Prime Minister will have the fortitude and the willingness to speak for those Canadians as well, and ask President Reagan to put star wars on the bargaining table at Geneva, so we will not engage and support an action that will destabilize the arms race? Will this Prime Minister start standing up for this country instead of acting like the Governor of the 51st State?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition had better put the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry back in charge of some part of the rail thing. He is out of his league in External Affairs.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: It will come as a great surprise to Mr. Gorbachev who very much told me those topics were on the agenda in Geneva and the Soviet Union proposed to discuss them emphatically.

Mr. Axworthy: Who will the U.S. discuss them with? That is the question.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend is impugning as he always does, the motives of the United States in every circumstance, and he is saying that the United States is untrustworthy in everything it does.

Mr. Axworthy: What are you going to do?

Mr. Mulroney: We reject that very strongly.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: The Hon. Member is saying that President Reagan is less committed to peace than the other side. We reject that.

Mr. Axworthy: Take a cap in your hand and put it on your head.

Mr. Mulroney: The United States is trying with the help of its allies to secure a durable peace. We believe it is a complicated issue, and we are going to try to be helpful to both sides in securing that kind of a peace in the world.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

U.S. AIRCRAFT IN CANADA

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. I hope I am not misquoting him; I am certainly trying not to. However, I understood him to have said that his Government inherited certain agreements which did not contain proper safeguards to guarantee that Canada's Government could deny access to Canadian soil to the U.S. Strategic Air Command. Is he saying to the House of Commons that the regulation which is in place in the U.S. that allows the U.S. Strategic Air Command to locate aircraft carrying nuclear weapons in Cold Lake, has been done away with, is no longer in place, and Canada is now in a position where that particular regulation is no longer in force?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position is abundantly clear. I have stated it before today and I state it again. There can be no stationing of nuclear weapons in any circumstances on Canadian soil without the agreement of the Government of Canada. In so far as this Government is concerned, if we believe that such a proposed stationing would not be in the Canadian interest, we would refuse such a stationing.

U.S. ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, does the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister recognize that there is a different opinion in the United States administration in regard to the regulation which they believe permits them, in emergency situations, to locate aircraft carrying nuclear weapons at Cold Lake, and makes no reference to Canada's right or otherwise to agree or disagree with the locating of those aircraft and those nuclear weapons?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Hon. Member—and I say this with all the kindness I can muster—would do better to rely on authorities other than articles which he might read on the op-ed page of The Globe and Mail as the basis of his questioning here.

Let me be categoric about it. In so far as Cold Lake and other questions are concerned, before any nuclear weapons could be considered for stationing in Canada in the event of the kind of crisis that all of us devoutly hope would not occur, this Government, and any subsequent Canadian Government, by agreements now in place, have the right to refuse that stationing. This Government would exercise that right, if we believed that to be in the interests of Canada.

TRADE

ACCESS OF CANADIAN PRODUCTS TO JAPAN

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. We welcome him back to Canada. He was able to have extensive bilateral discussions with other world leaders. Perhaps economics is a more important matter to Canada because our people want jobs. In his discussion with Prime Minister Nakasone, was he able to discuss further access by Canada of its agricultural products to the Japanese market, and the question of import controls on automobiles produced by Japan and imported into Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I had an excellent meeting with Prime Minister Nakasone at which those topics were raised, particularly the latter one to which the Hon. Member referred and which is of great interest to Canada, particularly southwestern Ontario. We had further discussions in regard to the agenda of the meeting at Bonn which we will both be attending. I took the liberty, given the importance of the Japanese-Canadian relationship, particularly the Pacific Rim and the involvement of western Canada, to extend an invitation to the Prime Minister to visit us in Canada this year at his earliest convenience.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON ACID RAIN

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Is he aware of the severe criticism which is being offered by major environmental groups, on both sides of the border, about the reported agreement that is to be signed by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister this weekend? In fact it has even been suggested that Canada is being sucked in, if we go along with this agreement. Could the Prime Minister assure the House and the Canadian people that we will not just sit back and accept some kind of agreement to enter into further discussions on acid rain, but that he will press the President of the United States for real action on this very critical subject?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of the Environment introduced a program in Canada, the first comprehensive program of substance, to deal with the question of acid rain, I noted that there were many favourable comments from the other side of the House, coming from the NDP, in regard to what she had accomplished and the manner in which the provinces and the private sector were brought into the process. I think it was generally agreed. For example, the Chairman of the Coalition Against Acid Rain in Canada, the leading environmental group, said that it was a very noteworthy accomplishment, a very great first step by Canada which had never been taken before. It is in this spirit that we deal with what I referred to as the savagery of acid rain to our environment.

We are trying to clean up our own act. We are trying to assume our responsibilities. We are trying to persuade, as well, our neighbours that it is a common problem. It must be dealt with internationally. I do not expect, in an imperfect world, miracles overnight, but I hope we will be able to achieve solid progress of which my hon. friend, and I, and others, will be proud.

PRIME MINISTER'S MEETING WITH UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. I think everyone is aware that the previous agreement struck between Canada and the United States on acid rain simply did not work because Americans did not have the willingness and political will to make it work. Again, will the Prime Minister assure the House that he will press the President of the United States to enter into an agreement which goes much farther than just simply saying "we'd like to discuss it"? It has been discussed to death; what we need now is action.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend that indeed we have inherited a particularly sad situation of non-accomplishment by our predecessors in the area of acid rain. I don't think even an objective Liberal would try to suggest that the previous Minister accomplished anything except getting himself squeezed in the back, by the Cabinet door. There was nothing accomplished at all, and we had to start from zilch. It is a complicated, difficult file, which has been marred by bad faith and hostility in the past. We have tried to create an atmosphere within which we can move it ahead in a substantial way. This is what I am hoping to accomplish. This is what I think Canadians would view as a significant improvement, not a miracle, which will lead to the kinds of definitive steps that will rid Canada and the United States of this tremendous problem for our environment.

TRADE

EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES SUGAR-CONTAINING FOODS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Since my question deals with something that he did not inherit from the Liberal Party, but that was brought up in a presidential proclamation dated January 29, 1985 which is at this moment limiting the export to the United States of food products containing sugar, and since at this moment entry into the United States of Canadian food products containing sugar is blocked by a unilateral proclamation made by the President of the United States on January 29, 1985, after he came to power, does the Prime Minister intend to raise that question with President Reagan to prevent the closing down of plants and the loss of thousands of jobs as a result of that unilateral decision?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are actually going to try and deal with important questions such as this one by hopefully issuing a joint declaration of principle indicating that we mutually favour freer, more acceptable access to our own common markets because, as I mentioned earlier in answer to my friend the Leader of the Opposition, there are millions of jobs that directly depend on our being able to maintain productive relations with the Americans. It is in that direction, with that goal in mind that I will be undertaking those negotiations over the weekend.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, workers in the food industry will have no use for any Prime Minister's declaration of principles. I am asking for something more than vague statements. I am asking him whether, between two sittings in front of the cameras, he will have time to solve the problem of sugar-containing foods that are turned back at the American border.

Mr. Mulroney: How mean can you be; yes, how mean! Liberal frustration permeates even your legitimate questions. I admit you have a legitimate question, but why all those disparaging comments against our historical allies? We in the Progressive Conservative Government are on the side of the 75 per cent of Quebecers who today said in a poll that they favour productive relations with the United States. And this we are going to achieve, not by voicing disparaging comments against our allies. We are here to build strong relations with our allies, especially the Americans.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST SALMON TREATY—YUKON RIVER

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Conservative Government, in its undignified haste to push through the West Coast Canada-U.S. salmon interception treaty appears to have thrown away the fishery on the Canadian part of the Yukon River, thus posing a serious threat to commercial and tourist operations in that area. Would the Prime Minister admit two things to the House: first, that his office asked the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to quash a public consultation process so that he could get the treaty before the United States Senate; second, that a wide number of groups from the Yukon which will be affected by this inadvertent decision are attempting to have the Government recover its position on the Yukon fishery which was lost by the haste with which it was pushed through Cabinet?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is that that is absolutely false and really quite unbecoming to the Hon. Member. With regard to the second part of the question, we have heard representations from various groups, and the general view, and certainly my view, is that notwithstanding a 15 or 20-year period in which our predecessors were unable to conclude an arrangement, we signed one which, while not perfect, is in the interests of Canadians and Americans alike. The commonality of the problem has been acknowledged, and we believe that it is a reasonably fair and helpful way to proceed in the interests of both nations.

CONTENT OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister has indicated to some of those groups from the Yukon that the Government might be able to salvage this fishery in the memorandum of agreement to be signed at Quebec city. Again, would the Prime Minister do two things? First, would he admit that the treaty is in fact in place and his only function in Quebec city will be to sign it? Second, would he indicate to the House whether or not he has had discussions with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans about the timing of the signing and approval of the agreement by Cabinet so that it could be placed before the U.S. Senate? Has the Prime Minister had discussions with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans about the political consequences of the timing involved in getting it before the U.S. Senate?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, we have had no discussions. I acknowledge readily that we enlisted the support of a truly accomplished and great Canadian, the Hon. Mitchell Sharp, as our negotiator, and he did a superb job, as he always does.

We have tried to act in the interests of the British Columbia fishery. We have tried to be helpful to the British Columbia fishermen. I acknowledge, for example, that there are problems with Clause 8. I am aware of that. They are all perfectible. However, what we are trying to do is always difficult to do when negotiating an international treaty. We never get everything we want. There is a give and a take in every legitimate negotiation. What we believe we have concluded and are ready to recommend to Canadians is a treaty that is designed to enhance the long-term economic prospects of British Columbia and the West Coast fishermen. We believe it is in the national interest, but most important, in British Columbia's interest.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

U.S.-U.S.S.R. RELATIONS

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that he is known as being committed to peace, that he has a special relationship with the President of the United States, and that he had a discussion with Mr. Gorbachev during his recent trip to the Soviet Union, could he indicate to the House whether or not he feels that Canada, as a neighbour, should play a role as mediator between those two countries?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not see that kind of a role for Canada. I think our bona fides and traditions as a peaceful nation committed to securing a just and durable peace are well known and appreciated. Mr. Gorbachev himself has a special relationship with Canada inasmuch as it was the first western country he visited. He certainly holds fond memories of it. He was impressed by his meeting here in Parliament with Members of the House. He spoke very highly of that meeting. He also indicated that he views us as a neighbour of the Soviet Union, and the importance of that.

I made the case as forcefully as would any Member of the House, given a similar opportunity, for our non-partisan desire to be helpful in every conceivable way, and to go the extra mile to secure a just and durable peace which involves the reduction and, hopefully, the elimination of arms.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—CANADA-UNITED STATES DISCUSSIONS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister and deals with the meetings he will attend over the weekend with President Reagan. My question is based on the fact that the Prime Minister is going to Quebec city in a very strong position which was made possible by decisions initiated by several Governments preceding his Government, including the initiative taken by the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who, in 1979, signed a memorandum of intent on trans-boundary pollution with the United States. I would like to remind him that he is benefiting from initiatives that have been taken over a number of years. Therefore, he can go to Quebec city in a very strong position. Would the Prime Minister be willing to accept a U.S. position that would call only for research on acid rain without immediate action to reduce emissions?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that was the position put forward by the American Government in response to my hon. friend when he was Minister of the Environment. That is why there was no progress of any kind made during his tenure as Minister of the Environment. We are trying, and I think we will succeed in doing much better than that.

NIAGARA RIVER POLLUTION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear that reply and I look forward to that conclusion. I would ask the Prime Minister whether or not he can assure the House that he will have on the agenda for the meeting the matter of toxic chemicals in the Niagara River, a matter that we in the House have been pressing for quite some time.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that the kinds of historic initiatives set out by the Minister of the Environment in a matter of six months, designed to introduce, and have approved, a quite splendid program, indicate our deep commitment, as members of the Government, to the environment. We will be taking all steps to deal with problem areas in our environment, including the one to which my hon. friend refers.

I say with no reluctance that I am not used to miracles, and I do not expect any miracles to occur overnight. What I am working for and toward is substantial progress upon which we can build to clean up our environment.

EDUCATION

PROVINCIAL EXPENDITURES ON POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. The Johnson report has again dramatized the fact that post-secondary education expenditures have decreased as a percentage of Gross National Product over the last eight years, primarily because the provinces have not paid their shares. To the Government's credit, it has increased EPF transfers by 7.4 per cent. However, the pattern continues. Ontario has only increased PSE expenditures by 5 per cent, and British Columbia appears to have decreased university and college funding by 5 per cent. Is the Government prepared to act at last to ensure that EPF transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education are in fact used for that purpose?

Hon. Walter McLean (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for raising an issue that is important not only to universities but to Canada as a whole and to our entire program of economic and social renewal, the full participation of Canada's universities.

I want to assure the Hon. Member that the purpose of releasing the report was to engage all sectors of the Canadian public in the discussion about the future. The Minister of Finance has indicated that the present arrangements would continue for another year, and we are looking at the possibility of a mutually-agreeable arrangement with the provinces for the following financial year.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAPIERRE—USE OF THE WORD "MESQUIN" IN THE HOUSE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege prompted by the remarks of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) during oral questions period. He used the word "mesquin" in connection with a very legitimate question which I asked him and which is of great concern to me, namely the future of sugar industry workers. The Prime Minister, who is supposed to have deep respect for the House and who fancies himself as a civilized man and has nothing but praise for this institution, used a word which Your Honour will find on page 105 of Beauchesne's French edition, where the word "mesquin" is given as the equivalent of "cheap", definitely unparliamentary.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps you might ask the Prime Minister to choose his words more carefully when addressing the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member is actually rising on a point of order, but I accept his purpose. I heard the word and I took it that it was in reference to the comments which were being made by the Hon. Member, and not his character. At the time I did not find that the word was being used in an unparliamentary manner, although I am sure that Hon. Members on my left understood how Hon. Members on my right might have taken it. However, in terms of making a ruling, I do not find it unparliamentary.

As the Hon. Member knows, my dilemma, in terms of checking the "blues", is that once the matter has been drawn to my attention I really have little choice but to deal with it on the spot.

Mr. Lapierre: Can I reserve my privilege?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member could reserve his right if it was a question of privilege. However, it is in fact a point of order in the House as to whether language is parliamentary or unparliamentary. The Hon. Member may have a separate question of privilege if he chooses to consult the authorities, if it does not relate to the language itself.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 30

Mr. Speaker: I have received notice of an application under Standing Order 30 from the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent).

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY—POSSIBLE USE OF CANADIAN TERRITORY AS STAGING AREA

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), to move the adjournment of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 30 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the threat to Canadian sovereignty posed by United States Strategic Air Command instructions to use Canadian territory as a staging area during international conflict and the clear possibility of a link between the announced North Warning Radar System and the destabilizing Space—Defence Initiative.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Oshawa gave me the required notice of his intention to request this emergency debate.

The application is similar to those with which I dealt yesterday, although in his presentation to me he indicated one new element. The Hon. Member referred in his application to what he believes is an automatic provision in the treaty which would entail the repositioning of aircraft carrying nuclear weapons from the United States to Cold Lake, Alberta.

As the Member knows, during question period that matter was raised and there would appear to be a dispute over the facts.

While this element could conceivably form the basis of an argument justifying urgency of debate, the issue itself would not seem to be of the kind envisaged by Standing Order 30. I repeat what I said yesterday, that the concluding of an agreement is a policy decision, and policy decisions are matters for normal debate. Whatever the provisions of the agreement may be, the concluding of such an agreement is the prerogative of the Government.

Two allotted days remain during the current supply period, so there will be an opportunity to debate the issue, although admittedly not before the signing of the treaty.

I hope the Hon. Member will understand that the Chair is bound by the practice and precedents which govern applications made under Standing Order 30. Therefore, I am unable to accept this application.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

MARITIME COMMAND

Question No. 166—Mr. Stackhouse:

1. In (a) 1980 (b) 1981 (c) 1982 (d) 1983, what were the defence expenditures devoted to Maritime Command?

2. What are the present defence capabilities of Maritime Command?

3. What are Canada's stated NATO commitments in relation to Maritime Command?

Mr. Robert Wenman (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Defence expenditures devoted to Maritime Forces for the fiscal years 1980-81 through 1983-84 are as follows:

1980-81—$1,221,495,000

1981-82—$1,144,034,000

1982-83—$1,010,260,000

1983-84—$1,259,081,000

2. Canada maintains maritime forces capable of roles in the defence of Canada, defence of North America, NATO collective defence, and international peacekeeping. These forces comprise the following major units: 23 destroyers, three submarines, three underway replenishment ships, one diving support ship, three maritime patrol aircraft squadrons, two anti-submarine helicopter squadrons and one medium range air reconnaissance squadron.

3. Canada has indicated that all of the above maritime forces would be available in times of hostilities for NATO operations.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: I am ready to deal with the matter that was raised yesterday, however the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has served notice that he would like to make a comment.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, if we refer to the "Projected Order of Business" for today, I believe the Chair was ready to make a ruling on the time remaining for 20-minute speeches, in connection with the comment made yesterday by the Government House Leader about the ringing of the bells. Mr Speaker, many Members on this side of the House are wondering what constitutes debate. Yesterday, the Chair made a ruling on the 10-minute period allowed after a Member's speech. I recall clearly that Your Honour said the questions and comments allowed following debate are not debate as such but rather a period outside debate.

Hon. Members are all aware that we have eight hours of debate, which includes the 20-minute speeches. These eight hours, however, also cover the 10-minute comments or questions following a Member's speech. There may also be points of order or questions of privilege. All of these are included in the eight hours. We are now nearing the end of the traditional eight hours of debate on Bill C-24. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Chair exactly what debate is. I submit that debate is a Member's speech plus the questions and comments relating to that speech. That is debate, and if I am right, yesterday, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) was rising during the normal period of debate and therefore had a right to move the motion of adjournment as he did. Mr. Speaker, I should therefore be grateful if you would explain to me and the other Liberal Members of this House what debate means. How are we to define debate, and is, according to yesterday's ruling, the 10-minute question and answer period not to be considered debate? What exactly are those ten minutes? And does the Chair intend to continue to count the 20-minute speeches, the 10-minute periods plus all points of order and questions of privilege as part of the eight hours?

Mr. Speaker, if that is the case, we shall have to bear that in mind. However I submit, with respect, that if we are supposed to have eight hours of debate, we should subtract the ten minutes of questions and comments and questions of privilege and points of order. Mr. Speaker, I also submit that it must be clearly understood what the Standing Orders mean in relation to a matter that is very important to us all.

● (1210)

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for his intervention. I expected an argument which would begin the way the Hon. Member began his argument, given what I had to say yesterday.

Yesterday, the Hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Hnatyshyn) raised a point of order as to whether or not the time taken by the ringing of the bells prior to voting on the motion to adjourn the House should be counted as part of the eight hours of debate on Bill C-24 during which 20-minute speeches are followed by 10-minute question and answer periods. The Hon. Minister quoted a precedent whereby it was ruled that the time taken by the ringing of the bells was counted as part of the two hours of debate allowed on a motion moved under former Standing Order 75(c), now Standing Order 82. The last sentence of Standing Order 82 reads:

> Not more than two hours after the commencement of proceedings thereon, the Speaker shall put every question necessary to dispose of the said motion.

That wording seems to me to be quite clear. No similar wording, however, is to be found in Standing Order 35(2) which deals with the length of speeches during the second reading of a Bill.

We have a precedent dating from May, 1983, which indicates that the time taken by bell ringing was not counted in the eight-hour period of debate. On May 17, 1983, 84 minutes of the eight-hour period were left on the debate on Bill C-151, the Borrowing Authority Bill. After five minutes of debate, the motion that the House do now adjourn was moved and the bells rang for six hours and forty-eight minutes. The adjournment motion lapsed at the ordinary hour of adjournment and the next time the Bill was debated, on May 26, the Bill was debated for a further 79 minutes during which 20-minute speeches followed by 10-minute question and answer periods were allowed.

I think that the validity of this precedent can also be borne out by reference to the authorities. At page 385 of Erksine May's twentieth edition, it is clearly indicated that a motion for the adjournment of the House, or of the debate, is a distinct question which interrupts and supersedes the question already under consideration.

In Abraham and Hawtrey's Parliamentary Dictionary, under the heading "Dilatory Motion", it is stated:

> A dilatory motion is a superseding motion because if it is accepted by the Speaker he proposes the motion as a new question which supersedes the original question and must be disposed of before the debate on the original question can be resumed.

The authorities cited, of course, were not dealing with a procedure which allows for the unlimited ringing of the bells. However, in the light of these citations and our own precedents, I believe it is logical to conclude that the time taken by the ringing of the bells prior to voting on an adjournment motion should not be counted in the time allocated to the debate on second reading of the Bill under Standing Order 35(2).

Therefore, there remains one hour and three minutes of debate on Bill C-24 during which 20-minute speeches may be followed by 10-minute question and answer periods.

I do suggest, however, that the question of the bells is a problem which needs to be addressed, and one hopes it is on the agenda of the special committee on reform of the House of Commons.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, i rise on a point of order. I rose the other day to take part in the debate on Bill C-24 and I did make a motion to adjourn the House. Therefore, I gather, I lose my chance to continue my debate. It seems to me that if the ten-minute question and comment period is not part of debate, as Your Honour has ruled, it would seem that I am available for ten minutes of questions and comments. I did make reference when I opened my speech to this particular Bill, and what it said.

Mr. Speaker: There has been a certain amount of creativity in the House over the last day or two. The House is observing the Speaker think.

I believe the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has a reasonable point. He did move a motion which ended his time to speak; he did in fact speak on the motion, and he is correct, given all of the arguments about debate versus questions and comments, that in fact there remains a ten-minute question and comment period on the speech of the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) could explain to the House some of the problems which his constituents have had because of the off-oil program being cut so quickly?

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, as Ministers say when they are asked a question by one of their own back-benchers, I thank the Hon. Member very much for the question.

The Hon. Member's question is an important one. I say through you, Mr. Speaker, that the House should understand that what these Bills do is bring two programs to an end at different times. We are finding—and many Hon. Members have approached me about this—an injustice in certain parts of the country. I will give you examples of how injustices have occurred to some of my constituents.

This Bill, Mr. Speaker, eliminates the off-oil program known as COSP, the Canadian off-oil special program, through which home owners receive financial assistance to convert their furnaces from oil—because we are at a point where we are starting to use our resources which are non-conventional and therefore a lot more expensive—to a heating system generated by natural gas, electricity, wood or solar energy.

This program was used to switch users to other means of energy such as natural gas, which we have a lot of; electricity, which we produce in abundance; wood, which we are blessed with; or solar energy, which we are developing with our new technologies and which, by the way, is a clean modern renewable form of energy. This program was to last until 1990 and now it is going to come to an abrupt halt on March 31, 1985.

I find it really ironic that the Conservatives when they were the Opposition attacked the 1980 National Energy Program of the Liberal Government. The irony is that the first Bill put forward by the Conservative Government dealing with energy attacks the one part of the National Energy Program which was working. The National Energy Program was working in respect to conservation and energy alternates. It made a lot of sense. When the Conservatives were in opposition they agreed with it.

The Hon. Member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) is a senior Hon. Member of this House. He was a Minister in the Diefenbaker Government. I was a young lad interested in politics, I remember, at the time of the Diefenbaker Government. I remember that people used to say that that fellow from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was one of the "thinkers" of the House of Commons. The context was that they really didn't have too many thinkers. Things, of course, have improved since then. We now have two thinkers. We have increased by 100 per cent. He said, and I quote from Hansard of June 30, 1981, at page 11099:

● (1220)

It is a good philosophy to get as many people in the low technology systems as possible to move away from the consumption of oil. It is particularly good, if the alternative is cheaper not only than the present price of oil but the future price as well.

He spoke in support of COSP, which we passed in an hour in this House in 1981 and which we made retroactive to 1980. The Conservatives supported it and the Hon. Member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain spoke in the debate. He also said:

I do not think there is any question that the House in general understands and supports the purpose of the oil substitution program—

The Conservatives were on board then, so what is the problem? The problem is that we are only half way toward our goal. We will now go back to the system where we are favouring the oil companies, who in this country are generally fat, foreign and very influential with this Government. Contrast that with the alternate energy people who are lean, Canadian and, unfortunately, out of influence with this Government.

Mr. McDermid: Wrong.

Mr. Waddell: The Hon. Member says "wrong". Why is he then cutting this program? The program seems to be working, and cutting it means some injustices. I will give you an example.

The NDP Member from Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Epp) wrote to the Minister on February 8, and I have a copy of his letter, saying that his people in Thunder Bay would like to take advantage of switching to natural gas. They pay a lot to heat their homes in northern Ontario and they have a chance to switch to natural gas. They are waiting for the gas to come in, and it is coming in. The Hon. Member said in his letter that many home owners wish to take advantage of COSP grants before the March deadline for completion of the installation and they are being denied assistance. He asked the Minister to allow extensions under the extenuating circumstances apparent in these cases. Here is an example of some constituents of a fellow MP who are having difficulty. It is an injustice because they cannot take advantage of the program as they are still waiting for the gas lines to come in.

I have another letter from the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy). His problem is that some of these small businesses that want to take advantage of the program are still waiting for parts to come in from Toronto and Montreal. They are going to suffer because the program is going to be cut off.

I am asking the Government to extend the deadline. That is a fallback strategy, because I would like the Government to keep the program until 1990. If it cannot be, then why not give a short extension so the injustices in Thunder Bay, Churchill and in other ridings can be rectified? I know that in my riding people are lined up to take advantage of the program before it expires.

Mrs. Sparrow: Where were they two years ago?

Mr. Waddell: I will tell you where they were. It is not—

Mr. McDermid: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member has been up for nine minutes with one question. He is making another speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member is correct. The reason I let the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) go on for such a long period is that I had not recognized at the time that we had asked for questions and comments. He was the only one who was up. But I will give the remaining time to the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid), if he wishes.

Mr. McDermid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address that point of order. I think the point of order is out of order.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: I was in the midst of answering the question from my colleague and from the Member over there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No one may monopolize the 10-minute question and comment period.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that the Speaker can arbitrarily cut off the Member when he is trying to answer a question that takes some time to answer, or is indeed answering another question that came from the floor? There must be give and take in the debate and the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow) just indicated another question for me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will read from the committee report on the spirit of the 10-minute question and comment period. The committee envisaged that exchanges which would take place during the 10-minute question and comment period would be short and sharp. More than one Member should be allowed to take advantage of the 10 minutes available, and the Member whose speech is the subject of a question or comment should be given time within the 10 minutes to reply to the point raised. No specific rules should govern the length of the intervention, that being left to the discretion of the Chair. However, the committee did not wish to see one Member monopolizing the 10-minute period in cases where there are several Members who wish to intervene. Furthermore, the Chair should control the intervention to promote a series of exchanges to enliven debate and other constructive elements lacking in debate simply consisting of a series of speeches.

That was the intent of the committee and that is why I think no one should monopolize the question and comment period. We have one minute left for the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) with a short reply by the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell).

Mr. McDermid: He did not have a chance to give his speech and he is trying to do it now in 10 minutes.

I want to make it very clear that the Government has provided an extension of the program for those people who signed contracts before November 8 and through no fault of their own could not complete their conversions by March 31. It was extended to the end of June. There has also been an extension on inspections in that they do not have to take place by March 31. They can take place after, but the work must be completed by March 31.

Naturally, everyone wants to get in on the program when they hear it is closing. But to extend the program for three months would cost, by a conservative estimate, $35 million. The NDP want to just throw the money away. We cannot do that now, and there are other methods of supporting renewable energy in this country and promoting off-oil programs without increasing the expenditure the Government has had to make in the last number of years. It has been beneficial and we do not argue with that, but it is now time to bring this program to a close because we feel the Canadian people now recognize the value of going off oil and will do so on their own because of the major economic benefits to them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) with a short reply.

Mr. Waddell: Cheap reply.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: Short reply. What I am trying to say is that it is cheap for the Government. It saves 115,000 barrels a day of oil equivalent, or 25 million to 30 million barrels a year. The Government is actually going to make money on this program. I cited two injustices in northern Ontario and in Churchill. I thank the Government for its limited extension, but maybe it could consider a further extension for those particular cases. People are not lining up just because the program is ending. They understand the program better. As well, we really have a problem with lower income people who do not have the money to spend. They need some Government help and the Government is going to save money anyway. That is why we are pressing so hard to have this program extended by at least another six months.

Mr. McDermid: It is not the low-income people who are taking advantage of it.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C-24 during the closing minutes. It is interesting to note that when the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) speaks it is always with the great reluctance to engage in a discussion on any of the Bills before the House.

This Bill is not designed to eliminate conservation or deny the real desire of the Government to make whatever changes might be appropriate regarding alternative energy, or any other reasonable option in this field that Canadians may have. This Bill debates the ending of a government program which has served a useful purpose.

• (1230)

As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. McDermid) indicated, it has contributed something by encouraging a change from dependency on oil to other sources of energy. At this point in time it has a limited function. By this time many people, if not most, have had an opportunity to take advantage of the program. For reasons that have been well described in terms of our financial position and disposition as a Government attempting to get the country going again, this Bill must be passed in order to wind down this particular plan.

There have been a number of useful interventions, most particularly by the Parliamentary Secretary and others on this side of the House, discussing the actual program and what it has accomplished so far. The Government's intention to make the changes were announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) last November 8. I think that all Members will recall the broad and well defined program described by the Minister of Finance at that time in an effort to achieve restoration of government management and expenditures that will serve the long-term needs of the country. This was one of the significant parts of that program described by the Minister of Finance. This Bill represents the legislation required to achieve that prescribed end.

We have all had an opportunity to assess the reaction to the plan of November 8. I think it is quite clear that the people of Canada, including those involved in providing materials, equipment, and services for this particular program in residential oil substitution and energy conservation, acknowledge that outright consumer grants for these purposes are something that the Government of Canada can no longer afford. A large potential exists for further oil substitution and energy conservation in the residential sector. The pursuit of that potential remains an important priority for Canada. In a time of restraint the Government must find less costly ways to support those objectives. I will return to this subject later in my remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Having been Opposition Members of Parliament for too long, we on this side of the House have had an opportunity to look into efforts and initiatives that have been taken by previous governments. In the conservation area particularly it has always been clear that any efforts that have been made have fallen far short of the real potential which exists. We have had an opportunity to study in some detail the magnificent opportunities which occur in conservation across the country. This is a very finite section of the implementation of conservation opportunities. There are many that have been taken in industry, for example, which is not affected by this Bill at all, which have achieved magnificent results because they were reasonable and cost effective things for them to do.

I cite that only as an example that many of us had an opportunity to become familiar with as we were sitting in Opposition. We are now in Government and therefore in a position to build on those opportunities. While this specific program has served a useful function, it has now reached the point where, comparatively speaking, it will probably not fulfil much of that additional potential.

The Member for Vancouver-Kingsway has mentioned specific instances where there are some difficulties. However, I believe that if this program were to be wound down in four years from now the Member for Vancouver-Kingsway would probably give the same speech he gave today. There will never be a perfect time to start or stop. There will always be people who might have become involved in a particular government program in a particular way. No one is claiming that this is the perfect time, but it would not be perfect in five years from now either. We must do the best that we can. The adjustments which the Minister has already indicated will be made will help, in a large part, to overcome some of the difficulties that may have been faced.

The two programs that we are talking about are the COSP and CHIP programs. COSP is the off-oil program which was introduced in 1980. It has provided taxable contributions of up to $800 toward the cost of converting oil heating systems to natural gas, electricity and propane, as well as to wood and other renewable energy resources. The existing legislation provided the termination date of December 31, 1990 for this program. The amending Bill will change that date to March 31 of this year. Again, I would emphasize that since November 8 of last year most Canadians understood that this Bill would be forthcoming and that the program would terminate on March 31 of this year.

A limited exception has been provided to allow applicants a further three months, until June 30, to complete conversions if they had signed contracts prior to the November 8 announcement, and if they face difficulties in getting the work done by March 31. The need for inspections to be completed by March 31 has also been waived in recognition that backlogs of inspection requests may occur in some areas.

A number of representations have been received proposing that three, four or five extra months be allowed to complete conversions in respect of commitments signed by applicants before March 31. It has been argued that it is impossible to convert to natural gas between November and April or, in any event, more costly to do so than during warm weather months. Both gas and electric utilities have also expressed concern that the pressure to get work done by March 31 may adversely affect the quality of the work. In some cases, because of limited inventories of equipment, less than optimum systems may in fact be installed.

We are all sympathetic to these concerns, Mr. Speaker. Consideration was given to an extension until summer for the period for eligible conversions. However, a general extension could not be permitted in view of the additional program costs that would have been involved. For example, a minimal useful extension of three months up to June 30 would increase outlays and government costs in the 1985-86 fiscal year by up to $35 million. This would reduce by more than one-third the program savings pledged in respect to COSP toward the deficit reductions announced by the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board.

The second part of the program is the CHIP program. This has provided taxable contributions of up to $500 toward insulation and draft proofing measures in existing homes. It was introduced in 1977 and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act provided for its termination at the end of 1987. One of the surprising things about this program was the very slow uptake of this opportunity by Canadians. For the first several years it was questionable whether this program would be a very useful adjunct in our energy policy. The crunch did not really come until it was clear that energy prices were reaching such levels as to make this a clear cost advantage. In fact, the proportion of people who took advantage of this program in the end are not generally in the category that the Member for Vancouver-Kingsway indicated. When energy prices started to increase dramatically people who were following budgets closely were the ones who responded quickly by taking advantage of the program. I was surprised at the low initial uptake of those programs.

The amending Bill will provide for a two-stage phase-out under which the Government's share of eligible costs is reduced to 33.33 per cent from 60 per cent effective January 1, 1985. The program comes to an end on March 31, 1986. In the final 15 months of CHIP the maximum contribution is unchanged at $500.

An extra year is provided for CHIP, which is beyond the termination date of COSP, in recognition of the fact that suppliers and installers of residential conservation materials across Canada needed the time to prepare for the withdrawal of the CHIP Program.

The end of the program has been anticipated for some time by both industry and Government. For example, the reduction of the contribution rate to 33⅓ per cent is a natural and important step which follows an early reduction of the rate for materials to 60 per cent from 100 per cent. Moreover, homes have been admitted to the programs sequentially on the basis of their date of construction and the process is now in its final state. The last group to become eligible—the 1.3 million homes built between 1971 and 1977—will have had two years to use the program by the time it concludes next year.

That further period will also be helpful to many small contractors across Canada who are working in a trade that is still relatively young. They have rarely had notices of changes in CHIP and this phase out period gives them some time to expand the scope of the conservation work that they can do, and also improves their ability to explain the advantages of conservation to householders.

In this respect, we are indebted to the National Insulation and Energy Conservation Contractors' Association which represents insulation installers across Canada. We are indebted to them for advice and support, not only in the phasing out of the program but throughout the entire CHIP Program.

The Association recognized early last fall that CHIP might have to be discontinued and it volunteered options for the orderly conclusion of programs. The suggestions were very helpful in preparing the recommendations which have now been brought forward. The Association was later able to identify the likelihood of a backlog of orders for work and materials that would arise in advance of changes in the contribution rate on December 31.

A modification which has been accepted permits applicants to sign for the work by December 31, but to have it performed in the first three months of 1985 at the 60 per cent rate. More than 80,000 applicants have taken advantage of this provision.

In the budgetary savings that we expect from the changes in the CHIP and COSP Programs, the expenditures in the current fiscal year, that is the budgetary savings, will total almost $350 million. The termination of COSP and the phasing out of CHIP will provide continued savings from the appropriation levels for the two programs of $180 million in 1985-1986 and $315 million in 1986-87. These are major and necessary contributions toward reduction of the federal deficit.

Our decisions have been made not just because we addressed the deficit, however. Our decisions recognize that the market place has changed and that the Government's role with respect to both oil substitution and energy conservation must change with it.

COSP was first introduced in October, 1980. At that time, OPEC dominated the world's view of the future for oil. It was expected to control world supply and push world prices much higher. Almost 40 per cent of Canadian homes were heated with oil and most of those home owners had little knowledge of oil substitution. Residential oil substitution was identified as a priority and a large consumer grant was introduced as the instrument to make it happen. It is difficult to establish how much of the activity which has taken place since 1980 can really be credited to COSP. Almost a million units have been converted under the program, representing oil displacement of 32,000 barrels of oil per day. Over this period, the financial benefits of oil substitution have become more than familiar to home owners. A trend has been established toward installation of medium and high efficiency natural gas furnaces which are being made available at a steadily declining and more competitive price.

Dual energy systems such as plenum heaters and heat pumps are offering savings and comfort to home owners and advantages in load management to the utilities.

A broad range of controlled combustion and woodburning systems is now available. Hundreds of thousands of homes across rural Canada use wood as their only source of space heating and obtain their supplies at very low cost.

To preserve a share of the residential market, oil dealers and manufacturers of oil heating equipment are marketing new, high efficiency oil furnaces and retrofit packages for existing oil furnaces. In this maturing competitive environment, we can expect to see the continuing rapid decline of the residential use of oil after COSP is withdrawn.

CHIP has provided assistance toward conservation measures for more than 2.5 million Canadian homes. Significant energy savings, averaging 17 per cent, have been achieved in the homes that use CHIP and an evaluation of the program has established that CHIP played an important part in achieving those savings.

It is estimated that the equivalent of 28,500 barrels of oil a day are being saved as a result of work done under CHIP.

As with oil substitution, the benefits of energy conservation in reduced heating bills and increased home comfort are much more fully understood by Canadians now than seven or eight years ago. Installation specialists now certify their work to accepted national standards.

However, there remains a significant gap in understanding and action on the part of both consumers and industry. Consumers still lack confidence in the quality of work and the advice that they are offered. They see conservation and heating system technologies as being complex and they doubt their own ability to sort it all out. Major technical issues remain to be resolved and the work standards now in place need to be refined, expanded in scope and backed up by the installer training programs. These are very real problems but they are not resolved by Government grants.

There are continuing objectives. One is to reduce the use of oil energy in Canada, which remains an important and highly desirable national objective. Very large potentials for savings exist not only in the housing stock but in the other sectors as well. These include commercial and industrial buildings, buildings operated by various institutions and even the operations of the federal Government's buildings.

We know that in many cases it can be less costly to invest in conserving energy than to bring on the same amount of new supplies. In the existing housing stock, the average potential for savings from cost effective conservation measures has been estimated at 30 per cent. For millions of Canadian households, it will be a very attractive investment, with a rapid return on dollars spent, to insulate, draft proof and improve or convert their heating systems.

We cannot, and should not, continue to expect the public treasury to use borrowed dollars for the payment of consumer grants to try to ensure that this energy investment takes place.

A more limited and balanced role for Government is clearly preferable, one that is sensitive to the information needs of energy users and suppliers, to the technical problems still unresolved and to opportunities for further development of energy use technology.

The legislation before the House today is therefore a necessary step, but only a first step in reorienting the Government programs in these sectors.

I have also indicated that other programs under the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in the area of conservation of renewable energy are to be thoroughly and critically reviewed. This Bill in no way should indicate to anyone that the Government does not wish to fully encourage through every means possible the expansion of conservation measures and to ensure a proper place for the role of alternative energy. That is a goal that we believe we can and should accomplish in the interest of all Canada.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I think that the Hon. Member said, "We know that it is less costly to preserve energy than to bring on new supplies". While I cannot quote him exactly, I think he also said that the public treasury should not use borrowed dollars so that this investment in conservation and so on takes place by consumers. Is that what the Hon. Member said?

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes. With respect to the second part, I am not exactly sure of the phrasing the Hon. Member was trying to use so I would not want to say yes or no to what he has asked.

The indication was that direct grants to consumers may no longer be the only cost effective way of achieving the desired results in conservation and switches to alternative and non renewable energy sources.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, that is incredible because the consumers who the member does not want to subsidize are the ones who are paying 50 cents a litre for gas at the pump. Will the member not admit that the budget for the Petroleum Incentives Program—which is grants to oil companies, not to consumers—was budgeted at $8.6 billion over a five-year period? The Government's own budget this year provides $1.6 billion in grants to oil companies to go up to the frontiers and off shore and sink $100 million wells.

There is also a grant of $1.3 million to East Coast Energy Corporation which was run by the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) buddies, including Fred Doucet, who was a director of that corporation. The Prime Minister's buddies got these grants. Yet, the Canadian consumer is being cut off because in the Member's words, "Well, you should not give grants to the Canadian consumer because they can borrow their own money". The Member admits that it is less costly to preserve energy. Therefore, why spend $1.6 billion bringing in a new supply and cutting off consumers from the grant, a small pittance compared to what is given to the oil companies? After all, the Canadian consumer pays it all out of his pocket. Why do that, Mr. Speaker? It does not make any sense compared to what the Government said and what the Member said. He said "we know it is less costly to preserve energy than to bring on new supply".

● (1250)

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for his concise question. An interesting piece of information came across my desk in the last month. It was a comparison of energy costs in which the Hon. Member and I will be interested. It concerns consumers. Every person going to the gas pump to fill up in Canada is paying a certain price. I usually end up paying 50 cents a litre. This comparison that came across my desk is very interesting. On a dollar for dollar basis it is now costing the average American consumer who goes to the gas pump in the United States equal or less money than he or she paid for gas in 1959. That takes into account inflation, the change in the dollar and everything else.

I have to question the common sense, the decency and even the intelligence of the Member opposite in making the kind of comments he makes, when it was he and his Party who supported the National Energy Program which resulted in all the disastrous changes which the energy consumers across this country have had to bear. The Hon. Member has to take responsibility for that; he was part of it. He does not even explain the PGRT and the PIP grants properly.

POINT OF ORDER—MR. CLARK (YELLOWHEAD)

SEIZURE OF TURKISH EMBASSY IN OTTAWA—TURKISH GOVERNMENT WARNING

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate the indulgence of the House and will not be long.

Members will know that on Thursday, yesterday, in response to questions on the Turkish Embassy I told the House of Commons:

> There was a request made in mid-February. There was a response made by the Government of Canada which was deemed satisfactory at the time by the Turkish Embassy. There has been no communication with the Turkish Embassy or the Turkish Government since that time.

That was my statement, Mr. Speaker. That statement was made after a thorough inquiry of Canadian officials who might have been contacted by Turkish authorities.

I have just learned that, contrary to the information given to me earlier, a representative of the Turkish Embassy here may have raised this matter with Canadian officials in late February or early March. I have ordered an immediate investigation and will report to the House.

I wanted, however, to take this earliest opportunity to correct the record and to apologize to the House for inadvertently conveying information which may have been inaccurate.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that there will be questions in Question Period tomorrow about this.

An Hon. Member: Tomorrow?

Mr. Waddell: I am sorry, Monday.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wise (for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) that Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): I want to remind the Hon. Member that we voted against the Petroleum Incentive Program. The Hon. Member was in the House. The NDP did not support the National Energy Program. His Party voted for it. I ask him to check the record. Does he recall voting for the Petroleum Incentive Program? He voted against other aspects of the Energy Program as did my Party. We both voted for the conservation program.

Is the Hon. Member aware from his own department that this program is half complete? The object was to convert two million housing units off oil by 1990. So far one million units have been converted, at a saving of 75,000 barrels a day. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) said last week in Vancouver that the energy costs can be reduced by up to 30 per cent to cost effective conservation investments.

In view of the fact that the program seems to be working, it is only half way through and, according to the Minister herself, we could still reduce by 30 per cent the demand and use of oil, and in view of the restraint programs much as in my province of British Columbia where one day, one year, it is for restraint and on the next day the province suddenly finds its sense and isn't, why is the Government cutting back and saving a small amount of money on a perfectly sensible program that is saving oil? This is one of the few aspects of the energy program that is working? Why is the Hon. Member's Government eliminating that and not eliminating things like PIP grants of $1.6 billion a year to oil companies, along with tax advantages? Why is the Government picking on the poor consumer and forgetting about other areas where money could be saved?

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I guess it is the Hon. Member's duty and disposition to be pessimistic. One of the things he really does not include in his thinking or in his comments is the fact that even prior to COSP there were significant conversions. There is no reason to expect that there will not be a significant number of conversions after. We intend to continue and even expand our efforts to encourage people and to inform them of the benefits that can come to them if they switch off oil when it is appropriate and reasonable for them to do so. Natural gas is probably one of the best examples. Electricity can be used in other areas, but there could be a reasonable debate as to whether that is a long-term totally desirable objective.

The Hon. Member continues to try somehow to cast two sides of this scene in terms of consumers; people on the street who need to buy gas, oil, heating oil, and other energy requirements, in contrast to the needs for development in Canada of our resources and the needs of Canadian industry, Canadian oil and gas producers—small ones, not the big ones which the Hon. Member talks about. There is no question that that industry is taxed heavily. The PGRT is the basis of providing PIP grants. Maybe PIP grants are not right either. There are really not two sides. When the system is running smoothly and when there are benefits to producers, industry and secondary industry across Canada will benefit. When everything is working, who really benefits is the Canadian taxpayer and those people who have to buy oil and gas products are the real beneficiaries.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member.

[Translation]

Order please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon. I shall then give the floor to the Hon. Member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Mr. Gagliano).

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. When the House rose at one o'clock, the Chair promised that the Hon. Member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Mr. Gagliano) would be given the floor after the luncheon recess.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, once again I must draw the attention of the House to a manoeuvre on the part of the Progressive Conservative Party that will cause serious harm to the Canadian economy and to many Canadians. I think there is grave cause for alarm when we see the present Government once again camouflaging the extremely negative impact of Bill C-24 by failing to give Canadians a true picture of what the consequences of this Bill will be.

After the Domtar case, the Progressive Conservative Government is once again aiming its guns at Quebec with a Bill that will deprive Quebecers of hundreds of millions of dollars in subsidies.

Where are the Conservative spokesmen for Quebec? have they been gagged once again? Are they afraid to defend the interests of their constituents?

The Conservative Members of Quebec ought to know that in 1983-84, 59 per cent of the grants they want to eliminate today were being paid to people in Quebec. Is this how they intend to defend the interests of their constituents?

However, in addition to the specific problems that repealing the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act will cause in Quebec, it is also obvious that it will have a disastrous impact on Canada as a whole.

Out of sheer ignorance, because I can hardly believe that conscientious members of this House would knowingly support a Bill like Bill C-24, Conservative Members are questioning the very foundation of Canada's energy policy. Everything done in recent years to make energy self-sufficient has suddenly been put on hold by a Government that would rather sell the country to the highest bidder instead of securing its future and its future autonomy.

Action programs for the benefit of energy consumers, which the present Government wants to abolish, were introduced in 1980 by a Liberal Government that understood Canada's energy requirements. These programs had three main goals: first, Canada was to maximize energy conservation; second, it was essential to reduce oil consumption and to maximize the use of alternative energy sources such as natural gas, wood and electric power or solar energy; and third, it was essential to make alternative energy sources available to Canadians by developing the infrastructure for their distribution.

A number of very well documented studies prepared by officials in various departments, as well as consultations held among the parties concerned, were instrumental, in 1980, in setting annual goals for conversion of residential and industrial heating systems that would help to reach the objectives I mentioned earlier.

Experts have indicated without hesitation that a minimum of ten years would be necessary to attain the objectives in question. Now, the Progressive Conservative Government, through Bill C-24, intends to tamper with the very foundation of this energy planning program.

Jean-François Villon, speaking on behalf of Gaz Métropolitain Inc. on November 7, 1984 in The Gazette, said:

> —the reasons which led the federal government to promote the substitution of natural gas to oil are just as valid today as they were three years ago. The supply of Canada oil is quickly decreasing and new oil developments will be extremely costly.

In that interview, Jean-François Villon stated that arguments for continued subsidies are so compelling that it is essential to keep this program.

The need for Canada to reduce its dependency on oil, the need for a new impetus in the Alberta economy and the need to ensure the profitability of the $400 million spent during three years to improve the availability of natural gas in Quebec makes it imperative, Jean-François Villon says, to keep the residential and industrial substitution program.

The legislation implemented by the Liberal government was of course a complete success since the goals were almost completely met for the 1980-83 period.

Indeed, 95 per cent of the 780,000 housing units to be converted to alternative sources of energy were converted during that period especially in Quebec, where provincial energy companies have drawn up complementary programs. Conversion was very successful. Indeed, 132,000 of 244,000 housing units converted in 1984 were in Quebec. In 1983-84 alone, Quebecers received $99,396,000 from the federal government, and they could benefit from substantially reduced heating costs. Those savings were reinvested in various areas which surely stimulated our entire economy. Are Canadians being punished for taking maximum advantage of a legislation that met urgent and real needs?

Even in Quebec where already 41.3 per cent of all conversions expected for 1990 have been made, 59.7 per cent of housing units to be converted will be denied subsidies if Bill C-24 is passed.

On the national scale now, what about the mere 37.7 per cent of projected conversions actually completed under the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act?

Mr. Speaker, not only will Bill C-24 deprive more than one million homeowners of direct grants averaging $735, it will also drain the economy of the huge savings which lower heating costs would have generated. Each owner would have reinvested his savings in our economy and tens of thousands of productive jobs would have been created.

Mr. Speaker, the figures I have just quoted are readily available, so why did Progressive Conservative Members, from Quebec or elsewhere, fail to mention them in the House?

Once again I suspect that, through this irrational and harmful piece of legislation, the Progressive Conservative Government is trying to divert attention from its lack of planning, and especially the discrepancies in its election program.

We all know that economic development and the fight against inflation over the coming years will depend above all on our energy policies, but the Progressive Conservative Government wants to do away with one of the most essential and effective measures in that sector.

Planning for the future is definitely not this Government's forte. Our dollar is in a nosedive, the Government knows that oil prices will soar the moment Bill C-24 becomes law, yet the Conservative administration once again wants to turn us into "Oil-god" slaves.

Mr. Speaker, everybody knows that it has become impossible to govern a country without planning and serious analysis. Here again the Progressive Conservative Party shows its inability to govern and keep track of national priorities.

Does the Government not demonstrate utter ineptitude by being so complacent about our energy requirements and the need to develop alternate energy sources?

It never fails, Mr. Speaker, we have a good program like this one or like the small business loan program, so the Government puts an end to it or changes it to make it useless.

Mr. Speaker, I fear that the Government's irresponsibility will increasingly undermine our future prospects in the coming months, but I keep hoping that Bill C-24 will be shelved so that we will maintain a modicum of energy planning.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow).

• (1410)

[English]

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend commented that the oil reserves were diminishing rapidly. He is absolutely right; the conventional oil reserves are diminishing rapidly. I wonder if he really knows why this was so.

Perhaps the Hon. Member has forgotten that the National Energy Program, which was brought in by his Government in the 1980s, brought the oil and gas industry to its knees and sent many drilling rigs out of the country and many people South of the border, to Australia or to the North Sea. Those who did not leave the country went on the unemployment or welfare lines. A great many jobs were lost in this particular sector. I can also state that the spin-off effects caused unemployment to rise by some 90,000 people in the Province of Ontario.

As well, the Hon. Member's Government introduced PIP grants which were extremely discriminatory. PIP grants forced more of the natural-resource companies to explore on Canada Lands and therefore to explore in the Beaufort Sea and off the coast of Canada. Unfortunately, this took away the people, technologies and moneys necessary to develop and explore on provincial lands in Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. That is why our conventional reserves are diminishing.

Another thing the former Government legislated was the 25 per cent back-in on Canada Lands after a discovery. I must tell my hon. friend that this particular legislation drove out and prevented foreign, and even Canadian investment. As a matter of fact, that program can be directly related to the moving of some $17 billion out of the country. Before the Hon. Member goes on to say too much about diminishing oil reserves, I think he should take a look at why this is happening.

My hon. friend also said that we were covering up and not putting forth all the correct figures. Perhaps he has not been able to hear the six or eight Conservative members who have spoken in regard to Bill C-24. They have all stated the facts and figures.

As well, we are not discriminating against Quebec. The programs will be terminated right across the country. We all realize that the COSP and CHIP programs have been extremely successful and I agree with my hon. friend about that. However, the time has come when Canadians can no longer be subsidized in every area. We will save over $800 million by terminating these programs, and that money will be put directly toward the deficit.

• (1420)

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, according to the Hon. Member, the Liberal administration did everything wrong.

I know, however, that this program, which the Conservative Government wants to abolish, is very popular. The people in the Province of Quebec are very concerned because as of March 31 the program will no longer be available. The Government announced on November 8 that the program would be discontinued. It should extend the program for at least six months to provide an opportunity to the people who want to take advantage of it. I do not understand what the Hon. Member is driving at. I definitely did not speak about discrimination, I said that Quebec was the Province which was the largest user of that program and the people of Quebec are not being permitted an opportunity to continue to use that program after March 31.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Mr. Gagliano) said that this Government was prepared to mortgage the future. I found that to be an interesting comment.

We have taken over from a Government which had almost a $200 billion debt. This year, there will be a $35 billion deficit. He is talking about this Government mortgaging the future of Canada, when it has to borrow money to pay for this program in order to give that money back to the Canadian taxpayers to convince them to insulate their homes or go off oil. I believe that Canadian people are more intelligent than that. They do not have to be bribed. They must be educated on the importance of going off oil, insulating their homes, using passive solar and solar opportunities, and renewable products. But for the Hon. Member to stand up in the House and accuse this Government of mortgaging the future of Canada, that is somewhat facetious.

Mr. Gagliano: The Hon. Member said that the Government was borrowing money to give this program to the Canadian people, so that Canadian people could reduce their heating bills and invest the money which they save. I think that is a good thing. However, he does not realize that the Government is taking money away from the Canadian people. That is the problem.

Mr. McDermid: It's their money!

Mr. Gagliano: In the long term, this Government will put the country into bankruptcy.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary said that this program is costing the Canadian people money. However, the program is taking money away from the people who can least afford it. This program was aimed at consumers, people on fixed and low incomes, and the unemployed. Those were the people who were taking advantage of the program, and those are the people who will lose.

The Parliamentary Secretary referred to the deficit. The deficit has increased since this Government has been in power. The Government cannot even bring in a budget or give us the date on which the budget will be brought down. It is not only the question of the funds which this program gave to people, but also the provision of information, guidelines and a toll-free line which people could call to ask questions about insulation and off-oil programs that is very important. Those were programs, aids and ideas which the people needed. We have not yet heard what the Government will do in that regard, or what information the Government will provide to Canadians.

I would like to ask the Hon. Member what difference it will make in his area, when people are no longer able to get the information or an assurance from the Government that the furnaces and systems which are put in place will be approved by CSA, or in fact whether it will be equipment which will meet the standards?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, on April 1, when this program is no longer in effect, a lot of home owners will not be able to convert from oil heating to electricity or gas, especially in Quebec. As well, the Montreal area does not have very many natural gas lines, and because of the hard winter which we have had, it has been very difficult to create those lines in order for people to have gas installed in their homes. April 1 would probably be a convenient time to start work on the projected natural gas lines, however the program will not exist at that time. I am sure, as well, that the termination of that program will mean the loss of many jobs.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary and other Conservatives have been saying that this program must be cut because this is a time of restraint. They are saying that we should let the people invest for themselves and that we should not subsidize consumers. They are saying that the people are sensible and that they will invest in the market.

A Montreal economist, Diane Bellemare, submitted material to the Macdonald Royal Commission from which I would like to quote. It reads:

> It may be that subsidies are necessary to encourage people to use more efficient forms of energy. Without them, consumers may not be able to afford the investment needed to conserve or switch from one form of energy to another, either because their levels of earnings are too low or because they feel that sooner or later prices will drop back to more attractive levels.

I wonder if the Hon. Member agrees with that. Has he found in his riding that lower-income people do not have money to invest in the market? Has he found that people have the money in their pockets to spend without a Government grant? We must keep in mind that we are talking about million-dollar programs. However, the oil industry is receiving PIP grants in the amount of $1.6 billion from the Government. PIP grants are subsidies. We have an interventionist economy. It is not a free-market economy. Anyone who thinks it is a free-market economy, as far as energy is concerned, is crazy. Even Texaco and Gulf know that it is not a free-market economy.

Does the Hon. Member feel that his constituents need help to participate in energy conservation programs?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry, but the time for questions and comments has expired. I would like to recognize the next speaker on debate for ten minutes. As per Standing Order 35(2), the next speaker will be allowed ten minutes.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I know that the Chair has already made certain comments with respect to the application of Standing Order 35(2)(b), which will now limit the speeches to ten minutes. The Table will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there have been 21 speakers and that the eight hours provided for debate have expired. Therefore, according to the rules, the House is now within the ten-minute speech period.

However, I would like to point out to the Chair that there is a difference in interpretation about which I would like to speak. Indeed, the French text and the English text of the Standing Order are not exactly the same. In English, Standing Order 35(2)(b) reads:

—twenty minutes following the first three speakers, if that Member begins to speak within the next eight hours of consideration;—

In other words, eight hours of consideration. The word is "consideration".

● (1430)

[Translation]

In French it reads, and I quote:

—les huit heures de débat—

[English]

"Consideration", Mr. Speaker, I take it could mean to encompass the speeches of 20 minutes plus the ten minutes for comments and questions. It could even include points of order, points of privilege and all of the things which traditionally, since we changed our rules, have been included in the global eight hours. I submit to you that by doing that, Mr. Speaker, you are restricting certain privileges of Hon. Members to speak for 20 minutes.

The point can be made that we have had 21 speakers debate Bill C-24 to date, but we should have had 24 speakers, that is, three speakers per hour for eight hours. So we are short three speakers for 20 minutes plus the usual ten-minute period for questions and comments.

I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, of the reason we changed the rules. I would like to go back to the days when debate was 30 minutes plus—with unanimous consent—questions being put to the speaker. We had a series of monologues at that time. We tried to improve things by bringing some dialogue into the House. We said that after a Member's remarks one could ask questions of the Member debating, as to the relevancy and effectiveness of his speech or the arguments he was putting forth.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that we in this House will have to consider whether we should continue with this procedure or go back to the monologue form of debate where Hon. Members on all sides of this House are called upon to debate issues. If the ten minutes is restricted to comments and questions, without being considered as debate, then in my view we should say so openly and not call it debate, as our rules so imply——in French. Although this might be a wrong translation, Mr. Speaker, I submit there is a substantial difference between "consideration" in English and "débat" in French. I should appreciate it very much if you could enlighten me on these provisions and on these remarks.

[Translation]

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I cannot disagree with my hon. friend about the new rules, but I think in questioning the time he will find that the Table has kept an accurate record. I was surprised when I saw for the first time ever how accurately the Table keeps the time. With respect to the question of the time we have now arrived at, I think the Table is probably very accurate in saying that the eight hours have passed. If we are getting into a debate on the new rules under this point of order, I don't think this is the time. If we are making recommendations on debate, let me say that I happen to like the new rules because I think we have now to a great extent gotten away from the monologues. We do have this exchange of ten minutes which gives a little life to the debate.

I cannot comment on the French and English aspect of "débat" or "consideration", but I would hope that if we are making recommendations—and I gather that is what the hon. gentleman is doing—we would maintain the system we have now, because it has added some life to the House and some enjoyment in the debate. I prefer that to sitting here listening to the monologues about which the Hon. Member talks.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the Parliamentary Secretary that with the new rules we have seen an improvement; we are getting away from the monologue and into debate. I would like to reiterate what the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has said. What I see is an inconsistency. It is an inconsistency between the French and the English when we deal with "debat" and "consideration". What has been included in the eight hours is not only the debate but the question and comment period. It was a thought perceived by a lot of people initially, I think, that questions and comments were considered as part of the debate. However, that is not what the Speaker ruled yesterday.

Mr. McDermid: Yes.

Mr. MacLellan: No. And that is not what was ruled here earlier today in this House. The Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) rose on a point of order and asked if he could continue. He acknowledged the fact that he had forfeited his time by moving the motion to adjourn yesterday: that is, his 20 minutes had elapsed. He asked at that point if the period for questions and comments could continue. The Speaker reflected and then said, yes, it could. If questions and comments are considered part of the debate, then the Hon. Member should not have been able to continue with questions and comments. One can't have it both ways.

I have no objection to my friend, the Hon. Member for Vancouver-Kingsway, having the ten minutes and continuing with questions and comments. He deserved that. He moved an adjournment which I thought was very worthwhile. If he had not done so, someone from this Party would have done so. He paid the price of forfeiting his 20 minutes, and he deserved to be able to continue with questions and comments. However, we have a very definite inconsistency. Regardless of what the procedure has been and what has been determined that the rules say, we have a very definite deviation from what has been followed by the rulings of the Speaker.

Mr. Gauthier: We've been short-changed on that one.

Mr. MacLellan: That's right. We have suffered and have been short-changed an hour at least. Now everything is concluded and counted as debate. That was not the ruling of His Honour, the Speaker, today. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that eight hours is fine. A time limit on 20-minute speeches is good. Eight hours is good. But those eight hours should consist only of the actual debate; not of points of order or questions of privilege or questions and comments, but debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Having heard the representations made by the three Hon. Members, I think that the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) who has raised this point will certainly agree with me that the occupant of the Chair is bound by the interpretation of Standing Order 35(2) which includes the 10 minutes. I will be pleased, however, to convey his representations to our Committee on Procedure and Organization in order to see whether changes could be made to satisfy all hon. members, if the House so wishes.

[English]

The Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) on debate, and I would remind him that we are now in the ten-minute period for debate without questions or comments following.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in questioning the Government's decision to do away with the most successful part of the national energy policy, a part which has had demonstrated results in terms of not only provoking activity, but also in very substantial saving of our oil supply which Canada will need some time in the future. It is acknowledged, I think, on all sides of the House that our oil and gas supplies are not inexhaustible and that our petroleum in particular is far from inexhaustable. We will be needing it for certain purposes such as air travel, for plastics and petrochemicals and in certain areas where it cannot be replaced by other products. Therefore, it does not make any sense to use oil for home heating and other uses where substitutes are in fact easily available.

The Government's decision is not only wrong and imprudent in the long term, but it is also wrong and imprudent in terms of the priority which the Government announced when it came to office. We were told that "jobs, jobs, jobs" would be its priority. I have had insulation contractors talk to me in my riding with respect to what will happen to their businesses after the phasing out of the CHIP program. The Government's own review of CHIP indicated that two-thirds of the CHIP work would not have been done if the program had not existed. About 40 per cent or 50 per cent of all retrofitting taking place in homes for insulation purposes is motivated by CHIP, but that will go in the course of another year's time.

I have had people in the furnace business tell me similarly that their businesses are just going to slump and they will in fact be forced to lay off their staff and in some cases be unemployed themselves because of the ending of the COSP program in just a few days.

I happen to have benefited from the COSP program last year. I did not anticipate that the Government would take this step but in September I took the initiative and arranged to have a gas burner installed in my house in place of my oil burner. The consequence is that from now on we will be saving about 50 barrels of oil a year, and that is a lot. That is a benefit which is going to go on for a very long time, and the cost to the Government after recouping tax on the grant would be of the order of about $500 or $550, whatever my tax rate may happen to be. That is a very small investment and it illustrates that it is far cheaper to get new oil supplies through conservation and alternate energy than it is through finding new supplies.

However, the Government is going to remove the petroleum gas revenue tax which will cost the taxpayers some $2.5 billion at the same time it is eliminating these two programs which are far less costly and far more productive, given their ability to literally mine oil from the walls of people's homes and furnaces because of the switch-over to other forms of energy.

It seems to me that the reason for the Government's decision is a bias in favour of western oil interests and a bias against the very prudent method of saving petroleum energy. The biggest budget cuts last year were to the CHIP and COSP programs, and cuts to the National Research Council, to the tune of $60 million for conservation and alternative energy research.

What binds all of these together is that they were measures which threaten the continued growth of the industry until the oil runs out. We are threatening short-term profits for the oil industry. But in my opinion and that of my Party these measures are all necessary if we are to be able to give to our children and grandchildren a country which still has viable amounts of petroleum resources for the future. With conservation, the value of savings grows as energy prices rise. The job impact of conservation and alternatie energy, COSP and CHIP, is a great deal greater than it is in getting new oil out of the ground.

When you consider the other energy alternative, it is significant that the Government does not cut a penny from Atomic Energy of Canada despite the fact that it is spending $340 million a year, yet after 35 years nuclear power has still not reached the point where it can support itself without the need for very heavy Government subsidies. If you want to save money, why not get it there rather than forcing poor Canadians to pay through the nose when they do not have the money?

I wish to move a motion which will have the effect of hoisting this measure for at least six months. We would like to see it put off longer because we are opposing the Bill, but it is a parliamentary device which will demonstrate what we think abnout the Bill, as well as being a response to the very specific needs of large numbers of people in my riding and elsewhere who are not now able to benefit from these programs, COSP in particular, because the deadline has arrived, and they can no longer get a contractor or oil company prepared to take their particular case.

Mr. Thacker: Still some rich NDP who have not taken advantage of the public purse?

Mr. Cassidy: Many of my constituents have taken advantage of this as well.

Mr. Waddell: His, too, I bet.

Mr. Cassidy: In fact, the take-up in Alberta has been stronger than in almost any other part of the country.

Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor: "Bill C-24, An Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence."

One of our concerns is for those ordinary Canadians who were not able to take advantage of this program before, and for whom even the dollars to pay their share were difficult to acquire. They are certainly not going to be able to take advantage of conservation and off-oil measures if they have to come up with all the dollars at once. Some of these people are Canadians in Alberta and British Columbia who do not have jobs right now, yet they find that the oil bills are coming up to $1,000 or more a year. They know they can save if they go off oil but they cannot afford to do that because the very first move the Conservatives announced was to cut this particular measure.

These programs have benefited us all by saving the energy petroleum resources we will need in the future.

Mr. Thacker: Only the rich took it up though, like you.

Mr. Cassidy: That particular statement is demonstrably untrue. This program was taken up by people—

Mr. Thacker: You took it up.

Mr. Cassidy: —on all sides of the House. I was too busy with politics beforehand to take it up or I would have done it back in 1977. I would suggest as well that if the Hon. Member feels he has a point and feels that some people on high incomes, who were paying tax on their grants, should not have gotten the grants, then it was open to the Government to have redesigned the program and redirected it to people with ordinary incomes. But I remember one of the first steps of this new Government when it came to power. The Conservatives said in opposition they were opposed to the tax increases which were due to take effect on October 1, tax increases which hit ordinary Canadians across the country. But did the Hon. Member's Party come in and reverse that tax increase which it had inherited from the Liberals? No, it did not. They imposed tax increases which had the effect of penalizing average Canadians to the tune of some $500 million a year.

That may be straying a bit from the Bill but I would suggest that if the Government genuinely cared about ordinary Canadians, if it felt that some groups in our society had not benefited from this program, it was elected on a mandate of change and reform and it could have come in with a new approach to make sure that every family in the country with an annual income of less than $20,000 or $30,000 would have been assured the opportunity to take advantage of this program before it ended.

I appeal to my hon. friend from Alberta, and his colleagues, to join with our Party in hoisting this Bill for six months in order to give the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources time to take up that very valuable suggestion. If the program is to be changed, it should be changed in order to benefit ordinary Canadians who were not able to benefit from the program during the six or seven years it has been in force. I remind you that the program benefits all Canadians, because if we keep on wasting oil at the rate we are doing it today there will be none left by the time our sons and daughters come to take their places in this House of Commons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier).

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hesitate to interrupt my friend but I just want to get the procedure right. I heard you call a voice vote and I am not quite sure what happened.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was just introducing the motion for debate.

Mr. Waddell: I heard a lot of people saying—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There were a lot of voices at the time. I got a loud response.

Mr. Waddell: I just wanted to make sure the motion was not lost inadvertently.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No, we are starting debate on the motion.

Mr. McDermid: I am assuming, then, that the Chair has accepted the amendment and we are now debating the amendment to the main motion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) is correct in his assessment of the situation.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the effect of this motion is to hoist this Bill for six months. I was not aware that that motion was going to be moved, and I was rising to speak on the main motion. But I am pleased to participate in debate on this amendment. I think my constituents, at least, will understand the impact it will have on them.

● (1450)

The CHIP and COSP programs were put into effect between 1973 and 1977. At that time I was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the Hon. Barney Danson. I vividly remember working on these programs to persuade Canadians of the importance of energy conservation?

One must think back to 1973 to appreciate the urgency and economic difficulties that Canadians were experiencing with their heating costs. Oil prices were rising at a very rapid rate. Most of us were using oil to heat our homes. Consequently, the costs of heating were becoming difficult to bear. As a responsible Government at that time, we felt it was necessary to convince Canadians to insulate their homes better and to transfer from oil to other sources of energy such as gas, electricity, and wood, which became very popular after this crisis.

The CHIP program which is addressed in Bill C-24 provided grants to homeowners who invested in residential energy conservation. The COSP program provided grants to encourage these same Canadians to convert from oil to other forms of energy. The programs were very successful in my riding and were used to the limit. The riding I represent in the Ottawa-Carleton region is the oldest section of Ottawa and much of the housing was indeed in need of better insulation. Our own house was insulated with newspapers and sawdust which had packed down, resulting in the tops of the walls and the attic being very cold. The problem of insulating against the cold of winter was not addressed because oil was cheap. It cost 12, 13 or 14 cents a gallon so one did not bother with insulation which was very expensive and hard to instal.

The recent decision of the Government to abolish this program is not easy to take. It indicates to Canadians that we have now reached a plateau of energy conservation which we think Canadians understand. It is quite possible that the Government is right in saying that Canadians must now take up their responsibilities and should themselves insulate and, if they want, change from oil to other sources of energy. They should do it themselves. I feel that part of our obligation as parliamentarians is to tell Canadians how we see problems and issues and how better to deal with them.

With regard to the question of energy, in the last 12 years we did a good job of telling Canadians that better insulation would save them money. We told Canadians that the oil crisis which the world has undergone was indeed a serious problem to cope with.

The Government has now decided to cancel these two programs. It has the right to do that since it is the Government. I do not agree, and from the correspondence that I am receiving I believe that many other Canadians do not agree either. The decision to terminate the program causes some difficulties for certain Canadians. I have a letter here from the Electrical Contractors' Association of Ottawa. It says:

> Due to a serious shortage of electric heating equipment, most of which will not be manufactured until late March, it appears that many homeowners who have signed contracts for the conversion of their heating systems will find themselves ineligible for the COSP grant.

That is not the fault of the contractor, or of the consumer. The letter goes on to say:

> We propose that the COSP program be extended to September 30, 1985, a more realistic date, considering the heating season in Canada does not end March 31.

My colleague, in his remarks on Bill C-4 talked about the gas companies which were also experiencing certain problems with installation and conversion. We all know that the ground freezes over in the winter time making it difficult to instal pipes. The electrical contractors tell me that they have had difficulties getting equipment. They tell me that it would be reasonable to ask for an extension of this program until September 30, 1985.

I do not want to take any more of the time of the House on this subject, except to say that if the Government can see its way to prolonging this program until September 30, 1985 it would be appreciated by a lot of consumers and contractors who have applications for the COSP grant for conversion. They are good applications which could save Canadians money in the long run. They should be received and carried forward by these contractors.

Before the Government says no, would it consider that perhaps an extension would be useful? The amendment to hoist this Bill for six months would give the Government time to address the immediate concerns of Canadians in the area that I represent. We have had a hard winter. We have not had the time or the capacity to make the conversions. Please give us the spring and summer to do the work we want to do.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment of the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Centre (Mr. Cassidy) that this Bill be deferred for six months. We have two good programs in place which are benefiting ordinary Canadians, especially those of low and middle income. Of the nearly five million residences that were targeted to use the insulation program, only about 2.5 million have been done. Other home owners have indicated an interest in proceeding with this program after having heard from their neighbours how well it worked.

These programs are primarily aimed at saving oil, and thereby heating costs. The Canadian Oil Substitution Program provided a subsidy to induce home owners to convert from oil heating to any other kind; gas, electric, propane, wood, wind or solar. It paid 50 per cent of the cost, up to a maximum of $800. The Canadian Home Insulation Program had the same goal, through persuading home owners to insulate their homes. We know from our own experience or that of our neighbours how successful that program has been in cutting heating costs, whether it is oil, gas or any other form of heat.

Some Conservative Members have suggested that it is only the rich people who benefit from these programs. Of course, they assume that our Party wants this program to continue because the NDP Members are rich. That has never been suggested before but the fact is that the number of wealthy members for each Party is irrelevant with respect to these programs. According to a Government survey, these programs had no special benefit for the rich people. The effect of the 50 per cent subsidy of eligible costs for conversion from oil and 60 per cent of eligible costs for insulation with a respective cap of $800 for furnace conversion and $500 for insulation means that rich and poor throughout the nation receive an equal share. Furthermore, the great majority of Canadians are not rich and stand to be the main beneficiaries of these programs.

For instance, in my riding of Spadina and where I live in Kensington, the people are predominantly construction workers, building cleaners, restaurant workers, retail workers and tradesmen and tradeswomen of different kinds. Many of the houses in which they live in Spadina are about 100 years old and were built at a time when it was assumed there would be ample firewood from the nearby forests to heat their homes.

One hundred years later, the owners must heat those homes with much more expensive fuel than was available 100 years ago. Those houses are not suited for modern heating methods and, with many of these home owners subject to unemployment—particularly construction workers—these programs helped them considerably in modernizing their homes.

The Government's report has indicated that middle and upper-income Canadians did not benefit disproportionately from this program. Twenty-four per cent of the CHIP dollars were given to the 21 per cent of the eligible home owners who earn less than $15,000 annually. In other words, the greater proportion of money was given to those earning less than $15,000 annually. One must wonder why the Government has chosen to attack those people who earn less than $15,000 a year.

Although the Government says that we must save money, it is throwing money at the oil companies. I will admit that Conservative Members of Parliament have been consistent in some of their election platform when they argue blindly that throwing money at the oil companies will make oil cheaper. However, the experience to support that argument, in fact, has been the opposite. There is no guarantee that the oil companies will reduce the price of oil after the Government gives them billions of dollars. There is no serious control over the price of oil.

However, there are very clear benefits from financial grants for insulation and the replacement of oil furnaces with other energy sources. The first benefit goes to the eight million home owners of Canada, including many low-income and middle-income Canadians. They do not live in fancy condominiums but in many of those older homes which need to be insulated and refitted with a modern heating system that does not use oil.

Why is the Government attacking those people rather than reducing the money it gives to the oil companies? Why does it not reduce the billions of dollars in subsidies that it gives to Atomic Energy of Canada, Limited, which has produced so little? One of its products is a $20 billion debt that is owed by Ontario Hydro. Ontario Hydro, in collaboration with AECL, has produced one of the most expensive energy systems ever heard of. That system has caused electric rates to go up and has increased the debt of the Province of Ontario. In turn, this has resulted in more subsidies. On the other hand, the benefit from oil savings continues for years after the original investment is spent on modernizing the energy efficiency of a house.

People in my riding need jobs, but not jobs drilling for oil in the Beaufort Sea. They need jobs in Spadina where they can be with their families, as has been the case when their jobs have been insulating their neighbours' homes. Employment in the insulation industry has been of particular benefit to unemployed construction workers during this depression.

The oil companies are the ones who stand to lose from these programs which benefit so many ordinary people because they are faced with competition. The Government preaches free enterprise and competition in our country but the oil companies don't like competition and therefore oppose programs like CHIP and COSP. They made an arrangemnent with the Conservative Party before the election by which the Conservative Government would implement programs that would fatten the bank accounts of the oil companies at the expense of the home owners and construction workers of Canada.

This Bill is an example of the attempt to eliminate the insulation program which provided modest jobs for ordinary working people. The remaining market would go to the oil companies who can then jack up the price of oil without fear of competition.

These programs should become a permanent source of employment and conservation for the next several years until Canadian homes have been completely renovated but, given the stubbornness of Government Members, the most we can do is request a six-month hoist in order to give Canadians a chance to make use of this good program.

• (1510)

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act. I have been waiting for something like eleven days for this opportunity to speak. I had planned to speak on the debating habits of this House, how insults fly back and forth and why my constituents back home do not really appreciate it. They are people who are productive. They work hard. They are prosperous.

I would have liked the Hon. Member, whose riding I have forgotten, to be here today to talk about prosperity. He has a riding on the edge of Ottawa. He says his people are poor, that their annual income is $1,000 less than the national average and 81 per cent of them own their own houses. I would like to tell this House that my riding is quite prosperous. The people earn $2,000 less than the national average, but 71 per cent of their own their houses.

I talked to the Hon. Member across the floor and discovered the reason. Part of his riding is in this dream world called Ottawa. Salaries of the people in Ottawa are quite high but the salaries of those who live away from Ottawa are more realistic or in the poorer range. Thus the Hon. Member comes out with a high average. He claimed there are very poor and very rich in his riding.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would ask the Hon. Member to withdraw his comments about Ottawa being a dream world. I represent 80,000 people who live in Ottawa. They do not consider it a dream world. It is a real world for them. Some work for the Government and some do not. I do not think any Hon. Member should make that kind of comment in relation to constituents of another Hon. Member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the question raised by both Members is more a question of debate than a point of order. The Hon. Member for Perth.

Mr. Brightwell: Mr. Speaker, I was talking about the methods of debate and about the insults that are hurled across the floor. I want to speak a little more about this if I may. We have heard words such as "bum-boy", "yes-man", and there is a very derogatory phrase that I hear coming across the floor, namely "Mike the Knife". I dislike that terribly. Of course, we have called Members opposite malcontents and rats. We are going to be careful about doing that in the future—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must ask the Hon. Member to speak on the Bill.

Mr. Brightwell: Mr. Speaker, I will speak on the Bill although I find it unusual in this House for Members to speak on the Bill. It seems that Members speak on many other things.

Mr. Heap: Speak for yourself.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brightwell: I have to sort through my papers, Mr. Speaker, because that comes much later in my speech.

I would have liked to speak about how my constituents feel concerning the way in which we delay items in this House. We are presently in a delaying posture here. The question we are talking about is how the Opposition chooses to delay Bills going through this House and why this should happen when the end result we know is inevitable. My constituents say to me: "You have the manpower; go to Ottawa and make things happen in the House". I hope when my constituents read this speech in Hansard they will understand that the reason we are being delayed is through the use of these funny rules by the Opposition on the other side.

Mr. Waddell: Funny rules?

Mr. Brightwell: I withdraw that. Funny rules is not proper. The use of the rules to delay is what I mean.

I will come to the meat of this debate now, Mr. Speaker. I consider it a waste of time to reiterate the figures about the two programs. This has been done so aptly by other Members. I have a few comments to make. I must admit there are very few comments about the Bill and there are more about the other things, but you have told me that I cannot make those comments, Mr. Speaker.

At least two speakers have spoken about the direct subsidies to home owners and the insulation and home fuel industry. The last speaker talked about the attack on lower income people and how they would like to have jobs created by funds from the federal Government. I believe this is a prime example of the Opposition's fuzzy thinking about governments and deficits. The Opposition believes that if we run up a deficit it does not cost the average home owner a cent. When I wrote this speech, I was thinking about a $30 billion deficit this fiscal year. I know now it is about $35 billion. The carrying charges for that amount to about $120 for every person in Canada for one year. The savings on oil are savings forever. We have heard Hon. Members say that you may save a dollar today and it keeps saving forever. But a deficit of $35 billion keeps costing forever because it is authorized into the future.

No one can possibly say that deficit reduction is somehow divorced from the welfare of every Canadian. My Party, this Government, was elected by the people who know that this is a major problem for Canadians. People know that government spending is out of control. I hope I can say "was" out of control. People want changes and the changes that we propose today are just another step in that particular direction.

I agree with Members across the floor that the programs were successful, and the changes that have occurred since 1977 are a reason for them not being in place any more. There has been a remarkable increase in the knowledge of energy conservation. This conservation knowledge has been applied to new construction. Now about 5 per cent of the homes that are lived in have been built since 1977. That is about equal to a quarter of the ones that have been improved under the program. Along with new structures has been the demolition of many of the old structures, the ones that needed insulation and the off-oil program the most. The energy conservation philosophy is firmly in place and the need is declining. CHIP should be terminated; it is no longer needed.

I do not think anyone has spoken about the costs of inflation or what has happened with inflation since 1977. I took the trouble to look the statistics up. The cost of gas has risen 230 per cent and electricity 170 per cent. Perhaps, as the Hon. Member said, we were so over-charged on electricity before that the costs have not changed very much. Oil has increased in price 300 per cent.

At the same time the price of insulation has increased more than 50 per cent. The buying power of the dollar has decreased quite a bit more than 50 per cent. Thus the $500 grant of 1977 is no longer worth what it was in 1977. At the same time the need to change from oil to other kinds of energy has increased almost three times. The relative value of the grant has decreased to the point that it is almost worthless in the hands of the people using it. Perhaps it is a carrot, but it is not anywhere near the big carrot it was in 1977.

The off-oil program was born when everyone was in the grip of inflation and the great threat of the OPEC oil cartel. This inflation psychology was led by the Government of the day and it led to at least two other unfortunate decisions, namely the National Energy Program that decimated our oil industry and the massive investment by farmers in more land. Let me quote my local farmers. They say "they don't make any more land".

This massive investment encouraged by government and by banks set the scene for the tremendous agricultural problems we have today. I do not want to suggest that COSP was equally bad, only that it was born then in the same type of psychology when the situation was different. We had just realized the energy crisis was at hand. The economy was not yet putting its crushing hand on our affairs. I realize now that I wasted too much time up front, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brightwell: Much has changed. These two programs have been successful. They are no longer needed. The new technology, particularly in the high-efficiency furnaces, and also in alternate sources of energy, will be of greater assistance to our personal economics, our environment and our energy reserves. I am sure this conservation attitude will continue not only because of economic pressures but by choice of responsible Canadians exercising their right to free enterprise.

For the reasons I have outlined, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support Bill C-24.

• (1520)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-24, an Act to amend the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act and the Canadian Home Insulation Program Act. These two programs relate to the substitution of conventional fuels with natural gas as well as to the conservation of energy in the construction of homes. In fact, the entire energy conservation program of the former Government was one of the most successful ever put before any country. International observers, such as OECD and other international bodies, judged that energy conservation program to be one of the most progressive, enlightened and effective ever to be put in place.

We live in a world today in which the price of oil is dropping from something below $29 American per barrel to as low as $22 to $23 in the next three or four years, according to the estimates of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Also according to the estimates of EMR, Canada will be self-sufficient in oil on a net basis through to the end of the century. We have been able to increase Canadian ownership of the petroleum and gas energy field to some 40 per cent.

However, let us think back to the autumn of 1980 and throughout the year 1981. It was a very different world then. It was a world in which our best hope was to be self-sufficient in energy, even on a net basis, by 1995. In fact, that was achieved by 1983 which in itself is a miracle. At that time we talked in terms of reaching 50 per cent Canadian ownership by 1990, and in fact we have come from 28 per cent in 1980 to about 40 per cent today.

We have achieved many of the goals of the National Energy Program as a result of massive exploration and development projects in the Beaufort and on the offshore East Coast. They have been stimulated by the Petroleum Incentives Program and other programs of the federal Government. Equally important, and perhaps more important, is the entire energy conservation program of which COSP and CHIP were valuable parts. There were programs such as oil upgraders to take residual oil in places like Sarnia and Montreal and upgrade it into fuels, gasoline and so on for use in the country and to back out more and more barrels of oil on the East Coast from the fragile Middle East situation and to bring in oil from Mexico and Venezuela. Not only should we look at those plants which were used to upgrade residual oil and to convert it. We should also look at the programs of enhancement and those to upgrade the heavy oils of Lloydminster, the western sedimentary basin, the Syncrude project and other projects in the Fort McMurray area. Certainly we have tremendous reserves in the Fort McMurray area, but I do not think the Government can go at it in the same way as did the Government in 1979 and 1980. Rather than massive projects, we can have smaller ones to bring on stream the tremendous reserves of heavy oil in that area.

To average home owners in northern Ontario a suggestion such as that is rather abstract. It is important and they know about it, but the substitution program is more important to them. In my own constituency bulldozers are at work today on the north shore of Lake Huron, building the north shore natural gas pipeline. This $51 million or $52 million pipeline will carry gas from Sault Ste. Marie to Blind River, to Elliot Lake and ultimately, if I have my way, to every community along the north shore.

There is complete chaos on the other side of the House. The Government is spending some $33 million under DSEP to build a pipeline to provide natural gas to that area. At the very same time money is being spent and bulldozers are moving earth on that project, the Government is cutting out COSP so that home owners in Blind River and Elliot Lake, especially those with low incomes, will be denied $800 grants to instal natural gas in their homes. For persons in the upper income brackets, this will probably not make any difference. They will spend the money and, since they are in high income brackets, they would probably lose half the grant anyway. However, working mothers, widowers and pensioners spending $1,100 or $1,200 per year on heating oil would like to take advantage of COSP. Instead of spending some $2,300, they could have a saving of $800 and spend some $1,500. Over the course of approximately three years they would have enough savings from the cost of natural gas and from the benefits and efficiencies of a new furnace to pay for the original cost of the furnace.

The Government is building this natural gas pipeline and is providing two-thirds of its cost, yet it is cutting the grants which assist low-income families in taking advantage of it. I have indicated to the Minister that it would look better if the Government spent some $33 million on the construction of that pipeline and extended COSP to this coming autumn or perhaps longer, so that people who will have natural gas made available to them in October and November of this year could take advantage of the program. I do not hesitate to call upon the Government to set aside the Bill and to leave the programs in place.

If we look at the Estimates of the Government of Canada which came out a couple of weeks ago, we see a commitment to spend $1.6 billion for Petroleum Incentives Program grants. These grants will be very beneficial to the East Coast offshore, the high Arctic and the Beaufort Sea exploration activities which are taking place and will be particularly beneficial to Canadian-owned companies.

• (1530)

If we have money for the supply side of the energy equation, it seems to me that we should have $160 million or $170 million available for the COSP and CHIP programs. The CHIP program saves us energy and the COSP program saves us oil by converting oil-burning furnaces and industries to natural gas. Those were the objectives of those programs which have been so successful and, in my opinion, should be maintained.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have seconded the motion put by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy), that this Bill be given a six-month hoist. While we on this side of the House recognize that the best thing would be for this Bill to be withdrawn, we also recognize that a six-month extension of the program would be helpful to those people who wish to take advantge of both the COSP and CHIP programs.

It is interesting to see that my colleague, the Hon. Member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Crofton), is present in the House today. I am sure that he received, as did I, a request from the electrical contractors of the area asking that there be a special extension of the program for Vancouver Island. Those on Vancouver Island were unable to take advantage of the COSP program until 1983 because a few years ago there was election talk about the possibility of building a natural gas pipeline to Vancouver Island. Because of that, residents of Vancouver Island were unable to take advantage of the oil substitution program except by putting in very expensive heat exchange pumps. It was not until 1983 that they were able to take advantage of the program by converting to electricity or wood-burning stoves. An appeal has been made on behalf of the residents of Vancouver Island that the program be extended.

It makes sense to me that the two programs should be extended for all Canadians. These programs have served a useful purpose in the past. They are only half way through the objectives which were stated for them at the time they were introduced and I think they should be allowed to run their natural course. Instead of having COSP terminated in 1990 as was planned, it should be able to continue.

According to the Tory Government, these programs are being terminated because Government Members want to attack the deficit. This seems to be the Tory philosophy. However, I question whether or not that is the case. Can it really be that Government Members are that interested in attacking the deficit? If they looked at the economics of the situation, they would realize that the economics simply do not add up.

We can ask about the origin of the word "economy". It means the laws of the household; and another meaning of the word "economy", aside from its abstract meaning, is to effect savings. To eliminate these two programs is to eliminate some very economical measures.

In the speech he made yesterday, the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) outlined some of the economics of the situation. If the Government were really interested in the economy, it would pay attention to what he and some of the other Opposition Members have been saying.

By encouraging Canadians to move off oil, the COSP program has saved some 15.3 million barrels of oil a year. This is enough to heat some 650,000 homes. A great deal of this saving has occurred in eastern Canada where, as we all know, we have been involved in some very expensive subsidization programs because of the cost of bringing in imported oil.

We can look at the economics of the situation in terms of jobs. Between 1977 and 1982, the CHIP program provided some 44,000 person-years of work, 53 person-years of work for every $1 million that was spent. Between 1981 and 1985, the COSP program provided some 16,750 jobs or 30.5 person-years per $1 million that was spent.

We should be looking at the economics of the situation in terms of the best use of a finite resource. We all know that oil reserves will not last forever. We face declining reserves of conventional crude, the cheapest kind of oil we have in Canada. The National Energy Board estimates that by the year 2005, production of conventional crude will have declined to approximately 28 per cent of its present level. Other sources of energy are very expensive and cost anywhere between $30 and $70 per barrel equivalent. The COSP program has been able to save oil at a cost of between $3 and $5 per barrel. Obviously conservation creates the cheapest oil we will ever get.

There are different ways of looking at statistics. The Library of Parliament has compiled a summary which indicates the following:

> Total energy savings in building units which have used CHIP and COSP are estimated to be at least 115,000 barrels per day of oil equivalent. Of this saving, a rough EMR estimate is that 40,000 barrels per day would have been achieved if CHIP and COSP had never been introduced, suggesting that the incremental energy savings which have resulted from CHIP and COSP amount to some 75,000 barrels per day of oil equivalent. This is a reduction in equivalent oil demand of 25 to 30 million barrels per year.

The kind of savings that we have been able to achieve because of these two programs is something the Government appears to be putting to one side. Government Members speak as though the private sector will take up the slack. That is simply not so. A study that was done by Energy, Mines and Resources a few years ago found that in the period 1977 to 1982, CHIP insulation activities constituted 43 per cent of all retro-fitting work done in the market-place; 65 per cent of CHIP insulation activities would not have occurred had it not been for CHIP; 37 per cent of CHIP users would not have insulated at all had the program not been in place, and 75 per cent of all the dollars spent by CHIP users would not have been spent without the program.

It becomes very obvious that the private sector is not going to be taking up the slack when these programs are terminated. We are going to lose jobs and we are going to lose the energy savings that would have resulted. We are going to lose the financial savings that home owners would have gained as a result of these programs.

I would like to remind Hon. Members opposite that any money saved by home owners through these programs will be spent in other sectors of the economy and will result in stimulus to the economy. The last thing the Government should want to see is any further depression of our economy unless Government Members are totally dedicated to following the horrendous example of the Social Credit Government of British Columbia.

We need to emphasize that the private sector is not going to take up the slack. The other thing that needs to be emphasized is that the people who have benefited from this program are not simply the well to do. In fact, a higher proportion of low-income home owners have drawn from the program than have home owners from other income groups.

● (1540)

I urge the Government to consider the motion to delay the Bill for six months. That would allow more people to take advantage of these good programs. In fact, we would prefer it if the Government scrapped the Bill altogether, but a delay would be second best. It is false economy for the Government to pretend that it is attacking the deficit by destroying two good programs which have benefited ordinary Canadians, saved energy, and provided jobs and savings both for the people of Canada and the Government.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on the motion which was moved by the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy). I think the motion deserves a great deal of support as it is in the best interests of Canadians.

In Bill C-24, the Government has brought forward a proposal which will mean that those people who applied for the Canadian Oil Substitution Program before November 8 will be able to follow through with that program even if the work is not completed by the March 31 deadline. However, the work must be completed by the end of June of this year. For those people who did not apply prior to November 8, there is no assurance, if the work is not completed by March 31, that they will be able to receive the benefit. In fact, the Bill states emphatically that if the work is not completed by March 31, the $800 benefit will not be forthcoming. I believe that is extremely difficult for and also hard on a great many Canadians.

The Government has said that if the applicants are able to complete the work by March 31, regardless of whether they applied for the grant before November 8, the inspection could be done after March 31. That is a help. There is no question that that will be of assistance. But what about the many Canadians who applied after November 8? Anyone could say that the reason so many people applied after November 8 was that they either knew or felt that the program was coming to an end. Of course, that would account for the great deal of interest which has been shown since November 8. From October 1, 1984 to February 26, 1985 over 17,900 applications were submitted to Consumers' Gas, in southern Ontario, to convert from oil to gas. However, from October 1, 1983 to the end of February, 1984 approximately 4,500 applications were submitted. There were almost 18,000 applications this year, as opposed to 4,500 applications last year.

With regard to the installation of electric and gas heating systems, there is a tremendous demand to have those systems installed prior to March 31. It is extremely difficult to instal those systems. Of course, some people will not be able to have the work completed and, therefore, they will not receive the benefit of the program.

Difficulties originate in different forms. First and most obvious, too many people have applied for conversion. Second, the weather is not as conducive to installing gas pipes in the winter months as it is in the summer months. Third, at this time of the year the companies who would be making furnaces for conversion to gas are making air conditioners for the summer season. So the companies are now forced to retool completely and change their systems in order to make furnaces to meet the demand. How many furnaces will the companies be able to make when they also have a tremendous demand for air conditioning systems?

Mr. McDermid: Name the companies.

Mr. MacLellan: Name the companies? Just ask them. There are many companies making gas furnaces.

Mr. McDermid: Name one.

Mr. MacLellan: The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has asked me to name one company. He should call Consumers' Gas. That company will give him the names. The opposition from the Government is getting very testy. Which is the Government and which is the Opposition? It would seem that the Government is opposing the will of the people and the facts which the Opposition is providing. The Government is on the defensive. That should tell us something. The justification for terminating the Canadian Oil Substitution Program is not there.

The NDP has moved a motion that second reading of this Bill should be delayed for six months. The Liberal Party has requested that the program be extended for six months. Essentially, we are asking for the same thing, to give people who have applied for the program a chance to have the equipment installed. That is not asking too much.

The Minister has said that there is no need for the Canadian Oil Substitution Program and the Canadian Home Insulation Program. However, the Electrical Contractors Association of Ottawa has indicated that there is a serious shortage of electric heating equipment. Not only are we talking about the installation of gas systems, but there is not enough electric heating equipment.

There is a great demand from many Canadians, especially in southern Ontario, for this program. There are many other areas in the country which are facing the same problem. There is not enough time or equipment to be able to convert from oil heating systems. If the program was delayed six months, that would allow time for companies to manufacture the equipment, it would provide a better time of year in which to instal the equipment, and the applicants could be serviced during that time.

In addition, there is a reduction in the contribution which will be made under the Canadian Home Insulation Program. The Government has reduced the contribution from two-thirds to 30 per cent, effective January 1. Certainly that is not a complete termination of the program, but for those who do not have enough money to insulate their homes, it is a serious diminution of the contribution which they would have received. Essentially, a lot of Canadians are saying that the program is beyond their reach.

The concern is that Canadians should be able to take advantage of these programs. They are good programs. I do not think there is a Member in the House who would say that COSP and CHIP were not good programs. They provided a very definite benefit. As I said earlier, it was not only the $800 which people received under COSP, or the $500 under CHIP, but the information which they received, particularly with respect to COSP. The programs provided information with respect to costs, alternatives, and the standards which had to be provided by the suppliers of the equipment. The furnaces had to be CSA approved. Through the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Government provided a toll-free line so that Canadians could call the people who were administering the programs to get the information that they very badly needed. It was a quality program which helped a great many Canadians. I have not heard the Government say how they were going to give this same information and the same kind of assurance and protection to Canadians.

• (1550)

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on this Bill. I must say I am somewhat surprised that none of the Conservative Members have seen fit to rise on behalf of their constituents to express concerns about the termination of two very important—

Mr. McDermid: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know the Hon. Member would not want deliberately to mislead the House. An Hon. Member of the Government just spoke a few moments ago, the Hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Brightwell). I am sure that the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) would not want deliberately to mislead the House.

Mr. Waddell: He hadn't finished his sentence.

Mr. McDermid: I would ask him to apologize.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) may resume debate on Bill C-24.

Mr. Robinson: I am sure that the Hon. Member who has just spoken would wish to withdraw his suggestion that I was deliberately misleading the House. He knows that those words are unparliamentary and I would ask the Chair to so find.

Mr. McDermid: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not say that the Member was deliberately misleading the House. I said that I know the Hon. Member would not want deliberately to mislead the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the Hon. Member satisfied with that?

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I think the record will show clearly that the implication of the Hon. Member was that in some way I was seeking deliberately to mislead the House. I think he would want to withdraw that suggestion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With respect to the Hon. Member for Burnaby, the Chair did not have that impression. Therefore, the Chair rules that the Hon. Member does not have to withdraw. The Chair gives the floor to the Hon. Member for Burnaby on debate.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, on the point raised by the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid), I would say that if at this point there is a single Hon. Member on the Government side who is prepared to stand and defend this Bill, I would be quite pleased to sit down and listen with care and concern to the viewpoint of that Hon. Member. I would be pleased to defer to any Government Member anywhere who is prepared to stand and defend this Bill at this time. I would be quite prepared to suggest that we adjourn while the Hon. Member finds someone.

Mr. McDermid: You have the floor. Give up the floor.

Mr. Robinson: No one is standing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McDermid: We can't rise. You are on the floor. Sit down and let someone rise.

Mr. Robinson: No one is prepared to rise and defend this Bill.

Mr. McDermid: Sit down and try us.

Mr. Robinson: That is not surprising, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McDermid: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the Hon. Member to resume debate, please.

Mr. McDermid: Sit down.

Mr. Robinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that those Hon. Members will have an opportunity on Monday—

Mr. Gormley: We have somebody standing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Am I correct in believing that the Hon. Member has completed his speech?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: A typical NDP challenge.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Burnaby has the floor.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, this legislation is legislation which is of vital concern to my constituents and to the people of Canada generally. What the Government is effectively doing in this important Bill is putting the interests of the corporate sector ahead of the interests of ordinary Canadians. If the Government was serious in its desire to reduce the deficit, then surely what it would have done is looked at the massive hand-outs given to the oil companies instead of attacking Canadians who are taking advantage of a very sensible proposal to promote energy conservation. I know that Hon. Members of the Government will recognize that what this Bill is doing is effectively eliminating two very important energy conservation measures, the Canadian Oil Substitution Program and the Canadian Home Insulation Program.

We are opposed to this Bill, Mr. Speaker, and I am speaking now in support of the motion put by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy), which suggests a six-month hoist of the legislation. If it were possible to hoist it for six years or six decades, I would be prepared to move that as an amendment. But at the very least, a six-month hoist is an opportunity for Canadians to make their Members of Parliament on the Government side realize that the Government should not be kowtowing to the interests of the multinational oil companies in the way it is.

This important program was introduced in 1980 in order to provide financial assistance for the conversion of heating systems of residential, commercial and industrial buildings off oil to non-oil-fired heating systems. Owners convert to heating by natural gas, electricity, propane, wood, wind or solar energy. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that in my constituency of Burnaby in British Columbia there has been a very successful response to this program. Many of my constituents have taken advantage of the fact that they can be reimbursed for up to 50 per cent of the eligible costs of material and labour for conversions, with a maximum grant of some $800. It was a bitter disappointment to us to learn that the Government intended to eliminate this important program.

I checked back very carefully, Mr. Speaker, to the records of Hon. Members who are now in the Government when they were out in the hustings on the campaign trail. I looked very carefully indeed, but nowhere, not anywhere in the country, did Hon. Members on that side of the House suggest to the people of Canada that they were going to attack energy conservation programs such as the Canadian Oil Substitution Program and the Canadian Home Insulation Program. No, Mr. Speaker, they were silent on that.

Mr. McDermid: Check my speech on that.

Mr. Robinson: The constituents of Brampton-Georgetown apparently were told that their Member of Parliament was prepared to stand in this House and vote for the elimination of these programs. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the constituents of Brampton-Georgetown who are watching today should be aware of the fact that their Member of Parliament supports the elimination of these important programs which promote energy conservation.

Mr. Waddell: Unbelievable.

Mr. Robinson: At the same time, those Hon. Members of the Government are silent with respect to the gravy train for the multinational oil corporations—for instance, the PIP program which those Hon. Members have supported and which they will continue to support. They are in bed with the Liberals on the national energy plan, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McDermid: Get your tongue out of your cheek.

Mr. Robinson: The Canadian Oil Substitution Program was to have run until 1990 but as it stands now it is going to terminate on March 31, 1985. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the axe fell effectively for Canadians on November 8, not just on this program but on many other important social and economic programs as well, including environmental programs, cultural programs and a whole range of other important programs. We have already seen with a vengeance in the Province of British Columbia the kind of restraints which have been foreshadowed by this federal Government. The termination of this very important program is simply a further illustration of the ideological closeness between the federal Conservative Government and its allies, the Social Credit Government of British Columbia.

This is a program which has actually met with considerable success. At the time the program was introduced, the home heating sector was 37 per cent dependent on oil. In fact, according to the officials within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the program has been successful. Almost a million units have been converted from oil to alternate sources of energy. I would note that the program, had it been allowed to continue, would have resulted in over one million homes being converted from oil to other forms of energy. We are saving oil.

The Canadian Home Insulation Program is another program which is being axed by this Government. I note that the existing criteria in fact have been changed recently in a way which is certainly harmful to my constituency in Burnaby. I know, Mr. Speaker, that in the coming days and weeks other Hon. Members on this side of the House will be taking the opportunity to draw to the attention of the Government our very serious concerns about the extent to which the Government has been in bed with the Liberals on the national energy plan and are now attacking important energy conservation programs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the House to proceed to Item No. 175?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Senate Reform

SENATE REFORM

MOTION TO NOTE REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills) moved:

That this House takes note of the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform, tabled in the House of Commons on Tuesday, January 31, 1984.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise in support of the motion that the House take a serious look at the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Senate Reform. As you know, the whole question of Senate reform is once again a hot issue with Canadians. They want change, there is no doubt about that, and we have a very short window within which to make the appropriate changes.

I want to express my thanks to those most recent appointees of the former Prime Minister who have raised the issue anew by obstructing the will of this House as expressed in a unanimous resolution of all Parties. It may well be that we will now have some degree of Senate reform and I hope Members will look at the Special Joint Committee report with a view to pushing the Cabinet and provincial executives towards its adoption. We know the primary reason for those Senate appointees attacking this House was really to get at the status and power of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner). He is, of course, no friend of theirs. Their secondary reason was to embarrass the Government. In fact, what they have done is to embarrass themselves. They have shown their true stripes and as a result we may have a satisfactory conclusion to a selfish act on their part.

My goal today is to urge the Cabinet to use this special report as a starting point. If I had my way, I would ideally like to see a resolution put before this House adopting the regulations and then use Section 38 of the new Constitution Act and put it to the provincial Premiers and legislatures. If they take the report to the people, they may be surprised at just how popular it would be. I also want to urge Members of the House, particularly the hundred or so new Members who, given all the pressures of becoming a new Member of Parliament, have not had an opportunity to read the reports from previous committees of the House on this issue, to have their staff dig out the Special Joint Committee report on Senate Reform because it is a worth-while document.

The committee reported in January, 1984. It was composed of some eight Senators and ten Members of parliament. I was fortunate enough to sit on that committee for the last half of its hearings and the report stage which took about a year to prepare. The committee travelled to every province, each of the two Territories, and over 300 submissions were made by individual Canadians and groups from across the entire country. I believe it is an important contribution to the ongoing process of parliamentary and Senate reform. I may say that it is a practical report because it was drafted by practical working politicians. As such, it reflected the balance which is necessary in this country between the federal the provincial levels, as well as the balance between a lower House which is elected on the basis of representation by population, and an upper House which would reflect the diverse regional interests in this grand country we call Canada.

Confederation was a deal between separate and independent colonies. They came together to form this country and we have done well. But from time to time pressures build and there is a need to restructure the deal. This report by practical working politicians is a basis for a new deal to be struck. I therefore urge my colleagues to take a serious and considered look at the report.

On an over-all basis the committee found that the status quo was simply not satisfactory. Again and again individual Canadians and groups came before the committee and said the status quo is not acceptable. They want change. The majority wanted change in the direction of an elected Senate. The proposal we made would clearly indicate that the Cabinet would have to be more sensitive. If the recommendations of the Special Joint Committee were the law of the land today, we would never have faced the National Energy Program. We would never have faced that first constitutional program. The Cabinet would have to have been much more sensitive to the regions and the interest of our diverse peoples.

As well, Mr. Speaker, the committee found that the role of the Senate would clearly be to represent the regional nature of Canada. We accepted the fact that the lower House would always be weighted in favour of the two central provinces on the basis of representation by population. That was important because we have to represent the majority of the people and the reality is that some 15 million people in this country reside in Ontario and Quebec. The principle of representation by population is one that our ancestors fought and died for and we did not think we should switch from that. But as a counterbalance the upper House could quite legitimately be weighted in favour of the regions and therefore be a proper check and balance to the unreasonable use of the concentrated power of the central provinces in this, the lower House, the House of Commons. That is why we recommended the Senate be elected and that it be a check on the lower House.

Another thing which came through loud and clear during the committee hearings was that Canadians want Parliament to be an important dimension to their lives. People have no trouble at all in wearing two hats in this country. They are proud to wear their Quebec hat or their Alberta hat but they also want to have a Canadian hat. They want to be proud of that Canadian hat. However, under the way Parliament exists now, people in the regions particularly have trouble with their Canadian hat because they do not believe their legitimate interests are represented.

For example, in the west we found, as a result of the National Energy Program and that first constitutional proposal, a real and deep sense of alienation. However, had we had the Senate that we propose, that would not have happened. When we talked to the people of Quebec we found they wanted to be proud to be Canadian, yet they felt that the power of this lower House, which from their perspective is so much weighted to the anglophone population, was such that they did not see it as offering adequate protection to them. Under our proposal they would have that protection. Therefore, everyone can have a Canadian hat and be proud of it.

In my own mind I believe that is the most important reason why we have to change the Senate. Certainly the Progressive Conservative Party, now that it is in power, has Members and Cabinet Ministers from every province and there may be a lessening of the tensions right now. But we want to form a Senate for the long-term good of the nation. To do so we need to have a Senate with the attributes that we recommended for it.

That brings me to the actual recommendations of the Special Joint Committee. As I said earlier, we first of all agreed that the Senate would have to be elected. Indeed, the first sentence of the report reads:

> We have concluded that the Senate should be elected directly by the people of Canada.

That sentence is the result of the hard work done by the former Member for Perth, Mr. Bill Jarvis, who worked long and hard on this committee. Indeed, while he was a Member of this House he worked long and hard for the sake of all of Canada.

• (1610)

As I say, the first sentence in the report says that the Senate must be elected. That was, without a shadow of a doubt, the feeling of Canadians. An appointed Senate today simply lacks the political legitimacy to exercise any authority. In order to have that authority it must be elected. We found that it should come from single member constituencies so that it would be accountable. There is a school of thought in the country that the Senators should come from the multi-member constituencies and that the constituency should be a whole province. The committee found that that would mean that the larger centres in the provinces would elect all of the Senators and the outlying regions would not have representation.

For example, if all of the 12 Senators from the Province of Alberta were elected, they would all come from Edmonton and Calgary. In Ontario they would come from Toronto. Therefore, we recommended that they come from single member constituencies so that the rural, outlying areas in Ontario, Quebec, Alberta and the other provinces would have Senators in the House and their views would be represented. It really is a transfer of power to the people as compared to a provincial Cabinet.

There is also a school of thought that the provincial Cabinet should be able to appoint the Senators to this federal House. Our committee found that that would not be acceptable because, if there is going to be a transfer of power, it should be to the people who should have the power to remove Senators rather than the provincial Cabinet.

The other dimension vis-à-vis provincial appointment, Mr. Speaker, is that if the provincial Cabinets appoint the Senators to Parliament that would, in effect, give them complete sovereignty over the Section 92 powers and half of the Section 91 parliamentary powers. In effect, two-thirds of the power in the nation would be controlled directly by the provincial Houses.

We felt that that was too much of a weighting in favour of the provinces and against that broad Canadian interest which we all represent and which must be focussed here in Parliament. It was not out of a sense of malevolence that we recommended against that; it is just that Parliament should be supreme. We should be elected to Parliament on the basis of a Canada-wide election which should not be weighted in favour of the provinces.

Another recommendation was that the Senate be composed of 144 Senators; 48 from the western provinces, 48 from Ontario and Quebec, and 48 from the Atlantic Provinces and the Territories. We spent a lot of time on that issue. There is a strong school of thought, particularly in the west, that there should be an equal number of Senators per province. We discussed that at length. There are several reasons why we decided that that was not acceptable. It is obvious that having 48 Senators from the west, 48 from the Atlantic region and the Territories, and only 48 from the centre, would amount to an enormous transfer of power to the regions of the country as compared to the present base of power in Ontario and Quebec. That is an enormous shift of power in real, practical, political terms. With that shift of power we would have never had the National Energy Program or the constitutional proposal.

The people who argue that we should have an equal number of Senators per province often use the United States as an example. It is a good example. It may be that if we were starting from scratch and every province was equal and sovereign and we were coming together to form a new Parliament, that may be the negotiated deal. The reality is that Ontario and Quebec each have 24 Senators today. To convince them to go from 24 down to 10 or six would require some consideration. In making a deal they will not give up that power, nor should they. We do not have to get them down to an equal number in order to be able to balance them. Under our recommendation, the weighting in the Senate would be strongly toward the regions.

With regard to the example of the U.S., in spite of the fact that there are two Senators per state, there is not one state in the U.S., including California, that has more than 10 per cent of the American population. However, here in Canada, Quebec has 27 per cent of the population and Ontario has 36 per cent. That is quite a difference. The most compelling reason to me is the fact that if we had a Senate with 10 Senators per province, the Atlantic Provinces and the Territories, with 13 per cent of our population, would have over 50 per cent of the Senators. We came to the conclusion that that would be as bad for Canadian unity and as oppressive as the existing situation is for those who argue for an equal number per province. Therefore, from a practical, working, political perspective, we felt that the recommendation of 48 per region for a total of 144 would be reasonable.

With regard to the term for each Senator we recommended that they be elected. However, we added the proviso that they only be elected once for a single term of nine years. If the report has any weakness, it is in that area.

I would like to explain to Members why we came up with that recommendation, although it could easily be negotiated away. We wanted a Senate which would not be as partisan as this House. We are trying to minimize the effect of partisan politics in that upper House. We could all give examples from our ridings of someone in the community who would be a fine Senator but does not want to be a partisan Liberal, NDP, or Conservative.

We felt that the only way to ensure that the upper House would be a true representation of the regions and a place of sober second thought would be to have Senators campaign and be elected. However, they would only serve for a single term. Some people say that that is a conflict, that if you are elected and never have to stand again you can never be accountable. The reason they would be accountable is that there would be a Senate election every four years. One-third of the Senators would be re-elected from each province. In my home province of Alberta, every four years three of our 12 Senators would have to stand for re-election. Therefore, if all of the Senators were Progressive Conservatives and were not representing the genuine needs of that region, within three years there would be an election and some of their colleagues would be defeated. We felt that would retain the principle of accountability. It would also get away from the problem of having to be re-elected. The minute you have to be re-elected you need a political organization behind you. That necessarily means that our three major Parties would step in and we would have a Senate that would be as partisan as our House here. Our goal was to try to get away from that. We may not have succeeded and there may be other proposals which would be more reasonable, but that was the thinking of the committee and the reason we came up with that recommendation.

Likewise, Mr. Speaker, that is why we wanted the Senate to have only a suspensive veto. We believe firmly that the power must reside in the House. A veto would mean that Cabinet has to be responsible to the other House, the Senate, which is incompatible with our form of responsible government. A suspensive veto of 120 sitting days means about nine months. In politics that is a long time. The National Energy Program took about one year to pass this House. If it went to the Senate and the Senate did not like it, they could delay it another nine months. Cabinet would then have to bring it back and pass it through the House again in order for it to become law. That would mean another year's delay. No Cabinet will spend that amount of time on one issue when they have many other issues to determine. Therefore, the Cabinet would be responsible. A Senate with a suspensive power would have just as much effective political power as one with a veto.

I can see that my time has expired, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion I would sincerely ask my colleagues to dig out our report and take a good look at it. If they feel it has some merit to recommend I would ask them to drop a note to the Cabinet asking it to put it forth as a proposal to the provinces so that it does not just gather dust on the shelves like so many very excellent reports of this House.

Senate Reform

• (1620)

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague, the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker), for proposing this interesting resolution to the House today. It is often the case in Ottawa and in the House that much time is spent producing reports. These are very worth-while reports and are introduced with some fanfare, but after the media gives particular attention to these reports for a week or so, they tend to disappear.

As we know, the current controversy concerns the Senate because of some problems in the last number of weeks regarding a money Bill. Of course, when that happens it tends to attract the attention of many people who have forgotten about the Senate.

I thank the Hon. Member for bringing forward this resolution so that we are reminded not only in the House and the Senate but throughout Canada at large that these very worthwhile reports do exist, especially the one to which the Hon. Member has referred.

However, with the greatest respect, at a time when governments should be devoting most of their efforts toward economic renewal, I wonder if there is much likelihood that the convening of a constitutional conference would lead to a speedy resolution of the Senate question. Can we expect at present that a consensus would emerge from such a conference as to which avenue Senate reform should take?

It is not for lack of proposals or want of proponents that the reform of the Senate may be an uncertain undertaking. Rather, it is due to the differences of opinion which people hold as to what modifications are best, and the problems associated with reconciling these differing viewpoints on fundamental change to the institution of the Upper House may require a lengthy process of intergovernmental discussion.

To illustrate some of the many proposals that have been made in recent years alone, we might recall the report of the 1972 Special Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Constitution of Canada. In that report, the committee noted that historically it has been intended that the Senate's role should be to protect provincial, minority and regional interests, as well as to review legislation in a forum of "sober second thought".

The committee took the view that the Senate required reform, not abolition, given that the reasons behind its creation in 1867 were still present. It recommended that all Senators continue to be appointed by the federal Government, but that as vacancies occurred one-half of the Senators from each province and Territory should be appointed in the same manner as at present, with the other half appointed by the federal Government from a panel of nominees submitted by the appropriate provincial or territorial Government.

The Government of British Columbia recommended in 1978 that the Senate should not be abolished but should be substantially altered. It believed that the primary purpose of the Senate should be to institutionalize provincial or regional participation in the federal law-making process and that its secondary purpose should be to review legislation passed by the House.

It recommended that Senate members be appointed and removed by the provincial Governments, with the leading Senator from each province being a provincial Cabinet Minister. I am not sure that that system would work well.

On the other hand, in that same year, 1978, the Ontario Select Committee on Constitutional Reform of the Ontario Legislature, the Canada West Foundation and the Progressive Conservative Party recommended the abolition of the Senate and its replacement by a "House of the Provinces". The Ontario Advisory Committee suggested that members be appointed by and represent the provincial Governments, and could include members of provincial Legislatures, Premiers or Cabinet Ministers. Federal Government representatives could participate in the House of the Provinces by introducing and speaking on Bills, but would not be permitted to take part in the voting.

The Canada West Foundation recommended that the House of the Provinces consist of provincial and territorial delegations casting a single weighted vote, and that these provincial delegations be composed of Cabinet Ministers and Legislative Assembly members, as well as civil servants. If the Hon. Member had stayed in the provincial House, he might have made it to the Senate.

Mr. Boudria: That's more than I can say for you.

Mr. McDermid: Moreover, all provincial Premiers would serve ex officio as members of the House of the Provinces, with each Premier serving as President of the House on a rotating basis. The Progressive Conservative Party recommended that the majority of members be delegated by the provincial Governments, with a small complement of federal appointees.

The Canadian Bar Association, in its 1978 report "Towards a New Canada", believed that the upper House should be reconstituted to represent regional interests in federal matters. The Bar Association recommended that members of the upper House should be appointed and serve at the pleasure of the provincial Governments while the federal Government would be empowered to name non-voting spokesmen to that House.

We all recall the 1979 Pepin-Robarts Task Force on Canadian Unity. That significant report indicated that a new second chamber should be known as the "Council of the Federation". It would be composed of delegations representing the provincial Governments and therefore acting under their instructions. The provincial delegations could be headed by a delegate of cabinet rank. The Hon. Member from the Ottawa Valley would not fit in that category, that's for sure.

As well, central Government Cabinet Ministers would be non-voting members, having the right to present and defend central government proposals before the Council of the Federation and its committees. The Fédération des Francophones hors Québec, for its part, recommended in 1979 that a House of the Federation be created, with elected members.

The Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, in its 1980 report on certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution, better known as the Goldenberg-Lamontagne report, recommended that although all appointments to the Senate should continue to be made by the federal Government, every second appointment should be made from a list of names submitted by the provincial or territorial Government concerned. The primary criterion would be to maintain a good balance in the representation of different segments of society and of the expertise required for effective performance of the Senate's functions.

If I continue with this, it will show Canadians are right in their observation that all they have done around this place is have reports on the Senate. For example, I could go on to talk about the Quebec Liberal Party, which presented proposals in its beige paper; "A New Canadian Federation".

An Hon. Member: What party is that? Are they still there?

Mr. McDermid: They are still around, I understand.

In 1981 the Canada West Foundation revised its previous position. In 1982 the government of Alberta published its position in a discussion paper entitled "A Provincially Appointed Senate: A New Federalism for Canada".

Finally, I come to the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons known as the Molgate-Cosgrove Committee on Senate Reform, which report was released in January, 1984. That report concluded that the Canadian Senate should be elected directly by the people of Canada. It would strengthen the authority of Parliament to speak and act on behalf of Canadians in all parts of the country.

However, the committee noted that its conclusion was not reached lightly or easily. It summarized the differences of views in these frank terms:

● (1630)

Although a substantial part of the testimony we heard favoured direct election, a roughly equal part opposed it, mainly on the grounds that a Parliament with two elected houses cannot be reconciled comfortably with the principle of responsible government as it has operated in the British and Canadian traditions. Some highly respected people in public life and in the academic community prefer a reformed system of appointment to election. Among this group is one member of our Committee.

Thus I come back, Mr. Speaker, to my original question, after all those divergent views, namely what sort of fundamental reform of the Senate should be undertaken. Is there any way to ensure that a constitutional conference at this time could eliminate forthwith the absolute veto of the current appointed Senate, which is the most pressing concern for this House, and, at the same time, put into place a new or reformed body? I think not, Mr. Speaker, not if such reform is to be carried out in a considered and orderly fashion that allows for a full examination of the different options and the eventual achievement of consensus. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we must first deal with the absolute veto of the present Senate before we commit ourselves to a process of reform which will take time to conclude successfully.

I am hopeful, now that all these reports are in, that this Government will in the next three of four years, once it tackles the depressing economic concerns of this country, take time to examine these reports and recommendations and bring forward a recommendation so we can start the very important process of Senate reform which is so badly needed.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the applause from all sides of the House being afforded me at this time.

An Hon. Member: Only for the moment.

Mr. Boudria: I am pleased to participate in this debate. It is the third such debate we have had in the last several days on reform of the Senate. I was not party to the second debate, but as you will recall I participated in the debate on the motion proposed by the Hon. Member for Scarborough West (Mr. Stackhouse) the other day in which, if my memory serves me correctly, he wanted reform of the Senate, but in his view if we failed to reform the Senate, we should abolish it. I took exception to that remark. In my view in no way should we as Canadians ever undertake to dismantle one of our parliamentary institutions.

We have often said that our parliamentary institutions are in danger right now with the large concentration of power the executive has over our legislative branches of government. It is obvious to me that if we eliminate one of the branches of our legislative part of government, we will, therefore, pass that power on to the executive. We will have more and more concentration of power and that worries me, Mr. Speaker.

We should also remember, as I indicated the other day in a speech I made in this House, that the Senate in the past has been a very useful instrument. It has been very effective. We often measure any form of initiative by any perceived or otherwise efficiency that it may have had or that we think it may have had. We should, however, measure any institution by its successes. I referred the other day to the Parliament that was elected in 1979 which had only two Government Members from the Province of Quebec. One of the two founding linguistic groups of our nation was represented in the Government by only two Members. We had a very difficult situation at that time. Without the Senate it would have been impossible for the Prime Minister of the day to appoint Members to the upper House, prominent Francophones, subsequently being able to appoint them as Cabinet Ministers.

An Hon. Member: Pierre Juneau.

Mr. Boudria: The Hon. Member on the other side will recall that in 1979 the now President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) as well as Senator Asselin and a number of others were appointed to the Senate in order for that province to be represented in the Cabinet of our country. I am sure the Member sitting across from me would be the first to agree that it is important for all the regions to be represented in Cabinet even if there does not happen to be an elected person in this House from a particular province. A province deserves to be represented in government nevertheless.

Mr. Holtmann: Rent a Minister.

Mr. Boudria: The Hon. Member said "rent a Minister". I had nothing to do with the appointment of the now President of the Treasury Board to the Senate at that time. Perhaps he would like to discuss with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) why that individual was appointed—

Mr. Holtmann: Remember 1980.

Mr. Boudria: —which is fine with me. The Member on the other side could bring that up with the appropriate Minister at his leisure somewhere behind the curtains. Notwithstanding that, I for one think it is important for all provinces to be represented in Cabinet. If we have achieved a consensus here today that every province deserves to be represented in Cabinet, then I think we have accomplished something. If the Hon. Member disagrees with that, perhaps he can tell us later that some provinces do not need to be represented in Cabinet, if that is his view.

Mr. Holtmann: I did not say that.

Mr. Boudria: In the last week I received a letter from a constituent. It is rather interesting. It is dated March 8, 1985 and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Boudria.

This sudden resolve of the Tory Government to abolish the Senate is one of the fastest about-turns we've seen lately. It is also entirely unacceptable. The Liberal Party must never allow the Canadian Parliamentary system to be mutilated in this way. The Senate must remain. A one-House Parliamentary system constitutes a serious threat to Canadian democracy.

The Senate does however, need a great deal of reform. An elected Senate, representative of the various regions of Canada, is a very attractive alternative to the present House structure—

With a House of Commons so heavily loaded with one Party, it should be obvious a strong Senate is absolutely required to balance the system.

An Hon. Member: Who wrote the letter? Your mother?

Mr. Boudria: My constituent who wrote this letter will, of course, get a copy of this Hansard, which will include the heckling from the Member who just made that remark. Perhaps it will be useful to assist that constituent in her decision as to whom she is going to vote for in the next election.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: Perhaps some of the Conservative Members do not take this issue seriously, but I think the Member who moved the motion today does. I would like to commend him for the seriousness he gave the topic. I think his exposé was far more representative of how the Canadian people feel than the one I heard the other day when we participated in a similar debate.

I am of the view that the Senate should be elected. I think we should move in that direction. Whenever a Senate position becomes vacant, the position should then be filled by way of election.

One would ask how this could be done at the present time while trying to represent the views of a region or a province in our Canadian parliamentary system. My view is that we should elect Senators at provincial elections. The Province of Ontario, which is the province I have the pleasure and honour to represent in this House, has 24 Senate places. Assuming we use the present system of 24 Senators for Ontario, we should elect half of the Senators at every provincial election. That would ensure continuity in the Senate. In other words, there could never be any more than 12 Senators changing at one time, assuming that every single one would be defeated, which is somewhat unlikely. Using that assumption, that would be the greatest transformation of the Senate at any particular time. If we elected Senators every second election, or half of them every election, which is what I am really saying, we would have a situation whereby Senators would be elected every six years. I remind the House that that is quite similar to the American system.

• (1640)

Let us take the average term in provincial legislatures across the country. It is roughly three years. They have five-year terms, as is the case here, but provincial legislatures tend to have elections somewhat more frequently. I think they average roughly three years. If we average out the situation in the federal House, it is not much higher. In any event, we would have a situation whereby members of the upper House would be elected every six years.

The Hon. Member who proposed this motion said that electing Senators on a province-wide basis would be difficult. I tend to agree with him. We should divide each province into electoral districts for the Senate, in a way which would not be totally dissimilar to the situation in Quebec. As we know, Senators from Quebec represent electoral districts based upon the old system of seigneuries. Of course, that would have to be amended to reflect more clearly population distribution within the particular province, but it would be a good system with which to start.

I feel this begs another question: How would one ensure that the Senate has a federal tone to it in any way, shape or form? Hypothetically, under this system people could elect only PQ Senators from Quebec, which could make it rather difficult to work with the Senate. That would have been the case, especially at the time that provincial Government was elected in 1976. To avoid that, a Party would have to have a minimum number of seats in the House of Commons before being eligible to have candidates for the Senate. For example, it could be 10 seats in the House or some such formula. It would ensure that Parties represented in the House of Commons could run candidates for the Senate, but because the Senators would be elected in provincial elections across the country, the mood of the people of a particular province, when they voted at the provincial level, would be reflected in their election of Senators.

Perhaps this sounds like a simplistic way of looking at the situation, but I have given it quite a bit of thought. I have sat in the Ontario legislature and I am now a Member of the House. I also had the pleasure of serving three terms at the municipal level. I have served in all three levels of government and I have looked at the situation from all three perspectives. I feel this would be a form of compromise to some of the suggestions which have been raised previously.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a Member of this House mentioned earlier there had been a proposal to the effect that the Senate should have the same number of seats, or rather, the same number of senators for each province, since that situation exists in the United States. However, I feel this would be totally unacceptable under the system of government we have here in Canada.

It is quite obvious that Quebec, for instance, would refuse outright to be represented on the same basis as, let us say, Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick or other provinces. And I think Quebecers would have every reason to consider such a formula unacceptable.

As a Franco-Ontarian, living in Ontario but of Quebec origin, I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I could not go along with that kind of system either, because we must remember the history of this country and not just refer to what is going on today. We all know that this country was founded as a result of the union of the United Provinces of Canada—Canada East and Canada West—with the Maritimes Provinces, and that when at the time of Confederation in 1867, under the British North America Act, Canada was united, this was done bearing in mind the differing views in the various regions and ensuring that each region was equally represented. The three regions at the time the Maritimes, Canada East or Quebec and Canada West or Ontario, were equally represented in the new Senate. This was to ensure, since representation in the House of Commons was based on population, that if the population in provinces other than Quebec, for instance, were to increase, Quebec would not lose entirely its position of importance in our Canadian federation. That is why a formula according to which Quebec would have one-tenth or one-eleventh, if we count the territories, of the total number of senators representing our country, would be totally unacceptable. It is important that Quebec should have more than just one-tenth or one-eleventh of our country's representation in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I think it would not make any sense at all to have Quebec represented by the same number of senators as the other provinces. Quebec deserves this special status.

[English]

I just want to draw to the attention of the House that in the last few weeks the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and perhaps some Government Members, although I am sure it would not be the ones who raised resolutions in the last few weeks, were attempting to smoke-screen other very important and pressing problems in the country by entertaining debate and suggesting that the Senate should be abolished. The other day in the House the Prime Minister tried the smoke and mirror act. He tried to tell us that if the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) gave instant, unanimous approval to a proposition to abolish the Senate, he would do it right then. That suggestion was totally ridiculous. That power does not lie with the Prime Minister, much less with the Leader of the Opposition. Since when does Government legislation start with a Bill which needs the assent of the Leader of the Opposition? That is totally unthinkable. Of course, it was not taken seriously by anyone, including members of the press.

It should be remembered that the country is in serious financial difficulty and that the Government made quite a few promises during the last election campaign. I have spent some time in the House reminding the Government of the 338 promises it made to the Canadian people. These problems and the unfulfilled commitments with which the Government of the day is stuck create a difficult situation. The Government is attempting to have debates on issues which focus attention away from youth unemployment, from its past attempts to abolish the universality of social programs and from its other failures in the last few months. This has not worked and it will not work. Only last week the Government House Leader said to the press: "You can't abolish the Senate without unanimity, the reason being that it affects the formula under the Constitution". If we need the unanimous accord of all 10 provinces and both Houses of Parliament, why is the Prime Minister, the Leader of our Government, suggesting that the only thing needed to abolish the Senate, which he did not intend to do to start with, was to move some sort of resolution and have the approval of the Leader of the Opposition?

Obviously the Leader of the Opposition saw through that proposal very quickly. Our Leader understands these issues more than the present Prime Minister, who does not have much experience in the House. Our Leader understood that we could not get away with such a resolution. Of course, the Leader of our Party was Minister of Justice for many years and has been apprised of constitutional issues. Only you, Mr. Speaker, with your objective and non-partisan position, would understand and agree with me, I am sure.

An Hon. Member: He wasn't Prime Minister for long.

Mr. Boudria: An Hon. Member has said that the Leader of my Party was not Prime Minister for long. He will be Prime Minister yet and he will be Prime Minister for a far longer period of time than the Hon. Member's Leader will be Prime Minister.

An Hon. Member: Keep hoping.

Mr. Boudria: He says that we should keep hoping. We know that the honeymoon with the Tories is over. If anything, it lasted too long. The people of the country had enough of the last Tory Government after nine months. It is now seven months that we have had this bunch in power and the people have had it with them already. The people will put up with them for now, but in four years I am sure the Leader of our Party will be Prime Minister again.

To conclude, I want reform of the Senate as do Hon. Members across. Let us do it in an orderly way but let us not focus attention away from the trouble with the economy of the country.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion put by the Hon. Member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) that the House take note of the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform tabled in the House of Commons on Tuesday, January 31, 1984. I am prepared to support this motion, as I was prepared to support the motion put last week by another Government Member, because I think a discussion of the Senate report would open the way for an examination of issues that are deeper than those contained in the report. The report has never been discussed in the House and I think it would be a good thing to have the questions contained within that report raised in the House.

The actual proposals contained within the report are not realistic. If we were to be creating a new country, as happened with the United States a few centuries ago, there might be something to be said for having directly elected Senators from single-member constituencies distributed regionally, one-third from the Atlantic, one-third from the centre and one-third from the west, having them serve one term of nine years with staggered elections. If we were to create something in an abstract way, that might work. I am not sure that it would, but it would be well worth considering. However, we are not creating something abstract. We are dealing with a situation that has been muddled by 100 years of having a Senate that does not work for the majority of the people of Canada.

The feeling across the country toward the Senate is simply boredom. We do not need a second House. The provinces have given up on second Houses. Great Britain seems to be having less and less use for its House of Peers. However, Great Britain is stuck with its House of Peers because its peers are hereditary. The British Government had to do something with those peers so they put them in the House of Peers. Normally, not much attention is paid to them. I do not see any reason to continue the pretence that we in Canada have a reformed version of the House of Peers.

I think that having two Houses simply confuses the public and divides the jurisdictions. We now have constitutional problems between Ottawa and the provinces but to emphasize further a division between the Senate and the House of Commons only makes legislation more difficult to understand by the people on the street and in fact more difficult to understand by those who are making the legislation.

The argument that we need all wear two hats, one Canadian and one regional, is an old argument. In fact, I suppose it was the argument used, in those words or others, when the Senate was first created in the last century. It is a very abstract argument, and interestingly enough it is used principally by those who wish to maintain the status quo, by those who want to keep change limited and by those who do not want any real transfer of power from the wealthy to the less wealthy.

The Senate has been a very good bulwark of the wealthy. Whenever a Parliament, under pressure from the public, puts through legislation to limit the powers of the banks, by the time the Bill gets through the Senate the Senate has enlarged the powers of the banks. The Senate has many ties with the banks. Not all Senators do; there are a few who do not have ties with the banks. However, the job Senators do on banking legislation is certainly very valuable to the banks and very harmful to the farmers, working people and small-businessmen who must suffer the results of lopsided legislation in favour of the banks.

The argument that national unity is protected by a second House has nothing to recommend it. It has never been demonstrated that it would in fact promote national unity. What it does is perpetuate a system in which issues of real importance to working people and farmers are befuddled either by appeals to solve this mysterious problem between the French and the English or between the English and people of other languages or the mysterious problem of the regions. Problems do not get solved by having a Senate; they simply become more mystifying.

This motion calls upon us to examine the Senate Reform report, and I would support the motion for that purpose. However, when we do examine the report, I do not really think we will find its recommendations workable. I think it is necessary to go through those recommendations, find that they are not workable, and then deal with what has for half a century been the only clearly workable solution to the Senate problem, and that is abolition.

Mr. Bernard Valcourt (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to speak to the motion now under consideration by the House with respect to the report of the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform. One thing that struck me is that this issue was not even on our agenda during the last election campaign when Canadians gave massive support to our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and our party. Earlier today, the Hon. Member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Boudria) referred to the 338 promises made by our party, yet none had anything to do with the Senate. On the contrary, we promised Canadians new leadership and that is why, on November 8, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) set a new course for Canada. There was nothing about Senate reform on our agenda because we thought it was a lot more important to get the economy back on an even keel. Then, all of a sudden, Liberal senators in the other place, frustrated at having been turfed right out by Canadians from coast to coast, started behaving like a Government in exile, anxious to thwart the will of duly elected Members of Parliament. Mr. Speaker, that was—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do regret having to interrupt the Hon. Member, but the hour allotted for Private Members' Business has expired.

It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until next Monday at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

The House adjourned at 5 p.m.
