January 10, 1994

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that Their Excellencies, the Governor General and Mrs. Gerda Hnatyshyn, will arrive at the Peace Tower at 14:35 p.m. on Tuesday, the 18th day of January, 1994.

When it has been indicated that all is in readiness, Their Excellencies will proceed to the Chamber of the Senate to formally open the First Session of the Thirty-Fifth Parliament of Canada.

Yours sincerely,
Anthony P. Smyth
for Judith A. Larocque
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

AJOURNMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), moved:

That the Senate do now adjourn until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 18, 1994, at 2:35 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:35 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, January 18, 1994

The Senate met at 2:35 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

The Hon. the Speaker: As there is no business before the Senate, is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada?

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 3:00 p.m., His Excellency the Governor General having come and being seated upon the Throne —

The Hon. the Speaker said:

Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod,

You will proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that it is the pleasure of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada that they attend him immediately in the Senate Chamber.

The House of Commons being come,

Their Speaker, the Honourable Gilbert Parent, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons has elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me. If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and Country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable construction.

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate answered:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's Person and Government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow, their constitutional privileges. I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

His Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to open the First Session of the Thirty-fifth Parliament with the following speech:

[Translation]

Ladies and Gentlemen, Honourable Members of the Senate,

[English]

Ladies and Gentlemen, Members of the House of Commons.

The two and a half years that have passed since I last had the pleasure of addressing Parliament have brought many changes, to Canada and to the world. Our hopes for global peace have been raised and, in many places, shattered. In some countries today, democracy is under stress, its future uncertain.

Canadians, however, continue their unwavering commitment to democracy. Elections in this country are carried out as peaceful clashes of ideas, not of forces. The very fact that we are gathered in this chamber is, itself, testimony to the durability and wisdom of the process by which we govern ourselves.

Once again we look forward to welcoming Her Majesty. This year she will travel to Nova Scotia and the Northwest Territories, and to British Columbia, where she will open the 1994 Commonwealth Games.

[Translation]

On October 25, 1993, Canadians chose a new Parliament and a new government. The Government has made a number of commitments to the people of Canada. They will be implemented.

On opening the first session of this Parliament, and on behalf of the Government, I make the following brief statements of government policy, which will be followed by legislation and other proposals by the Prime Minister and Ministers themselves.

The agenda of the Government is based on an integrated approach to economic, social, environmental and foreign policy.

[English]

In order to achieve this agenda, integrity and public trust in the institutions of government are essential.

My Ministers will insist upon integrity, honesty and openness on the part of those who exercise power on behalf of Canadians.

Specifically, an ethics counsellor will be appointed to advise Ministers and government officials and to examine the need for legislative change. Legislation will be placed before you to increase the transparency of the relations between lobbyists and the Government.

The Government is committed to enhancing the credibility of Parliament. Changes will be proposed to the rules of the House of Commons to provide Members of Parliament a greater opportunity to contribute to the development of public policy and legislation.

Measures to reform the pension plan of Members of Parliament, including the elimination of double-dipping, will be placed before you.

The Government attaches the highest priority to job creation and economic growth in the short term and the long term. To stimulate economic activity, an agreement has been reached with provincial and territorial governments for a joint federal-provincial-municipal infrastructure program. This program will proceed immediately.

The Government will reintroduce the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. The Government will also create a Youth Service Corps to begin putting young Canadians back to work.

For longer-term job creation, the Government will focus on small and medium-sized businesses. The Government will work with Canada's financial institutions to improve access to capital for small business. A Canada Investment Fund will be created to help innovative leading-edge technology firms to obtain the long-term capital they need. To improve the diffusion of technology and innovation, a Canadian technology network will be created. To strengthen research and development, the Government will encourage technology partnerships between Canadian universities, research institutions and the private sector. The Government will also implement a Canadian strategy for an information highway.

[Translation]

The Government will promote better training for the managers of small businesses, and greater access to strategic information on new technologies and new marketing opportunities. The Government will also work with the provinces to reduce the regulatory and paper burden on small businesses and to streamline the delivery of programs.

Job creation and economic growth also require Canadian firms, especially small and medium-sized businesses, to adopt an aggressive trading mentality to take advantage of export markets. With the successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round and the implementation of NAFTA, the Government will assist Canadian companies to translate improved market access into greater export sales. The Government will pursue an activist trade policy so that Canadians may have improved access to expanding markets, particularly in the Pacific Rim and in Latin America.

The Government will ensure greater cohesion of federal activity in international business development and welcomes the agreement of the provinces at the First Ministers' meeting of December 21, 1993, to explore opportunities for reduced overlap and duplication in this area.

At the same time, the Government will promote greater trade opportunities domestically. The Government is committed to working with all provincial governments to eliminate internal barriers to trade.

[English]

Job creation and sustained economic growth require an investment in people. The Government will work in partnership with the provinces and the private sector to help young people to be better prepared for the transition from school to the workplace. The Government will propose measures to improve job training as well as the literacy skills of Canadians. Funding for the National Literacy Program will be restored to its original level.

Canada's social security system must be responsive to the economic and social realities of the 1990s. The Government will announce an action plan for major reform of the social security system to be completed within two years. The Government will work closely and cooperatively with the provinces and will consult Canadians on the modernization and restructuring of our collective social security. New legislation will then be placed before Parliament.

The Government will pursue the fiscal discipline necessary for sustained economic growth. The budget will be tabled in February and will include measures to bring the federal debt and deficit under control in a manner that is compatible with putting Canadians back to work. The Government will work with the provinces to ensure that our shared fiscal challenge is dealt with cooperatively and creatively.

In collaboration with the provinces, and as a result of consultations to be undertaken by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, the Government will replace the Goods and Services Tax.

It will be the policy of the Government to promote sustainable development as an integral component of decision making at all levels of our society. Special emphasis will be placed on pollution prevention and the development of "green" infrastructures and industries and their associated high-technology jobs. The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will be proclaimed.

The East Coast fishery, which has provided a livelihood to thousands of families in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec, confronts significant challenges due to the groundfish resource collapse. The Government, working with industry and the provinces, will help those involved to become self-supporting. The Government will take the action required to ensure that foreign overfishing of East Coast stocks comes to an end.

[Translation]

The Government will vigorously pursue its commitment to strengthen the fabric of Canadian life. The Government will introduce measures to enhance community safety and crime prevention. There will be measures to combat the high level of violence against women and children. Measures will be proposed to combat racism and hate crime. The Court Challenges Program and the Law Reform Commission will be restored. Amendments will be proposed to the Canadian Human Rights Act; and the Canadian Race Relations Foundation Act will be proclaimed.

Canada's universal health care system is founded upon the principles of the Canada Health Act. The Government is deeply committed to these principles and rejects any measure which undermines them.

A National Forum on Health, chaired by the Prime Minister, will be established to foster, in cooperation with the provinces, a national, public dialogue on the renewal of Canada's health system.

A Centre of Excellence for Women's Health will be established to ensure that women's health issues receive the attention they deserve.

Prenatal nutrition programs for low-income pregnant women will be created and expanded.

[English]

The Government will forge a new partnership with Aboriginal peoples, particularly in respect of the implementation of the inherent right of self-government. Legislation to further the implementation of northern claims settlements will be put before Parliament.

The Government will allocate additional funds for the support of post-secondary education for First Nations and will develop an Aboriginal head-start program.

Our cultural heritage and our official languages are at the very core of the Canadian identity and are sources of social and economic enrichment. The Government will announce measures to promote Canada's cultural identity.

The Government will ensure that Canada plays an active, internationalist role in the global arena. In light of the radical changes that have occurred in international affairs in the last few years, the Government will ask parliamentary committees to review Canada's foreign and defence policies and priorities.

This year will also mark the 50th anniversary of D-day, and I look forward, on behalf of the people of Canada, to participating in commemorative ceremonies to mark the valiant efforts of our servicemen and servicewomen who participated in the liberation of Europe.

[Translation]

The Government will work vigorously to fulfil its responsibilities to ensure that federalism meets the needs of Canadians, recognizing that all Canadians share in the responsibility for making Canada work. It will be the policy of the Government to seek to clarify the federal government's responsibilities in relation to those of other levels of government, to eliminate overlap and duplication, and to find better ways to provide services so that they represent the best value for taxpayers' dollars and respond to the real needs of people.

[English]

By working cooperatively to create economic opportunity; by restoring common sense to our public finances; by rebuilding a sense of integrity in government; and by pursuing a positive and innovative agenda for our society, my Ministers are convinced that Canadian unity will be preserved and enhanced. They believe that this Parliament can play a historic role in preparing Canada for the new century to come.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry out the services and expenditures authorized by Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate, Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

The House of Commons withdrew.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the following report concerning the Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1994-95.

Wednesday, January 19, 1994

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present the following report:

> Your committee has examined and approved the Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1994-95 and recommends their adoption.
> The total Senate Estimates for 1994-95 will be $42,014,000. This is the third year during which the Senate budget shows a reduction. In the previous two years, the budget was reduced by 2.5% and 1.9% respectively. In 1994-95, the proposed draft budget is reduced by another 1.4% from the previous year although the workload is assessed to be higher than in 1993-94 as it will be the first year after an election.
> A summary of the Expenditure Budget 1994-95 accompanies this report.
> Respectfully submitted,
> THÉRÈSE LAVOIE-ROUX
> Chairperson

Your Honour, I do not want to talk about the report, but would my colleagues allow me to say a few words of thanks to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Budgets and Personnel, since he will not be here tomorrow? Would that be possible?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I would simply like to express my sincere thanks to all committee members. I will come back to this when we discuss the report at a future sitting.

[English]

However, I should speak English for Senator Doyle. He accepted the responsibility of being the chairman of the Subcommittee on Budgets and Personnel for the preparation of the 1994-95 budget.

Senators and staff who have been attending these sessions in the preceding months, and senators who have previously assumed that responsibility, know that the budget process requires a great deal of patience, devotion and hard work. I should like to express my thanks to Senator Doyle for the excellent work that he has done, the result of which is presented to you today.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with the comments of Senator Lavoie-Roux with regard to the work of Senator Doyle and the subcommittee. If any of you have not served on that subcommittee, I urge you at some time to take advantage of that opportunity.

While the Senate was in recess through the fall period, the subcommittee met on many long days, and it was a hard, arduous task. The previous chairman of that subcommittee, Senator Doody, also knows what I am talking about. Therefore, I wish to thank Senator Doyle and all of the members who worked on that subcommittee. It was indeed tough work, and they have done a very good job.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Lavoie-Roux, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE HONOURABLE JOYCE FAIRBAIRN, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON APPOINTMENT AS FIRST WOMAN LEADER

Leave having been given to revert to Senators' Statements:

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I wish to acknowledge the presence in the chamber of the first woman Leader of the Government, or of the Opposition, in the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, I think we should mark this occasion, because it is the first time that the Leader of either the Government or the Opposition has been a woman. This is, therefore, a red-letter day — if I may be excused the pun — in the history of this institution. I hope that it will not be the last occasion on which a woman will hold this position.

I am particularly happy to acknowledge this historic event today because my relationship with Senator Fairbairn goes back about 25 years, to the time when we both first became members of the Press Galley in the 1960s. I am fully aware of the distinguished role that she has played in her many positions in government: as legislative assistant to the former Prime Minister Trudeau, and as a long-time member of the Senate. I hope that she will have the support of all of us in the Senate to enable her to carry out her new and distinguished role.

In my case, she certainly will have not only my support but my affection.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot tell you how delighted I am to hear those words from my friend of many years — and I do believe, Senator Carney, it might even be more than 25.

Senator Gigantès: Not possible — chronologically impossible.

Senator Fairbairn: I will do my very best to be worthy of the confidence and the kindness that you have expressed today. I am also very conscious of the privilege and the honour that has been conferred on me, as indeed anyone would be in this position. It is the biggest challenge of my life. I will work with every bit of dedication, experience and will at my disposal to do a good and credible job for the Parliament of Canada but, most particularly, for all the Canadians we represent in this chamber.

• (1410)

I look around the chamber today and see how very different it is from the day that I came here in 1984. There are now many more women. I even see an old friend who is sitting in what was my original seat. I refer to Senator LeBreton.

I know that all of us will work together — regardless of whether we are men or women — to make this a place of significance and an institution to be proud of, not just for ourselves but for all Canadians.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

PROPOSED AGENDA

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before Orders of the Day are called, perhaps senators would be interested in knowing what the likely course of business will be.

We have canvassed as best we can what the situation will be in the other place, and what we might expect here. I cannot give any guarantees, but it looks as though there will not be anything received here in the immediate future. Therefore, when we adjourn tomorrow I will be proposing that we adjourn until February 8. I thought I would make this announcement today in order to oblige some honourable senators who may have plans to make.

Thereafter, I expect that we will be sitting steadily for some period. I am hopeful that we can achieve more predictability in our sittings, as Senator Lynch-Staunton and I tried to do last year, and that would accommodate everyone. In any event, we will be working on that. It will require the cooperation of both sides, but I think we can arrive at some arrangement.

In any event, we will be adjourning tomorrow until February 8.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cools, moved:

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Ramon John Hnatyshyn, a Member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, One of Her Majesty's Counsel learned in the law, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

[English]

He said: Honourable senators, it is my great privilege to address you in order to move the acceptance of the Speech from the Throne, read in this house yesterday by His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, the Right Honourable Ramon John Hnatyshyn.

• (1420)

This speech reflects what every candidate in the last general election and every senator heard on the hustings, from voters of every party: a desire on the part of Canadians for integrity in government; for honesty and transparency in what the people are told by each elected politician; a will for the voters to be heard and for elected representatives to be more than automatic supporters of their party's line. No member of this house would disagree with the voters on these issues; neither does the government disagree, for, as we have heard, the government intends to do the will of the people.

On the hustings, candidates of all parties further heard that Canadians want their country to be managed frugally and responsibly; but they also want it to be a land of economic opportunity, a land of hope. And there must be hope for all, for those who have found it easy to hope, and for those whom hope has eluded for too long.

Canadians made it clear during the election campaign that their country must ensure that no one is deprived of essential medical services. The government will preserve the main principles underlying our health system: it is universal, free, portable, accessible and it is publicly administered.

Canada would not be the country it was meant to be if it neglected the poorest among us, those on welfare and the unemployed. Canadians do not want Canada to be the kind of country where young people despair of ever making their way in our society. Most of these less fortunate Canadians want one thing above all: a chance to have a job and the dignity that a job confers. In the Speech from the Throne you heard that dealing with unemployment will be one of the government's special priorities.

The government realizes that this is quite a challenge. At first glance, there seems to be a particularly cruel dilemma. All governments in this country are in debt and spend enormous amounts of their income on servicing their debt. However, every spending cut inevitably causes a loss of jobs. Every person who becomes unemployed and every welfare recipient who is able to work represents an annual increase of $16,500 in the deficit, and thus the debt, of the entire country, for a total of $45.375 billion, an annual amount equal to the federal deficit.

Let me explain briefly how the annual cost of unemployment is calculated.

[English]

Here is how one arrives at the figure of $45.375 billion, representing the total cost of unemployment. Before losing their jobs, the unemployed and those on welfare who are able and willing to work used to earn on average $23,000, on which they paid a total of $6,303 in federal and provincial income taxes, GST, and provincial sales taxes. That $6,303 was a plus figure, written in black ink in the account books of the federal and provincial governments. When these people lost their jobs, they received in UI or welfare payments an average of $13,110. That figure was written in red ink, a loss for government, in other words. That loss of $13,110 was reduced to $10,187 by the total of $2,923 which the average person on UI or welfare pays to the two levels of government in income taxes, GST and provincial sales taxes. This figure of $10,187 is written in red ink in the account books of the federal and provincial governments.

Looking at the state of government ledgers, a plus of $6,303, when the unemployed were working, becomes a minus of $10,187, when they have lost their jobs. It works just like a thermometer. If you go from plus $6,303 to minus $10,187, you have experienced a fall in revenue for governments of $16,500. As governments are in a deficitary state, a fall in revenue of $16,500 means an increase of the deficit and of the national debt by $16,500.

Now there are 1.5 million unemployed. Of the 2.723 million people on welfare, 46 per cent, or 1.25 million, are able to work and want the dignity of working, according to pertinent surveys. Counting those on UI and welfare who are willing and able to work, we have a total of 2.75 million jobless people hoping for a job. Multiply this by the $16,500 deficit each represents for the government, and you reach the total of $45.375 billion. That is equal to the federal deficit.

[Translation]

The figure of $45.375 billion is absolutely correct. It includes unemployment and welfare benefits plus tax revenues foregone by governments, the incomes of the unemployed and welfare recipients being much lower than they would be if they were working. It means, they pay far less income tax and buy fewer consumer goods, which of course has a negative impact on the private sector. I think it is very important to remember that these 2.75 million people who are out of work and who want to work each cost our society $16,500, in return for which they produce nothing. They contribute nothing to the gross domestic product, while when each of those 2.75 million people were working and earning $23,000, they each contributed $23,000 worth of goods or services to the gross domestic product.

[English]

Cutting government expenditures means, inevitably, cutting jobs among public servants, but it also means cutting jobs among those businesses that provide goods and services to these public servants before they lose their jobs, as well as cutting jobs among those who provide goods and services to the government itself.

[Translation]

I think it bears repeating that fewer jobs inevitably lead to less consumption and fewer sales. Fewer sales inevitably lead to a drop in production and an additional drop in employment.

[English]

Less consumption means less production, and that means fewer jobs. Each job lost, as we have seen, adds $16,500 to the combined deficits of the federal and provincial governments.

The other dimension of the problem is that each business which saw its sales fall, because unemployment caused a fall in consumption, tried to defend its profitability by becoming more efficient, by doing more with less, by buying labour-saving equipment. You cannot blame those business people. Any of us would have done the same thing in their place.

Supply-side economic theory claims that eventually — eventually — all this restructuring and down-sizing will produce jobs, because businesses, having cut costs and become more profitable, will be able to invest those profits in new ventures and thus create new jobs; enough new jobs, eventually, to reduce unemployment. Economists who tell me the best thing the government can do is to leave the economy alone because it will eventually produce all the jobs needed have never given me a description of "eventually" shorter than 15 years.

Supply-side economists further claim that government should reduce taxes on business so that there will be more capital to invest; they say that such investment in capital generates jobs, eventually.

Taxes on business were cut and transfers to business were increased beginning in the mid-1970s. The combination of these two measures over the years reduced the contribution of businesses to government budgets from 1.6 per cent of gross domestic product to less than zero — less than zero. In today's dollars, the net contribution of business to government budgets was $11.6 billion in 1975 and was minus $1 billion in 1992. Those figures are in today's dollars.

It is interesting to look at growth of business investment in plant and equipment and compare that with growth of gross domestic product in constant dollars, that is, taking inflation out of the equation. From 1947 to 1975, before the contributions of business to government budgets were reduced as I described them, business investment in plant and equipment grew at an average annual rate of 5.3 per cent, after adjustment for inflation, and the gross domestic product for the same period, 1947 to 1975, grew at an annual average rate of 5 per cent.

From 1975 to 1992, while net business contributions to government budgets fell, as we have seen, business investment continued growing at an average annual rate of 5.3 per cent, a rate that is no faster than before business contributions to government budgets were drastically reduced.

Yet, during the same period from 1975 to 1992, the gross domestic product grew at an average annual rate of only 2.8 per cent after inflation. The extra stimulation of the supply side by reducing net contributions of business to government budgets did not stop the decline in the growth rate of the gross domestic product.

It is important to emphasize this point, because business invested at the same rate, even though its contributions to government budgets had gone down spectacularly, as we saw, from 1.6 per cent of GDP in 1975 to minus 0.2 per cent in 1992. However, the supply-side help to business, which started under the Liberals and was continued by the Tories, did not produce the increase in gross domestic product for which it was designed. It seems legitimate to ask why business did not increase its rate of investment in plant and equipment. Was this because the rate of unemployment was increasing and, therefore, and inevitably, the rate of growth of consumption was slowing down? It would be foolish for a business person to start investing at a faster rate when consumption is not increasing at a faster rate.

When the GDP grows more and more slowly or, at times, decreases, the economy does not produce enough jobs for all those who want to work. There are other factors, such as what amounts to payroll taxes, or taxes on employment.

I did a calculation as to how many hours we should reduce the work week in order to absorb the 1.5 million people on the unemployment rolls. Theoretically — I emphasize the word, "theoretically" — if we reduced the work week from an average of 38 hours to 33.7 hours, with no overtime allowed and with no increase in hourly wages, there would be jobs for all of the 1.5 million unemployed — theoretically. The federal government would see a reduction of its deficit by nearly $23 billion; the provincial governments would see a reduction of their combined deficits by $1.2 billion; the newly employed would consume an additional $8.25 billion. But here is the catch: The extra costs to business for employing 1.5 million more people would wipe out any profit from these extra sales because of payroll taxes, such as contributions to unemployment insurance premiums, to workmen's compensation, et cetera. Therefore, even if we legislated a reduction of the work week —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I apologize for interrupting the honourable senator, but his time has run out. However, with leave, he may be allowed to continue.

Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Gigantès: Therefore, even if we legislated a reduction of the work week from 38 hours to 33.7 hours with no increase in hourly wages — which means no increase in total wages paid by business — business would have no incentive to hire more people. Nor would they; why should they?

[Translation]

Consequently, one of the important measures proposed by this government is a review of the tax system with several goals in mind. Its purpose will not be to penalize employment; it will be to reduce the paper burden of tax measures like the GST for small business; to improve access to investment and research for small business; to improve training of employees and owners of small businesses; to provide special assistance to help these businesses find new markets abroad, and so forth. We all know that small businesses generate the most jobs. This government intends to help these businesses improve their contribution to the economy of this country.

[English]

It is in this context that the government would like to explore ways of converting unemployment insurance into employment insurance; in other words, stop paying people while they do not work, and pay them instead to work, to regain the dignity of work while they contribute not only to their own welfare and to that of their families but also to the growth of the economy. That is the primary emphasis of this government. That is something that will be undertaken with speed but also with great care and flexibility.

The government will be careful. It will constantly and openly monitor its programs, and be quick to abandon those that seem less productive and put more emphasis on other programs that are proving more productive. And, of course, this will be done in non-doctrinal collaboration with the provinces, without petty jurisdictional quarrels that the people do not want.

This government is dedicated to the proposition that the country needs to look at itself anew and determine, in agreement with labour, the private sector, and other levels of government, which level of government can best provide a certain necessary public service at the lowest cost. It should be that level of government that has the fiscal resources to finance the necessary service it provides. It is not a matter of constitutional jurisdiction. It is a matter of common sense.

Yes, like so many other countries, Canada has its troubles. They do not amount to a fatal disease. They can be cured by the dedication of women and men of common sense, whom Aristotle much preferred to philosopher kings.

Clearly, as we saw earlier, predictions of cures did not follow the prescription of what was considered the appropriate remedy. I do not doubt the sincerity of those who prescribed those cures. The cures did not work. There are forces at play that we did not fully understand in years past. The consequences of the free trade agreement with the United States may not be clearly and fully understood for years to come, if only because the U.S. is so much bigger, and its trade policy so much at the mercy of pressure groups. We cannot be sure of any prediction, not even of my past predictions of disaster. The fact is that we share a bed with a very large, if benevolent, elephant. If it rolls over and we are not agile, we become a very flat pancake. We must train to be as agile as possible.

The same can be said of the North American Free Trade Agreement, of the new GATT, and of globalization in which capital that can no longer be confined by national legislation seeks advantages, such as the lowest labour costs. We must not forget that countries where labour costs are low are often also countries that do better than we do in turning out people with better mathematical, scientific and even linguistic skills at the end of high school. Meeting the challenge of these hard-working and intelligent nations is part of our being more agile.

A newspaper article this past weekend said that our Prime Minister aspires to fixing the plumbing rather than building pyramids. I should like to remind honourable senators that the pyramids were tombs. This government simply plans many reasonable, open and measured actions to make the country better and make us all feel better about this wonderful country of ours — many actions in amicable collaboration with other governments and all citizens; all the actions that are needed to serve Canada well.

Honourable senators, you all have an important role to play in nurturing our country which you love, as I do, more than it is possible to say.

[Translation]

We all have a role to play in improving the well-being of a country we all love. That is what our fellow citizens want, and we are their servants. Is this a grand design for our society? Of course. A society's well-being is the best grand design there is.

[English]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I rise to second this motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Cools: Before doing so, I would like to add my voice to the many who have congratulated Senator Fairbairn, Senator LeBlanc and the new leadership of the opposition. I wish them well. I congratulate Senator Fairbairn on becoming the Leader of the Government in the Senate; historically the first woman to do so. I also congratulate Senator LeBlanc on becoming Speaker.

With respect to both Senators Fairbairn and LeBlanc, I wish to say that they are certainly, in my view, very worthy human beings. They have served our side and this country well, tirelessly, and willingly in many different roles for a long, long time. I look forward to serving with them for a another long time, particularly on this side of the chamber.

Honourable senators, I wish to proceed now by saying that in this, the Thirty-fifth Parliament of Her Majesty in Canada, we Senate Liberals, supporting the government in the Senate, will have as our primary goal the implementation of the government's program as outlined yesterday by His Excellency the Governor General. Our support will proceed in this chamber in accordance with the historical and constitutional role of the Senate as the upper chamber in this our bicameral system of Parliament.

Our Liberal senators will review, study, and support those matters placed before us with due diligence. Our instruments will be the principles of Liberalism that have served Canada for many years, to the point that Canadian history is largely intertwined with the history of the Liberal Party of Canada.

Canada as a concept and Canada as a country has possessed the minds of many great Liberals. One of those was the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King. In 1948, Mr. King, speaking at a national Liberal convention, described the conditions of the Liberal Party when he became its leader in 1919. He described the Liberal Party's historic defeat in 1911 after 12 successive years in government. He described the enormous division in the party on the issue of reciprocity during that election. He also described the following electoral defeat in 1917, when again the Liberals met with another historic defeat.

The problems facing Mr. King and facing the Liberal Party at that time seemed insurmountable. Mackenzie King, and I would ask you to note that he was speaking in 1948, had this to say:

> Such was the position of the party when I was chosen its leader on August 7, twenty-nine years ago. It was a party which had been out of office for eight years; a party which had become sharply divided at a time of war; a party which had lost the great chieftain who, for over thirty years, had been its unchallenged leader; a party which was in a minority in both Houses of Parliament. In its ranks there were still enmities and divisions. A third political party — the Progressive Party, with a program largely Liberal in its inspiration — had come into being and was a rival of the Liberal Party for power. The country itself was unsettled. Still all too visible were the cleavages of opinion which, over the conscription issue, had threatened to destroy the Unity of Canada. I myself, as a Laurier Liberal, had been defeated in North York in 1917 and was without a seat in Parliament. When I was chosen leader of the party it was said by my opponents, and by some others, that I would not last long in that position.

Canada now has a new Liberal Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Jean Chrétien, who on his election to the leadership of the Liberal Party in 1990 faced much adversity, as Mr. King did in 1919.

About the Liberal Party leader, Mr. Chrétien, on his election to the leadership in 1990, it was said that he too would not last long in that position. Some of his detractors predicted his quick and early exit from politics, and many of them were quite ready to facilitate his departure.

In 1984, Mr. Chrétien ran unsuccessfully for the leadership of the Liberal Party. At that convention, the musical accompaniment to his grand entry into the stadium was the theme music from a film called Chariots of Fire. The words "chariot of fire" are borrowed from a hymn called Jerusalem, whose words were authored by William Blake and later put to music by Sir C. Hubert H. Parry. The relevant verse containing the term "chariot of fire" reads as follows:

> Bring me my bow of burning gold!
> Bring me my arrows of desire!
> Bring me my spear! O clouds, unfold!
> Bring me my chariot of fire!
> I will not cease from mental fight,
> Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
> Till we have built Jerusalem
> In [this our] green and pleasant land.

These words reflect on and relate the human struggle on earth for the heavenly Jerusalem, termed "the City of God" and that human journey which is tried in fire. I have always pondered why Mr. Chrétien chose that piece of music in 1984; and now, ten years later, in 1994, I fully understand and it all seems perfectly natural.

How fitting his choice was then and now. How fitting it was as the current era, assisted by the government recently in power, discredited politics and politicians. How entirely appropriate when looking at life from the opposition benches these past nine years. How appropriate as we Liberals looked at despair, degradation, bitterness and anger across this land as the government ruled with disregard and even malice for many citizens. That government ruled, headed by a reincarnated sorcerer's apprentice.

Many of us agonized as we witnessed the dismantling of this country and the abandonment of principle. That government ruled and sustained itself by engaging in the darker sides of the human persona. That government ruled by unleashing impulses in the human organism that are largely ungovernable, impulses which, since recorded history, religion has sought to improve and correct, legislation has sought to limit, and education has sought to overcome by instruction. That government ruled by engaging the forces of humans' lower nature that usually governments seek to contain.

That government ruled by engaging the psychodynamics of greed, jealousy, prejudice, division, racism and regionalism, traits that years of Liberal enlightenment, Liberal principle and Liberal humanity had sought to tame. Pandora was surpassed.

Deception was their hallmark. That government demonstrated repeatedly that the human psyche is an "artful dodger" when prejudice paraded as conviction, greed paraded as political philosophy, spitefulness paraded as justice, and human weakness paraded as party discipline.

• (1500)

A sorcerer's apprentice with his unchecked libido dominandi, to use St. Augustine's term for the drive to dominate, the lust for power, headed a government for many years. This libido dominandi was the engine which drove that of his closest supporters and at strategic times enlisted the libido dominandi of the general population. He dabbled in the recesses of people's minds, in areas which escape detection, in the pre-rational areas of which few have consciousness and few can identify, and even fewer understand. Such was the lust for domination working in the "Directing Mind" of this country; and today such is the consequent damage inflicted on the body psyche, the body politic, the body economy, and the body social of this country. Many were compromised. Many were affected. Many were degraded.

I have now observed that one dimension of this libido dominandi is now identified in the journalistic lexicon as "rolling the dice". It has been said that the unreflective mind is unreliable, and that the nonintrospective personality is untrustworthy.

Honourable senators, it is not my intention to disparage anyone today, but simply to bear personal witness to the past nine years as I have observed from the opposition benches in this Red Chamber. I am very proud to be associated with the great defences of Canada and liberalism that were undertaken by the Liberal senators in this chamber led by the Honourable Senators MacEachen, Frith, and others.

Prime Minister Chrétien entered politics under the leadership of the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson in 1963. He was largely influenced by the liberalism and modus operandi of Mr. Pearson. Mr. Pearson was renowned at home and abroad in his personal and professional life for his insistence "...upon integrity, honesty, and openness on the part of those who exercise power." In 1962, the politician Pearson wrote as follows:

> Liberalism must strive to foster all those forces in a nation which will make for true development in other than material ways: the willingness to work and serve and sacrifice to achieve ends that are outside of self; appreciation of the beautiful and the good in life; understanding that bread and circuses are not the ultimate objective of existence, either national or personal; recognition that a society is only as strong as its adherence to moral values.

I repeat that a society is only as strong as its adherence to moral values.

Mr. Pearson's remarkable words are those of fundamental human sensibility and decency. This is the political position on which Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and the Liberal government are now standing firmly, and which was articulated in the Throne Speech yesterday. Many Liberals have subscribed to this sense of moral value as a building block of political principle and political action. Further, this Liberal principle as articulated by Pearson has been enunciated repeatedly by many, including Aristotle and St. Thomas Aquinas. In St. Thomas Aquinas' Summa Theologia, he says:

> Planning for the general good belongs to the people as a whole or to someone representing them, since those pursuing the goal must do the planning for it. "The aim of legislation," according to Aristotle, "is the fostering of virtue."

I should like to repeat that, honourable senators.

> The aim of legislation is the fostering of virtue.

Honourable senators, let us put on the record today some thoughts on Liberalism, using the words of some of the masters of Liberalism. In the 1960's, the Honourable J.W. Pickersgill said:

> The first principle of Liberalism is that the state and government exist to serve man and not man to serve the state. The second principle of Liberalism is that the family is the foundation of human society and that it is the duty of all governments to promote the welfare of the family and the sanctity of the home. The third principle of Liberalism is that self-government provides the best assurance that the state will, in fact, promote the welfare of the individual and the family.

The Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, whose father and grandfather both were Methodist ministers, had the following to say on Liberalism:

> The fundamental principle of Liberalism, the foundation of its faith, is belief in the dignity and worth of the individual. The state is the creation of man, to protect and serve him; and not the reverse.

And:

> The Liberal purpose remains the creation of opportunity for men and women to become self-directing, responsible citizens. This means, as we have seen, the simultaneous pursuit of freedom and welfare...
> In Canada, Liberalism has meant the evolution of political democracy; the removal of privilege, discrimination, and class distinction; the building of a society based on equality of rights and opportunities for all its members. It has included the struggle for national freedom, a struggle whose success has helped to bring about a great free community of an importance extending far beyond the borders of the countries concerned: the reconciliation of national independence with the close and friendly association of free states in a Commonwealth of Nations.

The Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, a Nobel Peace Prize recipient, was internationally acclaimed for his and Canada's contribution during the Suez Crisis. Remember, honourable senators, that it was 1962 when Mr. Pearson wrote much of this. He said:

> The history of the Liberal Party in Canada is also the story of the search —

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret that I must interrupt the honourable senator, but I am informed that her time has expired. Perhaps there would be leave for her to conclude.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Cools: Thank you, honourable senators. I appreciate this very much.

Mr. Pearson said:

> The history of the Liberal Party in Canada is also the story of the search for security and welfare for all men and women in a society where activity is increasingly centred in huge corporate organizations and where the individual is increasingly at the mercy of forces which he cannot control and which he often cannot even understand.

He continued:

> Liberalism stands for the middle way: the way of progress. It stands for moderation, tolerance, and the rejection of extreme courses whether they express themselves in demands that the state should do everything for the individual, even if it means weakening and destroying him in the process, or in demands that the state should do nothing except hold the ring so that the fittest survive under the law of the jungle.

Later, he added:

> The Liberal Party is opposed to the shackling limitations of rigid political dogma, or authoritarianism of any kind, which is so often the prelude to oppression and exploitation. It fights against the abuse of power either by the state or by persons or groups within the state. It recognizes the special danger of such abuse in an age of massive concentration of wealth and economic power and of "bigness" of all kinds. Liberalism must protect the right of every man to live his own life, in creative freedom, in the midst of all this "bigness" and the pressures that follow from it.

And finally, in the words of Mr. Pearson:

> ...the Liberal Party favours social and economic planning which will stimulate and encourage private enterprise to operate more effectively for the benefit of all.

• (1510)

Honourable senators, it is very well known historically that principles and moral beliefs fare best and flourish when they enjoy the protection and patronage of the rulers of society. The Right Honourable Jean Chrétien is now the steward of an enormous heritage of Liberal principles and history. He has pledged fealty to Mr. Pearson's concept of government as moral.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien has declared himself happily and enthusiastically to be the steward and protector of our Liberalism. He has committed himself, his ministers, his senators, and his members in the other place to this program, as outlined in the Throne Speech yesterday, and I shall repeat that sentence already quoted from the Throne Speech: "My Ministers will insist upon integrity, honesty and openness on the part of those who exercise power."

Prime Minister Joseph Jacques Jean Chrétien, a native son of Quebec, a boy, a man, a person from Shawinigan, who, molded by the Liberalism of the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, is also deeply attached to the Liberalism of the great chieftain, the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

I observed, during the election campaign, that Mr. Chrétien repeatedly quoted three famous lines from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's well-known speech of 1877 in Quebec City. Those oft-quoted lines are: "I am a Liberal. I am one of those who think that everywhere, in human things, there are abuses to be reformed, new horizons to be opened up, and new forces to be developed."

Honourable senators, I have frequently noticed that while many people quote those three lines, no one ever seems to know what comes before or what comes after. I thought for the purpose of today's record, in the hope that many diligent young people and students will be reading this record some day, I should put that on the record.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> Certainly, I am far from blaming my adversaries for their convictions, but for my part, as I have already said, I am a Liberal. I am one of those who think that everywhere, in human things, there are abuses to be reformed, new horizons to be opened up, and new forces to be developed. Moreover, Liberalism seems to me in all respects superior to the other principle. The principle of Liberalism is inherent to the very essence of our nature, to that desire of happiness with which we are all born into the world, which pursues us throughout life and which is never completely gratified on this side of the grave. Our souls are immortal, but our means are limited. We constantly gravitate towards an ideal which we never attain. We dream of good, but we never realize the best. We only reach the goal we have proposed to ourselves, to discover new horizons opening up, which we had not before even suspected...This condition of our nature is precisely what makes the greatness of man, for it condemns him irrevocably to movement, to progress: our means are limited, but our nature is perfectible and we have the infinite for our arena.

Canada is a vast country and known to be difficult to govern. In 1867, when the Fathers of Confederation chose to call Canada a Dominion, and when Sir John A. Macdonald and others chose to adopt the phrase "from sea to sea," they borrowed from one of the only two psalms attributed to Solomon, Psalm 72, verse 8: "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth."

Just as the psalmody was the bread of comfort for the early Christian monks in the wilderness of the desert, for us, as Liberals, this body of ideas and beliefs was our bread in the wilderness of the past nine years. During this country's adversity and insecurity of the last nine years we were sustained by the strength of our souls and by the strength of the convictions I have spelled out today. We were also sustained by the strength of the conviction that we would be on this side again, too.

Prime Minister Chrétien was called to serve as leader of the Liberal Party during those years in the wilderness. He has ably demonstrated his fortitude and his devotion in the face of enormous personal tribulation and daunting political adversity. As Prime Minister, he has manifested his conviction in the time-tested, long-enduring concept of the leader as servant. "He serves most who leads." He must serve the most who is the leader. He is one of a long line of international Liberals, including William Wilberforce, William Ewart Gladstone, Herbert Henry Asquith, David Lloyd George, and one of a long line of Canadian Liberals such as George Brown, Edward Blake, Sir Alexander MacKenzie, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, William Lyon Mackenzie King, Louis St. Laurent, Lester B. Pearson, Pierre Elliott Trudeau and John Napier Turner. We Senate Liberals are all joined and connected to them.

Prime Minister Chrétien and his ministry, now in the flush of triumph, with revived courage and renewed confidence, meet Parliament in the name of Her Majesty and the people of Canada; and they have placed the government plan before us. As we support the government plan of action and program of legislation and administration, and as we endeavour to bring this program into action and into law, I do believe that, with Prime Minister Chrétien, as Liberal senators "our swords shall not sleep in our hands."

Honourable senators, this is our pedigree, this is our history. We shall be known by our difference as we endeavour to return dignity to public service, humanity to government, stability and security to the economy, and confidence to the hearts and minds of people. Honourable senators, we place our program before this chamber and ask all honourable senators to support it.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

On the Order:

> That, pursuant to rule 86(1), the Honourable Senators Corbin, Doyle, Hébert, Kinsella, Lewis, MacDonald (Halifax), Neiman, Petten and Phillips be appointed a Committee of Selection to nominate (a) a senator to preside as Speaker pro tempore; and (b) the senators to serve on the several select committees during the present session; and to report with all convenient speed the names of the senators so nominated.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it never occurred to me that I would have had to rise yesterday to move the adjournment of the debate on this item, particularly given the circumstances under which we were sitting; but, had the motion gone through, we would have broken at least two precedents here and set a very dangerous one.

On November 13, 1984, when the Senate was faced with a similar situation, that is, a party with a majority in the House of Commons and in the minority here, Senator MacEachen, who was then the Leader of the Opposition, made the following statement:

> Every legislative assembly in our system operates on the majority principle, and the Senate is no exception. The majority will decide; the majority will prevail.

In 1988, we had the same situation. In 1984, the Committee of Selection was made up of five Liberals, three Conservatives and one independent. And in 1988, with again a Conservative majority in the House of Commons and a Liberal majority in the Senate, the Committee of Selection was made up of five Liberals and four Conservatives.

It is only natural that on questions such as these the leadership get together to have discussions to see whether some common ground can be arrived at and then to bring the fruit of their discussions to their respective caucuses for approval, change or modification.

Certainly, in our case, whenever these meetings are held, I make it clear, at least I hope I do, that depending on the item, whatever my personal view, only the caucus can decide; and certainly in this case that is the attitude we took.

The discussions that we had on this item led me to believe that we would follow the precedent that was set in 1984, and which continued in 1988. After hearing yesterday's motion, it was obvious that the Liberal caucus had decided to reject past history and to establish a precedent of its own: That is to say, no matter what the numbers in the Senate are, as long as the Liberal Party forms the government it must control everything.

I am wondering, then, if we are to assume that when Senator MacEachen talked about the majority deciding, he really meant only the Liberal majority which, today, means a Liberal minority. Or has the Liberal caucus, perhaps, decided that because the Progressive Conservative Party has lost its official status in the House of Commons, it can simply be ignored and dismissed as irrelevant in the Senate?

Let us hope that a steamroller tactic is not being initiated here, and that it will not be the main tool of our friends opposite in this new Parliament. If it is, then it is certainly a bizarre interpretation of what the Throne Speech referred to as "enhancing the credibility of Parliament."

In my reply to the Speech from the Throne I will elaborate on our party's understanding of its role in this place. Suffice it to say today that whatever its representation in the House of Commons, ours is the only other national party to which Canadians can turn. Some 2 million voters, or 16 per cent of those who went out to vote, gave it their support last October. That is more than that which was given to the separatists who form the official opposition in the House of Commons.

This party is present in every province of our country. It has a long and proud history. Because our electoral system does not translate popular support into seats on an equivalent basis is no reason to conclude what some are trying to make us believe: that the PC Party no longer exists. Far from it, honourable senators, let me assure you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If we are to conclude that this is the purpose of the motion, then are we to conclude also that independent senators become irrelevant because there is only one independent member in the House of Commons?

Honourable senators, this house has its own rules and traditions. Whether or not they are similar to those in the House of Commons is of no consequence. The issue here is simple: Do we respect what Senator MacEachen said about the majority deciding, the majority prevailing, or do we here on this side abdicate our responsibilities and simply hand over the running of this place to a minority group of senators, simply because they are members of the government party?

As far as we are concerned, the answer is obvious. Accordingly, I wish to move an amendment to Senator Molgat's motion.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): I move, seconded by Senator Berntson:

> That the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by deleting the name of the Honourable Senator Neiman and by adding the name of the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, and by deleting the name of the Honourable Senator Doyle and by adding the name of the Honourable Senator Robertson.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

> That, pursuant to rule 86(1), the Honourable Senators Corbin, Doyle, Hébert, Kinsella, Lewis, MacDonald (Halifax), Neiman, Petten and Phillips be appointed a Committee of Selection to nominate (a) a senator to preside as Speaker pro tempore; and (b) the senators to serve on the several select committees during the present session; and to report with all convenient speed the names of the senators so nominated.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Berntson:

That the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by deleting the name of the Honourable Senator Neiman and by adding the name of the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, and by deleting the name of the Honourable Senator Doyle and by adding the name of the Honourable Senator Robertson.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, one thing on which I agree with Senator Lynch-Staunton right from the start is that I, too, did not believe that my first comments in the Senate in this new session of Parliament would be devoted to the question of the Committee of Selection.

First, I should like to answer three questions posed by the honourable senator in his remarks. He asked whether senators on his side of the house are irrelevant. The answer is: certainly not. He asked whether the independent senators are irrelevant. The answer is: certainly not. He asked whether the majority in this chamber prevails: The majority definitely prevails.

The motion we introduced yesterday, to which Senator Lynch-Staunton has proposed an amendment, is straightforward. It calls for the establishment of a Committee of Selection made up of nine senators — five Liberals and four Conservatives. The amendment just moved would make the composition of the committee five Conservatives and four Liberals.

Although our motion was in itself clear, the reasons for the wording of the particular motion may not be clear to all honourable senators. It is true that, over the last several years since I have been here, the majority party in the Senate has had the majority on the Committee of Selection. This occurred when we began our sessions in 1984, 1986, 1988 and 1989. Honourable senators will remember a slight blip in 1991 as we began the Third Session of the 34th Parliament. The government was given a majority on the Committee of Selection even though at that time it had a plurality rather than a majority in the Senate. That is the recent history on this particular subject.

The motion before us, as originally moved, takes a different approach. It seeks a majority on the Committee of Selection on behalf, not of the majority party in this place but of the party which forms the government of Canada. Yes, we are a minority in this house.

Senator Lynch-Staunton said something at the beginning of his remarks to the effect that these matters are discussed and, in the end, we speak as a reflection of the views held within our caucuses. He does that, as do I. In this sense, it was the view of our caucus that the motion put forward yesterday reflected the nature of a different political situation in which we find ourselves.

In the other place, there has been a major realignment of political parties. That realignment — perhaps one of the most different and dramatic in the history of our country — occurred as a direct result of Canadians voting in an election. Obviously, it is a realignment that is not reflected in this chamber. Perhaps this is one of the areas about which we will have discussions and, perhaps, legitimate arguments.

In the Senate there is no representative of the official opposition in the House of Commons. For that matter, there is no representative of the other recognized opposition party, or of the NDP. However, with respect to the NDP, that is something we are accustomed to in this place.

It was argued by Senator Lynch-Staunton that there was a similar situation in 1984 when the Liberals retained their majority in this chamber following the massive majority government which was won by the Conservative Party at the polls. However, there is a difference.

In 1984, the Liberal Party emerged from the election as the party chosen by the people to be the official opposition — that is, the alternative to the government. Following the 1993 election, the official opposition is a party which has not a single member in this house.

After the 1984 election, those senators who supported the new government then did not seek the majority on the Committee of Selection. That was their decision at the time. The mandates given in 1993 to the two parties represented in this house now are very different from what they were in 1984. It is our view that this cannot be completely ignored. Although we operate independently from the House of Commons, we cannot ignore the electoral realities that shape that house. We do not operate in complete isolation from it. The motion we moved for this Committee of Selection reflects that view.

The supporters of the government are, in effect, making a proposal to the Senate. We believe that it is the government's role and its task to make proposals as to what the Senate might do. There is consultation and negotiation between us on all of these matters — and there must be. Obviously, the Senate as a whole, on this motion as on all other motions, will accept or reject what is proposed. The preference of the majority will indeed prevail.

This move in the last two days has not been intended in any way — and I wish to emphasize that — as a signal of confrontation or of steamrolling. Quite the contrary. It is our hope — and I said this earlier today — that we can work in this Parliament with a high degree of cooperation not only in terms of our legislative responsibilities but also, as we began today, on any initiatives that we may take on important matters of public policy that need the kind of forum the Senate of Canada can provide. We want to make Parliament and this particular institution as effective, as productive, and as responsive as possible.

Honourable senators, we are very aware of the party standings in this chamber. The motion to establish the Committee of Selection is one of the first actions taken by the Senate since the election. This particular motion, honourable senators, was intended as a small reflection of changes that have taken place in the political landscape.

As is the custom in this house, honourable senators will make the decision. It is our view that it would be quite appropriate for that decision to be made today.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT ADOPTED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

MOTION, AS AMENDED, ADOPTED

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion as amended?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): On division.

Motion, as amended, adopted, on division.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, January 20, 1994.

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE DOUGLAS D. EVERETT

RESIGNATION FROM SENATE—ANNOUNCEMENT AND TRIBUTES

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I rise to announce my resignation as a senator effective as of today's date. I have nine years left before mandatory retirement, but I have decided that I cannot devote the time that I believe will be necessary to this chamber, and the time has come to make way for someone else.

First of all, let me congratulate you, Your Honour, on your appointment as Speaker, Senator Fairbairn on her appointment as Leader of the Government, and Senator Lynch-Staunton on his appointment as Leader of the Opposition. I hope those appointments herald a spirit of cooperation in the Senate.

While I am not against partisanship — indeed that is the lifeblood of politics and I would prefer to see an elected Senate — I believe that the committee system of this chamber is its heart and soul, both in its legislative capacity and in its investigative capacity. For it to work, that system requires the good will and cooperation of senators to get the job done.

I chaired the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance of this chamber for a number of years. I believe we were a respected voice in economic affairs in this country. We published several reports on effectiveness and efficiency in government departments and programs. Those reports were largely implemented by the departments involved. It is interesting to note that, despite the fact that we were investigating departments whose budgets were in the hundreds of millions of dollars, the committee never exceeded $100,000 per year in its outlays. That was made possible by the total cooperation of the members, regardless of their political beliefs. At one time there were four premiers on the committee. To my knowledge, in all those years there was never a difference over political matters. The committee was there to get the job done, and it was done.

Honourable senators, I have enjoyed many years in the Senate. I believe that an appointment to the Senate of Canada is the greatest honour that can be conferred upon a Canadian. Senators are a dedicated lot and most of them work extremely hard. Interestingly enough, contrary to popular opinion, the hardest workers are often those who have political backgrounds.

I should like to give thanks to the magnificent staff of this chamber who support us so greatly and so kindly. I would also like to give thanks for the many friends that I have made, many of whom have retired and some, regrettably, who have passed on.

To those that I have offended, I am sorry — not sorry for the stands I took, but sorry for my inability to overcome our differences with the civility that is so essential to the working of this chamber.

I congratulate the Liberals on a tremendous victory, and I hope for the revival of the Conservative Party, for, like Mackenzie King, I believe that this country is best represented by parties of broad spectrum, including all political beliefs and the entire geography of the country.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we are witnessing today in the Senate a rather rare event: a senator deciding to leave before his time of appointment is through. However, that decision is a mark of the individual that Doug Everett is. He always does what he thinks is right, and in this case it is his belief that it is proper and right for him to be leaving this chamber. I regret his decision as an old friend and colleague.

Senator Douglas Everett was summoned to the Senate on November 8, 1966, at the recommendation of Prime Minister Pearson. There are not too many left in this chamber of that particular era. Senator Everett's appointment was the very first appointment that Mr. Pearson made in Manitoba, and it was a good one. At that time, when it was not usual for young people to be appointed to the Senate, Senator Everett was the youngest person ever to be appointed. He was 39.

In spite of his rather young age, however, Senator Everett came to this chamber with a varied and extensive background. He was educated in various parts of Canada — the University of Manitoba, Osgoode Hall in Toronto, and Royal Roads Military College in Victoria. He served in the military as a naval officer in both the Canadian and British navies and, I might point out again, at a very young age. He first entered, I believe as an officer-cadet, in 1943, and, if you go back to his year of birth, you will find that he was very young indeed.

For a young man, he brought to the Senate a most varied and extensive business background, being the chief operating officer of a major corporation in Winnipeg and having wide business interests. His accomplishments in the Senate, and he alluded to this himself, were particularly in the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. He led that committee through a number of major studies which had a very important role in changes that were made in the civil service and in the bureaucracy in Canada.

His investigations went in depth into the operations of various departments. At his suggestion, each year the committee would select one department, or a section of a department, and would do an in-depth study of it. However, he added one further aspect to that process which I commend to all committee chairmen and their committees: After the committee had produced its report, within a few months — six, eight or ten months — Senator Everett's committee, on his recommendation, would invite back the minister and the bureaucrats of the department that had been investigated. They would then be asked, "Well, you have now had time to see what the report said. Do you agree? If so, what have you done about it? And if you don't agree, why don't you agree? Let us know."

That process, which was launched by my colleague Senator Everett, is an area where Senate committees can perform a most useful role.

I know we do not like to read old speeches, but I should like to refer to the maiden speech of Senator Everett, which he gave on December 15, 1966, and which gives his views on what the Senate is all about:

> When I came to the Senate I tried, like all new senators, to find out something about its history and its traditions. I found that the three things that we are here to protect are provincial rights, minority rights, and individual rights.

And as a senator of this chamber, Senator Everett certainly helped the Senate fulfil that role.

In that same maiden speech, he said, of our country:

> ...this country is unique, because it is a cultural mosaic. We say that what really distinguishes this country is that we have strong groups who maintain their individuality but who have a common allegiance to Canada. We seek unity in diversity...

Those words, spoken more than 25 years ago in this chamber, hold just as true today. We should celebrate our diversity and not find in it excuses to question the unity of our country.

Those who may not know Senator Everett as well as I do — and our association goes back to the early 1950s — may think of him as basically dealing with questions of finance and weighty problems of banking and international exchanges. What I think of is his contribution to the civic life in his home city of Winnipeg. He has been an active member of a host of local community bodies in Manitoba, such as the Children's Aid Society, the Royal Winnipeg Ballet, and so on. Rather surprising for an Anglican, he was on the board of two major Roman Catholic institutions: Sacred Heart Convent and St. Paul's College. His contributions, whether in money or time, were always made in his usual quiet, unassuming, and, indeed, very often anonymous way.

Senator Everett has been blessed in his union with his most charming wife Patty, who is now in the gallery. Between them, they have six fine children and now a host of grandchildren coming along. I know that they both want to spend more time with family and grandchildren.

I conclude by wishing my friend and colleague well, by thanking him for all he has done for this institution, for our province of Manitoba, I have to say for the Liberal party as well, and for Canada.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I join with the Deputy Leader of the Government in deploring Senator Everett's decision to leave this place today, nearly nine years before the mandatory retirement age.

Senator Everett may very well have explained that he is, and has been, unable to be here as often as he would have liked. However, as far as I am concerned, these explanations are not necessary. Honourable senators will certainly agree that a record of attendance is no measure of effective participation in this place.

Senator Everett's interventions were always listened to with special attention, as they were so often enriching and productive. His argumentations on fiscal and monetary policy were particularly lucid and thoughtful, and they will be greatly missed.

Senator Molgat has made mention of Senator Everett's special contributions as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and I, too, would like to remind senators of that.

Interestingly enough, Senator Everett was appointed in 1966 as a Liberal. Sometime later, he identified himself as an independent Liberal. Not too long ago, he identified himself as an independent. I was hoping that this natural political metamorphosis would eventually lead him to make application to this caucus, particularly after hearing that, as an Anglican, he does not hesitate to sit on Roman Catholic boards.

Be that as it may, we will miss him tremendously. We understand his reasons for leaving. We wish him and Mrs. Everett and their family well. We know that we can call on him and his experience and his fondness for the Senate when need be. Certainly, that is one consolation as he leaves us today.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: I must say that I am totally unprepared. You can see I have no notes. I just learned of the departure of a very highly esteemed friend when I walked into the Senate chamber. However, I think it would be remiss of me not to get up and say a few words.

I have known Senator Everett for many years. I was looking forward to a great exchange of views, since the powers that be have decided to make me sit in this chamber. I have sat both in front of and behind Senator Everett, and I was looking forward to having long talks with him, as I know of his expertise.

Honourable senators may not know that I have a lot in common with Senator Everett. We both came to Parliament Hill under Prime Minister Pearson and were influenced by this great Prime Minister. Every chance I have had in my political life to say the word "Pearson" I have seized the opportunity. I was first elected in 1964 and I saw Senator Everett come to the Senate Chamber on November 8, 1966. I remember that date well — as, I am sure, will Senator Davey — because Mr. Pearson was re-elected in 1965 on November 8.

I must say that I have known Senator Everett. I did my basic military training in Shilo, Manitoba, in the late 1950s. I regret Senator Everett's departure because I think that some of us who sit as independents could play a greater role. We all know that there is a price to pay at times to sit as an independent, and that sometimes independents do not meet with the approval of some other senators.

I had already been in touch with Senator Everett to talk about what we could do together. I will not speak on behalf of the other fine gentlemen who sit as independents, the Honourable Senator Pitfield, Senator Lang and Senator Lawson, but I am sure that, for some of us who sit as independent senators, at the moment Senator Everett's departure is very sad indeed. I only hope that his wife and children will not mind if we take some of his precious time in the future when we call on him to seek his advice.

I say it openly: I am a new senator and I do not have experience in this chamber, so I was counting on this very fine gentleman. My father taught me that that is probably the best thing one can say about someone. When my father said about a lady, "She is a fine lady," he felt that he had said everything. When my father said about a man, "He is a fine gentleman," he felt that he had said everything.

As far as I am concerned, sir, you are a very fine gentleman who has sat in this Senate chamber and your departure will be missed by all senators, and certainly by me.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would join with my colleagues on both sides of the house in paying tribute to a fine gentleman. I agree with Senator Prud'homme that those words epitomize the honourable senator's life here in the Senate and also in his home city of Winnipeg. It was with surprise and sadness that I learned that Senator Everett would be making this announcement today. He has resigned, as he has done everything in his political life, as a matter of principle. Many of us would like to have had the opportunity to argue against his conclusion with regard to not being able to devote as much time to the Senate as he would have liked to contribute. Senator Everett's choice was to take his leave with the view that he would be followed by someone who would devote his or her full time to the work of the Senate. This is a testimonial to Senator Everett's own views on the importance of the work of this chamber. He has been one of the members of this chamber who have heightened its importance with their wisdom, experience, loyalty, and faithfulness.

Honourable senators, as I listened to Senator Molgat saying that Senator Everett was the youngest senator in this place when he was appointed in 1966, it took me back in time, because I remember that day; I remember it vividly.

I was a young reporter in the Parliamentary Press Gallery at the time. One of my newspapers was the Winnipeg Free Press. The arrival of this gentleman to Parliament Hill was big news. Thirty-nine years old or not, he had definitely made his mark in his community. The word came out from Winnipeg: "Go and interview this man; we want this for the front page." So I chased him down.

Somewhat reluctantly on his part, he agreed to be interviewed. It was one of the most difficult interviews I have ever conducted in my life. He was so careful and so cautious that his answers were single words. I had to go back and interview his friends in order to build the kind of story we wanted about the appointment of this very significant person to Parliament Hill.

I wish Senator Everett all the best in the future. He has many things left to do and a contribution to make. I have a feeling that he will find other avenues of interest and other tasks that will be important to the public life of this country. I wish him well; I wish Patty well; I wish their family well. You will be missed, Senator Everett.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I did not expect this announcement today until Senator Everett made it. Consequently, I have no notes. However, I wish to say one or two things about this announcement.

I made Senator Everett's acquaintance long before I came to the Senate in 1977. He will remember that, back in 1968-69, ministers occasionally came to the Senate to give explanations for the legislation they were attempting to pass through the House of Commons and the Senate. I was Minister of Agriculture at that time, and there were a number of matters that were of great importance to Western Canada and the grain industry. As a result, I grew to know Senator Everett and the kind of questions he asked; questions which clearly displayed his interest and integrity.

Honourable senators, it is a sad day when someone with the intellectual capability and the integrity of Senator Everett decides to leave this place with, as he indicated, still nine years left. However, his reasons are his own, and it is not my right to question those reasons.

Honourable senators, over the past 27 or 28 years, I have had many interesting conversations and discussions with Senator Everett in public and in private. We have conversed over breakfast together in the fifth floor cafeteria many times, and I have enjoyed those conversations.

Senator Everett, I know you have thoughtfully considered what your future will hold, and knowing your personality, I am sure that future will be an interesting one. I wish you well.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, as a fellow member of Mr. Pearson's Class of '66, I rise to briefly associate myself with the remarks that have been made with respect to the career of our colleague Senator Everett as he leaves this institution.

• (1430)

I can only add how delighted and honoured I have been to work with the Honourable Senator Everett, and how much I have appreciated his friendship and counsel over the years.

I agreed with him wholeheartedly when he was a Liberal, and disagreed with him wholeheartedly when he was an independent. He was a Liberal much longer than he was an independent in this chamber.

I, of course, join everyone in wishing Senator Everett and his wife Pat good health and happiness in their years of retirement. I can understand, as the years go by, his wish to spend his time with his family and his grandchildren, and I would like to associate myself with other honourable senators in wishing him well in those years.

FIRST REPORT PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Jacques Hébert, Chairman of the Committee of Selection, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 20, 1994

The Committee of Selection has the honour to present its

FIRST REPORT

Pursuant to rule 86(1)(a) of the Rules of the Senate, your Committee nominates the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer as Speaker pro tempore.

Respectfully submitted,

JACQUES HÉBERT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(g), I move that this report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

[English]

SECOND REPORT PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the second report of the Committee of Selection concerning the designation of senators to serve on the permanent committees of the Senate.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(g), I propose that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Hébert, seconded by the Honourable Senator Gigantès, that this report be adopted now. Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I would like to make my position quite clear, as of today.

At the opening of Parliament, there was a motion to appoint a selection committee, with five Liberal senators and four Conservative senators as members of the committee. Despite the presence of some very distinguished guests, I seriously considered rising in my seat and objecting to the motion, but I decided to be reasonable. I felt it would not be appropriate to have a debate in the presence of His Excellency the Governor General, the Right Honourable Prime Minister of Canada and other guests.

The motion was amended yesterday. It now reflects the majority, as Senator MacEachen had insisted in 1984 and 1988. It reflects the situation in the Senate at the present time: a Conservative majority. Yesterday, I again considered taking part in the debate, but to avoid casting a shadow over the proceedings from the start, I decided, at the request of some senatorial friends, against taking part in the debate. You will recall that you called a "yea-nay" vote yesterday. The "yeas" and the "nays" were pretty close, and you decided that the "yeas" had it. There was no division. I did not ask for one. I decided to defer to the wishes of my colleagues and friends.

I see that today a report was tabled, the first one, and I am sure it will be discussed for quite some time. The report was respectfully submitted by the Chairman of the Committee of Selection, Senator Jacques Hébert, who proposed that Senator Ottenheimer be appointed as Speaker pro tempore. So far, there have been no objections, and I did not hear any. I do not know what happened, but you live and learn! Therefore, we accepted this appointment.

Therefore, without any consultation — there is such a thing as independent senators! The Leader of the Government in the Senate said so yesterday. Today I was very sorry to hear about the departure of my esteemed colleague Senator Everett. However, the fact remains that independent senators do exist. The fact remains that some independent senators may have some useful expertise.

[English]

I was the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, unable to get anything else. However, I have been told, and such is written, that for close to 10 years in the House of Commons I was a good chairman of the Foreign Affairs and National Defence Committee, and yet I am now unable to participate in the deliberations. Thank goodness this summer I learned the rules and I know how I will participate. But this is not the way I intended to participate, and I submit that very humbly to you, Your Honour.

Yesterday, Senator Fairbairn, someone I can call a lady, like my father would have, said that surely an independent senator counts — even though in the French translation it was just the contrary; but that is not what Senator Fairbairn said. I have to be so careful here, and I have to read both versions. However, when translated into French, that is not what she said, but it is what she did say that counts. Senator Lynch-Staunton, the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, also said that independent senators count.

With respect to the list that I see today, I did not consult with the Honourable Senators Lawson, Pitfield, Lang or Everett, whose sad departure today I regret. No. In fact, I have to beg for information from various people around me, because they say that independent senators are under the jurisdiction of the chairmen, the senators responsible for committees, or the whip of the government. Surely the ones responsible for us should at least talk to us.

I regret to say that I was totally unaware of this committee report. I was not asked if I was interested in participating, or perhaps in offering, humbly, some views; they might not be shared, but at least I should have been able to submit them. I do not intend to stay in a corner and do nothing; I assure honourable senators of that.

I accepted the invitation of the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney — and I mention his name, even if some people think his name should no longer be mentioned. When he asked me if I wanted to come to the Senate, I said "Yes." I have much respect for all of the Prime Ministers, from Mr. Pearson to Ms Campbell, whom I have served loyally and faithfully, including the one I served the longest, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

I do not intend to be left out of events in this institution. If honourable senators want to have a harmonious Senate, as I have always begged all of my colleagues to make it, we have a duty, honourable senators, to show respect for our institution.

[Translation]

The Senate must show a great deal of civility. In fact the word "civility" exists in the vocabulary and the dictionary! I am one of those who believe in it.

[English]

I sat long enough in the House of Commons to know that the British Parliamentary system is the best of all systems, and that the Senate has a role to play while the country is under attack.

I did not answer questions asked by the press last summer which suggested that I was to become the leader of a certain party in the opposition. Some were playing games. I said nothing, and because I said nothing people interpreted my silence in their own way. My father taught me a good lesson, that you do not answer every question you are asked, and in that I imitated the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau — which is also a name I am not afraid to mention. He never wasted his energy or his time in answering "pissy" criticisms in every little journalist's report. Excuse me for expressing myself that way, but I get carried away in English, which is not my first language, as honourable senators will realise.

[Translation]

Therefore, Your Honour, I respectfully submit to you that after looking at the list of senators, I will have to become someone that I do not want to be: that is, a dissident in the Senate.

[English]

Treat a minority well and a minority will act very well: that fact has a long, long history in Canada.

[Translation]

Scorn the minorities and they will act as minorities!

[English]

I do not intend to remain silent. I have kept my silence since I arrived in the Senate. Many events — sad events — have taken place since I arrived here. Who was I to disturb? Nobody. I am only one of you and, very humbly, one of the last one of you, and I submit to that.

However, I intend to do a lot for my country, and while the country is under attack is not the time for cheap shots between senators. I intend to devote my full time to the Senate for the salary I earn. I said that to the press. Like Senator MacEachen and many others, we do not touch double-dipping. I cannot speak for the other independent senators, or for those still to come. However, surely we have a role to play in this noble institution. We must have a protector. And you, sir —

You, my respected friend, you are the Speaker. I think you are the one who should report, and here I call upon the Government Leader in the Senate to report to the Prime Minister of Canada the subject of this debate today.

However, the Right Honourable Prime Minister of Canada, whom I stood up to applaud yesterday in the House of Commons —

[English]

I applauded the speech of the Prime Minister of Canada yesterday, as I stood in the gallery, and in that I was imitating, believe it or not, the new leader of the Reform Party.

• (1450)

He acted differently. When we talk about Canada, there should not be any partisanship. This country is too good to play politics with.

[Translation]

Your Honour, I am seeking your guidance. I would like one of these two alternatives: we either amend this report — I am not demanding it.

[English]

I am afraid I will have no one to second my motion, for the time being.

[Translation]

I looked at the list of members of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I can tell you that I will be there all the time, which might prove embarrassing for those who stay away.

[English]

I repeat in English. I will be present in my favourite committee, the Foreign Affairs Committee, even though I am not a member of that committee. Because I intend to be there, it will be embarrassing for those who may never show up, or who may only show up from time to time.

However, that is not the right way to proceed, sir. I thought I was coming to the Senate to give the rest of my days to the greatest cause of my life — Canada. Is that clear, honourable senators? This country is still the last great hope on earth, on a troubled planet. With all our differences and all our languages, it is still the best land. We cannot play politics with it. We cannot have little shots against each other. Perhaps I was not the subject of that shot. However, I find it strange that I was not informed that my name was not to be submitted to any committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think we should carry on the debate on this issue. I look favourably upon the position of Senator Prud'homme. I simply want to say that all senators definitely have the right to sit on all of the committees. No senator is excluded, and that is just as true for committees meeting in camera as it is for committees open to everyone. It applies to all committees. There is no rule to keep him from participating.

However, I do believe that, in the other House as well as in this one, the official parties were the ones to determine the membership. This is not new; it has always been the procedure. I fully understand the honourable senator's position. I think we should discuss that point. Maybe we could reach an agreement whereby independent senators might be included. I do not know. The question has some merit.

[English]

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of Senator Molgat. Has any consideration been given to the organizational meetings of these committees? I ask because we are to be away from this place for three weeks, or so I understand. There are many important subjects that should be raised and discussed.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I do not think that is a question which should properly fall to me to address. Our group does not have the majority on the committees. He might address his question to those who have such a majority.

Hon. C. William Doody: The Leader of the Opposition does not accept questions.

Senator Marshall: Would my leader respond?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the answer to the honourable senator's question is that the clerk of the respective committee is responsible for calling the first meeting of that committee so that a chairman, a deputy chairman and a steering committee can be selected. That will happen when all the committee members are available.

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, if some of you are wondering why the report does not mention the important Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, I want to say that both parties have agreed that the new committee would be established after the present committee has completed the budget study. Therefore, that committee will be mentioned in a future report.

[English]

Senator Marshall: May I appeal to His Honour, honourable senators? We are to be away from this place for three weeks.

Senator Molgat: Two weeks.

Senator Marshall: I have figured out that it is about 19 days from today until February 8. Nevertheless, we have been off for six or seven months. In the Throne Speech there was talk about the commemoration of D-day, which is an important and historic event. We are now about two years too late in planning for that event, but I will be telling honourable senators what the United States and Britain are doing in that regard.

Surely we should not be passing the buck back and forth; surely we can come to an agreement that organizational meetings should be held. Someone has to take the lead. Perhaps His Honour would care to respond, or am I asking the wrong person?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have had a few years in parliamentary life. Of all the things I have learned, hurrying things along is usually done by the two sides of a house much more than by the Speaker. I do not think I will venture into that terrain unless and until I am requested to do so in a formal way.

I understand the honourable senator's impatience. He has stated his case. I believe I discerned a certain murmur of understanding from both sides that perhaps we could move to proceed. I hope that this way of operating will give good results.

If there is no further intervention, it is time to deal with the motion.

It has been moved by the Honourable Senator Hébert, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hastings that, with leave of the Senate, the report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Prud'homme: On division.

Motion agreed to and report adopted, on division.

CLERK'S ACCOUNTS

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, that the Clerk's accounts be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 8, 1994, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, yesterday I gave advance notice on this matter. I know of nothing at the moment that is happening in the other place that would cause a change in our plans. As usual, of course, the motion should be passed on the understanding that, if required, we are subject to recall. At the moment, however, I do not see that likelihood.

In answer to Senator Marshall, the committees are now constituted, with the exception of the Internal Economy committee, which is continuing. When the committees so decide, they may proceed. Nothing now impedes their progress. There has been no delay in that regard, and they can meet whenever they wish.

Senator Marshall: That is all well and fine, but who will initiate —

Senator Doody: The chairman of the committee can get after the clerk.

Senator Molgat: The clerk normally initiates the organizational meeting, but obviously the clerk will have to consult with the members of the committee to ensure that they will be able to attend. I presume that, having heard the discussion today, the clerk will proceed to make that canvass of committee members.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON EUTHANASIA— NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, February 8, 1994, I will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing a special committee of the Senate to inquire and report upon the legal, social and ethical issues relating to euthanasia and assisted death.

Honourable senators, I have been considering this inquiry for some time, as a number of you are aware. I was not aware until a few weeks ago that members of the opposition had discussed this proposal informally in their caucus and were generally prepared to support the idea, provided that such an inquiry or if it goes beyond that to a formal study, would be on a non-partisan basis.

The Leader of the Opposition informed me that Senator Lavoie-Roux was particularly interested in this subject-matter and had also done a great deal of work on it. I look forward to joining with our colleagues on the other side on this matter. I trust that we will have an interesting and useful examination of this difficult subject.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cools, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the Opening of the First Session of the Thirty-fifth Parliament. — (1st day of resuming debate.)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that I speak for all my colleagues in offering to you, Senator LeBlanc, our warmest congratulations on your being chosen Speaker of the Senate.

[Translation]

For more than 26 years, our colleague has played a very active role in Canadian parliamentary life, having been first elected to the House of Commons in 1972, then sworn in as a member of the Privy Council two years later, and finally summoned to the Senate at the end of June 1984.

[English]

He therefore brings to these new responsibilities a great deal of practical experience which can but benefit us all, as long as all of us, in turn, assure him of our cooperation as he presides over our deliberations.

As far as this side is concerned, the meaning of cooperation can be found in a quote from a speech given by a former Leader of the Opposition, whose comments were made on an occasion similar to this one, and which I hasten to make ours.

It was in November 1984. The Progressive Conservative Party had just been elected with a comfortable majority, while the Liberal Party was in the majority in the Senate. As Leader of the Opposition, Senator MacEachen said of the newly selected presiding officer that, "I certainly want to congratulate him and assure him of my full cooperation in carrying out his responsibilities."

These are the sentiments of the entire Progressive Conservative caucus, sentiments which we certainly do not intend to set aside, no matter how great the temptation.

[Translation]

I would be remiss if I did not pay my respects to and congratulate the senator who served as our presiding officer, an office he held for eight years; by far a record of which he himself and this house can justly be proud.

[English]

While Senator Charbonneau's tenure as Speaker was marked by unfortunate controversy, he faced it with uncommon equanimity and in the best tradition of a parliamentary presiding officer.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I want to express to Senator Charbonneau our deepest appreciation, not only for his conduct as Speaker, but also for his representing Canada abroad with much distinction, as befits one whose office ranks fourth in the order of official precedence after the Governor General, the Prime Minister and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

May I also be allowed to make mention of one other colleague? Whenever I discuss my present role I make it quite plain that I am not replacing Senator Murray; rather, I am following him. There is — to me, anyway — more than a semantic nuance in this choice of words, for far be it from me to suggest that I could meet the very high standards that he has always set for himself.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Senator Murray has been with us since 1979. Having worked closely with Davie Fulton, Wallace McCutcheon, Robert Stanfield and Richard Hatfield, he arrived here with a rich political background that quickly led him to play key roles in three governments.

[English]

One had to have the privilege, as I have for some two years, of being closely associated with Senator Murray to appreciate the tremendous energy and dedication which he brought to his responsibilities, not only as Leader of the Government in the Senate, but also as a cabinet minister, chairman of important cabinet committees, and advisor to prime ministers and cabinet colleagues on many issues. He did all of this with patience, cool-headedness and even good humour — most of the time, anyway — despite the tremendous pressures brought on by a number of particularly sensitive issues which he was called on to handle. We should all be relieved to know that he intends to remain an active participant in this place, as all of us can benefit from his experience, knowledge and unshakeable optimism.

I commend the mover and seconder for their initiating this debate yesterday. The fact that they made little if no reference to the Speech from the Throne is understandable, for it is, I fear, after careful reading, but a half-hearted, watered-down extension of "The Liberal Plan for Canada," the so-called "Red Book" that the leader of the Liberal Party unveiled with much fanfare during the election campaign and which he and his colleagues continuously refer to as the program to which the Liberal Party is firmly committed. In less than three months, however, it has become evident that Liberal promises of the past are only as valid as the time it takes to convince people that they might be the promises of the future.

A few striking examples will suffice to support this: A Liberal government, we were told during the campaign, will renegotiate the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement and the North American Free Trade Agreement to obtain a subsidies code, an anti-dumping code, a more effective dispute-resolution mechanism, and the same energy protection as Mexico.

Note the word "renegotiate." It implies so much dissatisfaction with a proposal that approval of it is impossible in its present state. The Red Book even suggested abrogation "if satisfactory changes cannot be negotiated." Brave words indeed, but oh, how empty, for here is the result: On December 2, did the Prime Minister announce successful renegotiation or abrogation? None of these, honourable senators. He announced, without a blush, "significant improvements."

And what are these "significant improvements"? Working groups have been established to deal with subsidies, countervailing duties, dumping and anti-dumping duties, and they are to complete their work by the end of December 1995. This, we are told in all seriousness, will also lead to an improved dispute-settlement mechanism. Improved? When the present dispute-settlement mechanism is so disadvantageous that Canada has come out ahead more often than not since its inception at the insistence of the Progressive Conservative government as an essential part of the free trade agreement? So disadvantageous that, earlier this month, the United States Commerce Department accepted the decision by a subsidy panel that punitive tariffs on softwood exports by Canada should be removed?

We can do better, say the Liberals, so much so that we will talk about the matter for another two years, and then, hopefully, everyone will have forgotten that we had no leg to stand on in the first place.

That, honourable senators, is how the Liberal government renegotiated both the FTA and NAFTA to obtain a subsidies code and an anti-dumping code, with the threat of abrogation if satisfactory changes could not be renegotiated.

The Liberals' tough bargaining stance with the threat of abrogation also led to the same sort of pious, meaningless statements on energy, environment and water, all subjects debated over and over again in the other place and here; all deliberately misinterpreted by the Liberal Party to leave the impression that the Conservative government was selling out. Then suddenly, when partisan consideration is set aside and the national interest is finally given some consideration, the Liberal Party is forced to admit that the flaws, anxieties and deep concerns which were being so skilfully advanced to Canadians had no foundation all along. They were simply gross political rhetoric with no concern over the damage done to our reputation with our two trading partners. Those partners must still be stunned by the misrepresentations of the Liberal Party which itself admits its distortions by concluding in its December 2 statement, "All these measures are to be effected without reopening the implementing legislation at this late date."

Renegotiations, indeed. What a farce! What is especially galling is that the Liberals show absolutely no sense of shame for having misled Canadians in such a fashion. On the matter of energy, the Red Book claims that "the Conservatives allowed Mexico to get protection for its energy resources that Canada does not have", and the Liberals pledged to get "the same energy protection as Mexico."

They were 100 per cent wrong on the first count, and fortunately failed on the second, because the NAFTA already provides Canada with benefits which Mexico does not receive.

As the Fraser Institute put it:

> ...Canada is guaranteed access to the U.S. market for the sale of its energy, a provision which is crucial to energy exporting provinces. Mexico is not provided this right.

Concurrently, Canada assures its U.S. customers that they will be given fair treatment in case of shortages, a normal commercial undertaking. NAFTA said this all along. The Liberals smugly claimed that Canada got the short end of the stick, but then they had to backtrack after October 25 when departmental advisors obviously warned them that any reopening of the NAFTA could very well be to the disadvantage of Canada, not the opposite.

One of the ironies of all this is that the Liberals trumpet, "Free, fair and open trade as essential to the future of our country," a view which few Canadians, who recognize the importance of exports to the prosperity of Canada, will challenge.

Nonetheless, as the Red Book does not want to displease anyone, one reads in it, only a few pages later, that "Canada's agri-food industry needs policies and programs such as supply management..."

[Translation]

All concerned Conservative ministers, led by the Prime Minister, did everything they could, used every available forum, in public and in private, to support the negotiators who worked relentlessly to ensure international recognition for this Canadian industry on which depend hundreds of thousands of Canadians, directly and indirectly. And for what? Soon after its swearing-in, the Liberal government sent its own representatives to Geneva, only to announce a few days later that it was a waste of time, that Canada stood alone, that we were running out of time, that the tariffs would be decreasing for a given period of time and that we should be satisfied with that from now on.

[English]

It was a Liberal government that introduced supply management. It was a Liberal government that instituted production quotas. It was a Liberal government that set import quotas. And now, it is a Liberal government that has agreed to the dismantling of the supply-management concept which their predecessors created.

We are all familiar with the arguments against supply management, particularly by consumer groups. But that is not the issue before us today. The issue is how will the government of Canada help the farming community to adjust, over the next few years, to our undertakings under GATT? Do not look for guidance in the Throne Speech. There is absolutely no mention whatsoever of Canada's agricultural industry in it; not even a platitudinous passing reference.

But perhaps the current Maclean's magazine inadvertently explains the Liberals' embarrassing silence. After the International Trade Minister twice boasted to the Prime Minister that the GATT agreement is a great day for Canada, the article states:

> But Chrétien cuts him off brusquely "Canadian farmers do not think it is a great day" says the Prime Minister, referring to unhappiness over the end of protection for them. "Tell me what I can tell them to make them feel better."

They are still waiting to hear from the Prime Minister and his colleagues.

The more one refers to the Red Book, the more one is depressed by its callous catering to every interest in a search for votes, and the total lack of implementation once the votes have been counted.

> A Liberal government will strengthen Canada's leadership role in international peacekeeping. In part, this will be done through a reorientation of Canadian defence policy and procurement practices to emphasize the key priority of peacekeeping. Consideration will be given to creating a special peacekeeping brigade, comprising Canadian volunteers with both military and non-military expertise, who want to spend time in an organization specifically mandated to meet the increasingly diverse requirements of modern peacekeeping.
> A Liberal government will also seek to convert surplus military bases in Canada to peacekeeping training and staging centres, and will encourage Canadian military industries to shift production in order to better support peacekeeping needs. We will give priority to Canadian efforts to improve the UN's policies on peacekeeping.

Is it not extraordinary that the Speech from the Throne makes absolutely no reference to Canada's foreign policy? No mention is made anywhere of our military obligations. No mention is even made of foreign aid. I dare say that this has to be the only Throne Speech in recent memory which ignores totally Canada's intentions outside its borders — unless the pledge to "take the action required to ensure that foreign overfishing of East Coast stocks comes to an end" is meant to reconfirm the Fisheries Minister's not too subtle insinuation that Canada might engage in a form of gunboat diplomacy to remove flag-of-convenience vessels fishing outside the 200-mile limit.

Why were the Red Book's sentiments on peacekeeping not at least alluded to yesterday or the day before in the Throne Speech? The Prime Minister did not even raise the matter at the NATO meetings in Brussels last week. Instead, we were embarrassed once again by a policy of having no policy: Perhaps we will have to remove our troops from the Balkans; perhaps we will reconsider. No air strikes, says the Minister of Foreign Affairs one day; well, air strikes if necessary, but not necessarily air strikes, says the Prime Minister the next.

The issue of deploying Canada's armed forces for the purpose of helping bring stability and humanitarian aid to other parts of the world is surely too important to be treated simply as another campaign promise — again to be neglected once the votes have been counted. It was bad enough for the morale of our troops to hear the then Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons repeatedly contradict himself on his party's position on Canada's stand in the Gulf War. It is even more deplorable to see a Prime Minister sign a NATO declaration stating certain firm approaches and also to see the same Prime Minister contradict them verbally, days later.

The government says in all seriousness that since it has no firm policy, it will call for a special debate in the House and take it from there. What a sorry example of indifferent leadership. "We don't know where we're going," say the Liberals, "so we want the best of totally divergent views to guide us."

During the campaign, the Liberals were never hesitant to blame Canada's economic problems, whatever they might be, on the Bank of Canada and, in particular, on its governor, John Crow, who was pictured as a cold-hearted Scrooge whose monetary policy priorities were satisfying the international finance community to the detriment of domestic economic growth. "His days are numbered," the Liberals whispered not too softly. "He's going to be replaced by someone more compassionate, more understanding; someone sympathetic to our domestic problems; someone who will put an end to the bank's servility to the international financial users."

The result? Less than three months after the election, as the Liberal's fulminations were still resounding across the country, the Minister of Finance announced the appointment of Gordon Thiessen as governor. Mr. Thiessen has been with the bank for the last 30 years, the last six as senior deputy governor whose responsibilities included monetary policy.

Has the Bank of Canada all along had two monetary policies: one followed by Mr. Crow to wreck the Canadian economy, the other by Mr. Thiessen, more in tune with the Liberals? Not a peculiar supposition, considering the Liberal Party's vendetta against Mr. Crow, but grossly unfair to Mr. Thiessen.

The answer, of course, is not only has the bank one monetary policy, to which the former governor and his successor fully subscribed with the backing of the Conservative government, but both the bank and the Liberal government have formally pledged to adopt it in total.

Here is part of the statement of the Government of Canada and the Bank of Canada on monetary policy objectives released on December 22 last. Yes, December 22, a date when Canadians might reasonably have their minds on matters other than the economy. The statement says:

> In February 1991, the government —

Meaning the Conservative government.

> — and the Bank of Canada jointly announced a series of targets for reducing inflation and reaching price stability in Canada. By the end of 1995, the goal was to reduce inflation at the mid-point of a range of 1 to 3 per cent.

The statement continues:

> It is now time to specify the objective that will steer monetary policy beyond 1995 and provide a medium term guide for Canadians in making their economic decisions... Accordingly, the government —

That is, the Liberal government.

> — and the Bank of Canada have agreed to extend the inflation reduction targets from 1995 to 1998 and to maintain the objective of holding inflation inside the range of 1 to 3 per cent (mid-point 2 per cent) during that time.

The statement ends:

> In addition, the present approach under the targets for dealing with major price shocks stemming from unexpected developments, and with indirect tax changes that result in sharp changes to the Consumer Price Index will continue.

Political parties are renowned for using excessive language in the heat of a campaign and for engaging in exaggeration, but rare is it when a party so relentlessly savages a distinguished public servant with an enviable international reputation, then abandons him at the same time that it reconfirms his policies by naming as his successor his closest associate who will continue those policies without an iota of change. Honourable senators, if this is the new meaning of "integrity," please give us back the old one.

Is it any wonder, honourable senators, after such a sorry experience within less than three months, that one can only treat this so-called Liberal plan with cynicism? That is why the Speech from the Throne cannot be taken with much more than the traditional grain of salt, as it is from the same authors and advisers of the already discredited Red Book.

None should really be surprised, however, as it was all explained most succinctly in 1963 by a writer who was to become leader of the Liberal Party only a few years later. Mr. Trudeau wrote then:

> Therefore the political philosophy of the Liberal party is very simple: "Say anything, think anything, or even better, don't think anything at all, but put us in power because we are the ones who are best able to govern you.

Senator Gigantès: That's true. It still works.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Despite —

Senator Gigantès: We're the best.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You're the best because you think nothing and say everything.

Despite this deplorable beginning, the Liberals are nonetheless in the unique position of coming into office inheriting an economic situation which is the envy of many, and certainly —

Senator Molgat: Come on. There is a limit.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: — and certainly is in vividly stark contrast to the sorry mess with which the Conservative government was faced in the fall of 1984.

Senator Molgat: For humour, you get top marks.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: At that time, for every tax dollar collected for program expenditure, the Liberals were spending $1.33. The figures are now just about in balance.

From 1980 to 1985, program spending increased by an average of nearly 14 per cent per year. The last five years saw the rate of increase reduced to less than 5 per cent per year. The bank rate in September, 1984, was over 12 per cent. Last October, it was under 5 per cent. The prime rate then was 13 per cent. Last October, it was down to 5 and 3/4 per cent.

The budgetary deficit as a percentage of gross domestic product in the last year of the Liberals was just under 9 per cent, compared to just under 6 per cent in the last fiscal year, and this despite technical accounting changes introduced for the first time in the 1992-93 accounts.

Inflation averaged 8.3 per cent per year between 1980 and 1984. Eight per cent inflation means that savings lose half their value in only nine years. Inflation is now in the 2-per-cent range.

Sadly, the unemployment rate, which in 1984 averaged 11.2 per cent, remains unchanged for all intents and purposes. It is to be hoped that the new government will pursue active policies of job creation, vocational training and retraining, to carry on the efforts already in place, and improve on them if possible. Certainly, increasing unemployment insurance premiums and reducing capital projects is not exactly a step in the right direction.

The economic situation under which the government is working allows much more latitude in the creation of employment than did the conditions with which the Conservatives were confronted in 1984. In addition, the last three years have been ones of worldwide recession from which, economists generally agree, North America at last is finally emerging. Despite this, however, 1.4 million more people are working today than at the end of 1984, and two-thirds of those jobs are full-time.

• (1530)

Honourable senators, much is being made of what can be expected from Conservative members who form the majority in this place. Let me assure everyone that we have too much respect for this institution to use it for overtly partisan purposes.

Senator Frith: Like holding votes in the absence of the opposition!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Let me again quote Senator MacEachen to make my point clear. He said in 1984:

> As far as I am concerned, the constitutional position and political stature of the Senate remain unchanged. No member in this chamber would suggest that the Senate should usurp the leading role of the House of Commons, or systematically obstruct the will of the majority in the elected body of Parliament. Certainly I do not approach my role as Leader of the Opposition from that vantage point.

Every piece of government legislation will be given the scrutiny and assessment it deserves. It will be subjected to rigorous committee hearings when found necessary. It may even, on occasion, be subjected to amendments in order to improve it and be returned to the House of Commons for reconsideration in its new form. In the long run, however, the Senate must not, cannot be the final arbiter. It can, and must, contribute through the knowledge and experience of its members to what it considers better legislation. However, should the House disagree, then so be it, for the Senate must act as it sees fit. The decision of the elected must, and will, be abided by.

Senator Phillips: Does that mean we have to give back our kazoos?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I want to end these remarks by warmly congratulating Senator Fairbairn on her appointment as Leader of the Government in the Senate. She brings to her new position here and in cabinet a unique practical experience, gained from 14 years' experience as senior legislative advisor to the then Prime Minister, and she has been an active, concerned and dedicated senator since 1984, and a most energetic one also, as anyone can attest who was present for her 16-hour marathon during the GST debate.

The Prime Minister has chosen well, and by giving her special responsibility for literacy has not only recognized Senator Fairbairn's longstanding interest in this matter but has expressed confidence that her abilities and determination will bring some tangible results.

[Translation]

I also wish to congratulate Senator Molgat and Senator Hébert on their reappointment to positions similar to those they held before the general election in October. We may have switched roles and seats, but our goals and intentions are the same: to continue to have a Senate where Canadians can find men and women from all over the country, from various political parties and, in some cases, with no official political affiliation, who are proud to have this unique opportunity to serve their fellow Canadians in this historic place, and are committed to contributing to the legislative process in an open and positive way for the benefit of all the Canadian people that they have the honour to serve.

[English]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators —

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you very much, honourable senators. As I said in my impromptu remarks yesterday, welcome back. We have all travelled many miles and seen many changes since we were last in this chamber. I sense, certainly after the vigorous speech that Senator Lynch-Staunton has just given, a real and genuine enthusiasm to get on with the job and to start a new and different parliamentary chapter.

[Translation]

First of all, Your Honour, I would like to congratulate you on reaching this distinction which really is a crowning achievement for a remarkable political career.

[English]

Senator LeBlanc began the path that brought him here as a teacher; a teacher in high school and then at teachers' college, then as a respected journalist and a foreign correspondent, then as a communications advisor to two prime ministers, which is when I first got to know him. Then he was elected as a member of Parliament for the constituency of Westmorland—Kent back in 1972. In 1974 he entered the federal cabinet, and over the years he had responsibilities for various issues — mainly as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, with a great concern for that issue, but also the environment, Public Works, and housing. For almost ten years now he has served as a respected member in this chamber.

Your Honour, you have always distinguished yourself with your integrity, fairness and sense of humour. Most important, you have never forgotten the people of New Brunswick, whom you have served with such dedication for so many years.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, there is something wrong with the sound system.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we have lost the sound. It is unfortunate, especially since the honourable senator was dealing with a subject that I was hoping would be heard clearly.

Senator Fairbairn: Would you like me to go back to the beginning? I think all honourable colleagues, Your Honour, are familiar with, and very grateful for, your work in this house and its committees, and most notably on the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. We all wish you well in this new instalment of an impressive career.

To Senator Charbonneau, who is now back on the floor of the Senate, I wish him well in his duties ahead. He has been here since 1979, when he began with a very active interest in the committees of Banking, Internal Economy, and Energy. I hope that he will reinvigorate the interests that he developed at that time. Senator Charbonneau was Speaker of this chamber during some incredibly controversial and divisive events. Political life, I suppose, thrusts these responsibilities on one, and I wish him well in his future years of contribution to the Senate and to the people of the province he represents.

I should also like to congratulate the new Leader of the Opposition, Senator Lynch-Staunton. I think we have already begun a relationship of courtesy, cooperation and, I believe, friendship. Senator Lynch-Staunton has a distinguished background of many years duration in municipal politics in the City of Montreal. He has served in an executive capacity in the corporate sector and has come here not just as a representative of his province and his city. I know that a motivating force for him in this chamber is to work for the benefit and the unity of Canada and the Canadian federation.

I want to thank him for his frankness, his loyalty to those who work with him and also for the final words of his speech. He indicated to us a view that we profoundly appreciate, agree with and will contribute to: the will to develop a cooperative atmosphere in this Senate that will take it, I hope, beyond the confines and the isolation of this chamber, where too often it remains. It will enable us to tell the people of this country that there is in this chamber a will to work for them, to work for this country and to work together in a spirit of consensus and cooperation.

Of course we will have our differences; there is no question about that. However, there is a larger issue, particularly as certain events may be approaching in our nation's history, and this chamber is prepared to work for solutions for Canadians in the atmosphere of cooperation we have pledged.

• (1540)

I should like, as well, to congratulate your team, Senator Lynch-Staunton. Senator Berntson, another westerner, has been selected as Deputy Leader of the Opposition, and Senator Kinsella, with all of his good nature and charm, has taken on the responsibility of Chief Opposition Whip. Having sat beside the former Chief Opposition Whip, I wish you well. It is a tough job. Just know who your friends are.

Honourable senators, before I conclude my comments of appreciation for people on the other side, I wish to say a word about Senator Murray.

Senator Murray presided over this chamber for seven very interesting and turbulent years. He was given responsibilities by his Prime Minister on extremely critical issues of the day, and I know he worked with dedication to carry out those responsibilities. I believe Senator Murray's colleagues were saying that he worked with great patience and sometimes even humour. I appreciate that, because I have known him for a long time. We were both young sprouts on Parliament Hill at the same time. He was working out of Senator McCutcheon's office, and I was running around looking for news stories.

I wish Senator Murray well. I know he will remain engaged and involved, and he will also be doing everything he can, as he always has, to further the interests of the Conservative Party of Canada. That is a laudable course for him to follow. I wish to thank him, as well, for his cooperation and courtesy during the transition period over the last many weeks.

At the beginning of my speech, I mentioned the changes that have taken place. I have, indeed, undergone some of those changes myself, and one need only glance at the long and illustrious list of names of those who have preceded me as Liberal leader in this place to realize that there are some very large shoes to be filled. Some of those shoes are, in fact, still on the feet of their owners, and some of those owners are still here in the Senate with us. Of course I am speaking of Senator Frith, Senator MacEachen, Senator Olson, and Senator Perrault. If I may be given a moment, I would like to express my appreciation to them.

We all know Senator Frith as a great actor and great orator, but we also know him as someone who has been in this chamber since 1977 and has done an extraordinary job, not just on legislation, but in putting his heart and soul absolutely into the work and the activity of this place. He has been a great communicator in the Senate of Canada, as he has been throughout his life.

Again, thinking back to one's youth, the first time I met Senator Frith he was in a combined capacity as a lawyer and also a person very interested in broadcasting, because he was vigorously pushing views before the Board of Broadcast Governors, which was the precursor to the CRTC.

Honourable senators, in the past, Senator Frith has served in many capacities in support of the interests of this country and the cultural aspects that pull it together. He was on the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, which was an historic moment in the evolution of this important issue in our country's history.

Senator MacEachen — what can I say about Senator MacEachen?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We would like to know.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, Senator MacEachen is a part of the living history of this Parliament of Canada, both in the House of Commons — which he entered as a young member in 1953 — and in the Senate. Through more cabinet positions than one can easily remember, he has been at the heart of public policy in this country in a very important, sensitive and inspired way. Everyone in this chamber will know that beneath that toughness and debating shrewdness lies one of the most compassionate political hearts in this country.

Senator Olson is a compatriot from Alberta who again had a distinguished career in the other place. He was one of the finest House Leaders in the House of Commons. He served in this chamber as the Leader of the Opposition and as the Leader of the Government. He served very sensitively in the cabinet of Canada in portfolios such as agriculture — so dear to his heart — and economic development.

Senator Perrault is one of the most beloved politicians in the province of British Columbia. He came here in 1973, just before Senator Frith. He has made his mark in this place, as he did in the other, and as he did in the province of British Columbia in that legislature.

Honourable senators, I mention these colleagues because it underlines the depth of experience and vitality in public affairs that exists on both sides of this house. I say to them personally, they have my utmost respect and affection. I will be counting on their guidance and on their wise counsel.

Honourable senators, on this my first occasion to give this type of speech, I should like to reaffirm to you all my deep and profound respect for Parliament. It is true that I have worked, in one way or another, around this building for 32 years. I take very seriously my responsibility to uphold the traditions which have given this chamber and this group of individuals a very special place in the governance of Canada. In one way or another, politics has brought us all here, and I firmly believe that the political process is an honourable pursuit. It is clearly fundamental to the functioning of the democratic system in Canada.

People choose their governments. I believe our process is the best in the world. Now they have made their choice, and they are always right. Our task is to honour their expectations to the best of our ability.

The first step for a government in doing that is to outline its intentions in a Speech from the Throne, which we heard on Tuesday, accompanied by all of the ceremony that reminds us of the depth and durability of our parliamentary democracy. Honourable senators, I should like to take just one moment to express our appreciation to His Excellency the Governor General for his presentation, and also to Mrs. Hnatyshyn for her presence here. I offer him and his family, I am sure on behalf of us all, our very best wishes for their continued success on behalf of Canadians in every part of the country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: We began this debate yesterday with the speeches by our mover and seconder.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Gigantès for moving the motion kicking off the debate after the Speech from the Throne.

[English]

He reminded us very seriously that the primary responsibility of all legislators to the Canadian people is to make every effort to provide them with an economy which offers everyone the dignity that comes with a job.

Senator Cools, whose poetry and eloquent prose took us back into the history books, made us — certainly those of us on this side of the Senate — feel proud to have been part of the social consciousness which has inspired so much of that legislation in this century.

Between the two of them, they pulled together the major messages of the Throne Speech. They also demonstrated the importance of balancing economic and social planning, a balance which has made ours the kind of progressive society it is today.

We are heading into a critical period in our nation's history, and the decisions we make here are of importance to every individual Canadian. We begin with the understanding that we are working for them and that they are looking to this new Parliament for some answers. We cannot let them down.

As we move towards the twenty-first century we need to remember some of the changes that have brought us this far; changes in our physical surroundings, in our attitudes, and events both inside and outside our borders that have helped determine the way we relate to one another as nations and as individuals. The scope of these changes has been vast. The very face of Canada has changed as people from around the world have come here, seeking to build a life in this country and helping to make Canada one of the most interesting and most tolerant countries in the world.

As we are always being reminded by Senator Marshall, we have suffered as a nation through two world wars and the Korean conflict. We have seen the beginning and the end of a Cold War between East and West. For decades, it seemed as though the world teetered on the brink of nuclear destruction. However, the end of that confrontation did not mean the end to brutal conflict, as events in the former Yugoslavia, Somalia, the Middle East, the Far East, and other trouble spots have shown us so painfully.

Canada has used its strengths and skills as a middle power to carry out a very special role in keeping the peace, not in making war. Thousands of women and men have served, and are serving today, as peacekeepers in many parts of this world. They are doing so under very dangerous conditions. Some, in fact, have lost their lives. Some, in fact, have been sent home with desperate injuries. I am proud of our commitment as a nation to the cause of peacekeeping. It is an issue that is very important in the mind of a government which has been grappling, and will continue to grapple, with the whole question of peacekeeping in a modern conflict.

However you wish to describe the events that took place at the NATO meetings, participants in those NATO discussions were themselves torn as to how to approach this function in the new circumstances that have followed the so-called liberation of Eastern Europe.

In recent years, we have also seen an explosion of economic activity within and among all industrialized nations of the world. Old antagonisms have been set aside. New partnerships have been formed. Old industries have died away and new ones are springing up to take their place. New international organizations have been and are being formed, and agreements signed, which may not seem directly important to the daily lives of individual Canadians but which, nonetheless, have an enormous impact on all of us.

The globalization of ideas and markets has brought, and will continue to bring, massive changes inside Canada. Our resource-based economy has led the way to greater and greater economic diversification. That, in turn, has presented Canada with enormous new opportunities, but also huge risks. It is our job to maximize those opportunities and minimize the risks.

In fact, how we treat the disadvantaged among us is the true measure of ourselves and our society. As the Prime Minister said in his speech yesterday in the House of Commons:

> We are extremely proud of the Liberal legacy in social policy. We believe that people experiencing economic difficulty must have income support available to them through social assistance.

At this point, honourable senators, I do want to mention again my colleague from Cape Breton, Senator MacEachen. He has been at the heart of the development of these social programs, whether it be a labour code, pensions or Medicare. Throughout many decades he has maintained the social conscience of the Liberal Party of Canada through his absolute commitment to the wellbeing of Canadians wherever they may live, whatever their circumstances may be.

In politics, we all learn from our colleagues. We never replace people, we follow people. Because of politicians like him and others in this chamber, I have always believed that governments have a duty to stand up for those in our society who are put at risk through no fault of their own; those people who cannot speak out for themselves: the poor and the sick, the single mother trying to build a life for herself and her children, the elderly struggling to make ends meet on a shrinking pension, the disabled man or woman in need of special assistance and equal opportunity, children living in poverty — more than a million in Canada today — the aboriginal teenager who sees no hope and no prospects for the future, the high school dropout who is in need of skills in order to have any hope of getting a job, the older worker displaced by economic change, and many other voices that must be heard and listened to.

Honourable senators, in this Throne Speech, and indeed in the program that we put forward in our campaign platform, we are listening to these voices and we intend to respond.

One of the key priorities of this government, which was mentioned in the Throne Speech, will be to take on one of the most difficult societal attitudes facing us today. We will make a concerted effort to break the pattern of violence in our society, especially violence against women and children. We will bring in measures to improve community safety and crime prevention. We all want to walk on safe streets, we all want to live in security within our own homes, and we all want ourselves and all other Canadians to be free from racism and from crimes of hate.

It is a question of changing deeply rooted attitudes. However, there is also a connection between increased violence in our society and economic hardship, and that is one of the reasons we are putting a great deal of effort into direct job creation and into building the kind of economy that will give all Canadians a chance to participate.

Not the least of those who need help in participating are people with children, which is why we are committed to bringing in a child care program just as soon as our economic progress quickens enough to permit the initiative announced in our Red Book.

All Canadians have been experiencing very difficult economic times, but the toll has been particularly harsh on those at the lowest end of the income scale. The recession has not only eroded balance sheets and thrown people out of work, it has also seen many Canadians giving up on their government's ability to provide the framework for economic recovery and growth. In recent years — and we hear it every day — our whole system of government and Parliament has been viewed with increased cynicism.

I believe that since the election we have already seen, perhaps, a more positive mood across the country. That mood is tenuous and cautiously hopeful. I think that is a good sign because it is in all of our interests as members of Parliament in both houses that Canadians renew their trust in their institutions. That is why one of the first items in the Throne Speech is the statement that this government intends to keep the commitments made before and during the election campaign. As honourable senators know, these commitments were laid out in detail in our platform entitled "Creating Opportunities," and I listened with interest to Senator Lynch-Staunton. He was taking a bit of a dim view of how the commitments in the Red Book were either acted upon or not contained at all in what —

Senator Frith: A bit of a dim view? I would like to see what a really dim view was.

Senator Doody: He was looking at it from a very neutral position.

Senator Fairbairn: — was a very short and pointed Throne Speech. I was tempted to respond, point by point, to Senator Lynch-Staunton.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Molgat: To the humorous sections in his speech?

Senator Fairbairn: No. I have to tell you, Senator Molgat — you saw me taking my notes — I was getting all fired up and then Senator Lynch-Staunton lost me. You absolutely lost me, Senator Lynch-Staunton, when you said that we were inheriting an economic situation that was the envy of many.

Senator Molgat: First prize for humour.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is true. The OECD has told us that we will get the best growth rates over the next two years.

Senator Fairbairn: I do not want to get into the absolute nuts and bolts of why we are the envy of the world. I can only say that when we were facing the year ahead with the prospect, we thought, of a $32.6 billion deficit, which is horrendous in itself, and we have now seen that it may well end up being $46 billion, I really do not believe we can describe the situation as being one to be envied. I would rather, if I may —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Tell that to the OECD.

Senator Fairbairn: It is not the OECD that worries me as much as the Canadian people.

Senator Hastings: The Canadian people judged you.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The campaign is over.

Senator Fairbairn: That is one of the reasons why a central point of our Throne Speech, and of our whole presentation during the election campaign, was opportunities for jobs for Canadians.

An unemployment statistic of 11.2 per cent covers the harsh reality that over 1.5 million Canadians are on the sidelines, unable to participate in the economy, unable to participate or contribute to the daily lives of their families, and unable to contribute to the national life of this country. Many more have stopped even looking for work. We need them back.

In 1977, when Senator Frith moved the motion for the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, he told us that unemployment should be spoken of "...in terms of human hardship, not in terms of global statistics." Statistics give us a measure of the problem we face, but they do not describe the physical and the personal hardships now confronting millions of Canadians and their families. That is what we, as parliamentarians, will be addressing in the months ahead.

Our government believes in an approach that is financially responsible and balanced. It takes account of the enormous debt and deficit with which we are faced, as well as the need to stimulate the economy to create growth and create jobs. Certainly, the private sector, particularly the small business sector, will continue to be the engine of job recovery in this country. Small- and medium-sized businesses now create upwards of 85 per cent of all the new jobs in Canada.

We have already started to put in place some measures, such as better access to investment risk capital, reductions in the government's regulatory paper burden faced by small firms, and other measures, including persuasion with the banks, to make it easier for our small businesses in this country to get the financing they need to set up their operations, and indeed prosper.

The specifics of those programs will be laid out in more detail in the upcoming federal budget. But one of the major commitments we have made, honourable senators, is to do away with the goods and services tax.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And then?

Senator Fairbairn: As my colleague the Minister of Finance has indicated —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What happens after? You intend to replace it with what?

Senator Fairbairn: — we are committed to replacing the GST as soon as possible with a fairer and simpler system.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: A fair tax. That's a lovely one!

Senator Fairbairn: In the interim, we will take steps to reduce the administrative burden to make it easier for Canadians to comply.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Bring back the manufacturers' tax.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator MacEachen has always been very supportive of the manufacturers' tax. It brought in the money, there is no question about it. The GST has been a real disappointment in that regard.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The taking off of the manufacturers' tax has helped our exports.

Senator Fairbairn: One of the things the government intends to do, Senator Lynch-Staunton, is to place this issue before the House of Commons Committee on Finance, which has been asked to develop options to deal with the GST.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Delay, delay, delay.

Senator Fairbairn: No, not delay. It will enable the Canadian people to have a role in changing this tax.

• (1610)

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Bring back Senator Hébert's petitions.

Senator Fairbairn: As every senator in this house knows, it is probably the most hated piece of legislation ever passed by the Parliament of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Carney: The National Energy Program tops the list.

Senator Fairbairn: In addition to the parliamentary process, the government is undertaking federal-provincial consultation to ensure that the replacement of the tax has a broad public and intergovernmental consensus.

We also believe that governments can, and should, take direct action where the private sector either will not, or cannot, move. This is why we have moved forward quickly with the Municipal Infrastructure Program.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: One convention centre in Quebec!

Senator Fairbairn: Don't be so pessimistic, Senator Lynch-Staunton. This will see the direct creation of thousands of new jobs and the indirect creation of many thousands more, while investing in projects of long-lasting benefit to Canadians in major centres of this country where unemployment is high, such as Quebec City. We will be bringing improvement to the quality of life for our citizens, while improving their job prospects at the same time.

In other areas, such as training and adjusting for the highly technical and competitive new job market, we are already at work putting together a National Youth Services Corps which will give young Canadians the opportunity to further their education and career development by working on social and environmental services in their own communities and across the country.

We will also have a program in partnership with the provinces and the private sector to better prepare young people for the school-to-work transition where so many of them fall by the wayside now because they have neither the experience nor the skills to be competitive in seeking jobs. We must give young Canadians the chance to get that relevant experience and the skills they need to qualify. Those programs will help do that.

We need a workforce which is not just more highly skilled but which is more flexible and adaptable to new conditions. I sincerely hope that the business community will support these initiatives which will help them grow faster and larger and, ultimately, become more profitable in the coming years.

I preface my next remarks by saying that there is some self-interest in what I am about to say. I am also pleased that the government has made a commitment to restoring funding for the National Literacy Program.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: I am pleased that the Prime Minister has given me the responsibility for promoting the government's activities in this regard. As all senators know, and especially those who have listened to me for more hours than they ever cared to, this is an issue which is close to my heart. It is an issue which, over the last decade, has brought me into contact with some of the most committed and dedicated people in this country.

Honourable senators, we should never underestimate the magnitude of this problem. It may not remain high on the list of most popular issues about which politicians like to speak. I know Senator Berntson has had a great deal to do with this issue. He and his wife have done remarkable things in the province of Saskatchewan to further the opportunities for people to learn.

Statistics Canada has reported that approximately 38 per cent — more than one-third of adult Canadians — do not have adequate literacy and numeracy skills. This fact has enormous economic implications which I believe we are only now beginning to understand. Obviously, our efforts to train and retrain workers are undermined seriously by this deficiency. The challenge of teaching the new high-tech computer skills is impeded if the individual cannot read a computer manual.

There are also disturbing implications for safety on the job if people cannot read the warning and danger notices; of time wasted because people cannot understand written instructions, and many, many other cases which I have brought before this house in recent years. All of that, in turn, prevents us from reaching our competitive potential in the international marketplace.

Just as important, on a personal level, without these fundamental skills millions of Canadians are prevented from becoming full participants in our economy and our society but, most important, even within their own families. We are restoring the funding of the National Literacy Secretariat. Therefore, we are increasing our support for literacy organizations and projects across this country.

We are also participating in an international study to compare, on a regular basis, literacy skills in Canada with other countries. This will give us a much clearer picture of the relative effectiveness of our approach. It will help us focus our efforts on the most productive way of dealing with this problem. Of necessity, the literacy community in this country is broadly based and very much connected to people where they live and work. I will be communicating and participating in activities as often as I can with these groups and organizations and, in particular, with learners themselves.

The government is also committed to reviewing our health care program and to finding ways to make it work more efficiently to deliver better service for all Canadians. There will be a greater emphasis on preventative care, such as encouraging proper diet, proper exercise and more home care for those who are in need but not requiring a hospital bed. The Prime Minister feels so strongly about this issue that he will chair a national forum on the renewal of Canada's health care system.

Honourable senators, we will continue to uphold the five fundamental principles on which the Canadian health care system is founded. They are universality, public funding, public administration, comprehensibility and accessibility. Medicare is at the heart of the Liberal social commitment in this country. We believe that every Canadian has an equal right to the best medical care that Canada can afford. We intend to strengthen that system, not weaken it.

We also want to strengthen our relationship with the First Peoples of this country. We will be introducing measures to build a new partnership with aboriginal Canadians which safeguards aboriginal and treaty rights, and through which we will be working on community development, housing, health, education and justice issues.

More specifically, we will also be introducing a program for aboriginal children called Head-Start which will help ensure that, in the important and formative years, every aboriginal child has access to good food, clothing and adequate shelter. This will help tremendously to encourage them to complete their schooling, giving them a better chance for later success.

The cornerstone of our new partnership is the recognition of the inherent right to self-government. That has been a Liberal Party policy for several years. It is the key to opening up a fair and productive future for all aboriginal Canadians. We are supposed to be equal partners in this country. That has not happened. This government recognizes that fact and is taking steps to make that partnership a reality. We will be working as closely and as swiftly as these difficult issues permit.

In its actions since the election, and in the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister and his government have started to fulfil commitments that were made. These include everything from reducing the size of the cabinet to the cancellation of some programs, which I do not expect the opposition to applaud. I refer to the helicopter program and the Pearson airport proposal.

We will also be dealing with questions such as the pensions of members of Parliament. We will be appointing an ethics counsellor to regulate the lobbying industry in this country. Some of this can and has been done by executive action, but some of it will require legislation. That, of course, means Parliament: the House of Commons and the Senate. The government has said repeatedly that it is committed to regaining the respect of Canadians in their Parliament. I will do everything, as all of us in this house will, to try and help fulfil that undertaking.

In addition to scrutinizing legislation, the Senate has long had a useful role in examining issues which are important to Canadians but which do not lend themselves to easy or swift legislative action. We remember the studies on poverty and aging, on children at risk, on the media, on Senate reform and on an international favourite, Senator Sparrow's "Soil at Risk." These and many other Senate reports are still referred to by scholars, by public servants and by politicians as they continue to grapple with many of these troublesome and chronic problems.

More recently, our committees have paid special attention to subjects as diverse as youth, international trade, energy and the environment, the changing work place, terrorism and public safety. Only this week we are turning our attention to new special issues such as the right to die and the treatment of aboriginal war veterans in Canada. This is the kind of work that the Senate is very good at. The government looks forward to this chamber continuing this important role.

Senator Neiman made a point today, in initiating her inquiry, along with Senator Lavoie-Roux, on the question of the right to die. Partisanship is not the route to take in dealing with these issues in this chamber.

I wish to conclude by returning to a reference I made earlier to the mood of Canadians and what they think of their country. As the Prime Minister has said many times, the one essential but also intangible quality that is required in pulling people together to build a better society is "hope." The task of government is to come up with the programs, the policies and the direction that will help to turn hope into a reality.

Yes, there is cynicism out there. There is also frustration and some anger. In fact, some political voices in this country say that Canada does not work any more and that we should give up altogether. Some say that people in this country simply do not care enough about one another to make it all work.

I strongly disagree with that attitude. It is wrong. I believe that there are millions of Canadians who do care and who do want to make a difference — millions of individuals who are willing to put in the effort to help their counterparts all across this land.

In this country, we have possibly the most outstanding volunteer culture in the world. Over one billion hours of service are donated by Canadians in volunteer activities each and every year. That represents roughly $13 billion-worth of unpaid work. That is a remarkable figure, and it proves that in tough times Canada and Canadians put action ahead of good intentions — and they are prepared to give more!

Just as an example, I looked at statistics in my home province of Alberta. A recent Statistics Canada survey affirms, among other things, that charitable contributions by individuals in three small towns in southern Alberta — namely Cardston, Raymond and Coaldale — are among the highest in the entire country. I think that is terrific! I am proud to come from that area, and to represent those Canadians who are involved in that way with the life of their country. In turn, they are representative of the strength, the understanding and the compassion that exists throughout Canada.

Honourable senators, here in Ottawa today there is a government — and a Parliament which includes a Senate — that does care and does want to work in partnership with Canadians; which does want to build a stronger economy and a fairer society, not only for adults but also for the young people who must lead us into the twenty-first century. Honourable senators, I am looking forward to working with colleagues on both sides of this house as we do our part together to help realize that goal.

On motion of Senator Beaudoin, debate adjourned.

ADDRESS IN REPLY—TERMINATION OF DEBATE ON EIGHTH SITTING DAY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of January 19, 1994, moved:

> That the proceedings on the Order of the Day for resuming the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to His Excellency the Governor General's Speech from the Throne addressed to both Houses of Parliament be concluded on the eighth sitting day on which the order is debated.

He said: Honourable senators, I have proposed this motion, which is the standard motion that is made each time there is a Throne Speech. If there are objections to it — that is, if someone wants to extend the debate, we can do so. However, this has been the traditional procedure and I suggest that we adopt it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Senate budget 1994-95), presented in the Senate on January 19, 1994.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the chairman of the committee is not here.

You, Your Honour, are the deputy chairman. Under the circumstances, I move that the report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the report be adopted?

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate in the name of Senator Doyle.

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Doyle, debate adjourned.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE REGULATIONS PROPOSED TO THE EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT

Hon. Michael Kirby, pursuant to notice of January 19, 1994, moved:

> That when the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is established, it be authorized to examine the regulations proposed to the Export Development Act (S.C. 1993, c. 26), together with the regulatory impact statement, originally printed in the Canada Gazette Part I, November 6, 1993; and
> That the committee report to the Senate no later than February 28, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, some of you will recall that Bill C-118 went through the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and then through the Senate last spring.

During the course of the hearings on Bill C-118, which was the Export Development Act amendments, there was some controversy raised by a number of business witnesses, notably those from the banking industry and the insurance industry, with respect to the additional powers that were being granted to the Export Development Corporation.

As a result of the discussion at the hearings, in winding up the hearings the committee asked the honourable Michael Wilson, who was then the Minister of International Trade, if he would agree to allow the committee to hold hearings on the regulations, which the act called to be established, prior to those regulations being put into effect. Mr. Wilson agreed that it made sense that, once the regulations had been gazetted, but before they were put into effect, he was prepared to give the committee time to hold those hearings.

The regulations, in fact, were gazetted early in November, so the original 60 days which Mr. Wilson had contemplated would have resulted in the regulations coming into force in mid-January. The current Minister of International Trade, the Honourable Roy MacLaren, has agreed not to put those regulations into effect until such time as the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce holds its hearings.

Honourable senators, we would hope to be able to have those hearings during the week of February 8. The witnesses are prepared to come. This involves a relatively small number of witnesses on a couple of fairly controversial issues. It is my hope that the Senate will approve this reference to the committee today so that we will be able to hold those hearings during the week that the Senate returns.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, you have heard the motion.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE TREATMENT OF ABORIGINAL VETERANS FOLLOWING WORLD WAR I, WORLD WAR II AND THE KOREAN WAR

Hon. Len Marchand, pursuant to notice of January 19, 1994, moved:

> That when the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples is established, it be authorized to examine and report upon the treatment of aboriginal veterans following the First and Second World Wars and the Korean War; and
> That the committee present its report no later than September 15, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, before I begin my remarks I want to congratulate my old friend and seatmate Roméo LeBlanc in his elevation to great heights as our esteemed Speaker of this institution. I have known Senator LeBlanc for a number of years, both in the other place and here, and I am sure that he will serve us well in his new duties, and I do wish him well.

I also want to congratulate those involved in the changes of leadership on both sides of the house: Senator John Lynch-Staunton, Senator Berntson, and Senator Kinsella. I wish them well in their new duties.

Also, on our side of the house, a couple of my old pals over here were elevated to greater heights: Senator Joyce Fairbairn, as our new leader; Senator Gil Molgat; and, of course, Senator Hébert, as our whip.

There is also another important occasion in this Parliament that I wish to note, in that one of our pages, Douglas Lauriault, a Métis from Maniwaki, has joined us in this esteemed institution. This is the first time that an aboriginal person has ever served as a page in this institution. I want to wish Doug well in his duties.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Marchand: That, in itself, is a very happy occasion but I suppose, in another way, it is rather sad that it has taken 126 years, just 126 years, for this kind of an event to occur. I will say no more on that.

• (1640)

Honourable senators, let me say at the outset how pleased I am that such a motion is before us today. It is long overdue. As a young boy growing up on the Okanagan Reserve, I recall the pride I felt when many of our people joined the war effort. The enlistment of aboriginal peoples across Canada was among the highest in the country, a fact in which many of our people take justified pride. As I grew older, I came to appreciate the significance of their personal sacrifice, and the loss to our communities of such a large number of our able-bodied men and women.

According to the 1918 Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs, the number of enlistments among the Indians in proportion to their population was remarkably large. More than 3,500 enlistments of Indians were recorded by the department. This represented approximately 35 per cent of the Indian male population of military-age residents in the nine provinces. It must be remembered that this did not include a large number of Indians who enlisted of which the department had no information.

The exact number of Métis participants is not known because the nominal roll lists of the Canadian expeditionary forces do not include ethnic origin. However, Julia Harrison, a Métis historian, notes that you see many Métis names such as Riel, Lépine, Nolin and Trottier on Canada's Military Roll of Honour, including that of Private Patrick Riel, nephew of Louis Riel, killed in action in France, January 16, 1916. Paddy Riel was a woodsman and trapper who depended upon the accuracy of his shooting for his livelihood. He enlisted with the 8th Battalion, Little Black Devils, the regiment which 30 years before had stormed the Métis stronghold at Batoche.

The department also acknowledged the contribution of aboriginal people in the war efforts. The report noted that the Indians have indeed established for themselves a magnificent record which placed their race high in the esteem of their fellow countrymen and our Allies. The manner in which the Indians have responded to the call of the colours appears especially commendable when it is remembered that they are wards of the government and have not, therefore, the responsibility of citizenship; that many of them were obliged to make long and arduous journeys from remote localities in order to offer their services, and that their disposition renders them naturally averse to leaving their own country and conditions of life.

I want to say that my people in the Okanagan also distinguished themselves in the war effort. According to the 1919 Annual Report of Indian Affairs, the Indians of the Okanagan agency made a splendid response to the call for volunteers, particularly among the members of my band, the Head of the Lake Band. It was reported that every unmarried, able-bodied male member of my band between the ages of 20 and 35 was on active service.

One of these Okanagan Indians, Private George McLean, performed an extraordinary feat of valour at Vimy Ridge, in recognition whereof he was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal for conspicuous gallantry in action. Private McLean, single-handedly, with a dozen bombs, killed 19 Germans and captured 14. He was himself seriously wounded.

Over the last year, I have come to appreciate more clearly the concerns of our aboriginal veterans and those of their families. Many aboriginal veterans made the ultimate sacrifice for this country, yet their families have never been properly cared for. Their concerns have been repeatedly ignored.

It has been more than two years since the Manitoba Justice Inquiry recommended that the topic of aboriginal veterans' entitlements should be studied. In their report, the commissioners recommended that a detailed study of the federal statutes and regulations and their implementation is needed to determine the unequal treatment of aboriginal veterans.

While the Manitoba Justice Enquiry did not undertake a detailed investigation into the concerns of aboriginal veterans, they were able to conclude the following:

Indian veterans do not appear to have received benefits off the reserve, and if they left the reserve they lost status and benefits under the Indian Act. In other words, they were no longer Indians.

Indian veterans who remained on the reserve were entitled already to land under the Indian Act, and yet it appears that the reserve land allocated to Indian veterans was treated as though it had been granted under the Soldier Settlement Act or the Veterans' Land Act. In other words, there are a number of Indian veterans who received land granted to them on their own reserves. Now, figure that one out. It was their own land.

The transfer of the ownership of land to or by Indians, on or off reserves, created jurisdictional problems because of the contradictory provisions of the Veterans' Land Act and the Indian Act. A few days ago I was digging around for some information pertinent to this motion, and lo and behold I found that there is a band in northern British Columbia called the Blueberry Band at Fort St. John. For some reason, the government of the day took a large portion of that reserve and gave it to white veterans. The Department of Indian Affairs poorly administered the Veterans' Land Act benefits for aboriginal veterans who settled on the reserve.

The leadership of the National Aboriginal Veterans Association has also pushed for the investigation of their post-war treatment since at least 1981. With the assistance of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, the aboriginal veterans made the largest survey of aboriginal veterans ever undertaken. Their findings confirm those of the Aboriginal Justice Inquiry and the deep-seated concerns of our aboriginal veterans.

According to their report, the most common complaint has proven to be that returning Indian veterans of Canadian service in World Wars I and II and the Korean War, whether on-reserve or off-reserve, status or non-status, were subject to discrimination in the availability and distribution of veterans benefits and were in fact treated as "second class" veterans. Most complain that they were never made aware of education benefits, low interest loans for purchasing housing or starting a business, nor the full range of veterans' land benefits available to all veterans.

Although our people were treated as equals during the war effort, our veterans returned home to face discrimination, hardship and, on occasion, bigotry. As the results of the veterans survey demonstrate, many aboriginal veterans were unaware of the assistance and benefits which were widely available to non-aboriginal veterans. The denial of land benefits to aboriginal veterans merely repeated the denial of their land rights upon the settlement of Canada, and has left many aboriginal veterans disillusioned and hurt.

I want all honourable senators to know how strongly our aboriginal veterans feel about these issues. At a Métis veterans conference in Saskatoon last summer, Métis veterans completed a survey, the results of which illustrate the depths of their concerns. Asked whether they would serve in the armed forces again after the poor treatment they received upon their return home, many said they would not.

• (1650)

Honourable senators, this is a damning indictment of our post-war treatment of aboriginal veterans. It is a call to action, and one to which we must respond with vigour and compassion. Aboriginal veterans have given much to Canada. It is now time for us to honour them by responding to their call. I urge all of you to join with me in supporting this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE HONOURABLE JOHN LYNCH-STAUNTON

ELECTION BY SECRET BALLOT AS LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION IN THE SENATE

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, precedents create constitutional conventions and contribute to the evolution of parliamentary law.

I wish to bring to the attention of senators an event which constitutes a precedent, the election of Senator John Lynch-Staunton as Leader of the Conservatives in the Senate by Conservative caucus members in a secret vote on December 15, 1993. This event should go down in the archives of the Senate, because it is the first time that a Leader of the Opposition in the Senate has been elected in this manner.

A committee of four senators, chaired by Senator Pat Carney, recommended such a secret vote. A chain of circumstances made it possible.

Since Confederation, with the alternation of Liberals and Conservatives in power, it has been easy to know which party could claim the title of official opposition in each chamber.

With the election of October 25, 1993, however, for the first time, the title of official opposition went to a secessionist party, on the customary basis of the number of seats held.

In the Senate, there is no counterpart to the Bloc Québécois, so we applied the only possible principle: the party having the greatest number of seats in the opposition is the official opposition. This official opposition then chose to elect its leader. This is an event that is worth putting on record.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would say to my dear colleague Senator Beaudoin that constitutional experts are scarcely less of a nuisance than are we historians.

I have always believed that, of the constitutional experts whom I have read, Sir Ivor Jennings was the best. After three years of studying the situation in Pakistan, which had hired him with an advance payment of £50,000, he told them in a very short letter that a constitution was worthless. He said, "If I wrote one for you, you would tear it up!"

VETERANS AFFAIRS

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARIES OF WORLD WAR II BATTLES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise to remind the Senate that this year, 1994, Canada will honour various fiftieth anniversaries of World War II — notably the Normandy landings on June 6, 1994 — through the Canada Remembers program launched by the Secretary of State for Veterans Affairs on November 9, 1993. That program provides Canadians with the occasion to honour those who, 50 years ago, took part in Canada's greatest series of military victories.

Our contribution to the defeat of Hitler's Nazi Germany will be depicted in a series of ceremonies remembering the First Canadian Army, the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Royal Canadian and Merchant Navy, the key elements in the grand alliance against the Hitler tyranny.

Our celebrations will focus on the Canadian landing on Juno Beach in which, with many other Canadians, I had the honour to take part as a member of the North Shore New Brunswick Regiment.

I shall never forget that day as the Canadians entered and breached Hitler's west wall along with our British and American allies. We had long prepared for that day by training in Britain and taking part in the battles of Dieppe, Sicily and Italy, and now we were there on the beaches of Normandy, upwards of a quarter of a million strong.

This summer, some half million Canadian veterans will remember these exploits, and many will actually visit the scenes of 50 years ago to relive those gallant days and honour our fallen comrades. Together with our allies, their leaders, and our own Prime Minister, we will honour that Canadian achievement, which was out of all proportion to that of our much larger allies.

Like our gallant Canadian corps of World War I, the First Canadian Army won everlasting recognition in its march to victory. Fifty years later, Canadians are remembered for their gallantry and courage, and the contribution we made to peace. Those we liberated remember us yet as those who once freed them from the Nazi yoke.

The shoulder patch "Canada," our divisional patches and regimental flashes and our distinctive cap badges are milestones of how and where we served in the march towards V-day. Every Canadian, now and for the future, will carry the honour of the Normandy battle, not just as battle honours for their colours but as part of Canada's heritage honouring those who, 50 years ago, fought for their country in June and beyond. This summer, in so many ceremonies at home and abroad, let the people of Canada honour their fallen and their veterans so that all Canadians may pay tribute to the brave young men of those days.

Honourable senators, as this First Session of the Thirty-fifth Parliament continues, I will call the attention of the Senate to various aspects of the Canada Remembers program as it progresses.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as a result of a discussion with my honourable friends opposite, there is agreement to continue the practice that was in place during the last session of Parliament of having a "short" Wednesday. In other words, when the Senate adjourns on Tuesday, it will meet at 1:30 p.m. on Wednesday. The understanding is that we will finish at three o'clock, after which committees can meet. At the moment, there are no committee meetings scheduled. However, I understand that tomorrow an indoctrination or information session is to take place. Thus, we have agreed to meet at 1:30 p.m.

I have a motion based on the understanding that we have. However, I seek the agreement of honourable senators to postpone moving the motion until later this day. The reason I ask is that there is a debate going on in the other place at this time on a government bill concerning the longshoremen's strike on the Pacific coast. It is possible that we will receive that bill later this day and may want to proceed with it. If there is agreement, then we can proceed with the bill quickly.

I ask for the agreement of honourable senators in order to remain flexible. If there is such agreement, then as soon as I have further information as to the timing of the matter, I shall inform the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) presented Bill S-2, to implement a convention between Canada and the Republic of Hungary, an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Nigeria, an agreement between Canada and the Republic of Zimbabwe, a convention between Canada and the Argentine Republic and a protocol between Canada and the Kingdom of the Netherlands for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to income taxes and to make related amendments to other Acts.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Molgat, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, February 10, 1994.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE GOVERNMENT

PROGRESS OF LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the House of Commons has been in session now for some three weeks, and when one looks at the bills that have been introduced there so far, one can only express surprise at their thinness. They are mainly of an administrative and housekeeping nature; there is nothing of substance. One wonders whether such an agenda during this period should not cause some worry, indicating as it does how the government now feels about the House of Commons.

The House has been spending most of its time giving advice to the government, which all of a sudden cannot take any decisions without consultation from members on both sides. For example, the GST will not be replaced before 1996 because it has to be studied by a committee. The Minister of Human Resources Development is asking a select committee to look into social security and, while there may be some legislation later this fall or next year, there is no mention made of any implementation. The Minister of Health has announced the creation of a national forum on health; the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has announced the launch of a new public consultation. During this period, the House has discussed peace-keeping, cruise missiles and the budget.

Can the minister confirm what one can only conclude: that this extraordinary, unprecedented process simply means that the government no longer recognizes the House as a legislative body but, rather, as an advisory board, and that, accordingly, the Senate's role in the parliamentary process will be reduced to that of spectator?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in response to Senator Lynch-Staunton, I would answer the latter part of his question first. The answer is no. I think we can look forward to a very active period in the Senate. I believe senators on both sides of this house will guarantee that this period in the Senate will be active, and that we will develop issues that perhaps the House of Commons itself will not focus upon.

As far as the House of Commons is concerned — and I will not go into a long dissertation, because it might be a shade painful for the ears of my friends opposite — the government has been extremely active since the last election. It has had productive meetings with the provinces. It has introduced an infrastructure program which has now been taken up by all but three of the provinces. Infrastructure agreements now in place go to the very heart of the election campaign, which was the urgent need for creating jobs and economic growth in this country.

We have also followed through on other important issues, such as those that dealt with the Toronto airport and helicopters.

We have also done something else in the House of Commons that is perhaps worthy of a debate at some other time in this chamber: we have responded to what the people of Canada have been asking parliamentarians to do, and that is to listen to them. The government is also being asked to listen to the peoples' representatives in the House of Commons.

It may be that no legislation has been introduced on peace-keeping, or on the cruise missile. However, we did something that has not been done in the Parliament of Canada for a very long time, and that is to have policy debates on the floor of the House of Commons, debates that then are available for consideration by the government as it reaches its decisions.

Apart from what has been happening in Parliament, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Martin, has travelled to every region of this country to have open consultations on the budget. Maybe it makes it tougher for him, in the end, to listen to Canadians, but he is listening to them and he is hearing them.

Therefore, Senator Lynch-Staunton, I believe that we will have an ambitious legislative program. We will also be examining some of the most important issues facing our country, including the one to which he referred most particularly, the social policy review, which will take place as part of the balanced approach this government will be taking on the economic side and the social safety net side at the same time.

These are not issues that can be decided overnight. There are people in this country who are very anxious to have a part in shaping the decisions that will come out of these reviews. Therefore, I ask the honourable senator, in that sense, to keep an open mind on these processes, because I think they will make for good government in Canada.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Perhaps the leader was reading from the notes of the former Prime Minister, who said that, in one case, 47 days were not enough. Now we are told that two years may not be enough.

Senator Olson: The restoration of democracy.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Restoration of democracy? I find it extraordinary that the main sources upon which this government is relying for advice are, one, a party which is bent on breaking up this country, and the other, a party whose views can only be called "reactionary" on the fundamental issues facing this country, when we have in this very chamber, on both sides of the house, the experience and knowledge, which are being completely neglected, of people who believe in the fundamental values that make up Canada. Instead, the government relies on separatists and reactionaries.

• (14:20)

Senator Fairbairn: I am not sure that there is a question there, but I would —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: — but you will answer it anyway. Why?

Senator Fairbairn: Why? The Leader of the Opposition has raised a very important question on the democratic process. We must acknowledge that the people who sit in the House of Commons are there because of the democratic process. They were elected by the people of Canada. We may dispute the outcome of that election in various parts of this house or in various parts of this country, but the fact is that the people who vote in our elections are the ones who make those decisions.

We have an interesting and different configuration in Parliament today. Here in the Senate of Canada we have two strong groups represented. I hope that we will be able to provide some very important and meaningful advice on some of the critical issues of the day. I am aware of the depth of conviction with which members of this chamber hold their positions. There should be no doubt where the members of this chamber stand on the future of our country.

CLASSIFICATION OF TOBACCO AS HAZARDOUS PRODUCT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, my question is with respect to the policy announced this morning by the government on "A Government Action Plan On Smuggling." I must say that the coalition of health groups that is opposed to the reduction of taxes on cigarettes at the price point is not entirely happy with this announced policy.

As I am sure we all know, the increase in tobacco taxes during the 1980s resulted in a much greater decline in cigarette smoking in Canada than in the United States; I think from 41 to 26 per cent. In fact, a study by Finance Canada in June of 1993 entitled "Taxes, Tobacco and Consumption" clearly demonstrates that the increase in taxes was more important than other measures in the reduction in smoking.

Is the Government of Canada, then, through these measures which are directed towards smuggling, abandoning its policy of deterring smoking through the reduction of taxes — ?

Senator Molgat: Not at all.

Senator Spivak: Just a moment. Let me finish my question. That policy, of course, is a basic part of the national —

Senator Molgat: This is just part of a smoke screen.

Senator Spivak: I listen to you all the time. Please listen to me.

This policy was a basic part of the national strategy to reduce tobacco use. That strategy says that the government considers the tax on tobacco products to be a significant public health measure, and that the tax is one of the factors known to reduce tobacco use, particularly among the young.

If the government is not considering such a policy change, although it has reduced the taxes which are an essential part of that policy, will it then place tobacco, a product which kills an estimated 44,000 people a year, under the Hazardous Products Act where it belongs? That act regulates production, import, sale and advertising of hundreds of potentially dangerous products, such as kite strings, teddy bears and hockey helmets, and would put in place a powerful instrument through which the government could deter people from smoking.

This, however, is not to say that the coalition of health groups would not still be unhappy about the reduction in taxes.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for her question. This has been a very important and difficult day on an incredibly difficult issue.

First of all, I would like to assure my honourable friend that the government is in no way abandoning its commitment to a vigorous assault on smoking in this country.

As I recall, a few years ago this house expressed strong views on this issue, as did I as a member of the Senate. The honourable senator mentioned the Hazardous Products Act. I believe my colleague the Minister of Health has already indicated today that that statute is being studied with respect to how it might be of use in the matter. I would emphasize that what we are dealing with here is not a single issue.

As you know, because there has been no lack of publicity, the government has been almost agonizing — if I may use the expression — over the problem in recent days and weeks in order to come up with a solution that would have the best chance for success. That solution cannot be single-pronged; it must be multi-pronged.

We in Canada are dealing with an enormous problem of contraband and smuggling of cheap cigarettes. We are dealing not just with a few people but with a very intricate network, primarily of organized crime. At the heart of the announcement today is an effort to get at that network. We are bringing forward increased enforcement measures and tax cuts to cigarette products across the country. Provinces may opt into these measures as they see fit, and we will increase support for them as they do so.

We have also targeted manufacturing profits — and I believe some of the people you are speaking for today would agree that this is an area that has been very difficult for governments to deal with in past years. We are bringing in as part of our measures an export tax on cigarettes. We will make that tax stick. We are also bringing in a health surtax over a three-year period. We will increase by 40 per cent the tax that tobacco manufacturing companies pay to the federal government. The additional revenues will be used for the most extensive anti-smoking and public education program in Canada's history.

I believe it was also said this morning that we are looking into the question of marking cigarettes in order to identify their point of origin. Eighty per cent of the contraband cigarettes sold in Canada come from Canada. That is one thing we wish to stop.

With regard to the public education program, we have also proclaimed today a piece of legislation that was already in existence concerning the age limit at which cigarettes are sold to young people. Young people and women will be the primary targets of our anti-smoking campaign. We will also be moving to ban the "kiddy packs," the small packages of cigarettes that young people may find attractive because of their price.

We will even be looking at generic packaging. I believe it was said in the House of Commons that the feasibility of generic packaging will be considered and that the issue may be referred to a Commons committee for review.

I know that my honourable friend is extraordinarily concerned about the health side of this issue. So am I, and so is the government. It is for that reason that we are bringing together different measures to try to solve an enormously difficult problem.

In conclusion, we are advised by Commissioner Inkster of the RCMP that past efforts to deal with this problem by enforcement have not been successful. The only way to come to grips with the problem is to combine enforcement with a reduction in price and with public education.

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, I do not deplore the measures that will be taken to fight the smuggling, but the centrepiece of the anti-smoking campaign in Canada is taxation. Making cigarettes cheaper means that more people will smoke. My question to the Leader of the Government is, therefore: Is the government abandoning that policy? With all due respect, I do not think the Leader of the Government has answered that question.

Senator Doody: She must have.

Senator Spivak: Lowering the cigarette tax will cost the taxpayers of Canada a great deal of money. Most provinces are against reducing taxes, and the United States is now introducing taxes. I want to ask if that portion of the strategy is being abandoned? I take it from the answer that the government will consider and put into place the Hazardous Products Act and eliminate the exemption of tobacco from that act. Is that a correct assumption?

Senator Phillips: Twenty minutes will do.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, on the Hazardous Products Act, I believe I said in my earlier comments that this matter is being examined by the Minister of Health. I would not wish to go beyond that point. On the question of price, the cheapest cigarettes in Canada are contraband cigarettes. The people who are buying that contraband perhaps more than anyone else are young people. We are trying through this combined effort to get to the root of the problem. We are trying to bring the price down so that contraband cigarettes, first of all, will not generate these great profits and, second, will not have the attraction.

The honourable senator mentioned the intention of the United States to increase the price of cigarettes. As you know, cigarettes in the U.S. are cheaper than they are in Canada. In fact, an increase on the American side might well produce parity with Canada, which, in the end, might be a useful situation. The one thing I want to emphasize is that we are not abandoning the health issue in the smoking campaign. It is central. I know it is difficult and I know it is controversial. We are trying to come to grips with the matter in a holistic way, and I hope we succeed.

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, I have one last question: Will the government then reintroduce taxes? Is this just a temporary measure?

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

SEARCH AND RESCUE OPERATIONS—STATE OF HELICOPTER FLEET

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I hesitate to intrude on the "answer period."

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): The question was good, too.

Senator Doody: During the leader's dissertation in reply to Senator Lynch-Staunton's question earlier she mentioned helicopters. That immediately caused my ears to prick up. This is a matter of major concern on the East Coast of Canada and, I suspect, in all areas of Canada where search and rescue is a matter of grave concern.

• (1440)

The current helicopter rescue force Sea Kings are acknowledged by anyone concerned to be obsolete, unreliable and dangerous to the crews asked to fly them. The statistics are quite startling and frightening, and are of little consolation to people in the North and on the West Coast and the East Coast, and on the lakes and anywhere else where the helicopter rescue capacity has been a major part of the planning and survival of the people involved.

I would ask the Leader of the Government to please let us know as soon as she possibly can what plans are in place to replace the Sea King helicopter force and to fill that major void in the rescue side of the search and rescue capacity of the Canadian government.

The search capacity is not such a big concern. The Auroras and other aircraft are still serviceable, functional and dependable. On the other hand, the helicopters are not only a danger to the people asked to fly them, they are quite unreliable in terms of their rescue capacity.

Senator Fairbairn: Perhaps the honourable senator's ears pricked up or —

Senator Olson: His antenna went up.

Senator Fairbairn: — his antenna went up at the story in the last few days in The Globe and Mail about the Sea Kings.

Senator Doody: No, I have been aware of that situation for quite some time.

Senator Fairbairn: I know, senator, but that story may have reminded you.

Senator Doody: Yes.

Senator Fairbairn: As the honourable senator knows, even under the former plan to have a new fleet of helicopters, those new helicopters would not have come into operation until the end of this decade. I can only repeat the words of the Minister of National Defence, namely that the current aircraft will remain airworthy until the end of this decade and will continue to have the capacity to perform the search and rescue operations for which they are responsible.

The Minister of National Defence has announced that a complete review of our defence programs will be launched within weeks. In the course of that review, I would hope the answer to your other question may emerge.

Senator Doody: I have a short supplementary to ensure that I know exactly what the honourable minister has said. Is it the intention of the Government of Canada to continue to use the current Sea King fleet until the end of this decade, and that there are no plans to charter or otherwise obtain supplementary equipment to augment this rather unfortunate capability?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would argue with the phrase "unfortunate capability." I am advised that it is a very viable and trustworthy capability. People within the armed services have indicated that as well.

I can only repeat what I have said: The current situation is known to my honourable friend, and any divergence from that would be discussed or come through the national defence review that will take place.

HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

PROFESSIONAL TRAINING—DOMAIN OF PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government concerning job training. Does the government intend to follow the practice of the European Economic Community to ensure that job training is delivered as close as possible to workers and clients?

Put yourselves in the Canadian context: Does the government intend to confirm the provinces' constitutional jurisdiction in job training so that this training can be delivered by the provinces, which have control over school boards, schools and teachers, and which are also very close to workers and businesses in every region of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for his question. As he knows, the Minister of Human Resources Development is at this moment undertaking a broad examination of the whole scope of our social programs, our training programs, and our education programs. This examination is now under way, with a very tight timetable to produce results by the end of this year, and he is discussing with all of the provinces in detail the types of accommodations that will be made.

I cannot be definitive in my answer to you, but I will certainly discuss with my colleague the minister just what else I may be able to offer.

Senator Rivest: Does the government leader's answer mean that the Canadian government has a one- or two-year timetable? How many times has the Economic Council of Canada told the federal and provincial governments about the current administrative mess in job training?

Former Prime Minister Campbell and former Premier Bourassa signed such an agreement on job training. The honourable senator tells me that it will take one or two years for the two levels of government to reach an agreement to clean up the job-training mess in Canada, and it could take two more years before this agreement is implemented. Does the government not fear that the implementation of real and effective programs for Canadians will be too late for workers and businesses who are demanding more job training? That it is a matter of urgency and that Canadians and Quebecers cannot wait another four years for concerted action between the two levels of government?

If that is the fight against unemployment promised by the current government, it is quite discouraging, honourable senators.

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: I would agree very much with the honourable senator that this is an urgent issue, but it is not being put off for two years or four years. It is under constant discussion between different levels of government. However, I will discuss the matter with my colleague to determine whether I can provide a more definitive answer on timing to the honourable senator.

IMMIGRATION

REDUCTION OF BUSINESS CLASS COMPONENT— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: First of all, let me congratulate the government, and in particular the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, for making the wise and proper choice to generally stay the course on the previous government's immigration policy.

As The Globe and Mail editorial of February 5, 1994, states:

> ...we seem to recall that, under the last Liberal government, immigration was cut to 85,000. On this, as on so many issues of late, we welcome their conversion to Conservative policy.

Senator Thériault: God forbid!

Senator Di Nino: But there is one difference, and that is: the reduction for next year of the business class component. In particular, what we most need is immigrants to help in our economic recovery. Why reduce the number of business class persons wishing to make Canada their home?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Thank you, honourable senator, for the question.

One thing that both of our parties have in common is a determination to maintain a very healthy level of immigration in this country. This is what we have tried to do. Indeed, as you probably know, the minister is also at work trying to set out a longer-term strategy for immigration that will bring, I hope, an even greater certainty.

• (1450)

I wish to be candid in answering your question. I should therefore like to confer with my colleague in order to provide a more complete answer.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I apologize for having to interrupt Question Period, the half hour provided for in the rules having been used up. We can only continue with leave.

Senator Olson: Let's give leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

INCLUSION OF REPRESENTATIVES OF EAST COAST FISHERMEN ON SOCIAL SECURITY TASK FORCE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The government has announced a program to dismantle the present social security program as we know it, with special emphasis on unemployment insurance and the Canada Assistance Program. The Minister of Human Resources Development has announced the formation of a task force of Canadians experienced in social security and employment reform to assist him. However, the group of Canadians who have the highest occupational unemployment rate — that is, the fishermen in Atlantic Canada — are not represented on that task force.

Can the honourable senator assure this chamber that the fisherman of Atlantic Canada will be allowed to nominate their choice to sit on that advisory board?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can assure my colleague that I will convey to the minister his question and his plea just as quickly as I can, and then provide the minister's response.

As the honourable senator knows, the task force is just one component of the discussions that will be taking place in the next weeks and months. I must say to my honourable friend that the government has absolutely no intention of removing or attacking the social safety net. In fact, the government wishes to make that net as effective as it possibly can be in the current situation, and one of the most important and sensitive issues in even discussing that net is the situation in Atlantic Canada.

I certainly will get back to the honourable senator with a response as quickly as I can.

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL AID FOR FISHERIES ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I thank the honourable minister for her reply. If I may go one step further, I would request financial assistance for the fisheries organizations in order for them to follow along and prepare their presentations. I would point out that many of the organizations represented on the advisory board already receive government financing. This group does not, and I would ask the same consideration for the fishermen as has been afforded to the labour force and other groups on the advisory board.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CIGARETTE SMUGGLING ON NATIVE RESERVES

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: My question relates to the government action plan on smuggling announced this morning by the Prime Minister. Even if smugglers were not referred to specifically in the Prime Minister's speech, all news reports on television, all the information now available, seem to indicate that certain native reserves are an integral part of the smuggling network, or organized crime network, as the Prime Minister put it this morning.

In light of the sad events that have taken place during recent confrontations in Canada between natives and the Canadian Armed Forces, what concrete steps does the government intend to take to ensure that police forces respect the rights of Canadians living on reserves when a decision is made to tail them or to enforce the law?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first I will repeat what I said earlier in this session. The issue we are dealing with here is not isolated to any one part of Canada. It has developed, in recent years, much more strongly in areas of Quebec, in areas of Ontario, and in areas of New Brunswick.

With respect to the operations that will be carried out to increase enforcement of our laws, they will be carried out with determination and great care. The focus of the RCMP and provincial police activities will be, certainly at this point, on the border areas where the activity is most pronounced.

Regarding the aboriginal reserves, there have been discussions between the RCMP and the chiefs of the three reserves that have been most affected by this problem, namely Akwesasne, Kanesatake and Kahnawake. I believe Mr. Grey, the Solicitor General, will be meeting with the chiefs tomorrow. However, I emphasize that enforcement activities will be carried out with care.

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, on the issue of contraband, there is no doubt that cigarette smuggling is a serious problem, but the government documents that are available also refer to the smuggling of alcohol products.

Unlike the situation with respect to cigarettes, where tobacco manufacturers will threaten to close their plants, the smuggling of alcohol into Canada does not really help Canadian plants but, rather, American distillers. What will the government do right now to put a stop to this activity before the situation deteriorates, as in the case of cigarettes?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, one of the concerns that have led to the action we have taken is that the networks that have produced perhaps the most visible type of smuggling, namely cigarette smuggling, are the very networks that are being used for alcohol, and that are being used, to a lesser extent, for drugs, and for some other products. One of our main objectives is to crack these networks. If we are successful, it is the belief of the government that we will also be cracking the networks used for smuggling alcohol and drugs.

AGRICULTURE

STRIKE BY WEST COAST LONGSHOREMEN—DELAY IN INTRODUCING BACK-TO-WORK LEGISLATION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I am well aware of the fact that there may be a bill coming forth today on the grain handlers' strike, or the longshoremen's strike.

Honourable senators, these are not normal times in terms of agriculture and grain production on the prairies, and recently we have had a particularly difficult time. Now grain is starting to move and prices are increasing. This country cannot afford the economic loss that has taken place because of this action.

A loss of two weeks of shipping cannot be made up. Seventy-five per cent of all the freight transported on both our major railroads is grain. That loss cannot be made up. We are now moving into the second week and the cost of demurrage to farmers and to the country is tremendous. The lumber industry is not moving. Seattle is booming.

Under these extraordinary times, why has the government not moved quicker than it has? We have known for a week that the difference between the two negotiating parties was only 25 cents. Surely, for 25 cents, we could not afford the expense that this country and its farmers will pay because the government has not acted.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government has been very conscious of the tremendously difficult position of the agriculture sector across Western Canada, as well as the credibility and the viability of the Port of Vancouver.

Since this unfortunate strike began, every effort has been made to resolve it through the collective bargaining process. Because the sides appeared to be so close and there appeared to be the possibility of a settlement, the government's best judgment was to allow that process to proceed. It became evident on the weekend that the hopes that had been entertained last week were not to be fulfilled; for that reason, the government is moving as swiftly as it can with the legislation today.

As my colleague Senator Molgat said, we are not certain what the situation in the House of Commons will be today. However, I can assure my friend that we will, with everyone's cooperation, move as swiftly as we can here, which will put the system back in operation, I believe, within 12 hours of passage of back-to-work legislation.

I do not suppose anyone could be more disturbed than I at the cost of this strike, both in respect of our shipments and in respect of the reputation of the Port of Vancouver. I can only hope it will be over as quickly as possible.

Senator Gustafson: Honourable senators, I would ask the honourable leader if she would use her good offices to direct some attention to finding a long-term solution to this problem of strikes. This has happened before under our administration, and now it is happening under this administration. Certainly, we all understand the need to negotiate. However, the country cannot stand the prolonged situation that seems to hit it whenever economic times are at their very worst.

I would be pleased if the honourable leader would use her good offices to direct that to the government.

Senator Fairbairn: It would be a pleasure, Senator Gustafson.

ENERGY

PROPOSED CARBON TAX—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, my question will take a very simple answer, which I am sure will be a relief to the Honourable Leader of the Government, given the complex questions that have been offered to her today. It is on a subject that just will not go away for Albertans, and that is the "here again, gone again" carbon tax question.

I know that, as a fellow Albertan, the leader is well aware of the consequences that such a discriminatory tax would have on our province. We in Alberta well recall October 28, 1980, when the National Energy Program was sprung upon Alberta.

I am confused as to the position of the government relative to the statements that have been made in the House of Commons. On January 25, the Honourable Minister of Natural Resources, also an Albertan, in response to an inquiry in the House of Commons relating to the institution of a carbon tax, responded:

> In relation to his specific question let me say that I believe it to be purely speculative. As the hon. member is aware the Minister of Finance has embarked on an unprecedented consultative process. He is in Toronto today. He will be in Calgary on the weekend...
> I welcome you to participate.

On February 2, 1994, in the House of Commons, the Minister of Finance, in response to a similar inquiry, stated:

> I would also say that when I was in Calgary I met with groups on that particular issue. I am certainly prepared between now and the date of the budget to meet with other groups.
> I would tell the leader of the Reform Party that there have been very strong representations made to me by the members of the Alberta caucus...

Yet neither the Minister of Natural Resources nor the Minister of Finance has yet given a simple "yes" or "no" to the question.

Therefore, I ask the honourable leader if she might advise the Senate whether or not the government intends to introduce a carbon tax or any legislation in the following session with respect to this discriminatory approach?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for his question, and I offer a simple answer: Wait for the budget.

Having said that, I would add that the Minister of Finance has also said the whole question of this issue was raised out of the mouths of others and not out of his mouth. He said that both in Calgary and in Ottawa.

I have a colleague at the end of this row who has been outspoken on this matter. I am not in a position to speak for the Minister of Finance on anything to do with taxes. I invite the honourable senator to wait for the budget, and I will leave it at that.

Senator Ghitter: I understand that the Honourable Leader of the Senate met last week with the Leader of the Liberal Party of Alberta, Mr. Decore. Mr. Decore is reported as stating, when he returned to Alberta, that he had the leader's assurances that there would be no carbon tax. Can you give Mr. Decore those assurances but not the Senate?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have not read that report, and I certainly would not discuss here the very good conversations that I had with the Leader of the Liberal Party in Alberta.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cools, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in Reply to his speech at the Opening of the First Session of the Thirty-fifth Parliament. (2nd day of resuming debate)

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I had adjourned the debate, but I am quite willing to yield at this time to my colleague Senator Kelly. Of course, I intend to speak this afternoon on the Speech from the Throne.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Honourable Senator Beaudoin. It is not for any complex reason that I have asked to speak before him. I have a little bit of a time problem. However, what I did not want to confess to Senator Beaudoin when I asked if he would do this for me was that, when I was made aware that he would speak and I would follow him, nothing would be more difficult for me than to follow an eloquent speaker such as Senator Beaudoin. I could not stand having to go through the agony of being such a pale shadow. Thus, I thought I would make my remarks and leave the rest to Senator Beaudoin.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak to the government's Speech from the Throne. I have not delivered any remarks in reply to a Speech from the Throne in previous sessions of Parliament. However, this time I felt it would be important.

In her remarks the other day, Senator Fairbairn referred to the many changes we have witnessed since we were last in this chamber. I am sure each of us here watches with great interest the new political configuration in the other place. I am sure each of us has his or her own theories as to how things will turn out.

There are those who are disturbed at this new configuration — an avowedly separatist party forming Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition; a distinctly regional party holding the next largest block of seats; and two former national parties reduced to a rump of members.

Obviously, I am saddened by the reduced status of the Progressive Conservative Party, a party that has played a major part in Canada's history, its birth, development and maturing as a nation, and, I must say, a party to which I have given considerable time, energy and personal allegiance. I only hope, like many other Canadians, and am optimistic, that the Progressive Conservative Party will rise phoenix-like and take again its rightful place in Canadian politics.

Beyond that, the political reconfiguration we are now witnessing does not bother me terribly much. We must recognize that in many ways Canada is going through a transition, a structural realignment unprecedented in our history. That realignment is being felt in our economy, in our governments, and soon will begin to impact on our institutions. It is only logical, therefore, that it be reflected in our politics.

To a considerable extent, it was the former Conservative government that put the transition and realignment in motion, and then became caught up in the avalanche. It was the former government that realized that Canada risked being left behind in the new world of economic order. To keep pace, the government initiated an ambitious series of initiatives — Canada-U.S. free trade, NAFTA, privatization, deregulation, economic restructuring, major fiscal reforms and government reorganization and retrenchment.

I believe that the political failure of the previous government was not what it did or tried to do, but how it did it. Look at this government's Throne Speech and compare it with the previous government's first Throne Speech in 1984. There is a remarkable similarity in policies and in directions.

The failure of the PC government, in my view, was the rapid pace of change that it partly initiated and to which it partly reacted, and that government's sometimes maddening inability to explain to Canadians why the changes were happening or were necessary. I do not think the former government adequately explained where it was going and why it wanted to get there. As a consequence, Canadians got the impression that they were caught up in a flood of apparently unconnected initiatives going toward an unknown destination.

They were on the track that I think the country has to stay on. I think history will record that the government of the day, the PC government, had the vision to recognize the dangers we were facing if we did not move in new directions. However, they all had to happen so quickly that they were difficult to explain.

Let us look both at the present and forward to the future. Some people find the strong representation of the Bloc Québécois and the Reform Party in the other house ominous and disturbing. Honourable senators, I think it is for the best. I think it is only positive that the views, policies and philosophies espoused by either party will now for the first time be exposed and subjected to parliamentary scrutiny and debate at the national level. It is one thing to promote philosophies and policies during an election campaign to a predisposed regional audience and draw on a well-spring of regional interests and discontents. It is quite another to have those same philosophies and policies debated as actual alternatives to government policies and put under the microscope of parliamentary and public scrutiny every day, day in and day out.

It is important, and I think critical, that the clash of opposing ideas on the future direction of Canada be debated, and there is no better forum for that debate than the Parliament of Canada, where the national perspective should be paramount and where all sides to the issues can be presented and explored.

I think it is fair to say that the federalist case has not been effectively advanced in Quebec for some time. Nor has the sovereigntists' or the quasi-sovereigntists' view been adequately tested in debate, or even adequately explained to the rest of Canada. The Bloc's strong representation in the other place will ensure that this happens.

I want to take the opportunity presented by this debate to talk about another issue, which I wish had been addressed in the Throne Speech; that is, Canada's need for an industrial strategy. Given the Liberal Party's historical ideological orientation and its huge mandate, I thought that a Liberal government would commit itself to the preparation of an industrial strategy. I was disappointed when it did not. It was, after all, the Trudeau government that made a stab at the last industrial strategy in a document entitled "The Way Ahead" for public discussion and debate. I believe our colleagues Senators Pitfield, Kirby, Fairbairn, Kenny and others had more than a little to do with that document and therefore know far more about it than I do.

Surprise has been expressed that the Throne Speech did not mention either the deficit or the government's plan for deficit management. I, too, find that surprising, given the rhetoric during the campaign. Deficit management based on further tax increases will only snuff out the faint glimmer of economic recovery now under way and will probably, as well, contribute to the growth of the underground economy which we see increasing today.

Further government cut-backs, though laudable in some cases and symbolically useful in others, will have little true impact on the government's operating budget. What is therefore required is to increase economic activity by leaps and bounds, thereby increasing tax revenues and putting people back to work in large numbers in meaningful long-term employment.

The question is: Does the government sit back and hope that cyclical economic forces and recovery in the U.S. economy are enough to prime the pump, or does it take a more activist role? I think a more activist role is called for if we are to have sustained, long-term, stable, economic recovery and growth. That is where an industrial strategy comes in.

By an industrial strategy I mean a sector-by-sector analysis of the Canadian economy that identifies strengths and weaknesses, that identifies those sectors that now compete internationally, those sectors that, with some adjustments, could compete and those sectors that neither have nor could with reasonable effort be helped to have a comparative advantage. That analysis would then be used as a guide for federal policies, purchasing decisions, fiscal and regulatory actions in each sector. The focus should be on those sectors which could, with some adjustments, be made competitive. We should then examine each such sector in detail to decide what fiscal policy, regulatory or other governmental actions are needed in order to realize each sector's competitive potential.

Honourable senators, I want to be clear at this point. I am not talking about government subsidies. Only rarely, in my view, do government subsidies accomplish anything. In most cases they either skew market forces or postpone the inevitable. Canada is unfortunately littered with abandoned or underutilized plants that were artificially created by government subsidies and quickly withered in the hot sun of real market forces. Subsidies should be a small part of an industrial strategy.

I am talking about the government acting as a facilitator or a catalyst by making whatever public policy and fiscal adjustments are called for to increase competitiveness on a sector-by-sector basis. I refer to deregulation, regulatory forbearance, infrastructure improvements, training programs, assistance with identifying and applying new-process technology, promoting R&D, generating market intelligence, promoting trade opportunities, and strategically using the federal government's massive purchasing and procurement powers.

In those sectors where a federal Crown corporation exists, especially where it is a dominant firm, we should look at prospects for privatization. We should look at the taxation or duties placed on inputs to ensure we are not putting Canadian firms at a disadvantage.

We should look at our competition law and its application to ensure that our traditional concern about "bigness" does not deprive Canadian companies of the critical mass necessary to compete abroad. Honourable senators, we must understand that a company may be big in the Canadian context, yet still very small in the international market where it competes. With the removal of trade barriers it should be the international competitive situation, not the domestic situation, that determines application of our competition policy.

We must be aggressive in removing interprovincial barriers to trade, and I was pleased with the Throne Speech commitment to do so. On the surface, it is clearly so foolish. I wish the government well in that initiative. Interprovincial trade barriers contribute to our high-cost economy. They militate against national strategy and mean product lines and firm sizes are frequently too small to be able to compete internationally.

Most important, we must facilitate the growth of pools of venture capital for those sectors with competitive potential. Venture capital companies characteristically provide the equity capital — and sometimes the management expertise — that firms need to grow and become more competitive by commercializing new products or by introducing new-process technologies.

The Canadian venture capital industry is underdeveloped. The heavy reliance of venture capital funds on pension funds — and pension funds now account for more than 60 per cent of the capital committed to venture funds — makes our venture funds more conservative than their counterparts in the United States. A large portion of the industry's available investments is heavily concentrated in Quebec — and the Caisse de Dépôt is an example — and Alberta. The network by which deals are matched with funds is unsophisticated and underdeveloped, and there is insufficient connection to foreign venture capital firms and partnership opportunities.

Without a vibrant, developed, venture capital sector we risk losing opportunities both absolutely and also to the more aggressive venture capitalists in the United States.

With such a sector-by-sector industrial strategy in place, we could then knit together the policies and actions of a range of departments and agencies in Ottawa that are otherwise inclined to operate independently and sometimes at cross-purposes — for example, the Department of Finance, Investment Canada, Treasury Board in its management of the infrastructure program, Investment Canada, the Department of Industry, the Competition Bureau, CIDA, the Department for International Trade, and Government Services in its purchasing and procurement activities.

I am not talking about a top-down command economy type of industrial strategy; I am talking about building on the extensive sectoral analyses already done by the industry department. Those sector analyses have already identified, implicitly at least, winners and losers by sectors and have identified impediments to enhanced competitiveness on a sector-by-sector basis. The next step is to involve each sector identified in the development of a strategy to maximize its potential. Provincial governments, labour organizations and academic institutions with a role to play or something to offer should also be involved in the development of a strategy for each sector.

I realize, honourable senators, that industrial strategy presents political complications. As I have said, an industrial strategy requires the explicit identification of winners and losers on a sector-by-sector basis. However, losers do not like to be identified as losers, especially if it also means being cut off from government assistance and general largesse. It is particularly difficult for governments if losers are highly concentrated in a specific region or province.

That is why now is the time to devise such a strategy. This government, with its huge mandate and almost an entire term ahead, has a unique opportunity to do what has to be done and brave the political wrath that will come from some quarters.

What is required is a strong dose of political courage. We also must confront the reality that, to a considerable degree, we do not have a choice. Our newest free trade partner, Mexico, has had a comprehensive and very successful industrial strategy, the national development strategy, in place since 1986. The economic revitalization of Mexico that has occurred as a consequence of that strategy and the unswerving political commitment to it has been phenomenal. Mexican government economists now forecast that gross output of the Mexican economy will exceed Canada's by the year 2000, thereby relegating Canada to weak-sister status in NAFTA unless we respond.

Another of Canada's major trading partners, Japan, has had an industrial strategy in place for some time. Many of the Pacific Rim countries with whom we trade or wish to promote trade have some form of industrial strategy in place or under development.

As for our largest trading partner and geographic neighbour, we must realize that we risk being picked clean by American states who identify winners in the Canadian economy and offer them very attractive inducements to move to the United States. In the absence of a strategy, and in the absence of federal-provincial cooperation, we simply do not have the tools to compete with this kind of industrial cherry-picking.

We must also realize that we do not have much time. The economic future of Canada will be set over the next four to five years. We are now standing at the crossroads. Which way we turn will determine the future economic health of this country.

That is why I do not think it will be productive to engage in — and I use these words carefully — frivolous, partisan debate on these issues.

There are some of us who would have preferred that another party had formed the government. I am one of them. However, Canadians made their choice, and we have in place a Liberal Prime Minister and a Liberal government with an historic mandate. We owe it to Canada to make partisan objectives secondary to helping the government do whatever is right for Canada.

Canadians are also clearly tired of partisan bickering and manoeuvring, and want their governments to address the major challenges that face them. My only admonition and warning to the government is this: We must do something and we must do it quickly. Time is not on our side. The old ways of muddling through and hoping for the best, rhetoric without substance and political bickering will no longer work. We need a strategy; we need the political courage to implement that strategy; and we do not have much time.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I agree with many of Senator Kelly's admonitions. However, before we get into that, I was amazed to note today that there has not been a day for months where the preambles to the questions have been very long, and have, in fact, turned into speeches. The honourable senator used to make a great case of that in the last session. I was surprised that he was so quiet, mild and reserved while this was going on today.

Senator Di Nino: Things may change.

Senator Olson: Yes, I realize that.

Honourable senators, I intend to try to keep my remarks within the time limit of 15 minutes. In that short period of time, I will deal with only two subjects in the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. One is the same subject Senator Kelly mentioned, namely that there has been a major shift in the political landscape in Canada. Some consequences flow from that that we may as well recognize sooner rather than later, because we, as a Parliament and as representatives of the people and people's business at the federal level, will have to deal with them.

The first area I want to talk about briefly is trying to prognosticate on what Parliament in this 35th Session of Parliament will deal with during these next four years.

If you listen carefully to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of Finance and, indeed, to anyone in authority, you realize that they are telling us there is no money for any new programs, no matter how high a priority is put on them. Therefore, if any legislation tries to bring in new programs of any kind that cost money, that legislation is out. Such programs will not be instituted.

We will be making major reductions in the size of government, and indeed the cost of government, and we will not bring in new programs for anybody. I accept that. I think the priority in recognizing that is valid.

I am also very sure that the message from the electorate this time has been different than ever before in my political career. That is, the electorate does not want the government to bring in a bunch of new costly programs, if there will be any additional cost to the government with the subsequent deficit problems that flow from it. The people of Canada, for the first time that I have ever heard, have said, "No, thanks. That is not the kind of administration we want."

That holds true if you are at the federal level or indeed at the provincial level. I guess it has happened in other parts of Canada, too, but certainly in Alberta. There, the new government, which some people call the Conservative government, is not really a Conservative government at all. It is a Ralph Klein government. That is the only thing that saved the party from a complete wipe-out such as happened at the federal level. It is because Ralph Klein was elected the leader shortly before that election. He, of course, was elected primarily in response to the electors telling him, "We want you to get rid of this deficit of $2.5 billion dollars." That is quite a lot for a province the size of Alberta.

For the next four years we probably will have some major problems. There is the matter of trading, particularly in the international field. There is also the problem of rising crime rates, particularly among young people, and youth crime certainly needs to be dealt with.

I should also like to suggest that what is happening today — indeed, what happened ten days ago with respect to a strike by the longshoremen on the West Coast — points specifically at another matter which we legislators now must deal with. Traditional labour-management relations are no longer valid so far as most people in the country are concerned. But the problem is even deeper than that. I think it is fair to say that, in Alberta at least, most of the members of trade unions no longer support the kinds of actions their leaders have been taking, because of the consequences to them personally. The union leaders are no longer serving their members well. Certainly, the leaders of the longshoremen's union are not, in my opinion, serving their members well when the average or the beginning wage of those longshoremen is somewhere around $20 an hour. To go on a long, protracted strike because they could not get within, as somebody has already said, about 25 cents is not in keeping with the best interests of those union members.

We know that all over this country, perhaps not as much in British Columbia, but certainly in Alberta and many other places, there are no increases being offered to anybody. Decreases are the order of the day. In Alberta there are many different decreases. Canadians employed in agriculture, I expect, have suffered more than a 50-per-cent loss in income, especially the grain farmers, over the last three or four years, as have many other sectors. Even the people in the government sector, whether they be school teachers or nurses or anything else, are being asked to take a 5-per-cent reduction in their wages, even though those wages were arrived at by collective agreement.

Most people think it will be either a 5-per-cent reduction or something else. That is not the case. It will be a 5-per-cent reduction first, and then another 20-per-cent reduction in the amount of money that will be provided for a number of departments in the government. It is not "either-or." It is both.

Quite frankly, although I am not a Conservative and I am not even a Ralph supporter, I think Ralph Klein is maintaining a very large degree of support from the people in that part of the country by sticking to what he is determined to do, which is to reduce the cost of government, because the people who elected him want him to reduce the cost of government. Anyone who thinks he can defy that will simply lose, in my view.

Honourable senators, I want to go back briefly to what I call the new political landscape in Canada. One of the things that some people, particularly Conservatives, are thinking — perhaps hoping — is that there will be some great revival of the Conservative Party. That party has been reduced to two members, one of whom was re-elected and a new member from New Brunswick, whom I suspect was elected because she was a particularly popular person in her own right before she ran for any party. I don't think anyone disputes that.

Senator Corbin: That is one version.

Senator Olson: That is one version. She got elected. We have to accept that. I do not think it was particularly because she was a Conservative that she got elected. Maybe it was. I do not know.

Senator Corbin: Could be. She ran on a Tory ticket.

Senator Olson: Whatever. However, anyone who looks at this situation and thinks that it is some kind of temporary flash in the pan is really not looking squarely at the problem. In the election, the Reform Party in Alberta captured all but four seats and, of course, most of the seats in British Columbia, plus some in Saskatchewan and Manitoba and one in Ontario. I do not believe that that is a passing thing.

I would remind honourable senators that the last time the people of Western Canada decided to vote for a party other than the two so-called traditional parties, one being the Conservatives and the other being the Liberals, they kept on doing the same thing for the next 36 years in Alberta. From what they are telling me now, the present generation of electors in Alberta are just as determined as their forbears ever were that, for as long as they live, they will never vote for the kind of government they have had over the last ten years.

Senator Corbin: Short-term memory.

Senator Olson: No, it is not. That is exactly what happened when R. B. Bennett was thrown out of office in 1935. The people went through a depression that was partly manufactured by the federal government of the day, and they vowed that they would never vote for that party again, and the fact is that they did not. No, they did not. They did not vote for them at all, insofar as the provincial government was concerned, for about 36 years, and they did not vote for them federally until 23 years later, from 1935 until 1958. The determination of the majority out there is that that will happen again.

The question is, honourable senators, why did it happen? If you are attempting to solve something or resolve something, you should at least understand what happened, and why it happened. I think the reason that it happened, the reason why they stopped voting for the Liberal Party sometime in the 1960s, was that they believed there was a problem with their being recognized as an equal part of Canada with central Canada. They did not believe that was happening, rightly or wrongly. I was a member first of the Social Credit Party and then of the Liberal Party, and the people did not believe that the federal government was giving them a fair shake within Confederation. It is true, whether honourable senators want to believe it or not.

I think they then voted for the Conservatives as the alternative that was there. There is no doubt about that. I do not intend to go through the entire history, but almost the entire province elected the Conservatives four or five times, hoping that they would give Alberta and Western Canada a reasonable and equal consideration with the rest of the country. The fact is, of course, that they did not. When you go through all the details, the people out there did not feel that they were given a reasonably fair shake. My friends opposite know what happened with a number of things, with respect to matters being moved or extra consideration being given to central Canada at the expense of Western Canada.

It is important to understand this, because it may be something that our party will have to face. We might be popular for a time, but after four years of having to re-establish democracy and fairness across the country, it may be difficult to sell ourselves the next time. If we have a tough four years and find that we are only cutting social programs and other things rather than bringing in sweet new programs, it may be even more difficult.

My friend who is giving me all the trouble is from Toronto. He might understand better now, because, for the first time, that part of Canada understands what a little depression means. They missed it all of the other times. We in the west did not miss any of them.

I am suggesting that a fundamental change has taken place in the regions of this country, and the people are determined that they will have an equal position insofar as the federal government and the federal Parliament are concerned, in spite of a number of problems.

The last government raised some constitutional matters. One such initiative was called the Meech Lake accord, and that was turned down for obvious reasons. They then came along with the so-called Charlottetown agreement to try again to do something about the constitution. However, the people of Canada were not enamoured of the argument that six senators from each province — innocuous senators, since they intended to take away all the real power that the present senators have — could be exchanged for 36 more seats in the House of Commons. To expect the people to buy that is absolutely ludicrous. I cannot understand why the government could not see that, yet I have to admit that all eleven governments apparently agreed to it in Charlottetown. The people of Western Canada did not buy it. To my surprise, even in Nova Scotia they did not buy it. It was not fair. It would just have made the whole situation worse, as far as they were concerned.

Right at the beginning of these major changes in the political scene in Canada, I think it is useful for someone such as myself to put these few remarks on the record so that historians, whether in the near or distant future, will have the benefit of someone's remarking upon the situation. I am sure some senators do not agree with me. I sincerely believe we may as well face it now: The outer regions of this country are determined to become an integral part of the whole country, and they are equally determined to be treated as an equal part of this country, and this last election was probably the most potent way that that message could be delivered to the parliamentarians here.

Honourable senators, I have a great deal more to say, but I —

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): We'll give you leave.

Senator Olson: Perhaps honourable senators will let me have leave, if my time has run out, for just a couple of minutes?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted that the honourable senator may continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is granted.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will not take advantage of that, but I do want to talk about trade. I have had some experience in dealing with the international trade arrangements, particularly with the United States, and I hope that members of this house will forgive me if I am a little less than fully diplomatic in discussing that subject.

We have entered into treaties, long-term arrangements, where we have more or less given up political control of our borders. My experience as a minister, but first as Minister of Agriculture, is that there are many people in the United States — they were there 20 years ago and they are there today — who believe that the United States is big enough and powerful enough that what the United States wants, the United States gets, no matter what they have signed.

This came home to us so clearly the other day. Under our free trade arrangements, not NAFTA but the one before it, there was an arrangement whereby there would be a freer flow of some goods across the border, including, by the way, durum wheat. Twice panels were set up to deal with complaints that had come from some of the American farmers and farmers' organizations respecting durum wheat. In both cases the panels ruled in Canada's favour, that we had not violated any of these arrangements. Yet, when the President of the United States wanted the Congress to pass NAFTA because he thought it was critical, he agreed — or at least promised, or gave an undertaking — that he would have another go at the problem of Canadian wheat coming into the United States. The disease that the United States officers have goes right up to and includes the President: It doesn't matter what they sign — what they want at any given time is what they will go for.

I can remember other cases — I don't want to raise them individually now — in agricultural trade where they had no respect for the rules under seasonal tariffs. If they needed something, they did it, and they would argue about it afterwards. There were livestock diseases involved, and many other things.

I am not terribly impressed with these commitments by which we give up to the United States political control of our borders with respect to trade. It needs to be proven to me that they will respect what they sign, and they have not done that. It seems to me that we have had more trouble with the United States over things like steel rails, steel sheets, softwood lumber, hogs, and all those other things since we put the free trade agreement into operation than we ever had before.

Let us not kid ourselves that we will get any benevolence from the United States with respect to trade. I am in favour of freer trade but I am not in favour of relinquishing our political control on what flows this way, when they simply will not give up the political control they exercise through other laws — countervailing laws and so on — when they refer to Canadian products moving into the United States. I say that in spite of the fact that I think there are many great people in that country. They have a problem with regard to trade; they think they should have their way on all things, regardless of what they may have signed.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Perhaps the honourable senator would permit a question?

Senator Olson: Certainly, if I may have the time to answer.

Senator Hastings: In the honourable senator's otherwise thoughtful presentation this afternoon, he indicated at one point something about crime by young people being on the rise, and that it had to be dealt with. Perhaps the honourable senator would tell us what authority he is quoting from, and what knowledge he has that youth crime is on the increase in this country, when all the statistics available by all the organizations indicate that youth crime is under no greater increase than any other crime group within Canada.

Yet youth, who cannot respond, seem to be singled out by speaker after speaker as perpetrating some great catastrophe on this nation that simply does not exist, and the honourable senator has done it again today. Perhaps he has some knowledge or some authority he can share with me to verify what he has said.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator may be right, and I apologize if the statistics that show the whole picture with respect to youth crime indicate no increase in such incidents. I do know that some very violent crimes, including murder, have been committed in the school yards and various other places in Calgary. The honourable senator would have to give me a few days to dig up the records on those crimes, but they are there, and Senator Hastings knows that. There may not be a significantly greater number, and the honourable senator may be able to prove that, too, but I do know that the general public is far more disturbed now than I have ever seen it in relation to young people going to school carrying weapons that were never seen on school grounds before. I think that is what they are talking about. The number may be smaller but the violence involved has been the subject of many articles in newspapers, and I presume that they have at least reported those facts correctly.

I think it is fair to say that the general public in Canada expects its Parliament, which is responsible for the Criminal Code, to change that code so that law enforcement officers will have more authority to deal with the problem.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, the Parliament that opened on January 17 will be unlike any other. For the first time in Canadian history, the Leader of the Official Opposition in Ottawa wants a province to achieve independence. The Reform Party, concentrated in Western Canada, has almost the same number of seats as the Bloc Québécois and is also in the opposition. These two opposition parties are poles apart. Our parliamentary system is still the best place to settle great differences of opinion in a civilized manner.

Canada experienced a threat of secession at the very beginning of Confederation. In 1868, a movement led by Joseph Howe of Nova Scotia was cleverly countered by Sir John A. Macdonald. In May 1980, the Quebec people voted by a margin of 60 per cent to 40 per cent to reject Premier René Lévesque's request for a mandate to negotiate Quebec's sovereignty and association with the rest of Canada.

This time, part of the debate is taking place in the Canadian Parliament, the only forum where all Canadian citizens are represented by their elected members. All this seems contradictory, but let us just wait and see.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, who, like Lucien Bouchard, comes from Quebec, wants to focus on job creation. That, according to him, is the mandate he received from the Canadian people. The Leader of the Official Opposition has stated that the renewal of federalism is a "dead issue." Jean Charest, for his part, draws a distinction between an election and a referendum. In his opinion, the Quebec people know that they have not exhausted all the benefits and potential of federalism. The leader of the Parti Québécois, Jacques Parizeau, talks about a "mental block" in the rest of Canada. Finally, Robert Bourassa has declared that Quebec sovereignty is geopolitical nonsense, that sovereignty is not a formula for the 20th century and that, in the end, Quebecers want to keep many things in common with Canada.

Federalism is a flexible formula that goes back a long way. Our parliamentary system may be part of the solution to save Canadian federalism. For decades, constitutional talks have been held at the level of the first ministers, in a process of what we call "executive federalism."

It must be embodied in the legislative branch of government. Parliamentarians must have their say in tomorrow's federalism.

Can this federalism meet today's needs?

[English]

In the Speech from the Throne, the Chrétien government proposes to eliminate overlapping in the field of the division of powers. It is an interesting idea that may contribute to rendering our country much more functional. From the beginning, this is an idea that has been put forward by our party, as Prime Minister Campbell explained last year.

The theory of a watertight division of powers is no longer what it was in the 19th century for federal states. Federalism has become complex, refined. For example, unemployment insurance has been within the authority of Parliament since 1940. Education, property and civil rights have been under provincial jurisdiction since 1867. It has been ruled by the Supreme Court that social security is primarily a provincial matter.

Since 1937, our jurisprudence has recognized a certain federal spending power under certain conditions. Finally, following amendments adopted in 1951 and 1964, old age pensions became a concurrent power with a provincial preponderance. What should we do? In my opinion, we have first to respect the Constitution and, second, we must render more flexible the working of our federalism by using administrative arrangements between the two orders of government.

The administrative agreements constitute an efficient way to solve problems. They do not require constitutional amendment. They adapt Canadian federalism to the needs of each era. The Quebec-Ottawa agreement on immigration is an eloquent example. Flexibility is the genius of federalism.

Canadian federalism is always in evolution. It is for us to continue to improve the work of the Fathers of Confederation and to adapt federalism to the needs of our time.

What is happening, in particular, in the case of manpower training? In the Beaudoin-Dobbie report and in the Charlottetown agreement, the Liberal Party agreed to sign agreements with the provinces wishing to exercise their jurisdiction over manpower training.

This is now clearly the wish of the Quebec government and perhaps of some of the other provinces. There was an agreement in principle between former Prime Minister Kim Campbell and former premier Robert Bourassa in July of 1993, the details of which now remain to be defined. In my opinion, things must be speeded up.

The Chrétien government also wants to implement the inherent right to self-government for the aboriginal peoples — in concert with them. It is a commendable objective.

The Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, co-chaired by Mr. Justice René Dussault and Dr. George Erasmus, will probably table its report later this year. The recommendations of that report will certainly shed light on the whole aboriginal question.

In my opinion, honourable senators, we must settle the aboriginal question by appropriate federal legislation, step by step. Then, when we are ready, we should enshrine those principles in the Constitution.

The inherent right to self-government for the aboriginals should have parameters as stated in the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report on the Renewal of the Constitution:

> ... any new constitutional provision should indicate that the right is inherent in nature, circumscribed in extent, and sovereign within its sphere.

What should we do until the election in Quebec? What should we do until the referendum, if the Parti Québécois wins the election? The time has passed for global federal offers to amend the Constitution. Those efforts were worthwhile at the time. Today, the same problem appears in a different light.

In my opinion, the time has come to conclude administrative agreements. It is only after trying out certain arrangements in the division of powers that we will be able to discuss constitutional amendments and resolve this issue. We must first experiment. Renewed federalism will not happen overnight but we must start the process today. We must demonstrate that federalism is not dead.

Quebecers will remain faithful to federalism if our system shows in practice that it can meet their needs.

Since 1867, Quebec has made tremendous progress that it would be unfair to deny. Where did it acquire its present strength if not within the federal system? To stay or not to stay; that is the question that may soon be asked. We must demonstrate, on both sides of this chamber, that it is in the interests of all parts of this country to stay and work together.

[English]

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, this is the first time since my appointment to the Senate that I have been energized to participate in a reply to a Speech from the Throne.

Civility, civilité, civilitas. Most senators will recall that the prescribed duties of that first antique Senate, whose name we proudly bear, was to bring civilizing tendencies to public life, and we all recall the severe penalties for failing to do so. Some say that, at times in the recent past at least, the Senate has suffered from short-term memory loss. So, honourable senators, it is most pleasing to hear those soothing, precatory words of civility oozing and flowing from our respective leaderships as we approach, with some delicacy, this new and admittedly unprecedented Parliament.

At the outset, may I salute the new Speaker; hail the leadership troika on the government side and on the opposition; recognize the various works of each of their predecessors; and remind our public and our leaders alike that those who would ascend to the lofty heights of Senate leadership sooner or later will descend yet again to rejoin those of us in the well of this chamber, rent with wear and tear from their experiences of higher office, to take up once again the rejuvenating and resuscitating Senate tasks in common cause with their more assiduous Senate peers.

Today, senators on all sides of this chamber, we find ourselves crouching on rather unique political geography, wrapped in a rather singular time warp in Canadian history. Recently, I forced myself to plough through Mason Wade's voluminous volumes on the history of Canada, drafted from a French Canadian perspective, to discover if there was, at any time in our past history since Confederation, a parallel to this particular moment! Was history repeating itself? Were there lessons to be learned? Alas, I could discover no precedent.

While the modern rhetoric in the other chamber rings with familiarity in its circular and repetitive Canadian content, we do hear dissident sounds in Parliament for the first time. The democratic demography in Parliament is freshly unfamiliar and strangely different.

For the first time since Confederation, the other place is quite heavily populated with those who do not share any common vision of Canadian unity. Meanwhile, here in the Senate, while we all share a common vision of a united Canada, we continue to differ profoundly on the priorities, the process, the ground rules, indeed the contours of the playing field that we all aspire to for a united Canada to occupy.

By accident or by design, history has injected the other place with a cast of characters dysfunctional and asymmetrical from the Senate. What can one predict from this rather curious misalliance? Will we speak for our regions with different voices? Will we catch the ear of a sceptical populace? I believe that we in the Senate will speak for a united Canada from the perch of our different regions, while recognizing our very fragile political limitations.

Has history thrown us a momentary task beyond serving as a chamber of sober second thought? Perhaps we can, on this different political terrain, construct the scaffolds of a public platform as a first chamber if we act to diagnose clearly, and ever more precisely, and ever more rationally, the pathology of the problems besetting Canada from within and from without.

This I believe we can do together in the Senate in the months ahead. If our prescriptions are lucid, we may hope to be tuned in by the public ear, attract the public mind, and enlist the hearts of Canadians who are simply aching for clarity of vision and rational leadership in the confusing world of economic unrest and riveting uncertainty. Is there an organizing idea lurking beneath and feeding the current state of unrest in the world?

In 1849, Benjamin Disraeli, then an aspiring leader of the opposition in the British Parliament, criticized England's most experienced and famous minister of foreign affairs, Lord Palmerston, for, as Disraeli said, Palmerston's "obsession with newfangled and divisive doctrines of nationality."

In the 15 decades since, close to 150 years later, we have learned little and erred much. Yet, from bitter experience, historians have now isolated the most corrosive cause of wanton human destruction. They have now correctly detected that cause, that scourge, that tumour, as nationalism. Thoughtful observers have labelled nationalism in our century, the 20th century, as "the killing century." Some have even calculated that over 167 million people have been slaughtered in this century, all in the name of one idea: "The nation." Many have defined nationalism as a political cancer of this century that obscenely has legitimized those killings. We find this malignancy is cocooned deep in the parts of Canada, and is found nesting in much more virulent forms in many parts of the world where unrest and suffering and bloodshed abound.

For me, the problem of Canada is not Quebec, nor is the problem of Quebec Canada. Rather, the problem of Canada and the world is nationalism. Nationalism — where self-love corrupts universal love; nationalism — where one group exalts itself over others; nationalism — where an imaginary superiority complex of one so-called "class" demands the artificial creation of inferior classes; nationalism — where tribal passions never fail to engulf and drown reason; nationalism — that seduces in the name of one so-called solitary, unique culture, while the essence of any culture lies in diverse and multi-ethnic groups.

Salman Rushdie, that notorious victim of extremism, argues that culture, like art, requires freedom. But he cautions that artists long for "imaginary homelands" so that they can plant their art and their dreams in one place, in one time. Meanwhile, below the planting surface of culture, he finds that art, like culture, requires cross-pollinization, cross-roots to flourish. One culture can only thrive or grow on the influences from others.

Hemingway, the American, needed France and Spain; Günther Grass, the German, needed America; Fuentes, the Mexican, needed Spain and America; Kundera, the Czech, needed France and Russia; Naipaul, the West Indian, needed England; and practically every novelist professes that he was nourished by Kafka, the Czech and Cervantes, the Spaniard.

Every artist needs another culture to centre himself in his art. Art can uncover no superior, no solitary, no isolated, no special, no distinctive culture, for none exists.

There is no "authentic" English or French or German voice. Who is a more authentic Quebecer, Anne Hébert or Gabrielle Roy, writing from France, or Mordecai Richler writing from England? Céline Dion singing from Las Vegas or Leonard Cohen singing from New York?

Culture coagulates from a melange of authenticities and a mixture of sources, and it depends on its clarity of vision — on its universal truths — not its origins and not its influences. Culture, like science, knows no boundaries, and certainly no national boundaries.

In recent days, critics consider the most perceptive novel turned into a film on English society and culture in the 1930s The Remains of the Day, which was written by an Englishman of Japanese origin and directed by an Englishman of Indian origin. And the most recent heralded French film, called Bleu, about a Frenchwoman suffering from the inner trauma of her problems adapting to modern day France, was produced and directed by Poles.

One can also detect that in the name of nationalism, or its incubator baby sisters, chauvinist regionalism and ethnic fundamentalism, the public vocabulary changes; subtly, it insidiously changes to justify atrocities. "Just Wars" or "Just Defense" they are called, all in the name of "the nation." Individual rights are absorbed or aborted by the collective. National justice is defined by the supremacy of one group over the individual. "Ethnic cleansing" is justified — all for the sake of the nation. Show me a nationalist who loves a stranger as himself. Show me a nationalist who prefers to argue that justice should be equal for all. Show me a nationalist who seeks to balance in the legislatures, or in the courts, justice for all, or craves equality for others in the media or equity in the marketplace.

In Quebec, we find a nationalist media who thinks it is not unfair to monopolize print and the electric airways in its singular promotion of its nationalist idea. While this monopoly should not surprise us, it should occupy the attention of any interested historian, any interested humanist.

Freud, almost always the realist, wrote the following:

> It is always possible to bind together a considerable number of people in love, so long as there are other people left over to receive the manifestations of their aggressiveness.

One wag, one wit, has even suggested that nationalists are always united in a common dislike of their neighbours, in a common mistake about their origins.

Where are the Voltaires or the Benjamin Franklins, who believed that, where liberty lives, that was their country?

Our fault, senators, has been to appease or, worse, to underestimate the forces of nationalism. Even such brilliant modern philosophers as Hobshawn or Berlin find nationalism so incongruous, so incredible, so unreasonable, that one group of people at the end of the 20th century would hold a belief of exultation over others at the expense of reasonable, liberal, universal values. Holding universal values appears to them to be so rational, so humane, so fair, so just and so workable. Pascal, that thoughtful medieval French humanist, put it best when he wrote in his Pensées: "The heart has its reasons of which reason knows nothing."

We fail repeatedly to illuminate the contradictions of nationalism. Have you ever heard a nationalist argue for a good society or a better society for all, rather than a special, distinctive or unique society for some? Or argue in favour of reducing the barriers between classes and empowering the minorities towards equality in their society? These ideas are simply not part of, nor a portion of, the rhetoric or the vocabulary of nationalism.

Have you ever wondered why, as one author has recently suggested, "the alibi of nationalism" is always promoted by "bourgeois prophets" whose Utopian plans always result in a "multiplication of misery" for the masses rather than for the leadership classes?

We know that nationalist power — chauvinist power — inflates and distorts the needs of a majority at the expense of the minorities. In 1955 the Tremblay commission in Quebec argued that Quebec needed more taxes, more power, as less than 30 cents out of every tax dollar was then being expended by the province. Then, the Tremblay Commission concluded that 50 cents out of every tax dollar would be fair, would be equitable, would be democratic. Now, in the 1990s, over 70 cents of every tax dollar is expended by the provincial government and still it is not enough. Alas, nationalists the world over never know when to curb their bloated appetite.

Is it not, senators, part of our challenge, our job, to contain and curtail that voracious appetite and to provide the public with alternatives: civil, universal, liberal alternatives to the coarseness and the crudeness of nationalism in the weeks and months ahead? The "alibi of nationalism" always suffocates debate for more jobs, more equity, more equality. This is the paradox of nationalism.

May I turn more specifically to the Throne Speech and one gentle critique made by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate? He suggested that the Throne Speech was negligently absent of any foreign policy discussion. I respond that this is simply not fair comment.

The government promises that Parliament will review foreign policy in all of its aspects. And who in the Senate could argue that such a review is not long overdue? Wherever we turn, senators, at home or in the world, we find our foreign policy in tatters, because the assumptions and the foundations that have supported our foreign policy are changing ever so rapidly.

We know at home that domestic institutions are losing credibility because they were simply unprepared to cope with the economic limitations of the 1990s. So, too, we find international institutions designed and machined for another age. The UN, NATO, our relations with the Commonwealth, our relations with emerging Asia, our relations with the developing world, all these noble groupings are founded on political templates that are shifting beneath our feet. The tremors of the new world order — the unpredictable new world order — are cracking the pillars of international organizations.

Today we read in the New York Times a damning article by Sadruddin Aga Khan, the former UN Commissioner of Refugees, deploring the United Nations' Secretary General's attempts to pull the teeth on the United Nations International War Crimes Tribunal just set up by the UN Security Council.

The UN War Crimes Commission, "charged with assembling evidence," the Aga Khan tells us, is being told to "wrap up" its investigations in Yugoslavia by April. The Aga Khan charges in today's article that "the neutering of the international tribunal is on the way." Worse, he argues, is that those leaders who have led the way to the atrocities in Yugoslavia are about to be whitewashed. Yes, senators, surely we need a review of our foreign policies.

What kind of new world order can call itself by that name?

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. I apologize to the honourable senator. I am informed that his time has come to an end. However, with leave, the time may be extended. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grafstein: What kind of new world order can call itself by that name, when the most robust states disengage and retreat like isolationists of old? What happens when the most economically viable states refuse to deploy their resources abroad because of lesser, pseudo, needs at home? Yes, the ice of the Cold War has melted. Yet the human condition remains encased with the cancer of nationalism that continues to metastasize.

Canadians are confused, when we send our troops abroad to Somalia and Yugoslavia and their mission and their mandate is not supported by a clear international consensus. Canadians worry when they detect that a strong United Nations command structure and a stronger political direction is absent, particularly when Canadian troops are deployed in harm's way abroad.

Canadians sense that there is weakening of leadership, even in the most congenial atmosphere of NATO. This is not new to senators. These concerns we noted in our Senate report on peace-keeping last year. Obviously NATO, the touchstone of our European policy, needs a refurbished mission statement since its credibility to play a decisive concert on its own instruments against open, visible, aggression in the name of nationalism has been neutered by confusion and inaction. Where is Mr. Pearson when we need him!

We must examine our foreign policy. We must examine what values and resources Canadians are prepared to project on to the world stage. We must find out anew how Canadians can make a humane difference. Canadians relish their international involvement in good causes abroad. Canadians have been proud of their international role. Now clearer policies must support these very noble sentiments.

Salman Rushdie wrote about the "beautiful image" in a Saul Bellow novel called The Dean's December. The Dean, the central character of Bellow's book, hears a dog barking wildly somewhere. He imagines the barking is the dog's protest against the limits of the dog's experience. "For God's sake, open up the universe a little more," the Dean thought. Not a bad organizing idea for our foreign policy: "For God's sake, open up the universe a little more."

To close, honourable senators, on a domestic topic, I do applaud the government's proposal to revive the National Law Reform Commission. I had a hand in the establishment of the first National Law Reform Commission and I was proud of its role and its membership throughout its tenure. The essence of the rule of law is not self-love, but equality and respect for each individual. The rule of law is precisely where domestic and international conduct intersect. Just as we must develop new modalities abroad, we must re-examine the rule of law at home. Respect for the rule of law remains the holy ark in our search for domestic and foreign tranquillity.

Cecil Augustus Wright, one of Canada's greatest law reformers and the Dean of my law school at the University of Toronto, a great teacher and a mentor of mine, said, 30 years ago, quoting yet another great judge:

> Fragile as reason is, and limited as the law is as the expression of the institutionalized medium of reason, that's all we have standing between us and the tyranny of mere will and the cruelty of unbridled, undisciplined feeling.

The Canadian way of life is adherence to the rule of law. The Canadian way of life requires civility. The Canadian way of life requires us to contain our passions by our reason. This is exactly the purpose which the Senate was constructed to accomplish. Senators, let us get on with the job!

Senators, I am indebted for the articulate support for some of the notions in this speech found in two recent and extraordinary books: The Cultivation of Hatred by Peter Gay and The Wrath of Nations by William Pfaff. I commend both books as primers for any student of foreign and domestic policy. Thank you for your indulgence.

Hon. Ron. Ghitter: Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate Senator Grafstein on a thought-provoking and excellent presentation this afternoon. It was wonderful to hear. I would now beg leave to adjourn the debate.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Senate budget 1994-95), presented in the Senate on January 19, 1994.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, honest efforts to no avail, having spent nine years attempting to become perfectly and abominably political, I find myself back where I started — incapable of hating, loathing and demonstrably despising the new Leader of the Government in the Senate. It will take more than preaching from Senator St. Germain or coaching from Senator Atkins to turn me from cheering Senator Fairbairn, who is to me like a bridge over troubled waters.

What good fortune for Senator Fairbairn to come to high office just as Senator Lynch-Staunton assumes the leadership of the opposition, which holds the majority of the seats in this place. The accomplished Senator Lynch-Staunton, as Senator Fairbairn will certainly have noticed, arrives as the choice of the caucus he now represents.

Senator Doyle: Never has a leader in this place been expected to dance with so many people who brung him. Good on both of these elegant Canadians. The Senate? A class act, eh?

I should also wave my little rule book at Senator Roméo LeBlanc. I first met our new Speaker when I interviewed him about his policies as Minister of Fisheries. Long since, we have both been hooked, so to speak — he as a newly gowned rainbow trout, I as a struggling smelt. We come here having served our colleagues on the same committee and having shared the same problems, if not always the same solutions. Some of those problems are still with us.

Honourable senators, the three faces of the Senate — government, opposition and management — defy all attempts at precise definition. Government offers a clear agenda, opposition its reasonable alternatives, and management its peculiar priorities and undoubted efficiencies. Such neat slotting, alas, makes little allowance for divisive groupings related to the political left or the political right, to age or youth, to spendthrift or miser, to him or to her.

Nowhere are the supposed conformities of "Senating" so frequently rent asunder as they are in the Internal Economy Committee, that compendium of fussy housekeepers whose budget proposals for 1994-95 are now awaiting the verdict of this chamber. Left to their own devices, government members of the budget subcommittee would have served up a different dish; opposition, a more calorie-limited plate; management, something along the line of nouveau cuisine — perhaps with a nasturtium leaf to hide wee buds of excess.

The compromise comes with less potential for confusion than budgets devised before Senator Brenda Robertson's revision of the rules severely restricted the use of in camera committee meetings for most purposes other than those relating to finance, personnel and agenda. A direct result of this reordering was Senator Lavoie-Roux's disposal of two of the "in secret" subcommittees that historically pre-screened Internal Economy's workload. With this move to far more transparency of the committee's business, there began tentative efforts to persuade the media to make use of the windows now provided.

Obviously, when the controversial move to increase accommodation allowances came in June of 1993, the media did not look for disclosure in the budget papers. Senators understandably — and regrettably — did not hasten to point it out. This year, we have been bolder. For instance, we have made note of provision for increased use of research allowances in our press release, as well as in our report to the Senate.

The media have not rushed to describe the Senate's efforts to respond to the hard times that have alarmed the country. But I would venture that we have seen credible beginnings. Examples were to be found, for instance, in the Gazette of Montreal and The Hill Times of Ottawa. The Canadian Press was straightforward and fair.

The Hill Times does not have the country's largest circulation, but it is the home town paper for people who work on the Hill and it shows encouraging signs of trying to get things right. That, dear friends, is a blessing to behold, even in stories or columns that attack or ridicule events or folks in Parliament. Attack and ridicule are, after all, stylish techniques in our business, too.

As long as facts are the ammunition used in the exercise, we have no grounds for complaint. Sometimes, however, explanation can be useful on either side of the media relationship — testy as such relationships are, and should be.

In the course of commenting on the budget before you, honourable senators, I said in the Internal Economy committee:

> We did not think it was our job to tell senators what services they should or should not have in the way of doing their work. Those are things that should properly be decided in the chamber, and not by some committee working on a budget.

• (1640)

I am certain that there will be some support from at least some of my colleagues here in the chamber for the quick retort from the reporter from The Hill Times who wrote that:

> All the committee's major decisions must be ratified by the Senate as a whole. But what prevents them from debating the future of services during a budget meeting? Senator Doyle's comment sounds eerily like a certain Prime Minister of the Tory persuasion who insisted that election campaigns were not the place to discuss the future of social programs.

I might pause now to allow honourable senators to say "Hear, hear!" But, in fairness to my committee colleagues, I must point out that the subcommittee on budgets has never hesitated to discuss any aspect of Senate spending, and has always invited carryover of that discussion in the open precincts of the committee as a whole. Any senator who wishes may attend and speak at committee or subcommittee meetings.

In addition, some budget matters are referred to Liberal and Conservative caucuses. For example, the drastic change made in this year's budget for senators' overseas travel was sent to caucuses before being endorsed by the subcommittee and passed by the committee as a whole. If there had been a proposal to eliminate the underwriting of such travel, I would have argued that the Senate as a whole should consider the matter here in the chamber. I would say the same for consideration of further cuts in, or abandonment of, support for parliamentary associations and their travels, and their hosting here of visitors from the parliamentary associations of foreign governments.

If we find that the national economy requires further changes that will radically affect or eliminate programs and services, then the Senate itself should be involved in the process. I would say the same for future review of equipment provided for senators' offices. This year we have said no to replacements unless the equipment is beyond repair. There are services and programs which I, for one, believe should be delayed until Parliament has more money that it can spend with a clear conscience.

In the last month of last year, and just before the finalization of the budget now in your hands, honourable senators, the subcommittee was asked to give its approval to a scheme submitted by the Public Works Department to halt the structural deterioration and to make better use of the East Block, the treasure house of so many parliamentary relics.

I ask: What does a good senator say when asked, ever so nicely, to save the Crown jewels?

Ah, but wait a minute. While initial work will require no money from the Senate, we will have started down a road that in this decade will require from the Senate millions of dollars to pay for furnishings, finishings and services to the offices for eight or 18 new senators — none of which is necessary to fill an immediate need. We will be required to commit ourselves to abandon our Centre Block post office and accept at the same time the conversion of an abandoned, windowless vault as a work place for Senate postal staff.

Discussions of the important East Block rebirth and the sensible creation of a new Centre Block committee room have been underway, in the present phase, for three years and more, although in the last year these discussions have been almost totally confined to the secret meetings of the management board of the other place.

When we on the Senate Internal Economy Committee inquired last summer about persistent rumours that the post office was about to be moved and the East Block plan revived, we were told nothing of the kind was afoot. When the Public Works Department sent a representative to our most recent meeting, which was held last month, we were advised — or perhaps told is a better word — that omnibus plans were finished and approval was necessary at once so that tenders could be called. Work would be under way with spring thaw, even before consideration of the House of Commons' budget!

The Hon. the Speaker: I apologize to the honourable member but I am informed that his time has expired. However, with leave, he may continue.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doyle: Honourable senators, this is the kind of project that cannot be dealt with by approving or denying a committee recommendation. It is the very kind of thing that I said in the Internal Economy Committee "should be properly decided in the chamber." In this instance the word "properly" should imply "after full and public debate."

A last thought here about that word "public." My year in the budget slot has convinced me that we would be better off in the business of understanding, and even far better off in the business of being understood, if we did away with all in camera meetings of the budget subcommittee other than those directly related to working relations with our employees with whom, as you can see, clear and candid talks are needed from time to time. As senators, we might well even show the way to our friends down the hall at the Commons Board of Management, where, we are told, members must swear oaths of secrecy.

• (1650)

In such circumstances, I would hope that the three faces of the Senate would continue to enhance the openness that is such a vital part of the new politics Canadians seek.

On motion of Senator Di Nino, debate adjourned.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

NINETIETH INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE, CANBERRA, AUSTRALIA

Hon. Peter Bosa rose pursuant to notice of January 19, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the 90th Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference held in Canberra, Australia from September 13 to 18, 1993.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my privilege to speak on the report I tabled in the Senate on January 19, 1994, concerning the ninetieth Inter-Parliamentary Conference held in Canberra from September 13 to 18, 1993. Three of our distinguished colleagues, Senators Bonnell, Comeau and Lewis, and I attended this conference. Our Clerk Assistant, Mr. Richard Greene, accompanied the delegation in order to attend the regular conference of the Association of Secretaries-General, which meets at the same time as the IPU.

Before speaking about the deliberations at the conference, I wish to say something about our host country. Australia is the flattest, smallest and driest continent. A nation as well as a continent, it seems an anomaly: It is English-speaking, Christian, sparsely populated with about 17 million inhabitants, and it stands on the rim of its cultural antithesis, Asia.

The first British settlers landed in Australia in 1788. Successive immigrations led to the establishment of six separate colonies which joined together to form the Commonwealth of Australia in 1901. Each of the six states and the two territories also has its own legislature.

The government of Australia is a constitutional monarchy with Queen Elizabeth II as the head of state. The legislature is bicameral, comprised of the Senate and the House of Representatives. Voting in all Australian elections is compulsory for citizens over the age of 18.

The 148 members of the House of Representatives are elected by a preferential voting system. If no candidate has a majority after the primary votes are counted, the votes of the candidate who gets the least votes are distributed to the candidates who receive their second preference. This process is repeated until one candidate achieves more than 50 per cent of the vote. Elections are held every three years.

The 76 senators are elected by a system of proportional representation under which each of the six states is treated as a single constituency. Elections for half of the Senate are usually held simultaneously with the elections for the House of Representatives. Senators, therefore, normally have a six-year term.

Currently, the system of government is a Westminster-style parliamentary democracy. However, the Prime Minister, Mr. Paul Keating, has called for a referendum on whether Australia should become a republic by the turn of the century. A Republic Advisory Committee has been established to examine the modalities of achieving a federal republic and is expected to make its report in the near future.

Our visit took place five months after Australia's federal election, which was held in March 1993. The Australian Labour Party has ruled Australian federal politics since 1983. Most recently, Mr. Keating led his party to an upset fifth victory, notwithstanding a stubbornly slow recovery, persistently high unemployment, and generally popular discontent with his government. He won more than 52 per cent of the vote, and even doubled his majority in the House of Representatives to 13 seats. However, the actual margin was very thin: Only 1,550 votes in the eight most marginal seats made the difference.

Since the early 1970s, Australia has progressively reoriented its foreign policy stance away from Europe and towards Asia. This approach has been accelerated by the Hawke-Keating governments. As it increasingly directs its policy towards the region, Australia is beginning to question its involvement in such organizations as the Commonwealth.

Canada-Australia relations are long-standing, friendly and broadly based. Apart from historical and cultural links, bilateral trade and investments are not insubstantial. Similar viewpoints on a vide variety of international issues exist. In addition, there is a welcome and well-entrenched tradition of exchanges of officials, views and mutual assistance. Canada works closely with Australia in multilateral fora, particularly the United Nations and its associated agencies and the Commonwealth, as well as in the multilateral trade negotiations through the Cairns Group. During the conference, the Canadian government announced the sharing of some diplomatic facilities abroad with the Australian government.

I would now like to turn to the conference itself. At the outset, I wish to pay tribute to the Canadian Deputy High Commissioner, Mr. Gardner Wilson, and his colleagues for their assistance and support during the conference. Shortly after our arrival, Mr. Wilson and other staff members provided a comprehensive and informative briefing on Australia. In addition, Mr. Wilson attended our regular morning briefing sessions and he also hosted a reception in order for us to meet members of the Canadian community in Canberra, including a number of public servants participating in exchange programs.

The first topic on the agenda of our conference was "Respect for international humanitarian law and support for humanitarian action in armed conflicts." My colleague Senator Bonnell and Walter Van de Walle of the other place spoke on behalf of Canada in the plenary debate. They also represented Canada at the meetings of the committee which examined this subject and prepared a draft resolution. Both Canadian speakers emphasized the need for the protection of peace-keepers who are not covered sufficiently by the existing international covenants. When the proposed draft resolution did not make any reference to peace-keepers, Senator Bonnell successfully moved an amendment to the draft text to ensure that they were included.

The second topic on the agenda was "The health and wellbeing of the elderly." The inclusion of this subject on the agenda came about largely through the efforts of the women parliamentarians in the Canadian group. Two of our colleagues from the other place, Mrs. Edna Anderson and Mr. Les Benjamin, represented Canada in the plenary debate. A drafting committee of nine persons was selected to prepare a draft resolution. Mrs. Anderson was elected as chairperson of the drafting committee. The draft resolution, which was adopted unanimously by the conference, contained some elements proposed by the Canadian group, especially several clauses on elder abuse, a topic examined in detail by a parliamentary committee last spring.

At each conference there is an opportunity to vote on a supplementary item to be included on the agenda. On this occasion, the topic was "External displacement as a consequence of the conflict in Bosnia and Hercegovina and other wars and civil wars." Two of our colleagues, Senator Comeau and Senator Lewis represented Canada at the meetings of the committee that examined that subject, and they worked vigorously to produce a text that was adopted subsequently by consensus.

There was also a debate on the general political, economic and social situation in the world. I used this opportunity to speak about the North Korean withdrawal from the non-proliferation treaty, stressing the need for a multilateral, regional, security-dialogue mechanism for the North Pacific, similar to the mechanism of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. I believe that the lessons we have learned from the CSCE process could be applied to other regions of the world in order to ease tensions in situations of conflict, and to facilitate the development of trust and mutual understanding.

I should also like to mention the report of the IPU Committee on the Human Rights of Parliamentarians. As you are aware, the Canadian group has been very active in the work of this committee. Our colleague Senator Neiman, who was instrumental in its establishment, was a member of that committee for a number of years.

During the Canberra conference, the violations of the rights of 101 members or former members of Parliament in seven countries were brought to the attention of the delegates. The 101 cases were one from Bulgaria, five from Columbia, one from Indonesia, sixty-eight from Myanmar, formerly Burma, two from Togo, twenty-three from Turkey, and one from Uzbekistan. Supporting actions by legislatures play an important role in securing positive developments, and I would urge my honourable colleagues to consider how we might assist in promoting the human rights of parliamentarians throughout the world.

Honourable senators, the Inter-Parliamentary Union was founded in 1889 by two men: an Englishman, William Cremer, a carpenter, trade unionist and a Liberal Member of Parliament, and a wealthy Frenchman, Frederic Passy, a member of the Chamber of Deputies. What united these two men of quite different backgrounds was a joint commitment to the cause of international peace. Both argued strongly for the need for some form of international arbitration as an alternative to war. The IPU was very active from the beginning in the international peace movement and was largely instrumental in establishing the Permanent Court Arbitration in The Hague.

At the opening ceremony, the Governor General of Australia, the Honourable Bill Hayden, paid tribute to the IPU, noting:

> ...it is a forum where some of the most important issues facing humanity in the modern world can be discussed by elected representatives in an open and vigorous way, without delegates necessarily having to express the particular views of governments or parties. It seems to me that this has been the great strength of the Inter-Parliamentary Union over the decades, and I hope that it will be a touchstone of this conference.

Honourable senators, I can assure you that delegates at the ninetieth Inter-Parliamentary Conference continued to work vigorously toward the great objectives of the IPU: the peaceful resolution of conflicts and the development of democratic institutions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, the inquiry is considered debated.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE ON NORTH-SOUTH DIALOGUE FOR GLOBAL PROSPERITY, OTTAWA, CANADA

Hon. Peter Bosa rose pursuant to notice of January 19, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference on the North-South Dialogue for Global Prosperity, held in Ottawa on October 18 to 22, 1993.

He said: Honourable senators, on January 19 last, I presented the report of the Inter-Parliamentary Conference on the North-South Dialogue for Global Prosperity held in Ottawa on October 18 to 22, 1993. Senators Andreychuk, Cools and I attended this conference. Permit me to share with you some of the background which led to the organization of this event.

At the 83rd IPU Conference in Nicosia, held in April 1990, the International IPU Executive Committee decided to set up a working group to make specific proposals on how the union can make a better contribution to the North-South dialogue and to the solution of the problem of Third World debt. After reviewing the report of this working group, the executive committee recommended the establishment of a support committee to the North-South dialogue on problems of Third World debt. The support committee's specific mandate was the early convening of a conference on the solution of the Third World debt problem. Chaired by the then President of the Inter-Parliamentary Council, Dr. Sow of Senegal, the support committee was composed of members designated by the national groups of the following countries: Canada, Egypt, France, India, the U.S.S.R., and Venezuela. Dr. Bruce Halliday of the other place served as Canada's representative.

Early in its mandate, the support committee expressed its wish to hold the conference in Canada, and subsequently the Canadian Parliament extended an official invitation to IPU members to come to Ottawa. Little did we realize that this conference would take place immediately before our federal election.

The support committee worked on specific issues to be addressed at the conference and in April 1993 recommended that the agenda should not be limited to strictly North-South relations but should also include Eastern and Central European countries in the equation.

I am pleased to report that 94 parliamentarians from 42 countries attended this conference, which focused on three main themes: trade and development, financial resources and the debt question, and managing the world economy. The inaugural ceremony took place on October 18 in the theatre of the Museum of Civilization. Senator Andreychuk represented the Speaker of the Senate at this event.

The format of this specialized conference was one which encouraged a lively exchange of views among participants. Following introductory remarks by the keynote speakers, delegates were free to challenge views expressed by the experts or to provide alternative suggestions. From personal experience, I can assure my honourable colleagues that the debate was animated and extensive. Both Senator Andreychuk and I had the honour to serve as vice-chairpersons of the conference, and each of us presided over one of these sessions.

Eight countries, including Canada, were elected to serve on a drafting committee to prepare a final document: Canada, Costa Rica, Egypt, Germany, India, Kenya, Senegal and Slovenia. Our colleague Senator Andreychuk served as Canada's representative and subsequently was elected as chairperson of the drafting committee.

The 41-paragraph final document contained nine specific recommendations for follow-up and initiatives by Parliaments and the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Noting that:

> ...parliamentarians have an unique contribution to make in shaping institutions and policies for a more interdependent world...

the conference recommended that national and international policy makers need to be alert to the needs and demands of people everywhere when shaping the new system of global governance.

Honourable senators, in presenting this report on a conference hosted by our own Parliament, I want to mention the praise and congratulations offered by our international colleagues, first, for hosting a conference on such a topical and relevant issue, where the outstanding speakers and the level of debate ensured that it was a most interesting and informative event; and second, for the superb organizational and administrative arrangements. Not only did everything run smoothly and efficiently, it was an excellent opportunity for our international guests to see and appreciate Canadian culture and institutions.

We can be proud of the contributions of the Canadian group to the ongoing work of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. The recent conference on North-South Dialogue for Global Prosperity was yet another example of Canada's strong interest in, and firm support of, IPU activities.

In conclusion, honourable senators, as usual I should like to thank Mr. Peter Hucal, the executive director of our IPU group, Mrs. Barbara Reynolds from the Parliamentary Centre, and many other persons too numerous to mention at this time, for their contribution to the success of this conference.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is now five o'clock and we have reached the end of the Order Paper. I do not have any news as to the procedure in the other place. All the indications are that the bill should pass within the next hour or hour and a half. Although I expect that we will receive it at 6:00 or 6:30 p.m., of course I can make no guarantees, since that depends on how the debate progresses, but I would point out that there is an agreement among all parties. I would suggest, honourable senators, that we suspend the sitting of the Senate now to the call of the bell and, as soon as we receive the bill, we will ring the bell for 15 minutes and then resume the sitting. I would ask for the views of honourable senators.

• (1710)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are as anxious as the government to settle this matter as expeditiously as possible. At the same time, I have consulted with a number of Conservative senators and I am informed that some have regional caucus meetings at 6:00, 6:30 or 7:00 p.m. I am sure the deputy leader will agree that we would not want to disrupt their schedules. I would, therefore, suggest that we amend his motion and agree to resume at eight o'clock.

Senator Molgat: My honourable friend, having more numbers on his side than I have on this side, leaves me no choice. If that is his wish, we would concur. However, I would ask that we give some indication that this house is in favour of moving this legislation through quickly. I see a number of heads nodding in agreement with me. Perhaps I should ask the Leader of the Opposition to turn around. Not wishing to embarrass him, I would suggest a two-minute suspension so that honourable senators opposite might caucus.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, that is unnecessary. We will not delay the passage of this bill unnecessarily, but, to honour the schedules and commitments of certain of our senators and no doubt certain senators on the deputy leader's side as well, we would still like to resume at eight o'clock and dispose of the legislation as quickly as possible.

Senator Molgat: I would agree to adjourning the session until eight o'clock.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, you may recall my saying several weeks ago, when we adjourned until today, that independent senators in this chamber count.

Therefore, let me begin by saying that I received a letter this afternoon from the Honourable Senator Molgat advising us of what was happening. I want to say here and now that I appreciate this gesture on his part.

Secondly, by way of a positive contribution to the work of the Senate, I would like to assure him that as long as he extends this courtesy to the independent senators — I am not the only one, but I speak for myself, of course — he can always count on our cooperation. We are here, and I will make it my duty to point this out every time certain people forget it.

I want to be very clear on this matter: I will make it my duty to point out that if the courtesy shown by the two main parties to each other is not extended to independent senators, then it will be more difficult for us to proceed in a harmonious way in the Senate.

For the moment, everything is fine. I am quite happy to go along with your suggestion, namely that we either suspend the sitting to the call of the bell or adjourn until 8 p.m. I will go along with the will of the majority in the Senate, but either way I will be available. When the bell rings, I will be in attendance.

[English]

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: May I ask the leaders of the Senate whether or not it would be appropriate for the Foreign Affairs committee to meet in the interregnum between this adjournment and eight o'clock? The committee was to have its organizational meeting when the Senate rose. I do not think it will be a lengthy meeting, but we should get on with the work of that committee.

Senator Molgat: Notice was given that the committee would meet when the Senate rose, so it is perfectly in order that it should hold its organizational meeting now.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is suggested by the Deputy Leader of the Government, and there appears to be agreement on the other side, that we should adjourn until eight o'clock this evening. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

• (2000)

At 8 p.m the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

WEST COAST PORTS OPERATIONS BILL, 1994

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-10, to provide for the maintenance of West Coast ports operations.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): With leave of the Senate, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that this bill be read the second time now.

Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill C-10 is to end the labour dispute in West Coast ports and get products moving again. As honourable colleagues know, nothing has moved through these crucial ports since January 29. The dispute that has given rise to the introduction of this legislation involves the British Columbia Maritime Employers Association, representing shipowners, stevedoring firms and agents in the longshore industry on the West Coast of Canada, and the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Canadian area, which represents some 2,300 full-time and 1,300 casual members. They are covered by the collective agreement that expired over one year ago on December 31, 1992.

On January 27, the longshore union started legal strike activity at the Port of Chemainus on Vancouver Island. The next day, the employer said it would not request the union to supply labour as of 8 a.m. on January 29. In response, the union started strike action at other British Columbia ports during the afternoon of January 28, and by the next day all operations had ceased. The initial indications from both parties were that an early resolution could occur. Both sides professed a desire to settle and get the ports open again.

While the union expressed willingness to continue to move grain and other perishable commodities, the employer took an all-or-nothing approach to the movement of cargo in and out of the ports, and so all activities ceased.

Honourable senators, the costs of this dispute are considerable, and we talked about them a little bit this afternoon. The Port of Vancouver estimates that it is losing $1 million per day. The Canadian Wheat Board is concerned with demurrage costs. As of yesterday, some 26 ships are now in West Coast ports awaiting loading. A further 38 ships are due to arrive in the next two weeks. They are scheduled to load about 2.1 million tonnes of grain worth over $450 million.

It is obvious that, if those ships do not load that grain and it does not move, the losses to our western farmers in particular could be staggering. It is important to note that these losses will not likely be made up later in the season. This is the peak market period, and towards the end of this month prices may start to drop.

In addition, five other container ships carrying some 5,000 containers have already been diverted away from the Port of Vancouver. Our shipments of lumber, potash, sugar and minerals are all at a standstill. The Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association, the Alberta government, the British Columbia Chamber of Commerce, the British Columbia Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Premier of Saskatchewan —

Senator Berntson: Even him?

Senator Fairbairn: Even the premier of Senator Berntson's province — and many others have demanded that the federal government step in and legislate a solution. More than 170 grain handlers have been laid off at West Coast elevators. More than 200 rail employees have been laid off. Layoff notices are being sent to 190 federal grain inspectors. There are also reports of layoffs in other industries that serve those ports. The B.C. Sugar Refinery and Cominco have both indicated that they will be facing reduced operations if the work stoppage continues much longer.

Therefore, in addition to the direct financial cost, our reputation is being damaged. We are losing business, and for a trading nation that is bad news.

As I mentioned at the beginning, the collective agreement between the union and the employers' association expired over one year ago, on December 31, 1992. Despite receiving considerable third-party assistance the two sides have been unable to settle their differences. A federal conciliation officer, who was appointed in July 1993, met with both sides on more than 20 occasions between July and December of last year, but no agreement was reached. Earlier this month a conciliator was appointed and intensive mediation talks were held, but still the parties could not settle their dispute.

Honourable senators, the major difference is over wages. In fact, the parties are more or less agreed on everything else in their collective agreement. To the participants, the wage issue is significant enough to prevent a negotiated settlement. Consequently, the Government of Canada cannot stand by and allow the livelihoods of millions of farmers, transportation workers and Canadians in associated industries to be put at risk. While a negotiated settlement between the parties clearly would be preferable, the impact of the work stoppage now extends far beyond the parties and is causing serious economic disruption in Western Canada. This dispute cannot be allowed to paralyze the movement of goods and damage Canada's reputation as a reliable exporter. We cannot permit the integrity and the credibility of our West Coast port facilities to be harmfully diminished. It is time to act.

I wish to make it clear that the government believes the collective bargaining process is the best way to resolve issues of wages and working conditions for Canadian workers. We believe that process should be given every opportunity to continue. However, in this case the parties could not reach a settlement despite the fact that their previous collective agreement expired over a year ago, and despite the efforts of federal conciliators and mediators. In fact, both parties are playing what my colleague the Minister of Human Resources Development referred to in the other place as "a very dangerous game of poker with extremely high stakes."

Honourable senators, the legislation before us orders both parties back to work. It will take effect, I am told, within twelve hours of receiving Royal Assent in this house. The parties will then have seven days to agree on an arbitrator. If they cannot agree within that time, the federal government will appoint one.

While arbitration itself is not new, what is different about this legislation is that the concept of final-offer selection is being used for the first time. That means that the arbitrator receives from both parties a list of issues on which they agree and a list of issues on which they still disagree. Included with that list is the final offer from both parties on the items in dispute. Within 90 days, the arbitrator is obliged to select the final offer of one of the parties on all of the issues and apply it as the resolution of this dispute. This, then, forms the new collective agreement which will be in force until December 31, 1995.

The act also provides for regular penalties in the event of noncompliance. All of the costs to the Crown relating to the appointment of the arbitrator and the carrying out of his duties are recoverable on an equal basis from the two parties.

No one in this chamber, and I am sure no one in the other place, is ever comfortable in legislating employees and employers back to work. However, we are faced here with a situation that offers the government no other choice. It is not a simple dispute between an employer and a union. Hundreds, if not thousands, of other people are innocent victims of the failure of these parties to reach a settlement.

I know that members on the other side of this house will appreciate the position in which the government finds itself with this particular union and this particular employer. There is a history here. The same parties have been the subject of back-to-work legislation in the past, specifically in 1972, in 1975, in 1982, and in 1986.

Honourable senators, the necessity for this bill is clear. We are taking this action reluctantly and, I must say, with considerable frustration. We profoundly wish that the circumstances had not made this legislation necessary. It is indeed a last resort. I hope that all honourable members will give this bill their support so that many Canadians can get back to work, both for themselves and for this country.

Honourable senators, at the appropriate time I intend to move that this legislation be referred to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I am pleased this evening to say a few words with reference to the strike on the West Coast. First, however, I must mention that this is my maiden speech.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Gustafson: I would rather have had considerably more time to prepare, but I do speak with some authority. My grandfather came to Canada in 1909 and began farming; my father farmed; I farmed; and I have ridden tractor with my grandson.

The subject before us tonight in Bill C-10 is a serious one, especially to the prairie people. I know you might say, "The farmers are crying again." However, this is Canada; more than farmers are affected.

I served for 14 years at Milestone, Saskatchewan. A sign there says, "We feed the world." Honourable senators, there might be a little exaggeration in that phrase, but we do feed some of the world. The important thing is that every dollar of grain and primary production in Canada turns over 24 times. That is important, especially at a time when we are facing economic difficulties and our farmers are facing problems that they have not faced for many years.

In 1985 on our family farm, we were receiving about $6 a bushel for our wheat. This past year, we started our sales to the elevators at $2.40 a bushel for No. 2 wheat, less than half of what we were receiving in 1985. Indeed this has been a difficult time.

However, in the past few months we have seen prices rising. You have heard a lot about the durum wheat crisis and grain going to the United States. I made it my business to find out what the price of durum wheat was selling for in Crosby, North Dakota. On November 15, it was selling for $7.50 Canadian. The price was increasing. Some of that Canadian wheat was going to us and some was going to other countries. The irony is that now we have an opportune time to move the product into the international marketplace, we find ourselves saddled with a strike.

The Leader of the Government told us that 64 ships are either in the Port of Vancouver or moving into the port to be loaded. When we had the strike in 1991, there were 21 ships in the port. The longshoremen walked out on the Monday and were ordered back on the following Friday. That was severe, but the number of ships waiting in port has now tripled! One Wheat Board official puts the figure for lost sales at $450 million.

Honourable senators, this strike is having serious repercussions for Canada. Not only are we talking about the consequences for farmers, but with the grain backed up at the ports, the terminals are full; the boxcars are full; the hopper cars are sitting idle on the tracks. I just came through Regina and passed terminals and elevators. No boxcars are sitting there; they are gone. The elevators are full, and we have had a cold winter to move grain — -40 degree and -30 degree temperatures. This is a serious situation which will be very costly to Canada.

Honourable senators, the problems have been pointed out, but what is the answer? Proposals must be put forward. We in the Conservative Party believe in bargaining with the people who work for the companies and for the farmers, if you will, and for the country.

Certainly, we need collective bargaining, but there must be some type of settlement which could be negotiated that would not cause the country to be choked in the way it is being choked in this case.

We must look at other ways. Some people in the grain business suggest that we should have an alternative route through Seattle for just this situation. We should be able to negotiate some kind of settlement with the union, which would be backed by legislation, in order that this cannot happen.

You might say that that is idealism, but the price for this is too heavy to pay. We cannot pay this price as farmers, as legislators or as citizens of this country which has this great capability to produce. We must come to grips with the problem.

I hope that all of us in the Senate, in the House of Commons, and all Canadians who are interested in the future of this country, will work together to solve this problem, dealing fairly with the labour force. However, we must not allow the country to be throttled again as it is now being throttled.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I should like to make a brief intervention on a subject dear to my heart: free collective bargaining.

I have had some experience over the years, as has Senator Perrault, watching the harbour from Vancouver during these strikes. At times the ships have been lined up so close together in the harbour that one could almost walk across the harbour on the decks of those ships.

Ten or 12 years ago I had the experience of going to the United States with officers of the International Longshoremen's Union to meet with shipping company representatives and to plead with them to send more product, more ships, to the Port of Vancouver, to create more jobs. Although they were somewhat responsive, they did say, "What about your reputation for constant strikes and ships being tied up in port? We will undertake to ship more tonnage through the port if you give us an undertaking that there will be no interruptions."

From those discussions, considerable improvement took place. It has been seven years since a major dispute has tied up the port, so some success has been achieved.

In deciding whether or not to support this legislation, which, after a fashion, is an attack on free collective bargaining, I must ask myself whether the parties have acted reasonably and responsibly, and whether the government has acted fairly in bringing this legislation to us this evening.

I do think the longshoremen's union acted responsibly in making the offer to continue handling perishables. I suspect, and I think I know, that the Maritime Employers Council said no in the hopes of provoking what is taking place today, but provoking it sooner.

Nevertheless, free collective bargaining directly by the parties had ample opportunity to work, and it failed. Conciliation was given an opportunity to work, and it was unsuccessful.

After the strike started, the federal government appointed a mediator, Bill Lewis. He is a fine young man who is a friend of mine. As a matter of fact, he took his training as a union representative in the organization I represented for 40 years. He is a skilled negotiator and mediator. When he said, as he did the other evening on television, that the dispute is hopelessly deadlocked and there is no possibility of immediate settlement, you can take my word that you can take his word that there is no possibility of a settlement.

So what happens now? There are times when the interests of the nation are far greater than the interests of the parties. Senator Fairbairn, the government leader, gave you all the details of the meetings, the disputes and the amount of unemployment. Surely at this time, with the amount of unemployment we have, with the desperate attempt we are making to come out of this recession and put people back to work, we have to look seriously at this dispute.

I recall the meetings we had in San Francisco with shipping employers. There was a time when we had a lock on these markets, but not anymore. Many countries are willing and anxious to displace Canada if we cannot honour our contracts and meet our commitments, whether we are talking about wheat, as the senator did a moment ago, coal, or any other product. In this highly competitive, shrinking world of trade and free trade, we have no lock on those markets.

Therefore, I must ask myself what a responsible Canadian, a responsible former labour leader, should do in a situation like this. I have come to the conclusion that the government has acted fairly and reasonably in giving free collective bargaining a chance to work. It has acted fairly and reasonably in appointing a competent mediator. It has not been possible to achieve a settlement in that way.

The proposed legislation deals with two critical issues. One is final-offer selection, which is not as frightening as it appears to be. Whichever offer the arbitrator accepts and imposes on the parties, I am satisfied that the union workers will not get less, but will get more.

There are two other serious considerations. If the parties are fearful of or offended by a legislated settlement after this bill is given Royal Assent, I suggest they get back to immediate collective bargaining and resolve the issue.

Failing that, the legislation also provides, which is a comfort to me, that:

> Nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to limit or restrict the rights of the employers' association and the Union to agree to amend any provision of the collective agreement extended by this Act, or any new collective agreement...

Therefore, even with the imposition of the legislation, the parties will have the right to sit down at any time and negotiate their way into a satisfactory settlement that would restore free collective bargaining.

In the face of all this, I conclude that the interests of the nation, the economy of the country, our reputation in world affairs for being able to deliver products that we commit to, far outweigh the interests of the parties, and I propose to support the legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to hear from the witnesses.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (2020)

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Eymard G. Corbin in the Chair.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would ask that the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, be invited to participate in the deliberations of the Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Pursuant to rule 21 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, Mr. Michael McDermott and Mr. Robert Cooke were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I welcome the Minister of Human Resources Development and Western Economic Diversification. I suspect he has not been here for a while in this type of capacity; indeed, since Parliament reopened, this is the first occasion we have had on which to invite someone to share his wisdom and information with us.

Welcome, Mr. Axworthy. I would also ask senators to welcome Mr. Michael McDermott, the Senior Assistant Deputy Minister, Labour, and Mr. Robert Cooke, Counsel, Legal Affairs.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-10, to provide for the maintenance of West Coast ports operations.

Shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: I will invite the minister, if he so wishes, to take the opportunity to make a statement at this time.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy, Minister of Human Resources Development and Western Economic Diversification: Mr. Chairman, first let me apologize for being late. I was not aware of how efficient the Senate had become. I was in a meeting in the Confederation Building and it took me a little while to return. I do appreciate both your courtesy in waiting for me and also the willingness of the Senate to deal with this legislation at this hour.

We all recognize the pressures that we face, and so we very much welcome the opportunity to present our views to you. I am sure that the Honourable Leader of the Government has presented the reasons for this bill, and I see some senators present from the B.C. area who probably know full well exactly what is taking place.

I will only make one comment, if I may, Mr. Chairman. In the legislation itself, in addition to requiring the back-to-work order as of tomorrow morning, if it is passed this evening, we have introduced the final-selection clause. This is the first time it has been used in federal back-to-work legislation. This house is not a stranger to back-to-work legislation. It has had to be imposed many times before. I think there have been four or five occasions in the last 10 or 12 years where it has been used in relation to this particular problem.

The reason we have decided, for the first time under federal jurisdiction, to use a final-selection clause is that we still want to keep the pressures on the parties to respond to their own responsibilities for bargaining and to come up with solutions.

The use of arbitration in the past has become a crutch; it has become an easy way out for both sides of the process in these areas to say, "Let the government bail us out," and it is about time we said, "We want you to go back to work because the economic impact is substantial." However, we still believe that there is an onus upon the parties to come to some agreement, and the final selection offer process is one way of maintaining their responsibility within that agreement.

We will do our utmost to retain the element of fairness. The parties themselves will have the opportunity to come together and recommend an arbitrator. If they cannot agree after seven days, then I will make the appointment. Nevertheless, we are trying to keep that open. The reason for it, Mr. Chairman, is that on the horizon are a number of other disputes of an equally disturbing nature. I am not predicting — I am certainly not hoping — but we do have other port disputes that are now reaching the end of their collective lives, and substantial questions are being raised in other parts of the transportation industry.

We were hoping that with this proposal we could send an effective message that we do not intend to let the parties simply bail out of their own responsibilities. We want them to recognize that even if a government must represent third-party national interests, public interests, there is still a responsibility for them to work out differences and to come up with a solution in which they have to develop their own best proposals.

That is the reason for the final-selection offer. It is the one area that members of this chamber would recognize as different from past initiatives of this kind.

If there are further questions, I shall be more than happy to receive them.

• (2040)

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister why it has taken the government so long to come up with this legislation. Not more than three years ago we were faced with a strike by grain handlers. At that time it took the government just five days to come forward with legislation. Why has it taken nearly two weeks in this case, when the government is well aware of the economic and social impact this strike is having, not to mention the impact it is having on the reputation of this country as an exporter of a key commodity? Why has the government waited nearly two weeks to come up with this legislation?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, we very much believe in the collective bargaining process. We think it is still a fundamental component of labour relations in this country. Any precipitate move by the government in this matter would mark the beginning of throwing the entire principle of collective bargaining off track.

When we gave notice of the withdrawal of the conciliation officer on January 19, the parties were only a small distance apart. Some of the complex issues had been resolved. What we were into was a simple dispute over money, with there being not much difference between them.

The parties indicated that they thought they could resolve their differences. We wanted to give them a full opportunity to do so. When the process began to bog down, we appointed a mediation officer who met with the parties on two different occasions. At that time, they came within a hair's breadth of reaching a settlement. However, as the honourable senator may well know, these things sometimes take on a life of their own and other things get involved rather than the simple, rational calculations and judgments that are required.

In trying to stay true to our belief in the private enterprise collective bargaining system under which we have operated for so long, we do not want to have the government rushing into the breach at every opportunity. We must use the power that we have in a careful, cautious and prudent way. We must not use it like a sledgehammer.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Has the minister been able to assess the financial impact of the strike? I refer specifically to the demurrage fees that must be paid, as well as lost sales.

Mr. Axworthy: There have been some losses over the course of the past week, as there are in all labour disputes. What gave rise to the action I announced on Monday was the fact that there were some 26 grain-carrying ships in the Vancouver harbour. Another 38 are expected in the next few weeks, something which would expand the problem geometrically. It was only in the last few days that container ships were beginning to be diverted to American ports. Thus, we had reached a point where the time had come for some intervention by the government.

Up to that point in the process of labour-management conflicts, some pressures must be applied, and the parties need to be responsive to such pressures. Unless a full-scale arbitration system is set up, we must rely on the dynamics of this type of process to play up.

Senator, if the legislation is passed tonight, some major consequences will be avoided.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This may resolve an immediate problem, though at what cost the minister does not care to say. How will we avoid such situations in the future? This is not the first time that we have been faced with this kind of legislation in this kind of situation. Surely, what we should be addressing in the long term is how to avoid interfering in a process in which we should not be involved.

Mr. Axworthy: I agree. This afternoon I indicated to my colleagues in the House of Commons that we may want to begin looking at some of the broader labour relations questions that are now arising. Certainly, as we face a different set of economic competitive challenges, it may be time to look at some of the options.

A few years ago in British Columbia, for example, I recall a very bitter strike involving B.C. Tel and others. Out of it came a new process to deal with technology changes. A panel now deals with these matters. It seems to be working. Labour problems have been avoided since then. It may be that we should start to look at some creative answers of that kind.

Keeping in mind that this chamber has spent some valuable time in the past looking at such measures, this could be an area in which the Senate might be of great help. It could begin to look at some of these new emerging labour relations issues. I would be glad to sit down with the Senate leadership and talk about how we might do that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We very much welcome that, Mr. Minister, since we do not have very much to do around here except assess emergency legislation. Your government not having sent us anything yet, we would be glad to give you some consultation and advice any time you wish.

Senator Perrault: Let's not get political, now.

Mr. Axworthy: God forbid you should get political while I'm here.

Senator Carney: Would the minister elaborate on his statement that this is the first time that the final-offer selection process has been used? I ask the question because I have a concern about it.

Mr. Axworthy: The provisions for a final-offer selection are part of the labour codes of both Ontario and Manitoba. It is the first time that that process has been used in emergency legislation at the federal level.

As I said earlier, the reason we chose this particular technique was that it will send a proper message to other parties involved in labour disputes in the transportation industry. The message is not to look for an easy way out by relying upon government intervention as a way of solving their problems. We may have to get them back to work, but we do not want to solve their problems. I hope this may give some proper influence and suggestion as we approach some pretty delicate and sensitive labour issues in the next year.

Senator Carney: I understand the reasoning behind it.

• (2050)

What I am concerned about is in relation to clause 11 where it states that:

> The arbitrator's decision constitutes a new collective agreement between the employers' association and the Union effective as of the day it is made until December 31, 1995...

and so on. If this is being used in an emergency situation, and since it does not impose a new collective agreement for a period of time which is almost two years, is there any escape clause or ultramediation clause in the legislation so that, if there is an aspect of this final-offer selection that does not work, there is some remedial process? If you are to use something in an emergency situation that is as arbitrary as this and it does not meet the circumstances, what is the fallback if the final-offer selection process does not work?

I am asking this question because I am sure that we are all agreed that the damage has already been done. The port has lost a lot of money; the farmers and the transportation workers have lost incalculable amounts of money. The damage to the port's image has been major. I am worried that some downstream problems might arise out of this imposition of a new collective agreement in an unusual circumstance. I would like some reassurance that, should this not work, some other action could be taken, short of a strike and lockout.

Mr. Axworthy: The problem that you raise is also the problem that arises when there is a simple arbitration clause, which has been the case in other emergency pieces of legislation. There still is a settlement that applies for a period of two or three years and it has all the effects of a binding agreement.

Clause 14, if I may read it, states:

> Nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to limit or restrict the rights of the employers' association and the Union to agree to amend any provision of the collective agreement extended by this Act, or any new collective agreement referred to in section 11...

In other words, if the parties themselves come to a new agreement on a mutually consensual basis, then they can amend it if they want.

Senator Lawson: The only comment I would add to that is that, as I understand it, under clause 11 the arbitrator will be largely imposing, with the exception of the money issues that are outstanding between the parties, a large number of clauses that have been agreed to by the parties. Approximately 95 per cent of the clauses that make up the collective agreement have been agreed to by the parties.

Mr. Axworthy: That is right.

Senator Lawson: Therefore 95 per cent of the agreement will be imposed on that basis. For those of us who have had some experience with final-offer selection, this is not new. It may be new in federal legislation but it is not new in collective bargaining. It is nothing more than an extension of partnership agreements whereby you make people very honest. It is a valid point to impose that process in order to bring the parties together. Once this is imposed, they have from now until 6:00 a.m. to make a settlement.

You can be sure that in final-offer selection both parties will make submissions, and those issues that they have agreed upon will go before the arbitrator. His options are somewhat limited. Although it appears to give him broad scope to impose anything, he has to impose what both parties submit. He has only those two choices. In my experience, 95 per cent of the matters have been agreed to, so it is a limited option.

Concerning clause 14, it is important, and I mentioned this earlier in speaking on it, that nothing stops the parties after arbitration, for example, next week, next month or six months from now, saying, "Hey, we do not like what was imposed on us. We do not like it. It is not workable. We" — that is, the parties — "will get together and work out a solution." That is one of the reasons why I supported the legislation. These are critical points. If you are to impose the legislation, they are important in this type of situation in collective bargaining.

Senator Molgat: I believe you indicated in your comments that at one stage the two parties were very close to agreement. That is one of the reasons why the government was hopeful that the dispute would be resolved. Can you give us an idea of how close they were?

Mr. Axworthy: The public expressions were about 25 cents, but it may have been substantially lower than that, more like two nickels. However, I do not want to diminish the importance of that because, in many cases when you are dealing with working people, 10 cents an hour is a significant amount. Nevertheless, they were that close.

Senator Molgat: That close. What starting rate of pay are we talking about here?

Mr. Axworthy: I think it is $21.41.

Senator Carney: For what?

Senator Molgat: For what?

Mr. Axworthy: That is per hour.

Senator Molgat: The rate was $21.41 per hour?

Mr. Axworthy: For longshoremen, yes.

Senator Molgat: And the difference was less than 25 cents?

Mr. Axworthy: Yes.

Senator Lawson: You cannot blame them for going on strike.

Senator Molgat: It is difficult to understand that this could not be resolved by mutual agreement, is it not?

Senator Jessiman: I do not know how clause 11(2) can be applied if you have final-offer arbitration. When they make their offer, will the parties themselves have to put something in, whether they say it is before or after, and then the arbitrator chooses? Or is it the arbitrator himself who can decide, after he chooses one of the offers, that he will make it effective before or after this date? I do not think that clause is applicable.

Mr. Axworthy: The procedure is that the parties have a certain period of time thereafter, within 90 days in which they can present their final offer. It is then up to the arbitrator to make a selection of which of the final offers he or she deems most effective and appropriate under the circumstances. That becomes, in effect, the collective agreement for the next two years.

Senator Jessiman: Are the parties being asked now to say that there are certain clauses that will become effective January 1, 1993, and others that will become effective at some other date? Is that what the government is telling the parties now?

Mr. Axworthy: The arbitrator in this case has the authority under the act to make whatever decision is arrived at retroactive to that date, because the parties are coming back to work without a new contract. If we had imposed a settlement as of tonight, that would be what their wage rates and working conditions would be, but we did not do that. We still want to retain the onus of responsibility on the parties to arrive at some proposals. Therefore they will not have an agreement until such time as the arbitrator decides which final offer he or she accepts, and then it becomes applicable on that basis.

Senator Jessiman: Surely, once the parties make a decision one way or the other, applying clause 11(2), that is it; there is nothing more the abritrator can do. Let us assume for the moment that one of the parties makes it effective January 1, 1993, and the other makes it effective the date that the arbitrator says that he will make a decision. Is that what they intend to do? Surely the idea was that both parties would come in and say, "This is what we want without this clause being put into effect," and then it would be up to the arbitrator to have a choice as to when it should become effective. That is not the way it has been drafted as I read it.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I think it is a little bit of a fine point, but the fact is that each party of the dispute has the right to make its best case, which may include retroactivity or may not. It is up to them to decide when or how they think they can get their argument accepted. It is up to the arbitrator then to decide on that best-case scenario, whatever he or she chooses, what is to be applied, what is to be brought forward or put back in this case.

We want to give the arbitrator some room for manoeuvering on this issue so that we can get a settlement that will meet most of the conditions. As you well know, senator, having seen lots of legislation over time, you cannot cross every "t" and dot every "i". When you give authority of this kind, you have to allow some degree of flexibility for them to make appropriate decisions as they see fit.

Senator Jessiman: But you are not giving the arbitrator the flexibility. You are handcuffing him. You are telling the arbitrator, "You have one choice; one or the other. It does not matter what they say." And he does not have the flexibility of that clause 11(2).

I thought clause 11(2) was for other kinds of arbitration, but when you have it in this kind of legislation, you do not give the arbitrator a choice. He has only two choices: take the union's contract or the employer's contract. He does not get the use of that flexibility that you thought you were putting in there. I should have thought that clause 11(2) would have been for the benefit of the arbitrator, to give him that flexibility.

Mr. Axworthy: I will try to respond, Mr. Chairman. The collective agreement expired well over a year ago. They have been without a contract since then. Any collective agreement maintains that right to move forward or backward as a starting point when new conditions come in. Therefore, the arbitrator has a right, under this clause, to draw back to a certain period of time or, if necessary, to set conditions for the following year of the collective agreement. He can take a look at the two offers and decide which one approximates it. If they want to set a somewhat different rate of return for the second year of the agreement, they can do that.

That is what happens under the form of arbitration. The difference here is that we are asking the parties to make the best case and not leaving it solely up to the arbitrator.

Senator Kinsella: Mr. Minister, the penultimate phrase of clause 14 says, "other than a provision relating to the term of the agreement." Would you help me in my understanding of that?

Mr. Axworthy: Which clause was that, senator?

Senator Kinsella: Clause 14, the second last phrase, which appears to be referring to the term of the agreement. It seems to obviate the parties changing the term of the agreement. If the parties want to stay with the agreement, which will be the agreement achieved through final-offer arbitration, clause 11(1) says that it is made until December 31, 1995. I am trying to understand whether that penultimate phrase of clause 14 prohibits them from having a contract with a longer term?

Mr. Axworthy: I think you will find, senator, that it is a pretty standard provision in the Canada Labour Code that you cannot affect the actual duration of the agreement; conditions within it, you can. If the parties came to a mutual agreement, they could decide to alter it, but not the duration. When the two-year period comes to an end, then a new contract negotiation will be required.

Senator Kinsella: If the parties were to choose, on December 31, 1995, to have a new contract in the same terms and conditions as are in the present one, that is the way in which they would extend that contract?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. McDermid explains to me that it may be a semantic difference; that the expression "terms" in this case, really, in drafting language, refers to the duration.

Senator Carney: We do not understand.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You will have to explain that one.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, I gave you the explanation in clause 14 that refers to the duration. That is the only article that cannot be amended by the two parties coming to a new agreement. Under the terms of the standard Canada Labour Code requirement, Part I, they cannot alter the actual term of duration. Under clause 11(22), which is the antecedent clause, "terms and conditions" refer to the actual circumstances within the agreement.

If you have a problem, we could take it up with the Department of Justice and I would be glad to present your case.

Senator Kinsella: Minister, my other question is a follow-up on the question about the final-offer arbitration that other honourable senators have raised already, this being probably the first time that we see this, particularly in emergency legislation.

In the labour relations literature, there are, as in everything, at least two schools of thought, the pros and the cons. My first question is: Did you canvass those different schools of thought, and how did you strike the balance in favour of final selection and arbitration as against the more traditional approach?

Mr. Axworthy: Primarily because the old traditional approach clearly was not working; it had simply become an ingrained habit to rely upon government intervention and have an arbitration settlement. It saved the parties the difficulty of actually sitting down and doing some serious bargaining amongst themselves and putting some of that kind of chemistry into the collective bargaining system.

As I said earlier, I am also conscious of the fact that there is on the near horizon a series of other potential disputes involving crucial services in this country. Proceeding with legislation of this kind, I hope, will provide a certain chastening, cold-water effect on some of the parties, who might assume that they could simply rely upon the government to bail them out again.

Senator Kinsella: Is it your government's view that final-offer arbitration is the preferred model of arbitration? Is this an approach that your new ministry will be advocating in the — I might add, excellent — labour relations training programs that your ministry puts on? Is there a bias, in the good sense of the term, in this direction?

Mr. Axworthy: I guess we will find out, will we not, if the bill passes. There is nothing like experience as a teacher. We will learn from this experience how effectively it can be applied. As I said earlier, it has not been used at the federal level. If it becomes a useful labour relations tool, I am sure the excellent teachers at the labour relations courses will pick up and herald this day as a turning point and a milestone of labour relations in Canada.

Senator Kinsella: Mr. Chairman, in clause 2, we find the definition of "minister," meaning the minister within the meaning of the Canada Labour Code.

This chamber has yet to see the machinery of government legislation come to it. In fact, we have not seen very much legislation coming to this chamber yet. We have not seen the machinery of government legislation creating a Ministry of Human Resources Development, of which you are the distinguished minister. Would you explain to this chamber the authority by which you are the minister within the meaning of the definition of "minister" under section 2(1)?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, as you know, the new Department of Human Resources Development is really an amalgamation of five other departments, bringing together a number of codes. In this case when I was sworn in as a minister, I was sworn in under the statutes of the older ministries, such as Labour, Employment and Immigration, and others. I exercise my authority under those statutes until such time as we have new human resources legislation.

As you say, I am wearing several hats at one time, and I can tell you honestly, senator, even after three and a half months I am still finding things in the department that I have to do that I did not know were there before. Every morning I get up, there is a new revelation of things for which I am responsible.

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, I intended to raise a number of matters when we got to clause 6, because that deals with the extension of the collective agreement, and what a new collective agreement would be under section 9, section 10, and section 11. Most of the questions I had have been dealt with in the discussions up to now, but there is one remaining.

I understand that the arbitrator can declare what is the new agreement after he has received a representation from the employers and the employees, and of course part of that is a list of the matters remaining in dispute on February 7 and any other matters that they want to put before him. He can then declare that that is the new agreement which will be in effect up till the end of the contractual arrangements, which I think is December 31, 1995.

However, section 14 provides, as the minister read a few minutes ago, that nothing in this act shall be construed so as to limit or restrict the rights of both sides to agree to amend any provision.

Is that the only way in which something other than what the arbitrator decides can be in the agreement? Does there have to be an agreement between both sides before it can be opened up, added to, or modified at all?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the senator, the only other authority for making any changes in the agreement would be — and I cannot at this stage point to a circumstance where it would happen — the sovereign right of this Parliament to make an amendment, because Parliament can basically make laws about almost everything. However, under the normal terms and conditions, it would be the arbitrator's decision unless the parties themselves came to a mutually agreed-upon set of conditions.

Senator Olson: I understand Parliament's authority. Once the arbitrator declares what the new agreement is to be, the so-called collective agreement that will be in effect, there is no way you can go in and change some of that. I understand you cannot extend the provisions relating to the term of the agreement. However, a problem arises if they come to an agreement that there are some changes that they want other than what the arbitrator is forced to declare.

Mr. Axworthy: In effect, rather than having a collective agreement which normally would be signed off by both parties, in this case both parties put forward a final-offer selection, the arbitrator chooses the best case out of those, and that becomes the collective agreement until such time as it is amended by the mutual consent of the parties.

Senator Olson: That is the only way?

Mr. Axworthy: That is the only way.

Senator Gustafson: Honourable minister, in my mind there is some misunderstanding about the increase that was offered. You said that the longshoremen were receiving $21.65, and there was a difference of 25 cents or two nickels. I read somewhere that there was an offer made of up to $26 and some cents per hour. Can you enlighten us?

Mr. Axworthy: I did not read that report, senator. It may well have been the combination of both the wages and benefits as part of a package. I could suggest, though, as I said in the House this afternoon, that I do not think a parliamentary chamber is the place to start negotiating the dollars and cents of the agreement. That is why we are bringing in a process to let the parties come back and put that on the table. To the extent that we are able to refrain from making comments about which side has a better offer or does not have a better offer, the easier it will be to arrive at a proper judgment.

Senator Gustafson: I understand that position. However, I felt that the Senate was left with the impression that we were now here dealing with 25 cents. We are dealing with a bigger amount of money than that.

Mr. Axworthy: Senator, the Senate is not dealing with any number. It is now up to the parties to come forward with their best offer. The differential as reported was around 25 cents, but that may not have been the point of dispute. We were not at the bargaining table. We do not know what other things may have been happening there. That is why, in handling these matters, I try to stay outside the question of which conditions would be most appropriate. I think that is up to the parties themselves to decide.

Senator Bosa: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a question to the minister concerning section 16, which reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding subsection 787(2) of the Criminal Code, a term of imprisonment may not be imposed in default of payment of a fine that is imposed under section 15.

Is this a standard clause in every piece of back-to-work legislation, and, if so, has it always been like that?

Mr. Axworthy: I am told, senator, that that is a pretty standard clause that has been incorporated in legislation over the past several years.

Senator Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might ask the minister, in as much as this is somewhat new, if he could direct his attention to recovery of costs by the Crown and give us the benefit of his thoughts. Certainly, the splitting of costs is a common and well understood practice in collective bargaining. However, the minister might want to tell us a little bit about his thoughts, because it is a little bit unusual in a case where the final offer has been made binding; in other words, where it is arbitrary and we are now arbitrarily assessing costs.

Mr. Axworthy: Senator, the notion of recovery of costs has been employed in cases where there are arbitration and grievances, so it is not the first time it has happened, nor is it unusual. I think in this circumstance it may well add to the disposition of the parties to come to an agreement because they realize that the longer things fool around, the more costs may be incurred. We would hope with some dispassion that we could get an arbitrator right away, that he or she might make a decision right away, and we could get on with the business. As you are well aware, senator, these are very frugal times. We feel increasingly that those who have incurred costs should bear those costs.

Senator Forrestall: In this case, Mr. Chairman, the minister will be aware that the union did not incur the costs, that we have imposed them upon it. I understand what the minister is saying, but I suggest, with all due respect, that it is not quite the same as the usual practice "of the past." I will simply leave it there.

However, on my other point, is this the approach that unions, not just in transportation but in all matters coming under the appropriate parts of the Canada Labour Code, can anticipate from government — in other words, this type of final-offer reward — or in fact are you pinning future decisions on the success or otherwise of this particular procedure? I can assure the minister that many of us who have been involved with unions for many years look forward to the outcome, but we will look particularly at the process to see whether indeed it does have merit. Is this the attitude or position the department has adopted? Have you decided to try this out from time to time in the next year?

Mr. Axworthy: As I said in my opening remarks, with passage of this legislation we hope to put labour relations on a somewhat different footing. We hope that we can provide some constructive signals to parties of future disputes, or disputes that are already under way, that there will be a somewhat different regime brought to bear, a regime that will put increasingly more emphasis on the parties settling disputes in a useful way as opposed to constantly using government intervention. If there is both a notion that they will have to continue, that they do not have an easy way out by having government simply legislate settlement, and at the same time a realization that there may be some costs involved in the settlement, it might help in the resolution of future disputes.

There are times when our labour management relations in this country, and I know the honourable senator has seen much of them, have tended to become a little lazy, or to leave one with the impression that there is this attitude that one does not have to bargain hard to come to a mutual solution or arrive at an agreement that is in the best interests of both parties, because the government will take them off the hook. We want to try to change that attitude a little.

Senator Forrestall: At the same time, we have not been overly sophisticated in the application of that principle. I wish you well with it.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Chairman, are the items in (a) and (b) known at this time — the matters on which they are in agreement and the matters on which they are in disagreement?

Mr. Axworthy: Yes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: They are known?

Mr. Axworthy: A mediator has been involved in the process over the past weekend, and they clearly have come to an agreement in certain areas. The area remaining is wages.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Why is the arbitrator not given a specific time period within which to get these two items finalized? It simply says, "Within such time and in such manner as the arbitrator may specify..." which is pretty open-ended.

Mr. Axworthy: Again, senator, I go back to a point I made earlier: In this case we want to give the arbitrator a reasonably broad authority to make these kinds of decisions and have some flexibility in terms of timing. I do not think there are any hidden clauses. He or she will be able to have full access to that information. The key is that the parties themselves have to put down where they think there is agreement and disagreement. Remember, there is a principle at stake here: We still want the parties to the dispute to try to find an area of agreement that would be useful for that industry. We do not want to let them off the hook. That is why they have to come up with their best-case scenario.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I find it a bit of a contradiction to force people back to work and then not hasten the settlement process.

Mr. Axworthy: We have set a timetable. The arbitrator has 90 days.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I will not prolong this, but clause 9 says, "Within such time and such manner as the arbitrator may specify...". Theoretically, he could ask for a year to produce those two reports. I do not know why, once he gets to work, he does not move on.

Mr. Axworthy: He or she has 90 days, unless we decide to extend it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is clause 10.

Mr. Axworthy: If, for some reason, the arbitrator waited until the eighty-ninth day to get information, he or she would not likely get a good settlement.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You are talking about clause 10; I am talking about clause 9. Once they get the two lists, yes.

Mr. Axworthy: It says in clause 10, "Within 90 days after being appointed..."

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It says in clause 9, "Within such time and in such manner as the arbitrator may specify, the employers...shall each submit to the arbitrator..."; so he specifies a time frame within which he will get that information. Once he gets it, he has 90 days to do something.

Mr. Axworthy: Clause 10 says, "Within 90 days after being appointed..."

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It goes on to say, "...or within such greater period as may be specified by the Minister..."

Mr. Axworthy: Yes. I retain that authority to extend, but they would have to come back to me.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What exactly does the phrase "determine the matters" mean?

Mr. Axworthy: The legal language is that they "resolve" or "decide." That is a judgment call, to put it in the vernacular.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The list is submitted by both sides as to what they agree on and disagree on. Can the arbitrator, in determining, disagree with the list? I am wondering what it means.

Mr. Axworthy: All I can account for is the human faculty of judgment and, to the extent it is applied to a list that outlines agreements and disagreements, and to the extent that the rational part of that judgment applies, and I do not think that either party would appoint an irrational arbitrator, then I think the process is clear. "Determine" makes it clear that they are simply making a judgment as to what has been agreed on, or disagreed on.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE LATE HONOURABLE CHESLEY WILLIAM CARTER

TRIBUTES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise to pay tribute to a former colleague, Newfoundland's Honourable Chesley Carter, who passed away last month while the Senate was not in session. As described by Mr. Roger Simmons, M.P., his successor in the other place, Ches Carter was one of the original Newfoundland members to enter Parliament after Confederation and was elected seven times until his appointment to the Senate in 1966.

While his impact on Parliament was wide and varied, as a veteran of World War I and World War II Ches made his mark in fighting for the veterans' cause and was instrumental in promoting legislation on behalf of not only Newfoundland veterans but also all Canadian veterans.

My fondest memory of comradeship with the good senator goes back to a proud moment in the early 1970s when I was privileged to stand with him to receive the distinguished Meritorious Service Award, the highest award of the Royal Canadian Legion.

The Honourable Ches Carter continued his interest in veterans affairs long after his retirement, and I enjoyed our frequent chats on matters of common interest on our beloved Newfoundland and our comrades. I salute a great parliamentarian and offer my condolences to his wife Elsie and family.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, briefly with respect to the remarks just made by my colleague, Senator Marshall knew the late Senator Carter much better than I did. My knowledge of him — and there is a fair age discrepancy — goes back mostly to the period before he was appointed to the Senate.

Senator Carter was a very civic-minded person and played an important role in the area of adult education in Newfoundland before his appointment to the Senate. That was at a time when adult education did not receive the recognition that it does today. In many ways he was one of the pioneers of adult education in Newfoundland. Much of it, but not all of it, was geared to the needs of returning servicemen; also included were the areas of remedial education for those thousands of Newfoundlanders who, because of the severe economic circumstances in that early period, were not able to receive what today, and even then, would have been regarded as an adequate education.

I wish to join with Senator Marshall in paying tribute to Senator Carter's memory, and I would also make reference to the important contribution he made to life in Newfoundland prior to his appointment to this chamber.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, although I do not have the good fortune to be a Newfoundlander, as Senators Marshall and Ottenheimer are, or as Senator Carter was —

Senator Doody: That is Newfoundland's loss!

Senator Molgat: Thank you. I want to add my words and those of my group to the remembrance of Ches as we knew him. I do not believe that there are too many left now in this chamber who sat with Senator Carter, because he has been gone for some time, but we all recall him as a very pleasant gentlemen.

After his departure from the Senate, he assisted us on some occasions with Senate work; he was seconded to some of our committees for the purpose of giving special assistance, which he rendered in his usual capable way.

I remember Senator Carter for one particular organization with which I became involved through him, namely the Baltic Federation. I had never quite understood why it was that Ches was directly involved with the Baltic Federation, but it was one of those wide interests that he had. In any event, he involved some of us in the Senate in it, and we became very active in that group. I suppose, thanks to people like Senator Carter, the Baltic states eventually saw their freedom. It was one of those things that senators become involved in.

However, it was thanks to people like Ches, in the very early years when those areas were dominated by Russia, that there were Canadian senators who became interested in what was going on in that part of the world. There were others here in the Canadian Senate as well, such as Senator Yuzyk and Senator Haidasz, but Ches was one of the early ones.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I wish to address a question to the honourable —

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): It had been my understanding that on Wednesdays, which are short days, we would not have a Question Period.

Senator Ottenheimer: If that is the case, I was unaware of that arrangement.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): You are both right. Unfortunately, Senator Ottenheimer was not present at our caucus meeting this morning and had not been alerted that, because of the short session, we would postpone Question Period until tomorrow.

Senator Ottenheimer: I stand my question till tomorrow.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, before Orders of the Day are called, I have a comment. A number of honourable senators have asked me about the sittings next week. I had hoped to be able to have an answer for them today. Unfortunately, however, I cannot get the full information that I require, but early tomorrow I will advise honourable senators what the situation will be.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cools, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the Opening of the First Session of the Thirty-Fifth Parliament. — (3rd day of resuming debate)

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, first may I congratulate the Speaker on his preferment. I have known him for a good many years, back to 1968 at least, and I have learned to respect both his integrity and judgment. It is a great pleasure for us to have the opportunity to sit under his chairmanship.

I also congratulate Senators Fairbairn and Lynch-Staunton on their preferment. I know it will be a pleasure to work with them during the coming session.

Senators Gigantès and Cools did an excellent job of introducing and moving the adoption of the Speech from the Throne. It is a pleasure for me to continue to reply to this speech because it is one with which I am able to agree. At the beginning of each new Parliament over the last nine years, my colleagues and I have had to listen to Speeches from the Throne with whose philosophy we disagreed, and by whose legislative implementation we were appalled. The Canadian people have taken advantage of our electoral system to summarily reject the politicians who espoused that philosophy and who perpetrated those laws.

Today, after nine years of Conservative government, Canadians are facing hardship. There are 1.6 million Canadians unemployed, millions more on welfare, a million children living below the poverty line, and record numbers of bankruptcies and plant closings. We are confronted with a large budgetary deficit, a chronic current account deficit, and a huge federal debt. Despite repeated promises to reduce the deficit, the previous government continued to turn in deficits in the $30-billion range every year. The latest, as we all know, was over $40 billion. All this, honourable senators, at a time when real personal incomes have been declining.

At the beginning of this Parliament, we were treated to a concise Throne Speech, a commitment made by the new government to restore integrity to Parliament, to give faith and hope back to the Canadian people, and to rebuild our injured economy. The government has acted quickly to fulfil that promise, but there is much yet to be done.

First let me say that the government must deal with our economic situation in a comprehensive and balanced manner. The budget deficit, employment, economic growth, inflation, monetary policy, program expenditures, trade and taxation are all tightly integrated with one another and cannot be considered separately.

It is well accepted in most circles today that in order to address our economic woes we have to bring down our deficit and eventually address the accumulated debt. By and large, the avenue identified by the conservatives in this Parliament — Reformers in the other place and Tories here — is through cuts in government expenditures. A number of government programs and tax expenditures — some of which have been identified by the Auditor General — are inefficient, poorly managed, or driven by purely political reasons. The government has already demonstrated its resolve through cuts to the helicopter program and to ministerial staffs, for instance. There is, of course, much more to come — some of which will, no doubt, be painful to all of us as Canadians.

Expenditure reductions will be achieved by cancelling unnecessary programs, streamlining processes and eliminating unnecessary duplication. This effort must take place in partnership with the provincial governments. The December first ministers conference has already demonstrated to us that there is a willingness on their part to move.

However, the government should not reduce services simply to reduce expenditures. If the services are needed and can be provided more efficiently at the same cost, or less, than they can be provided by the individual for himself, then the government should continue to administer them. In many cases the government can provide a cheaper way of doing something as a result of economies of scale, and simultaneously achieve a national objective.

Take, for instance, health care. The Alberta government intends to cut $17.6 million from the province's health care budget. If that money is needed to continue an adequate level of care, then Albertans will pay in some way on an individual basis. This could include user fees, fees for yearly physicals, even parking fees, among other things. The point is that if the services are needed, it does not matter if they are paid out of provincial coffers or individual wallets. The money all comes from the same place. Cutting government expenses can be a shell game. The bottom line is how to get the most value for our dollar in this society.

Cutting spending, nevertheless, should be an important part of the government's upcoming budget. However, reducing government spending is not a panacea. Cuts undertaken should not be so radical, fast and reckless as to send the country into shock. Moreover, major reforms should not be implemented without adequate study of the consequences and without discussion with Canadians about priorities.

The utilization of cuts alone would have the net effect of shrinking the economy and creating tremendous hardship for Canadians. The proposals by both the Progressive Conservative Party and the Reform Party during the election campaign would have been too extreme and damaging, putting thousands of people out of work and forcing them to depend on unemployment insurance or local welfare; in other words, just shifting the burden.

We must balance cuts to government expenditures with investments in economic growth. One should not be neglected because of concentration on the other. Spending cuts and economic growth through job creation and innovation are not mutually exclusive. They can, and must, be simultaneous. Always the goal of Canada's economic policy should be the maintenance of a high standard of living for all Canadians because, honourable senators, this is not a business we are running; it is a nation of people with a common stake in its survival.

Growth is a proven means of building government revenues, paying down debt and revitalizing crippled economies. The United States government has significantly reduced its operating deficit this year, mostly as a result of economic growth. Growth fosters employment, and employment creates spending power and reduces the cumulative drain on social services. The best way to reduce spending is to make welfare unnecessary.

The economic and social costs of unemployment for both society and individuals are extremely high. Not only does unemployment represent a waste of economic resources, but government costs related to income support and social welfare rise and tax revenues decline in periods of high unemployment. Unemployment can also impose considerable financial and emotional hardships on individuals and their families. If high levels persist over time, there can also be important consequences in terms of polarization in the labour market and the distribution of income in society.

The government must undertake a comprehensive program of measures to aid the struggling economy both in the short and in the long term. I applaud the approach that has been announced in the Speech from the Throne. It includes short-term measures, such as renewing Canada's infrastructure and renovating our housing stock through the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, and longer-term measures to create jobs and growth by focusing on small- and medium-sized businesses, setting the stage for an innovative economy, investing in people through training, apprenticeship programs, and a youth service corps, encouraging research and development through the Canadian Investment Fund, and fostering trade initiatives. Money spent in these ways is an investment in our future.

How did our forefathers build this country? They spent money on infrastructure. The infrastructure of this country exists; the railroads, the highways, the St. Lawrence Seaway, the massive dams and canals have been built and will not have to be built again. They have paid for themselves many times over in the opening up and development of the land and the enjoyment of the people. Our grandchildren will have the benefit of strong and durable infrastructure for years to come, as long as we maintain and renew it now. If we fail to maintain and build infrastructure today, the cost for future generations will be prohibitive.

Where does the money come from to pay for these investments? Much of it will come from cuts to existing government expenditures. However, that will not provide all the resources necessary to make the investments we need. Greater revenues will be required by the government. Eventually the economic growth that will be achieved through these investments will pay for itself and help reduce the deficit. In the interim, however, the government will have to find more tax dollars.

Reducing or terminating some tax expenditures, more commonly known as loopholes, is a legitimate method of increasing revenues, especially when those loopholes disproportionately benefit those who are best able to afford to pay their taxes.

Some of the suggested changes to the tax system include cancelling the $100,000 exemption on paying tax on capital gains, reducing the top limit on RRSP contributions, eliminating an exemption on the first $1,000 of pension income, taxing benefits such as employer health and dental plan contributions, getting rid of corporate tax write-offs for meals and entertainment, and taxing lottery winnings. Many of those things would be pretty painful.

I believe that the RRSP system is a good one, but we should be aware of its cost in terms of revenue. The tax deduction for RRSP contributions and the tax holiday on all income from investments held in RRSPs cost Ottawa and the provinces $8.6 billion in forgone revenue in 1991. By comparison, welfare cost the federal and provincial governments a total of $8.8 billion that same year. That is, $8.6 billion in lost revenue and $8.8 in welfare costs.

The Ontario government has calculated that tax-free contributions to RRSPs in 1990 cost the province $3 million for those earning less than $10,000, but $131 million for people with incomes of more than $150,000.

The tax burden in this country is high. However, it is vital to understand that this burden does not fall equally on all Canadians. It is not even close to equal; it is not even close to being fair.

The Leader of the Reform Party, and perhaps some of his intellectual fellow travellers in this chamber, denounce the concept of closing tax loopholes as a source of revenue to help pay down the much hated deficit. Mr. Manning has bragged that he has asked Canadians whether they wanted the government to deal with the deficit problem through spending cuts or tax increases. Of course they said spending cuts; spending cuts aimed at someone else, no doubt.

Mr. Manning fails to mention that this is not an either-or situation. The Finance Minister has stated that there would be a balance: somewhere in the range of two parts spending cuts to every one-part increase in revenue. This is a reasoned, balanced approach to a multifaceted problem.

We need spending cuts where they make sense and where they do not damage the ability of the government to do the job Canadians ask of it, and new spending on investments that will pay off in the form of jobs, heightened business activity and an enduring infrastructure.

Finally, in speaking of the importance of government economic policy, I want to mention the mood of the public as an important factor in the economic success of the country. An economy is not simply a series of numbers and statistics. It is, at its core, a psychological state. As I first recognized when I was a university student investigating the dubious "science" of economics, an economy will grow if people feel good about themselves and their country. If they have a positive feeling they will take risks; they will change jobs; they will start new enterprises; they will expand businesses; they will invest; they will buy homes; they will buy cars and appliances. Two weeks ago we received some simple evidence of this fact: the Conference Board of Canada noted the incredible boom in business and consumer confidence since the October 25 election. Business confidence had risen by 10 per cent; consumer confidence had risen by 13 per cent.

Therefore, it is critically important that this government use the levers at its disposal to maintain this mood of confidence. Certainly, the Prime Minister has used every opportunity in speaking to the public or the media to deliver a message of confidence. Mr. Chrétien recognizes that an optimistic mood will translate into economic growth and job creation.

Unemployment, poverty and depression are not the natural state of the Canadian economy or of the Canadian people. We are among the people in the world best equipped to enter into this new global economic maelstrom, provided that we get the kind of leadership this government is prepared to give.

In summary, honourable senators, to say that we are facing a difficult economic situation is to vastly understate the obvious. We need a balanced approach to deal with this situation. It is well accepted that in order to address it we have to accept spending cuts. However, too many cuts will, by themselves, shrink the economy and create tremendous hardship for Canadians. Therefore, we also need to encourage the economy to grow so that more people are contributing to it instead of draining from the economy.

The means to this growth is investment. New spending, such as that described in the Speech from the Throne, will provide that investment. The spending required will be financed to some extent through reductions in spending in other areas of the budget. However, that will not provide enough of the necessary resources. Greater revenues will be required. Closing some tax loopholes that benefit the privileged is a legitimate method of increasing revenues, but growth must be stimulated too.

Therefore, honourable senators, what we need now, and what the government seems prepared to provide, is a balanced approach to economic recovery.

We should not forget that the ultimate goal of all government economic policy is the maintaining or the raising of the standard of living of citizens. Debt and deficit, value of the dollar, expenditures and revenues, lending rates, redistribution to people and provinces — these are each important only in the context of what they mean for our standard of living.

Honourable senators, let us take bold but reasoned steps to build a more prosperous Canada. Let us be confident in decisions and proceed to implement them with determination.

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, I rise to participate in my first debate on the Speech from the Throne. I must be candid when I say at the outset that I would very much have preferred doing it from the other side of the chamber. However, the electorate dealt with that the last time around. Electorates have been known to be wrong from time to time and will determine that in due course.

To begin with, may I offer to Your Honour my congratulations on your appointment as Speaker of the Senate. Due to my newness in the Senate we have met only once. However, your reputation for fairness and good judgment precedes you, and I am comfortable in the knowledge that your role as Speaker of the Senate is one that you will undertake with dignity, wisdom and balance. I look forward to working with you in the years to come.

That means, Your Honour, that I hope you will recognize me from time to time in this spot.

While I am expressing congratulations, may I also do so to a fellow Albertan, Senator Fairbairn. I am pleased with her appointment. She is a highly regarded and respected parliamentarian who brings grace, commitment and dedication to her new position in the Senate, and an individual of whom all Albertans are justly proud. I wish Senator Fairbairn good luck in her undertaking. I know that she will acquit herself in a manner that will make all of us from Alberta proud, not to mention fellow senators, and I heartily congratulate her.

Honourable senators, I hope it will not be regarded as overly presumptuous or even naive of me as a new member to emphasize my feeling that this chamber will become more effective when it becomes less partisan. Frankly, I do not regard it as my responsibility to represent the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada when I am in the Senate. What I may do outside the Senate, of course, is another matter; we are all free to conduct ourselves as we wish in that regard.

In my view, my responsibility in the Senate is more to present the hopes, aspirations and attitudes of the region I represent in the country. It should never be forgotten, if I may say so, that, first and foremost, from the time of the very creation of this place, the purpose of senators has been to represent regional interests. If one examines the Confederation debates, it becomes clear that the Fathers of Confederation opted for an elected House of Commons with representation by population and an appointed Senate with representation by region.

In those debates Sir John A. Macdonald argued that local interests should be recognized and protected by a Senate equally representing the great sections of the country: Western Canada, Lower Canada and the maritime provinces. Although we have not succeeded in achieving an equality of regions — an opportunity which was lost, unfortunately, with the defeat of the Charlottetown Agreement — we certainly have the opportunity to represent our regions rather than merely being extensions of our political party loyalties.

Let me say that nothing will do more harm to the Senate than the overt interplay of political partisanship, which, to an outsider, can be so destructive when viewing the good work of the Senate. If we allow partisanship to take hold again, we will seriously undermine the work of the Senate, making it nothing but a rubber stamp for legislation emanating from the other place and rendering it a useless institution.

Frankly, and I say this with no disrespect, I was somewhat disappointed by the statements of Senator Cools in the honourable senator's debate in the Senate on January 19. I have no problem with a senator's lauding the good work and importance to this nation of great Liberals such as William Lyon Mackenzie King and Lester B. Pearson; I might argue a little about Mr. Trudeau, and Mr. Chrétien still has himself to prove, but these were all political leaders who have had or will have a great impact on our nation. For Senator Cools to laud these gentlemen is totally appropriate, whether or not I agree with her conclusions.

What I found to be out of keeping with the new spirit of cooperation and harmony that we wish to achieve in the Senate were comments suggesting that the past government had "deception" as its "hallmark"; that it "demonstrated repeatedly that the human psyche is an 'artful dodger' when prejudice paraded as conviction, greed paraded as political philosophy, spitefulness paraded as justice, and human weakness paraded as party discipline."

As a Progressive Conservative, and being partisan, if I may, for the first and I hope the last time in the Senate, may I also say that I find those comments out of keeping with the spirit of the Senate. As an Albertan and a member of the Senate, I am proud to have been associated with the work of the Mulroney government.

Senator Ghitter: I cannot sit idly by and hear the comments of Senator Cools suggesting that for nine years our Prime Minister and his associates, people such as the Honourable Mr. Mazankowski, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Beatty, Mr. Epp, Mrs. McDougall, Ms Carney and many others were, by implication, greedy, spiteful, deceitful, and had a disregard or even malice for many citizens, as Senator Cools has suggested.

Speaking substantively as an Albertan, I have to say that the Mulroney government, from an economic assessment and an assessment of courage, was the best federal government Alberta has ever had during the years that I have been involved in politics.

• (1410)

Senator Ghitter: It was a government that totally rid Alberta of the NEP and FIRA. It was a government that brought free trade and NAFTA to Alberta, and that had immense positive impacts on our province. It was a government that brought western diversification and far-reaching programs to the benefit of our rural communities. It was a government that totally deregulated the oil and gas industry and brought stability to that industry — a stability that had been long lost.

It will also be remembered for being in office at the time of the lowest interest rates and the lowest inflation that we have experienced in many years.

Senator Perrault: And the lowest popularity!

Senator Ghitter: There were many excellent and dedicated men and women of the Progressive Conservative Party who served this nation extremely well — men and women who each weekend went home to work for their constituents; men and women who were dedicated to the betterment of the human condition of this nation; men and women I was proud to call friends and colleagues as members of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada.

You can question their judgment; you can question their decisions; you can question their philosophies. However, when we question their integrity or dedication to this nation, either directly or by implication, we unfairly degrade them when they are not here to protect their good names, and we demean the parliamentary process which we serve. We send out incorrect messages that political service is debased and corrupt, which it is not. We discourage good people from entering political life at a time when politicians are at their lowest point in public esteem, and when more than at any other time we need intelligent, wise parliamentarians to deal with the complex issues of our day.

If we as politicians personally demean our fellow politicians with generalities and incorrect statements or by innuendo, we demean the very institutions that we serve. I would hope that such comments as we heard the other day will be the last of this sort, and that we will henceforth treat each other and those in the other place respectfully.

We will question their judgments; we will question their decisions; we will analyze the implications of what they are doing, for that is our work. But we must never debase, degrade or belittle our fellow parliamentarians because we disagree with their approach in the fulfilment of their duties.

I do not think our parliamentarians are appreciated to anything near the extent that they deserve, given the difficulties of performing public service. It may be easy for the Reform Party to look under every rock for a barber, a manicurist, a pensioner or a subsidized lunch, but it leaves the impression among Canadians that parliamentarians are riding some form of gravy train, milking the public on their journey to fortune. Nothing could be further from the truth. Being a member of Parliament is a difficult, unsettling job that goes very much unappreciated by many Canadians.

I often think of the many parliamentarians I have known who have travelled, weekend after weekend, from Ottawa to their constituencies many miles away, in an endeavour to do their work. How many qualified people would be willing to give up their normal way of life in their communities, with their families and their secure jobs, to come to Ottawa to serve their country only to find, after four, six, eight, or twelve years or more, that their pension is inadequate and that it is the only thing keeping them alive. A number of our politicians are out of jobs today; politicians who fall very much into that category.

Yet, every time a Reformer or someone else gets on his feet and carries forward the false impression of unseemly perks and benefits in Ottawa, fewer and fewer people will come forward and be willing to take on the challenge of fulfilling our democratic needs in the governance of our nation.

As Senator Fairbairn and I well know from our experiences in the last election, it is not easy to persuade as many people as you would like to come forward to stand for federal public office. Honourable senators, the denigration of our political representatives is a fool's game played by the righteous to the benefit of no one, and to the detriment of our democratic process.

We are focusing on the wrong issues. We should be focusing on ways to get better people into political life; people of background, talent, wide experience and business acumen. Our parliamentarians are running the biggest enterprise in Canada. We have the challenge of dealing with a debt of half a trillion dollars. We must spend less time fighting each other on issues of little consequence or financial moment and more time building up our institutions and the people who serve them.

Wary as I might be of past Liberal governments and what they have done to my province, I am hopeful that the new government will be balanced and even-handed in assuming the very difficult task of governing this nation. I congratulate the Liberals for their overwhelming victory on October 25. I say that for the good of the nation I want them to succeed in bringing Canada together, for I see Ottawa today as a very uneasy place.

As Winston Churchill said, "History is just one damn thing after another." This nation's history is proof of that statement, as we examine the perplexing situation this nation faces in 1994 and the immense challenges it presents to its parliamentarians.

Let me read to honourable senators but a few paragraphs from the address of January 19, 1994, of the Honourable Lucien Bouchard, Leader of the Opposition, the leader of a party with 54 seats, all from Quebec where it received 2 million votes.

> More than 30 years ago Quebec awakened to the world and decided to catch up. The quiet revolution transformed Quebec. It did not take long before the spirit of reform in Quebec collided with the spirit of Canadian federalism in Ottawa. Thirty years ago the horns were locked. Thirty years later we are still at it, as if frozen in a time warp. We should learn from the past, and this we should have learned: The political problem with Canada is Quebec, and the problem of Quebec is Canada.

> Some are willing to deny the obvious in order not to upset the status quo. They speak of one Canadian nation, whereas Quebec and English Canada are two different nations.

He went on to say:

> Let there be no mistake. Bloc members will not forget that their commitment to sovereignty constitutes the real reason for their presence in this House. One could say that as far as we are concerned, the pre-referendum campaign has begun.

Thus, we as Canadians find ourselves in the incredible, unprecedented position of paying millions and millions of dollars for research offices and support services to the official opposition of Parliament whose sole aim and purpose is to remove Quebec from this nation of 126 years, to dismember the Canada we know and to create political and economic chaos in this country for years to come with all of its attendant instability.

The political landscape in Ottawa today is one that will challenge the strongest and feed the most fervent cynic's appetite to the fullest. First, we have the Bloc already committed to the destruction of this nation and whose job will be finished when they pack their bags and go back to Quebec City with Quebec sovereignty assured. Second, with respect to the Reform Party, aside from the very cosmetic issues they have raised, one can only say that the fact remains that the Reform's position relative to Quebec is the antithesis of the Bloc's aspirations. There is no way Reform will accept or understand the "distinct society" view of Quebec. Ultimately, this will become evident as positions start to polarize in Parliament. No pancake breakfast in Ottawa will overcome the disparity in views of these two regional parties.

It will also become evident over time that the Reform Party can never become a national party as long as Quebec is part of Canada. It is therefore, we must understand, in the interests of the Reform Party that Quebec leave Canada, if Preston Manning ever wishes to become Prime Minister of this nation.

Maybe it will happen. All one need do is look around the world today to conclude that where regional and cultural differences are not recognized and are not allowed to develop within a larger federation, the inevitable desire to break away occurs. From Czechoslovakia to Yugoslavia to the former U.S.S.R., the very pressures that we are experiencing in Canada today are becoming evident.

If we do not allow ourselves as a nation to recognize the distinctiveness and the cultural aspirations of the people of Quebec, we stand the risk of losing that great province and ending up with a broken nation. It is in the interests of the Reform Party that this break-up should occur. We must not allow that to happen.

Senator Ghitter: Then there is the great Liberal Party with their majority, a party with a great tradition, a party national in scope and represented in all regions of this country. It does not have another national party to contend with in Parliament, so it is really the only true national party in Ottawa, for two seats do not a national party make for the Progressive Conservatives.

The Liberals have elected some excellent men and women. It will be their challenge to present a national agenda that will act as a foundation for this nation at the turn of the century. Whether they are able to do so, only time will tell.

The Speech from the Throne, for what speeches from the Throne are worth, gave little indication of that agenda. There were 36 paragraphs in the Speech from the Throne. Fourteen of them talked of spending; only one paragraph dealt with deficit and debt.

The other day the government committed 165 million extra dollars by way of equalization payments to seven provinces. Yesterday they committed hundreds of millions of dollars to dealing with the tobacco tax and the removal of it. We have heard of their infrastructure program; we have heard of the continuing support of the East Coast fisheries; we have heard of spending, spending, spending.

Honourable senators, we cannot have it both ways. If the taxpayer does not have any money, where will the revenue come from? We either believe in debt and deficit reduction, or we carry on until we hit the fiscal wall and the International Monetary Fund tells us how to run our country, as Canada's creditworthiness and reputation fall to rock bottom. Unless we do something about it, this is what will happen.

That is the Liberal's challenge: balancing their Red Book promises with the fiscal realities of 1994. It will not be an easy task.

There are then the other parties, such as the New Democratic Party, which I cannot speak for. For the moment, I want to speak about the Progressive Conservative Party.

It is often useful to look to history to be our guide. Although the players, the rhetoric and the technology may be different in 1994, there are lessons in the history of this nation that might act as a guide for all of us in the examination of what is happening today with reference to the Progressive Conservative Party.

The year is 1920, the decade that stood between the Great War and its aftermath of revolution and the Great Depression, with its sequel of disintegration. In describing the 1920s I could, to a degree, be describing the backdrop of 1993. The twenties have been defined as the years following the war and into the Depression. It was a time of deflation. It was a time of unemployment. It was a time of a nostalgia towards the past. It was a time of revolt. It was a time when the agrarian movement, the farmers, came together and determined that they were not being represented by what they considered to be only lawyers in Ottawa. As it turned out, the United Farmers of Ontario and Alberta captured their provincial governments. In Manitoba they reduced the government to a plurality.

A separate progressive group was formed, and in June of 1921 there was a by-election in Medicine Hat. The government candidate was overwhelmingly defeated by a farmers' representative. Prime Minister Meighen, who had in 1920 succeeded Robert Borden as Conservative leader, took note and called a general election in December of 1921. The result was that 65 Progressive members were elected from British Columbia to Ontario — 65 that could have easily been 75. The Liberal Party had the larger number of members of the two parties, but with 117 they were one short of control of the house. Only 50 Conservatives were returned. The Progressives had the balance of power and they started coming to Ottawa.

The new Liberal leader was William Lyon MacKenzie King. Shortly after that, he determined to call an election because the crops were good, unemployment was down, business was reviving and class and sectional distresses of post-war deflation were subsiding. In 1925, the Conservatives were returned to Parliament with 117 members in a house of 245. The Progressives were reduced to 24 from 65 members. The Liberals had 101 members, and half of them were from Quebec.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order! I apologize to the honourable senator but his time has elapsed. However, with leave, perhaps he might be allowed to finish.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is granted. Please proceed.

Senator Ghitter: Thank you for allowing me to continue. I will speak faster now so that I may finish quickly.

Honourable senators, that was an example of history. The other example is the honourable background and history of Sir Winston Churchill who, as we all remember, after World War II, after having lead his country through the war, immediately went to the polls and was knocked out as Prime Minister. But eight years later he was back again as Prime Minister.

Let me suggest to everyone, honourable senators, that you have not heard the last of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada — not for one moment.

Senator Ghitter: There will come a time, honourable senators, when even those senators on the other side of the house will appreciate the fact that there is a need in this country for another national party, one that will represent the regions of this country; not merely regional parties like the Bloc Québécois and Reform Party. Canadians, I can assure you, will come to realize the importance and significance of a party that started this country 126 years ago with John A. Macdonald. Even Liberals will welcome the rebirth of the Conservative Party because I am sure that you much prefer to deal with us than with regional parties. I believe that in due course you will come to that realization.

In conclusion, honourable senators, as we assess the Speech from the Throne and the acts of the government, I submit that Canadians are willing to make sacrifices. Great opportunities were lost at Meech and Charlottetown. However, as I look at the situation in terms of what is happening in my province, if I examine what is occurring with the severe cut-backs, the deficit and debt reductions and the suffering with which we are confronted in the health care service and in the education field in our province, I feel that Albertans are willing to sacrifice a little if they feel that there is a future and that there is hope.

As legislators and parliamentarians, we must be aware that what Canadians want more than anything else is hope. They want to feel that the sacrifices they make today will bring better opportunities for their children and the country in later years. They are willing to take the short-term pain of cut-backs and reductions in government spending in order to achieve a better Canada.

I hope that the Liberal government has the courage to make those cut-backs. When I see spending programs and more spending programs, I question whether this Liberal government has the courage that we see manifested by the premier of the Province of Alberta; a premier who is taking tremendous abuse but is moving right along on course, because he recognizes that such things must be done. It seems to me that if we show courage and face the realities of the day, while at the same time giving hope to our people, then our country will be a proud place in which to live in years to come, and we will enter the twenty-first century with a sound foundation to meet the challenges of the times.

I thank you, honourable senators, for the additional time you have permitted me.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, first I want to commend our new Speaker of the Senate, a distinguished parliamentarian with an outstanding record, a great Canadian of Acadian descent. It is good to have him in that chair. I think that, on behalf of all of us, he will act fairly and in an even-handed manner. I also want to congratulate our new Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Fairbairn, who is providing competent and able leadership for the government ranks in this chamber. Congratulations should also be extended to Senator Lynch-Staunton, who has had a distinguished career and now has the important responsibility of leading the majority in the Senate.

There was another time when we had more Liberals than we do now in the Senate. I was the opposition leader at that time when we had a majority, very much the position that Senator Lynch-Staunton enjoys today — or is "enjoys" the correct word?

One of my first actions as Leader of the Opposition in the Senate was to write a letter to Prime Minister Clark. The letter will be in the Conservative archives. I wrote in this vein:

> The Senate Liberal majority will work conscientiously to support the government's program if the measures proposed appear to be in the public interest. We will not use our numbers to impede the progress of government bills nor shall we impede unfairly the legislation as it comes before us. We shall reserve the right to attempt to improve those measures.

I hope that the present Leader of the Opposition will support that philosophy now that he is in the position which he occupies — which is a very important position.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Did your successor get a copy of that letter?

Senator Perrault: I will diligently search my files to attempt to determine that.

I have read the Speech from the Throne conscientiously and I have come to the conclusion that I will not have any difficulty supporting the resolution which we hope to send to the Governor General. It is a good Speech from the Throne, and it is short. It always amazes me that, every time a Speech from the Throne is read, spokespersons for the opposition immediately say, "We are shocked. We have read this document in disbelief"; or, "We are shocked and angered." I do not think an opposition since the inception of Parliament has ever said a nice thing about a Speech from the Throne. That is part of the parliamentary ritual around here, and in other chambers.

Today I will not get immersed in all of the detail in the Speech from the Throne — I would not burden honourable senators with that — but one sentence of special interest emerges for a number of us who are interested in the forest industry in this country. The Speech from the Throne informs us that the government will assist Canadian companies to translate improved market access into greater export sales, and will pursue an activist trade policy so that Canadians may have improved access to expanding markets, particularly in the Pacific Rim and in Latin America.

As honourable senators are aware, the success of our export industries is of immense importance to the success of our economy. In this regard, recently the forest industry in Canada has been under concerted attack, particularly from Europeans who have lectured us consistently about how we are supposedly mismanaging our forests and how somehow we are endangering the environment, the ecology and the economy of the world. Next week we will have a number of Europeans visiting Canada, members of the Canada-European Group. Representatives of the main accuser nations will be in our midst. With your indulgence I want to put on record today some of the facts that we should bring to the attention of the delegates who appear at that conference, which will be held in Canada. This is something about our forest industry.

We have been described as the Brazil of the North. The accusation is made that Canada clear-cuts one hectare of forest every 30 seconds. Canada cannot be compared to Brazil. There are two main differences. Most of the rain forest of Brazil is converted to agricultural use after it is harvested. In Canadian boreal forests, harvested areas are required to be regenerated with tree species similar to the ones found in the original forest.

Yet, during the past decade, Canadian forests were harvested at a rate of one hectare every 33 seconds and regenerated at a rate of one hectare every 18 seconds. That sounds like a rather progressive Canada, doesn't it?

Furthermore, the boreal forest is composed of tree species adapted to and, indeed, dependent upon disturbances such as fires, insects and disease to regenerate. These forests also have the capacity to be renewed quickly after clear-cutting.

Incidentally, we will be taking some of these Europeans on a tour of some of our forests out in British Columbia when they are here. Perhaps some of them will go back better educated. I hope so.

I remember a visit that I made to Germany two years ago. I was shown sections of the Black Forest which are absolutely dead because of chemical pollution or some other problem. I visited an area near Wittenberg in Germany. There is a huge forest standing near Wittenberg which has been destroyed by chemical pollution. The trees stand like ghastly, ghostly monuments to someone's ineptitude, or the lack of concern or care by those responsible. Yet, we are being lectured by certain spokesmen of that nation that we in Canada are not observing high enough forestry standards.

The accusation is made: Why does Canada allow clear-cuts to be so large? That is, up to 2,500 square kilometres. The truth? In Canada, there are no clear-cuts that are 2,500 square kilometres in size, despite the propaganda that is flooding in upon us from Europe. The largest clear-cut was 490 square kilometres and was created to contain a widespread outbreak of spruce beetle and to restrict the fire hazard created by the damaged timber.

Traditionally, clear-cuts in Canada have ranged in size from 40 hectares to 200 hectares, not the 2,500 hectares referred to by Greenpeace and some of the other organizations.

In Canada, there has been a recent trend to reduce the size of clear-cuts. This has been in response to current concerns for the health and quality of the environment, and to recognize numerous non-timber values of the forest. The size and location of clear-cuts are based on a long-term, detailed management plan which is developed with public participation and is based on sustainable development. I am not talking just narrowly about British Columbia; I am talking about the industry from coast to coast. It is our number one export industry and is of great importance to New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, and to Newfoundland, Alberta, and many other parts of Canada.

The size and location of Canadian clear-cuts are based, as I said, on long-term, detailed management plans. These plans are designed to ensure that the harvesting methods and size of clear-cuts respect the sensitivity of forest ecosystems.

I come now to a question that has been bandied around on national news and in newspapers from coast to coast: Will Canada meet Greenpeace's demand that Clayoquot Sound be the core area of a United Nations biosphere reserve? This is not an easy matter for any government. It would not matter what the political orientation of the government of British Columbia was. If it were a Liberal or Conservative government, it would still be faced with the question.

The fact is that the government of British Columbia recognizes the potential benefits of a biosphere reserve designation and is exploring the extent of international obligations, as well as the funding and management responsibilities and implications. Concurrently, the B.C. Government is consulting local groups, including aboriginal associations, to pursue a formal application for a biosphere reserve designation.

Federal governments, including the most recent Conservative government, have been cooperating with the provinces and territories in initiatives to promote the sustainable development of our forests. Good for them. The sustainable development of our forests is important to us however we vote.

Does the decision to allow logging in Clayoquot Sound violate the international biodiversity convention which Canada signed? The B.C. management plan for Clayoquot Sound meets the terms and conditions of the convention on biodiversity. In fact, this decision has increased the area under protection by an additional 18 per cent. The result is that a total of 33 per cent of Clayoquot Sound is now under permanent protection. This decision, along with other planning processes, will ensure that the seven special ecosystems found in the sound will be protected.

This plan will also make this area one of the largest temperate, old-growth coastal forests on the west coast of North America under permanent protection. Again, this is the view of a majority of people not just in one political party in B.C. but in all of the parties.

The large, protected reserve will foster the maintenance of biological diversity in this area. The harvesting which will occur in the sound will be carried out in a sustainable manner using forest practices that are compatible with other forest values.

Another question has been bandied around on the international stage. I hope that we can get these forestry facts into the hands of all of the delegates to this forthcoming Canada-Europe meeting. The question is: Does Canada intend to enact legislation to protect endangered species in line with its commitments under the International Biodiversity Convention?

The Canada Wildlife Act already provides for the protection of wildlife, including endangered species. This act provides a framework within which the federal government has created a national program to identify and recover wildlife at risk. In addition, Environment Canada and World Wildlife Canada, a non-governmental organization, have jointly created the Endangered Species Recovery Fund to stimulate and fund recovery projects in Canada. A federal endangered species policy, which would reinforce the need to include endangered species in the environmental assessment review process, is being considered.

Among the leading seven questions is the following: Will Canada take steps to ensure that the use of all of its forests is ecologically sustainable?

In 1992, after a year-long public process, the Canada Forest Accord was signed by members of the forest community, including governments, organizations representing the interests of naturalists, wildlife, aboriginal people, labour, private-forest land owners, academics and forest industries. These organizations agreed on a common vision and a national forest strategy entitled, "Sustainable Forests — A Canadian Commitment." The strategy goal is to ensure that the management of Canada's forests includes a range of both timber and non-timber values such as recreation, wilderness, biodiversity and wildlife, while protecting the forests' integrity, health and diversity. The strategy identifies nine priorities and 96 commitments that will be acted upon over the next three or four years.

Some of these commitments include completing an ecological classification of our forest land; increasing our research to gain a better understanding of forest ecosystems; completing a network of protected areas by the year 2000. As part of the new national forest strategy initiated by the last government, Canada has established a unique network of ten model forests across the country. The goal of these model forests will be to test new, economically and ecologically sound approaches to forest management. Each model forest is managed by a partnership of organizations and individuals who have an interest in the forest and who must decide on the particular objectives for which it will be managed.

So much for all of the false propaganda that we have heard recently, and all the news reports about the commendable effect of the premier of British Columbia going to Europe and attempting to educate Europeans regarding the facts of Canadian forestry practices.

As I said at the outset, the Speech from the Throne talks in terms of greater export sales. If we lose this public relations battle regarding our forests and the world becomes convinced that we are irresponsibly destroying our old-growth forests, and as a result of these false charges they do not buy lumber and paper produced and manufactured in Canada, then we have a real economic problem.

Incidentally, the 12 per cent of land that British Columbia alone has targeted to set aside for parks and wilderness represents an area almost equal to one-third of the total size of Germany. That is the recombined Germany. Those are not just the old West German boundaries. Germany, proportionately, has not set aside for similar use nearly as much land as Canada. In Germany, they have set aside something like 1 per cent of their land.

Canadians can make their forestry arguments with confidence and with accuracy. I hope that the Europeans who visit Canada next week will be enlightened during their time here, and that they will learn a great deal.

I congratulate Senator Ghitter on his maiden speech in this Throne Speech debate. It is always an ordeal to rise for the first time and speak in this chamber. It can be a bit intimidating under certain circumstances. While I do not agree with all of his political statements, I do think that he may well make a very positive contribution to this assembly. As a matter of fact, early evidence indicates that this could be a productive house in the next few months and that we could do many great and constructive things for this nation.

May I share a thought with you? I think that we should be perhaps a less political house. I would hope that the majority here will understand the importance of cooperation and working together. Hopefully, there may be a new form of enlightenment that sweeps over the other side and elsewhere. In my usual non-partisan fashion, I will contribute to the utmost of my ability.

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, first of all, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate our new Prime Minister and wish him luck. Like me, he is from the Mauricie area and was educated at the seminary in Trois-Rivières. I also wish to congratulate our new and very dignified Speaker, Senator LeBlanc, and pay tribute to his predecessor, Senator Charbonneau. I also commend the mover and the seconder of the motion.

As the twentieth century draws to a close, one sees how difficult it is to govern in a world where the massacre of innocent peoples has taken the place of the old concerns of the Cold War. Instead of progressing, Canada's economy and that of a number of industrialized countries are caught in a recession similar to the Depression in the thirties. The government is being bombarded on all sides with demands for solutions, but the formerly all-powerful welfare state has proved to be an idol with feet of clay, because it does not have enough revenue and cannot further tax its citizens to get more.

On January 18, the Throne Speech promised the appointment of an ethics counsellor to advise ministers and government officials. New legislation on relations between government and lobbyists will soon appear on the Liberal Order Paper.

Although I am pleased, I would like to point out that the novelty lies in the form rather than the substance. Measures proposed by a Conservative government between 1984 and 1990 had already been announced or adopted. They generated good results. I am happy to see the Liberal government intends to continue along the same lines.

The Throne Speech did not contain any plans to legislate on conflicts of interest, except that the Liberal government did intend to address this issue with respect to lobbyists. For more than two years, during the two periods of its existence between 1991 and the spring of 1993, I sat on the former Special Joint Committee on Conflict of Interests, ably co-chaired by Senator Stanbury. Bill C-116, the successor to Bill C-43, died on the Order Paper. The special joint committee and the government could not agree on the proposed two-headed system that would prescribe one set of rules for senators and members of the House of Commons and another for ministers and parliamentary secretaries. The committee felt this parallel treatment was wrong, especially since it imposed stricter rules on senators and members of the House of Commons. Perhaps Senator Stanbury or the Government House Leader could inform us about the government's plans in this respect.

As you know, the issue is inextricably linked to politics. Today, it will be up to the two opposition parties in this new Parliament, the Bloc Québécois and the Reform Party, to reach a consensus and decide whether they want to take advantage of the momentum that has built up during the past five years or prefer to set them aside.

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney saw this legislation as a breath of fresh air for democracy, and, right up to the day he left, he pulled out all the stops in an attempt to get this legislation through Parliament.

[English]

A Canadian "Independent Foreign Policy" is promised on the other hand, more by the Red Book than by the Speech from the Throne. Senator MacEachen, a former external affairs minister, said in an address to the Canada-Germany Symposium held in Ottawa on November 20, 1993:

> Canada, under the previous government, was too much under the shadow of the United States when conducting its foreign policy.

However, to a great many Canadians, this whisper of change is definitely not felt in the quickness with which the new Prime Minister endorsed the signed NAFTA treaty after his constant opposition during the last electoral campaign.

Canadian allies in NATO and elsewhere in the world expect practical answers from Canada. The rapid cancellation of the contract for the 42 defence helicopters was an easy gesture; however, that very cancellation will promote the realization that Canada does not have a sound defence and foreign policy. It is simply make-believe.

In the Speech from the Throne, the government promises that it will enhance Parliament's credibility so as to provide members of Parliament, and I quote:

> ...a greater opportunity to contribute to the development of public policy and legislation.

We take this to mean that the government will be holding more free votes in the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, a number of other subjects warrant our consideration. The Minister of Finance, Paul Martin, has resigned himself to waiting two years before announcing a replacement for the 1990 Goods and Services Tax. Yet, in their Red Book, the Liberals stressed that replacing the tax was a matter of national urgency.

The same Minister of Finance will be tabling his budget this month. Prior to drafting it, he held four economic forums, in Halifax, Calgary, Montreal and Toronto, during which he allowed himself to be convinced by business people that the priorities were job creation and deficit reduction. One can but wonder how useful such consultations are. Few Canadians would deny, if asked, that jobs and the deficit are the priority concerns of the day. Had the Minister of Finance asked them, he would have got the information he wanted more quickly and more cheaply.

Honourable senators, the Minister of Human Resources Development, Lloyd Axworthy, has also announced that he will need two years to implement social program reform. Another two years. We have a government that seems to like even numbers. The provincial governments, for their part, are bracing to hear an announcement of new cuts to federal transfer payments.

I want to refer at this time to something Prime Minister Chrétien said in his book, Straight From the Heart, which he wrote in 1985 when he was a minister in the Trudeau government.

The Prime Minister wrote :

> It is sometimes said that our social security system undermines the desire to work and to confront challenges and that people abuse the system. Personally, I think that the system is a sign of progress, social justice and civilization. I do admit that in some cases, social assistance can encourage people to remain idle.

I hope that the Prime Minister continues to feel that social security is a delicate system, one that cannot be changed without affecting those members of society who are the most vulnerable. Consequently, the government will have to take special care to ensure that the changes made are equitable so that they can gain public acceptance.

Personally, I am lukewarm to the whole idea of lowering the ceiling on registered retirement savings plans or to any other initiative that would reduce the purchasing power of senior citizens.

In its January 31 editorial, The Globe and Mail was critical of this trial balloon floated by the Liberals in December. The daily newspaper felt that cutting contribution limits would be as counterproductive as eliminating the $100,000 capital gains exemption:

• (1450)

> A sensible society does not tax savings, since that amounts to a tax incentive for consumption. Income consumed now is taxed less heavily than if the same income were saved, invested, and consumed next year.

Honorable senators, the highly coveted economic recovery will not occur without a modicum of respect for its sponsors.

It seems to me that the mere creation of a Youth Service Corps to give jobs back to the young is a dream full of illusive promises. The Liberal government will have to consider that, unfortunately, computers eliminate many jobs for good. The American magazine Time was sadly stressing that a week ago. Canadians are worried, and rightly so, about their future, their jobs or their children's jobs, and about maintaining their standard of living. If there is anything for which they blame the Throne Speech, it is for not giving them any hope.

[English]

In closing, I cannot resist quoting Mr. Manning — not Preston, but his father, Ernest C., who was then the Social Credit premier of the province of Alberta — from a book entitled Political Realignment that he published in 1967. Premier Ernest C. Manning said then:

> There is one further alternative which I hope will not be necessary for the Canadian people to consider seriously, and that is the alternative of attempting to bring into being a totally new political party.

He added:

> Anyone who speaks or writes on the subject of political realignment is open to the common misinterpretation that he is advocating the formation of another political party altogether apart from those presently in existence. I wish to make it very clear that this is not what I am advocating by this thesis.

As you can see, honourable senators, this is another example where good and sound advice from the father has not been followed by the son.

Senator Grimard: Supporters of the Reform Party are members of our party who have wandered away. They will come back to the Conservative Party once they realize that the blink of light they thought they saw at the end of the tunnel was only the flash of a broken mirror.

The last Speech from the Throne by the Liberal government amounts, consequently, to a promising but very incomplete document when it states:

> The government will work vigorously to fulfil its responsibilities to ensure that federalism meets the needs of Canadians, recognizing that all Canadians share in the responsibility for making Canada work.

[Translation]

While it is often shining in the right direction, will the light from that lighthouse be bright enough to guide the rescuers? Will they manage to go through the rocks without sinking? Or will the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have to change its now well-known message so that, instead of saying:

> An hour later in the maritimes,

it will say:

> Two years later in the country

if we take into account the Liberals' already expressed affection for the even number of two years?

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the adoption of the report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Senate budget 1994-95), presented in the Senate on January 19, 1994.— (Honourable Senator Di Nino)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I might ask a question in this regard, because we had an understanding that the mandate of the present committee would end when the budget was passed. I hope that this is not a delaying tactic. Can we expect this matter to be concluded tomorrow?

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, Senator Lavoie-Roux wishes to speak on this matter. I have taken the adjournment on her behalf since she was absent yesterday. She informed me today that she intends to speak on the matter tomorrow.

I wish to assure all of my colleagues that this is not an attempt to delay. I should state that if any other senator wishes to speak on this matter, I would be more than happy to cede the adjournment.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 10, 1994

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

HEALTH

EFFECT OF REDUCING CIGARETTE TAXES— RECLASSIFICATION OF TOBACCO AS HAZARDOUS PRODUCT

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, yesterday, public health organizations and officials in Canada called the federal government's decision to cut cigarette taxes a disaster for public health. Dr. Stephen Corber of the Canadian Public Health Association said lowering tobacco taxes jeopardizes Canada's greatest public health achievement — the lowering of smoking rates in this country.

The Heart and Stroke Foundation predicted 250,000 tobacco-caused deaths from this government initiative, while others said the measure will lead to 800,000 additional smokers, including 175,000 new teenaged smokers. At the same time, provincial governments, especially Ontario, are faced with a Hobson's choice: either giving up sorely needed tobacco tax revenues by reducing provincial taxes on cigarettes to a level comparable to Quebec, or facing a smuggling problem across provincial borders. In addition, Canadian distillers, seeking a domino effect, are pressuring federal and provincial governments to cut liquor taxes to combat liquor smuggling into Canada.

The underground network for smuggling cigarettes is now being used for other goods. Tobacco companies are also warning that they may hike prices to counteract a surtax on profits. According to David Sweanor, legal counsel for the Non-Smokers' Rights Association, the net impact of this is that cheaters win, bad guys get rewarded, and good guys end up picking up the tab.

Honourable senators, some of the effects of this new policy initiative of the federal government can be mitigated if the government moves to place tobacco under the Hazardous Products Act so that it can regulate the sale of this very hazardous product and give itself more leverage in dealing with the tobacco companies.

The day before yesterday, the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicated that her colleague the Minister of Health is considering just such a move. I hope that her very considerable powers of persuasion will influence her colleague the Minister of Health to place tobacco under the Hazardous Products Act.

TOBACCO SMUGGLING—GOVERNMENT ACTION PLAN

Hon. Wilbert J. Keon: I should also like to comment on the government's action plan on smuggling, which was announced by the Prime Minister on February 8. Some of the elements of that action plan are truly commendable: the increased monetary and human resources to be devoted to enforcement of the law; renewal and extension of initiatives of the previous government to educate Canadians about the effects of tobacco consumption; the imposition of the export tax on cigarettes; and the surtax which will be imposed on the profit of tobacco manufacturing companies.

Like most Canadians, I sympathize with the government's desire to address what has become an enormous and tremendously complex problem, and I applaud these measures. I do hope that the government will follow through on its commitment to devote the new revenues from the export tax and corporate surtax to programs to discourage tobacco consumption.

On the other hand, I join the rest of the health care community, along with the vast majority of Canadians, including many tobacco consumers, in expressing my dismay at the tax cuts on tobacco which are included in the government's action plan. By this measure, the government has immediately undone the good that could have been achieved by the other elements of the plan without waiting to see what effect they might have on smuggling.

It is very clear that the government views tobacco sales and consumption as simply a smuggling issue and not as a health problem. This may be a slight exaggeration, but I believe their priorities are backwards. Health concerns have been lost in the rush to deal with the economic issues of illegal tobacco sales in the underground economy.

The dramatic lowering of retail tobacco prices, especially in the province of Quebec at the moment, but with other provinces under extreme pressure to follow suit, will inevitably encourage consumption, especially among young people who are most susceptible to adopting the habit of smoking and the most influenced by changes in cost.

This tax measure encourages our youth to experiment with the most toxic and addictive substance legally available in our society, and comes at a time when governments throughout Canada — municipal, territorial, provincial, and the previous federal administration — have been trying to discourage tobacco usage, especially by young people.

For now, the government should reinstitute the excise taxes to previous levels, then concentrate on ancillary measures to prevent manufacturers from supplying the contraband market from south of the border, thus avoiding the export tax.

MIDDLE EAST

PEACEMAKING EFFORTS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, the last time I presumed to rise under this heading was in the Thirty-fourth Parliament when, on September 22, 1992, I hailed the peacemaking efforts of the then new Prime Minister of Israel. I ventured to say that, thanks to him, there now existed hope where gloom and foreboding had long dwelt.

Late last summer, on the White House lawn, a milestone for peace was achieved. The handshake of Prime Minister Rabin and Chairman Arafat was something few would have predicted in their loftiest flights of fantasy. As important was the sight of the outstretched hands of the President of the United States, encouraging and perhaps impelling the great and historic gesture. Subsequent meetings, including yesterday's in Cairo, have furthered the progress which the momentous Arafat-Rabin handshake opened up.

There are those who say that things are moving too slowly and that many problems have yet to be solved. However, can we realistically expect that the fears, anxieties and hatreds of generations, indeed ages, could be dissipated in a matter of weeks? For the two leaders, there are manifold difficulties. The road may well be long and tortuous, but the direction has been set and the tone and temper changed, I believe, forever. They should both be sustained and encouraged by all people of goodwill as they lead the way to a better, nobler and more peaceful future in a region too long torn by strife and bloodshed.

FELICITATIONS ON THE OCCASION OF HIS THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY IN PARLIAMENT

SMOKING WITHIN THE PRECINCTS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, a great deal has been said in past days about smoking, taxes, the health of youth in our country, and what have you. I think that legislators should be the first to set an example to the youth of the country.

We have established zones of toleration in this building for people who smoke, including some of our own honourable colleagues. I think that the time has come, not to tax those honourable senators but to declare as non-smoking areas places such as their offices, especially when their office doors are open, as smoke invades and permeates the honourable halls of this place quite easily. I think we ought to stop smoking in the Senate reading room. One can walk in there any day and cut the haze with a knife, it is so thick.

Before setting ourselves up as proponents of good health, we ought to practice what we are attempting to preach and cut off smoking altogether within the precincts of Parliament.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

HONOURABLE EFSTATHIOS W. BAROOTES

The Hon. the Speaker: Before we pass on to the next item, I would advise honourable senators that sitting in the gallery above the clock is one of our old colleagues, Senator Barootes, to whom we offer our greetings and our words of welcome.

Senator Hastings: Is he smoking?

THE LATE HONOURABLE CHESLEY WILLIAM CARTER

TRIBUTE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, while extending greetings to my good friend the doctor and former senator, I should like to remind you, particularly senior senators who have been here for some time, that we have lost one of our retired senators from Newfoundland. Ches Carter has passed away. Despite the fact that there will not be anything formal, as he was no longer a senator, there are many who would like to remember Ches, who was an active senator here for many years.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have the power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical, and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matter of bills and Estimates as are referred to it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is there some urgency?

Senator Doody: I do not think so. I have not asked for leave to proceed, Your Honour. This can very well stand until the next sitting.

I do not agree with dispensing with the house rules when it is not necessary. I realize that my honourable friend opposite has been, from time to time, forced to bend what have been considered to be firm rules, but I am quite prepared to stand by the rules of the house and wait until the next sitting of the chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: Until the next sitting of the Senate, then.

BOSNIA

CANADA'S COMMITMENT TO NATO AIR STRIKES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. That question is with respect to the government's support of air strikes in Bosnia, and I would ask the Leader of the Government very bluntly whether that commitment will be honoured as spelled out in the NATO communiqué issued yesterday. The reason I ask that question is that, over the last month, we have witnessed some extraordinarily contradictory positions being taken by the government, particularly by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Foreign Affairs — stands which have been confusing, contradictory, and certainly completely out of keeping with this country's pioneering dedication to peace-keeping.

I will spare colleagues a recital of the embarrassing opposite positions taken by senior government ministers, particularly in Brussels last month, except to say that unfortunately they were the subject of ridicule, not only in this country but with many of our NATO partners.

Yesterday, Canada formally agreed to NATO air strikes after a given time period, if the warring factions do not meet certain conditions.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is straightforward: Can she assure us that Canada will honour the NATO commitment unconditionally, should it have to be fulfilled?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in response to Senator Lynch-Staunton's question, the answer is yes.

I am conscious of this not being an "Answer Period" but a Question Period. However, the question raised by the honourable senator is an important one, and perhaps I could expound and elaborate on that issue.

The position of the Canadian government has been very clear —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Clearly confusing.

Senator Hastings: You are the only one who is confused!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Just like during the Gulf War.

Senator Fairbairn: It has not been confusing. It has been very much an effort to obtain support and maintain security for United Nations' forces on the ground in that troubled area. That has been the underpinning of the Canadian position.

• (14:20)

On the weekend, as we all know, a horrific action took place in Sarajevo. At this point in time there must be, as Canada realized, a firm warning and response demonstrating that such acts will not be tolerated and must not be repeated.

In the hours and days since the mortar shelling in Sarajevo, there have been very intensive discussions in Brussels. There have been discussions between leaders; discussions between our Prime Minister and the President of the United States. The Canadian position that has been argued, and indeed has had an impact on the outcome of the decision in Brussels, is comprised of three points: The first point is that, in the event of any action, the United Nations will be in the position of coordinating and controlling that response. That was a very important consideration for the Canadian government.

The second consideration is that the proposals that have been made, and that we hope will hold, for the ceasefire and the declaring of a 20-kilometre demilitarized zone for heavy weaponry around Sarajevo, will be carried out in complement with increased efforts on the peace process in Geneva. That is also very much part of this package. Part of that increased activity is a greater determination on the part of the United States to be very involved and persuasive in those talks.

Finally, security of personnel has been another underpinning of the Canadian concern. That, too, is part of the council's resolution. That is not, honourable senators, just for Canadians in that troubled area. It is for all United Nations personnel.

I apologize for the length of my answer, but I think it is important to put the Canadian position in that context.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is interesting that, despite the Liberal Party's criticism of Prime Minister Mulroney during the recent election campaign for his close association with the President of the United States, it took the President of the United States to convince the Prime Minister of Canada yesterday to change his stand once more, but I will leave that for another time.

In yesterday's Hansard, Prime Minister Chrétien is quoted as saying during Question Period:

> According to the news I heard a few minutes ago, the Serbs have agreed to accept the ultimatum...so there will be no need for a strike.

Since all previous ceasefire agreements have failed, can the Leader of the Government explain how the Prime Minister can guarantee unequivocally that "the Serbs have agreed to accept the ultimatum...so there will be no need for a strike"?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I think everyone in this house would wish to echo the Prime Minister's words. One of the critical parts of the ceasefire arrangement is that it is not just on one side, it is on both sides. That arrangement would involve both the Serbs and the Muslims in Sarajevo.

The ceasefire arrangements are moving forward, and both sides have indicated they will support it. Of course, it is the hope of every leader involved in this situation that within ten days there will be no necessity to have air strikes in that war-torn city and its surroundings. There is not a single person on the NATO council who would wish otherwise.

On the question of the President of the United States and the Prime Minister, they have had very candid talks with each other, and I think the Prime Minister of Canada also persuaded the President of the United States of the importance of two or three of the issues that I mentioned earlier.

USE OF AIR STRIKES—CANADA'S ROLE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): My last question, honourable senators, is the following: Since the leader has answered affirmatively that Canada will stand by its commitment made yesterday, should NATO proceed with the air strikes, what is our role in them? What is our participation in them, if any? Are we to devote planes and equipment and whatever manpower is needed to engage in these air strikes? Are we presently consulting with our NATO allies to see that we, as part of NATO taken collectively, fulfill our obligations? Or are we to be mere spectators — signing an agreement but finding a way not to be part of it?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): To the Leader of the Opposition, the Canadian Armed Forces have not at any time been standing by during this conflict. We have been more engaged than most countries in the world.

I cannot answer specifically in terms of the hypothetical situation of the air strike and exactly who, operationally, would have what responsibilities. However, I will be glad to make further inquiries on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition to see what information I can come up with.

The Canadian position, as put forward through our ambassador in Brussels, is very much in concert with that of all of our allies in NATO, and I am sure that Canada will play the part and the role it has always played in these situations.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Let me be clear that this is not a hypothetical question. Having troops in the former Yugoslavia is one thing, but my question is: If asked, will Canada participate in the air strikes?

Senator Fairbairn: Again, that is a hypothetical situation.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, it is not. We have signed an agreement.

Senator Fairbairn: In my answer to the Leader of the Opposition I will be absolutely candid. I will put directly the questions he has asked and I will provide him with the answers.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Within nine days, I hope.

Senator Fairbairn: Very definitely, I will. Canada will take its responsibilities, as always, very seriously.

THE BUDGET

EFFECT OF CARBON TAX ON COST OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, given the fact that in the Throne Speech there was no mention of agriculture, I am looking forward to the budget.

There is a great deal of nervousness in the farm community about various aspects of the budget, but particularly about the carbon tax. Farmers have faced a great many problems within the last few years, as all senators know. A carbon tax would add tremendous expense to the cost side of the production of agricultural products. Consequently, as I have said, there is a great deal of nervousness.

Another area on which I would seek some response is the $500,000 capital gains tax exemption. It is rumoured that that might be removed. Still another area is the GST. Farmers receive back the GST under application; they do not like having to apply, but they get the tax back.

There is a great deal of nervousness in the agricultural community in these three areas.

Would the honourable leader give us some direction? I realize that there is some secrecy involved here, but would she use her good offices to communicate to the Minister of Finance and the government this nervousness in the agricultural community, because it is very serious.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure how large these "good offices" are that the honourable senator wishes me to use. I will be delighted to convey his concerns on his own behalf, and on behalf of the people he represents.

I gave an answer to my colleague from Calgary the other day and I am afraid I will have to give the same answer to Senator Gustafson, namely, that I cannot speak on behalf of the Minister of Finance on anything concerning taxes. Wait for the budget. However, I will certainly pass on the concerns of the honourable senator this afternoon.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION BEYOND 200-MILE LIMIT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Government Leader in the Senate concerning the unilateral extension of jurisdiction beyond the present 200-mile limit to the limit of the continental shelf; in other words covering areas frequently called the Nose and Tail of the Grand Banks.

It will be recalled that the government has stated that in the absence of an international agreement with respect to Canadian jurisdiction on fisheries in those areas of the continental shelf that are beyond 200 miles, the government would introduce legislation that would unilaterally declare Canadian jurisdiction.

Does that remain the intention of the government? Is international agreement still lacking and is it, therefore, the intention of the government to introduce such legislation?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I understand the question, the Government of Canada continues to try to reach consensus in this area. I believe the Minister of Fisheries has indicated that he would be prepared to bring forward legislation to establish authority for conservation and enforcement beyond the 200-mile limit.

Obviously, the consensus route is the preferable one. I will seek further elaboration from him on this, and perhaps leave it at that for the moment.

Senator Ottenheimer: I appreciate the reply of the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. Everyone is agreed that if there can be international agreement, obviously that is the way to go. However, as everyone is aware, there has not been international agreement, and there has been a quite firm commitment that, in the absence of international agreement, unilateral action will be taken by the Government of Canada.

I am not looking for an answer now, because the honourable leader stated she would look into the matter. To be more specific, the information I hope the honourable Government Leader in the Senate will be able to supply is: Is it still the government's firm intention to act unilaterally? Is there some reasonable time frame within which this would be done, in the lack of international agreement?

Senator Fairbairn: I will be delighted to consult with your friend from Newfoundland on that question.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ADMINISTRATION OF INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, the public confusion concerning the government's cigarette policy and foreign policy is only exceeded by the confusion and bitterness currently felt by municipalities in Saskatchewan concerning the administration of the infrastructure program.

• (1440)

Municipalities in Saskatchewan feel cheated and misled by the government. They had been told the program would be cost-shared, with each level of government paying one-third of the cost. I wish to read from the Red Book, the one that was waved during the federal election: "A Liberal government will join with the provinces and municipalities in a shared-cost, two-year $6-billion infrastructure program to upgrade transportation and local services."

It seems that the mathematicians in Ottawa and Saskatchewan have mangled this program so badly that not only will the money not be spent on what the Prime Minister said it would be spent on, but urban municipalities are being asked to contribute up to two-thirds of that money.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate explain to this chamber how it is that this government has lost control of this program? What steps will they take to remedy what is obviously a very confusing program for the people who were supposed to be the benefactors but who now feel they are being punished?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not accept the notion that the government has lost control of the program.

Senator Berntson: Only in Saskatchewan.

Senator Fairbairn: The program will be beneficial to Canadians in communities all across this country. As I understand it, the government has negotiated with the provincial government of Saskatchewan. They have an agreement on how they intend to operate. In view of the honourable senator's concern on behalf of those municipalities, I will be pleased to look into the agreement to see what further comment I can usefully make.

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, if everything is on track with this program and under control, as the leader says it is, then why is it that the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association passed an emergency resolution on February 2, which reads:

> WHEREAS the original intent of the national infrastructure program as proposed by Federation of Canadian Municipalities (FCM) was to fund municipal infrastructure programs only; and
> WHEREAS the original intent of the FCM infrastructure program was that it be cost shared equally by all three levels of government;
> THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that SUMA take the following position with respect to the current Canada-Saskatchewan Infrastructure Works program:
> 1) that the infrastructure program follow the original intent as proposed by the FCM;

> 2) that urban municipal infrastructure projects be cost shared equally by all three levels of governments; and

If everything is under control, then why has the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association seen fit to pass this resolution?

Senator Berntson: It looks to me like you are out of control.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, clearly there is some difference between the municipal and the provincial level of understanding on this agreement.

Senator Berntson: Agreed to by the feds, by the way.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, indeed. I would be pleased to take the representation made here and attempt to obtain some information for the honourable senator by next week.

CHANGES TO RULES GOVERNING RRSP CONTRIBUTIONS—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Terry Stratton: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

As honourable senators are aware, reforms to RRSP and pension plan rules brought about by the Mulroney government improved opportunities to build retirement income. A key goal was to put those who saved through RRSPs on an equal footing with pension plan members. The changes also sought to put those in less generous pension plans on an equal footing with those in more generous pension plans.

My question to the honourable leader is this: Regarding the upcoming budget, could the honourable senator indicate if the government is aware that any cuts to RRSP contributions will cause a major gap between those who save through RRSPs and those who are part of a pension plan at their place of work? Further, could the honourable senator indicate whether or not such a gap would be acceptable to this government?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I regret that I will have to give the honourable senator a similar answer to that which I gave to Senator Gustafson. I cannot comment on what might or might not be in the budget, or on the views of the Minister of Finance. One can say that on this issue he has probably heard as lively a comment as any from across the country during the pre-budget consultations. We will have to await the budget.

SOCIAL POLICY WHITE PAPER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Minister of Human Resources Development has stated on many occasions that the Liberal government is ready to deal with the new realities facing social policy in Canada, and is calling for a public review. When the minister took office, he found a social policy white paper prepared by departmental officials. Is it the minister's intention to use this document for consultation?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask that specific question of my colleague the minister. As honourable senators are aware, he is engaging in a wide-ranging and action-oriented plan to review and, perhaps, to restructure the social security system in this country with a view to having something concrete before Parliament by the end of this year. I am sure that he will be taking into consideration all of the very useful and important proposals that are already on the table, as well as ones that will come forward during the consultations. However, I will specifically inquire about the one referred to by the honourable senator.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, if it is the minister's intention to make use of this document, I should like the Leader of the Government to ask him if he will make it public prior to the consultation, so that Canadians can prepare themselves for what is to come. The merit in this would be to reduce the lengthy period that has been foreseen for a final report.

This is a most urgent situation, something which was recognized by the previous government. We should act on it as soon as possible. Unless there are serious reasons that I do not know about, a period of two years seems to me to be very lengthy to try to improve unemployment insurance, social reform and all the other problems related to those two issues, including manpower training. There might be some merit in making public papers that he intends to use, if that is the case, so that people can begin to reflect on these proposals.

Senator Fairbairn: I will be happy to draw the matter to his attention, honourable senators.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONTRABAND ALCOHOL ON RESERVES

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it concerns contraband.

As its documentation attests, your government is aware of the serious problem of contraband alcohol. Your documentation refers to Canadian production at 25 per cent, which represents roughly $4.5 billion per year. Therefore, this is a very serious problem.

Can the leader assure us that her government will do as much to curb the growing scourge of contraband alcohol in Canada as it does to combat cigarette smuggling?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was conscious the other day of Senator Nolin's concern with regard to this issue. I can only reiterate what I said to him at that time. The critical difficulty in this whole problem is the existence of a network of contraband activity, one of the most visible of which, as we know, involves cigarettes. It also includes alcohol, drugs, firearms, and other commodities. As I said the other day, the careful but determined efforts that the government is making in a major way on this issue will result in cracking those networks. In so doing, the same effect will reflect on the movement of contraband alcohol as on the movement of contraband cigarettes.

Senator Nolin: I appreciate your answer on that point and the answer that was given the other day, but my main concern is with respect to jobs. With contraband alcohol there is a net loss of jobs because the alcohol that is illegally imported from the U.S. is not produced in Canada; it is produced in the U.S. However, approximately 80 per cent of the cigarettes smuggled from the U.S. are made in Canada. That is why I am concerned by this occurrence.

In Montreal, as in any other area of the country where we have distilleries, we will lose those jobs. The industry is already telling your government that there is a decline in our production, and definitely a decline in jobs. That is why I am so concerned. This is a different situation from the contraband cigarette issue. The government must be very decisive and very effective in fighting the importation of contraband alcohol.

Senator Fairbairn: I will take your last comment to heart, and perhaps have a future discussion with you on this matter.

TRANSPORT

CONDITION OF ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. W. David Angus: Honourable senators, my question is to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, and concerns the St. Lawrence Seaway.

The recent work stoppage on the West Coast that we dealt with in this chamber the other evening emphasized once again the importance of the seaway and the Great Lakes system as one of our two major routes for the export of our grain from the prairies, and for our other foreign trade.

In listening to Senator Stanbury's speech yesterday, I was very pleased to hear him talk about the infrastructure of this country, the massive dams and canals, the St. Lawrence Seaway and the other major structures that have been built up by our forefathers. He stated that:

> Our grandchildren will have the benefit of strong and durable infrastructure for years to come, as long as we maintain and renew it now. If we fail to maintain and build infrastructure today, the cost for future generations will be prohibitive.

The St. Lawrence Seaway, it is well known, is presently in need of substantial sums of money to upgrade it. My question for the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Does this government intend to include in the $6-billion infrastructure program the needed repairs and maintenance to the St. Lawrence Seaway? If not, what plans does the government have for maintenance of the St. Lawrence Seaway?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the agreements with the provinces concerning infrastructure have within them the flexibility for these projects to come up via the provinces from the municipalities, or sometimes through other methods. The final selections are then made by a joint board. I cannot say whether or not this particular project will be one of them, but I appreciate the depth of your concern and the magnitude of that waterway. I will make enquiries concerning your question.

However, with respect to your question relating to the infrastructure program itself, you might also want to apply a little pressure on your friends in Quebec as to whether or not they might like to bring it forward as one of their projects.

Senator Angus: Perhaps you would be so kind on another day as to let us know whether or not the St. Lawrence Seaway maintenance and upgrading is included in the infrastructure program that we are now referring to as "the infrastructure program." In other words, I should like to know if the kind of maintenance and repair of infrastructure referred to by Senator Stanbury yesterday might include the St. Lawrence Seaway. More specifically, I should like to know if your government has any plans at the moment for repairs and maintenance of the St. Lawrence Seaway. If so, which part of the seaway would be involved, and how much money is being allocated?

Senator Fairbairn: I will do my best to obtain some answers to those questions.

REPAIRS TO PORTS OF HALIFAX AND SAINT JOHN— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: May I ask a supporting question?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I apologize, but we are already a couple of minutes beyond the 30-minute limit. However, I do not like to interrupt an honourable senator in the middle of a questioning sequence.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This will be the last question.

The Hon. the Speaker: For that reason, I allowed Senator Angus to continue.

Since there were no questions recognized on the government side, perhaps the house would accept two brief questions from that side, and then we will call for the next item. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stewart: My question is short. If perchance it is found that improvements or repairs to the St. Lawrence Seaway are eligible for inclusion under the infrastructure program — that is, the shared program between Canada, the provinces, and the municipalities — will the minister undertake to assure this house that the appropriate authorities at the Ports of Halifax and Saint John are made aware that money is available from this source for comparable work at those ports?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will give the honourable senator's question the same very serious attention as I am giving to that of Senator Angus.

THE ECONOMY

UNDERGROUND LABOUR MARKET— LOSS OF TAX DOLLARS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, it is a well-known fact that the GST has driven a lot of things underground in this country.

Senator Doody: Let's repeal it!

Senator Corbin: One of the results of the GST is the underground labour market. That is a fact which the National Finance Committee managed to bring to light last year during its studies. Officials of the government had to acquiesce to our view that there was a lot of underground labour occurring, which means that the government is being deprived of an important tax source.

• (1500)

Notwithstanding the fact that the government and the committees in the other place are beginning to examine the possibility of replacing the GST with something else, in the meantime has the government taken any action to recuperate lost revenue from the underground labour market?

I respect the fact that they want to recuperate their cigarette taxes, their liquor taxes and what have you. However, they are also suffering a very great revenue loss because of the underground labour market. Those Canadians who pay their income tax expect others to do the same. Therefore, what is being done with respect to that problem currently?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question specifically. Certainly, the objective of this government is to create an atmosphere in which Canadians once again will be in a position to obey the laws of this country and contribute through their efforts to the well-being of this country.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: So we should get rid of the speed limits?

Senator Fairbairn: I would be pleased to look further into the issue raised by Senator Corbin. Perhaps this house at some point would like to look into it.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. H.A. Olson moved the second reading of Bill S-2, to implement a convention between Canada and the Republic of Hungary, an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Nigeria, an agreement between Canada and the Republic of Zimbabwe, a convention between Canada and the Argentine Republic and a protocol between Canada and the Kingdom of the Netherlands for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to income taxes and to make related amendments to other Acts.

He said: Honourable senators, I have a few comments to make about this bill. The purpose of the bill, honourable senators will be pleased to know, is to implement conventions between Canada and Hungary, Canada and Nigeria, Canada and Argentina, Canada and Zimbabwe, for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, and also to implement a protocol to revise the current convention between Canada and the Kingdom of the Netherlands. Before discussing the details of this particular bill, I would like to say a few words about the desirability and the role of tax treaties.

Tax treaties are important to promote international trade and facilitate international investment. In particular, the existence of a tax treaty enshrining the basis, as well as the rate, of the applicable taxes generates certainty and provides a general air of tax stability that can only be reassuring to investors and traders. In short, a treaty rate of tax cannot be increased unless the treaty itself is modified or terminated; termination is a rare event, while revision is a lengthy process requiring the concurrence of the two governments and, in both cases, taxpayers will normally get advance notice of the impending changes.

Tax treaties also reduce the annoyance in the operation of the tax system by eliminating the necessity of paying tax on business profits in the source country if there is no permanent establishment in that country, and by providing a mechanism to settle problems encountered by taxpayers. More important, tax treaties eliminate or alleviate double taxation in the instances where international transactions are involved that may give rise to the same income being taxable in the hands of the same person by more than one state.

The international "juridical" double taxation may generally arise in three cases: a) where each contracting state subjects the same person to tax on his world-wide income; b) where a person is a resident of a contracting state and derives income from the other contracting state, and both states impose tax on that income; c) where each contracting state subjects the same person, not being a resident of either contracting state, to tax on income derived from a contracting state. This may result, for instance, in the case where a non-resident person has a permanent establishment in one contracting state through which he derives income from the other contracting state.

For the purpose of eliminating double taxation, the tax treaties establish two categories of rules: First, in the case of a number of items of income, an exclusive right to tax is conferred on only one of the contracting states. In this way, the other contracting state is prevented from taxing, and double taxation is thus absolutely avoided.

Second, for other items of income, the right to tax is not an exclusive one. These provisions confer on the state of source, or situs, a full or limited right to tax, and the state of residence must allow relief so as to avoid double taxation.

The major reform of Canada's income tax legislation in 1971 required Canada to expand its network of double taxation conventions — tax treaties, if you like — with other countries. Since that time, negotiations for the conclusion of new treaties or the revision of existing ones have been entered into with 75 countries, according to my notes.

In this bill, the four tax conventions under review follow the general pattern of the conventions previously approved by Parliament, and I am advised that the number of Canadian tax treaties in force presently is 52.

Honourable senators, I should like now to briefly indicate the main elements of these tax treaties, the ones which I mentioned at the beginning of my comments and which are specifically identified in the bill. I will deal with the protocol of the Netherlands convention at the end of my comments.

These treaties provide generally that dividends may be taxed in the source country at a maximum rate of 15 per cent. However, in the case of dividends paid to a company that is a resident of a contracting state, a 10-per-cent rate, or 12.5 per cent in the case of Nigeria, will apply if the company receiving the dividends holds a certain equity interest in the company paying the dividends.

In the case of interest paid by a resident of one country to a resident of the other country, a general rate of 12.5 per cent will apply. There are, of course, always exceptions: 15 per cent in the case of Zimbabwe and 10 per cent in the case of Hungary. There are a number of other exceptions and I will not go into the details.

Interest paid in respect of a bond or a similar obligation of the government, a political subdivision or local authority thereof is exempt in the country in which it arises. Also, except in the case of Zimbabwe, these treaties contain a provision that would allow that interest paid in respect of a loan made, guaranteed or insured, or a credit extended, guaranteed or insured by certain state entities — for example, in Canada, the Export Development Corporation — be taxable only in the state in which the recipient of such interest resides.

With respect to royalties, the conventions provide for a general rate of 10 per cent in the source country — 12.5 per cent in the case of Nigeria, and from 3 to 15 per cent in the case of Argentina, depending on the nature of the royalty. Copyright royalties are exempt under treaty with Hungary.

Some of the other matters also dealt with in these tax treaties include:

Capital gains: The treaty provisions dealing with capital gains reflect the standard Canadian position enabling the source country to tax gains arising on the sale of real property, business assets and shares in real estate companies.

Non-discrimination: Under the conventions, discrimination on the basis of nationality is prohibited, thereby ensuring the nationals of one country equal treatment with nationals of the other country in the same circumstances. However, this does not prevent a country from providing fiscal incentives — for example, the small business deduction — on the basis of the residence of the taxpayer.

Pensions: Canada has preserved its right to tax pensions paid to residents of Argentina, Zimbabwe, Nigeria and Hungary. In the case of Argentina, Zimbabwe and Hungary, the maximum rate of tax applicable by a contracting state to periodic pension and annuity payments to residents of the other state is 15 per cent. In the case of Nigeria, there is no stated maximum rate of tax applicable to periodic pension payments. Finally, war veterans' pensions are generally exempt from tax under the four treaties.

Double taxation relief: The treaties provide that, in Canada, double taxation of foreign source income of Canadian residents is alleviated by way of a foreign tax credit, in accordance with the limitations provided for in the Canadian legislation. In addition, dividends received by a company resident in Canada from the exempt surplus of its foreign affiliate resident in a treaty country are exempt from tax in Canada. Reciprocally, relief from double taxation is granted in the other treaty country in accordance with the method recognized by that country.

As I said a moment ago, I want to deal separately with the amendment to the protocol with the Kingdom of the Netherlands. The protocol to the tax convention signed by Canada and the Netherlands updated the 1986 treaty to take into consideration the changes made to the respective laws and policies of the two countries. The Netherlands is the first country with which the offer extended by the Minister of Finance in his budget of 1992 to reduce the withholding rates on direct dividends will be implemented. The rate of withholding on dividends where the recipient holds 25 per cent of the capital of the paying corporation are reduced over a period of five years to 5 per cent, which is a change from the current 10 per cent. The protocol also introduces a reduction of the rate of withholding tax to 10 per cent from the existing 15 per cent and eliminates the withholding tax on interest paid to pension funds and on royalties of computer software. The latter issue was referred to in the April, 1993, budget.

In conclusion, honourable senators, on balance the terms of the four tax conventions and the protocol provide some equitable solutions to the various problems of double taxation existing between Canada and these countries. Each of these countries hopes to implement the bilateral convention as soon as possible, and consequently I would therefore commend this bill to the most favourable consideration by this house.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, we wish to thank Senator Olson for his analysis of Bill S-2. I should like to make a few comments at this time and, if there is no further discussion from honourable senators, perhaps we could agree to have the bill referred today to the agreed-upon committee.

As this is my first opportunity to speak in this chamber since the elections, I should like to make a few preliminary remarks. Those preliminary remarks begin with congratulating you, Your Honour, on your appointment to the position of Speaker of the Senate.

Honourable senators, the appointment of Senator LeBlanc to the position of Speaker is a clear indication of the confidence that the government, and indeed, I suggest, all of his colleague have in his ability to discharge his duties with fairmindedness, grace and good humour. His Honour's appointment is also a tribute to his and to my province of New Brunswick. In that sense, His Honour is following in the footsteps of other distinguished New Brunswickers in becoming the presiding officer of the Upper House of Canada. For example, the Honourable Amos Edwin Botsford, the Honourable Robert Duncan Wilmot, the Honourable Walter Edward Foster, the Honourable James Horace King, and the Honourable Muriel McQueen Fergusson were New Brunswickers in whose footsteps Senator LeBlanc follows.

New Brunswickers are certainly aware of His Honour's important contributions to our province and to Canada throughout his remarkable career, and we take special pride as well in his appointment as the first Acadian to preside over this chamber. I congratulate him, and bring him special good wishes from the people of my province and, in particular, the people of Petitcodiac and Saint-Joseph, where he is affectionately known as Roméo du cove.

Honourable senators, as Senator Olson has pointed out, Bill S-2 deals with the matter of tax conventions and the principle of these kinds of treaties. The former government, as you know, dealt with the principle that tax treaties are useful in promoting international trade and facilitating international investment. With that foundation, we are very comfortable with this particular bill, and we underscore that the existence of tax treaties enshrining the basis as well as the rate of the applicable taxes generates certainty and provides a general air of tax stability that can only be reassuring to investors and to traders.

This bill, as I have read it and as Senator Olson has outlined for us, is dealing with tax treaties with Hungary, Nigeria, Argentina, and Zimbabwe, and also allowing the government to amend the existing treaty with the Netherlands. Through this bill, these treaties will be possible and will set out the framework for taxes on investment income flowing between Canada and Hungary, Nigeria, Argentina, Zimbabwe and the Netherlands. Furthermore, they will provide the mechanism to avoid double taxation and prevent tax evasion. Tax treaties such as the ones that we are dealing with in Bill S-2 were negotiated by the previous government and the bill, as Senator Olson has pointed out, will bring the number of tax treaties to 56.

These agreements deal with problems that arise when residents of one nation earn income in another. International double taxation occurs when the same person pays comparable taxes in two or more states on the same taxable income for the same period of time. For example, double taxation would arise if a resident of Japan were taxed in both Canada and Japan on dividend income received from a Canadian company. This type of treaty prevents double taxation and therefore is an important economic development instrument, since it facilitates investment.

The principle is clear, and while there is some complexity to the content, that is something that the committee to which it will be referred will be able to examine in its specificity. Therefore we would be happy to see the bill receive second reading today and referred to the appropriate committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Olson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 1 under Reports of Committees:

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Senate budget 1994-95), presented in the Senate on January 19, 1994.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I did not want Senator Molgat to become worried about his budget, and that is why I think we should complete the matter this afternoon.

Before proceeding with the adoption of the budget for the year 1994-95, I would like to thank all members of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration for their collaboration over the past two and a half years. Quite often we had heated discussions but it was through these, as we say in French, le choc des idées, that we most often found the best solution. This, in turn, has permitted the committee to adopt policies that have improved the administrative functions of the Senate. If one reviews the recommendations of the Auditor General for 1991, which was requested by the previous committee, they will see that the recommendations pertaining to the administration of the Senate have been largely carried out. However, the ones pertaining to the senators will certainly require further scrutiny by the new committee.

There are many people I would like to thank, but I shall limit myself to the most assiduous without any reflection on the others: Senator LeBlanc, Senator Kenny, Senator Molgat and Senator Hébert. People will understand if I address a very special thanks to Senator Doyle, Senator Lynch-Staunton, Senator Di Nino and Senator Doody, who have given me a great deal of support. I must say I have learned a lot from these people who have much more experience than I have. They shared their experience with me, and I thank them for it.

[Translation]

I would also like to thank the branch staff and directors as well as the clerk of the committee, Mr. Paul Bélisle, and all the employees who always make themselves available to us and respond very patiently to our constant demands, at least in front of us. I do not know if they show signs of impatience behind our backs sometimes. I must say that their dedication, their commitment is steadfast and I want to give them special thanks.

[English]

Being a member of the Internal Economy Committee requires a great deal of time. Although it is one of the most demanding committees, it receives little recognition. Be that as it may, I should like to suggest to any of my colleagues who want to learn quickly about the Senate culture, administration, habits and functions, that they serve for a trial period on the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, at least for six months if not a year. They might not get much recognition but they will certainly not have a dull time. Furthermore, through our discussions we developed friendships, and I think that, in the end, real trust developed among most of the members.

Though we have had many policies adopted and administrative modifications introduced, there are still matters requiring attention. One dossier we did not have time to complete is equity of employment, which certainly deserves immediate attention on the part of the Senate. The next committee will also have to focus attention on the East Block renovation plan. That is a $20-million project. No final decision on the project was reached because there was a lot of hesitation about going ahead with the committee room in the Centre Block, which would entail an expenditure of between $5 million to $6 million and, in the end, may not be essential.

These are times of economic hardship, and restraint is certainly in order. Those who assume the responsibility of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee in the future will want to look at that project very carefully.

As Senator Doyle reminded us last Tuesday, and I quote from page 60 of the Debates of the Senate:

> While initial work will require no money from the Senate, we will have started down a road that in this decade will require from the Senate millions of dollars to pay for furnishings, finishings and services to the offices for eight or 18 new senators — none of which is necessary to fill an immediate need. We will be required to commit ourselves to abandon our Centre Block post office and accept at the same time the conversion of an abandoned, windowless vault as a workplace for Senate postal staff.

In this regard, I remember that we moved people from Debates Branch to a room that proved to be inadequate. Six months to a year later, we had to move them somewhere else. We must be careful where we move people who work much longer hours than we do.

Senator Doyle added:

> ...this is the kind of project that cannot be dealt with by approving or denying a committee recommendation. It is the very kind of thing that I said in the Internal Economy Committee "should be properly decided in the chamber." In this instance the word "properly" should imply "after full and public debate."

I believe Senator Doyle gave us food for further reflection.

In this particular case, as in many other situations, a policy of transparency is the best means to avoid unfounded, harsh criticism from the public. You will recall what happened with respect to the renovation of the entrance hall at the Victoria Building, which was entirely the initiative of Public Works. Nevertheless, we had to bear the bulk of the criticism, and this is very recent.

It has to be clear what our real involvement and responsibilities are in those projects. The renovation of the East Block is a project of the same nature. However, I want to make clear that I believe the whole committee was very sensitive to the issues of the protection of heritage and security of buildings.

Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders for proposing to make public the meetings of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, as opposed to the situation that still prevails in the House of Commons. I know that among some of my colleagues on both sides, this decision still meets with resistance, but I strongly feel that this is the best protection for the Senate, which is too often the object of unfair statements.

In concluding, I would like to thank my colleagues for their trust in giving me the chair of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. I wish to tell them that, even if it was not always an easy mandate, it was a very interesting experience.

I would also like to remind you that the two major principles, among others, that always motivated my actions and my decisions were, first, to ensure that everyone, whether it was a staff member or a senator, was treated with all the fairness possible and, second, to manage the public funds as responsibly as possible.

[English]

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before voting on this motion, on behalf of my colleagues — and I am sure I speak for many on the other side of the chamber — I wish to thank Senator Lavoie-Roux for undertaking the chairmanship of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration for the period that she did. Those of us who have attended meetings of that committee will realize that it is probably the most difficult committee, not only of which to be a member but particularly to chair, since the interests of each senator are involved. Senator Lavoie-Roux carried out her duties with tremendous patience, distinction, and exemplary devotion to the Senate and to each of its members.

Along the way, it was inevitable that Senator Lavoie-Roux would not please everyone, but that is not the purpose of public life; the purpose of public life is to do what one thinks is best for everyone. Certainly, in her case, she did that.

I should like to thank Senator Lavoie-Roux for the many hours she spent working in the interests of this body. I can only hope that her successor will use her example as he or she takes over the reins of that committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few comments on the report with which we are being ask to concur.

I watched the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, sometimes in person, at other times from a distance. It has tried, and justly so, to reduce some of the operating expenses of the Senate. This is normal. I believe that any good organisation has to look for opportunities to reduce spending.

However, I believe that we could have thought a bit more about the role and the future of the Senate. I think that too many parliamentarians — faced with criticism from the public, and the media in particular — forget that they are only passing through the parliamentary institutions that are the House of Commons and the Senate. Many of our colleagues have left, and we will go too some day, but the institution will stay.

The buildings where we work are from another era. I am not just talking about the neo-gothic style, I am also referring to the facilities which are not always the best, and do not always allow us to perform in the best possible way. Our committee rooms are antiquated. The air-conditioning — when present — leaves much to be desired. Air quality is poor. Water fountains in the hallways are rusty, but we want to save. I believe that we must, first and foremost, provide parliamentarians with the best means to perform their duties in reasonable comfort. It seems to me that there is nothing wrong with wanting to be comfortable while performing our senatorial duties!

I would venture to say that a person performs better when he or she is comfortable. Our committee rooms are horrible, really horrible! At one point, whips from the previous government even refused to change some chairs, although they were broken. It is not surprising that some of our colleagues have back problems and must leave after half an hour to an hour! I have back problems too, and I like a firm seat when I have to stay seated for any length of time.

It is high time we stopped penny-pinching in the area of parliamentary accommodations. Law-makers are expected to perform efficiently; for that, we require a minimum of tools and a minimum of comfort. Personally, I think that additional meeting rooms are urgently needed. Occasionally, on certain days of the week, committees are lined up at the door, waiting to meet. They are literally queuing up.

This morning, I took part in the setting up of the standing committees of this house; you could already feel the intense pressure to book meeting rooms at reasonable working hours.

Personally, I will confess that I have had it up to here with sitting on committees at mealtime. I am human, just like my father, who used to work with a pick and a shovel for the railway. Human nature does not fundamentally change. When mealtimes approach, we like to relax and eat in peace. One does not work too well on cold sandwiches, if there are any!

Committees have to meet at mealtimes, noon and night; sometimes, even for a breakfast of doughnuts and croissants! Such a diet does not make any sense! I refuse to be subjected to it.

As much as possible, I have deliberately chosen to sit on committees that meet during regular working hours. At night, I like to eat with my family. This situation is largely due to the lack of committee rooms.

I know there are plans for the setting up of new committee rooms, at least one in any case. One new room could possibly be enough to meet the demand, but it remains to be seen. I certainly hope the new committee and its new chairman will make this issue a priority so that we may solve, once and for all, the problem of committee room availability. This is what we need the most now.

I hear no one complaining about the comfort in his or her office or the quality of the secretary's office. Of course, when there are better and larger offices, there is a waiting list, so I think the facilities are probably suitable for all. However, when it comes to the most important part of the senators' task, committee work, we lack the basic necessities. We need new facilities. The existing ones have to be renovated. The air-conditioning system should be adequate, since our noses sometimes object to going into a room where two other meetings have already taken place. The air in that room is polluted, corrupt. It is unacceptable!

No self-respecting unionist in the world outside this chamber would accept such working conditions! Who do we think we are? Let us at least give ourselves the basic facilities we need to do our job well.

We might even see a few more senators doing committee work.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to tell Senator Lavoie-Roux that, on the one or two occasions that I substituted on her committee, she gave me a warm welcome and treated me well, and I thank her for it.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in her speech, Senator Lavoie-Roux thoughtfully mentioned all senators who sat on the committee as well as our staff. I would like to join in her comments.

There is no doubt that we often ask a lot from our staff. I am thinking, for example, about how often we change our minds! We start to move in one direction, and then switch to another! That must be quite unsettling at times. However, they always take it with a smile, and we continue with our work.

Therefore, I particularly want to join in her comments and those made by all senators who sat on the committee. It is certainly not an easy committee as it sits very long hours, and very often. Being chairperson is no piece of cake!

I especially want to tell Senator Lavoie-Roux that, although we did not always agree, and despite some of my colleagues' frequent reservations, I never thought that either side was acting in bad faith. I always appreciated that she was acting out of conviction. I want to thank her for all her work.

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sorry I was not in a position to finalize this earlier. I do not know what kind of crystal ball my honourable friend who is now the Leader of the Opposition had when he was over here, but I find that my crystal ball gets very hazy at times, and it is extremely difficult to make predictions.

We are faced with an inevitable problem. Quite frankly, I do not want to suggest that the Senate should come back if there is no precise work to do, because it is very costly to be here. There is the cost of bringing the senators here as well as the cost of functioning. We have to balance those costs against what work we have before us. With the best of intentions, therefore, I have tried to make my predictions.

At the moment, there are nine bills in the other place. Three of them have received second reading and are in committee. The others are in process and will be referred to committee shortly. I cannot guarantee exactly when they will come out, but it does appear that we will have some of them at least before the end of the month, but not next week.

Similarly, we have just given a bill second reading and sent it to committee. It will presumably be in committee next week, but I do not suppose it will be reported back to us then.

I should like to suggest that we not sit next week, but return the following week. Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 22, 1994, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

• (1550)

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have no objection to not being here if there is no work to challenge us. In fact, if there is no work generated between now and next week, or the end of next week, perhaps the government could make us aware of that and we could take another week off. However, we are looking forward to the government getting the legislation through the House and passing the challenge along to the Senate.

Senator Molgat: I certainly appreciate the comments of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and I will take that into consideration. If, by the end of next week, it appears that we would not have a meaningful workload before us, I will certainly contact him then. I think we have to attempt to find the best way in which the Senate can work, and that is my objective.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cools, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the Opening of the First Session of the Thirty-fifth Parliament.—(4th day of resuming debate)

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I am pleased to take part in the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. However, before I do so I would like to congratulate Senator Gigantès and Senator Cools, the mover and seconder of the motion, for setting the tone of the very vigorous debate to follow.

I want to take this opportunity to speak on the policy of multiculturalism; how it is perceived by some segments of our society and how misleading that perception is. Like our colleague, the Minister of Canadian Heritage, the Honourable Michel Dupuy, I believe the history of our country and our national identity is closely linked to successive waves of immigrants and to the interaction between newcomers and the existing society. Our challenge is how to integrate, not assimilate, these new Canadians and how to promote a Canadian identity that will serve as a rallying point for our diverse population.

Multiculturalism was declared an official policy of the Trudeau government in 1971, some two years after the Official Languages Act was promulgated in 1969. Canadian multiculturalism has always emphasized the positive aspects of ethnic and cultural diversity, and in particular those aspects related to mutual enrichment. Since its inception, multicultural policy has focused on eliminating the barriers to the successful integration of ethnic minorities: barriers such as interethnic and intercultural misunderstanding and conflict, discrimination and racism.

Without the adoption of a policy of multiculturalism, adoption of a policy of official bilingualism would have been interpreted as a rejection of the contribution made by those Canadians whose ancestors are neither French nor British toward building our country.

The Canadian Multiculturalism Act, adopted in 1988, sets out the ten aims of our multicultural policy. Without reciting verbatim the ten points, let me just highlight some of the aspects of the policy.

The policy aims at recognizing and understanding cultural and racial diversity of Canadian society, that it is a fundamental character of the Canadian heritage, and that it provides an invaluable resource in the shaping of Canada's future. It recognizes the existence of communities whose members share a common origin, and their historic contribution to Canadian society. It encourages Canadian institutions to be both respectful and inclusive of Canada's multicultural character. It promotes multiculturalism throughout Canada in harmony with the national commitment to the official languages of Canada.

Nothing in these aims can be considered injurious to national unity. On the contrary, some are absolutely essential to it, such as the promotion of the full and equitable participation of all individuals and communities in Canadian society, the elimination of barriers to such participation, and the assurance that all individuals shall receive equal treatment and protection under the law.

Attacks on multiculturalism appear to be based on misinformation or lack of understanding of policy objectives. There is the frequent assumption that multiculturalism is a luxury that we cannot afford. In reality, the estimates for the current year show that the multiculturalism budget is approximately $35 million in a government budget of $160 billion. Of the $35-million multiculturalism budget, approximately $7 million is used by the department for salaries and operating costs and the balance is spread over four programs. Much of this money is paid out in grants and contributions to individuals, community and service organizations and mainstream institutions.

I believe it is significant to note that practically the entire budget is devoted to salaries and wages, whether it be in the department or through community activities that are funded through the programs, so there is a significant economic aspect to these expenditures that cannot be overlooked. Bringing the cost of funding to the lowest denominator, it works out to approximately one dollar a head for the Canadian people.

So much for the policy of multiculturalism, its objectives and costs, but what is the perception of the critics of the policy?

Some Canadians attribute to the policy all the negatives that irk our society: the illegal entry into Canada of bogus refugees, abuses of the welfare system, the swelling numbers of unemployed and increases in the crime rate. The policy of multiculturalism and the policy of immigration are often intermingled with, and are frequently used as scapegoats for, everything that ails us. Some believe that the policy is designed to ghettoize minority groups by encouraging them to keep apart from the rest of society, and that large sums of money are spent to promote folklore — meaning songs, dances and ethnic foods. This is absolutely not true. Its focus is on integration of first generation Canadians and on promoting societal cohesion.

It is unfortunate that some misperceptions permeate not only the minds of ordinary Canadians but also of members of Parliament, like Ms Diane Ablonczy of the Reform Party. She is reported in The Toronto Star of February 8 as wanting to abolish the Department of Multiculturalism. Multiculturalism is not a department; it is administered within the Department of Canadian Heritage. She proposes that multiculturalism funds be used to integrate immigrants and fight racism. It would take her only a few moments to acquaint herself with the policy and the good work that is carried out, in partnership with mainstream institutions and ethnocultural communities, precisely to integrate immigrants and to fight racism.

Perhaps we should look outside the borders of Canada to appreciate how lucky we are in a country with a population of 27 million people made up of some 100 different ethnic groups. While nobody can deny that bigotry and discrimination do exist in Canada, they are not rampant and have not resulted in violent acts which would tear apart our society. One need only look at what is happening in Northern Ireland, in the Middle East, in the former Yugoslavia, in South Africa and in several other parts of the world to appreciate that, notwithstanding some imperfections, we live in an ideal society.

Multiculturalism has given many first-generation Canadians, as well as those who are second-, third- and fourth-generation Canadians, a feeling of really belonging to this country, a feeling of pride that they are part and parcel of this country. It is a feeling of real comfort to know that one is accepted for what one is rather than for what others would want one to be. It is obvious that we have not done a very good job of selling the concept. It is one that deserves the support of all Canadians. It is an instrument that promotes harmony and cohesion.

A policy of multiculturalism can speed the integration of first-generation Canadians into the social, cultural and economic fabric of our society. However, we cannot overlook the reality that, over the generations, the attraction of the heritage language and culture becomes weak. Language fluency, particularly fluency in the written language, begins to decline with the second generation. I can speak from experience because my two children, who are both fluently bilingual in English and French, have a somewhat limited knowledge of Italian. Nevertheless, they are aware and proud of their heritage and, at the same time, are proud to be true Canadians.

Let us support a policy that has such noble aims, a policy that can be so beneficial in promoting harmony, in promoting good will and in strengthening the sinews of our society, not only for ourselves but also for future generations.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I rise today to participate in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. Before launching my comments on Senate renewal, I should first like to congratulate His Honour the Speaker on his appointment. I should like to say about him, in his absence from the chamber at this moment, that he brings a number of important personal characteristics to this position. Not the least of these characteristics are his sense of humour, and the even more important fact that he is from that great part of our country, Atlantic Canada.

He also brings to the Senate a knowledge of Parliament and how Parliament functions. This has developed through his time in government in the other place and through his work in the Senate. His understanding of the purpose and the work of Parliament will be very useful as our country faces some difficult times ahead.

I would also congratulate Senator Fairbairn, who is also absent from the chamber at this time, on her appointment as Leader of the Government in the Senate and upon her assuming additional cabinet responsibilities for literacy among Canadians. I have known her for only a short period of years, but I am aware that she is deeply committed to the future of Canada.

Honourable senators, I am concerned about the role the Senate has to play in the governing of Canada, both in this Parliament and in the long term. I say this because I am deeply troubled about the future of the country.

I believed that, with the signing of the Charlottetown agreement in August of 1992, we had set out on a path for renewal. As a lawyer, I certainly recognized many of the technical faults in that agreement, but I believed in the compromise, as did most of the senators in this chamber, I understand. It provided a framework for people and legislators to work within in future years. It is my belief that its defeat led directly to the rise of regional-interest political parties, one of which, the Bloc Québécois, is committed to the destruction of the country.

As a result of this rise in regionalism, the other place, demonstrated in the results of the most recent federal election, is divided as never before. The official opposition is dedicated almost exclusively to the issues of Quebec independence, while the Reform Party represents an ideology that runs contrary to the basic tenets of the caring, compassionate and open nation we believe Canada to be.

Honourable senators, I ask you: What role can the Senate play in a Parliament that has the potential to be destructive?

In the 15 minutes that I have at my disposal, I want to concentrate the rest of my comments on those parts of the Speech from the Throne that deal with parliamentary renewal and reform, which may provide an answer to my question as to the future role of the Senate.

I am in every sense of the word a new boy on the block. I have been in the Senate for barely three years. However, after being here for only one week, I quietly observed to myself that the Senate of Canada was sadly in need of a good shot of renewal. That is what the Canadian people have been saying about us as well. Now is the time to act.

It was encouraging, therefore, for me to hear our Governor General say in this chamber on January 18, "The government is committed to enhancing the credibility of Parliament." I remind honourable senators that Parliament includes inter alia the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada.

I have watched carefully the committees that have been struck by the new government, and am chagrined by the dearth of Senate involvement. We are an integral part of the Parliament of Canada but have been expressly excluded by the Government of Canada.

It is distressing that the Senate has been omitted from this government's parliamentary renewal. The Senate has a fundamentally vital role to play. We as senators can show Canadians — all Canadians — that regional desires and aspirations can be achieved within a unifying force. I believe the Senate can be that unifying force.

The Senate can play a leading role in emphasizing the importance of the regions of Canada so that Canadians will realize that the regional spokespersons are in the Senate, where they are supposed to be according to the Confederation debates. This can be a chamber of unity, where regional differences and similarities are discussed and debated by the representatives of two political parties committed to the continuation of Canada as one Canada, with a grand Quebec. However, in order for us to have credibility in our discussions, changes will have to be made in the manner in which this chamber functions. I refer not to constitutional changes, but to internal changes which can be implemented under the title of "Senate renewal."

In congratulating Senator Fairbairn on her appointment as Leader of the Government in the Senate I want to say how encouraged I am that she seems interested in Senate renewal. I note, for instance, that the February 3 edition of The Hill Times reports her as saying that there is a new mood in the Senate which gives us "a real opportunity" to get things done now, perhaps more than ever. She went on to say, "I think senators on both sides are prepared to work hard on the legislative part of the job." The article concludes by saying that she wants to promote the Senate.

In this very chamber when we met on January 20, she said that our whole system of government and Parliament have been viewed with increased cynicism. Senator Fairbairn also said that her government is committed to regaining the respect of Canadians in their Parliament. She emphasized some of the good work of Senate committees. She then concluded her specific comments on the Senate by saying that investigative committee work is "...the kind of work that the Senate is very good at. The government looks forward to this chamber continuing in this important role."

Honourable senators, the Senate has been effective, but I believe it can be more effective and play a more meaningful role in the leadership of this country. I want to say to the Leader of the Government that many of us on this side have been studying ways in which the Senate of Canada can be more effective without the requirement of a constitutional amendment. We have made considerable progress in our work.

Honourable senators will know that we have recently had a two-day special caucus to study renewal, which I had the privilege to chair. Our senators took the process so seriously that we had nearly a 94-per-cent turnout and excellent participation in all the seminars. We have produced documents which contain substantive recommendations for renewal. Now is the time for united action.

I call upon the Leader of the Government, in consultation with my leader, the Honourable John Lynch-Staunton, to appoint a "Senate renewal" working group, comprised of senators from both sides, with a mandate to put some teeth in those sections of the Speech from the Throne that adapt themselves readily to renewal and reform. After all, in that very speech it stated, "The government is committed to enhancing the credibility of Parliament."

We, the Progressive Conservative caucus, have already done substantive work on renewal. We invite you to join us, because there are a great number of initiatives that must be proceeded with.

• (1610)

Permit me to be more specific. Senator Fairbairn spoke of the important role of Senate committees. A great deal can be done to make committee work in the Senate much more productive and effective. Senator Everett, perhaps, put it best in his farewell speech on Thursday, January 20, 1994 when he said:

> ...the committee system of this chamber is its heart and soul, both in its legislative capacity and its investigative capacity.

I encourage Senator Fairbairn to engage the Senate in more special joint committees. In my short time here I have been involved in the work of two special joint committees: One dealt with conflicts of interest and the other with constitutional renewal.

I like this approach to policy development. Special joint committees seem to combine the best elements of both chambers. As they are established by a specific reference from the government, there is a feeling that the Senate, through its membership, is contributing in a meaningful way to the development of the political agenda.

Senators bring to the task at hand their varied backgrounds, and the fact that they do not have to seek re-election can add a more imaginative flavour to the committee reports. Those from the other place bring a sense of immediacy — the need to solve the problem quickly.

Professor C.E.S. Franks said of Senate-directed studies that:

> These investigations are usually of a higher standard than those by committees of the House of Commons. Reasons for the differences include: First, many extremely able and experienced Canadians sit in the Senate and contribute to this investigative work; second, investigations by the Senate are usually non-partisan; third, Senate investigations do not suffer from excessive exposure in the media; fourth, senators have the time and the leisure to conduct diligent > research and exhaustive analysis; and fifth, investigators can work on for many years, immune from the vagaries and demands of the electoral process. The work procedures of the Senate committees are far better than those in the House, and ensure that witnesses are given the time to present their case and are questioned carefully. Competence, freedom from competing demands on energy, low partisanship and an absence of fresh pressures of time and fears about re-election are the keys to successful Senate investigations.

I believe that there is a spirit of renewal in this place. Perhaps a small indication of this spirit at work is the fact that the Progressive Conservative Senate caucus elected its own leader by secret ballot. We are fortunate, and proud, to have Senator John Lynch-Staunton as our leader, and I believe that we will be able to work with senators opposite to make meaningful changes in this place. In short, the time has come to move on internal reform.

I want to outline for you some of the topics that this new Senate working group on renewal, that would be drawn up by Senator Lynch-Staunton and the Leader of the Government in the Senate, could canvass during its study. These topics include improving the legislative timeline and a consideration of whether pre-study should become a more regular part of the legislative process. Also, the working group could study improvement of the method for selecting subjects of investigation by a committee. When an investigative committee is struck, it should immediately develop and adopt a work plan and a communication plan for the study.

The Senate should also take the lead in government program evaluation. A procedure should be developed for selecting those programs which are to be studied each year. Consideration should be given to having the Auditor General or Comptroller General make recommendations as to appropriate methodology. The Senate, through its committees, should undertake at least three specific program evaluations a year.

Another area for the working group is the establishment of a Standing Senate Committee on Official Languages to which the annual report of the Commissioner of Official Languages would automatically be referred for study and analysis.

The Senate should institute a disallowance procedure for statutory instruments, as recommended by the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Scrutiny of Regulations. A regulation disallowed through this procedure could not again be advanced until six months had passed from the time of disallowance.

The Senate, through its legislative and investigative work, could act to ensure the enrichment of Canadian values of bilingualism and multiculturalism.

A standing committee on Human Rights should be established to which the annual reports of the Human Rights Commission, the Status of Women Minister and the minister's report on senior citizens could automatically be referred for careful study and analysis.

There should also be the establishment of cross-party regional caucuses inclusive of independent senators. This would provide an opportunity for the Senate to work at its best.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I strongly urge the Leader of the Government in the Senate to establish immediately, in conjunction with the Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable John Lynch-Staunton, a special committee on Senate renewal made up of members from both sides, which I referred to above. It could, for example, have a four- or five-month mandate to produce significant recommendations on renewal that could be debated by the Senate in Committee of the Whole. The Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate can be assured of our cooperation and of the willing support of our caucus for such an endeavour.

On motion of Senator Hastings, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE VETERANS HEALTH CARE REGULATIONS—ORDER WITHDRAWN

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, before I move the motion, I want to make an amendment pursuant to rule 31 to modify the motion to add on the record the following:

> That the committee report no later than October 31, 1994.

When I originally presented my motion, I did not include the date for reporting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators is Senator Marshall's addition accepted? Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Might I have the amendment again, please?

The Hon. the Speaker: I have received it.

Senator Marshall: I do not know the wording, but I did not include in my motion a date for reporting by the committee. I simply want to add that, namely that the committee present the report no later than October 31, 1994.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I would just point out to Senator Marshall that the amendment puts a time limit of October 31, 1994, while the second paragraph reads:

> ...on all other matters concerning veterans affairs which may arise from time to time.

From what times to what times?

• (1620)

Senator Marshall: From when the committee is struck until October 31, 1994.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this is really for my edification. We see a number of these motions which ask a committee to target a specific topic, but then the words are added: "...and on all other matters," et cetera, which is, in effect, a very wide open authorization.

Can we not limit this mandate, particularly if there is a target date, to the health care regulations, whatever they may be? The committee can report by a certain date, and then they will not be under pressure to say that, since they are entitled to go into other aspects of veterans affairs, they cannot report by the specified date.

I would urge Senator Marshall to amend his motion to restrict the special study to veterans health care regulations, and to report by October 31, 1994.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, if it is agreed, I will do it. However, it is obvious, as I have learned over the years, that emergencies arise from time to time, especially with veterans as they are aging. Changes are made in the legislation. This is very flexible wording which gives the committee an opportunity to look at a current problem without the necessity of going back to the Senate and waiting perhaps three or four weeks before the matter is dealt with. If you wish, I can detail, in a very long list, the things that I want to review and deal with in the committee.

On second thought, perhaps I should withdraw my motion and present a different one at a later date.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that we take a little more time to find an accommodation for everyone?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 22, 1994, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 22, 1994

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

SENATOR'S STATEMENT

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF TAXATION ON STANDARD OF LIVING

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my statement today is as a result of a message I received from Mr. Gary Herman of British Columbia. Mr. Herman is part of the employee relations group of a major forestry operation in the Province of British Columbia. Since it is budget day, I think it appropriate that his message be on the record:

> These are most difficult times. Years ago when we negotiated a raise, we saw full benefit and gained on our standard of living. Nowadays, we seem to receive more money, but are falling further behind. With more taxes, higher tax brackets, hidden taxes, G.S.T., federal, municipal and provincial taxes, it almost seems we would be further ahead to refuse the raise.
> We are trying a new system at our operation. It is called — "Working Together." We are working with management to create a more productive, efficient, safer, recovery oriented, profitable, harmonious atmosphere.
> With co-operation from both union and management, it is our belief that if we share our ideas and become the best operation in our industry, our jobs will be secure and management will gain the reputation in the marketplace for a quality, dependable product.
> Perhaps, there is a valuable lesson to be learned here. If we, as Canadians, would work together to make Canada the best country in the world, to have our products recognized as of the highest standard, to have our name "Canada" stand for quality, we could create full circle employment.
> As individual Canadians, (taxpayers) we are accountable to pay our bills and taxes — unfortunately, we are one of the highest taxed countries in the world. As a result, our standard of living has been reduced. It is high time for the government to restrain its spending, reduce taxes so we can gain back the standard of living which we once enjoyed. The individual taxpayer can spend dollars much more efficiently than the government. The amount of waste generated by the government is a tragedy to the individual taxpayer, never mind what it does to the country and the future of our children. In short, we need lower taxes. The government is making hard-working people into tax evaders. Enough is enough!
> In order for us to believe in our country, we must all work together to save this most beautiful, free, wonderful nation called "Canada." We have to trust in our governments. We have to share our ideas. We have to make our operations successful and profitable not only for our security, but for Canada's!

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Eileen Rossiter: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 105 of the Rules of the Senate, I have the honour to table the first report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, which deals with the expenses incurred by the committee during the Third Session of the Thirty-fourth Parliament.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—NOTICE OF MOTION TO AMEND CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, February 24, 1994, I will move:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada respecting the Schedule to the Prince Edward Island Terms of Union concerning a fixed crossing joining the Island to the mainland.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE FUTURE OF DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, February 24, 1994, I will move that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the future of the Department of Veterans Affairs, and that the committee present its report no later than October 31, 1994.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, February 24, 1994, I will call the attention of the Senate to an appeal from the Canadian Vietnam veterans to the federal government to provide national capital lands for the site of the Canadian Vietnam veterans national memorial.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MONITOR MATTERS RELATED TO THE FEDERAL ENVIRONMENT ASSESSMENT PROCESS

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, February 23, 1994, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources be authorized to monitor all matters related to the implementation and application of the Act to establish a Federal Environment Assessment Process (previously Bill C-13); and
> That the committee report to the Senate no later than June 30, 1995.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

STATUS AND ACCEPTANCE OF NAFTA— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government is as a result of an address given by the Minister for International Trade, the Honourable Roy MacLaren, in Davos, Switzerland, on January 29, in which he discussed Canada, the global economy, and particularly our country's position with respect to international trade.

The purpose of my question is to try to reconcile the minister's statement with what we heard during the last election campaign, what we read in the Red Book, what we went through in 1988, and what was repeated to us recently regarding the Liberal government's approach to NAFTA. In other words, what we have been hearing over the past few years — adamant Liberal opposition to free trade — appears to have been totally contradicted by the minister.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If honourable senators on the other side were to read what they said during the debates on the FTA and NAFTA, they would have to admit that I am not far from the truth regarding their approach to free trade.

The minister said in his speech that the recently proclaimed North American Free Trade Agreement, which Liberals in this chamber voted against, can also provide a complementary tool for expanding opportunities for Canadian exports. Therefore, honourable senators, despite the vote by Liberals against the enabling legislation on NAFTA, a minister of the Crown, a member of the Liberal Party, comes out with a most constructive interpretation by saying, and I quote, "NAFTA can provide a complementary tool for expanding opportunities for Canadian exports."

My question to the Leader of the Government is: Does this mean that the government is now trying to dispel the fears displayed in the past in this country by the Liberal Party? Does the Liberal government today finally see reason?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would first of all take issue with an initial statement made by Senator Lynch-Staunton to the effect that the Liberal Party has an adamant opposition to free trade. That, as all my colleagues around me will attest, is not the case. It is true that we carried on vigorous debate on two occasions on the propositions that were put forward by the former government.

I have not seen the speech given by the minister in Davos. I would be interested in reading it. Mr. MacLaren is a vigorous advocate for the trading interests of this country all around the world.

The Prime Minister himself, shortly after the election campaign, entered into discussions with the President of the United States on this and other matters; a number of agreements were made between the two countries involving the final position of our government on NAFTA. We will be working on trade arrangements that will produce the best possible results for this country, both in the United States and in Mexico.

Indeed, yesterday morning I was meeting with officials from Mexico to support the further activity that we will be pursuing there. There will be a ministerial visit next week, and the Prime Minister himself will be going to Mexico in March to take up the opportunities that this country will find mutually beneficial in that arrangement.

Senator Olson: It is better than it was.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, it is not. There has been absolutely no change in the North American Free Trade Agreement and absolutely no change in the NAFTA legislation. This government signed exactly what the Conservative government had been promoting over the years, and that includes the FTA.

Senator Olson: The problem lies in the interpretation.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is not a matter of interpretation; it is a matter of fact.

When the minister says she has not read the statement, it makes me wonder whether she is trying to detach herself from her colleague's comments.

Senator Fairbairn: Not at all.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I will read further from this statement, since the Leader of the Government has not had a chance to read it herself.

This was a major policy statement on Canada's position on international trade. It was not just a passing comment. This was a well-prepared, thoughtful statement made in front of a prestigious international audience.

After Mr. MacLaren said that NAFTA was not the only tool available to Canada to expand our trade relations, he added:

> Another approach could be to explore the prospects for negotiating bilateral free-trade arrangements with selected Pacific Rim countries. In this respect, Canada's role in the FTA...and now NAFTA can be translated into a major competitive advantage...

This is from the same party which, for at least six years, condemned absolutely and constantly all our efforts to develop FTA and NAFTA. Now they say:

> ... NAFTA can be translated into a major competitive advantage on an international scale by encouraging greater economies of scale, greater specialization and greater productive efficiency.

•(1410)

A member of that same party, the Honourable Roy MacLaren, Minister for International Trade, went on to say:

> To do this, however, it is essential that we view our North American base not as a buffer against international competition, but as a springboard into a rapidly expanding global economy.

Senator Frith: You are making a silk purse out of a sow's ear.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The question is simple: If that is not firm and enthusiastic support and commitment for NAFTA and the FTA, as developed by the Conservative government, what is it?

Senator Doody: Another trip down the road to Damascus!

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I repeat again that considerable efforts were made to clarify NAFTA prior to the decision of this government to proclaim it. That was made clear last fall. Having listened to the comments on the speech by my colleague Mr. MacLaren, I am anxious to get a copy of it, because it does set out a forward-looking pathway that goes well beyond North America.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Conservative policy! I could not agree with you more.

Senator Fairbairn: I must say to my honourable friend that the thrust of Canadian interest in the Far East and the Asian markets has been ongoing for many years, long before the government which my honourable friend supports came to power. Indeed, some of the movements that have taken place in the countries of Asia, particularly Japan, China and various other Pacific Rim nations, were vigorously promoted well over ten years ago. This is the same thrust in which my friend Senator Carney has been very much involved in her career.

There is absolutely nothing wrong in the people of Canada, who support the development of this nation, joining in an activity that will take our trading arrangements far beyond the borders of North America, into other productive markets in Latin America, South America and the Far East. Certainly, it is a tremendous opportunity that is before us in the Far East.

QUEBEC

IMPENDING ELECTION AND REFERENDUM—ACTION FOR NATIONAL UNITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, bearing in mind yesterday's results in the provincial riding of Bonaventure, Quebec, where a separatist Parti Québécois member was elected in a riding that has been a long-time Liberal riding; and that Stephen Block, a political scientist at Concordia University, has said that, as things stand right now, the Liberals will be massacred in the provincial election that will be held this year; and that the Parti Québécois has promised to hold a referendum on sovereignty within ten months following an election; my question to the Honourable Leader of the Government in this chamber is: What is the Canadian government doing now, in preparation, to try to convince Quebecers, before any referendum, that they are much better off within Canada than choosing to operate as a separate, sovereign state?

Senator Berntson: Well, they have endorsed the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for his question. First, I would, as I am sure he would, dispute the comments quoted in describing the situation in Quebec with regard to the Liberal Party of Quebec. We strongly support the future of the Liberal government in the province of Quebec. Federally, we fought vigorously in that province — as did the party represented by my honourable friend — to put the whole question of national unity within Canada before the people of Quebec. We will continue to do this.

Personally, I say take heart; there will be a vigorous provincial campaign in Quebec, and federal support for that vigorous campaign. I have every confidence that the people of Quebec will respond to that national call, and to the support of the country for their aims.

Senator Jessiman: By way of supplementary, is the Leader of the Government in the Senate saying that the government will wait for a referendum and then do the work?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, work is being done every day, day by day, on the ground throughout that province. With respect to the people with whom I am associated in our party and government, every single day is a fight for Canada, and for Quebec as a part of Canada. That fight will continue. We will not wait upon these events; we will be active participants in them day by day.

BOSNIA

COHERENCE OF NATO STRATEGY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I was pleased to learn that Bosnian Serb forces appear to have honoured the agreement to withdraw their heavy weapons from the 20-mile exclusion zone around Sarajevo. However, one matter concerns me, and that is the apparent lack of coherent strategy by NATO in Bosnia.

Honourable senators, it will be remembered that in August the North Atlantic Council decided to draft plans to end the siege of Sarajevo with the use of air strikes. Five months later, nothing had happened. In January, NATO met again and issued another order to allow air strikes in order to achieve specific goals: One, to stop the bombardment of Sarajevo by Serbian forces, and two, to allow the replacement of Canadian peace-keepers at Srebrenica and the airport at Tuzla. Then, on February 5, after a Serb mortar exploded killing 68 people in Sarajevo, an ultimatum was issued regarding Sarajevo only.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Does NATO have a coherent policy with respect to the situation in Bosnia, and is the government aware of that coherent policy? If the answer is "yes" on both counts, would the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate explain the main thrust of that policy, including how, if at all, that policy affects the situation at Srebrenica and the airport at Tuzla?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his question. By way of response, I wish to say that Canada and its allies take great encouragement from what has transpired in the past days in the former Yugoslavia with respect to Sarajevo.

This is a situation that has held; it is holding now. Indeed, talks are continuing between United Nations' authorities, the Croats and the Muslims on the possibility of extending the type of ceasefire operation undertaken around Sarajevo to other parts of the area, including Mostar and Tuzla.

Further to the honourable senator's question, a conference was held recently in Bonn, called by the German government, which brought together the countries of the European Union, the United States, Russia and Canada. The purpose of that conference was to review the ongoing policy in that area, and to take stock of exactly where we stand and the direction in which the effort is going. The purpose of that meeting was exactly what the honourable senator seems to have in mind, that is, to maintain an international coherence in the activity in that area.

As far as Srebrenica is concerned, as you know there is an expectation that Canadians will be relieved of their duties in that area within the next few months by the Dutch armed forces. They are now moving into place, and we would hope to see a withdrawal of Canadian forces from that area in fairly short order.

Senator Ottenheimer: I thank the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate for her reply. I have one supplementary question.

I understand that, as a multilateral organization, NATO must balance national interests to a certain extent, I suppose, in an attempt to find a consensus. However, perhaps the honourable minister would be in a position to identify the policy of Canada as a member of NATO, as distinct from the policy of NATO itself.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the policy of Canada in this particular situation has been quite clear from the beginning. Our policy has been to undertake our responsibilities as a member of NATO, as a member of the United Nations, and as a leader in the field of peace-keeping, and to maintain a very sizeable contribution in terms of almost every activity that has taken place in this distressing situation for some considerable period of time. In concert with the United Nations, Canada will be assessing its position on the Canadian contingent in that area as the United Nations prepares a comprehensive status report on where we are now and where the operations will go. Canada will be very much a part of that review, and will be looking to its conclusions for direction in making our own decisions.

Senator Ottenheimer: I have a very brief, final, supplementary question. I realize, of course, that Canada, as a participant in a multilateral organization, plays a role in discussing, assessing, weighing and, presumably, attempting to find a consensus on what NATO's official position should be. However, does the Government of Canada have a specific, identifiable policy to put forward to NATO, or are we in a position of having to wait and see what everyone else has to say, and then going along with the best solution under the circumstances?

Senator Fairbairn: I will be very pleased to speak to my colleague Mr. Ouellet for a more specific response to your direct question. However, I would underline that Canada is not on the sidelines waiting for any one country or any particular discussion on this matter. Canada has been at the heart of discussions that have taken place on the progress and on the very difficult decisions of recent days. Our country has played an extremely active, positive and strengthening role in what has turned out to be, so far, a success, but still a very fragile undertaking in that area. In other words, we are engaged; we are not standing on the sidelines.

NOVA SCOTIA

STATUS OF PEACE-KEEPING TRAINING CENTRE AT CFB CORNWALLIS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question is also to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. A few minutes ago she mentioned the magic words on the question of peace-keeping, and Canada's leadership role in that area.

During the recent election, the Prime Minister promised, in writing, that he would establish a peace-keeping training centre at CFB Cornwallis in Nova Scotia, in return for the people of that region voting for his party in the election. Needless to say, his offer was taken up, and thousands of people who received this letter did, in fact, vote for his party. That support was given. Now we hear rumours that there may be cut-backs. I will not touch that subject.

However, I will touch upon the subject of peace-keeping. Since they have been in Ottawa, members of Parliament from that region seem to have neglected the whole idea. Perhaps they have forgotten it.

Nevertheless, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if she would undertake to remind the Prime Minister of the promise he made to the people of southwestern Nova Scotia, and see to it that a peace-keeping training centre is established at Cornwallis.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Like my honourable friend, I too will move quickly away from any precise comment on what might or might not evolve later in the day. However, I certainly will take his representations to the Prime Minister and my colleagues on the general topic that he has raised.

The honourable senator will also be aware that the government is in the process of engaging in a vigorous defence policy review, and members of this house will be asked to participate in a joint committee to that effect, something which will be dealt with in this chamber in the next few days. I am certain that the question of peace-keeping will be a very integral part of that review.

NECESSITY OF PEACE-KEEPING TRAINING— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, recent events are now unfolding with respect to what happened in Somalia and the military's continued reticence in that regard — and they have been very reticent. The military keeps stating that a Canadian-trained troop receives the best training in the world. In light of what has happened in Somalia, perhaps the military's thinking should be revisited.

Would the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to remind military leaders that peace-keeping training is no longer a luxury; it is a necessity, and it is something that we must provide now for our Canadian troops serving overseas.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I would be delighted to do that.

THE CONSTITUTION

GOVERNMENT EFFORTS TO KEEP QUEBEC WITHIN CONFEDERATION

Hon. Jean Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, I would ask, first of all, what this government intends to do to keep Quebec in Canada and convince Quebecers to remain part of Confederation.

If the government's intentions are as genuine as we have just heard in this house, why did the Speech from the Throne fail to mention that, as a result of the actions of the Liberal government in 1982, Quebec was unable to become part of the Canadian Constitution?

Second, because of this Liberal government and Liberal critics, the efforts of all Canadian first ministers leading up to the Meech Lake accord failed, in the final instance. If the government really wants to convince Quebecers that they should remain in Confederation, who in Canada's present government will be able to speak to Quebecers with a minimum of credibility? Why did the Speech from the Throne fail to mention the problem of Quebec in Confederation?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the question from my honourable friend. The commitment of the Prime Minister to a productive and profitable future for the province of Quebec within Canada is probably the greatest motivation the Prime Minister has to continue in public life.

There is no question that that is at the heart of —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is why the Bloc got 52 seats.

Senator Fairbairn: This motivation is at the heart of the government's efforts to improve the economy of this nation and the economy of Quebec, to create jobs for the people of Quebec, and to imprint in the minds and hearts of the people of Quebec the understanding of how important they are to this country, and the importance the rest of Canada places on their partnership within this country. There is absolutely nothing more fundamental to the work of this government than to keep this nation together.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I note the time for Question Period is running out, and that is why I asked for brief supplementary questions. However, I think I should not deprive Senator Rivest of the opportunity to ask a supplementary question. Then perhaps we will attempt to accommodate Senator Phillips and Senator Forrestall as quickly as we can.

There are days when we run out of questions; there are days when we run out of time.

Senator Thériault: It's their rules.

[Translation]

Senator Rivest: Honourable senators, I would simply like to come back to my question. If indeed everyone is thoroughly convinced that Quebec should be a part of Canada, why then, in the Speech from the Throne, which is supposed to reflect the government's commitments, is there no mention whatsoever of the major constitutional problem created by the previous Liberal government?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will simply repeat to my honourable friend what I just said. However, I will add that the notion is absolutely without foundation that the leader of this government, or the activities of that leader throughout his career in any way have been of a nature to pull this country apart and isolate Quebec.

Senator Rivest: Not true! Not true!

Senator Fairbairn: That notion is absolutely without foundation. The efforts that he will make personally, and that colleagues in the government — particularly those from Quebec — will continue to make will be very much directed at creating an atmosphere for Quebecers to thrive within this country. That is the commitment of the Right Honourable Jean Chrétien and his government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED CUT-BACKS TO DEFENCE EXPENDITURES— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last week, the Minister of National Defence, speaking in the other place, mentioned the necessity of cut-backs in defence expenditures. In particular, he mentioned surplus infrastructure. He then went on to say that there would be no more Summersides, that the government could not afford to be that generous.

For the benefit of honourable senators, I point out that, with the cooperation of former Prime Minister Mulroney, of the former Leader of the Government in the Senate, and of Barbara McDougall and Elmer MacKay —

Senator Thériault: Where are they now?

Senator Phillips: Fortunately, they are at home and not here with you.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Listen to the question!

Senator Phillips: As a result of their cooperation, we have the GST centre as well as the aerospace centre. Between the two, some 1,000 jobs have been created.

Will the government follow the example set by the previous government, which established a cabinet committee to work with those who are interested in finding replacements for the bases that are to be closed? Perhaps the minister will be kind enough to volunteer to serve on such a committee. I am sure all honourable senators on both sides take an interest in the future development of bases that are to be closed.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his most thoughtful question.

First, I am pleased to take the honourable senator's recommendation to the Prime Minister. We will have to wait and see what today's announcements bring. There is no doubt that these kinds of situations must be handled with great sensitivity.

As the honourable senator knows, this is a difficult time economically for our country. Some tough decisions have to be made. I think my colleague the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Collenette, was looking at the province of Prince Edward Island and the situation that has occurred there in past years with a sense of nostalgia, because the situation we find ourselves in today may not make it possible to do the same thing to the same extent in other parts of the country.

However, it is the intention of the government to take the responsibilities it has and to deal as sensitively as possible with the communities affected. I would be pleased to be part of any operation that would make that possible.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED SALE OF HALIFAX SHIPYARDS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We learned this morning that, yesterday, Irving interests in the Saint John dry dock entered into an arrangement with Halifax Industries to purchase the Halifax shipyards. The Halifax shipyards are presently gearing up for the construction of ships under our country's new minesweeping program.

My concern is twofold: First, the Irvings have said that the contract which is held for these new vessels will be completed in Halifax. The government has not yet confirmed that. I would appreciate very much if the minister could give us that kind of affirmation.

Second — and if she does not have this information now, then at a later date I may ask her the question again — if this purchase has been sanctioned by the government, has it been done under the aegis of the East Coast shipyard rationalization discussions that have been going on in recent years? If such is the case, would she address herself to the future of the Halifax shipyards, and give some assurance that the remaining waterfront property involved will not be turned into a condominium construction site by the interests of K.C. Irving?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his question. I will take it as he, in very detailed form, enunciated it. He knows that I will do my best to obtain the information he seeks as quickly as possible.

[Later]

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers to questions. One was asked on February 8 by Senator Di Nino regarding Business Class Immigrants, and the second was asked by Senator John Lynch-Staunton, the Leader of the Opposition, on February 10, regarding air strikes.

IMMIGRATION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Consiglio Di Nino on February 8, 1994.)

> The level set for business applicants reflects a declining number of applications, attributable in part to economic conditions in Canada, as well as the economic boom in south east Asia.

Independent immigrants, including skilled workers and business immigrants, are a priority for this government. The 1994 plan announced by my colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, increases levels for applicants with labour market skills by more than 10,000.

To support the priority given to independent immigrants, we want to do focused promotion and recruitment abroad to position Canada in the independent skilled worker and business immigrant market.

BOSNIA

(Response to a question raised by Hon. John Lynch-Staunton on February 10, 1994.)

Canada is encouraged by recent developments regarding the situation in Sarajevo. Both sides have placed some of their heavy weapons under UN control and we hope that progress will continue.

Canada would not be participating in the strikes; aircraft from the USA, the UK, France and the Netherlands are in place and have the capability to conduct air strikes should they be necessary.

In addition to contributing a presence of approximately 2000 troops in the former Yugoslavia, Canada also has two ships and two maritime patrol aircraft helping to enforce the UN embargo. Canadian crews are also serving on a rotational basis aboard NATO Airborne Early Warning and Control aircraft in support of enforcement of the No-Fly Zone in Bosnia-Hercegovina. Twelve Canadian Forces personnel are serving in the European Community Monitoring Mission.

Our continuing contribution to the ongoing peace process and humanitarian relief effort must not be overlooked. Canadian aircraft are participating in the humanitarian airlift to Sarajevo. Canadian Forces officers are also participating in the UN Commission of Experts and have conducted war crimes investigations in theatre.

It would be an injustice to suggest that Canada is doing anything less than its fair share in working to alleviate suffering and to bring about a peaceful resolution to the current conflict in the former Yugoslavia.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cools, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the Opening of the First Session of the Thirty-fifth Parliament.—(5th day of resuming debate)

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, may I begin by offering very sincere congratulations to the Speaker, the Honourable Senator Roméo LeBlanc, who brings to this very important position a wealth of experience and a sense of integrity and fairness which I am confident will serve us well in this place.

I should also like to offer best wishes to the new leadership on both sides of the chamber. While I anticipate vigorous, spirited and forceful debate on all matters of importance, I detect a desire for understanding and cooperation in advancing those issues which are in the best interests of all Canadians.

Yesterday's mail brought a most timely reminder from the Secretary of State for Veterans, the Honourable Lawrence MacAulay, that Canada will be remembering major events of World War II in 1994 and 1995.

I have also been reminded frequently in the last two or three weeks by that most distinguished champion of veterans affairs in this place, Senator Jack Marshall, that 50 years ago this June, Canadian infantry divisions took heavy casualties on the beaches of Normandy. The battle honours on our regiments' colours will tell that tale in perpetuity, a tale in which Canadian divisions were the solid core of a multinational effort to free Nazi-occupied Europe. On June 6, 1944, that sacrifice drove a shaft of light across the continent.

Now, as we gather in a new Parliament, we do so in the flickering shadows of that light, and hopefully in the dawn of a new age and a new day full of promise and prosperity. We must never forget those sacrifices as we contemplate the unprecedented domestic and global problems which face the world today. For as Canadians hit the beaches of the past with courage as their sustenance and freedom as their guide, so too must we, in turn, assault the beaches of the new age.

The enemy arsenal is obviously vast and diversified. Just ask Canadian peace-keepers now in Bosnia to explain some of its global dimensions. Fuelled by famine, demagoguery and despair, by civil war and disease, the weapons concealed in the cliffs of the future appear particularly horrifying. The pictures of burning villages and mutilated bodies in the Somalias and Bosnias of this world frighten all of us who live in what might be called gentler places.

We search for sanctuary in this peaceable kingdom. Yet we know deep in our hearts there is none. There is no place to hide in our shrinking world. There are no barricades in this global village. We know that we cannot afford to fail in coming up with formulas for fairness in our dealings with the developing world. Yet the facts remain immutable.

The developed world retains its corner on wealth and power. Disparities between north and south are worsening. Formulas for fair sharing of resources elude us. Promises about equality in trade remain hollow.

The world is really in a race against time. It must produce the resources to sustain a population which has more than doubled in the past 40 years and will reach a staggering eight billion, perhaps even 10 billion, early in the twenty-first century.

Here at home, doomsday scenarios proliferate. Some even project a 30-per-cent permanently unemployed class. Others point to the agony of an already engulfed middle class. Yet others speak of a potentially insolvent pension system, a rich tradition of social systems in crisis, and all of this along with the deceleration of world economies across the board as they undergo what Lester Thurow recently referred to as global economic saturation, or GES. Add to that the "D" word — where the deficit is another vital component of the enemy arsenal — and the beaches of the new age appear to be even more formidable and more impenetrable.

Yet over the last few months we have heard a man of experience, a man of common sense, speak to us of a very simple truth. That man is the Prime Minister of our country. The truth is about the restoration of hope to individuals in our society. Individual dignity, Prime Minister Chrétien has said tirelessly, is the engine of all we will do together and all we will accomplish together. That simple truth is the basic assumption upon which this government will enact reform and renewal.

No government can call for sacrifice from people who do not believe in their own worth. We cannot make a national effort to win the beaches of the new age, honourable senators, without people strong in the conviction that we can do better. It will be individuals of conviction, of will and of courage who will do this.

I believe the Prime Minister has history on his side. Look around the planet. There is cause for celebration in the global reach of education, in the dynamic spread of new ideas advancing across traditional borders of sovereign states with impunity — all this caused by information technology and by the parallel burgeoning of citizen participation.

In our present chaotic world there are a number of powerful forces at work. Globalization is one; disintegration is another. But what is of particular interest, in my opinion, is that "people power", through the new social movements revolution, has become a force to be reckoned with, as the present Mexican government knows only too well. I refer here to the rich proliferation of groups prepared to push doors open all over the world. Ecological groups are doing this; aboriginal peoples are going further. Anti-nuclear, feminist and human rights groups, all of these are springing up all over the planet.

We see movements struggling for urban renewal, alternate forms of economic organization, land reform, racial justice, cooperative production and liberation from various forms of foreign domination. They are voices demanding change from the bottom up, and they signify the determination of ordinary people to have a voice in their own affairs.

All this means that something very significant is happening. It means that one of the most important forces of our time is people. In fact, it seems to me that people, ordinary people, are going much further than their governments; much further, in some cases, than their leaders.

I have to tell you that my heart is really on board this "people power" train. As an international election observer who has been part of many missions abroad over the years — to Africa, South America, Eastern Europe and Asia — I can only tell you that I have watched firsthand the process of the empowerment of people and the growth of a marvellous devotion to democracy in terrain often noted for repression and fear.

I have seen people go much further — much further than their governments, much further than their leaders, because, of course, the real transition was rooted in their hearts and in their minds, rooted in a conviction that ordinary people have the right to shape the foundations of a fair society. Therefore I believe that, as the Prime Minister speaks of the empowerment of the individual, he is very much in tune with one of the most important forces now sweeping the planet.

Just last month, I spoke to a model United Nations forum at St. Francis Xavier University. I told those assembled that the future is not a gift; it is an achievement. They understood this. I said that there were no limits to the power of ordinary people to make change happen. I told them that they could make a difference. I spoke to them of little people in far-off places whose spirit and will alone was what forced sorghum to grow from the dust, and was what forced the seeds of freedom as well to spring from barren soil. They savoured the thought, but wondered at the staggering obstacles that lie ahead.

Our nation, Canada, is becoming increasingly underemployed. Today, only 48 per cent of the adult Canadian population have full-time jobs. The majority of the population is employed on a part-time basis, or underemployed, or unemployed.

Arthur Kroeger, one of Canada's most distinguished public servants and now Chairman of the Public Policy Forum, recently pointed out in an address in Toronto that:

> ...one of the failures of Canadian labour markets has been, and is, the co-existence of skill shortages and high unemployment.

He said that in 1989, 39 per cent of auto parts manufacturers reported that they had to curtail operations due to shortages of trained personnel. As well, he pointed out that the Quebec Department of Education last month listed 30 vocational programs in which there is a severe shortage of students relative to job market requirements.

Just think about it: Fifty-two per cent of the adult population in Canada is employed on a part-time basis, underemployed or unemployed — and still there are jobs available for which we lack the commensurate skills.

As far as I am concerned, the new Minister of Education in Nova Scotia, John MacEachern, has it right in this respect. A former high school physics teacher himself, he has set out to correct the awful problem of skills shortages. An employer warranty program for community college graduates is now on the drawing board in my home province. It is really a simple idea in that those same colleges guarantee skills and training for technology-related jobs. If the employer is dissatisfied, the college takes the worker back for retraining.

As Mr. MacEachern said in a recent Globe and Mail interview of, I believe, February 3, 1994, education has "to start with an analysis of what it's doing — and demonstrate that it's done it."

I believe that most people would agree that it is in our educational institutions where the future will be shaped and moulded. Our young people are, indeed, the stars in our constellation. It is they who will sketch out the future. We must give full scope to their talents and to their potential. As public figures, we must give them hope. We must communicate the message because, as the Prime Minister has so well understood, we cannot make the national effort needed to win the future without the fullest commitment of all Canadians who are strong in their conviction that we can do this.

Yet in the Canada of 1994, we see so much demoralization around us, a demoralization which I believe is cloaked in indifference. Too many of us have lost heart. Too many of us say, "Why, Canada? What is in it for me?" I believe the time has come to look back, to think back, to revive our collective memory, to reflect upon our ancestors, upon those who understood that to grasp the diversity of Canada, piece by piece, one had to challenge every mountain, every forest, every river.

Our ancestors sought peace, they sought prosperity and, above all, they sought freedom. Purposefully, and with great determination, they created something new. They built the country with responsible foundations and endowed it with a radical heart.

Today, if you look around, you will see the marauding forces of intolerance that are so clearly evident right across the planet. We must remember that these forces are unleashed in free societies when the citizens say, too often and too easily, "What's in it for me?"

As a new world evolves around us, honourable senators, we will be asked as Canadians to reject indifference and embrace commitment. We will be asked to reject old certitudes and embrace adventure. We will be asked many times to be late for dinner in the service of the future, as we have been many times in the service of the past.

Finally, honourable senators, I want to say something very briefly about our work here. If this chamber is to continue in its present form, we must be convinced, and we must convince Canadians, that this special place, this institution, has an important and useful role to play in the day-to-day workings of Parliament and of our country. Today we must take up the path of the Raoul Dandurands, the Arthur Meighens, the John Connollys — of the great Canadians of the past who sat here, who preceded us, who made it their business to communicate the message about the very worthwhile functions of this place, and about the men and the women who worked so hard in its service.

As I said earlier, we gather in a new Parliament when the national effort must be unprecedented. The sacrifices we must all make will be of great magnitude. All of us know that the path will not be easy, and that conventional wisdom no longer serves us very well. The times are uncertain; they are perilous, but the change will come, and the world will be different.

In the declining years of this twentieth century, there are many analysts who are predicting a renewal of spiritual life and the idea of communion with others for the sake of the common good of all the citizens on our planet. In fact, I believe the uncertainties of the present have led most of us to start concentrating more on the permanent things in life. Some of you may recall that the early Christians asked Paul for answers to some of these perennial questions, and I am not sure the meaning of this is any different today. Paul did not speak of material things. He said the permanent things are the things that you cannot see. Of course he meant things like truth and compassion and justice, and maybe even love. We must all remember this because, as the world changes, as our young people change the world, such invisible components will be indispensable to them in the future. Honourable senators, these, indeed, are the permanent things.

Hon. David Tkachuk: This being my maiden speech, and my first speech arising from the Throne Speech, I find myself with unexpected freedom and the inclination to say too much, forgetting as I wrote this that, God willing, I have 26 years to say what I have to say.

I would first like to congratulate our new Speaker, the Honourable Roméo LeBlanc, on his appointment. I am sure he will guide this place with the same skill he brought to the other place when, as a minister, he re-established the Department of Fisheries and Oceans as a full department, and established a 200-mile limit on our fishery zone in 1977.

I want to extend the warmest wishes for success to the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, someone from my region who is involved in the cause of literacy, a cause I share with her. I became involved in the committee to promote literacy in Saskatchewan because of my good friend Senator Berntson who, with his wife Joan, founded the organization in our province. They have been responsible for raising over $300,000 dollars in the last four years, and founded and designed the awards of merit awarded each year in our province to those who have distinguished themselves as learners and professionals and volunteers. I know Senator Berntson and our new Leader of the Opposition, Senator John Lynch-Staunton, will prove to be extraordinary in their new leadership role, and I wish them well.

I have been involved in the political process in this country all of my adult life. I have canvassed for my party from Prince Edward Island to Vancouver Island. My appointment to the Senate was to me a great honour. As a second generation Ukrainian Canadian, the Tkachuk and Berezowski clans marvelled at a country where a Prime Minister from Baie Comeau could reach across the country and extend his hand to someone who came from a small town in Saskatchewan. We all celebrated Canada on the evening of June 9, 1993 and, with the help of Alexander Graham Bell, we were able to communicate our joy at this honour and responsibility.

I grew up in the village of Weirdale, Saskatchewan, just a few miles northeast of Prince Albert. That area was settled in the 1930s by those escaping the ravages of drought. We named our town after the Honourable Robert Weir, a Conservative who was elected to the Melfort constituency in 1930 and was appointed Minister of Agriculture.

I was introduced to politics at the age of 11 when I was fortunate to witness the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker speak, while standing on a flatbed truck on Main Street, as part of an election caravan wending its way across our constituency of Prince Albert. Here was a man who would be Prime Minister. He had a profound effect on me and many others in the prairies and across this country. What he represented for many of us was the idea that by work, vision and the propagation of ideas, one could go far and do much. One could change society, and one could change one's community.

Today I would like to continue with the theme so well addressed by the Honourable Senator Ghitter. I am perhaps even more fearful with respect to some of the things Senator Ghitter talked about than he is. Our institutions are indeed under attack; we know that. The success of the Bloc is our evidence. However, the phenomenon is even more far-reaching. Political parties and those who participate in them are under extreme scrutiny. While that is healthy, it is not so when it becomes hysteria.

I would like to quote the Right Honourable Joe Clark from a speech given to the Calgary Southwest PC Association on November 12, 1992, when he spoke about this issue. He said:

> Yet, those people are painted with a poison brush, because they happen to wear the label of politician.
> It is not much comfort to know that this is an international phenomenon.

•(1520)

> And it is not all new. Winston Churchill was despised by millions of Britons through the war, and turfed out directly afterwards. Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Lester B. Pearson, John G. Diefenbaker — people we now look back on as icons — all lost elections, all lost favour, all faced the opposition of millions.
> But today, we seem to have gone beyond that, to embrace a brooding hostility that is more abiding, much deeper, more disturbing. And it is something we must both fear and fight — not simply as Progressive Conservatives, but as Canadians. If we don't, something far more serious than elections are at stake. The country is.

We know as parliamentarians that our system benefits from having strong national parties, and that they are necessary for our particular system to operate, especially in a country as large and as diverse as ours. We also require the best of the brightest to be involved, for it is within broad-based parties that people learn the skills necessary to govern, to debate, to campaign, to raise money, to sell ideas and to compromise — to give a little to your neighbour and, as Jesse Jackson so aptly put it, to find common ground.

Totalitarian personalities find it difficult to succeed within our system. They are weeded out because they have neither the skill, the patience nor the inclination to succeed amongst people of strong, differing views. It is in narrow interest groups that the authoritarians flourish. Everyone thinks the same; people who think differently are excluded, and everyone is wrong but the group. It is happening in Canada today. We are left with one national party in the other place and two in Parliament.

Honourable senators, I want to turn my attention now to the Reform Party. The Reformers have built their momentum on some basic premises; on a foundation that used exaggerations and misinformation to take advantage of what Joe Clark described as a world-wide phenomenon. They said such things as, "The deficit is the fault of free-spending politicians who are more interested in spending on themselves than on the national interest" or "The politicians themselves are not pure of heart. Therefore, we must be governed by the people who are." This leap of logic excludes elected members from being "the people."

The Reformers talk of a more direct democracy. On February 20 on Newsworld, I heard Preston Manning say that even though he is against euthanasia because it is morally wrong, if his constituents wanted it, then he would support it. Honourable senators know that MPs have argued and debated this premise since 1867. Do I vote for what I think the constituency wants, even though I do not agree? Do I vote for what I think is the national interest, or for the narrow interests of the riding? I think most members vote their conscience, and when they face the electorate in the next election they defend their position, because an elected member is elected for his record through the four years, not on one particular issue over which he can be recalled, according to the Reform Party. We tell our children, "Do not succumb to peer pressure; do what is right, even if you stand alone" — but not Manning.

He stands in sharp contrast to my former member of Parliament who is now our Governor General. He was an abolitionist while 80 per cent of his riding favoured capital punishment, but the people elected him four times consecutively because he stood up for what he believed in. Now, if you are in trouble and the world is against you, surely you would want to know who would be by your side.

Frankly, the Reform Party has been getting a free ride. Like all extremist parties, they practise the politics of envy — the reason you, the voters, do not have is because others do. We have heard this before, whether it be the rich, the Jews, the multinationals; history is full of examples. Find someone to blame. The Reform Party painted politicians with the broad brush of envy, those who were there, and deftly used the propaganda tactics so exceptionally described by Hitler in Mein Kampf in his chapter on propaganda. The sins were opulence, sumptuous offices, gluttony practised in subsidized restaurants, vanity, barber shops turned into beauty salons and health clubs; all were mentioned — and, of course, greed by way of pensions that were huge windfalls to defeated members of Parliament. Politicians were fiddling while taxpayers burned. The media got on board, and all parking and travel became perks. No one examined what Reform was saying, and few had the courage to take them on and confront their moral crusade based on few facts and little examination. All that was wrong with politics was the benefits that elected members received, which is a premise based on falsehood.

The charade continued when 51 Reformers were elected — a 10 per cent pay cut, voluntary of course, led by Preston Manning who had been paid $90,000 per year plus pension deposits as leader of the Reform Party — no wonder his backbenchers balked. There was a press conference at which Manning gave back a 1987 Buick. I think if someone gave me a 1987 Buick, I would have given it back, too. They attempted a boycott of the Parliamentary Restaurant — except for a few of their number who found the prices to be not as inexpensive as they had months before promulgated — and a boycott of other so-called perks of office.

Let us look at the reality. Voluntary pay cuts by the leader of 10 per cent — but not really. It was a 5 per cent cut of net pay after taxes, but he keeps the leader's pay and money from the Reform Party. They argued over office space: not as opulent as they had told everyone, and as a matter of fact quite plain. Meal prices were not as low as they had thought, and some Reformers actually use the Parliamentary Restaurant, although I am sure under fear of being "outed." While they are accepting the pension plan, no one has raised the fact that others like the RCMP, the military and the public service also have very generous pension plans. No one wants to debate the issues; they just want to use the paintbrush of greed on only elected members, regardless of the facts.

It continues. The leader of the Reform Party was not up to paying respects to the Governor General on the evening that Parliament opened. The opening of Parliament is a democratic function and, therefore, to celebrate it is to celebrate democracy. A new government has been elected and, without guns and without violence, it read its vision for the country. Surely our mothers and fathers would have thrown open their homes, given the opportunity, and put out their finest china and baked their favourite dishes, just as the Governor General did. By acting in the way he did, Preston Manning was making a statement that the Governor General Ramon Hnatyshyn and his wife Gerda were somehow doing something not worthy of the Mannings. Surely the Hnatyshyns are a couple with simple but dignified taste. They proudly occupy this country's residence today on behalf of all the people of Canada. In any event, Manning stayed home.

Shortly thereafter, there were articles in The Toronto Star and The Ottawa Citizen about how frugal the Reformers were. I bring to the attention of honourable senators an article in The Toronto Star of February 5, 1994 by Derek Ferguson of the Ottawa Bureau — and I will try my best not to break up here. The heading is "Frugal Reformers are proving they know how to save a loonie" and the suheading is "Fast-food dinners, humble lodgings, help MPs practise what they preach." It reads in part:

> Reform MP Sharon Hayes had just finished another 14-hour day and was about to return to her brother-in-law's home for her nightly bowl of soup.

That is not all, since fellow Reform MP Deborah Grey saved her from the soup, no doubt, with an invitation to go out for dinner.

The article goes on:

> 'We went to the Swiss Chalet' said Hayes, the rookie M.P. for Port Moody-Coquitlam.

Now isn't that a ground-breaking event? There is more, of course.

> The Toronto-born homemaker and mother of two doesn't give all her business to the chicken franchise, however.
> 'My staff and I have gone to McDonald's a couple of times,' said Hayes, 46...

Remember, honourable senators, that in the past, parliamentarians had to impose wage and price controls, pass the War Measures Act, or bring in a National Energy Plan to get a favorable headline in The Toronto Star, and we Conservatives must have been doing it all wrong. There is more in this article from the Reform communications specialist, Ron Wood:

> I said, 'Basically, look at yourselves as 52 Gandhis'...

He was referring, of course, to his members. He went on to say:

> 'But you have to understand, these people are like that. They'd just as soon go to McDonald's'.

Now for the supreme sacrifice. In the article the journalist introduces the fact that, at the Travelodge, the Reformers are able to get a large discount adding up to one half of what Mr. Manning had to pay of $80 per night. Therefore, I assume this means he is only paying $40 a night.

•(1530)

The article goes on to say:

> Where Manning goes, Reformers are sure to follow. On any given night, there are more than 20 staying at the Travelodge.
> And, on any given night, they crowd into a nearby bistro... The attraction for the Reformers is a standard, nightly feature: a rib-eye steak for $9.95.

Now, I have been reading these articles since the Reformers came into the House of Commons in the fall.

Senator Gigantès: Masochist!

Senator Tkachuk: I raise this matter because it is all so foolish and ridiculous. I find these interesting tidbits charming, but it hardly proves that Reformers are frugal. Senators, it just proves they are cheap. And this is all becoming news because the public misunderstands the issue.

The Reformers receive their $20,000 and their $6,000, whether they live at the Travelodge or at the Chateau Laurier. They are pocketing all that extra money, and good for them. But saving the taxpayers' money? Hardly! They are hypocrites, fellow senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Tkachuk: In Matthew, Christ chastises those who pray so that all will see; that's the Reformers: "Look at us, how frugal we are," while they keep the money. The politics of envy, fellow senators.

Honourable senators, I wish to say that this well-orchestrated PR campaign — and that is all it is, a PR campaign — has succeeded because most of us live our lives within our own means and think nothing of it, while Reformers think they are alone in trying to get by. They will be eating gruel soon, I think. It is also a contrast of style, and the media seems to buy into it. They do not understand that everything is not necessarily what it seems.

For example, I will be sharing an apartment here with my fellow senator, Senator Gustafson. We have a nice, two-bedroom apartment.

Senator Gigantès: Two?

Senator Tkachuk: A two-bedroom. We have two bathrooms, a kitchen, and a view of the city of Ottawa.

Senator Perrault: Luxury.

Senator Tkachuk: Our apartment is within walking distance, just like the Travelodge, but it is a much shorter walk than from the Travelodge.

Oh, I forgot to mention that we have perks, too; we have access to a swimming pool, a health club and a nice restaurant.

Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Tkachuk: Perks! Meanwhile, those Reformers pay $40 a night, about $640 a month, plus taxes, if they only stay four nights per week, four weeks per month. Meanwhile, I have access to my accommodations every day while Parliament is in session, for $20 a night, or based on four nights a week, for $37.50 a day.

I might add that I am a pretty good cook. Senator Gustafson does not know that, but I hope he likes household chores, because I think we will make a fine couple. Perhaps we will even go to the Governor General's together. I enjoy cooking, so I can put a little sweat equity into a meal, which the Reformers are obviously not able to do at the Travelodge. I can broil a T-bone steak or a sirloin, and do baked potatoes, mushrooms, apple pie and coffee for well under the $9.95 it costs for the old rib-eye at the bistro.

Senator Perrault: Is humble pie served?

Senator Tkachuk: I want to ask you, honourable senators, who lives better and spends less? And Reformers claim they should be running the country!

The point I wish to make, honourable senators, is that we are confronted by many serious issues in the country, and we must attack wasteful spending at all levels of government. However, I think we should do it in the trenches of Parliament and in committees.

Honourable senators, let us move forward to attack the deficit as a nation. Let us focus on the issue of jobs and the economy, and let us be honest with the people. Let us not be afraid to attack the money changers in this temple of democracy. I predict that, in the future, many people will see that the Reformers do not represent the Conservative values of Macdonald, Diefenbaker, Borden, Stanfield, Clark or Mulroney, but rather the values of authoritarianism, pretentiousness, propaganda and irresponsibility.

In the next few years, I pray for the success of the Liberal Party. I never thought I would say that, and probably never will again.

Senator Gigantès: We will hold you to it.

Senator Tkachuk: I congratulate their victory while I weep for our party's failure. I pray that they succeed in holding the country together, while I hope we will be of assistance as we rebuild our broken party. I know that we will be sympathetic with their attempts to control the deficit while we argue our point of view as to how the tasks should be done.

Finally, honourable senators, I thank many of you for your kindness and assistance on my arrival here, those from my party especially. I thank you for your patience on the occasion of my first speech in this place. As well, I should like to thank the politicians I have known, respected and loved — Grant Devine, Brian Mulroney, Robert Stanfield and Joe Clark, whom I have served under, and Senators Barootes, Buckwold and Steuart, and Senator Hnatyshyn, the father of the Governor General — those who have come before me — for giving me an example of excellence and devotion to our country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, it is a distinct honour and a real privilege to stand and deliver my first speech in this place. First of all, I wish to congratulate you, Your Honour, on your appointment. I watched with due diligence and waited with bated breath for the appointment of the Speaker, and I do not think that the Prime Minister of this country could have picked any better.

I should also like to congratulate Senator Fairbairn and Senator Lynch-Staunton. These are very difficult times we are living in, and their leadership will be called upon time and time again. I look forward to working with both of them in cooperation in building this great nation.

My maiden speech in Parliament was delivered some 10 years ago in the other place, where, as a rookie in politics, I was chosen to serve the people of Mission—Port Moody in British Columbia. For five years, I undertook very seriously the responsibility bestowed upon me by my fellow citizens.

Like some other honourable senators in this chamber, I have served Canadians in both houses. This duty I have always taken seriously, and the opportunity to serve I have always cherished with considerable honour.

Like many who have served before me and many who will serve in Parliament in the future, I have experienced both the tremendous satisfaction of victory and the stinging disappointment of defeat. What is most important, though, is that I am one of a minority of Canadians who can say that they have experienced the results of our democracy in action. We must never forget that we are in Parliament to serve our fellow Canadians as their representatives, whether we serve in this place or the other place.

Honourable senators, when I was elected to the House of Commons, the partisan politics of the day constantly reminded me that the voters held us all accountable. In this chamber, we often cherish the luxury of not having to submit to voters. However, this, at the very least, is a false sense of security and truly an abdication of our responsibility to the people we represent, for we must always remember that we are here to represent our fellow citizens.

The Senate of Canada is a vital part of a representative democracy, where our federal governing system is a bicameral Parliament consisting of both houses.

For 127 years, tradition has served our country well. Our vast land, consisting of very diverse regions, populated by people of many cultures, has functioned as one nation, achieving true greatness simply by its unity and earning the envy of nations throughout the world. In a world where technological advances are dictating rapid change, traditions should not be dismissed too rapidly.

Over the last century, many have argued that this chamber should consist of elected members. Debate has ensued in many forums about the relevancy of the Senate, as was pointed out by the distinguished speaker before me. Proposals for reform have been cast in various forms, but not one method has yet been accepted by Canadians to replace the system that has been established through convention and tradition.

I am of the belief that a democracy functions best when people can participate to the greatest degree. Representative democracies promote participation, and I am, therefore, an advocate of an elected Senate. However, when Prime Minister Mulroney called on me to serve in that chamber, I did not hesitate to once again accept the call of duty. Under his great leadership, in two major reform proposals, Canadians considered changes that would have resulted in a much more representative second chamber. Both proposals failed to gain the full support necessary for implementation of this change.

Honourable senators, I would have preferred to have entered this chamber at the will of the people I represent. Nonetheless, let me state today: I am here to serve those whom I represent, regardless of whether I am elected or appointed. I am proud to say that I represent the people of British Columbia and I am honoured to be referred to as the Senator from Langley—Pemberton—Whistler.

I am one of a majority of British Columbians who choose to call this tremendous province their home. For nearly 40 years, beautiful British Columbia has provided me and my family with tremendous opportunity; an opportunity to experience a lifestyle unmatched, I believe, anywhere in Canada; an opportunity to raise a family in a rural and also a suburban environment, tolerant of the diversity of its citizens; an opportunity to harness the great riches of the land and to create wealth; an opportunity to participate in an enterprising economy where, until recently, rewards came to those who chose the risks.

British Columbia has changed in so many ways since I first moved to that province from the great province of Manitoba in the late fifties. That change has brought many benefits to the people of British Columbia and created new opportunity. Waves of immigrants from other provinces and from other nations throughout the world have flocked to the West Coast of Canada to take advantage of those opportunities of which I speak. In many ways, though, British Columbia is really still a pioneering province, where the traditions that built British Columbia continue to create new opportunities today.

However, as we focus on the considerable change that is engulfing the urban lower mainland of British Columbia with new population settlement and unprecedented urban growth, we tend to forget that British Columbia is a vast territory stretching from the U.S. border in the south to the Yukon in the far north, and from Vancouver Island on the Pacific Rim to the Rocky Mountain divide. The interior landscape is as diverse as that of many entire nations, from dense rain forests on the coasts to arid scrub land on the interior plateaus. British Columbia's geography, like that of most of our country, is truly rugged and uncompromising.

Nonetheless, for more than 150 years, men and women have faced the challenges of climate and geography. They have harnessed the power of our raging rivers, cultivated the rich soil of our narrow valleys, harvested the lumber and the wood fibre of its lush forests, and mined the base minerals of the earth. These resource-based activities have opened up the vastness of the land and literally put British Columbia on the world map. More important, though, resource-based industries have created a tremendous wealth that not only built one of the most cherished cities in the world, Vancouver, but also contributed to the economic diversity of Canada.

We have shared this great wealth, with great enthusiasm, with all Canadians from the coasts of Newfoundland right to the western borders of the Yukon. Men and women throughout British Columbia continue to toil at resource-based industries, contributing to our provincial and national wealth in a proportion that often goes unmeasured, yet measures significantly. We tend to pay considerable attention today to the new pioneers of science and technology, or the champions of modern commerce in our urban centres, but how often do we consider the achievements of people who carry on the traditions that built Canada, and especially British Columbia? When do we ever point to the loggers and mill workers, or the farmers or miners and say that our future is also dependent on these people? It is true that in a world overwhelmed by technology, advanced education is important to our competitive survival. Keeping pace with innovation means keeping pace with global change, but promoting and protecting what we do best also means surviving today.

Let me tell you about some of the quiet heroes who, in their own small way, are contributing to our survival by continuing the traditions of the past simply by carrying on their way of life. In small towns of British Columbia, from where the lifeblood of our resource-based economy flows, these special people persevere amid a changing world where outside influences challenge their values and question their activities. Let me tell you about some of the people, for instance, in the Pemberton valley, a part of British Columbia I know well, a place I have adopted as a second home, the home of my working cattle ranch, McLeod Creek Wilderness Ranch.

The rather narrow Pemberton Valley lies approximately 125 miles northwest of Vancouver, just beyond the resort of Whistler. The picturesque Lillooet River cuts through this valley, flowing from the Pemberton ice cap high in the coast mountains that surround that valley. The narrow strip of land that borders this river is a fertile oasis amid a rugged coastal forest.

For nearly a century, pioneering people have tilled the rich soils, growing the world-renowned Pemberton Nuclear Stock seed potato. Others have raised herds of cattle. A majority of the local population, while not farming, has traditionally worked in the woods, harvesting timber from steep mountainsides. These people have not developed a metropolis, or even a large town. Yet, pioneering, hard-working, innovative people have toiled day in and day out through harsh winters and short summers, sustaining themselves in a valley that, until recent years, has been rather isolated from the rest of the province.

Great personal wealth has not been accumulated by those of the Pemberton Valley, but the forestry and agricultural activities of these people have contributed significantly to the wealth of British Columbia. The people of Pemberton, aboriginal people of the Mount Currie reserve and non-natives of the valley, have lived side by side, raising families, living a good life based on the land, and enjoying the natural splendour of the environment. These people are the true environmentalists. They respect our natural environment and have always looked upon our renewable resources as sustainable only if renewed and managed. They work in the local forests and play in the rugged back country. Respect for the environment is not a new, learned catch phrase for them; it is a part of their worldly values.

Let me tell you about one young man up there by the name of Al Bush, the owner of a small business, Valley Recreation and Chain Saws, in the Pemberton Valley. Al Bush is a young man who came to the valley as a youngster and built a business for himself in the village of Pemberton. Al sells, rents and services chain saws. His main customers are the logging companies that work in the Pemberton forestry district. When you walk into Valley Recreation in Pemberton, you begin to see what makes the area that which it is. Loggers and snowmobilers gather in Al Bush's shop in the winter to talk about their experiences in the back country. They talk about rugged mountain trails the way that many city dwellers refer to city streets. Their landmarks are not skyscrapers but mountain peaks or logging bridges across ranging rivers.

Al Bush shares with me his concerns over what is happening with our forest industry in B.C. He, like many British Columbians, feels the misplaced wrath of urban environmentalists who are irresponsibly launching an attack on a resource industry that built British Columbia and built Canada.

Al Bush is an environmentalist. He understands our natural environment, revealed in all its splendour in the back country of B.C., like many of us understand our neighbourhoods. The wilderness is his business. The wilderness is the main focus of his leisure activities. The rugged wilderness valley is his home. His children are being raised to respect the wilderness environment in the same way as he was raised.

Al Bush, I repeat, is an environmentalist. He is more of an environmentalist than Robert Kennedy Jr., Paul Watson, or Vicki Husband. He is one of many British Columbians who understand the value of our environment, who respect the vastness of our land and who know the intricacies of our ecosystem through firsthand experience.

It is Al Bush, and the Al Bushes of British Columbia, who will sustain our environment, protect our resource-based economy, promote the beauty of our land, and pass those values on to others. It is the Al Bushes who will promote positive environmentalism, much more than the thousands who support the urban international activities of Greenpeace, the Sierra Club, or the Western Wilderness Committee.

I have singled out Al Bush here today, but there are many Al Bushes in the Pemberton Valley. There are thousands of principled, hard working, knowledgeable people like him throughout British Columbia. They live in places like Prince Rupert, Port Hardy, Burns Lake, Creston, Kitwanga, Cowichan Bay, Mission, Merritt, Williams Lake and Chilliwack.

Senator Perrault: And Whisky Creek.

Senator St. Germain: Whisky Creek is an important place, Senator Perrault.

They work in forests every day, logging trees, thinning stands and planting seedlings. They work in coffee shops and in places like the Pemberton Hotel. They run equipment companies, gas stations and barber shops. They work for B.C. Rail and B.C. Ferries. They plough steep logging roads during midnight winter blizzards. They teach our children in the schools in small towns throughout the province.

These are the people whose livelihoods depend on our resource-based activities, especially our threatened forest industry. They know how fragile our environment is, and they know how to preserve it for future generations. They can withstand the assault of the weather. They persevere in rugged conditions and preserve the environment. They can conquer many natural challenges. However, they are having a very tough time battling invisible guerrilla enemies who pretend to be friends of the environment.

These self-proclaimed crusaders for our environment, the guerrilla warriors of the modern urban environmental movement, emerge in many forms and in various forums. Whether they are radical members of the European Parliament, well-meaning yet uninformed university students blockading roads — and logging roads as well — or grandstanding socialist members of our own Parliament who flaunt our own laws, they do not understand the real issues or appreciate the effect of their protests.

More important, they do not understand or appreciate how vital forestry, as one renewable resource industry, is to our current economic survival and our future economic growth. They do not know the Al Bushes of British Columbia. They have never attempted to understand what makes British Columbia's small towns work. They place little value on the real values of people who have developed traditions that have created wealth and sustained lifestyles.

I have focused on this important topic in my first address in this chamber because today we are spending so much time in the Western World focusing on our environment, and rightly so. With the narrow spotlight on issues concerning environmental preservation and conservation, we have lost sight of what we should be focusing on here in our own backyard. We should be looking at how to create jobs, sustain employment, and create new opportunities for our young people and our aboriginal people, while protecting our environment and renewing our resources.

The war on forestry must stop. We cannot allow this misguided assault to continue, insidiously influencing our basic values, turning urban people against rural people. We should not be sitting down to divide up our land, allocating one portion for preservation and another for development. We must all work together. We must study what has made us strong and devise new ways to continue to renew our renewable resources more efficiently and more effectively.

These must be our priorities. To accomplish these tasks we need not look to the European Parliament or to the United Nations. We do not need to hear from radical, self-proclaimed experts like Paul Watson or Robert Kennedy Jr. We need to listen to our own citizens, the people I am here to represent.

It was in 1984, when I was re-elected to the House of Commons, that I, along with members of Parliament Lorne Greenaway, Bob Brisco, Frank Oberle and the entire B.C. caucus, approached the government and requested that our ERDA, which was the Economic Regional Development Agreement, be focused solely on reforestation. We insisted that over $300 million be directed for the sole purpose of reforestation, with emphasis on the NSR lands of the North. It was under the leadership of Prime Minister Brian Mulroney that we received the necessary support to begin the massive environmental project of which I speak. Forests were replanted and silviculture became a byword of the government of the day.

Yes, we are cognizant of the wealth and the beauty that God has bestowed upon us in British Columbia. We will guard it religiously so that future generations will be in a position to benefit from those renewable resources as past generations have.

Thank you, honourable senators, for having allowed me to run a little over my time. I thank all fellow senators for their patience. I wish senators on both sides of the house well as we meet the challenges that are before us, and I look forward to working with all honourable senators in this place.

On motion of Senator Rivest, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

GENERAL SECURITY INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Normand Grimard moved the second reading of Bill S-3, to authorize General Security Insurance Company of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the province of Quebec.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-3 does not seem to be controversial. In fact, the bill would authorize General Security Insurance Company of Canada to continue as a corporation under the laws of the province of Quebec as if it had been incorporated under those laws.

General Security is part of the Mouvement des caisses populaires et d'économie Desjardins, almost all components of which are governed by the laws of the province of Quebec.

All shares of General Security issued and in circulation are held by the holding company Groupe Desjardins assurance générale inc., a wholly-owned subsidiary of Société financière des caisses Desjardins inc., which in turn is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Confederation of caisses populaires et d'économie Desjardins du Québec.

General Security was incorporated on January 1, 1981 under federal legislation governing insurance companies, when it did not do business exclusively in the province of Quebec.

Today, General Security has no operations outside of the province of Quebec.

The holding company, Groupe Desjardins assurance générale inc., which controls another insurance company, wants General Security, its subsidiary, to become a corporation under the laws of the province of Quebec, so that all components of the Mouvement des caisses populaires et d'économie Desjardins will be governed solely by the laws of the province of Quebec.

There is no existing statutory authority to enable an insurance company governed by the laws of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of a province.

Consequently, General Security asks in this bill for the enactment of the following: that it be continued as a corporation under the laws of the province of Quebec as if General Security had been incorporated under those laws; second, that from the day on which it is continued under the laws of the province of Quebec, General Security shall cease to be governed by the Insurance Companies Act.

Furthermore, and I think this is an important point, the Insurance Sector of the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions in Ottawa was informed of this bill, and I have received confirmation that the Superintendent of Financial Institutions has no objection to this procedure.

Finally, and I think this is the most important point of all, this bill does not create a precedent, since similar legislation was passed here in the Senate for the Safeguard Life Assurance Company, S.C. 1989, c. 29, and also for l'Assurance-vie Desjardins, S.C. 1990, c. 53.

Honourable senators, I respectfully submit that Bill S-3 constitutes legal recognition of a situation that already exists, and that consequently it should be submitted as soon as possible to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for approval.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

HEALTH

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON EUTHANASIA

Hon. Joan Neiman rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, January 20, 1994:

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing a Special Committee of the Senate to inquire into and report upon the legal, social and ethical issues relating to euthanasia and assisted death.

She said: Honourable senators, on January 20, I gave notice that I would launch an inquiry asking the Senate to consider the possibility of setting up a special committee to consider the ethical, legal and social implications of euthanasia and assisted death. I did so because the gallant and ultimately unsuccessful struggle of the late Sue Rodriguez to be permitted to realize her final wish ignited a fire under my smouldering interest in the subject, which I am today asking the Senate to consider studying.

Sue Rodriguez believed she had the right to die with dignity at a moment in time of her own choosing, and to be able to ask for and receive help if she were no longer physically able to do what was necessary to achieve her purpose. She lost her legal battle and some of her final hopes were frustrated, but at least she had the satisfaction of knowing that she had generated an enormous public interest in, and support for, having Parliament again review and, if found necessary, revise the present laws relating to euthanasia and assisted suicide. I believe the Senate is the ideal forum in which to undertake this study.

The subject is emotionally charged and complex, but there is now an enormous amount of literature and innumerable people and organizations whose experience and expertise would be of great assistance to a committee in understanding the problems and preparing recommendations to correct them. This is not the time to summarize the opinions of either supporters or opponents of change, but I should like to do a brief historical review and bring honourable senators up to date on the current situation in Canada and elsewhere.

Before doing so, I must confess to an inadvertent error when I gave the Notice of Inquiry on January 20 when I said that the study would relate to euthanasia and assisted death. I should have used the more precise expression, "assisted suicide," as that is legally and conceptually distinct from euthanasia. As the Canadian Medical Association pointed out in one of its recent articles, "assisted death" is a term which could include both euthanasia and assisted suicide. Honourable senators, if you approve the setting up of a special committee then, with your permission, I shall propose amending its terms of reference to be a study of euthanasia and assisted suicide.

Proposals to legalize voluntary euthanasia for the incurably ill began to be debated publicly in many countries in the Western World late in the nineteenth century. In 1906, a bill to that effect was introduced in the Ohio legislature and, amid heated controversy, was eventually defeated.

In 1920, the German public debated and eventually put aside a very controversial joint publication by a psychiatry professor and a law professor entitled, The Permission to Destroy Life Unworthy of Life which advocated allowing physicians to perform euthanasia under certain guidelines. Many people considered some of their views totally unacceptable, if not actually dangerous. No action was taken with respect to their suggestions until about 13 years later when the Nazis came to power and distorted them in such a grotesque manner as to justify laws authorizing compulsory sterilization. The Nazis then went on to legalize wholesale euthanasia, in which both the medical and nursing professions played a significant role and, finally, to the horror that was the Holocaust. When people everywhere became aware of the full extent of the heinous crimes which had been committed under the guise of lawful acts, there was, understandably, little desire for discussion of euthanasia or even of the right to die with dignity for more than 20 years.

The expression "death with dignity" probably gained currency and revived public interest in the question of the quality of life, and of death, with the case of 21-year old Karen Ann Quinlan. Karen Ann had lapsed into a coma after consuming a quantity of alcohol and drugs. Even though the doctors decided that she had suffered irreversible brain damage, they and the hospital authorities refused the request of her parents, supported by their priest, that she be removed from a respirator. The parents eventually applied to the New Jersey Supreme Court for an order, citing in their arguments that their profound desire was that their daughter be allowed to die with grace and dignity, and they were successful. The case undoubtedly had a significant effect on public opinion, medical practice and legislative developments with respect to the withholding and withdrawal of treatment of incurable and terminally ill people.

In another much publicized case in 1990, Cruzan v. Missouri, the United States Supreme Court held that a person whose wishes were clearly known had a constitutional right to refuse life-sustaining medical treatment. That decision sparked a renewed interest in what are known as "living wills."

In Britain, the Voluntary Euthanasia Society was founded in 1935, attracting a significant number of adherents and a large number of opponents. That society is still active today and the number of supporters has increased considerably.

A select committee of the British House of Lords has just completed studying and issuing its Report on Medical Ethics. Its first term of reference was to "consider the ethical, legal and clinical implications of a person's right to withhold consent to life-prolonging treatment, and the position of persons who are no longer able to give or withhold consent." That is somewhat narrower than what I have suggested for our Senate committee.

However, its other two terms of reference cover much of the same social and ethical ground as would our committee.

I have not yet had time to read the full report that we received two days ago, but I do know it recommends that there should be no change in the law permitting euthanasia. In considering the withdrawal of life-prolonging treatment, the Lords concluded that inappropriate treatment — that is, treatment that "will add nothing to the patient's wellbeing as a person" — need not be given. There are a number of other conclusions and recommendations, such as for more and better palliative care, which would be of great interest to our committee.

As the Hemlock Society U.S.A. stated in its introduction for a booklet entitled: "Aid in Dying":

> The early 1990s saw a surge of activity in the introduction of assisted suicide and active euthanasia bills in state legislatures. While most of the bills that proposed to legalize physician aid-in-dying were brought by legislators responding to the requests of their constituents, those bills that sought to make assisted suicide a crime were in direct reaction to the activities of Dr. Kevorkian, who assisted 15 people in their suicides before the state of Michigan made it a crime.

I am sure honourable senators are aware of Dr. Kevorkian's activities and his zeal in promoting changes in the laws of his country to legalize physician-assisted suicide. However, I have the impression that many supporters of his cause are, at the same time, not comfortable with how he has sometimes demonstrated his own commitment to it.

Although at least two major polls in the United States have indicated that over 60 per cent of the people would approve physician-aided suicide, no bill attempting to legalize that procedure has yet passed, although eight have been introduced in various states. In spite of their setbacks, proponents of change in some of the states — notably Washington and Oregon, where the defeats were narrow — are already preparing new initiatives to place before the public.

The situation in the Netherlands is unique and will require careful study and analysis by the committee. Euthanasia is, and always has been, a crime in that country, but since 1973, a physician will not be deemed to have performed euthanasia provided he follows the very strict procedures formulated by the Royal Netherlands Medical Association in conjunction with the Chief Coroner, including, after the death of the patient, a full report to the coroner of the province in which he practices. Incidentally, those guidelines are remarkably similar to some suggested by other medical associations, proponents of change and drafters of bills in some of the American state legislatures.

Since there has been quite a bit of criticism and misunderstanding of what was actually happening in the Netherlands, in 1991, at the request of the Dutch government, its medical association undertook three very comprehensive reviews and a compilation of statistical evidence with respect to what it terms medical decisions concerning the end of life, the results of which are contained in the report of the Remmelink Commission. That report provides a great deal of useful information and should clarify a lot of the questions that have been raised. Last November, after the release of the report, both houses of the Dutch Parliament voted to retain the criminalization of euthanasia, even when explicitly requested by a patient.

Euthanasia remains illegal in Germany, while suicide has been decriminalized since 1751. Moreover, assisting someone to do it, providing that person is competent and has made a "freely responsible choice," is legal. The practice is rooted in German culture, tradition and adherence to the concept of "Freitod," an idealistic form of voluntary self-deliverance which for them has no negative connotation. Apparently for that reason, people contemplating suicide normally turn to their friends and relatives for help, and rarely to physicians.

As to the current situation in Canada, there is an excellent article by Jocelyn Downie in a recent publication, Health Law in Canada, entitled: "Voluntary Euthanasia in Canada." The author analyzes the present state of our law within the context of existing criminal sanctions bearing on five distinct components of voluntary euthanasia, from withholding treatment to intentional killing, all with the consent of, or at the direction of, the person asking for death. Her conclusion is that, because of the differing judicial decisions in different jurisdictions in Canada bearing on apparently similar violations or provisions of the law, many of our laws are now inconsistent and unclear. This makes the role of health care givers far more difficult, the advice of their legal counsel less reassuring, and it adds an additional burden of uncertainty to patients, their families and friends.

The only case where there has been clarification of one aspect of the law affecting voluntary euthanasia is the fairly recent case of Nancy B. in Quebec, where the presiding judge concluded that the withdrawal of treatment in accordance with a competent patient's request was legally permissible. That decision applies, of course, only in Quebec, which means that until a final ruling is made in the Supreme Court of Canada, applications for similar relief will have to be made separately in each of the other provinces.

Hon. Royce Frith: Was it a criminal case? Why would it apply only in Quebec?

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Because it was never appealed.

Senator Neiman: The case of Nancy B. was not a criminal case.

The author also carefully reviews the present social and medical situation in Canada, and gives very cogent illustrations and arguments as to why changes in our existing laws need to be made.

In the meantime, because of the well-publicized struggle of Sue Rodriguez, and because she lost her fight in the Supreme Court of Canada by the narrowest possible margin, there has been mounting public pressure in the media and by individuals and organizations to re-examine the issues that have been raised.

Some time ago, the Board of Directors of the Canadian Medical Association decided that, because of the mounting pressure on it and increasing queries from the public, it was necessary to formulate a policy on euthanasia and assisted suicide with which the profession could live, and which the public could understand. In order to get the project under way and to stimulate discussion and debate among physicians both before and during its annual meeting in the following August, its Committee on Ethics published a series of five papers in the Canadian Medical Association Journal, beginning in April, 1993. These papers contain a thoughtful and comprehensive review of the issues as they concern and affect physicians.

In approaching the issues, they lay out the various options that physicians should consider. They attempt to qualify the multifarious definitions and some distinctions that attach to the terms of "euthanasia" and "assisted suicide," and the arguments and beliefs which lead some patients and physicians to support the concept of "assisted death" and others to oppose it. The series contains a review of the practices in ancient times, as well as the current practices in some Asian and European countries. Finally, it explains various policy options which the CMA might adopt after the necessary consideration and debate.

There is an interesting discussion on the relation between ethics and policy, and the recognition that it is the legislators who must decide ultimately whether, based on the consensus they perceive in the public, changes in existing laws are warranted.

The CMA did have its first debate last August and is encouraging further discussions between, and recommendations from, its members. It would be an essential witness before our committee.

Honourable senators, if undertaken as carefully and thoughtfully by my colleagues as I know it will be, the proposed study can create a far greater awareness and understanding by the general public and provide a solid base of information which could justify, if so warranted, recommendations to the government for changes in existing legislation. I am happy to say that the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Allan Rock, has given me his full support and has offered his cooperation and that of his department. I should very much appreciate the support of honourable senators for the formation of a special committee to undertake a very important and timely study.

Honourable senators, if this debate is concluded today, I intend to ask leave tomorrow to proceed later that day with consideration of a motion to set up a special committee of which I shall give notice.

[Translation]

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, the issue of euthanasia and assisted suicide is one that I have considered for quite some time, ever since I was Quebec Minister for Health and Social Services. When we were preparing our policy on health and social services, I recommended that, in view of the state of modern technology, we should be addressing the use of excessive measures to extend a person's life, because this had become a very critical issue. This was in 1989.

The controversy around euthanasia is very complex. It has legal, social and moral implications and challenges traditional medical ethics. It is also an issue that raises strong emotions in all of us because we are dealing here with what is literally a matter of life and death.

This is the kind of subject the legislator must approach with an open mind, without hurrying the process and without giving in to sometimes contradictory pressures from various interest groups. And if tomorrow Senator Neiman presents her motion to appoint a special committee of the Senate, I will certainly support the creation of such a special committee to consider this matter. The committee would be ideally suited to assembling the elements of a national position and to provide the basis for appropriate legislation, when the time is right.

Progress made in medical technology, especially in pharmacology and medical equipment, has allowed people to live longer and more productive lives. However, merely postponing death leads to an intolerable deterioration of the quality of life. Nowadays, many people die of incurable and degenerative diseases like cancer, AIDS and Alzheimer's. Many want their suffering shortened, and they want to be more involved in decisions concerning their death. Since the Criminal Code dates back to a time when technology was not as advanced, I think certain provisions of the Code that concern euthanasia should be reviewed.

This view is supported by Canadians who are in favour of euthanasia practised by a physician, in the case of the terminally ill. Groups and private citizens would like to see changes in sections of the Criminal Code that, according to them, infringe on their civil rights. This will probably mean looking at the implications of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In response to these demands, several provisions of the Criminal Code will have to be examined to determine whether they should be revised. I will mention only two sections: 241 and 14, which deal directly with euthanasia. Section 241 says, and I quote:

> Everyone who
> (a) counsels or procures a person to commit suicide or
> (b) aids or abets a person to commit suicide, whether suicide ensues or not, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years.

Section 14 provides that no person is entitled to consent to have death inflicted on him. To escape criminal responsibility under either provision, it is not enough to say that the deceased gave his consent. There are also sections that deal with the legal responsibilities of a physician to his patients. Section 215, for instance, provides that those who have persons under their care must provide the necessaries of life, including medical care. However, this provision may conflict with the patient's right to refuse or interrupt medical treatment.

While physicians are divided over the euthanasia debate, a recent survey of the Canadian Medical Association revealed that 60 per cent of Canadian doctors support the need to review current legislation. I would not be surprised if that figure has changed, now that the issue has come even more to the fore. I met with some doctors last Friday night, and I was quite astonished at their reluctance that we should go ahead with modification of the Criminal Code. However, we will have a chance to review this if the committee is created.

Traditionally, the Hippocratic oath serves as a model for the ethical practice of medicine. It is based on the principle that the physician's first duty is to preserve and enhance life, not to destroy it. However, the growing proportion of terminal illnesses, combined with new technology, has made it difficult for the physician to determine how long he should sustain life and when it should be allowed to end.

Quoting from the report I made to the Quebec government:

> Ethical questions raised as a result of technological development arise particularly during the last moments of a person's life. Often, what is perceived as technologically possible quickly becomes the norm: all available means must be deployed to save or even simply prolong a life. Furthermore, it is far from certain that the widespread use of technologies always corresponds to the wishes of the individual. Ethical dilemmas multiply as technological development pushes back the frontiers of the possible. Today, traditional ethics, especially those based on the great ethical principles, are insufficient to guide choices, for instance when it is a matter of resuscitating a dying person, or even of undertaking or ceasing treatment.

These dilemmas will only be further heightened in the years to come as the Canadian population increasingly becomes an older population. Moreover, the increasing costs of health care will make the delicate balance between sustaining life or ending it an even more difficult one for those who want to contain health care expenses. This, in turn, creates many concerns about whether there would be abuse of new legislation that permitted euthanasia.

I would like the Senate to create this committee because of my interest in this matter. However, before we actually do anything, we all need some clarification. We need to hear from people from various sources so that we know, as we say in French "les tenants et les aboutissants" of such a complex question before the House of Commons decides to act.

Given the complexity of the matters surrounding euthanasia, it is necessary to look at some definitions. The first definition originates from the Greek language and means "good" or "easy death." The more modern definition of euthanasia is "the death of a seriously suffering person brought about by another person, whose intention is to end the suffering painlessly and whose motive is mercy." This can be broken down into three more components: voluntary, non-voluntary, and involuntary euthanasia. Where voluntary euthanasia is concerned, a person is mentally competent, properly informed, and freely chooses to die. Involuntary euthanasia is performed contrary to the person's will, while non-voluntary euthanasia is used on a person who is unable to express their will.

There is also a further distinction between active and passive euthanasia. A patient's refusal of treatment which leads to death is an example of passive euthanasia. Active euthanasia, on the other hand, hastens death, such as the administration of a lethal injection. These definitions, however, also vary according to who is using them. Some use terms such as active euthanasia, physician-assisted suicide or mercy killing interchangeably, while others use the terms for self-serving purposes.

In these last few years, two famous cases have thrust euthanasia into the news. First, there was the case in Quebec of Nancy B. who suffered from Guillain-Barré Syndrome, a neurological disorder that attacks the nervous system and paralyzes a person's muscles to the point where he cannot breathe without a respirator. Twenty-five-year-old Nancy B, who was paralysed from the neck down, asked that her respirator be disconnected. She had been bedridden for two and a half years when she decided that she did not want to remain hooked up to a machine for the rest of her life. She knew that her respirator was not helping her get well, but merely keeping her alive.

A Quebec Superior Court judge ruled in her favour. He found that she had the right to refuse treatment and that her decision did not violate the Criminal Code. The judge also had to decide whether the doctor would be held criminally responsible for his actions. He ruled that the doctor's actions would not be unreasonable or reckless since the patient herself had requested that treatment be discontinued. He did not feel that the doctor would be assisting in a suicide since Nancy B. was going to die anyway from her illness.

Following the ruling of the court, Nancy B. had her wishes carried out. In actual fact, her doctor helped her end her life.

[English]

The other case which has been scrutinized by the media is that of Sue Rodriguez. She suffered from amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or Lou Gehrig's disease, a disease that destroys muscle function, leaving its victims immobile and eventually unable to breathe or swallow unassisted. Ms Rodriguez wanted section 241 of the Criminal Code struck down so that a terminally ill person could have the right to physician-assisted suicide. She felt that everyone had a right to make decisions concerning their own death. The British Columbia Supreme Court ruled against her, and the British Columbia Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The dissenting justices felt that it was a matter to be dealt with in Parliament and not in the courts.

The Supreme Court also dismissed the appeal in a five-to-four decision. The court ruled that section 241 does not violate the constitutional rights guaranteed under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The majority felt that the law was needed to protect vulnerable people who might decide to commit suicide in a moment of weakness. They were afraid that if the law were changed it could be abused, and they felt it would be difficult to create safeguards that would prevent abuse. Furthermore, they did not want to give the idea that the state approved of suicide.

The dissenting judges, however, felt that it was unfair that a patient who could not commit suicide by themselves could be prevented from doing so, while able-bodied people were free to commit suicide. One of the dissenting judges felt that the ruling deprived Ms Rodriguez "of the security of her person" because she could not make decisions concerning her own body. She was being made the "scapegoat" for those who might abuse the law. Despite the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, on February 12, Sue Rodriguez took her life with the help of an unidentified physician. The doctor had agreed right after the court's decision to assist Ms Rodriguez in her suicide, regardless of the legal consequences.

Rodriguez's death has highlighted the need for Parliament to study and debate this issue. If it is the wish of the House of Commons to have a free vote on the issue of doctor-assisted suicide for the terminally ill, we may have a free vote here before we send our report to the other side.

Sue Rodriguez was evidently not alone in her battle to have certain rights concerning her own death. A study from the University of Toronto Centre for Bioethics determined that many people are interested in having a say in their treatment and want to have the option of having a living will. Although living wills have not yet been recognized as law in Canada, Quebec and Nova Scotia have legislation allowing a surrogate to make decisions on the patient's behalf. Furthermore, Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario have proposed laws which would allow a patient to select a proxy as well as a method to make pre-illness decisions through health-care directives.

The United States, Britain and the Netherlands have also seen the need to review their legislation. In the U.S., euthanasia is still illegal, but in some instances the courts have allowed voluntary euthanasia. Furthermore, 45 U.S. states have legislation that recognizes the drafting of living wills and 30 states have laws that authorize the appointment of a person to act as the surrogate of a patient who has become unfit to make his or her own decisions. Living wills, however, are not always followed by physicians, because they have been criticized as being too general.

Contrary to some statements that have been made, although not in this chamber, euthanasia has not been legalized in the Netherlands, but physicians have been given legal protection so long as they follow strict regulations. The guidelines specify that euthanasia can be used only in cases where the patient suffers a "perpetual, unbearable and hopeless condition" and requests it only while lucid. The patient does not have to be terminally ill, but a second medical opinion is required. If the rules are not complied with, an offense is committed and is punishable by 12 years in prison.

England presently has a medical ethics committee which is studying the ethical, legal and clinical implications of euthanasia. Their report has just been released, but up until now euthanasia has not been a common practice in England. Instead, their focus has been to improve their system of palliative care, using it in such a way as to keep a dying patient comfortable and free of pain.

These examples clearly show that there are several approaches to the issue of euthanasia. I would like us to address together all aspects of this question. To this end, we must put aside our personal positions and biases in order to welcome with a totally open mind the groups and individuals who will appear before this committee if it ever comes into being. As I was saying earlier:

[English]

It will be with conviction that I shall support Senator Neiman's proposal, because I believe that I will be doing something useful.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, sharp observers will find in the chambers of the Speaker of the Senate a wall inscription in Latin by Seneca saying Nihil ordinatum est quod praecipitatur et properat.

This translates into "Nothing is well ordered that is hasty and precipitate." These very wise words are found in your chambers, Your Honour.

[English]

I will translate that into English. Nothing is well ordered that is hasty and precipitate.

Among the big issues that will always drive humankind, three stand out. Whenever I speak to youth groups across Canada, the three big issues are capital punishment — on which all generations must make a decision — abortion and euthanasia. That is why I think that the Minister of Justice was very wise to accept the Senate's invitation to study this question in the calm and tranquillity that should reflect the Senate's qualities. We hear so many demagogic arguments on this issue that, in a fit of anger or in the grip of a poorly expressed and hasty public opinion, we could make the wrong decision.

I remember, honourable senators, that around 1972, I raised a question concerning attempted suicide. I raised this question in the House of Commons because events close to me had prompted people, for reasons we should not judge, to attempt suicide. As I said in the House of Commons at the time, if a suicide attempt was successful, people had a lot of sympathy for the family, but if it was not, it was considered a criminal act. I remember interceding with the then Minister of Justice, Otto Lang — I eventually became his parliamentary secretary. I explained to him the whole moral aspect, perhaps the whole human aspect of having this question of attempted suicide in the Criminal Code. While I was listening to my esteemed colleague Senator Neiman, and the no less esteemed Senator Lavoie-Roux, I asked the page — and I thank him — to quickly find me a copy of the Criminal Code, to be absolutely sure of what I am telling you today. The argument heard at the time was that we could take the question of attempted suicide out of the Criminal Code. Martin's Annual Criminal Code 1994 explains:

[English]

> At one time, attempting suicide was an offence, but this section has been repealed so that the person who attempts to commit suicide does not commit an offence: Only the person who counsels or assists is guilty of a crime.

At that time, I must say with regret, I had to put up with all kinds of gibes in very poor taste in the House of Commons and even in public opinion because people wondered if I was suicidal. That is always the tragedy when you talk about such terribly difficult issues in life.

Senator Neiman, together with several others and with the consent of the Minister of Justice, you very wisely asked that this whole issue be referred to the Senate. I do not yet know how I will participate in the debate, but I can assure you, Senator Neiman, that I will follow this great question of euthanasia more seriously than anything else that could come before us in the Senate.

I already see that some members of the other place are getting excited. You know that people can engage in quite a bit of demagogy with this amazing issue. I am an advocate of the abolition of the death penalty. Why? Because I have always said that where there is life, there is hope. Even for the worst of criminals, I wanted us to be severe — not an admission of weakness, here — while also demonstrating a respect for life.

I had to go through all these crises several times, in the debate on abortion, in the debate on capital punishment and now in the debate on euthanasia.

It is good that we can have such debates occasionally. It is a fundamental debate that must be conducted with all the seriousness that should be granted to human life, the human person and respect for human beings. Whether this will lead to a new law allowing or forbidding euthanasia, we shall see in due course.

•(1650)

Honourable senators, it is a privilege and an immense responsibility to sit on a committee authorized to study euthanasia, and I know that the debate will be in extremely good hands. I will not prolong the debate today, but we must begin this debate in a serious atmosphere. This important proposal may eventually come to be submitted to the House of Commons.

If this debate were to take place in the House of Commons, the press would be outside the chamber and protesters pro and con would be on the front lawn. However, here we have the Senate quietly discussing a very essential, very modern, and very difficult issue. If I can offer any aid, I would be more than honoured to participate in this debate because I do not yet know, in my conscience, how I feel about this subject.

Honourable senators, the Senate is ready to deal with this serious issue and to duly consider the views that are yet to be expressed in committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, in my experience in this chamber, this inquiry is the most serious subject-matter that we have been called to reflect upon. I would have preferred a packed gallery and full benches as we have this debate on Senator Neiman's inquiry, because the debate at this stage will no doubt help us as we debate the motion of which Senator Neiman has given us notice.

The inquiry states that the senator wishes to have a committee inquire into and report upon three elements relating to euthanasia and assisted suicide: the legal, the social and the ethical. Just one of those elements, in my judgment, would constitute an enormous undertaking, given the fact that the subject-matter speaks to our values as Canadians and our civility as a democratic society.

Let me reflect for a moment, honourable senators, on the legal element, which is so complex. We have the recently adjudicated five-to-four decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the application brought on behalf of the late Sue Rodriguez. The relationship of section 241(b) of the Criminal Code and our Charter was canvassed and measured by their lordships. That, in itself, leads us to the need for a very special inquiry on that element — the legal and the constitutional.

As we know, honourable senators, assisted suicide, outlawed under the common law, has been prohibited by Parliament since the very adoption of Canada's first Criminal Code. This is, therefore, an area of the law dealing with a subject-matter that has a long, long history.

I thank Senator Neiman for identifying ethical issues as well. This is another area on which to concentrate. If the committee is set up and is to examine the legal dimension, it will be required to call witnesses who are constitutional lawyers, experts on the Charter, experts on the criminal law and on other areas of the law. However, it will also be important to canvass the whole spectrum of ethical issues. It will be important to hear from witnesses who have appeared before parliamentary committees in the past, such as Margaret Summerville of McGill University and Joseph Boyle of St. Michael's College, University of Toronto, and many others across the land.

I wish at this time to place on the record some of the ethical principles involved in this issue of assisted suicide. First, it is sometimes claimed that individuals have the right to die. In discussing rights, however, two points are commonly made: First, rights are correlative to duties; that is, my claim to a right is identical to, and concomitant with, a recognition of a duty on the part of another. The question that presents itself, then, is this: Does a right to die then imply a duty to kill?

Second, rights are commonly distinguished as either negative — that is, never to be interfered with — or positive — that is, to be positively provided for. The ethical question that presents itself is this: Is the right to die a negative right? That is, "No one can prevent me." Or is it a positive right? That is, "Another must provide this for me?" It would be a unique right indeed if it were claimed that it is both a negative and a positive right.

Assisted suicide is not passive euthanasia; assisted suicide is active euthanasia. One might want to reflect upon whether or not it would be wise to limit the study to one or the other, given the complexity and difficulty of the issue and the terms of reference given to the committee. Should we limit the inquiry to consideration of active euthanasia or assisted suicide, being specific to the issue now proscribed by the Criminal Code in section 241(b)?

In terms of assisted suicide, is active euthanasia an especial situation? This raises two issues: First, is it ever permissible to directly intend the death of another, even in the case of justifiable killing, such as self-defence, where the justification rests on the contention that the death of the other is not directly intended? Second, the call for assisted suicide implies a change from the absolute value of life to a more conditioned value of life. However, the value of life is no longer an intrinsic one. Are there other considerations or situations which might be seen to justify this direct termination? These are the kinds of questions that one would want to put to ethicists to draw other testimony on the ethical dimensions of this issue.

Third, is it ever permissible to choose a moral evil in order to avoid a physical evil? That is, may I lie in order to avoid punishment? If not, may I choose killing to avoid pain? These are the kinds of questions that the ethicists ask, and the committee, in my judgment, would do well to put before ethicists or moralists who ought to be invited to the committee should the study go forward.

Finally, there is another ethical principle involved in the issue that, it seems to me, should be canvassed. The issue here raises a question regarding the purpose of medical intervention. Perhaps this is under the rubric of "social" that is used in the terms of the inquiry, if the social dimensions encompass the medical dimensions. However, there are questions other than the medical-ethical questions as to the purpose of medical intervention. Is medical intervention justified on grounds of objective benefit to the patient, or by the fulfilment of the patient's subjective preferences? May not the term "benefit" itself be subject to equivocation?

Therefore, honourable senators, it seems to me that we have to consider whether we wish to focus on assisted suicide or active euthanasia. The subject-matter which is currently proscribed by section 241(b) of the Criminal Code can deal with that. Or do we wish also to examine passive euthanasia? Do we wish to look at both of those things in a tremendously elaborate study?

It seems to me it might be much more helpful, and much more direct, if we were to limit the study to assisted suicide or active euthanasia and to recognize, at the beginning, that we would have to canvass, as Senator Neiman has pointed out, the legal and the social, which is inclusive, I take it, of the medical as well as the ethical.

Consequently, honourable senators, I hope that the motion of which we have been given notice will come forward, will be carefully drafted and will give a fair degree of specificity as to what the mandate would be for the committee that is envisaged.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. C. William Doody, pursuant to notice of February 10, 1994, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have the power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical, and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matter of bills and Estimates as are referred to it.

He said: Honourable senators, this is just a standard motion to facilitate the operation of the committee. In this case, it is respecting the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Obviously, the committee's budget will have to be considered by the Internal Economy Committee and then by the Senate, for specific approval. In the meantime, this motion gives us the authority to proceed with the work that the committee may be called upon to consider.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

OLYMPIC WINTER GAMES

CONGRATULATIONS TO MYRIAM BÉDARD

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would draw your attention to the dazzling victories of Miss Myriam Bédard, the pride of Quebec, who just won her second gold medal at the Olympic Games. Canada should be proud of this young lady who has an iron will and extraordinary talents.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF ST-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE

Hon. Solange Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, I would have liked Senator Fairbairn to be here, because I am not looking to question or criticize anyone —

[English]

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance to keep — — the Collège militaire de St-Jean open at all costs. I do not mean to criticize the budget; I am far from qualified to do so. However, coming from a military family, there is one thing I know. The college at St-Jean still attracts our young people even at a time when so many young kids lose themselves in alcohol, drugs, and whatever you want. I think this college is necessary not only for — — the sense of what it will do to the community of St-Jean. That is not my business. My business, as a Quebec woman who has grandsons and whose brothers were in the army, is to beg the Leader of the Government in the Senate to tell the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister that this college is an essential part of our Quebec culture; it is essential for our dignity of being, and for the military education and training of our young people.

Last week I was in Kingston. I was invited to give a lecture to the Royal Military College. If anyone wishes to tell me that that college will become bilingual overnight, he or she had better go there and stay there for a while.

If our young people can be trained in Quebec, in their language and in their environment, we may see a little less violence in our province, and a little more desire on the part of our youth to serve their country.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE IN RUSSIA OF UNITED STATES PHARMACEUTICALS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would bring to the attention of this chamber an article entitled "Russia Allows Sale of Drugs made in U.S." The article, which appeared in the New York Times on February 17, described an eight-page memorandum of understanding signed by the Food and Drug Administration of the United States and the Government of Russia, which also signed on behalf of the Russian Federation participants.

This is a coup for the U.S. trade commissioner and the American government. It is the first time in history that any country has allowed drugs manufactured in another country to be sold without any clinical testing or other type of bureaucratic requirements.

This agreement is also a great boon for the American pharmaceutical manufacturers and exporters. It gives them a great advantage over manufacturing companies and exporters of other countries that might want to sell their drugs in Russia. I am afraid that the Canadian manufacturing companies and exporters of pharmaceutical products will be at a serious disadvantage because of this agreement.

I hope the Minister for International Trade will take note of both this agreement and my representations here this afternoon.

Some Canadian pharmaceutical companies are already doing business in Russia and others are planning to do so. They require the support of our government, just as the American manufacturers had the support of their government, to penetrate the Russian market and to have such easy access.

HEALTH

NOTICE OF MOTION TO ESTABLISH SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I give notice that, with leave of the Senate, I will move later this day:

> That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon the legal, social and ethical issues relating to euthanasia and assisted suicide;

QUESTION PERIOD

THE BUDGET

EXTENSION OF WAGE FREEZE FOR PUBLIC SERVANTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, last evening's budget is odious because of things it does not contain, which my colleagues and I on this side will develop in greater detail at the appropriate time. However, it is most odious because many of the things that it does contain go completely against what the Liberal Party has stood for over a period of many years, including what it again pledged during the election campaign, but now has completely forgotten. It is a betrayal of the supporters who saw hope — obviously false hope — in the promises of the Liberals before October 25. However, I will not now go into any particular details on that. We will have plenty of time later for discussing the budget when we begin our inquiry on it, but I wish to ask two questions arising from that budget.

When we were here in October of 1991 to discuss the bill returning the public service to work following their strike, Senator Olson, who was then speaking for the Liberal Party, said:

> In labour-management relations, honourable senators, one should at least discuss one's intentions with the other party before making an announcement; but this government did not do that.

And here the honourable senator is talking about the Conservative government. He goes on to state:

> It did not even go to the Public Service Alliance and discuss with them what its policy would be.

In his budget speech, Mr. Martin said:

> ...the government is announcing a two-year legislated extension of the existing salary freeze, and a two-year suspension of pay increments within grade.

My question to the minister is: Was there consultation with the Public Service Alliance on this issue — as urged on us by the Liberal Party on a similar occasion some three years ago — before it was announced?

Senator Olson: They already knew about it from you!

Senator Di Nino: Senator Olson has already answered the question, I guess.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there certainly have been conversations over a period of time between the government and spokesmen within the public service union. As for the degree of precision about which the honourable senator has asked, I will make inquiries of the President of the Treasury Board.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This is not a nitpicking question. I am reminding Canadians that the Liberal Party has let them down on fundamental issues: First, on collective bargaining and negotiations with its own employees, it has completely neglected to take its own advice and do what it urged us to do.

Senator Bonnell: You are not even waiting for the answer!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I have the answer. It is, "We will get at it another time." The answer is in the budget, if you read the budget speech: "Now we will consult."

Senator Hébert was speaking for the Liberal Party in 1993 when we extended the wage freeze. His was a very forceful speech; I remember it well. Concerning our bill freezing wages, he said:

> ...this bill continues the assault against federal employees which began with the 1991 budget. As honourable senators will recall, the salaries of public servants, MPs and senators were frozen by legislation in 1991. At that time, the average earnings of government employees were only $30,000 a year.

Senator Hébert continues to speak for the Liberal Party in this house and, I assume, the Liberal Party across Canada. He goes on to state:

> The earnings of civil servants had been below those in the private sector for over five years, and they had not kept pace with inflation over the same period.
> Civil servants have already been penalized by the government, and the legislation will pour salt onto the wound by extending the 1991 wage freeze through 1994.

I suppose they have enough doses of salt to go ahead and make the wound even worse by not only extending the wage freeze for two years but also halting any incremental increases within salary ranges. Therefore, you are compounding a problem which you saw and for which you criticized us, and I would like to know why that is.

Senator Frith: I thought a dose of salt had a beneficial function.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That shows your age, Senator Frith.

I want to know how the Liberal Party of Canada can justify this complete change of face, which is shameful and a betrayal to the Canadian people.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, in preface I will say, and I think everyone in this house will agree, that at this point in time we are in the position of having to freeze public service salaries and of having to deal massively with the defence establishment, to the detriment of all of us. Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland has already movingly described that situation.

Our need to take that kind of action across this country, in every province and every region, and —

Senator Simard: You should cut the fat.

Senator Fairbairn: — the need for some other painful cuts that had to be made last night speaks to another issue. That issue is our fight against a $45.7-billion deficit.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Accounting gimmickry, as you well know.

Senator Fairbairn: Oh, no, senator.

Senator Frith: That is their defence now, accounting gimmickry?

Senator Olson: They will not even admit to that.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, if you want to cast your minds back to a few years ago —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Form another task force. You only have 15 in the budget.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, we may think of "a few years ago" as being in the mists of time, but I should like to remind honourable senators that, under the projections and assumptions of my friends opposite, we were supposed to be looking at a deficit this year of $14 billion. Put that in juxtaposition with the reality of $45.7 billion.

Senator Phillips: You sure made a mess of things.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What about the wage freeze?

Senator Fairbairn: Quite clearly, figures like that make it absolutely imperative that this new government take action, and very tough action, that involves a freeze of the public service salaries.

It involves, as I am sure all of you will remind me and draw to my attention, a great many other difficult and unpleasant actions that we had to take. We had to take those actions in order to do two things: We must get a hold on the deficit and bring it down; at the same time, while not stifling economic growth, we must take into consideration the major message in this country, which is the creation of jobs in every corner of Canada. Those items are also contained in this budget.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You were against the wage freeze.

NOVA SCOTIA

EFFECT OF BUDGET ON CORNWALLIS PEACE-KEEPING TRAINING CENTRE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Senator Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, I also will be reminding the government of the kinds of promises it made during the election period. One promise was to establish a peace-keeping training centre at Cornwallis, Nova Scotia.

I would like to quote a vote-seeking letter from the Prime Minister to thousands of voters in southwestern Nova Scotia:

> We also feel that peace-keeping should rank higher on the list of Canada's defence priorities in terms of budget, personnel and infrastructure. Cornwallis not only has impressive training facilities, it is ideally suited to serve as a staging area for international peace-keeping troops.

He goes on to say that they adopted a resolution for the training of troops at Cornwallis.

What we are getting from the new government is a private group of retired military people who organize conferences and seminars, and conduct research into peace-keeping. Where are the jobs in that? Where is the consultation with the people of southern Nova Scotia? We do not know when the contract was awarded. We do know that the announcement for the closure was made yesterday, and somehow the contract has already been awarded for the think tank. At a time when 2,200 Canadians troops are training in California — which I assume has better weather than southwestern Nova Scotia at this time of the year — the Canadian government is throwing Canadians out of jobs.

What will you tell the people of Atlantic Canada? Where will the jobs be coming from? Is this what we can expect from a Liberal government: Think tanks, seminars and conferences?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator has obviously read the portion of the budget papers that indicates there will be support for a training centre at Cornwallis. However, it is not the kind of training centre that was originally spoken of.

The question asked was: Will this government be working only on studies and research and not on jobs? I would make the point to my colleagues in the Senate that jobs remain the underpinning of the government's programs, and in order —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: They're celebrating in Chatham tonight.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I know that there is unhappiness in Calgary today as well, and —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And Toronto.

Senator Fairbairn: And Toronto, and in many other places across the country. However, we have taken the initiative and are moving to create job opportunities in this country. We have had to find money to go ahead with an infrastructure program. We have had to find room in the budget to put together a job creation scheme through small business by guaranteeing the lowering of the premiums for unemployment insurance —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That's next year, not this year.

Senator Fairbairn: — which will create a great number of jobs in this country. We are also creating an $800-million fund to —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Stick to the facts. You raised the premiums.

Senator Fairbairn: I am sticking to the facts. We will now be able to lower considerably unemployment insurance premiums for businesses and individuals over a two-year period, which may well create 40,000 new jobs.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Everything is two years down the road.

Senator Fairbairn: We have also been required to find money for the $800-million fund that will go towards funding the kinds of joint projects with the provinces that will create job opportunities all across this country.

As you know, we are starting in this house today a review of a major policy area that will change the way we do business in the military in this country, aiming at a more effective and efficient operational force.

We are also undertaking probably the biggest challenge in recent memory in changing the social programs of this country to make them efficient, affordable and effective for Canadians: action that senators on both sides of this house will find painful. It is something to which this government is committed, and it is something we believe will affect the lives of Canadians in areas where they need the most help, encouragement and support to work, rather than being on social assistance or unemployment insurance.

MILITARY AND FUNDING CUT-BACKS— EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I should like to direct some questions to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. If in fact, as the leader has said, jobs remain the underpinning of the Liberal program, why then is the government eliminating 16,000 jobs on military bases? That was an option open to us which we did not take up. Second, why is the government eliminating infrastructure in the maritimes without putting in place offsetting programs, which is something our government did not do. Further, why is it that, if the government is relying on small business to create new jobs, they are cutting the very funds from the Western Diversification Program that have been instrumental in the successful creation of new jobs in the west?

Senator Simard: And ACOA.

Senator Carney: I will leave it to our maritimes senators to point out the problems with regard to ACOA.

However, indications are that the government is cutting hundreds of millions of dollars out of a program for small business that has created new jobs in Western Canada.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is quite true, as Senator Carney has said, that the former government did not take the action that would result in the reduction of 16,000 jobs in the military. That is one of the reasons why this government is currently faced with extensive clean-up and restructuring of the military, and the Minister of National Defence has taken on that responsibility. No previous governments, including former Liberal governments, took the responsibility of progressively changing the structure of the military infrastructure in this country to meet the changing needs in the world. We in this country are operating on an infrastructure that dates back to the Cold War, and even to World War II.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We closed Lahr and we got out of Cyprus. Come on, now!

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly we will have reductions in employment because of these cuts, there is no question about it. Every possible effort will be made, through the military establishment as well as the public service, to treat these people with the utmost sensitivity in terms of their future.

As far as the Western Diversification Program is concerned —

Senator Berntson: An excellent program.

Senator Fairbairn: It is an excellent program, but it will have to be readjusted to meet new needs.

Senator Berntson: It doesn't have any money.

Senator Fairbairn: It will have money to devote strategic financing to projects in Western Canada, as will ACOA in the maritimes.

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, I would not mind the objective of cutting the deficit if we did not have the hypocrisy that goes with it. You cannot cut jobs in the military and cut jobs in the Western Diversification Program, and then talk about strategically creating jobs elsewhere.

R&D CUT-BACKS—EFFECT ON BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Pat Carney: Another issue I would raise at this time is the issue of fairness. British Columbia has taken an especially heavy hit in this budget. This government has cancelled the KAON project, which is the largest single scientific project ever conceived in Canada, and has left B.C., the fastest growing province with 12 per cent of the population, with a mere 3 per cent of R&D grants distributed by Ottawa. How does the government intend to address this issue of fairness in terms of offsetting R&D programs in British Columbia?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that the former minister strongly supports that program in Vancouver, as do my colleagues from British Columbia on this side of the house. Again, that was one of the incredibly tough decisions that had to be taken. The decision of the Minister of Finance in the case of the KAON project was based, in part, first, on the fact that there has not been the international financial support for that project that might have been wished for, and second, the government in the current circumstances simply cannot afford to fund a project of that magnitude.

In terms of scientific research and development, and given the fiscal situation, the commitment of this government is to strongly support scientific development and research in this country.

Senator Carney: But not in British Columbia.

Senator Olson: I would not say that.

Senator Fairbairn: I would suggest to Senator Carney that the program of this government will be strongly influenced by senators, by members of the other house and by ministers from every part of Canada, and I would hope that there will be support for scientific research and development in the province of British Columbia.

Senator Carney: Not in this budget.

THE ENVIRONMENT

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—RECOMMENDATIONS ON TOXICITY REDUCTION IN GREAT LAKES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, last week in its seventh bi-annual report, the International Joint Commission stated once again that the Great Lakes and the life forms that depend upon them remain at an unacceptable level of risk from persistent toxic substances. These risks include not only cancer but also neurological, reproductive, developmental and immunological adverse effects. There is emerging evidence to that effect. Among other things, the commission has called for the development of:

> ...sunset timetables on the use of chlorine and compounds containing chlorine in industrial feed stocks, and an examination of means for reducing and eliminating other uses.

In view of the fact that the Clinton administration recommended that, as of January 28, 1994, their Clean Water Act be amended to restrict or prohibit the discharge of the most highly toxic pollutants — and they are specifically dealing with chlorine and chlorinated compounds as well — can the Leader of the Government answer a question which puzzles me because of the answer given by the Minister of the Environment to the same question when it was asked in the House? The question is: Does the Government of Canada recognize in principle the need for the virtual elimination of these chemicals, or for taking the country towards a zero-discharge goal? If so, will the Leader of the Government inquire of her colleague the Minister of the Environment in what time frame the Government of Canada will move to implement this vital recommendation of the International Joint Commission?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for her question. I know that my colleague in the other place, Ms Copps, has been following this issue closely, and that she spoke about it both inside and outside the house just last week. I will send the honourable senator's question to her and bring back a full answer.

CENTRE OF EXCELLENCE FOR WOMEN'S HEALTH—NATURE AND FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. In August of 1993, the previous government announced the establishment of a women's health bureau within the Department of Health, a department with full representation in cabinet, to ensure that women's health issues were a priority in our health system.

•(1440)

Given that the Centre of Excellence for Women's Health, as announced in the Throne Speech and reiterated again yesterday in the budget, is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for the Status of Women, a non-Health Ministry, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate please tell us when the government will begin work on the centre?

Perhaps the Leader could answer these specific questions: First, how will the proposed Centre of Excellence for Women's Health and the Department of Health interact in terms of the functioning and funding of the centre to ensure that women's health issues receive priority?

Second, what are the health issues to be targeted by this centre, and how will these decisions be made?

Third, given the lack of research funding for women's health problems to date — for example, the Women's Health Research Foundation of Canada located in Winnipeg estimated that in 1991-92 only 3 per cent of all medical research funds in Canada went directly to women's health research — what portion of the centre's resources will be dedicated to funding such research, and how will this be determined?

Honourable senators, I can appreciate that the Leader of the Government in the Senate may not have that information today; however, if she could seek this information and table it in the Senate as a delayed answer as quickly as possible, that would be appreciated.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I would be pleased to do so, senator. The Centre of Excellence for Women's Health is an important issue, particularly to the Prime Minister. I will endeavour to find out for you, in as much detail as possible, the timing and guidelines that might pertain to this issue.

I can assure you that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has and will continue to have a strong interest and involvement in this issue.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EFFECTS OF CLOSURE OF ST-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. As mentioned before, we have just learned that the Collège militaire de St-Jean is to be closed. I suppose the government came to that decision after a thorough evaluation of the economic impact of this establishment on the area. Could the Leader of the Government tell the Senate how much money will be saved and how many direct and indirect jobs will be lost? I acknowledge that the number of indirect jobs will be more difficult to assess.

My second question is as follows: Is this the government's final decision? If such is the case, it will mean the closure of the only French language military college in the country.

Moreover, the Collège militaire de St-Jean plays an important role as a link between French-speaking and English-speaking military personnel, not to mention the fact that the Canadian Armed Forces are now recognized throughout the world as an institution where one can serve in either official language. It is a very strong element that sets Canada apart.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for the question, and I thank Senator Chaput-Rolland for her statement.

I will take these representations to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Defence. I can assure you that the actions taken during the process leading up to the budget were taken with a great deal of thought and, I think it is fair to say, a great deal of anguish. The emotion and the feelings you express over the college at St-Jean are quite in keeping with the feelings expressed by the strong supporters of Royal Roads Military College in Victoria.

I will undertake, honourable senators, to obtain a breakdown on the job question. I have no comfort for you today, but I shall pass on your representations, and I certainly share your anguish.

[Translation]

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I have a short supplementary. I agree with the Leader of the Government that British Columbians have the same feelings over the college in Victoria. However, I would like the Leader of the Government to take into special consideration the totally French environment maintained at the college at St-Jean, which has a long tradition, and which has been of great assistance not only to the Canadian Forces but also to some members of this assembly.

REMOVAL OF TAX CREDIT—EFFECT ON SENIORS

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable colleagues, prior to asking my question, I wish to state that I find it difficult to believe that Senator Fairbairn participated in the meetings leading to the decisions that were preliminary to yesterday's budget. She has always shown such caring and compassion, and yet she and her colleagues, honourable senators, decided to establish a means test for the tax credit for those Canadians 65 years and older, the impact of which will result in some 800,000 seniors paying more taxes, of which 200,000 will be paying in the neighbourhood of $950 or more in taxes.

I should like to ask the Honourable Senator Fairbairn to explain why her government decided to establish such an unfair and discriminatory means test?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the proposal in the budget is, again, a proposal one certainly would have preferred not to make. However, the government is seeking extra revenue to support job creation and development in all parts of the country.

It is not fair to describe this measure as punitive. Twenty-five per cent of the seniors of Canada will be affected in some degree by this measure. It is an effort to preserve and protect those at the lower end of the income scale and ask those at the upper end ultimately to contribute a bit more through the removal of the tax credit.

Senator Di Nino: May I ask a supplementary, Your Honour?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have been lenient in allowing questions and answers to exceed the 30-minute time limit. However, yesterday, I found that when we passed the 30-minute mark, the questions and answers were rather lengthy. We went well beyond the limit.

If the senator wishes to put his supplementary briefly, we might get a brief answer.

Senator Di Nino: Thank you, Your honour. I appreciate the opportunity to place a supplementary.

Would the honourable senator please explain to Canadians, and in particular to seniors, why her government believes that seniors with a net income of over $25,921 are considered wealthy and therefore subject to a higher level of taxation? Does the honourable senator really believe that a senior making a net income of over $25,921 can afford to pay more in taxes?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, with the elimination of the tax credit at a certain level, all of the seniors of Canada are not being asked to pay a higher level of taxation. We are not attacking the seniors of Canada and saying that those who earn $26,000 are wealthy people. Of course they are not. The elimination of the tax credit occurs at the level where an individual would be earning close to $50,000. Eliminating the tax credit at that level is not something one would want to do, but it does not represent an enormous sum of money at that level.

The other point I would make is that we have been urged by others, with great enthusiasm, to cut and slash programs that are the underpinning of our social security net and extremely important to the seniors of Canada, whether the cuts be in the field of health, insurance, or even RRSPs. The government did what it could in the least intrusive way, and held on tight to the rest of the social safety net until we can determine, after public consultation and working with seniors and with every sector of our society, how we can have a strong and secure Canadian social safety net that will provide protection to Canadians in a more affordable and efficient way. That is the project for the next few months. It is a project that will produce legislation, we are told, by the end of this year, and which will be debated into the next.

I assure you that the segments of Canadian society which are the most worthy of the greatest consideration are, on the one end, our seniors, and on the other end, our young people. Tremendous efforts are being made to put young people into a job situation and a training situation that will enable them to make a contribution and to participate in our economy.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is my pleasure to give two delayed answers to questions. The first is to a question asked on February 10 by Senator Gerald Ottenheimer on the extension of jurisdiction beyond the 200-mile limit. The second was also asked on February 10, by Senator David Tkachuk on the Saskatchewan infrastructure program.

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerald Ottenheimer on February 10, 1994)

In the recent Speech from the Throne, the government indicated it would take measures to end foreign overfishing outside Canada's 200-mile zone with respect to straddling stocks on the Nose and the Tail of the Grand Banks. A review of options is under way. Internationally, the government is vigorously pursuing all legal and diplomatic measures. However, if these initiatives do not solve the problem, the government has also made clear that it is prepared to take unilateral action.

Canada scored an important conservation victory last week in Brussels. On February 17, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) agreed on a moratorium on fishing for cod off the southern Grand Banks (area 3N0). We fully expect that every NAFO member, including the three who abstained (Norway, Denmark for Greenland and Faroe Islands, and the European Union) during the NAFO vote last week, will comply with the moratorium, which will apply to all members just as it applies to Canada.

Another recent achievement is the negotiation of an agreement in the U.N. Food & Agricultural Organization (FAO) to promote compliance by fishing vessels with international conservation rules on the high seas. It requires 25 countries to formally adopt the agreement before it can enter into force. Canada hopes to become party before the end of 1994 and will encourage key states to do so. In practice, this new agreement means that NAFO conservation decisions will apply to any country that accepts the FAO Agreement, whether they are NAFO members or not.

Joint diplomatic approaches, during the week of February 21, will be made by senior officials from Canada, the European Union, Japan and Russia to NAFO non-member states whose vessels are fishing in the NAFO Regulatory Area, namely, Panama and Honduras (Belize and Sierra Leone will be visited later). The message from all NAFO members to these countries is that they must immediately withdraw their vessels from the NAFO Regulatory Area.

At the United Nations, as a result of Canadian initiative, a conference on high seas fisheries problems is under way. Canada is seeking the recognition of enhanced rights for coastal states and would like to see these entrenched in a binding legal instrument as the outcome of the conference. The conference resumes in March 1994 to complete its work in time for the 1994 Fall UN General Assembly.

A successful conclusion of the conference, combined with other diplomatic and legal initiatives, represents Canada's best hope for a lasting solution to high seas overfishing in the Northwest Atlantic.

(Response to question raised by Hon. David Tkachuk on February 10, 1994)

The Canada Works infrastructure program in Saskatchewan, as elsewhere, is being implemented quickly and effectively to provide a much-needed boost to employment and to basic infrastructure across Canada. This is the commitment we gave in the election campaign. This is the commitment we are fulfilling.

The Government of Canada has met its federal responsibility to make available funds to each province in accordance with a national formula. In Saskatchewan, the province has proposed a distribution of funds which allocates significant funds directly to municipalities. It also proposes to set aside funds for communities whose capacity to finance infrastructure is limited, for projects which will benefit a number of communities or which will introduce innovative technology.

We have been prepared, in the spirit of cooperation with which we entered these negotiations with the province, to consider the distribution proposal. That proposal will soon be considered by the management committee.

The most important requirement for us in implementing this program is that jobs are created and infrastructure is built or repaired, and that this be done soon. We are sensitive to the views of municipalities and to the fair distribution of the benefits of the program

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION TABLED

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON SOCIAL CHANGE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 1 appearing on the Order Paper — (Honourable Senator Marshall).

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we proceed to Orders of the Day, this might be a good time for me to tell senators the results of my discussions with my colleagues opposite on the business of the week.

We expect that later today we will get a message from the House of Commons regarding the appointment of a Special Joint Committee on National Defence. The House of Commons is expected to vote this afternoon, and after that happens we will get the message here. In my consultations with my friends opposite, there was agreement that we would revert to that order at that time, and proceed to establish that committee today. There is some urgency in this matter, because in the other place the committee has been formed, and we should be prepared to participate as quickly as we can.

We have also agreed that we will revert later today to the motion by the Honourable Senator Neiman on the question of a committee on euthanasia.

I expect that tomorrow we will receive the required constitutional resolution on the fixed link to Prince Edward Island. It is not essential that we complete that item this week. It was completed in the other place in one day, and if we can complete that tomorrow, that would be convenient, but it is not essential.

On the basis that we will complete the other two matters this week, we will then have nothing remaining on our legislative calendar. The House of Commons will not be sitting next week, therefore there will be nothing processed in that place. That having been said, and considering the costs of assembling us, it is my recommendation, and my honourable friends have agreed, that we would adjourn tomorrow until March 15. That is a long recess, I realize, but I do not think there is any point in having senators here if we have no business before us with which to deal.

However, a number of our committees do have work before them. The Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples has an order of reference regarding aboriginal veterans. Presumably today we will establish the committee on euthanasia. The Special Joint Committee on National Defence will be organized later today, we hope, and it is my expectation that in that second week the committees will be meeting actively and will thereby get a great start to their work, since they will be able to hold full day meetings without having Senate sessions in between.

Hon. C. William Doody: Could my honourable friend enlighten the National Finance Committee as to the status of the interim supply bill, the supplementary supply bill, the Estimates and other matters? I imagine that the government will want them, or at least some of them, before the end of March. Can you indicate when we will receive such bills and other items, in order that the National Finance Committee can plan its work?

Senator Molgat: My honourable friend is correct. There will be two supply bills forthcoming, and those will be needed before the end of March. I do not expect that we will receive those here in the Senate before March 22. That is my expectation at this time. If we can dispose of those bills during that week, we would again be well ahead in our calendar.

I expect another bill will be required before the end of March: that is Bill C-3, involving equalization payments. That one will also be required before the end of the month.

Senator Doody: Therefore it is pretty safe to assume that the more things change, the more they remain the same. These bills will come up in the last week of March, and the government will want them back before the end of the month.

Senator Molgat: Yes. My honourable friend has been involved in this process for as long as I have, and he knows that that seems to be the standard system. However, if we do get those bills here in the Senate on March 22, which is a Tuesday, I think it is an advance on what we have had in the past, since we have normally received them over here on a Thursday.

Senator Doody: I will take my friend's word for it.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have a question for Senator Molgat. Does the line-up you have announced for tomorrow's Orders of the Day restrict us from completing the Orders of the Day? I have an inquiry on which I would like to speak tomorrow.

Senator Molgat: Not a bit. I see no reason why we should restrict any debate. In fact, if we do not conclude our work, we can sit on Friday and we can sit next week. There is no attempt to restrict in any way.

In fact, Senator Phillips made reference to the budget debate today. If there is a desire to proceed with the budget debate at an earlier date, we could certainly accommodate honourable senators by meeting next week or the following week. I am certainly very open in that regard.

Senator Marshall: I just do not want the people who will be attending to listen to this debate to be disappointed.

Senator Molgat: Let me assure honourable senators that there is no attempt to curtail debate in any way. We will have all the debate that we want, and we will explore every subject in depth.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cools, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the Opening of the First Session of the Thirty-fifth Parliament. — (6th day of resuming debate)

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, first of all I would like to offer the usual congratulations to the Speaker of the Senate and say that I look forward to working with him and all honourable senators in a spirit of harmony and cooperation.

It has now been almost one year since I first took part in the proceedings of this institution, and it has been a pleasure to work with all honourable senators.

Honourable senators, the challenges facing Canada today are impressive. On the international scene, it is clear that the restructuring that has taken place in Eastern Europe will create new responsibilities for Canada and a need for new approaches. We are all very proud of our country. Canada, as a middle power with impeccable credentials internationally, can and indeed must make its own specific contribution. The international situation demands this, as it has during the past ten or fifteen years.

As far as the economy is concerned, Canadians are experiencing some very serious problems, but we can say that under the leadership of the former Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, some very important decisions for the future were made when both houses passed the free trade agreement with the United States and the North American Free Trade Agreement with the United States and Mexico. With these guarantees, our country will be able to play a remarkable role in the international economy, and Canadians across the country will benefit.

When we think of the prospects of our country's youth, if these decisions had not been made and this perspective had been ignored, I think our young people would have had no future at all. I am convinced that, thanks to these decisions, they can look forward to a better future.

Unfortunately, despite all of these efforts in the international sphere and elsewhere, we still face a very serious crisis within Canadian society. There is a crisis in individual values and family values, and this is something both federal and provincial governments must understand. It is causing a host of new problems. All levels of government must change their perspective in order to recognize the importance of human values, amid their political and administrative concerns. This is indeed an area where a change in policy is necessary.

We have just been considering some very serious problems such as euthanasia, but there is also the problem of violence against women and young people, and the breakup of family structures. All these problems should be at the centre of political debates and concerns.

Naturally, there are some urgent questions such as job creation. All politicians in the country are talking about it, because this is what people expect of them. Everywhere in Canada, this is the number one priority. In the short term, it should be our main objective.

The other important objective, once again highlighted by the budget, is the fight against the deficit. On this side of the house, honourable senators, we always said that the Canadian deficit was compromising the initiatives that the government should take regarding job creation and changes in the living conditions of individuals. I do not want to talk about the budget at this time, but perhaps the only merit of the budget that was tabled yesterday by the Minister of Finance is that the Liberal government became concerned, and finally understood that there was indeed a deficit problem. We did not hear much about that during the election campaign, but nevertheless, the action that the government took and the way in which it was done — and we will talk about that later — shows that the problem is very serious.

We must address those issues of the challenges facing Canada on the international and domestic levels, the value crisis, the public finance crisis, and the needs in terms of employment. I would simply bring to the attention of honourable senators that, in order to be able to face all of those challenges that are common to all Canadians, Canada must avoid falling once again into a political crisis following what could happen to the Quebec government.

If the party now in office in Quebec, the Liberal Party, were defeated, there would be a major crisis not only in Quebec, but also throughout Canada. This dimension of the political scene in Canada cannot be ignored, otherwise all of the nice ambitions that we may have in Ottawa, be they of the government or of the opposition, might be seriously compromised.

Yesterday I mentioned, by way of a question, that my greatest disappointment with the present government's discourse was that it has completely ignored, not only in the Throne Speech but also since it came to office, this extremely important aspect not only of the Quebec situation but also of the Canadian one. The government is acting as if this problem did not exist.

However, this problem does and will exist. As far as I am concerned, I will do my best, as will many other honourable senators from Quebec on both sides of the Senate. I trust that the Quebec Liberal Party, under the leadership of the new premier, Daniel Johnson, will be a winner. We Quebecers who believe that Quebec's future lies within Canada will succeed in convincing our fellow Quebecers that it is the way of the future.

This presupposes that the Canadian government acknowledges, is open to and aware of the seriousness of the problem that Quebecers will be facing and — although I hope it does not come to this — that the whole of Canada will be facing.

Senator Jessiman asked what could be done to convince Quebecers to stay within the Canadian federation. We must first of all acknowledge and accept — and I wish it could be made clear by the current government — Quebec's historical, sociological and political reality, its valour and its contribution to the Canadian federation and to Canada as a whole.

You know that in many respects Quebecers are exactly like other Canadians. Why do we, as Quebecers, share with other Canadians the goal of participating in the building of Canada and of continuing the Canadian experience? Because we fundamentally share the same values as Canadians in general, in terms of individual freedoms and democratic rights. We share a similar vision about the building of the economy, and about the way jobs and the market economy generate prosperity. We share with all Canadians this ambition to spread and distribute our collective wealth among all classes of society. This very strong ambition of Canadians and Quebecers is proof of their commitment to social programs.

I could also say as a French-speaking Quebecer that Quebec is the main anchor of French culture in Canada. Quebec never said it was French Canada by itself, since all provinces have citizens of French descent as deeply committed to preserving their French language and culture as are Quebecers.

There is, therefore, an array of fundamental characteristics which confirm that Quebecers, French- or English-speaking, want Quebec to remain in the Canadian federation. We could say to our fellow citizens that we share our basic values as citizens and individuals with all Canadians. It is on that basis that we can and should continue to build and consolidate a country such as Canada, which holds at both the national and international levels an enviable position of prestige and authority, a source of pride for both Canadians and Quebecers as a whole.

Senator Rivest: However, there are a number of conditions to that, honourable senators. Historically, what is this specificity, this ever more particular interest that Quebec is generating in the Canadian debate? By the way, this issue is so constantly at the forefront of Canadian news that, as Quebecers, we sometimes have the feeling that we are getting a little on our fellow citizens' nerves.

I understand much of the reactions of our fellow citizens, but this is a historical reality, for which Quebecers — and to some extent our compatriots of French language and culture living outside Quebec — have fought since the Quebec Act.

Quebec's participation in the Canadian federation presupposes that Quebecers feel that they exert some kind of influence, and not only at the federal level. Heaven knows they have influence, power and responsibilities at the federal level, but they must have their own government, on their own territory; a government to which they can turn.

Of course, the strongest and most far-reaching expression of that feeling is the independence sought by members of the Bloc Québécois; they want the Quebec government to have full powers. However, in spite of the extremely important election results that we have seen, the majority of Quebecers do not think that sovereignty is absolutely necessary.

However, we still need some guarantees with respect to the powers of the National Assembly. This is not an issue that has just arisen because of the Parti Québécois or the Bloc Québécois. This is something that goes all the way back to 1774, to the Quebec Act; this concern was recognized when a specific territory was given to people sharing a common language, a ommon culture and a common religion, for at that time religion was a very important consideration.

In 1867, the country was founded, and one of the main reasons why we have a federal as opposed to a unitary system of government is that we fully realized that, to preserve Canada's integrity, we had to give Quebecers special jurisdictions, allow them to have their own government, their own national assembly which would deal in its own way with education, health, local issues, land use management, and natural resources ownership. Thus, all Canadians, the ones from the first four provinces and those from provinces which joined later, have benefited from the federal system that we created.

Economic, social and cultural problems have evolved in such a way that everything now seems to concern both levels of government. This is why we have such a hard time selling federalism to Quebecers and to convince them that federalism is still a valid option.

In my view, Quebecers have one great fear, which may explain why they voted so overwhelmingly for the Bloc Québécois and why the polls show that they tend to support the Parti Québécois. Basically, Quebecers are worried that the powers and authority they require to manage their own society at the national assembly level are slowly eroding. Quebecers — and myself among them — are not demanding that all powers be handed over to them. As Quebecers, we want to define our own society and keep certain powers, while remaining a part of the entity that is Canada, with which we share the same values.

This is why the Meech Lake agreement mentioned the distinct character of the various components. What, in essence, will be the substance of what federalists will be saying to Quebecers, in the upcoming crucial elections? What will they have to say about independence which, by force of circumstance, will be the focal point of the political debate?

Not only must the authority of the Quebec National Assembly in the area of education be recognized and accepted, it must be extended in a modern context. That is why we are asking and pressing for job training to be recognized, and for project management to be fully recognized as coming under the jurisdiction of the Quebec government.

It is quite simple: This debate is about the quality of our resources. When I hear the current Prime Minister of Canada has to say about education issues, about the whole analysis, this becomes clear. I remember a document from the Economic Council of Canada wherein the council questioned why the federal government was involved in all of these areas.

There are loads of documents and analyses from the Quebec Ministry of Education, which clearly show the shortcomings of our education system. What the people of Quebec fear is that the federal government, and particularly the federal bureaucracy, will somehow manage to standardize curriculums across Canada, using changes in modern economic conditions as an excuse. It is probably just as true for other regions of Canada. Quebecers are just as intelligent and able to understand the basic facts behind the evolution of the global economy and, as a result, to adapt their own education system without the need for standards unilaterally set through the spending power of the federal government.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt, Senator Rivest, but I must tell you that your allocated time has expired.

Honourable senators, does the honourable senator have your permission to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Rivest: The same thing could be said about health, about social services, about every issue that seems to be emerging.

Some could call this basic concern of Quebec a somewhat nationalist vision, if you will, of Canadian federalism.

With regard to the nationalist vision, I just want to say that I found Senator Grafstein's speech very sad, in many respects, because he only talked about the extremes in that area.

I am sorry, but essentially Quebecers have never and will never agree to be part of a Canada which is unable to recognize that Quebec is a distinct national community within this country, and which is unwilling to recognize that strengthening the Quebec community within Canada does not mean and will never mean that we wish to abandon Canada. Quite the opposite; it will give Quebec the opportunity to assert itself, to become more dynamic and to enhance the Canadian identity. In that sense, all of us Quebecers are nationalists. I, for one, am a Quebec nationalist and a federalist.

Given these circumstances, I am interested in working to establish the specific and distinct character of Quebec, which would help us to define a society where I can feel at ease, a society which encompasses the French language and culture, and which is open to other communities. At the same time, I feel as though I am making the unique and exceptional contribution that only Quebec can make to the definition of the Canadian identity at the international level. This is what our goal and our plans are all about.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Would Senator Rivest entertain a question?

Senator Rivest: Very well.

Senator Thériault: I listened carefully, as I always do when Quebec nationalists describe their position. I find this intriguing and disturbing. We are often under the impression that there are quite a lot of people in your province who think that they are the only ones who are French, and that the others do not count. However, my question is not on that subject. My question is: Is Senator Rivest's "Quebecer-Canadian" definition reflected in this famous Allaire report?

Senator Rivest: Not at all. The Allaire report is, in fact, a vision. I think Senator Thériault is very sensitive about that. I know he is as concerned about this as I am.

The way I see it is very simple: I said that Quebec was the main centre of the French fact in Canada, but not the only one. I underlined the contribution and existence of the French-speaking community, and the bilingualism policy. But the fundamental problem with the Allaire report, as will be seen in the debate that is about to take place in Quebec, is that it gives up on French-speaking communities outside Quebec. That is the intent of the Allaire report and of the Bloc Québécois. They are giving up on the French-speaking communities outside Quebec.

In our view of federalism, which all federalist premiers since Mr. Lesage have upheld in Quebec, we think that if Quebec grows stronger with its French language and culture, it will help and support efforts that the Canadian government must make to foster the Canadian linguistic duality.

In the Meech Lake accord and in the Charlottetown agreement, the nationalists in the Government of Quebec, those whom you call Quebec "nationalists" — and I sense you mean to use it in a derogatory way — accepted to defend and promote the linguistic duality of Canada, and that answers the question. This means that in Quebec we consider that both the Government of Canada and the government of Quebec have a responsibility. We also have linguistic duality in Quebec. We have responsibilities towards our English-speaking citizens and we intend to assume them without any second thought. This is the Canadian duality.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I would like the senator to explain to me — and therefore to the million French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec — how we should feel, as non-Quebecers, who were here in Canada before you and who consider ourselves at home in Canada, but who fear the consequences of a split in this beautiful country of ours. What would happen to us, a million Francophones scattered here and there, without the French base that Quebec is?

Can you explain why the Allaire report, two or three years ago, became the policy of the Quebec Liberal Party? You can shake your head as much as you like; I saw the convention on television. People such as Claude Ryan and other federalists were not even allowed to challenge that report.

That report also gained the support of the Liberal Party at its annual meeting, in the presence of Premier Bourassa. How do you explain that to Canadians outside of Quebec?

Senator Rivest: First, the Allaire report is no longer the Liberal Party's official policy. I do not know if your television set stayed on long enough — You saw one convention, but another convention was held after that one. I did not mention it because I do not wish to take up too much of the Senate's time.

One must not forget, however, that there was this element of rejection, and I understand the senator's concerns. Among other things, the rejection of the Meech Lake accord was not without its repercussions on the federalist cause in Quebec. Those who, in Canada, worked against the Meech Lake accord, in good faith no doubt, could not have avoided thinking about certain consequences.

The first consequence is the fact that there are about 50 members from the Bloc in the House of Commons. The second consequence is that, since the rejection of the Meech Lake accord in Quebec, the federalist vote has declined and the vote in favour of sovereignty has become what can be read in the polls. That all started with the Meech Lake accord. Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier Bourassa, as Quebecers, tried with their heart and soul to convince all Canadians that the Quebec input into the Canadian federation implied the recognition of the distinctiveness of Quebec society, and when again some other Canadians viewed federalism differently, they did not care about the consequences their action would have. Therefore, if there were consequences, do not blame us: blame those who rejected the Meech Lake accord.

Senator Thériault: There is confusion again. Senator Rivest, long before the Meech Lake accord, a separatist government was elected in Quebec. That government refused to sign the 1982 agreement when all the polls showed that 75 per cent of Quebecers were for it. There were some nationalists in the National Assembly, and the separatists refused because you wanted to play petty politics.

Senator Rivest: Honourable senators, I do not want to continue this debate because this kind of talk is likely to show complete ignorance of the Quebec political reality and of Quebec's concerns. My honourable friend again returns to 1982. Together with two colleagues here today, I was a member of the National Assembly then. We never voted for the Parti Québécois. We are not for Quebec separation; we are not for Quebec sovereignty. We want a Quebec that asserts itself within Canada.

However, in the National Assembly we voted against the unilateral repatriation of the Constitution, and in that we shared the concerns of Jean Lesage at the time of the Fulton-Favreau formula; we shared the concerns of Daniel Johnson, senior, who was a federalist, and of Jean-Jacques Bertrand, who was a federalist, and of Claude Ryan, whom you just quoted, and who led our fight for Canada at that time.

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, would my honourable colleague allow me to ask him a question? I listened to Senator Rivest's remarkable contribution. He reflected with tremendous eloquence this feeling which is widely shared by Quebecers who want their National Assembly to have real powers affecting their own identity. I agree with everything that Senator Rivest has said. Federalism is the dividing up of internal sovereignty. The provincial legislatures must be sovereign in the fields that affect them. What I would like to say frankly, is that since 1867, Quebec, because of its specific identity, has never expressed as clearly as now what contribution it wants to make in order to contribute to this country's political process.

I agree with my honourable friend that Quebec must have jurisdiction over specific areas but Quebecers, Albertans and Canadians from all of the other provinces must one day start telling each other what they will do to deserve to belong to this country.

Let us forget Quebec for a moment. During the Charlottetown negotiations, the central government put on the table a proposal calling for a lowering of interprovincial non-tariff barriers. It was known that 95 per cent of the Canadian population was in favour of this proposal. The ten provincial premiers each thought about their own position, then rejected the proposal, arguing that it would prevent them from passing legislation in certain areas. In other words, when push comes to shove, regional interests always win out over national interests.

In my view, the real test of a country's political maturity is when a person, whether he resides in the Gaspé region, the Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean region, the Abitibi region or northeastern New Brunswick, can stand up and admit that while he feels a deep sense of attachment to his province, the good of the country must come first.

Senator Rivest has said that Quebec should be sovereign in the area of health. I agree, but at the same time I figure that I am a part of this country. I am in favour of the free movement of people among provinces. While having our own Ministry of Health in Quebec, which has a big say in the program format, is it not also in order for us to think of ourselves as part of a larger group, and thus for social benefits to be portable.

Much as I agree with Senator Rivest on the need to have a national assembly in Quebec which would have the power to shape and reflect our distinctiveness, I cannot help but think that the time will come when we must say what we are prepared to do as a part of this larger group.

Senator Rivest: We have done a lot. On the subject of job training for instance, the first thing Senator De Bané mentioned was non-tariff barriers. Recently, the Minister of Industry and Commerce in this government signed an agreement with New Brunswick and with Ontario which included the use of non-tariff barriers. With respect to health insurance, the honourable senator talked about the history of the creation of the Canadian health system. At that time, Quebec agreed with all of its partners that this system would be universal, free and portable.

In the Meech Lake accord we agreed to minimum — and obvious — standards that any modern society must set for itself in the area of job training. Again, Quebec can agree freely, as can the other provinces, because the problem is the same everywhere.

I am delighted to see that my speech has sparked so much discussion. Basically, when it comes to areas which are essential to Quebec society as a minority group — which is why we opted for a federal system in the first place — with respect to programs and other things that must be shared, and increasingly so, due to the realities of our times, we do not want those things to be imposed upon us unilaterally by the federal bureaucracy, just because it has the spending power.

We want mature government, and I am speaking not only as a Quebecer here. Why do you think the Reform Party won so many seats in the Parliament of Canada at the last election? It was because decisions were being made in Central Canada that were not compatible with the best interest of the people of Alberta.

Quebec is not asking for anything different. This is the reality of a federal state. If we take the reasoning of Senator De Bané to the limit — and I will end on that note by saying that what he is saying bothers me, just as much as what I am saying bothers him — why not just have a unitarian state, where everyone could share the same ambitions? I exaggerate, of course, because I know this is not what you want. However, if we are to have a federal system the power must be shared, and we would have means and mechanisms to ensure that interdependent and complementary activities are managed more efficiently than in the past, so that Canada can function more effectively.

Senator De Bané: If you will allow me a last comment, honourable senators, I would say, let us get to the bottom of this. In the past, when I heard Mr. Duplessis talking about going to Ottawa to get the loot, or Mr. Bourassa argue for profitable federalism, it made me feel uncomfortable.

If someone from the Mauricie area, the Outaouais, the Gaspé, the Bois-Francs, Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean or the North Shore were to say, "I belong to Quebec because I represent 6 per cent of the population but the Government of Quebec buys 10 per cent of what it needs from us," I hardly think you would approve.

That is how a country operates. We belong to Canada, not because we will bring home the loot or pick up our cheques, or because of the benefits, but because this country represents certain values in which we believe. If I loved this country only for what it could do for me, that would be akin to what some psychologists call "parasitic love" such as when a child loves his parents because they give him more than do the people next door. It is time we thought about what we can do, not just as Quebecers but as citizens of each and every province, to be worthy of a country that is the envy of the entire world.

Senator Rivest: Honourable senators, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies to Quebec and is accepted by all Quebecers. It expresses the Canadian values which Quebecers support wholeheartedly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am starting to think that we are getting into another debate altogether. However, there are times when, unless there is a request for interrupting the debate, I am inclined to let some very stimulating discussions take their course. I am sorry the press was not here to listen to the debate. In any case, I have the impression that we will get back to this question, because I saw too many heads either nodding assent, or otherwise, to interpret this as a request for silence. I am inclined to think that there was a desire to participate in the debate. That being said, I assume that Senator Rivest has finished what he had to say, and that there will be no more questions, so we will go on to the next speaker.

[English]

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable senators, I do not believe my comments will bring forth any debate from anyone, because they will be very mild and benign.

Your Honour, I want first of all to congratulate you. You have had, and continue to have, a very long and distinguished parliamentary career, being a veteran of 22 years in the House of Commons and 10 years in this chamber.

For six of the twelve years that I was the Premier of Nova Scotia, I knew firsthand of your very positive contributions to this country and to your area in your portfolios of Fisheries, the Environment and Public Works. On many occasions I did not entirely agree with you on policy statements, but I suggest that, overall, we did have agreements of many kinds in your various portfolios. I, with other members of the Senate, look forward to your impartial judgments and decisions as Speaker of this upper chamber.

May I also congratulate the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Fairbairn, whom I met for the first time about 16 years ago when she was a young girl working in the offices of the then Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau. I met Senator Fairbairn at the first federal-provincial conference that I attended as Premier of Nova Scotia in 1978. I wish her well as she takes on the various and onerous responsibilities of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I also congratulate the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, Senator John Lynch-Staunton, who brings to this chamber a vast experience in municipal politics, business, and community affairs, not to mention his experience latterly as Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate.

As I look around this Senate, I am struck by the fact that there is a vast amount of experience in this chamber. Many of us forget that from time to time, but some of our senators were formerly members of the House of Commons or of other legislatures, and their parliamentary experience ranges from four years to over 30 years. That is a lot of legislative experience to draw on. I sometimes wonder if we really are using that legislative experience to the best of our ability as we look at the problems of this country.

We also have in this Senate people experienced in business, labour, agriculture, the professions, and the fishing industry. You name the field, and there is experience in it here. I believe over the next number of years we can utilize that experience in the interests of this country, and in the interests of ensuring that the Senate plays an important role in the constitutional and economic life of this country.

I also congratulate the new Government of Canada and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien on their election victory. However, I will not congratulate the new government for that budget yesterday; I will have something to say about that on another day. That budget did very little for Atlantic Canada. In fact, as someone said this morning, it is a good thing the Prime Minister gave the Minister of Finance a pair of boots, because Atlantic Canada really did get a boot in that budget yesterday. However, that is for another day.

I do want to say a few words about the mandate given to the Prime Minister, the government and his party. It was a strong mandate; but the government must have a strong mandate from the people of Canada, because the future of this country will be determined by the government's actions, together with the actions of the other members of Parliament and the actions, yes, of the members of the Senate, over the next four years. The years ahead will not be easy for this country. In fact, the years ahead will determine the course that this country will be taking in the future.

Honourable senators, I have a few words to say about the constitutional dilemma in which this country finds itself at the present time. This is not from the perspective of members who have spoken here this afternoon from Quebec, but it will be, I believe, the perspective of people in Nova Scotia and generally in Atlantic Canada.

Having been involved in public life for 27 years and having participated in every federal-provincial conference from 1978 to 1990, I want to speak this afternoon about the future of this country and how that future will affect Atlantic Canada. The Atlantic provinces will be very much affected by what happens vis-à-vis Quebec and the Constitution. This country today is at a crossroads: we can either stay still, go ahead, or break up. We can either become stronger or much weaker.

If this country becomes fractured as a result of a Quebec separation, I believe that Atlantic Canada is the part of Canada that will suffer the most. About five years ago I was asked what would happen to Atlantic Canada in the event of a constitutional separation of Quebec. I repeated something that had been said back in 1970 as well as back in the early 1960s by Atlantic Canadian politicians. First, we could continue to be part of this country, fractured as it might be; second, we in the Atlantic provinces could form our own country; or, third, we could become part of the United States.

Of course that latter comment of mine was the one that hit the headlines, and it was said that I advocated that the Atlantic provinces join the United States. I did not say any such thing. I said that was one of the three options. Those are the only three options open to Atlantic Canada. You can see that both the historic debate and the present debate about the Constitution and Quebec's place in the Constitution are very important to Atlantic Canada.

Being an optimist, I do not believe that there will be a breakup of this country; however, we cannot blithely sit back and just allow it to happen. We must make sure that it does not happen. For the next two years we must ensure to the best of our ability that Canada does not break up.

From 1978 to 1981, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, as Prime Minister, and the ten premiers of Canada worked tirelessly to set up a new direction for this country. We had as our goal at that time the patriation of the Constitution, the addition of a charter of rights, and methods of amending the Constitution of Canada. I was very proud to have been a part of those negotiations.

Many Canadians think that the process and its result, the Queen signing the new Constitution in 1982, was a total success. Unfortunately, it was not a total success. The Prime Minister signed and nine premiers signed, but Quebec, which is comprised of some seven million people within this country, was not part of that constitutional accord. I do not intend to get into a discussion about that now, but I was there. I can tell you that there were many reasons why Quebec did not sign. I shall leave that for another day. History will record the reasons why that signing did not occur.

However, from that time to the present, we have had continual discussions about the Constitution vis-à-vis Quebec. There are those who say the reason for the failure of the 1981 accord was the fact that a separatist government was in power in Quebec. There are others who say that different approaches could have been taken to bring Quebec into the fold, even though René Lévesque and the Parti Québécois were in power. History will determine why that did not occur.

We find ourselves again in the situation that we have had in this country for so many years. From 1981 to 1985, there was very little activity vis-à-vis Quebec and the Constitution.

In 1984, Premier Robert Bourrassa brought his five points to the premiers' conference in Edmonton. We were pleasantly surprised. Those five requests, not demands but five requests, for changes in the Constitution were reasonable and well thought out, and immediately the nine other premiers and the Prime Minister indicated tentative approval of those requests.

There are those who say that the negotiations to finalize the so-called Meech Lake accord were carried out under pressure and time restraints. That is absolutely incorrect; not true at all. For over one year there were discussions between the Prime Minister and the premiers. Many meetings with officials were held during the period from 1986 to 1987, culminating in the historic initialling of the document at Meech Lake called the Meech Lake accord. Quebec was at that time a partner with all the provinces and the federal government.

Further negotiations on the so-called legal text continued until late spring of 1987, when we concluded the accord. Unfortunately, and I stress the word "unfortunately," there was a three-year waiting period before it could be finalized on June 23, 1990.

I want to set something else straight. There are many who say that the three-year lag was a result of the Meech Lake accord. That is not true at all. The three-year lag was included in the Constitutional Accord of 1982, not 1987 or 1990. During that three-year period, there were changes in governments in Canada, primarily in Newfoundland and in New Brunswick. It is partly as a result of those changes that the Meech Lake accord failed. What happened on June 23, 1990, is now history. The judgment of history in years to come will record why the Meech Lake accord failed on that date. It was certainly not because of the week-long negotiations.

There are many who say that the Meech Lake accord failed because of pressures, time constraints and the fact that ten premiers and the Prime Minister were enclosed in a room for 10 to 12 hours a day for a whole week and, under that pressure, decided to sign the documents. That is completely untrue; that is not correct at all. I was there, and there was no such pressure.

In fact, if one wants to talk about pressure, we can look back to 1980 and 1981. In that same room in the Conference Centre and in another room in the Langevin Block, we were with Prime Minister Trudeau for 10 and 12 hours a day for four or five days, including one period over a weekend. I recall that well, because on the Sunday of that weekend we took a break, and the Nova Scotia delegation, along with some delegates from New Brunswick, went for a delightful boat ride on the Canal. Therefore the same thing occurred in 1980-81 as occurred in 1990; that is, intense negotiations for many hours for almost a whole week. I believed then, as I do now, that the Meech Lake accord was good for Canada, was good for Quebec and good for the whole country. If it had been approved in 1990, we would not be facing the tragic dilemma in which this country finds itself today.

The accord at that time stated in very simple terms that Quebec represents a distinct society within Canada. Certainly, other sections of the accord — for example, changes in some of our institutions, such as our immigration laws — were important but the focus was on the distinct society clause; much misunderstood by many people but certainly not misunderstood by the premiers, the negotiators and the members of our legislatures who approved it.

If you break the expression down to its lowest common denominator, "distinct society" simply means that Quebec is distinct within Canadian society. We all know that. The rule of law there is different from the rest of the country — the Civil Code versus the common law, and the rule of law is the basis of our society. No one will dispute that the language of Quebec is distinct as compared to that of the rest of the country, as is Quebec culture.

A vast majority of the people of Nova Scotia responded at that time "Yes, Quebec does represent a distinct society within Canada." As honourable senators know, Quebec has been considered a distinct society in this country since it was founded, and beyond that before 1867. All we were doing was putting into the written Constitution that which we had practised for years in this country. In the words of then premier David Peterson, "Every schoolgirl and every schoolboy in the country understood that, and had understood it for years."

Honourable senators, here we are again. The Meech Lake accord failed for various reasons. The Charlottetown agreement failed because, in my opinion, it was too broad. There was too much within that accord. Now, and for the next two years, the pressure will be stronger in Quebec. I am not from Quebec but I know people there, and people in this chamber and in the House of Commons from Quebec.

There is no question that the pressure will be stronger than it was in the 1970s, the 1980s and the early 1990s. It is because we may soon have a separatist provincial government in Quebec, as well as the party that is now the official opposition in the House of Commons, consisting of 54 members who are separatists. In other words, we have a double "whammy" facing us at the present time. In 1980 we had René Lévesque and the Parti Québécois. Today we have Lucien Bouchard and Jacques Parizeau. I do not know what the outcome of the provincial election will be, but it appears at the present time that we will end up with a Parti Québécois government. The pressure will, therefore, be extremely great over the next number of years.

This unique and strange situation in which this country finds itself, where the Leader of the Official Opposition in the Parliament of Canada wants to break the country up, is something that people from outside our country do not understand. I have a friend in New Hampshire who is a senator, and he has asked me if it is true that the Canadian government and the Canadian people are paying people to break up the country. The simple answer is "Yes, that is exactly what is happening." That is a strange and unique situation, but there are people who say that this is a strange and unique country. We failed in 1981, 1990 and 1992 with all of these accords to bring this country together and to settle the constitutional issues relating to Quebec and its place in Confederation.

Honourable colleagues —

Senator Frith: That is better.

Senator Buchanan: I knew you would like that.

— I believe I speak for everyone in this chamber when I say that we must do our part in assisting the Government of Canada and the ten provincial and territorial governments to ensure that when and if the referendum comes in Quebec, there will be a resounding "no" to separation by the people of the province of Quebec. Our job is to assist the nationalists — the federalists in the province of Quebec to make sure that happens.

•(1600)

Senator Frith: You had better be careful, senator. A nationalist in Quebec does not mean a federalist.

Senator Buchanan: I am sorry; I meant federalist.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You can be a Quebec nationalist and a federalist.

Senator Frith: I say the word in general currency. I agree with you. I do not know why, but it seems that the word in general currency means a separatist.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Senator Grafstein's definition does not fit.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the honourable senator that he may want to conclude his remarks.

Senator Buchanan: I shall, but there have been a few interventions. That gives me more time.

I wish to say that this may be our last opportunity. We may have spent the course on this situation. I urge everyone in this chamber to work as hard as they can to ensure that the federalist cause is championed in Quebec.

Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about free trade and NAFTA. I supported free trade; I consented to it on behalf of the people of Nova Scotia. I have heard comments in this chamber over the last number of weeks about free trade and its effect on Canada. However, I should like to say this: If it had not been for former Prime Minister Mulroney bringing forth the free trade agreement with the United States, we would be in much worse shape economically in the Atlantic provinces than we are today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buchanan: Seventy-five per cent of everything produced and manufactured in Nova Scotia, for instance, is exported. Over 60 per cent of that is exported to the United States.

Senator Frith: And was before the agreement.

Senator Buchanan: We would have to be foolish not to agree with free trade, and that is why I consented to it back in 1988.

Senator Perrault: Including the export of jobs!

Senator Buchanan: No, not the export of jobs at all; rather, the saving of jobs during a recession. That is what free trade did: It saved jobs in Nova Scotia. We are now on the threshold of creating new jobs with NAFTA.

I am pleased to say, honourable senators, and I know you are as well, that the present Prime Minister, Jean Chrétien, agreed with the NAFTA agreement because NAFTA will also open up new opportunities for Nova Scotia in the fishing industry, the pulp and paper industry, the car industry, the steel industry, and the coal industry as tariffs come down. Opportunities are present for people to create new jobs and preserve existing jobs.

By way of conclusion, I wish to thank former Prime Minister Brian Mulroney for bringing those two agreements to Canada; agreements which will preserve jobs, create new jobs and put Canada in the forefront of new opportunities in job creation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I want to congratulate the sponsors of the motion for an Address in reply to his Excellency the Governor General's speech. Their speeches strongly launched our debate, a sign that this session will be most positive.

[English]

If I might build upon what my colleague has just said, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney made a promise to the people of Chatham that CFB Chatham would never be closed. He kept his promise. We note the promise made by the present Prime Minister with reference to CFB Cornwallis.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, nevertheless we recognize that on October 25, 1993, the Liberal Party won a splendid victory. Canadians living in all regions of our nation voted for change. Canadians in Atlantic Canada voted for change.

Senator Comeau: They got it!

Senator Kinsella: I would hope the boot that Atlantic Canadians received yesterday in the speech from the Minister of Finance is not reflective of the fact that only one Progressive Conservative member of the House of Commons comes from Atlantic Canada and all the others members of Parliament from that region are members of the Liberal Party.

Surely, it is incumbent upon the Liberal Party and the new government to pursue its agenda. That is the agenda that was presented to the people of Canada, an agenda which, according to its election program, is premised on an integrated and coherent approach to economic policy, social policy, environmental policy, and foreign policy.

Honourable senators, much has been said about the desire to make Parliament work better. Part of Parliament, of course, is this chamber. Many of us here in the Senate share the view that we need a Senate that works because the country needs a Senate that works. The country needs institutions to bring us together, to help build a common sense of citizenship. The type of assault such as that levelled at this chamber not too long ago by the recently seated deputy speaker of the other place should no longer go unchallenged. Perhaps His Honour may wish to enlighten those in the other chamber. The time has come for this chamber and the work we do in this chamber to challenge the mistruths, the abuse, and the mythology that has been allowed to go unchallenged about this institution.

Honourable senators, I have argued before that the practice of freedom in Canada has been a grand success. It is my hypothesis that our success and freedom is directly related to the institution of parliamentary democracy that has grown here and for the past 126 years has worked well, notwithstanding the problems that any democracy has.

The burden rests on those who wish to change or to mock the institutions of Parliament: the three parts of Parliament: the Crown, the Senate and the House of Commons. I believe that our system has a proven record, and the time has come for us to stand up and challenge those who mock this institution.

Honourable senators, we shall be open to creative ideas. We should also be open to creative ideas for the renewal of the Senate from within. I wish to suggest that we go forward with some of the very good ideas about Senate renewal that have been circulating over the past several months, some of which our colleague Senator Oliver outlined in his speech. He specifically recommended that the Leader of the Government in the Senate review and reply to the idea of an all-chamber committee on renewal — a renewal which does not entail constitutional amendment, but a renewal from within. Perhaps changes to our rules would be appropriate or, if need be, amendments to the Parliament of Canada Act.

Honourable senators, our responsibilities on this side are weighty. Our purpose is to respect the will of the majority in the elected body of Parliament. Our purpose is to make government possible, and obstructing the will of the people as reflected in the membership of the House of Commons is no solution to anything. We need government that works, and works better; not government that cannot work at all.

Our leader, Senator John Lynch-Staunton, has said that we have a job to do in the overall effort to make our institutions as responsible and credible in the eyes of Canadians as we can. I agree with Senator Lynch-Staunton, and as I begin my tenure as the Conservative whip, I pledge to all honourable senators my full cooperation and, in particular, my collaborative cooperation with Senator Hébert. From time to time we will make a special effort to ensure that he has a quorum when a quorum is needed.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne was read in this chamber. The Prime Minister delivered a more detailed blueprint of the government's agenda during the debate in the House of Commons. Yesterday, we had the blueprint brought forward by the Minister of Finance.

As far as the statement from the Prime Minister and the outline in the Speech from the Throne is concerned, I wish to congratulate the government. However, I must reserve judgment on yesterday's speech for another time. The intentions as set out in the Speech from the Throne and in what the Prime Minister said in the House were noble. Certainly, there were measures that I can support; measures to stimulate economic growth through an innovative economy; measures to encourage skills development and knowledge to meet the demands of the new job market; measures to help sustain people through difficult times; and measures to enhance the confidence of Canadians in their public institutions and in the political process. Although hardly new ideas, they are worthy of serious consideration, and should command the support of all honourable senators.

For example, reference was made to proposing measures to combat racism and hate crime. I am sure, honourable senators, that the new government does not wish to ignore the progress achieved over the past few years in combating racism and creating understanding of cultural and ethnic differences in Canada. We all will recall that, under Prime Minister Mulroney, in 1988 the government initiated the Race Relations and Cross-Cultural Understanding Program. Through the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, every March 21 Canadians are educated about the nature, scope and impact of discrimination.

In 1990, under Prime Minister Mulroney's leadership, the government established the Excellence in Race Relations Awards, which are presented to individuals and organizations who have shown exemplary leadership in their pursuit of greater equality and understanding among Canada's diverse peoples.

In 1992, Prime Minister Mulroney provided leadership for the establishment of the Canadian Police Race Relations Centre to help police forces across the country with special training initiatives.

Honourable senators, we all must work together to eliminate racism in Canada. Every individual, every community group, and every level of government must do its part to improve relations among Canadians of different colours and creeds. This is why I am pleased that Prime Minister Chrétien's government not only will proclaim the Canadian Race Relations Foundations Act, which was passed by Parliament during the second term of the Conservative administration, but also that yesterday, during his speech, Mr. Martin said that funds will be sought for that centre. The Canadian Race Relations Foundation's role is to conduct research and raise public awareness, and includes helping business, labour, government, and public and private institutions to be more responsive to Canada's multicultural nature.

With reference to the government's announced intention to propose amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act, this, honourable senators, in my view, is a welcome commitment. I trust, however, that when it drafts these proposed amendments to the Human Rights Act, the government will take guidance from Bill S-15 which, as you will recall, was passed by the Senate during the last Parliament.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne proposes measures to improve the literacy skills of Canadians. I am proud of the foundation established by the previous government in recognizing the importance of literacy in Canada. In 1987, we became the first federal government to recognize literacy as a national concern by creating the National Literacy Secretariat. I am delighted that the new government's commitment to improving literacy is firm, and I will certainly support the measures to improve the literacy of Canadians and will lend cooperation to the honourable minister with responsibility who sits in this chamber.

It occurs to me that the themes in the Throne Speech are, to paraphrase a newspaper headline at the time on another subject, "lots of round bits but no substance about where Canada is heading...". This is regrettable. At least, it is regrettable if that is the perception. It must be a major disappointment to millions of Canadians.

The government's blueprint essentially tinkers around the edges and scarcely addresses the fundamental issues affecting our country's future. The government appears not to have a plan for real and lasting economic growth. Nowhere does the government set out an integrated and coherent approach to tax policy, trade policy, and to creating real, lasting, quality jobs and economic opportunities.

During the election campaign, the government party's central message was "creating opportunity." This message was taken at face value by Canadians, particularly by Canadians living in Atlantic Canada, a region where the challenges are more acute and the need for action is critical. This, honourable senators, is why what happened yesterday is so tragic in many ways for Atlantic Canada.

Atlantic Canada is experiencing major, wrenching change. We are living in a place, and in a time, characterized by painful crises in the fisheries and restructuring in our traditional resource industries of forestry, mining and agriculture. Atlantic Canadians know better than anyone the harsh reality of unemployment, the pain it brings to families and communities. It seems to me, honourable senators, without being partisan and political, that there was a vast misunderstanding of this dynamic of social life in Atlantic Canada when one considers the impact of the government's budget proposals affecting unemployment upon Atlantic Canadians. I know that many of my colleagues opposite from Atlantic Canada will have to struggle with that measure in order to be able to support it.

If the challenge Atlantic Canada presents was urgent the day before yesterday, is certainly is more urgent today. The level of unemployment in that region is 50 per cent higher than that of the rest of the country. Their level of income is 30 per cent lower than the Canadian average. Performance on research and development there is 29 per cent lower than the national average. They have a declining share of Canadian exports, and a trade deficit with the rest of Canada which stands at $5.6 billion a year.

The government will have to come to grips with the embracing on the one hand — and I believe rightly so — of NAFTA and, on the other, the decision which is on hold and which the cabinet will have to deal with, affecting the abandonment of the CP rail line from Saint John, New Brunswick, through the State of Maine to Sherbrooke and Montreal.

In terms of infrastructure, if Atlantic Canada is to participate in NAFTA and the free trade agreement, the trade is north-south. The line that carries our goods north-south is the line CP manages which goes from Saint John to Vanceboro, Maine. This is not the kind of infrastructure that should be abandoned if we are to participate in north-south trade.

Honourable senators, this is the context for the government's new approach to regional development; an approach which, according to its election program, will be based on developing forms for economic cooperation, joint action and integrated development, whatever that may mean. What the government's approach does not set out, in my view, is a coherent action plan. What it does not do is provide hope and opportunity for putting Atlantic Canadians back to work.

The people of Chatham, New Brunswick, only see 1,000 jobs being lost, and one would want to see a very quick and clear response to new initiatives, if indeed there are new initiatives for that region of Atlantic Canada. Atlantic Canadians are developing, surely, a strong consensus as to what can work in the future and what does not work today. The government must reach beyond the rhetoric of its blueprint and adopt the dynamic approach to economic development in our region.

The Atlantic premiers — and I salute the premier of my own province of New Brunswick — have gone a long way in their efforts to address the region's challenges. They have embarked upon a dynamic approach to economic cooperation —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I regret to interrupt the honourable senator, but his time has elapsed. Perhaps, with the permission of honourable senators, he may have consent to conclude.

Senator Stewart: Why don't we just change the rule and stop this foolish nonsense of having to waive it every time?

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps I could make a suggestion for unanimous approval that, with respect to the rule that limits interventions to 15 minutes, Your Honour not interrupt. Then if any senator wishes to call time on a colleague, he or she may rise and call time, and then Your Honour can intervene.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am in your hands with respect to the rules and how they are applied at the moment. I have no difficulty with the idea that changes might be made. I always hesitate to interrupt an honourable senator when he or she is speaking. I usually look to see if the senator has a page or a page and a half to complete, and then try to be a little permissive. I am, of course, in the hands of honourable senators, and I always interrupt with great hesitation.

Senator Kinsella: I shall attempt to sum up, honourable senators.

Indeed, on the basis of the Speech from the Throne, there are many elements that I support, and I know that my colleague Senator Beaudoin will join me in expressing some pleasure at the restoration of the Court Challenges Program.

In terms of the focus that I was attempting to give to Atlantic Canada and the economic challenges facing our region, the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister's speech, and certainly Mr. Martin's speech, does not provide a great deal of guidance as to an action plan or proposals for a specific action to confront the Atlantic region's overall challenges. The federal government is, and must be, a major player and a major contributor to the Atlantic economy. Atlantic Canadians expect no less and, as a right of citizenship, deserve no less.

Honourable senators, I wish to comment briefly on the government's infrastructure program, but I will limit myself to saying that if swift agreement could be reached over the next few weeks, on the twinning of the Trans-Canada Highway through the province of New Brunswick, it would receive a great deal of support from those people living in the province of New Brunswick.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, perhaps I might pose a question to the honourable senator.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Corbin: I do not want to touch on the Trans-Canada Highway issue.

Senator Murray: Why not?

Senator Corbin: Why not? I did not seem to get much support in the previous Parliament. Every time I raised questions, I got delayed answer upon delayed answer. I am sure my government will do something about it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Form a task force?

Senator Corbin: In that sense, we may join our efforts.

My question deals with the following, and I would like to pick Senator Kinsella's brain for a minute, while reserving the right to debate the matter in a more formal way at some later date.

In the course of his speech, Senator Kinsella used the expression "Atlantic Canada" — the people from "Atlantic Canada". He spoke of "Atlantic premiers" and so forth. Under the Constitution, I do not recognize an entity which is referred to by just about everybody else in this place as "Atlantic Canada." Is there an Atlantic Quebec? I do not think so.

Under the Constitution, the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland are distinct entities. In some echelons of our federal bureaucracy there has been a trend to always refer to the easternmost provinces as "Atlantic Canada." I do not buy that. I do not know under what rationale my colleague Senator Kinsella expressed that. I like to identify myself as a senator for New Brunswick, which is my proper title.

I wonder if Senator Kinsella intends to continue using that expression. When referring to the Chatham Air Base, he locates it in Atlantic Canada; it is very much in New Brunswick. I would not want to be the only one to rise in this house and defend the rights and the history of New Brunswick, so I am picking his brain and I would like a reaction.

Senator Kinsella: I thank you, honourable senator. The research that I did in preparing my remarks was based on data provided by the Atlantic Canada Economic Council, which covers the provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and from the Association of Atlantic Universities, which represents the universities in those four provinces. The data that is available from Statistics Canada is presented in such a fashion that one can draw together the data that is identifying those four provinces.

Senator Corbin: Would my honourable colleague suggest, then, that we should bring forth and support an amendment to get rid of the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland and create a new province called Atlantic Canada? Is that what we are heading into? I am not buying it.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, in reply to that question, no, I would not advocate that.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE POLICY

PROPOSED SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons requesting that a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider Canada's defence policy.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(d), I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat:

That the committee be composed of eleven members of the House of Commons and five members of the Senate;

That, notwithstanding Rule 86(1)(b), the members to act on behalf of the Senate on the committee be the Honourable Senators De Bané, Forrestall, Kenny, Meighen and Sylvain;

That the committee have the power to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and abroad and that, when deemed necessary, the required staff accompany the committee;

That a quorum of the committee be nine members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both houses are represented and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, whenever six members are present, so long as both houses are represented;

That the committee or its representatives meet on occasions it deems fitting with the parliamentary committee or its representatives charged with reviewing Canada's foreign policy;

That notwithstanding the usual practices of this house, if the Senate is not sitting when an interim or final report of the committee is completed, the committee shall report to the Clerk of the Senate and that it shall thereupon be deemed to have been laid upon the Table;

That the committee present its final report no later than September 30, 1994; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: I will stand firm concerning the initiative proposed by the Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the honourable senator rising to take part in the debate on this issue?

Senator Prud'homme: On this issue, on the proposal that you have just put forward in the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Leader of the Government.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am pleased to rise today to speak on this motion. It is the first stage of this chamber's involvement in what I am sure we all agree is an overdue and timely review of Canada's defence policy. The special joint committee created with this motion will be one of the major means by which Canadians in every part of the country will have the opportunity to be consulted and to have their say on defence matters. The committee will hold hearings in different parts of Canada. It is hoped that it will report no later than September 30 of this year.

While the government will be monitoring the hearings of that committee, we intend to study the report and the recommendations very closely. As the Minister of National Defence indicated in the House of Commons last week, the report will play a major role in preparing the government's response to the discussion. That response will be in the form of a white paper on defence issues, which we anticipate should be completed a few months after the committee report, possibly by the end of this year, which I believe is the objective of the minister.

Honourable senators, we need to review and rethink defence policy now for many reasons, not the least of which is the fact that the world has changed dramatically in the past few years. It has, perhaps, become less dangerous in terms of the nuclear threat we lived under for the 40 years of the Cold War, but the world has also grown more complex. There seems to be tentative hope, but nonetheless hope, for peace in certain traditional trouble spots such as the Middle East and some parts of Central America. However, new areas of conflict and confrontation continue to leap out at us from the television screen almost every night — Bosnia, Somalia, the former Soviet Union, Liberia, Sudan and other places. As developments in Iraq, Iran and North Korea suggest, the threat of weapons proliferation still exists.

These new realities compel us to come up with the most helpful and realistic response. Reviewing the goals of our defence policy and the role of our armed forces at home and abroad is clearly a first step. The most basic of those roles is, of course, to defend Canada and to affirm our sovereignty. That is a constant and unchanging mission which has taken on a different dimension with the ending of the Cold War.

Defence policy must also take account of other vital domestic roles. Our armed forces provide search and rescue services off our coasts. They are also a line of defence against illegal drug shipments and illegal fishing, and respond to natural disasters and other emergencies. We also cooperate closely with the United States in the defence of North America, going back to 1940 to the Ogdensburg Agreement which was signed by Prime Minister Mackenzie King and then President Roosevelt.

Since 1958, with the NORAD agreement, we have cooperated in defending the air approaches to this continent. We are also linked by a tradition of bilateral cooperation in such areas as intelligence sharing, defence production and research and development. These arrangements met the requirements of the time, and they have evolved since then. However, like every other aspect of our policy, they need to be reviewed where necessary, and to be adapted to current needs.

Our defence involvement also extends beyond North America to the collective defence of the North Atlantic community. As a founding member of NATO, we have always played an active role in its affairs, and continue very much to do so in these troubling days. As NATO evolves and changes, we need to consider how Canada's role within that organization may alter in the coming years. We must also consider Canada's role in the wider world beyond this continent, and beyond the North Atlantic Alliance.

Since 1945, our support for the United Nations has been a pillar of Canadian foreign policy. We have always viewed the United Nations as the world's best hope for peace. Our contribution to that organization has been concrete and significant. In the past 45 years, more than 100,000 Canadians have served as peace-keepers at various trouble spots around the globe — a record with respect to which every one of us has a right to be proud.

As we see a rise in regional conflicts, there is every reason to believe that the demand for new peace-keeping missions will increase. As that demand increases, so does the complexity of the mission.

For example, in the 1950s the typical peace-keeping mission was the monitoring of a cease-fire. Today, no mission is typical. Today's peace-keeping missions are likely to involve the delivery of humanitarian aid, the establishment of safe havens for refugees, the monitoring of an election, or the shifting and difficult demands we see every day in the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. We need to look at the nature and responsibilities involved in peace-keeping as it is today and as it is likely to be in the future. We must decide upon our role in that process, examine the ground rules for involvement and decide what our forces need in order to be effective.

Last, but certainly not least, we must examine our priorities in terms of what we can and cannot afford. We do not have the money to do everything. As we look at expenditures on equipment, training and other items, we must avoid both being excessive and running short. It can be a somewhat precarious balancing act, and the choices are always difficult and complicated. The process that we are about to undertake will help greatly in determining how we can target our resources most effectively.

While we are discussing a review of our defence operations, we must also bear in mind other immediate demands that require tough decisions. Here, I am referring to the reductions in defence spending made by the Minister of Finance in his budget yesterday. As he outlined, there are compelling fiscal and structural reasons for the announcements made yesterday. Honourable senators know that we were committed in our election program to significant cuts in defence spending. But as the Minister of Defence has said, there is an equally compelling reason for proceeding with those commitments now. We have in place an infrastructure for a military of about 130,000 personnel, yet today we have just over half that number in our armed forces. There is no doubt that the budget announcement will have important and difficult consequences in regions all across the country.

The government is acutely aware of the need to manage these changes in the most sensitive way possible for the communities and the individual citizens involved. We must also recognize that we owe it to Canadians to try to operate the military in the most efficient and cost effective way possible.

As we are rethinking assumptions, roles and objectives in our defence policy and relating these to our national priorities and our economic limitations, the members of this chamber have an enormous contribution to make. The appointment of the joint committee is in keeping with the best traditions of the parliamentary system. There is a long history of useful cooperation between the two Houses of Parliament on this issue. Between 1982 and 1989, the Subcommittee on National Defence examined and reported on no fewer than six major issues: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces," "Maritime Defence," "Canada's Territorial Air Defence," "Military Air Transport," "Canada's Land Forces" and, most recently, "Peace-keeping."

I mention the history of this place on these issues only by way of saying that I think we have shown clearly and convincingly in the past that we are more than up to this task. I have no doubt whatever that the Senate members of the joint committee will serve it well and will again demonstrate, as Senator Buchanan said this afternoon, that the depth, knowledge and expertise available in this chamber are second to none. Indeed, it is because of that knowledge and that expertise that the Minister of National Defence considers the active participation on the committee of representatives of the Senate to be essential to its success. I look forward to those discussions.

Honourable senators, I also wish to table in both official languages the guidance document that was prepared for the joint committee by the government and was tabled last week in the other place by the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Collenette.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I wish to ask the Leader of the Government a question concerning the decision that has been made to close or reduce some base depots in Canada.

When the policy review takes place, will it not be tantamount to putting the cart before the horse? Should a policy review not be done before decisions are made on the closing of bases? I am not trying to look for a confrontation, but it seems to me that the proper procedure would be to get an appreciation of the whole defence effort before making a decision. The defence review may result in the conclusion that a couple of those base depots are needed. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate clarify that point?

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Marshall, not in recent weeks or months, but over the last couple of years and perhaps even before that, a fairly detailed study was done of the structural needs of the armed forces. It is the view of the government and the minister that these studies are quite separate from the review that he will undertake. Furthermore, while there was an urgency to commence these studies, they will in no way impede or infringe upon the work of the committee.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wish to ask one or two questions. I notice in the motion that "the committee or its representatives are to be authorized to meet on occasions it deems fitting with the parliamentary committee or its representatives charged with reviewing Canada's foreign policy." I repeat: "with the parliamentary committee." Does that mean the committee in the other place? Does it mean the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs? To what is the reference there?

That leads me to what I find a more difficult question, namely, what line is being used to distinguish between defence policy on the one hand and foreign policy on the other hand? Superficially, one would have thought that we would have determined our foreign policy and then followed up by discussing the ways and means of achieving those goals. Senator Fairbairn helped me a bit when she talked about some specific functions that the defence forces perform, which could be included under foreign policy in a broad interpretation of that expression, but which would not normally be thought of as foreign policy — for example, search and rescue, the arrest of illegal drug traders, and so on. That would hardly be foreign policy.

Just for the sake of knowing what this committee intends to do — or what any other committee intends to do — could we get some idea where the line will fall? I am not asking for a precise line. I am asking for at least a fuzzy line to distinguish between the functions of this committee and the other committee to which reference has been made.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Senator Stewart. You never ask easy questions.

In answer to the first question, the language in this motion is really presaging the setting up of a further joint committee. This would be a study and review of our foreign affairs policy. This is expected to take place in the not too distant future. The guidance paper which is available here will perhaps be of some help. Perhaps in every day and age — but particularly so today — there is a tremendous crossover between the two areas. That is one reason why there will be a desire to have the two entities meet from time to time when those areas come particularly close.

The defence review, perhaps, will be a more definable piece than the foreign policy review. That committee will have before it, as I have indicated, very specific decisions on the role of our defence forces, just as much at home in their domestic capacity as in their capacity abroad. However, when the capacity abroad is brought into the equation, it falls very much into that fuzzy area of foreign policy. We know that more than ever today by the dilemma of the pressures on our system caused by the conflicts which have been taking up the attention of our armed forces.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps I could follow up with two short questions. The minister has referred to a special joint committee on foreign policy. What will be left for the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs? It does not necessarily follow that the special joint committee will pre-empt the whole field. However, will the foreign policy committee study, for example, matters of trade? Are those matters being left aside?

That is one question. The other question is one which the minister will appreciate on the day after the budget. The committee is to have power to adjourn from place to place inside Canada and abroad. My question is: Who decides where the money comes from to pay for that travel, particularly the travel abroad?

Senator Fairbairn: In answer to the first question, honourable senators, I do not believe that the work of the special joint committee will in any way leave the Foreign Affairs Committee in the Senate short of a heavy agenda. I do not think there is a committee on either side of Parliament that has taken as precise and intensive a responsibility on the issues of international trade as has the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. This has been true throughout all of the discussion on North American trade.

However, there is another vista out there about which senators from other parts of the country feel just as strongly. That is the necessity for Canada to move beyond North America and into the areas of Asia and the Far East and, indeed, Latin and South America.

I cannot speak for the Minister of Foreign Affairs nor offer the guidelines for his particular study. However, the Senate committee has a very important role to play, and perhaps a role which will not be played so definitively by any other committee of Parliament.

You asked a good question about travelling abroad. Your point is well taken. I will definitely draw your question to the attention of the Minister of National Defence. From conversations with him, my impression is that any forays outside the country would be very narrowly defined for specific visits.

Senator Stewart: The minister will not decide that. He gives the reference: the committee will decide.

Senator Fairbairn: The committee will decide. The areas in which travel was contemplated — might I say that? — would be in the nature of a visit to NORAD, or perhaps a visit to NATO headquarters.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I was greatly impressed by the remarks of the honourable minister, and I congratulate her on the excellent case she made for increasing the armed forces. Did she express those views to the Minister of National Defence before the budget was presented?

Senator Simard: You win some, you lose some.

Senator Fairbairn: I think I will let that one go, Senator Phillips.

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Senator Stewart's question is important in the sense that we need even a fuzzy description of where we begin to draw the line before we start. Has any thought been given to an examination by this joint committee of the approximately 48 agreements, pacts, protocols, letters of understanding or telephone conversations which govern and control the military relationships between Canada and the United States in the long term, in the short term, on a day-to-day, hour-to-hour, need-to-know basis? Or should that more properly be in the hands of a companion joint committee, which you suggest may follow later?

These documents and agreements, protocols and papers, have been built up over a long period of years and have not had the benefit of public scrutiny by any committee, at least not over the past 28 or 30 years during which I have been trying to get the matter out on the table. I would like to ask the leader whether we might contemplate such a study, since the minister, in his guidance to the committee, does refer to our traditional commitment to North American defence and our relationship with the United States. He then deals with whether there ought to be increased or decreased defence arrangements between our two countries, and whether we should re-think the NORAD agreement. That agreement comes up in about two years' time. Should we look at perhaps backing out of it?

It is important that we have some demarcation as we get into this discussion, because it will be rather hollow for us to build a paper for Canada dealing with defence matters and, at the same time, not have a clear understanding of where we stand with respect to our closest neighbour and greatest protector.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Forrestall, I appreciate your point. I would suggest that this is an issue that will be for the committee itself to build on. The signal has been fairly clear in recent weeks. This came up most recently during the discussion in the other place on the question of the cruise missile, which brought in the whole question of the position of NORAD and what the Canadian defence future is. The intention and the desire of the minister is to have this review take a very close look at that whole issue. I would think this would be something within the discussion that the committee will have in setting out its business; something that would be a useful point to discuss.

Senator Prud'homme: I would like to make two points. Honourable senators, I would like to speak about the permission that was granted, notwithstanding rule 58(1)(d), but I will do so later. Now, if I understood correctly, in order to do things in an orderly way, you would like us to ask questions or wait until later. In that case I would have a few questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I must admit the more I listen to their explanations, the more I get confused. I would like to make a very practical suggestion to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, because it may be time for her to ask all of her colleagues to get together on this matter. Honourable senators, I can see the risk of great confusion.

In the past, the House of Commons had a committee called the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and there was no possible confusion. That committee had a chairman, a deputy chairman and members, among whom were Senator Forrestall and myself, and we knew we were free to organize our business in the way we wished. However, in the present case, it is already obvious that the more questions the Leader of the Government answers, the more difficult it becomes to follow the debate on this item.

As I understand it, Senator Stewart is to be the new chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, and we are to have a subcommittee on national defence. In addition, yesterday the Leader of the Government in the Senate informed me that today she would be proposing the setting up of a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Canada's defence polilcy — and it is with pleasure that I readily agree to set aside the rules with respect to that motion. However, in one of her answers, the government leader talked about the probability of setting up a joint committee on foreign affairs. Since we already have a Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and a proposed subcommittee on national defence, I can already visualize the reaction of my friend Jean-Robert Gauthier, chairman of the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and International Trade, and that of Mr. Rompkey, chairman of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs, who is rather sensitive about his authority as chairman,

Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would permit me to make a suggestion: Let all of these chairpersons sit down together and decide who is to do what. Would the government leader be prepared to relay my suggestion to cabinet?

I am not a stubborn man. I am not one of the so-called "stubborn senators" who refuses to change his mind. I would happily let an intelligent explanation win me over but I am in total confusion as to who will do what.

As far as I am concerned, the committees on foreign affairs decide how the nation's affairs should be conducted, while the committees on national defence must comply with the objectives set by the Minister of Foreign Affairs and by the cabinet. If the Government of Canada, through its Minister of Foreign Affairs, decided to stop participating in peace-keeping or peacemaking missions, it would need to consult the Minister of National Defence whether we are in a position to do so, since that is the current policy of Canada.

Senator Fairbairn, I am asking you this question without making any assertions, which I will do later in my speech, and I fervently hope, as a concrete suggestion from an old man who has spent 30 years of his life studying these questions, that the great danger —

I can see the reaction of your neighbour, Senator MacEachern, who chaired a subcommittee on national defence and who is very knowledgable on the subject. With all these committees, I can tell you right now, Senator Fairbairn, that with his experience, with Senator Stewart's experience and with the experience of several other senators, who as MPs sat on the External Affairs Committee, the confusion will be complete with respect to the goals we will want to meet. If each one of us has a different goal, it will cost a lot of money.

Therefore, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate agree to my suggestion and humbly ask the cabinet to consider this problem, and thus bring some order as to who will do what? I believe that Senator Stewart and myself, as well as Senator Forrestall, who sat on the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, will know exactly where we should be heading.

Of course, everyone knows that I am not on any committee. That will be the subject of a later debate. For the time being, I would like to have some clarification as to our objective, which is to determine how great Canada will be, or as I learned in France what the "puissance canadienne" will be; that is to say, what Canada's overall policy will be. We must have order. We must have only one goal. Normally, it is the Minister of Foreign Affairs who determines our foreign policy and the objectives of our defence policy.

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I salute Senator Prud'homme, who has done a great deal of work for many years in this area. I would be pleased to convey his suggestions to my colleagues. I would hope that that would not preclude the house from moving ahead with the passage of this motion so that the committee can be formed. However, I will be pleased to convey the substance of what you are saying, because it is relevant.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate for clarification. I certainly support the motion that we have before us. However, it raises in my mind the question of resourcing of these committees. In the past, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has had a subcommittee on defence. Do you see the establishment of this joint committee as somehow preventing our standing committee from setting up a subcommittee on defence? I thought Senator Stewart's question was leading into that. I realize this point does not speak directly to the motion, but it would be helpful for clarification purposes if we could address that issue.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Kinsella, obviously the joint committee that we are trying to establish today will have its mandate. Certainly, I believe it would be within the scope of Senator Stewart's committee, if it were to so choose, to consider forming its subcommittee to take a special look at individual subjects. That is something for Senator Stewart and his committee to decide as these two bodies are set up and their workload becomes obvious.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, it is not my wish to prolong this discussion. I welcome the fact that the Parliament of Canada, through both houses, will have an opportunity to review Canada's defence policy and Canada's foreign affairs policy. It may be overly simplistic, in which case I am open to correction, but I have always viewed Canada's defence policy as the military aspect or military expression of its foreign policy, at least to a very large extent. It would appear that the national defence policy that Canada has now was based largely on our military alliances. NORAD and NATO were historically born out of the circumstances of the Cold War, the Atlantic Alliance and continental defence of North America, and so on. Obviously, all of that foreign affairs or geopolitical background has changed and it is therefore absolutely appropriate, indeed necessary, to look at Canada's foreign policy in the light of changing world circumstances, perhaps in the light of changing Canadian priorities and perhaps changing Canadian abilities.

I am just not sure to what extent a committee will, with any specificity, be able to make recommendations with respect to national defence policy, unless that is done against a backdrop of foreign policy.

Perhaps I am splitting hairs. Obviously, the two committees are committees of the same Parliament. They both have steering committees. Presumably, they can divide subjects between the committees. I suppose they could have some joint hearings and do some things together. The only point I wish to make is one of caution: If one accepts that, to a very large extent but not totally, defence policy is a military expression of foreign policy — and surely that has to be the case, because the obverse to that is very dangerous — then the priorities with respect to foreign policy should be quite clearly defined in order for policy with respect to national defence to be coherent and consistent. As I say, I do not want to push it too far.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Ottenheimer for his observations. He has described the process and he is right about the process that is being envisaged. I should like to take all the suggestions that have been made, and the questions that have been asked today, to make sure that the ministers are aware of them as we proceed along these two pathways, which will not be parallel but will cross over as the studies proceed.

Senator Prud'homme: I must say that the comments I am about to make will be very different from the ones I would have made, if we had not had this question period.

However, after listening to Senators Kinsella, Stewart and Ottenheimer, I am still much afraid — and I see that Senator Bosa, who has been carefully following the proceedings of the Foreign Affairs Committee, seems very interested in the matter — that for us, for me anyway, national defence policy is an extension of foreign policy which supports the Canadian power, the "puissance canadienne" as I have always called it in French. This is what determines the goals of that policy at the national and international levels. Then, it must make sure that the various departments are ready to reach those goals, and if not, it must prepare them accordingly. I think that, at that point, the Department of National Defence is always asked by the minister to help the Department of Foreign Affairs to reach the goals he has set.

I think it would be wrong not to force them to cooperate. First of all, there are all the personalities of all those key figures to be taken into consideration. Several of them have been asked to chair parliamentary committees. They will want to pursue certain objectives. We already have Senator Stewart and a deputy chairman. In the House of Commons, we have Jean-Robert Gauthier and Mr. Rompkey, both of whom have already set goals. Now we see that there will be a new chairperson and a new co-chairperson, I gather, who will need to set goals for their committee.

Again, I do not want to directly address the issue of our foreign policy, because as you know, honourable senators, I would then have to tell you the story of my life, since my whole life revolves around that issue.

[English]

I would even go as far as to say that I got into federal politics solely because of my international preoccupation. I may have been diverted from my interest in that field since first displaying that interest, but I will die with a great interest in foreign affairs. That is why I am a federalist; that is why I came to federal politics. Perhaps I was naive, but I am still naive enough to repeat it today.

I passionately believe that because I have this international preoccupation I got into federal politics. That is why I defend the parliamentary associations against the press. People are afraid and they duck their questions. I will go directly to the press and explain how the issues are interrelated and how they all involve foreign affairs. Therefore, the objective must be, first, foreign affairs and then national defence. The master is foreign affairs.

Do we want to be peace-keepers or peacemakers? If we want to play a peace-keeping role, that is fine. However, if we want to play a peacemaking role, defence will have to be totally different. It will cost more to make peace than to keep the peace.

The committee on defence studying that matter will say that we should create an international school. An ex-parliamentarian, very popular in the Liberal ranks, sent me a long letter. Mr. Danson, a former minister of national defence, is of the opinion that the time has come to send messages to countries in the Middle East and to send students from Canada to work together in peacemaking and peace-keeping. This objective would be extremely difficult for a defence committee to put forward — as prominent as it may be, coming from the House and the Senate — if the committee does not first receive some direction from the Department of Foreign Affairs as to the ultimate role of Canadians in this field.

What will all of this cost? What do we want to achieve in the world? We all believe that Canada is one of the last lights of hope on a troubled planet; not the United States. Therefore, certain objectives must be taken into consideration.

Honourable senators, I suggest that if these committees start their programs of action, there will be much negotiating between the various chairmen of the various committees. They might well say, "Do not touch upon this issue because the following committee will tackle it."

Honourable senators, I believe that in the month of March or April, as we see fit, we should have a general day of debate on foreign affairs, as they have had in the House of Commons. We in this chamber respect order. That is why I came to the Senate from the House of Commons, where I was told I had a good chance of being re-elected. I chose to move to the upper chamber because I believe I can contribute.

Honourable senators, the Senate can be an element of great stability in these troubled times if we talk to each other openly and directly. Foreign affairs goals will be extremely interesting. Everyone has something to offer. Knowing Senators Fairbairn and Molgat as I do, I am sure they will consider having a free debate in the house prior to these various committees developing their own goals. They will have to react to what senators think of the world today.

Honourable senators, what does the phrase "human rights" entail? It is a much abused phrase. My father once said that when you talk about human rights, do not pick and choose. When you talk about peace and justice, you must talk about peace and justice for all, and "all" means "all"!

Honourable senators, I am a junior member in this place. I am the latest addition to the Senate, and I will behave as such. However, I have much to offer. I would say to Senator Fairbairn that a multiplicity of committees may lead to confusion. Human nature being what it is, conflicts between chairmen and co-chairmen could easily arise, sending the committees in different directions.

I note as well that there are no women from the Senate represented on this particular committee. Women have a different approach to national defence. I trust that there will be female representation from the House of Commons.

If there is to be a committee on foreign affairs, women should be on that committee. Women see elements that may be totally disregarded by men. They have a different approach to human rights, military matters, and international relationships. This should be looked into.

Honourable senators, I know that Senator Fairbairn will deliver our messages in a timely fashion and return to us with the answers.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposiiton): Honourable senators, I move adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy leader of the Government): I understood that we would proceed with this matter today.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are proceeding, but we wish time to reply tomorrow. We are sitting tomorrow, are we not?

Senator Molgat: I realize that we are, but it was my understanding in discussions with my colleague opposite that we would pass this matter today because the committee plans to meet tomorrow morning. It was felt that the committee should meet now in order to lay out its plans so that, during the recess, matters can take their course. That was clearly the understanding I had with my colleague opposite.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I am in an embarrassing position. I certainly do not want to contradict whatever has been agreed upon.

Senator Molgat: To accommodate my friend, we could proceed now to discussion of the other motion and come back at eight o'clock tonight.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, we will not do that simply to hear what I have to say. If the commitment was made to pass the motion before the end of this day, let us do so. I will find another occasion on which to make my remarks. I had wanted to reflect on Senator Fairbairn's presentation. This is not a secondary issue that we are discussing. We know what we are talking about. However, if a commitment has been made, I will certainly honour it. I had not heard about this agreement, frankly. It was conveyed to me, perhaps, and I forgot about it. I am not passing the blame, except to myself. Let us carry on and face the question.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I can assure my colleague that that is what we agreed upon. However, I want to comment on what my old friend Senator Prud'homme said earlier. I think that what he said made a lot of sense. There can be some problems between our Foreign Affairs Committee and the committee in the other place plus the Defence Committee also in the other place.

It would be appropriate for the chairpersons of these committees to agree on the subject-matters that they wish to consider. We must recognize that there are a lot of very important issues each committee can study on an individual basis. For example, our committee can easily examine the issue of our relations with the Caribbean and with Cuba, two countries with a very particular status. My colleague is very familiar with this issue, since we both went to Cuba a few years ago with the Inter-Parliamentary Union. I think Canada can play a very specific role in this area, given the relations between Cuba and the United States.

This is something which the Senate could examine. Our committee has a role to play. I agree that we must be careful not to step on each other's toes and look at the same issues at the same time. However, I think that this joint committee could do some work.

I want to congratulate my leader, Senator Fairbairn, who made every effort to ensure that the Senate is part of that Special Committee on National Defence set up by the House of Commons. She felt, and I agree with her, that it was important for the Senate to be part of that committee. I think that we can play a greater role on that committee and be listened to a little more since the committee will have a very important mandate. Indeed, it could determine the future of our armed forces for quite a long time.

We all know that the international scene has changed drastically. What we had to look at five or six years ago when the Soviet threat was still very real was very different from the current issues. Consequently, we must be prepared to make adjustments. The committee will have a very important role to play. In the meantime, we must ensure that the other committees, namely the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and the House of Commons committee, do not look at exactly the same issues.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I would like to request that, should a similar situation arise again, the government not be so presumptuous as to call a meeting of a committee which has yet to be created. I find that somewhat presumptuous. Any member here who was unaware of that agreement could have moved the adjournment, and would not be bound by it. For the Senate's sake, the government's sake, and everyone's sake, let us give reasonable time for the debate, and call the meeting afterwards. Let us not arrange everything ahead of time.

Senator Molgat: I accept that comment fully. If I said that they had called a meeting, I was in error. They had hoped to be able to call a meeting if we passed the motion. They wanted to call the meeting because, as I indicated, the House of Commons will not be in session next week and we will not be in session next week. If the committee could meet at least once before the recess, they could decide what they want to do regarding staff, make preliminary decisions on witnesses, and get a full week ahead or, as far as we are concerned, two weeks ahead in view of the fact that we will not be here for the next two weeks.

MERCHANT NAVY VETERAN AND CIVILIAN WAR-RELATED BENEFITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall moved the second reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-Related Benefits Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in view of the time, I will dispense with paying tribute to the Speaker and to the Leader of the Government. However, I say to them that they will be missing great tributes.

Bill S-4 will amend the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-Related Benefits Act by adding the word "war" between the words "navy" and "veteran" or "veterans" in the title of the act and throughout the act wherever the expression "merchant navy veteran" or "merchant navy veterans" appears. As a result of the adoption of this amendment, the legislation should now read "Merchant Navy War Veteran and Civilian War-Related Benefits Act."

Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is very simple. It is to give full recognition to merchant navy war veterans and to emphasize their status by giving them the dignity and public recognition that was denied them for decades after the world wars.

Some time ago, I introduced Bill S-5, which would have given war veterans of the merchant navy equal status with Canada's uniformed war veterans in terms of war-related benefits and recognition. My previous bill, unfortunately, was ruled out of order by the then Speaker on the grounds that it was a money bill and, upon my challenge, regrettably it was defeated by a vote of 34 to 33.

However, the government of the day introduced parallel legislation, Bill C-84, which was given Royal Assent in the Senate on June 18, 1992. It extended to the war veterans of the merchant navy some benefits which had previously been made available only to uniformed veterans but had left untouched other anomalies. These anomalies, I hope, will be on the agenda of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs when it begins its work very soon.

In the meantime, it is also necessary to recognize the contribution made by merchant navy veterans to the world wars and to the Korean conflict in every way possible. Without qualification, the word "veteran" suggests no more than long service, or perhaps experience by long practice. We are not honouring merchant seamen for having grown old, or for their great experience as seamen. We are honouring them for their service, whether counted by months or by years, as frontline soldiers in two world wars who, because of their vulnerability and lack of defences, suffered extraordinarily high casualties.

Looking over the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-Related Benefits Act, it was noted that the French version better indicates that a wartime Canadian seaman is a war veteran of the merchant navy and, thus, equal in status to the war veterans of the other three Canadian services. The amendments proposed in Bill S-4 would bring the same advantage to the English version.

Honourable senators, as I indicated, this is a very simple bill and I appeal for speedy passage of Bill S-4.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MONITOR MATTERS RELATED TO THE FEDERAL ENVIRONMENT ASSESSMENT PROCESS

Hon. Pat Carney, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 22, 1994, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources be authorized to monitor all matters related to the implementation and application of the Act to establish a Federal Environment Assessment Process (previously Bill C-13); and

That the committee report to the Senate no later than June 30, 1995.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

Hon. Joan Neiman, pursuant to notice of earlier this day, moved:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon the legal, social and ethical issues relating to euthanasia and assisted suicide;

That notwithstanding rule 86(1)(b), the Honourable Senators Beaudoin, DeWare, Gigantès, Keon, Lavoie-Roux, Neiman and Perrault act as members of the special committee, and that three members constitute a quorum;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and

That the committee present its final report to the Senate no later than December 15, 1994.

She said: Honourable senators, yesterday when I launched an inquiry preceding my motion today, I spoke at length about the historical background and the present situation surrounding issues of euthanasia and assisted suicide. I hope I presented a sufficiently strong rationale for the appointment of such a special committee. I am therefore proposing to restrain myself today.

I am grateful to Senators Lavoie-Roux and Prud'homme for their very strong words of support yesterday. They obviously share my belief, and that of an increasing number of Canadians that, as complex and difficult as the issues may be, legislators have the responsibility of addressing and, sooner or later, finding some solutions to the problems which abound with respect to euthanasia and assisted suicide.

The endorsement of Senator Kinsella was somewhat more reticent, but revealed a thoughtful awareness of the ethical questions which are lying in wait. I am sure he will follow the committee proceedings very carefully, and perhaps he might take part from time to time.

The proposed committee is relatively small — seven members — but they represent a broad spectrum of expertise and experience. However, I would invite all senators to take an active interest in the proceedings of the committee. I have no doubt that some of the issues that will be raised will be controversial, and that premises on which assertions are made will be questioned. The challenge to the committee will be to identify the problems and propose solutions to them. It is obvious, even now, that people with different interests and concerns will eventually have to accept some compromises.

Honourable senators could play a very important role in conveying to the public, in any understandable ways they might choose, the essence of what the committee is hearing and discussing. We all might encourage debate and try to get as much feedback as possible before the committee proposes its final report. In undertaking this study, the Senate has a formidable challenge and a wonderful opportunity to make a significant contribution to the resolution by Parliament of problems which so urgently require attention. I hope all honourable senators agree.

[Translation]

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, yesterday I had the opportunity to express preliminary thoughts on the whole issue of euthanasia. At this point, I simply want to invite all those senators who are interested and who can to participate in the work of the committee, even if it is not in an official capacity. I believe this is an issue of interest for everyone. I am convinced that Senator Neiman would agree to open the door to all those who want to make a contribution of one form or another.

I will simply repeat what I said yesterday. This is a very complex issue. I do hope that we can look at each and every aspect. To that end, I also hope that we can set aside the views that we may have developed, based on personal experience, in order to meet with a totally open mind the groups and individuals who will come before the committee.

I am pleased to give my formal support to Senator Neiman's motion.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, the subject-matter to be studied by this committee is very important, and I am sure Canadians from coast to coast would like to have input into the work of this committee. I would ask Senator Neiman whether the committee will be studying this matter only in Ottawa, or whether it will travel from coast to coast in order to give Canadians from all parts of Canada the opportunity of appearing before the committee and stating their views.

Senator Neiman: Senator Haidasz, I am somewhat restrained by the leadership on both sides of the house when it comes to the question of travel and money. My hope is that we can invite as many people and organizations as possible to come here to Ottawa. It would make the work of the committee much simpler and, of course, much less expensive.

If it does appear that there is an overwhelming desire for us to travel somewhere, which travel is concurred in by the leadership, then I am sure we could arrange it, but that is something that will have to evolve as the proceedings continue.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2.00 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE HONOURABLE KEITH DAVEY
THE HONOURABLE EARL A. HASTINGS

TRIBUTES ON TWENTY-EIGHTH ANNIVERSARY OF APPOINTMENTS TO SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, you will find this hard to believe —

Senator Doody: No, not me; not from you.

Senator Berntson: You could not surprise us.

Senator Frith: Really? That is quite a compliment. Thank you.

You will find it hard to believe that one of our youngest-looking, most dynamic colleagues was appointed to the Senate 28 years ago today. I refer to our colleague, one of my life-long friends and Canada's own rainmaker, Senator Keith Davey.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I rise only because my friend Senator Royce Frith very generously made that reference. However, the same tribute would apply to my friend and colleague Senator Hastings. He, too, has been a member of this chamber for 28 years.

Honourable senators, my time here in the Senate has been a delight, and I thank you.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I wish to join with Senator Frith in extending best wishes to Senator Davey and to Senator Hastings on this occasion. As well, I should like to tell my colleagues a quick story about my friend Senator Davey.

I came here as an innocent. My friend had been here for two years before me. He was forming a committee to study the mass media. He and Senator McElman decided they were looking for a patsy, and I was it, so I was appointed to the committee. On the committee, they were looking for a whip. I got the job, not because of my great abilities, but because I was the youngest — not in age but, rather, in seniority.

I wish to publicly thank Senator Davey for that appointment because it was one of the best things that has ever happened to me. Thank you, and again, all the best to Senator Davey and Senator Hastings.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I, too, wish to congratulate my colleague Senator Davey, who has been an inspiration to me for a great many years, a mentor in many respects, and a great Canadian.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this anniversary was brought to our attention this morning at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. Senator Hastings reminded us of this great event. I thought Senator Davey's response at that time was quite valid, namely that his appointment was the ultimate proof that appointments here are non-political. I wish them both well.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with the remarks that have been made by other senators in congratulating Senator Davey on the occasion of the 28th anniversary of his appointment to the Senate. May I wish him another fruitful 28 years in this chamber.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

THE ESTIMATES, 1994-95

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the following documents: The government's Expenditure Plan, Part I, 1994-95 Estimates; the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995, Part II, 1994-95 Estimates; and the Expenditure Plans, Part III, 1994-95 Estimates.

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE— PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Pierre De Bané, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 24, 1994

The Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy has the honour to present its

FIRST REPORT

Your committee has examined its Order of Reference, adopted by the Senate and the House of Commons on Wednesday, February 23, 1994, and recommends the following:

That the committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings;

That the committee be empowered to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of its powers, except the power to report to the Senate and House of Commons;

A copy of the relevant Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence (Issue No. 1, First Session, Thirty-fifth Parliament) is tabled in the House of Commons.

Respectfully submitted,

PIERRE DE BANÉ
Joint Chairman

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator De Bané: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(g), I move that the report be adopted now, as this is necessary to allow the committee to start operating without delay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE ESTIMATES, 1994-95

REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(f), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995, with the exception of Privy Council Vote 20 (Official Languages).

Honourable senators, by way of explanation, the section for Official Languages is excluded from this motion because it is referred to the joint committee. I will be moving a motion immediately to refer it to the joint committee. That is the standard practice.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES, 1994-95—PRIVY COUNCIL VOTE 20 REFERRED TO JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(f), I move:

That the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages be authorized to examine the expenditures set out in Privy Council Vote 20 of the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1410)

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am perhaps not following the procedure as closely as I might. I find it rather strange that there is another motion before the Senate on aboriginal veterans. Are we confusing the two motions? I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate to explain the apparent conflict — at least it is a conflict to me.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I am not quite sure to which conflict Senator Phillips is referring. The two motions which I have proposed are the ones that send the Estimates, which I tabled earlier, to committee. Across the floor, Senator Doody had asked me if I was referring them to committee.

The bulk of the Estimates covering all departments have been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. However, by long-standing practice and agreement over the years, if not by law, the section on official languages is referred to the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Official Languages, as I understand it. That was the purpose of the second motion.

I do not see how this in any way affects the aboriginal question. The reference from the Senate to the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples deals specifically with the treatment of aboriginal veterans, and there is no reference to Estimates. There may well be a recommendation that could affect the Estimates at a later date, but at this point it does not affect the Estimates; it is not part of the Estimates.

Senator Phillips: That was my concern, that there might be a conflict between the Estimates and the reference which I understand is to be made regarding the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples.

If my honourable friend says there is no conflict, I am more than happy to accept his word.

Senator Molgat: Thank you.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEES

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a), I move:

> That rule 86.(1)(b) be suspended in relation to the nomination of senators to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages and the Standing Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament;
> That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, namely, the Honourable Senators Corbin, Nolin and Rivest;
> That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the Standing Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament, namely, the Honourable Senators Cools, Doyle and Riel; and
> That messages be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House of the names of the honourable senators appointed to serve on the said Standing Joint Committees and the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I would like to stress that there has not been much consultation. I am willing to grant leave for the adoption of the motion. I want to cooperate, but since there is only one independent senator in this house, I will certainly agree, on our behalf, to this favour that the whip of the government is asking from us; that is, the suspension of rule 59(1)(a).

Motion agreed to.

IMPACT OF CHANGES TO TOBACCO TAXES—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, March 15, 1994, I will call the attention of the Senate to the impact of the Government of Canada's changes to tobacco taxes.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM—HAY REPORT—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several hundred residents of the Chilliwack River Valley respecting their desire to have anti-flood preventive diking financed under the Government of Canada's infrastructure program.

The Chilliwack River is classified as a wild river. It caused severe flooding in 1984, 1989 and 1990. The residents wish the report of the Chilliwack River Valley Hazard Management Plan, which is known as the Hay report, to be implemented in order to protect public safety and their homes.

INTERNATIONAL SPACE STATION PROGRAM—STATUS OF CANADA'S COMMITMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in the Finance Minister's speech, which was distributed with a number of other budget documents last Tuesday, one reads the following on page 7:

> Second, we have decided to negotiate an orderly withdrawal from current commitments to the International Space Station program.

When he delivered his speech in the House of Commons, however, Mr. Martin said, as reported in Hansard:

> Second, we have decided to negotiate an orderly reduction in current commitments to the International Space Station program.

My question is obvious: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if, as The Financial Post reports today, based on U.S. and Canadian government sources, according to its reporter, the original intention of a unilateral withdrawal from the International Space Station program was changed to one of negotiated reduction only after a telephone call from the President of the United States to the Prime Minister of Canada?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my information is that, yes, the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States spoke on this issue. The intention of the Government of Canada was to negotiate reduction rather than outright withdrawal. I believe that has been indicated by officials. We look forward to having a continued relationship in this program.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, that answer does not explain why the printed copy of the speech, which is still available for distribution and which has not been corrected, still has the word "withdrawal" in it. It does not say "Check against delivery." The document is available today. Anyone who wants to call the Finance Department can get it. The official document of the Government of Canada still states "withdrawal." It is obvious that after that was printed, or at the time of its printing, pressure was put on by the Government of the United States and the minister had to backtrack.

The article also states:

> "There's a lot behind that change of words," said one U.S. official involved in the space negotiations.

• (1420)

According to the same article, an official of Spar Aerospace said it was an oversight that the word "withdrawal" had been left in the prepared text and in the budget documents. This whole scenario clearly implies that a foreign government and a private Canadian company directly affected by a budgetary decision were involved in the decision-making process. One cannot read anything else into it. The budget speech is printed, the word "withdrawal" appears — and the speech could not have been printed many days before it was given — and suddenly the minister uses a word completely opposite to the one in the text.

Pressures were brought to bear by the company and by the President of the United States; the Government of Canada backtracked. Therefore, we have the unique situation of having a foreign government and a private company involved in the decision-making process of the budget.

My question is this: How can the minister justify such unprecedented behaviour, which is in total violation of the absolute secrecy and confidentiality that are inherent during the preparation of budget documents?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, to respond to the last part of Senator Lynch-Staunton's comments, in the history of this country there has never been as open a process of budget consultation as there has been for Mr. Martin's budget.

Senator Frith: That is Tory thinking. They just cannot get that cobweb out of their heads!

Senator Gigantès: They judge others by their own standards.

Senator Fairbairn: The Government of Canada remains committed to being part of this process in relation to the International Space Station.

Senator Berntson: What changed your mind?

Senator Fairbairn: However, we have been negotiating with the United States for a reduced commitment in order to make our participation in that project affordable. Clearly, there is a mistake in this document, pure and simple.

Senator Berntson: Is that what it is, just a mistake?

Senator Fairbairn: The commitment of the Government of Canada has remained strong. Obviously, however, we are in a reduced economic state. We are, therefore, negotiating a reduction in our participation in this program, but we wish to remain productive players in it.

Senator Olson: The Tories would not understand that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: One can remember an instance when the Honourable Mitchell Sharp, as Minister of Finance, was photographed in his office and the television cameras managed to catch a certain figure on a printed document. That document was immediately taken back and changed for his presentation that very same day.

Senator Thériault: It was not Mitchell Sharp.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Correction; it was Marc Lalonde. Now we are being asked to believe that the word "withdrawal" was a casual mistake and that "we only picked up on it a few days later. We then changed it to something else, and we are terribly sorry." That may be the official line, but it is very hard to swallow because, between the two happenings, the President of the United States and Spar Aerospace intervened. That fact has not been denied. It was the intention of the Government of Canada to withdraw from the program, but pressure was applied by the United States.

Once again, those of us who were charged with what the Red Book calls "camp-following" have witnessed an incidence of meek submission towards the President of the United States. Indeed, that has happened on two issues recently. First, there was the matter of air strikes in the vicinity of Sarajevo. The Government of Canada initially maintained its opposition to air strikes. After one telephone call from President Clinton, however, the position became, "Yes, we are in favour of air strikes." A few days ago there was another call from him saying, "Look, Jean, I am sorry but you have to be involved in this program, because if you back out the other partners will back out." The response was obviously, "Yes, Mr. President."

• (1430)

I ask the leader, is this not camp-following? How does she define it if not as meek submission displayed by the Prime Minister of Canada following conversations with the President of the United States?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, this is far from meek submission on the part of this government in its interaction with the United States since the last election.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Maybe abdication is a better word.

Senator Fairbairn: I will ask members of this house to recognize that in terms of air strikes, which the honourable senator chose to raise, Canada had a very strong and persuasive influence, not only on the President of the United States but on Canada's allies within the NATO alliance.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then it changed. It lasted a month.

Senator Fairbairn: The influence of Canada helped to bring about the situation we now have in the former Yugoslavia, where air strikes did not occur because reason prevailed on the ground. Canada's influence in NATO and with the President of the United States was absolutely fundamental to that taking place.

There is no question of weak submission at all. This was a very strong Canadian intervention, and it helped. It was not the whole cause of the success, honourable senators, but it helped enormously in creating an atmosphere which led to a ceasefire, and that ceasefire may now be extended throughout that troubled area.

In terms of the space station, I have made very clear the Canadian position on that. Canada wishes to be involved. However, we wish to be involved in reduced circumstances, and that is what is under negotiation with the United States at this point.

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to that of Senator Lynch-Staunton: How did the President of the United States know what was in the Canadian budget, and when did he know it?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is the point. Clairvoyant? Consultation?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am not privy to conversations between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada, but I would be pleased to make that inquiry.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—JUSTIFICATION FOR FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government.

I have in my hands here, honourable senators, the basic facts in relation to federal spending. My question is asked at this time because of the tremendous sacrifices that Canadians are being asked to make. I believe that all honourable senators and all Canadians understand the sacrifices, although we do not necessarily accept them. However, in this material, I read that our federal spending includes another $1.1 billion for the CBC.

I know that the relationship of political parties and partisanship is a very delicate area, honourable senators. However, in view of the terms under which the new president of the CBC was hired, I would ask the government leader whether there was any consideration given in the budget discussions to making some cut-backs in this area? It seems to me that when we are asking sacrifices of people in regions such as Newfoundland, who have already taken the brunt of the recession, the question should be asked: Has any consideration been given to reducing this huge amount of money that goes to support the CBC? If not, why not?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as you know, the CBC over recent years has taken systematic and considerable cuts in its budget. The new president of the CBC and the minister responsible have made it clear that this government believes the CBC makes a worthwhile contribution to this country. This government intends to make sure that the CBC is maintained as the service that Canadians have come to regard as something which binds this country together. It will be maintained on an extremely careful budget, and we wish to underline our support for it.

The other side of that question is the budget propositions which affect Canadians all across this land. I tried to make clear yesterday, as I have before, that the underlying motivation of this government is to combine the measures which will bring about economic growth in this country, such as job creation and opportunities for training and progress for people who have been hurt by events. Newfoundland is a particular case in point, which is why this government has put aside $1.7 billion specifically to help people in the Atlantic provinces surmount the difficulties that have been placed in their way, particularly in the last year.

Senator St. Germain: A supplementary, Your Honour.

Honourable senators, there is no question that I hear what the Leader of the Government is saying about what her party believes binds this country together. However, I believe it is much more than the CBC. I think the greatest resources we have in this country are the people and the families who work and contribute. That far exceeds anything that the CBC, CTV, or any other media network can provide. Inasmuch as I see a value, and I am not questioning that aspect of it, but given, Mr. Speaker —

Senator Frith: Order! Address the honourable senators, not the Speaker.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators and Senator Frith, I stand to be corrected, and I accept the correction.

Honourable senators, $1.1 billion is a great deal of money for such an organization, in the eyes of my constituents in British Columbia. I believe it is a luxury to employ people such as Peter Mansbridge and Pamela Wallin when the Lloyd Robertsons and the Peter Kents can deliver the same type of news at a profit.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—CHANGE IN DURATION OF CLAIMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Don't make it political, now.

Senator Doody: I find it most alarming and chilling, really. I refer to a part of the budget speech which speaks about the reductions in the unemployment costs. I would like to read to you this quotation:

> The maximum duration of unemployment insurance claims will be reduced for new claimants with weak attachment to the labour force.

If ever there was a chilling, cold, bureaucratic statement included in a budget speech, this has to be at the top of the list.

Does this mean that the young people who are just getting out of school, or finishing college, or finishing trade school will have less chance to obtain unemployment insurance in lieu of jobs which, in my part of the country at least, are unobtainable? Does it mean that casual labourers, or seasonal labourers, or part-time workers with a weak attachment — my God, what a term — with a weak attachment to the labour force will no longer be eligible for the same unemployment insurance benefits as those people with regular incomes and longstanding jobs, and people with a chance to save and to get established in the community?

Does it mean that the less advantaged in our society, those people with the least opportunity to get a foothold in the Canadian lifestyle, will now receive reduced benefits as new claimants with "a weak attachment to the labour force"? Or is there some plan to provide opportunities for these people in lieu of what has been their lifeline before, namely the unemployment insurance fund?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Thank you, Senator Doody, for that question. There is no doubt that the unemployment insurance system in this country is of fundamental importance, particularly in areas where there is seasonal employment and very high unemployment.

The question that this government is trying to deal with is precisely geared to your concluding statements, and the answer is yes.

Honourable senators, the efforts of this government in this budget are to create opportunities that will get people off unemployment insurance and put them to work and give them, as the Prime Minister of Canada has said on a number of occasions, the dignity of being able to work in this country.

• (1440)

As far as our young people are concerned, there is a concerted effort in the Throne Speech, the budget and the government's programs to help young people move into jobs. We will be moving ahead quickly with the Youth Corps. We will be moving ahead quickly with the Apprenticeship Program.

In concert with the provinces, and this is particularly true of the four Atlantic provinces, we are also moving ahead with coordinated efforts to develop quickly and innovatively productive training and education programs to move people into the work force and into jobs for which they are qualified — and this is not just for young people.

There will be changes in Canada because of what has begun in this social policy review, but underlying all of them will be the ultimate goal of getting Canadians working in every part of Canada and, I must say, most particularly in the province of Newfoundland.

Senator Doody: I appreciate the intentions, the ambitions, the ideas and the hopes of the administration, but they are not spelled out nearly as specifically in this document as the statement that $725 million will be saved in 1994-95, and $2.4 billion per year thereafter, by reducing the maximum duration of unemployment insurance claims for new claimants with weak attachments — that's a terrible phrase — with weak attachments to the labour force.

Can the minister be more specific and tell the people in the less advantaged parts of our country exactly what will be put in place for them in return for having their access to the unemployment insurance fund decreased? It is an awful thing to deprive people of something of value and give them nothing in return, except some vague hopes and aspirations.

I despair for my friends and fellow citizens in the poorer parts of this country if all they will have to eat during the coming winter are the promises that are obtained from the generalized statements of my honourable friend.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, that is not a phrase I would have written.

Senator Doody: It is "bureaucrat-ese."

Senator Fairbairn: It is not expressive of what this government is trying to do. This government is trying to provide an opportunity for people to work rather than to collect either unemployment insurance or, for that matter, welfare.

One of the most important things in this budget is the reduction in the rate of unemployment insurance premiums, which will trigger job creation in all areas of this country to the tune of some 40,000 jobs.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That's next year.

Senator Fairbairn: On the question Senator Phillips asked me previously, there will be a special package for Atlantic Canada. The Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Human Resources Development have spoken about this. Last weekend they met in the Atlantic provinces with the premiers.

This is an immediate, action-oriented plan to help people get jobs so that they are not on assistance in the Atlantic provinces. This is not a plan for next year or the year after. This plan will be put into place very quickly.

Finally, honourable senators, I must remind you of another fact, and that is that the unemployment insurance fund has a $6-billion deficit. If we do not take action to preserve this system, and we must do some cutting in order to do so, we will lose the fund. That is something that is not to be tolerated in this country, and particularly in Atlantic Canada.

Senator Doody: I offer my sympathies to the Liberals, who must support this Tory government.

IMPACT OF BUDGET ON ATLANTIC REGION—CONCEPT OF FAIRNESS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, by way of follow-up to the questions that have been asked, I am interested in the concept of fairness as defined by the government and applied by the Minister of Finance in his budget. Commentators are virtually unanimous in their conclusion that the impact of the budget will be disproportionately harsh on one region of the country, namely the Atlantic region.

There are base closures, a 22-per-cent reduction in unemployment insurance payments, a considerable reduction in the Fisherman's Compensation Program alluded to by the Leader of the Government a moment ago, and the cuts in regional development spending. I am sure that an argument can be made and will be made, as to the necessity for any one of these measures. However, what thought was given to the cumulative effect of these measures on the people of the Atlantic provinces?

The premier of my honourable friend's home province of Alberta, Premier Klein, is quoted as having said:

> I can't see where Alberta has been hit very hard. They weren't as tough as I expected them to be.

My question is whether the concept of fairness, which has been mentioned frequently by ministers and in particular by the Minister of Finance, was considered in regard to the relative impact of the budget on the different regions of Canada and whether any consideration was given to trying to spread the pain a bit more evenly.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): The government is quite conscious of the situation in Atlantic Canada, and it is for that reason that a great deal of effort is being made with respect to the fisheries and in developing programs in consultation with the people involved.

We were also aware, when thinking of the $800-million special employment stimulus and training fund that will be used immediately in this country —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: How much is there?

Senator Fairbairn: We are also conscious of the fact that some of the issues that Senators Doody and Murray have mentioned in connection with the unemployment insurance cuts have an element of fairness in them. The people who are on the lower end will receive a higher percentage of payment.

Honourable senators, I am not going back into the mists of time, but we must appreciate the reality of the deficit that we have. I reiterate the fact that the figures show a $45.7-billion deficit and —

• (1450)

Senator Simard: You're cooking the books!

Senator Fairbairn: No, Senator Simard, it is not a question of —

Senator Frith: Squanderers!

Senator Fairbairn: — cooking the books. I would remind honourable senators that a mere two years ago, when my friend Mr. Mazankowski brought in his first budget, he predicted that the deficit for the year we are just concluding would be $22.5 billion. We are not talking about cooking the books here; we now face a deficit that is twice as high.

Senator Phillips: That was good cooking, wasn't it?

Senator Fairbairn: My friends opposite know the painful decisions faced by a government in trying to deal, on the one hand, with the absolute necessity of cutting deficits, and on the other hand with, in our view, the equally if not more important necessity of supporting people and helping find jobs for individuals. It is also difficult, in our reduced circumstances, to find the money that will provide an infrastructure program throughout the Atlantic provinces which will also create jobs. These are the kinds of programs that have been very much in the minds of those responsible in the government in terms of where the impact of this budget will be felt. I am sure that when the Prime Minister goes to Newfoundland tomorrow, he will be giving that message to the people of that province.

Senator Frith: You left a mess, and we are just trying to clean it up.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY—REVIEW OF ACTIVITIES BY NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should mention that 31 of the 32 members of the House of Commons from Atlantic Canada are supporters of the Liberal government. Four out of four provincial governments there are Liberal. There may not be much that the Senate can do to undo some of what is being proposed. However, I think we would be doing no more than our duty if we made it our business to give a voice to people in the Atlantic provinces who justifiably feel hard done by in this budget.

In connection with the notice of motion that was given earlier by the Deputy Leader of the Government, perhaps the minister might consult with the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance with a view to having that committee take the estimates of ACOA under consideration forthwith so that a review could be made, not just of the activities of that agency, but of what needs to be done to try to ensure that the Atlantic provinces do not fall further behind.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Murray, I should like to reiterate once more that it is definitely a commitment of this government that the Atlantic provinces will not fall further and further back. I believe that the suggestion made by the honourable senator is one that the committee and the house might wish to consider.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CUTS—PLIGHT OF LOBSTER FISHERMEN

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government is with respect to unemployment insurance, particularly as it relates to fishermen. The budget calls for an extension of the qualifying period from 10 to 12 weeks. This creates an anomaly to lobster fishermen whose season only stretches for 10 weeks. They will not, therefore, qualify for unemployment insurance, and they will not be able to collect unemployment insurance until the next lobster season presents itself.

Upon enquiring at the local area office of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the fishermen were told that the local officials had not been consulted about whether or not the lobster fishermen would fall into this strange category whereby they are not eligible for unemployment insurance.

The Leader of the Government may not have an answer now, but this matter is pretty urgent at the present time. Lobster fishermen have been calling my office. It seems to me that this might just have been an oversight. I wonder if the Leader of the Government would check on that matter and provide me with an answer.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I would be pleased to do that as quickly as I can, Senator Marshall.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer today. I am expecting at any time now, by the way, that my honourable friends across the way will stand up and cheer over how quickly the responses are arriving.

Senator Frith: You are not a quick learner, Gil.

Senator Phillips: Would you hold your breath until then?

Senator Molgat: In any event, I have the answer to a question asked on February 10 by Senator David Angus regarding the infrastructure program as it relates to the St. Lawrence Seaway.

TRANSPORT

(Response to Question raised by Hon. W. David Angus on February 10, 1994)

Infrastructure works is a shared-cost program designed to meet primarily the infrastructure needs and priorities of local governments. Projects are developed by municipalities and other partners, and costs will normally be shared equally among project participants, the province and the federal government, each providing up to one-third of project funding.

Given the pressing need to renew and enhance Canada's municipal infrastructure, and the relatively limited amount of funding available for this purpose, it appears unlikely that municipalities or the provinces would be willing to fund infrastructure projects connected to the Seaway.

The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority (SLSA) has submitted their Corporate Plan, including maintenance plans, for approval by the Minister of Transport and Treasury Board. To date, there has not been final approval of the plans. A summary of the Corporate Plan will be tabled in both houses once approval is obtained.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—MOTION TO AMEND CONSTITUTION OF CANADA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 22, 1994, moved:

That whereas section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada

may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies;

Now therefore the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by His Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE
AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

1. The Schedule to the Prince Edward Island Terms of Union is amended by adding thereto, after the portion that reads

"And such other charges as may be incident to, and connected with, the services which by the 'British North America Act, 1867' appertain to the General Government, and as are or may be allowed to the other Provinces;"

the following:

"That a fixed crossing joining the Island to the mainland may be substituted for the steam service referred to in this Schedule;

That, for greater certainty, nothing in this Schedule prevents the imposition of tolls for the use of such a fixed crossing between the Island and the mainland, or the private operation of such a crossing."

Citation

2. This Amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1993 (Prince Edward Island).

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I look across the floor at Senator Phillips, I am delighted to have the opportunity to introduce this resolution today.

Today is an important moment for the host province of Confederation. The last time we heard about this subject was from Senator Phillips when he indicated that this step would be necessary in order to complete Prince Edward Island's request for a bridge. The province has asked Parliament to make a small — but nonetheless very important — change in the Terms of Union to allow for the construction of a bridge between the Island and the mainland.

Honourable senators, this is a bilateral constitutional amendment. Section 43 of the 1982 amending formula allows for the adoption of constitutional amendments which affect one or more, but not all, of the provinces. This is accomplished through the adoption of constitutional resolutions by appropriate provincial legislatures and by the Parliament of Canada.

Such amendments, honourable senators, cannot be used to change the division of powers, or to create new constitutional provisions, or to give special powers to one province. In fact, the amendment we are discussing today is a piece of unfinished business left over from the last Parliament, as I said earlier.

Honourable senators, we in this house have changed the Constitution by way of bilateral amendment twice since 1982. In 1987, an amendment gave the Pentecostal churches in Newfoundland the same educational rights as other religious schools. In 1993, the New Brunswick equality amendment was adopted, which recognized the equality of the two linguistic communities in that province.

In this case, under the current Prince Edward Island Terms of Union, which are a part of our Constitution, the federal government is obligated to provide a permanent ferry service to the Island. The exact words of the Terms of Union are:

That the Dominion government shall assume and defray all the charges for the following services, viz:-

It includes:

Efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers, to be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland of the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion;

That clause was insisted upon by Prince Edward Island when it joined Confederation in 1873. For over 120 years it has been their guarantee of a permanent connection to the rest of Canada.

This amendment, honourable senators, does not change that guarantee. It will merely change the nature of the way that guarantee is carried out; that is, with a bridge — or "fixed link" — rather than a ferry service.

The amendment is required because the Federal Court ruled in March of 1993 that the ferry service could not be discontinued without an appropriate constitutional amendment. If the bridge were built without it, the federal government would be in the very difficult position of having to guarantee ferry service in addition to any expenditures it might undertake for the bridge.

We are all aware that the proposal to create a permanent fixed link between the Island and the mainland has been under discussion, on and off the Island, for several years. In fact, between 1987 and 1993, some 80 public meetings, attended by over 10,000 people, were held to provide public input at various stages of the environmental review process alone. Over 90 studies were undertaken on the environmental impact that the bridge will have as it is under construction and when it is in full operation.

The June 1993 decision of the previous Minister of Public Works not to proceed with further public hearings was challenged in the Federal Court by opponents of the bridge. In his decision in favour of the government, Justice Cullen of the Federal Court said:

> The criteria accepted and followed by Public Works Canada when making its self-assessment was more than adequate for the purpose and complied with the Guidelines Order.

That statement was made on August 12, 1993.

Honourable senators, this is probably the most studied project from an environmental point of view, ever undertaken in Canada.

Senator Berntson: Other than Rafferty-Alameda.

Senator Fairbairn: I was about to say the Oldman River dam project, but I am not sure that is true, either.

Senator Frith: Closer than a photo finish.

Senator Phillips: It beats both of them.

Senator Fairbairn: The conclusion is that any adverse environmental effect of building this bridge would be either insignificant, or could be alleviated by known technology. The federal and provincial governments will monitor the construction of the bridge at all stages to ensure that the builder is following all of the proper procedures.

In June of 1993, Bill C-110, respecting the Northumberland Strait Crossing, was debated and passed by this Parliament. That same month, a resolution authorizing this amendment was passed by the Prince Edward Island legislature.

When we had Bill C-110 before us, Senator Bonnell described what had already occurred in the Prince Edward Island legislature, while Senator Phillips noted that the resolution would need to be adopted at some later date by both Houses of Parliament. Both of them spoke enthusiastically in favour of the project.

If I may quote Senator Phillips from the debates in this chamber last June 17, where he said, at page 3563 of Hansard:

> Prince Edward Island needs this project; Atlantic Canada needs it; Canada needs it. It is clearly a winner.

In that same debate, Senator Bonnell said at page 3566:

> This new mode of transportation will allow the Island to become more efficient and competitive by eliminating many barriers to exporting our goods around the world. This bridge will greatly improve the efficiency of those industries that rely heavily on an effective transportation system while, at the same time, allowing more visitors to come to the Island.

In fact, after considerable debate and discussion, a majority of Islanders strongly supported the initiative, as do the current and past provincial and federal governments. It is also supported strongly throughout the rest of Atlantic Canada.

The creation of this fixed link will provide over 5,500 direct and indirect jobs over the approximate three years of construction. About 96 per cent of those jobs, honourable senators, will be created for Atlantic Canadians.

The government is also taking steps to protect those fishermen who may lose the opportunity to fish in specific zones where construction is taking place. The developer will be required to set up a $10-million compensation fund for this, which fund will be administered according to the terms being established by a Fisheries Liaison committee, made up largely of fishermen.

The program consists of six compensation components: for lobster, for scallops, for herring, for Irish moss, for "other species," and for port interference. The payments to individual fishermen can vary between $1,000 and $29,000.

In addition, steps are being taken to ensure that those ferry workers who will lose their jobs as a result of this construction will be treated fairly and equitably. They will have the first right of refusal for the bridge operation and maintenance jobs, of which there will be about 60. They will receive a fair severance package negotiated with the workers' union and Marine Atlantic. They will be provided with opportunities for retraining and relocation assistance where necessary.

Under the terms of the bridge construction agreement, about 70 per cent of all the materials used will also come from within Atlantic Canada, and the shopping list for the materials for this 13-kilometre-long bridge is pretty impressive. Among other things, it will require 1.5 million cubic meters of aggregate and stone, 200,000 tonnes of cement, 53,000 tonnes of reinforcing steel, 12,000 tonnes of cable, 8,000 tonnes of metal fabrication, and 139,000 tonnes of asphalt paving.

At its highest point, this bridge will rise some 55 meters above the water at the centre of the channel. It will be the largest bridge ever built in North America, and one of the longest bridges in the world. Its construction, by Strait Crossing Development Incorporated, will provide a real and very positive stimulus to the Atlantic economy generally, and will pave the way for future long-term economic growth and development in that region. Prince Edward Island Premier Catherine Callbeck has called it "a symbol of hope...a tangible opportunity to create jobs and revitalize the province's economy."

One of the most attractive features of this proposal for some people who worry about fiscal restraint is that it will not cost the federal government any more than the projected cost of maintaining the ferry service, a cost it is constitutionally obligated to undertake in any event.

The government believes that if we want to have the renewal of existing facilities, and the new facilities that we need, governments alone will not have the financing capacity to do the whole job by themselves. Infrastructure and transportation are critical to our ability to compete nationally, and to the ability of Prince Edward Island to compete as the smallest province in our confederation.

Senator Phillips: But the most important one.

Senator Fairbairn: And one of the most beautiful.

This project is an excellent example of how government and the private sector can pool their expertise and resources to create the essential infrastructure that we need. It gives maximum protection for the taxpayer and it provides the developer with a fair, but not excessive, profit potential.

A private firm will finance the construction, which is expected to run to some $850 million. In return, the firm will receive $42 million per year from the federal government, which is the amount it would cost per year to maintain and subsidize the ferry service. This arrangement will last for 35 years, at which time the ownership of the bridge reverts to the government and to the people of Canada.

Given that the bridge will be constructed to last for at least 100 years, that means that, for virtually no new financial outlay, the government will acquire a major asset. In short, it is a good business deal for the people of P.E.I. and for the people of Canada.

The firm will be allowed to collect tolls for the use of the bridge. The tolls will not be allowed to exceed the cost of the ferry service, and will not be allowed to rise by any more than three-quarters of the rate of inflation.

In addition, if that bridge is not finished by May 31, 1997, the developer will be required to reimburse the government for the continued operation of the ferry service for up to 36 months. Therefore taxpayers' money is being further protected under the terms of this deal.

The great advantage of the bridge over the ferry service is that all users — Islanders, tourists, the trucking industry and anyone else — will not be at the mercy of ferry schedules when they want to get off or on to their Island, and it is estimated that the bridge will lead to an increase in tourism on the Island of some 25 per cent. That is certainly good news indeed for hotel, motel, campground and restaurant owners who have been suffering through this recession along with the rest of the country.

I am told that the construction itself will attract hundreds of tourists, as well as engineers and others from all around the world who will want to have a look at one of the biggest projects on the continent.

Honourable senators, I believe that giving citizens in the Atlantic provinces a chance to strengthen their transportation infrastructure and create new, long-term economic opportunities will make the whole country stronger. In the long term, this bridge will provide Prince Edward Island with a new lifeline to the mainland. It will give its residents and its businesses increased flexibility and allow them to be more competitive, and all sectors of the Island economy will benefit, whether tourism, agriculture, shipping or the fishery.

Finally, I believe that supporting this resolution is far more significant than laying down a constitutional framework to allow the replacement of a ferry with a bridge. It is a realistic and imaginative response to a very real need on the part of Islanders to have that stronger link with the mainland, and it can become a model for the way in which the private sector and government can cooperate together in giving the people of this country the kind of infrastructure that is essential to the smooth and efficient operation of our economy.

It is a great boost for Prince Edward Island, it is a great boost for Atlantic Canada, and I think it is a great boost for all Canadians. I hope that everyone will consider —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We brought it in.

Senator Fairbairn: And I would certainly congratulate you, Senator Lynch-Staunton, for doing that.

I hope that everyone will give their support to this resolution, in order to conclude this piece of unfinished business.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would first thank the Leader of the Government for her introduction of the resolution. When I heard the Deputy Leader of the Government move the amendment, I thought: "In the other place, a cabinet minister moved the amendment. Don't tell me the Senate is getting the sous-chef."

It is not that I have anything against Senator Molgat, but I am delighted that Senator Fairbairn herself introduced the amendment.

• (1520)

Senator Fairbairn: I needed time to regroup after Question Period.

Senator Phillips: I see. We on this side needed a little time to regroup after your answers, too, senator.

For generations, Prince Edward Islanders dreamed of a continuous link with Canada. We did not think of it in the terms expressed by Senator Fairbairn, when she said "P.E.I. was being linked to the mainland." We, as Islanders, think of Canada as being connected to us, and I think that is the proper viewpoint.

Last year, after all the years of debate and planning, I had the pleasure of introducing in this chamber Bill C-110, which provided for the terms and conditions of the construction, maintenance and financing of what we now call the fixed link.

In my remarks on June 17, 1993, I gave a lengthy, extensive, detailed explanation of the bill and, I might add, with a great deal of clarity, so there was no question as to the conditions contained in the bill. It is very unlikely that honourable senators would forget my speech on that occasion.

Senator Fairbairn: Never.

Senator Phillips: Or on any other occasion. I am suspicious that perhaps some honourable senators may have left a little early on their summer vacation.

Senator Molgat: We reread them all the time.

Senator Phillips: I am glad honourable senators do. I have noticed that since the honourable senator has moved to that side, there has been an improvement, and I will attribute that to the fact that he has been reading my speeches. For those honourable senators who left a little early, I would suggest that they take a few moments to read the remarks that I made on that occasion.

I was extremely pleased on that occasion to have the support of one of my colleagues from Prince Edward Island, the Honourable Senator Bonnell, a long-time friend despite political differences. I appreciated his support. I think that between the two of us, we left no questions unanswered.

Following the passage of Bill C-110 and Royal Assent, the Honourable Elmer MacKay, then Minister of Public Works, signed an agreement with SCI, Straight Crossing Incorporated, which is based in Calgary, to construct the fixed link. It immediately called for tenders and the first one was for the construction site in Borden, a $60-million contract.

Honourable senators will be interested to know that since the awarding of that contract, Marine Atlantic has found it necessary to schedule two extra crossings of the car ferries to accommodate the materials moving on to P.E.I. for the construction of the fixed link.

Prior to the final negotiations on the signing of the fixed link, the provincial government in P.E.I. conducted a plebiscite to determine the wishes of the residents of P.E.I. The result of that plebiscite was 60 to 40 in favour of the fixed link. Recent private surveys have placed that number at 70-30, and I am told by residents of the Island that that figure is actually higher now as the construction has begun.

Indeed, there is a new spirit of optimism on P.E.I. as a result of the contract award, and the Islanders are excited and looking forward not only to the benefits of the construction but also to the post-construction benefits.

A recent article in a P.E.I. newspaper pointed out that real estate firms from all across Canada — some of them, Senator Perrault, as far away as British Columbia — are buying homes on Prince Edward Island, buying land to provide accommodation for the thousands of workers expected during construction. It is then hoped and expected to sell those homes to people who will move to P.E.I. as permanent residents, or at least as summer residents, who will buy in that area because of the more ready access to Prince Edward Island.

I wish to remind honourable senators that the contract called for certain benefits to accrue to Atlantic Canada. Senator Fairbairn, in her excellent introduction, has detailed those but I will point out that at least 70 per cent of the material must come from the Atlantic region.

In addition to that, the federal government has established a supervisory committee to supervise the construction of the fixed link. This committee is charged with certain responsibilities. One of those responsibilities is the environment. The committee has a subchairman who is responsible for the environment, the fisheries, Marine Atlantic workers, and the socioeconomic effects, including the effects on the town of Borden which was created solely as a terminal for car ferries.

You may find it interesting, honourable senators, to realize that one of the problems that this committee is facing is the fact that the town of Borden received $10 million for the development of an industrial site, but the town does not have within its town limits an area for that site. Now it is faced with the problem of either moving out to the surrounding towns and villages or expanding the town of Borden. These are just minor problems that will be solved as time goes on. Of course, the establishment of this committee is in addition to the fact that the Government of Canada has engaged an outside engineering firm to supervise the construction of the fixed link.

Senator Fairbairn has already mentioned that tourism is expected to increase by 25 per cent. I predict it will be a bit higher during construction, as many tourists will want to see the actual construction. I would like for a moment to bring the matter down to the more practical viewpoint as to what this means to Islanders.

Someone with whom I am very well acquainted is a seed potato grower. He has 2.5 million pounds of top quality seed potatoes that he has sold to the Carolinas, and which are to be moved by transport truck. In fact, they are being moved at the present time. To move that amount of potatoes will require the use of at least 65 18-wheelers. An 18-wheeler, while waiting at a ferry terminal, has to run at half throttle, which costs $300 per hour. Honourable senators, 65 times $300 — and I am doing mental arithmetic here — amounts to approximately $20,000 an hour. This illustrates the benefit of this bridge to P.E.I. potato growers. The same sort of benefits apply to the fisheries.

Of course, one aspect that we do not mention too often is that we bring in a great many products from the mainland. If trucks bringing in products have to wait at Cape Tormentine, the cost is added on to the price of the products in Prince Edward Island.

I read the debate in Hansard of the other place on this proposal. I should like to pay particular tribute to the remarks made by the Honourable David Dingwall, the Minister of Public Works, when he introduced the amendment to the Constitution. He was most enthusiastic in supporting the link, and gave all the reasons that anyone could possibly want for supporting it. Honourable senators will understand if I say I wish he had made that speech before a certain event in October, then maybe Prince Edward Islanders would have shown a little more appreciation for the fixed link.

Reading on in the House of Commons Hansard, I was not so greatly impressed with some of the other speeches, including those of some parliamentary secretaries. They referred to the great Liberal promise in the Red Book, which I must say Mr. Martin destroyed in his budget speech. They attempted to create the impression that the fixed link was part of this program. Honourable senators, I was amazed and appalled at their ignorance. Every one of those who made those remarks were present in the last Parliament. They knew that the fixed link was initiated and the negotiations completed by the Mulroney government. I hope they did not fool anyone with their propaganda.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt the Honourable Senator Phillips. However, the rules require that I point out that 15 minutes has elapsed since the honourable senator began his remarks. Does the honourable senator have leave to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, perhaps I had better reread the rules. I thought that when I was replying, I had a little more time. I thank the Chair for bringing that to my attention.

In her remarks, the minister referred to the fact that there was a cooperative effort between the federal government and the private sector, with the private sector providing the funding and receiving, in return, an amount equivalent in value to the subsidy for the car ferry. She also pointed out that SCI is responsible for maintenance, and that at the end of 35 years the fixed link becomes the sole property of the Government of Canada.

I find it interesting to note that other levels of government are now looking at this type of operation. I notice provinces are talking about superhighways and bridges being built under the same financial arrangement. It is not one that I oppose. I have travelled on highways and bridges in both Canada and the U.S. where it is required that a toll be paid. I have never felt that I was being subjected to any undue hardship in having to pay such a toll. I am sure the Leader of the Government would not want me to pass on this subject without reminding her that I take pleasure in noting that present governments are now beginning to appreciate the action of the Mulroney government. I might say that it is better late than never.

The amendment to the Constitution, as Senator Fairbairn has pointed out, is the result of a court ruling. I am not a lawyer. However, I would like to explain it to the lawyers in the Senate in layman's terms so that they will understand it.

Basically, the amendment says that the fixed link may replace the constitutional obligation on behalf of the federal government to provide a car ferry service. Beyond that, I will not go into any great detail because the Chair has already reminded me that I am running out of time, and I have a few more items I would like to mention.

I heard some criticism that the responsibility for a constitutional requirement is placed in the hands of a foreign-owned consortium. Honourable senators, I do not accept this argument. The company responsible for the construction, maintenance and operation of the fixed link, SCI, is incorporated in Canada. Its headquarters are in Calgary, as I am sure Senator Fairbairn is well aware. I do not know why, but for some reason its headquarters are located there. It operates under the supervision of an independent construction firm that was hired by the Canadian government, and it is acting as an agent of the Government of Canada.

The funding for this project was raised in Canada by a bond issue, which was sold out within two days. Most of the bonds were bought by pension funds, which are well managed. Obviously, the managers of these pension funds had no objections to the arrangements that have been made.

Before resuming my seat, honourable senators, I wish to point out that the treasurer for the province of Prince Edward Island, Mr. Cheverie, has come up with some rather convoluted arguments that I find difficult to understand. He has said that the provincial economy will improve because of the actions of the Mulroney government in providing for the fixed link, the GST Centre in Summerside, and other actions that the Mulroney government has taken to improve the economy of P.E.I. Now he is complaining that his great worry is that equalization payments to Prince Edward Island will be reduced.

Honourable senators, that is a convoluted argument; one that is difficult to understand. It is difficult to imagine a provincial cabinet minister presenting an argument like that. He has requested that, when calculating the formula for the Island's equalization payments, the present Minister of Finance exclude the improvements in the provincial economy that will accrue to P.E.I. as a result of the actions of the Mulroney government. I am sure that very soon the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, will close the debate. When she does that, perhaps she can tell the chamber whether or not the government has agreed to Mr. Cheverie's request.

Honourable senators, I will close by asking all honourable senators to support this amendment to the Constitution. It is one that will benefit P.E.I., Atlantic Canada and all of Canada. If you will permit me a personal comment, I was proud to support the Mulroney government that brought in this project.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I do not intend to say much. I have two questions and I will put them forward now so that, at an appropriate time — either now or later — they can be answered.

There has been a report in the public media that the company proposing to build this structure has proposed changes in the design. Honourable senators who attended the meeting of the committee to which Bill C-110 was referred will recall that precise details were given to us at that time as to the design of the structure. While I would not go so far as to say that the report of the committee or the action of this house depended on the information given to us in that committee, it would be fair to say that the precise information on the design influenced the decision of the committee and of the Senate.

Has the design been changed? Has the Government of Canada agreed to a change in the design? If the company proposing to build the crossing structure wants to make a change and the Government of Canada is saying, "Oh, no you don't," what are the considerations that caused the company to think that changes would be desirable? As I understand it, what the company has in mind is a reduction in the height of part of the structure. The honourable Senator Fairbairn, in moving her motion, said that the structure would be 55 meters at its highest point. Could we have information as to what changes, if any, will be made, or can we assume that the specifications given to the committee when Bill C-110 was before that committee are the specifications to which the company is to conform?

The second question is legalistic. Under the terms of the Order by which Prince Edward Island entered the Dominion of Canada, there is a requirement for continuous communication. The Order states that:

> Efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers, to be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland of the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion;

We now have this proposed amendment that a fixed crossing joining the island to the mainland may be substituted for the steam service.

• (1550)

Is it correct to assume that after this amendment is made there still will be an obligation on behalf of Canada to maintain continuous communication? True, the mode for performing the obligation would be different. It could be a fixed crossing rather than the ferry service. However, as I read the Order, there still would be an obligation to provide continuous communication.

One of the reasons I raise this question is the kind of weather we are having today. Is it the intention of the government of Canada to maintain a standby ferry service in the event that for prolonged periods, and I do not mean a few hours, the fixed crossing does not provide the continuous communication required by the Constitution?

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am not sure to whom the question was directed, but regarding the specifications, no one has submitted any changes to me. I would suggest that his question regarding changes in specifications be directed to his fellow Nova Scotian — we might even call him a colleague — the Honourable Mr. Dingwall, the minister responsible. As I say, I read his excellent remarks with great care and I found no mention of any changes in specifications.

Regarding the second part of the question about continuous service and what would happen on a day like today, I find it rather strange that someone who lives so close to the ferry crossings to Prince Edward Island would not know that, on numerous occasions in each year, the car ferry service is closed down because of high winds. I, myself, have waited 12 to 14 hours for a crossing, and I do not expect to wait any longer than that on the fixed link.

I think it is rather a red herring you are drawing across the tracks here, my honourable friend. You know very well that the car ferry crossings have been delayed for longer than that. It is not unusual in wintertime to find the ice-breaking car ferry stuck in ice for 10 to 12 hours, and some crossings require as much as 20 hours. As I say, you are very well aware of that and you are not bringing anything new into the chamber. I think all those from the maritimes are well aware of that.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I was not addressing my questions to Senator Phillips; however, I appreciate what he has said.

Senator Phillips: I was glad of the opportunity.

Senator Stewart: I was addressing the minister. I assume that, insofar as the design is concerned, the government will come up with an answer. Insofar as continuous service is concerned, I said that I am not asking a question that deals with an interruption lasting a few hours. However, we are dealing with a structure that inevitably is fragile relative to its size.

Suppose we get a breakdown? In the case of a ferry, we could try to locate another one, but I do not know what we would do if a section of the bridge collapsed. I am asking a lawyer's question. How is the constitutional obligation of continuous service to be met in such a situation? That is the question, and I will leave it with the minister. She can deal with it at her convenience.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Thank you, Senator Stewart. I will take your invitation and get the information for you. I do not know the answer to the question on a change in the design. I will seek information on that.

As to the reliability of the bridge compared to the ferry, my only comment is that studies by the engineers indicate that it is more likely that the bridge will stand up to the pressures of time and the elements than it is that the ferry will provide consistent service. However, your question is whether there will be a back-up, and I will seek information on that and convey it to you as soon as I can.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I do not want to make a debate, but I have been waiting patiently to ask a question.

My question to the minister follows exactly on what Senator Stewart and others said when we were debating this matter in June. I attended the committee, sadly missed by the press which was titillating itself downstairs waiting for a decision on the so-called $6,000. There we were in the committee room with all the most important people dealing with this issue. In the many questions we had, you may remember that I raised a question. I went into the committee room with great enthusiasm and came out with no answer to my question.

I still have the same question. If there is to be that kind of backup, and there is no doubt in my mind that there will have to be a backup, who will be responsible for paying for the ferry and, of course, for the dock? If you have a contingency plan for a tragedy, which we hope will never take place, you will have to maintain not only a functional ferry but a functional dock, and the upkeep will be very expensive.

I concluded then, and perhaps erroneously, that we would have two systems: We would have a bridge system and we would have a dock-and-ferry system. I have not received an answer to those questions so far.

I wonder why we have this amendment today, because the promise which was made in 1873 was to give steam service. Steam service went out. The last time I went to P.E.I., I did not see any steam service, but I reached the other coast. Yet we did not see then a necessity to make an amendment.

• (1600)

We now have an amendment because we see the words "steam system" are out, and it will henceforth be a bridge. This will be subject to further debate.

I do not need the answer to my question today if the Leader of the Government is not in a position to give me one, but I would be delighted if, in due time, she could get me the information.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Prud'homme, as I am seeking the information for Senator Stewart, I will certainly include your questions as well.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we leave motions, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 15, 1994, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: The ides of March is a bad time for senators to be around.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I gave indication of this yesterday. My motion is in accordance with an agreement reached with my honourable friends opposite. Of course, on every adjournment the Senate is always subject to recall if things should change in the other place. However, at the moment I have no indication that we will have work to do before that time. On that basis, I think it is wise for the Senate not to be spending the money required to have sittings.

However, I urge committees to take the opportunity to work when there is no likelihood of interference with the sitting hours of the Senate. We know in the past that that has been a constant problem.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MERCHANT NAVY VETERAN AND CIVILIAN WAR-RELATED BENEFITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the second reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-Related Benefits Act. — (Honourable Senator Molgat)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not prepared to proceed at this time. However, if there are any other senators who wish to speak on this matter, I urge them to do so.

Senator Marshall was anxious that we proceed with this matter. I am not attempting to hold it up, but I do need to find out whether the proposal has impact on other legislation, because it well might. I have not been able to obtain that information so far. I hope that when we come back, I will be in a position to proceed. I cannot give any indication of what I may find out. It may turn out that I will have to oppose the proposal, if indeed it goes beyond what we expect. I want to leave my options open, but I also want to make it clear that I am not delaying the bill.

Order stands.

PRIVATE BILL

GENERAL SECURITY INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Grimard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, for the second reading of Bill S-3, to authorize General Security Insurance Company of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec. — (Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I adjourn this order in the name of Senator Gigantès.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I apologize. There has been a misunderstanding. I do not want this matter adjourned. I think it is an issue that merits some technical examination. It is not something that we can approve before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has looked at it and searched for all the possible implications. I hope that my honourable friend Senator Grimard will agree with me that this bill should be sent to that committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Grimard, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN VIETNAM VETERANS MEMORIAL—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 22, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to an appeal from the Canadian Vietnam veterans to the federal government to provide National Capital Lands for the site of the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial.

He said: Honourable senators, before I deal with this order, I would like to acknowledge, and call to the attention of my colleagues in the Senate, the presence in the gallery of some Canadian Vietnam veterans, including Mr. Lee Hitchins, President of the Canadian Vietnam Veterans Association, Vice-President Mr. Michael Ruggiero, and other members of the association who have come from Toronto today to hear the case made on their behalf.

With your permission, honourable senators, I would also like to mention our colleague Senator Norman Atkins, who served with distinction with the American armed forces. He shares in the efforts put forth here today, and has expressed his support for the recognition of this tribute to Canadian Vietnam veterans.

I hope that honourable senators will give the usual applause to the Vietnam veterans.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, Canada has always given special recognition and paid respect to its veterans. Their accomplishments in this century's major conflicts, namely the First and Second World Wars and the Korean War, are a source of continued pride and inspiration to us all. Every year on Remembrance Day, we take a moment to pay tribute to their courage and sacrifice, and to remember those who fell in the name of freedom. By doing so, we acknowledge the prominent place they occupy in our history.

This year will be a special one for all of us in Canada when, in a few months, we will commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Second World War both at home and abroad as we participate in the Canada Remembers Programme to honour those Canadians who fought and died for their country.

However, honourable senators, there is another group of Canadian veterans for whom such tributes are extremely rare. Having served in the uniform of another country, these men and women have been largely forgotten. I am speaking, of course, of our Canadian Vietnam war veterans.

Over 10,000 Canadians joined the American armed forces during the Vietnam war and served in Southeast Asia. They came from all levels of society. Some of them, holding joint citizenship and having lived in the United States for some time, were either drafted or enlisted. Others voluntarily crossed the border to join up.

They were young, honourable senators, often in their late teens or early twenties, eager for adventure, perhaps, but certainly believing that the principle of freedom was at stake. Whether they became sailors, marines, infantry or airmen, they served with distinction and honour. In the end, 113 of them lost their lives, and many more were seriously wounded.

Canadians who fought in Vietnam have been described by one historian as "unknown warriors." Few Canadians paid much attention to them at the time, and few today possess any knowledge of their sacrifice. What Canadians do remember is a controversial war in which the Canadian government had no official involvement. Many wonder why the Americans themselves were ever involved, and many question their motives.

Inevitably, those Canadians who chose to fight in what was perceived to be a questionable war in a uniform that was not Canadian were viewed with suspicion. They returned to Canada, like their American counterparts, to suffer at best indifference and at worst hatred and rejection. These men and women deserve a better fate. The politics of the war notwithstanding, they are still Canadians, whether or not they served in another country's armed forces.

I cannot state it better than did Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, a hero of the Vietnam war, when he uttered these words:

> Duty, honour and sacrifice know neither boundaries nor borders, for they live in the hearts, minds and souls of men.

We should not forget that the United States, after all, was then and still is our closest and most dependable ally. As for the legitimacy of the war, that is irrelevant. The Canadians who enlisted in the American forces believed that the principle of freedom was in jeopardy, and they were prepared to die for it. Ultimately, that is all that matters.

Nearly 20 years after the end of the conflict in Vietnam we have now an opportunity to correct, if only in a small way, an injustice, and to recognize the sacrifice of our Vietnam veterans. An American group, the Michigan Association of Concerned Veterans, has financed the creation of a Canadian Vietnam veterans' national memorial in honour of those Canadians who fought and died in Vietnam. A Canadian group of Vietnam veterans, some of whom are in attendance and whom we recognized earlier, have warmly accepted that memorial, and they hope to unveil it in Ottawa in July of this year. I believe the date is July 9.

Senator Edward Kennedy, speaking in the American Senate just last month, stated that Canadians joined the American forces, "because they believed, as good neighbours, that it was the right thing to do..." He referred to Fidele J. Bastarache of Gardner, Massachusetts who, with his family, emigrated to the States from New Brunswick. An infantry sergeant decorated four times for heroism, he was killed in a mortar attack in 1968 at the age of 22. Like many of his comrades, he gave his life protecting the freedom of others.

Senator Kennedy went on to say:

> This memorial will be a fitting tribute to these courageous young men and women who sacrificed their lives serving as members of the United States Armed Forces in South East Asia.

It is probably well-known that one of our previous Chiefs of Staff of the Canadian Forces, General Dextraze, had a son who was killed in Vietnam.

There is a problem, however, honourable senators. The Canadian government seems unwilling to provide a suitable land site. The National Capital Commission, a Crown corporation, has refused to make federal land available on the ground that Canada was not officially involved in the Vietnam war. So what?

In desperation, Canadian veterans approached the city of Ottawa, but it, too, refused the request, because the memorial does not relate specifically to the development of the nation's capital. It certainly would. Finally, the Canadian War Museum was lobbied; but, unfortunately, while the museum is supportive of the concept of a memorial paying tribute to Canadian Vietnam veterans, it does not have any land available. Although I am disappointed that neither the City of Ottawa nor the Canadian War Museum can make an offer of land, I understand their concerns; I cannot say the same for the National Capital Commission. The government clearly has land to spare in Ottawa, but it seems unwilling to cooperate.

I cannot help finding it ironic that, while the Canadian government has dedicated a memorial in Washington, D.C., to the thousands of Americans who crossed the border and joined the Canadian Armed Forces to fight in the First and Second World Wars and in the Korean War, Canada is now refusing a similar request from the Americans. Senator Kennedy pointed out in his recent speech that:

> ...the United States and Canada share a long history of friendship with one another...Canadians and citizens of the United States have repeatedly shown their strong commitment to each other during times of war.

By refusing to make land available for this memorial, Canada is casting a shadow on this friendship, but it is the Canadian Vietnam veterans themselves who are suffering the greatest shame of all. Given the enormity of the sacrifice these men and women made 25 years ago, is it really too much to ask for a small parcel of land in this vast land we call Canada, a country that we love so much? Only a small parcel of land is needed — I think it is only about eight feet by eight feet — to erect a modest but significant memorial in the names of the Canadian and American dead who are listed on the Vietnam memorial in Washington, the famous wall.

It seems only proper that we should initiate this move and that we should have our own memorial to allow veterans, as well as family and friends and those who follow them, which is most important, to remember those they have lost and to offer their respect and admiration in some small way. It may ease their pain and suffering, and they ask no more.

Honourable senators, it is time to accept that Canadian Vietnam war veterans are part of our history. They cannot and should not be ignored or forgotten any longer. This memorial would bear witness to their courageous and unselfish actions and make them a part of our proud military heritage. On behalf of our Vietnam veterans, therefore, I strongly urge the Canadian government to take immediate action to ensure that this dream becomes a reality.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of this debate.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned I should like to ask a couple of questions of Senator Marshall. I received correspondence from the group and I must say, first, I was surprised at the number of Canadians who were involved. I knew three of the lads who were listed among the 113 killed. I replied to a veterans' association, asking what area they would require for a site, but I have not as yet received the courtesy of a reply. I noted that the honourable senator said something about needing a plot about eight feet by eight feet. When I look out of my office window, I can see the War Museum. If what is needed is only eight feet by eight feet, I am sure that area can be found behind the War Museum. I would suggest that, rather than simply speaking to the National Capital Commission, we should be speaking to the representatives on the board.

The United States is building a new embassy. There will be considerable territory around the new embassy. It might be appropriate for the memorial to be placed on the grounds of the new American embassy. Perhaps you would be kind enough to contact the Vietnam veterans and see what they think of that suggestion.

Senator Marshall: I have the specifications for the memorial listed. I made an error in stating eight feet. The specifications are as follows: 11 feet high from earth point; 15 feet total span; 10 feet weight span, centre; six foot wall, front to back; granite weight total, 4,000 pounds; steel structure total, 2,400 pounds; total shipping weight, 7,200 pounds; granite, three-quarters of an inch; free floating frame system; sealed silicone rubber; and many other intricate details.

I do not know when the American embassy will be built. I have heard talk for many years that it is to be built, but we have been around long enough to know that that may be a long time in the future.

Honourable senators, I will be leaving the Senate in nine months, and even though the Canadian Vietnam veterans are much younger than we are, I do not know how long they can wait.

Those are good suggestions, senator, and I will follow them up. I will be speaking to some veterans in room 263-S, and you are welcome to come along, Senator Phillips.

Senator Phillips: Senator Marshall, I invite you to my office to show you the site behind the War Museum. I think there is ample room for a memorial there.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN VIETNAM VETERANS' MEMORIAL—NOTICE OF MOTION TO PROVIDE SITE FOR MEMORIAL

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the Senate will be adjourning for two weeks, I ask leave to move a motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): What is the motion?

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Has notice of the motion been given?

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, the motion reads as follows:

> That the Senate urges the Government of Canada to provide an appropriate site for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial, and;
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the aforementioned action.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators? If not, this item will appear on the Order Paper as notice.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I do not think this motion is in order until I have had the right to talk. I moved to adjourn the debate so that I could discuss, in this chamber, Senator Marshall's proposal.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, the problem is one of procedure. Senator Marshall has proposed an inquiry so that we can discuss the issue. First, we must proceed to discuss it. Then, arising from that, the motion can come forward. To propose the motion now is, in a sense, precluding the inquiry.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE FUTURE DEVELOPMENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 22, 1994, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the future of the Department of Veterans Affairs; and
> That the committee present its report no later than October 31, 1994.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of this debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion for adjournment?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Does Senator Marshall wish to speak on the motion? If he wishes to speak on the motion, he should have the opportunity to do so before we proceed with an adjournment.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, it would be my wish that the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs begin its work. We have waited for quite a while. It is time that we looked at the future of the Department of Veterans Affairs because, after so many years of existence, there are still many problems within that department.

I do not blame the present government, but all governments. As a matter of fact, the Royal Canadian Legion appeared before the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs in the other place. One of their recommendations was that we look at the future of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Veterans are getting older and waiting longer for pensions. I understand that the Bureau of Pensions Advocates, which has a complement of 12 to 15 members, is now down to 4 or 5. They are an important cog in the adjudication process.

Many representations were made from various veterans associations, including the war blinded, ex-prisoners of war and merchant seamen. This might be the time to have a look at the department, instead of commissioning a task force at great cost. The Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology could do that job for the government. That is why I believe we should get moving on this matter as quickly as possible.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I shall therefore put the motion before the house, and that is that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT REGULATIONS—COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXTEND DATE OF PRESENTATION OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. John Sylvain, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, February 23, 1994, moved:

> That notwithstanding the order of reference adopted by the Senate on Thursday, January 20, 1994, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to present its report on the regulations proposed to the Export Development Act no later than March 28, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, the failure of interested parties to arrive at any mutually satisfactory wording for the proposed regulations has meant that the committee wishes to allow them more time for their negotiations. Therefore, more time than originally foreseen is required to prepare the committee's recommendations for government consideration. Leave is requested, therefore, for a four-week extension to the original deadline.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY STATE OF CANADIAN FINANCIAL SYSTEM

Hon. John Sylvain, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, February 23, 1994, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and report upon the present state of the financial system in Canada in the wake of the major legislative and regulatory reform which took place two years ago; and

That the committee present its final report no later than December 22, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has studied and been involved in reform of the financial system. Most recently, the committee played an active role in the regulations arising out of the recent major reform of the legislation governing financial institutions in Canada. Further, the committee stated its intention to monitor development in the financial system once the reforms had been in place for two years. The Minister of State for Finance at the time indicated that the Department of Finance would welcome such a review. It is now time to begin this examination.

The official with the best overall perspective on developments in the financial system, on the relationship between the state and the economy and the health of financial institutions, and on the relationship of our financial system to those in other countries is the Governor of the Bank of Canada. The committee intends to begin its review of the developments in the financial system by inviting the Governor to appear before the committee to address these issues.

I therefore ask this chamber for permission to undertake this examination.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 15, 1994, at 2:00 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 15, 1994

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

MEMBERS OF THE AFRICAN NATIONAL CONGRESS OF SOUTH AFRICA

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform you of the presence in our south gallery of a delegation of officials from the African National Congress of South Africa. They are here to study Canadian parliamentary traditions. They will also spend some time in Toronto in order to get a better understanding of our system of government. We welcome them, and we wish them well in their future careers.

CLERK OF THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF PAUL C. BÉLISLE, ESQUIRE APPOINTMENT OF GORDON BARNHART, ESQUIRE, AS HONORARY OFFICER OF THE SENATE— FELICITATIONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a commission under the Great Seal has been issued to Paul C. Bélisle, Esquire, appointing him Clerk of the Senate and Clerk of the Parliaments.

The commission was read by a Clerk at the Table.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that, by the usage of Parliament, the Clerk of the Senate is required to take the oath of office before the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate.

The oath of office was administered by His Honour the Speaker.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is my privilege to welcome the new Clerk of the Senate and Clerk of the Parliaments, Mr. Paul Bélisle.

Mr. Bélisle is well known to all of us. His connections with the Senate extend back more than 20 years, to 1971 when he began putting himself through university working first as a page in this place and then as a night messenger.

In 1974, Mr. Bélisle earned an honours degree in political science from the University of Ottawa; the following year he was awarded his certificate in public administration from the same university. He then turned his attention to law and, in 1980, earned his degree in civil law. He became a member of the Quebec bar in 1988. All of this was accomplished while he continued to work within the Senate.

In 1979, Mr. Bélisle joined the Senate Committees Branch; he has served there as deputy director and associate director for the last ten years. As some of you may recall, he was clerk of the 1980-81 Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, and has served since 1982 as clerk of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. In addition, Mr. Bélisle assumed many administrative responsibilities while he was associate director of committees, and since 1991 he has acted as clerk with the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and its subcommittees.

Honourable senators, Mr. Bélisle has fulfilled all of these responsibilities with great care and support for the Senate and its members on both sides of this house.

Mr. Bélisle, I welcome you to the floor of the Senate in your new capacity. On my own behalf and on behalf of all of my colleagues, I assure you of our full cooperation in the discharge of your new responsibilities.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would also pay tribute today to Mr. Gordon Barnhart, who resigned as Clerk last week.

For the past 25 years, Mr. Barnhart's career has been built on a foundation of public service. As a history teacher at North Battleford Collegiate, he served his community. As Clerk of the Legislative Assembly in the province of Saskatchewan for 20 years, he served his province. As Clerk of the Senate and Clerk of the Parliaments of Canada for the past five years, he served his country.

• (1410)

Honourable senators, these years have been a transitional period for the Senate, at times both challenging and difficult. Mr. Barnhart met those challenges and discharged his duties in an impartial manner in dealing with both sides of this house.

With his administrative experience, he helped to bring this institution and all of us into the age of computers and technology. He introduced new administrative policies and promoted career development from within the Senate itself. He was active in developing strategic planning cycles for budget preparation. With his assistance, senators, and particularly those who sit on the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, have successfully managed to keep the Senate within its allocations, even during the past three years of budget reductions.

Mr. Barnhart also represented the interests of this chamber in a variety of organizations, including the Association of Canadian Clerks at the Table, the Council on Parliamentary Assistance to Russia, and the Editorial Board of the Canadian Parliamentary Review, of which he was chairman. He also participated in several conferences of Commonwealth Clerks in various parts of the world.

On behalf of my colleagues in the government, I wish to thank him for his service to this house and extend to him best wishes for the future. In keeping with the precedents of this chamber, I am pleased to move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Lynch-Staunton, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(i):

> That the Senate desires to record their deep appreciation of the distinguished service rendered by Mr. Gordon L. Barnhart, Esquire, as Clerk of the Senate and Clerk of the Parliaments; and
> That in acknowledgment of the dignity, dedication and profound learning with which he has graced the office, he be designated an Honorary Officer of this House with an entree to the Senate and a seat at the Table on occasions of ceremony.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I cannot let this occasion go by without making some remarks on the work done and the initiative shown by the ladies and gentlemen who occupy the Table.

Not many who are summoned to the Senate arrive with anything more than a casual knowledge of the duties and responsibilities and, indeed, the privileges shared by these gowned officers of the Senate. Without them, we quickly find out that we cannot be sworn in and cannot make the required attestation. When in session, we rely more often than not on their so subtle signals to know when to sit, when to stand, when to speak and, even more subtly, when to be quiet.

For those at the Table are our authorities on procedure, the keepers of the ancient flames and custodians of many meaningful traditions, anachronistic as they may seem today. His Honour, the Speaker himself is attentive to their cues, and looks to the Table for aid in keeping his wits about him whenever the rest of us are lost in the occasional whiteouts of debate.

The Clerk of the Senate and his tablemates, their costumes notwithstanding, are not here simply to carry out parliamentary procedures steeped in history. In conjunction with their immediate associates elsewhere, they are responsible for the day-to-day running of the Senate, for the preserving, heating and cooling of its buildings, for the oiling of its committees and, yes, for guarding its inmates. Together, they are our most direct link with the hundreds of Senate employees who make this place what it is and, in this most political place, they are expected to be apolitical. In this house of much rhetoric and occasional rancour, they have the impossible task of seeing no evil, hearing no evil, and, as their greatest challenge, of speaking any of the evil which may, on occasion, be shouted and whispered all about them.

Today, as we witness a changing of the guard, this occasion allows us to remark upon the value that we, as senators, place upon our friends at the Table. On behalf of colleagues on this side, I join the Leader of the Government in expressing much appreciation to the retiring Clerk of the Senate, Gordon Barnhart, for services proffered over the last five years when he was at the apex of the pyramid of our administrative staff.

His was not a passive stay among us. Whatever one's opinion of his approach to the carrying out of his responsibilities, at no time could one doubt his goals or intentions, which were always to improve the efficiency of the administration of the Senate. We wish him many rewards and happy times in his future undertakings, and thank him for leaving his successor such a sense of vigorous involvement.

[Translation]

We wish to congratulate Paul Bélisle, our new Clerk. While he is contemplating the opportunities and challenges ahead of him, I want to assure him that, on this side of the chamber, we will keep in mind what was said today regarding how difficult and important is the task entrusted to him and his colleagues.

[English]

The Pages, particularly, will be impressed with the fact that Mr. Bélisle was once one of them, and thus may they look upon him and see themselves, if their aspirations so lead them. But more important, may I urge the new Clerk to look upon the Pages and see himself so that he might continue to share their energy, their enthusiasm, and their compassion. May he accept the gifts of tradition and history, but in so doing, not kink his neck looking backward.

Honourable senators, Mr. Bélisle's is an Order-in-Council appointment, and we are grateful to the Prime Minister for confirming him in his new post. However, with every respect due to all those who have been appointed Clerk, surely the time has come for the Senate to decide on the choice of its own senior officers — and I know that many on both sides of the chamber share in this sentiment. In other words, the Senate should hold and exercise the rights of employer for all its employees, including the Clerk and Black Rod, the other Order-in-Council appointment with important administrative responsibilities. We are, after all, moving in that direction on other fronts. I am standing here as a result of an election by my caucus colleagues. The government and opposition leadership were consulted prior to Mr. Bélisle's appointment. The Speaker of the House of Commons is elected. There are even cheers raised for the election of senators!

This is not the appropriate time to argue the point, honourable senators, so let me just end by saying to those traditionalists who are not convinced that such changes would make things better: Ask the Pages and they will tell you that no guarantees come with democracy; only high hopes.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I too wish to associate myself with the kind remarks made about Mr. Gordon Barnhart. I had occasion to deal with him several times while he was Clerk of the Senate, and I always appreciated his honest, forthright manner.

I also wish to congratulate Paul Bélisle on his appointment. While the Yukon is a long way from Windsor, we were both born and raised in the Windsor area, one from the west side and one from the east side of Windsor. I should like to congratulate those who made the selection for choosing someone with Mr. Bélisle's qualifications, and someone who has spent time in this chamber.

I was a member of city council in Whitehorse for eight years. When hiring, we had a tendency to look outside the territory for candidates. The rule was that if you were to be considered an expert, you had to live more than 500 miles from the community doing the hiring. I am pleased to see that such a standard has changed, and that we have appointed someone with so many qualifications, one who knows the Senate as well as Mr. Bélisle does.

I congratulate you, Mr. Bélisle.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Your Honour — although according to tradition one does not address the Speaker in the Senate, I would prefer to establish a new tradition as far as I am concerned — I simply wish to join in the words of tribute to Mr. Gordon Barnhart.

Since my arrival in the Senate, I must admit that my position as an independent senator has not been an easy one, but I found that this particular senior public servant was a man of complete integrity who was prepared to help, without a hint of partisanship, those who asked for his assistance.

Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to wish him the best of luck in what, for him, will be a new career.

As an independent senator — joined, I am sure, by the other independent senators — I also want to thank him for his excellent services.

I wish Mr. Bélisle, our new Clerk and an alumnus of the University of Ottawa, a very long career. I am always proud when I see an alumnus of the University of Ottawa who is so successful.

Honourable senators, I also hope that the new Clerk, who has already shown that he is capable of keeping an open mind at all times, and this includes meetings of France-Canada, parliamentary associations and committees, will be able to maintain the very high standard of our senior public servants by being absolutely independent, and that he will try to consider the wishes of a few independent senators who want to become more involved in the business of this house.

I feel I must say, for the benefit of the Leader of the Opposition, that I hope that someday we will have this committee on Senate reform. I am not overly fond of the word reform, which now has an entirely different connotation in the House of Commons — or the other place, as I was told it should be called here. Honourable senators, I earnestly hope that we can set aside political considerations and look at the question of making the business of the Senate even more relevant.

I hope that, with our new Clerk and the good advice he will be able to give, we can do so in these troubled times facing Canada today. Honourable senators, I am convinced that the Senate can play an important role, thanks to its independence. I am thinking in particular of the committee on Euthanasia, which, if given a chance to work undisturbed, will produce an excellent report.

I want to say more particularly how happy I am about the appointment of Mr. Bélisle. I agree entirely with what was said by the Leader of the Government who, in the other official language, made some comments which I support, as I do those of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition.

• (1420)

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I wish to speak briefly on the matter before the house. I have known Mr. Barnhart for about twenty years. As honourable senators are probably aware, he was appointed Clerk of the Legislature of Saskatchewan by a Liberal administration, and served in that capacity under Liberal, NDP and Progressive Conservative provincial governments.

In the Senate, although he was here for only five years, I had some dealings with him, particularly several years ago during a fairly difficult period in the history of the Senate. On a few occasions when the Speaker and the then Speaker pro tempore were unavoidably absent, I was in the Chair and occasionally had the opportunity to seek his counsel, knowledge and advice. I found that his experience served him, and those with whom he was in contact, very well. He had the knack of seeing immediately what the point was, and of directing his advice specifically to the point at issue. This is, I think, a very important attribute. He had experience. He had knowledge. He was, in my judgment, totally impartial, in any partisan sense, and performed an important service to this chamber during a difficult period of time. I join with others on both sides of the chamber in expressing appreciation for his service here.

• (1430)

May I also add my best wishes and congratulations to Mr. Paul Bélisle. As the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate stated, the time has come when we as senators, and the Senate as an institution, should perhaps have responsibility for the appointment of the senior officers of this chamber.

All who have known Mr. Bélisle welcome his appointment. Certainly, it is excellent to see that a person who, in a sense, began his career in the Senate has now risen to the highest office, in the official sense, and that augurs well for the future when we can take more responsibility in terms of the appointment of our senior officials.

I wish you well, Mr. Bélisle, during the years to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ST-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE—EFFECTS OF PROPOSED CLOSURE

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I rise today, in my capacity as a senator for the province of New Brunswick, in order to bring to the attention of this house the fact that over 25 per cent of the students enrolled at the Collège Militaire Royal in St-Jean-sur-Richelieu are from Atlantic Canada.

Currently, 601 officer cadets are enrolled at the collège militaire St-Jean. Of this number, 165 are from the provinces of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. The proposed closure of the collège militaire St-Jean will be an additional hardship placed in the way of many maritimers who seek admission to the military college. The collège militaire St-Jean bases its education program on the Quebec education system, which is similar to the system in the Atlantic provinces. Thus, after passing Grade 12 in Atlantic schools, our students are admitted to the collège militaire and need not compete with students who graduate from Grade 13, as is the case at Kingston.

The second reason why the college in St-Jean is of critical importance to students from my region is that, for unilingual francophone students from the province of New Brunswick, like those from Quebec, the collège militaire represents a welcoming cultural milieu through which to enter the Canadian Armed Forces. The specific mission given to the collège militaire in St-Jean was to be an entry point for francophone officer cadets into the Canadian Armed Forces. The college is also an important instrument for the Frenchification of anglophones.

Honourable senators will know that, at St-Jean, francophones are in the majority, and thereby they set the cultural tone. For anglophones, the college provides the opportunity to discover a dominant culture which is not theirs, and thereby anglophone cadets learn to understand and respect this culture.

Many interested Canadians, including the interim leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, the Premier of Quebec, and the faculty at the collège militaire St-Jean, have called for a moratorium on the proposed closure of this national institution. I wish to add my voice to that call.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

BENNY FARM HOUSING PROJECT—APPROVAL OF CMHC PROPOSAL

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, Canadians are often told that we treat our veterans as well as any country in the world. They are reminded that, given the sacrifice these men and women made on our behalf in this century's major wars, we owe them every possible service in return. Sadly, such promises are not always fulfilled, and I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate one such story.

The Benny Farm project in Montreal, owned and managed by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, was one of a series of housing projects built across Canada after the Second World War to provide housing for Canada's war veterans and their families. That project stands on 16 acres of prime real estate in the Montreal neighbourhood of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. There are 64 buildings in all, adding up to 384 apartments. Veterans make up over 90 per cent of the tenants.

It has become increasingly apparent in recent years that the buildings of this project are no longer safe or adequate for the needs of the veterans. For example, there are no elevators, the stairwells and hallways are far too narrow, the fire escapes have no bannisters, the kitchens and bedrooms are tiny and crowded, the bathrooms are unmodified, and there is poor insulation and wiring. This is hardly suitable accommodation for tenants whose average age is over 70.

In March 1991, CMHC announced plans to redevelop the obsolete complex in order to provide its tenants with modern, barrier-free housing. After consulting Benny Farm's veterans, CMHC tabled a proposal with the City of Montreal involving the wholesale demolition of the site's decrepit buildings and the sale of part of the land in order to finance the construction of new units.

Although polls suggested that over three quarters of the residents supported the proposal, opponents of the plan — from heritage activists and architects to local politicians and community groups — quickly gathered strength, and in November 1992 the city rejected the proposal. CMHC was then told to draw up a new plan which involved renovating all or some of the 64 buildings on site.

Over a year later, CMHC finally presented a new proposal which took into account the city's suggestions. The tenants were happy with the details of the new plan and public consultations began in February of this year.

Those plans have recently been completed. It is now up to the Bureau de consultation de Montreal, a municipal body, to assess the plan and report to Montreal's Executive Committee. It is hoped that a favourable report by the BMC will clear the way for final approval by the city, and Benny Farm's tenant veterans will finally have the new housing they were promised three years ago.

Those three years have been very hard on the veterans of Benny Farm. They have been riding an emotional roller-coaster, as the federal government and the City of Montreal haggle over their fate. They have become nothing less than pawns in a bitter struggle. Quite frankly, honourable senators, many of these men and women do not have time on their side, and yet their future has been left dangling. An end may finally be in sight. However, Benny Farm's residents have had their hopes raised before, only to have them dashed at the last moment. Even if the City of Montreal grants approval, new construction may still take upwards of a year.

I therefore urge the present government, and in particular CMHC, to spare no effort in ensuring that this latest proposal receives approval from the city. I need hardly remind honourable senators that the Government of Canada has a long-standing commitment to provide our veterans with affordable and decent housing. Neither the city of Montreal nor the government's concern over the deficit should overshadow that commitment. Nothing should stand in the way of barrier-free housing for these veterans. They risked their lives on our behalf in the name of freedom; the least we can do in this year, the 50th anniversary of the Second World War, is to provide them with the suitable accommodations that they deserve.

ARMY CADET LEAGUE OF CANADA

MYRIAM BÉDARD—RECOGNITION OF INVOLVEMENT AS ARMY CADET

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the subject-matter of my statement is one in which Senator Marshall and I have particular interest. I refer to the Army Cadet League of Canada — the best youth training program in Canada.

Earlier in the session, honourable senators paid tribute to Myriam Bédard after she had won her first gold medal. Since then she has won a second gold medal — an amazing feat. The Governor General has presented her with a special medal in recognition of that feat.

Myriam began her biathlon training in the Army Cadet League. I should like to put her impressive career in that movement on the record.

[Translation]

On October 1, 1983, Myriam Bédard joined Valcartier Cadet Corps 2772. She obtained her green star in May of 1984. In September 1984, she was promoted to the rank of corporal. In October 1985, she was promoted to the rank of sergeant and, after completing her training for the gold star in 1986, she was promoted to the rank of warrant officer. After getting the bronze and silver badges of the Duke of Edinburgh Award in Canada, Myriam Bédard received her gold badge in February 1986.

In the summer of 1986, she attended the command and challenge course at the national camp for army cadets in Banff, Alberta, where she was named best cadet and received the centennial award of the Army Cadet League of Canada. In March of 1987, she was promoted to the rank of chief warrant officer. In 1988, she turned 19, the age limit for cadets, and left the army cadets.

This is an example of what our programs can do for our young people. Here is a young person who, had she not had this opportunity, would probably not be the champion that she is today. She deserves those tributes. She has achieved very great success, and I am really pleased that our army cadet program enabled her to do so well.

THE CONSTITUTION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: It is fashionable these days to write that Prime Minister Chrétien has no real, consistent strategy for Quebec. The truth of the matter is that Mr. Chrétien has a real, consistent strategy for Quebec as part of Canada. As he sees it, the responsibility for any given public service should rest with the level of government capable of offering the best quality of service at the lowest cost, and that level of government should have the tax resources which go with it.

This is the most ambitious restructuring of the relationship between citizens and their governments in the history of this country. Negotiations are under way and progressing well. The provinces will be involved. They will be free to participate in arrangements made by other provinces, or to opt out. This can be done only through administrative arrangements; to use cumbersome constitutional amending procedures in this instance would be like using an axe in watchmaking.

What bothers the separatists, and those who, like Senator Jean-Claude Rivest, fell into the trap — like Obélix who fell into the magic potion as an infant, perhaps — of the separatist discourse is precisely Mr. Chrétien's refusal to take the constitutional approach. The separatists insist on taking that approach because its complexity and rigidity allows them to say that the Canadian federation is unreformable. That is what Mr. Bouchard said in the United States. However, this federation is eminently reformable through administrative arrangements, and that bothers Mr. Parizeau, who said he suspected a federal conspiracy in support of Daniel Johnson, Quebec's federalist premier. As if federal support to Quebec were a sin!

What the separatists are proposing is some out-of-hand separation. I do not think separation is likely, but if it were to happen, I do not think we would see the kind of massacre they had in the former Yugoslavia. It would probably take place without bloodshed and military threats, as in Czechoslovakia. The Slovaks decided to leave. The Czechs said: "Good riddance. We have had it with paying for them while they call us oppressors." Before separating, the two even signed a common market agreement in which they undertook not to alter the economic and trade relations between them.

The separation took effect, and the very next day tariff and non-tariff barriers were in place on both sides of the new border. Economic and trade relations were cut. The Czechs saw their gross domestic product fall 10 per cent, while in Slovakia, the smallest of the two economic partners, it dropped by 35 per cent. Slovak intellectuals were unable to let go of their old habit of blaming the Czechs for everything, and the Czechs were unable to forgive the Slovaks for their continued hostility. The Slovaks are reportedly surprised because they had always thought that Czechs had cash registers in place of hearts, and it was inconceivable that they would do anything that could make their GDP drop. That is how Quebec separatists perceive English Canada.

I predict that the people of Quebec will prefer the Chrétien solution to the Slovak solution. As for recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, Mr. Chrétien and his cabinet have no problem with that. That is why we have a federal system which allows Quebec to be as different as it wants. This is an obvious enough statement to be a truism, like the one uttered by Mr. de La Palice who, you will recall, was still alive fifteen minutes before his death.

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE ST-JEAN—REVERSAL OF DECISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Was the government's decision to close the Collège Militaire Royal in St-Jean-sur-Richelieu motivated by budgetary considerations only, or were there political or other considerations behind that decision?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the decision, and a very difficult one it was, was motivated by budgetary and operational considerations.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the minister for her answer that, indeed, budgetary reduction consideration was the principal reason for closing the military college in St-Jean.

I have a supplementary question: The Department of National Defence issued a publication at the time of the budget, a copy of which I should like to table. That publication states that the annual savings from closing the college would be $23 million. How does the minister account for that statement, given the fact that the present budget for the college in St-Jean is $25.2 million annually, of which $4.5 million is for the salaries of permanent military officers who will remain in the armed forces. Obviously, therefore, it is not possible for a saving of $23 million to be realized at all.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the considerations which led to the decision to consolidate the operations within the facility in Kingston, to the St-Jean decision, to the Royal Roads decision, were all part of the larger and difficult cuts in the budget of National Defence. To answer further, I would need to read again the document that you have tabled. I would be pleased to do that, and perhaps to provide a more specific response for you.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, the Commissioner of Official Languages has also called upon the government not to proceed with the closure of CMR St-Jean because of the negative impact he believes such a closure would have on linguistic duality within Canada and within the Canadian Armed Forces. In view of that, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate lend her support to the suggestion that the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages study this matter on an urgent basis?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I do appreciate the suggestion from the honourable senator. As Senator Corbin has just noted, those kinds of decisions would be for the parliamentary committees themselves to decide.

There is a strong commitment to extend, improve and consolidate the bilingualism aspect of the facilities in Kingston so that, by 1998, all cadets will be required to be fully functional in both languages, and the support systems will be there for that to occur.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—CHANGE IN DESIGN OF BRIDGE—ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT REVIEW PROCESS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, in this my first utterance in this Parliament, I have a question for the honourable leader, to whom I extend hearty congratulations and good wishes on her elevation to that position.

My question follows on one from that very perceptive colleague Senator Stewart who, on the last day of our sitting, addressed a question about the fundamental change in the Northumberland bridge. The high arch, which was considered one of the great achievements of mankind has now been re-examined and researched and lowered by 33 feet. That is a fundamental change in the design which both houses dealt with in the last Parliament. It also means that such important considerations as those stemming from the Navigable Waters Protection Act should be invoked.

I read some very disturbing things. One is that it will be up to Transport Canada officials to decide whether the change in the navigational channel is acceptable. Spokesmen from the Department of Public Works noted that any departure from the bridge design will have to be assessed under the Environmental Assessment Review Process, the very thing for which some of us sought vigorously and in vain in the last Parliament.

This is a profound change, and since this chamber prides itself in taking care as the chamber of sober second thought, and would not want to make an error in this issue of great importance to Prince Edward Island — no debate since that of Confederation in 1873, which was actually before my time, has moved Islanders as much as this — I ask the minister if she and her colleagues would give thought to making sure that, at this stage, the motion is looked at carefully. I should like to think that a Senate committee would hear some of the people who are involved in adjudicating this important change.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the question from Senator Macquarrie, and I thank him for his kind remarks.

Perhaps I might attempt to partially answer the honourable senator's question right now. I understand he will be speaking on this issue when the debate continues today. I intended to attempt to respond to some of the questions that Senator Stewart and Senator Prud'homme had raised. However, if he would prefer that I take the time now, I will.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I do not want to break the heart of such a gracious lady, but actually I do not intend to speak today. I will exercise my right to stand this important issue, in the hope that consideration may be given to having this matter looked at with the great care and attention it deserves.

• (1510)

Indeed, in one other statement that caused me some concern, an official from the Department of Public Works said that a letter from the company which was very anxious to build this structure for its overseas owners cannot be released to the public unless it has been applied for through the Access to Information Act. What in the name of God is in there that would threaten the realm of Canada and the peace, order and good government of all its people? I do not know, but I think we should see that letter.

I think we should hear from these people who are assessing this project. That is one reason why I am not speaking today, and my silence at this time is not because I have nothing to say against the measure.

Senator Fairbairn: I am heartbroken, Senator Macquarrie. I was ready to listen. Indeed, I will be looking forward to your speech.

I will say in a preliminary way, from pursuing the answers to questions posed by our colleagues, that I understand there is a provision in the contract with the builder, which is the Strait Crossing Development Inc., which gives them an opportunity to propose alterations. I am advised that, in this case to date, the builder has requested a clarification in the clearance requirement on the long navigational channel. The information that I have been given is that the request has been whether or not the bridge needs to be, at that point, the full 49 metres across the whole span, or whether it could be curved. That is all I am aware of in terms of requests for alterations by the company. However, I will certainly seek further information as a result of your questions.

As you noted, there is a process in place that is followed when any such application is made. If it becomes a formal application, then it must be reviewed by the Minister of Transport under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and it would also need to be considered under the applicable environmental guidelines and other contractual obligations.

I will carefully read the record of your comments today and try to acquire more information for you.

Senator Macquarrie: That is a good beginning. Thank you.

ATLANTIC CANADA

DEPENDENCE ON SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT—REINSTATEMENT OF SPECIAL INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As she is well aware, in the Atlantic provinces our long-time reliance on the fishery, mining and pulp industries is ending, and the Atlantic economy is, to put it mildly, in extremely bad shape. The road to recovery will be extremely difficult.

To fill the gap, experts and economists have been telling us that the new economy is coming with its hope of high-tech jobs. However, in the meantime, those working in the old economy find it hard to be optimistic. Atlantic Canada's two million citizens cannot foresee any work in the immediate future, and certainly not in the old economy.

Speaking of the old economy, the minister will be aware that, since the mid-1980s, a project called Scotia Synfuels has been attempting to establish a project in Nova Scotia which builds on the strength of Cape Breton's human and natural resources. For those who need reminding, this project involves the coprocessing of high sulphur coal and oil which produces a stream of cleaner burning, environmentally acceptable synthetic fuel. The total cost for the project stands at about $750 million, and the financing has been obtained from private sector sources.

In 1992, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, chaired by Senator Hays, produced an excellent report which said, in part, that the project could provide important socio-economic, technological, regional and environmental benefits to Canadians, but that one measure was paramount. In the recent budget, the Special Investment Tax Credit of 30 per cent was eliminated.

Given that this tax credit is vital to the development of the project, which I understand is ready to proceed with its preconstruction work, and which work will be abandoned if it does not receive these credits, do you know of any steps that are being taken to encourage the government to consider grandfathering this project so that its managers will be able to take advantage of this credit?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator MacDonald for his question. The answer to his final comment is no, I am not aware, but I will make myself aware. I have taken notes on his question. I would appreciate it if I could have a copy of some of the details. I will try to find a response for him quickly, because I share with him a deep concern about the situation of the economy in Atlantic Canada.

Senator MacDonald: To encourage you, Madam Minister, of course you have the report of Senator Hays.

In hindsight, it can be acknowledged that a major part of the success of the splendid campaign run by the Liberal Party in the recent general election was the voters' interest in the creation of new jobs.

Senator Berntson: Jobs, jobs, jobs.

Senator MacDonald: I want to encourage you to take a look at a few statistics from the proponents of this project, indicating that the employment of 2,000 persons could be added to that eastern region of Nova Scotia for up to 35 years. In comparison to the Hibernia project, more permanent jobs will be created by Scotia Synfuels at only 6 per cent of the capital cost. All this would be lost if it were not possible to find a way to restore the investment tax credit, which was always vital to this project, and for which project was declared eligible in 1991.

On page 25 of the publication "Tax Measures: Supplementary Information," an explanation is given for the termination of this investment tax credit. This next may give us our laugh for the day, because I realize that the Leader of the Government in the Senate cares as much for bureaucratese as I do, but here is the language:

> The termination of the Special ITC eliminates the ongoing problems of defining eligible activities and eligible geographic regions and removes economic distortions caused by this initiative.

I would not insult you, Madam Minister, by asking you to tell me what that means, but going back to the days of Senator Godfrey, 10 years ago, we have attempted to find ways to get the government to respond to a report of a committee of the Senate. Senator Marshall has tried. I recall Senator Robertson, Senator Molgat and Senator Murray all in this discussion. We got nowhere. We can ask politely, but Senator Everett had the best idea. He dragged the appropriate officials before his committee and asked them why they had not implemented certain recommendations in the report.

Perhaps I should address the next question to the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Is it not possible that, while examining the Estimates, you could ask officials of the Department of Finance to tell you what they mean by this ludicrous explanation as to why this tax credit was eliminated?

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senator, I see no reason why that could not be done. We have the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements legislation coming before the National Finance Committee in the next few days, and the Supplementary Estimates (B) will be before us as well. Both could act as vehicles to ask the questions you raise.

I remind Senator MacDonald that he is very welcome at these meetings. If he wants to raise the questions himself, he is perfectly entitled to do so. I will make sure he is given due notice of the time of the meetings.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, if I might just intercede with a comment to Senator MacDonald, I will personally seek a translation of the comment he quoted from the budget papers. As one who has spent a great deal of time over the last years promoting the use of plain English throughout the government and beyond, I will be interested in the response.

PUBLIC WORKS

RENOVATION OF EAST BLOCK—SENATE INPUT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and has to do with plans for renovations to the East Block of the Parliament buildings.

The East Block, it should be remembered, is a work-in-progress project. It has been in the throes of renovation almost continuously since the laying of its foundations, long before the great fire of 1916. Most recently, in the sixties and the eighties, millions of dollars were wisely invested in the continuing usefulness of the building.

The good news is that the East Block is in no danger of collapsing, although there are parts in need of repair, and the 1910 wing is, as gung-ho builders like to remind us, unsafe for current habitation.

Last month, I asked honourable senators to consider the money the Senate would need to spend to finish the job that the Department of Public Works is about to begin. Senator Lavoie-Roux, in a speech on February 10, endorsed a delay of the project until the Senate is able to relax the stringent limits imposed to meet the pressures of recession. Between that date and this, the department has announced plans to go ahead and close two committee rooms, build 18 new offices for senators, and establish a visitors' theatre in the Centre Block where the post office is now located.

Honourable senators, my question is this: Is it no longer necessary for the House of Commons to have Senate agreement to proceed with work that involves the shared accommodation on the hill?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): That is a good question, Senator Doyle, and I will endeavour to get the answer for you.

On the question of renovations, my colleague Senator Hastings has indicated that there will be a meeting of the Internal Economy Committee very shortly to discuss the whole subject. However, I will attempt to respond to your question as quickly as possible.

TRANSPORT

NECESSARY REPAIRS TO PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding Canada's largest and busiest airport, an airport that our colleague Senator Keith Davey persuaded Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau to name "Pearson."

Thirty years ago, on February 28, 1964, terminal 1 was opened. It was considered at that time to be one of the finest terminal buildings in North America. In fact, they called it the "Cadillac" of terminal buildings. Today it is not only obsolete, it is in real need of major repairs.

Honourable senators, my question relates to the government's decision to cancel the deal to privatize both terminals 1 and 2, which represented a significant investment in upgrading the airport's facilities. Has the government decided what it will do with respect to making the necessary improvements to terminal 1, and whether it will proceed with construction of an additional runway, which is considered vital to the further development of the entire airport complex?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to my knowledge, those decisions have not been taken. The whole question has been under consideration since the cancellation of the previous arrangement. I will undertake to consult with my colleague the Minister of Transport.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I wish to make one more point. I hope the work that is necessary at this airport is given priority, because that also relates to jobs. When considering the priorities laid down in the Red Book, this work at Pearson is an important consideration. Just as important is the development of that whole airport area, which would translate into many more jobs.

Senator Fairbairn: Your point is well taken, Senator Atkins. I concur that this airport is fundamental to the transportation structure in this country.

THE BUDGET

NEW BRUNSWICK—EFFECT OF CHANGES TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Madam Minister, in the wake of the last budget, New Brunswick may lose as much as $200 million as a result of changes to unemployment insurance. In addition, I understand that Prince Edward Island will lose about $50 million.

A motion has been introduced in the New Brunswick legislature, with the blessing of Premier Frank McKenna, registering concern about proposed UI changes and asking that any proposed changes be delayed pending reform of Canada's income security system.

Is the honourable senator prepared to listen to her Liberal colleagues in New Brunswick and change or modify the UI reforms announced in the budget?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senator, I am always prepared to listen to Premier McKenna and my colleagues in New Brunswick.

As Senator DeWare will know, a number of plans and options are currently under vigorous discussion and study by the Minister of Human Resources and the Human Resources Committee in the other place. These discussions relate to the whole issue of unemployment insurance, training, education, and jobs.

• (1530)

I am not personally aware of the motion introduced in the New Brunswick legislature. I would be glad to have a copy of it. I will certainly draw it to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Human Resources, and get a response or reaction for you.

RULES OF THE SENATE

INFRINGEMENT OF RULE 26

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I do not have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I simply want to point out that rule 26 has been blatantly broken today by every member opposite who has asked a question. Every question had an extremely long preamble.

Rule 26 says:

> A preamble to a question, whether it is asked orally or in writing, is out of order.

I think we ought to respect the rules.

The Hon. the Speaker: Since no one is standing to ask a question, I will point out that the 30 minutes allotted for Question Period have now elapsed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cools, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the Opening of the First Session of the Thirty-fifth Parliament. — (7th day of resuming debate)

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, our speeches are limited to 15 minutes under the Robertson rules, so my opening remarks of congratulations, welcome and good wishes to all must be very brief. They are, however, well meant and they are directed in particular to you, Your Honour, and to the new Leader of the Government in the Senate. As a friend of many years, I am pleased that you and she have been given the honour and the great opportunity for further service that come with your high offices.

As for Senator Lynch-Staunton, my colleagues in the Progressive Conservative caucus know how highly I think of him and of my confidence in him. The new Leader of the Opposition and the new Leader of the Government made opening speeches that were excellent in every way, and I thank both leaders for their kind references to me.

As for the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I never thought the day would come when I would hold out any speech of Senator Gigantès as a model of moderation and constructive thought. I am happy to be able to do so today and, all things being relative, I would especially commend the statesmanlike example of his speech to his seconder, Senator Cools.

Honourable senators, in the autumn of 1984, another newly elected government, that of Prime Minister Mulroney, undertook a program of quite radical change in policy and direction for Canada. A number of major achievements stand out from the period 1984 to 1993: the Free Trade Agreement with the U.S., NAFTA with the U.S. and Mexico, tax reform, spending controls and spending control legislation, monetary restraint, a new regime for foreign investment, deregulation, privatization, changes in patent and copyright law affecting pharmaceutical products, changes to certain universal social programs such as Old Age Security and family allowances and reforms to the unemployment insurance program.

Liberal senators and MPs opposed and, in some cases, obstructed virtually every one of the initiatives I have mentioned. Their speeches are on the record. Yet it is now clear that our successors, the Liberal government of Prime Minister Chrétien, intend no reversal of the main policy direction set out by the Mulroney government. The major changes in economic and social policy brought in by the Progressive Conservatives are here to stay.

We introduced these policies and the new government is now supporting them, not because of some doctrinaire ideological motivation, as some simple-minded commentators would have it, but because those policies provide the only path to future prosperity, to increased opportunity, to improved living standards for the Canadian people. Our friends opposite know this. The reality and the responsibility of governing in the national interest have overtaken the indignant rhetoric of opposition days.

It seems that the success of the Chrétien government, especially in managing the national economy and in managing the public finances, will depend in large measure on how well they follow the path laid out for them by their Conservative predecessors.

I must add, and I hope to return to this later this week in the budget debate, that the budget tabled last month gives some cause for concern in this connection.

However, there are two issues, honourable senators, that I would like to touch on very briefly today, knowing that we will return to them frequently and in detail over the next couple of years. These two issues are social policy and national unity.

In the Throne Speech the government announced its intention to reform, modernize and restructure Canada's social security system. The Minister of Human Resources, Mr. Axworthy, elaborated on this in his speech in the House of Commons on January 31. The minister speaks of "total reform" of the social safety net. He says that all programs will be reviewed: unemployment insurance, training and employment programs, social assistance, income security, aid to education and learning, labour practices and rules affecting the workplace.

Honourable senators, of the matters that Mr. Axworthy proposes to reform, only one, unemployment insurance, is wholly within the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament. Most of the other responsibilities are largely in the hands of the provinces, and many are dependent on financial support from the federal government.

The Throne Speech makes a ritual bow to "working closely and cooperatively with the provinces," as does Mr. Axworthy in his speech. But consider the schedule to which Mr. Axworthy has committed us: committee deliberations in March, a federal government action plan in April, more consultation in the summer, legislation in the fall, a whole new regime within two years. Either this undertaking will turn out to be a lot less than advertised, or it will be, as Mr. Axworthy promises, a total reform of the social security system. If so, it will be one imposed upon the provinces by the unilateral action of the federal government.

If such action overtakes, as it is beginning to do, the scheduled revision of equalization — and we have a bill before Parliament now to renew the equalization program for five years — of Established Programs Financing and of the Canada Assistance Plan, then social programs in this country could be in a chaotic situation before too long, especially with regard to their financing. Our concern should be with the people whose lives will be affected by these reforms.

In his speech to the House of Commons, Mr. Axworthy denied that the undertaking is driven mainly by budgetary pressures. I quote him from page 610 of the House of Commons Hansard:

• (1540)

> There are voices out there — I have heard them from time to time in this House — that say redesign is simply a code word for cutting costs. They are wrong. The purpose is to find out what really works so that we can help people get back to work. That is the purpose of redesign.

That speech was made on January 31. Three weeks later in the budget, Finance Minister Martin gave us his bottom line. The bottom line is that two years from now, at the start of the fiscal year 1996-97, there will be at least $4 billion less every year for federal support of social programs than was the case before the budget. Four billion dollars is a lot to take out of that system.

The transfers to the provinces for social programs in 1996-97 are to be no higher than they were in 1993-94. That will be a loss of $1.5 billion in 1996-97. Then there is the $2.4 billion to be saved annually — starting in 1995-96, by the way — by way of changes in eligibility for unemployment insurance announced by

Mr. Martin in his budget — and there is more to come. The bottom line may turn out to be a moving target, as Mr. Martin has certainly indicated it is when he speaks of minimum savings to be effective, and the first phase, and so forth. Mr. Axworthy speaks of restructuring parts of the unemployment insurance program and the Canada Assistance Plan. I will return to some of these matters in the budget debate later, if I get an opportunity.

We have had some experience with these matters in the 34th Parliament. In 1990, Parliament approved the Conservative government's Bill C-21 which lengthened qualification periods, shortened the benefit duration periods and took other steps for the purpose of transferring so-called passive UI funds to active developmental purposes such as training, mobility assistance and so on. In 1993 we made further changes with Bill C-113. These reforms were far reaching, they were controversial, and they were fought tooth and nail by our friends opposite. Now Mr. Axworthy, with a push and a shove from Mr. Martin, intends to go further, faster.

Honourable senators should be concerned. All of the reforms being considered now and alluded to in statements by various federal and provincial ministers and officials, have been floating around for a fairly long time. They have all been on the table before. Previous governments have not proceeded with them. This is partly because of timing: We had quite a serious recession in 1990-91, and we are now only mid-way through a worldwide economic restructuring that is having serious repercussions for Canada.

However, beyond the question of timing, it is easy enough to identify the shortcomings and the disincentives in the present system — and goodness knows there are fiscal pressures. What is not clear is whether the proposed changes, sound and logical as they may appear to be in principle, really will increase opportunity and security for those who are dependent on the present system in a period of almost unprecedented economic turbulence and uncertainty. The blunt question — training for what? — stumps the experts who are trying to put new so-called incentives into the package of assistance for the Newfoundland fishermen, for example. The government should beware lest, without intending to, it imposes measures that are coercive and punitive on people who have nowhere else to turn.

My own view, for what it is worth, is that a lot of this stuff is not yet ready, as they say, "for prime time." It is not yet ready to be implemented on real people in the real world. If the government contents itself with a series of pilot projects, then no harm will be done. In the real world, unemployment insurance, education, training, retraining, social assistance, income security and placement are linked, and far-reaching reform can only succeed if it is truly a cooperative undertaking with those on the ground who know the problems best in their human as well as in their social and economic dimensions: the provinces, education, business, labour and others. I have not even mentioned the vastly different economic and social conditions that exist from one part of this country to the other, and must be taken into account.

The schedule set out by Mr. Axworthy and Mr. Martin's budget suggests strongly to me that the die has been cast, that the key decisions have already been made and will be imposed by Ottawa on the other parties. Honourable senators should be concerned.

Honourable colleagues, with regard to the transcendent question of national unity, let me say in passing how regrettable was the decision announced in the budget to close the Collège Militaire Royal in St-Jean, to which reference has been made during oral Question Period today. This decision is reminiscent of another issues 18 years ago which became known in the political shorthand as "les gens de l'air." At issue was the question of the use of French by francophone pilots and air traffic controllers in the air space over Quebec airports. The issue was badly mishandled by the government of the day. It caused the resignation of Jean Marchand from the cabinet. Significantly, and sadly, when Quebecers and French Canadians looked to the major opposition parties in the Commons to speak for them, they found little or no support from those quarters either.

The issue became a political flashpoint. It took on symbolic importance; it demoralized federalists in Quebec; it offended French Canadians, and, in my opinion, it contributed to the 1976 election of the Parti Québécois government in Quebec.

In Parliament today, the Bloc Québécois has been vocal but it lacks credibility on the issue, for obvious reasons. The Reform Party would abolish Canada's linguistic duality, so one cannot expect much from that source. It would be helpful if Liberal, NDP and Conservative parliamentarians would take the lead of the Honourable Jean Charest and urge the government to rescind this decision for the best of all reasons: national unity.

At issue here is the question of offering francophone officer candidates the opportunity to qualify in their own language. The decision to close that place was a blunder. In terms of armed forces personnel objectives and the federal language policy, it is almost indefensible. In the context of national unity problems today, it is inexplicable. I say to the government, do not force Quebec federalists to carry on their shoulders, into a provincial election and beyond, the burden of this ill-considered decision. Make an elegant, strategic retreat while there is still time to do so.

On the wider issue, let me say that I share completely the concerns expressed earlier in this debate by Senator Beaudoin and Senator Rivest, and from quite another perspective by Senator Ghitter of Alberta. I have been encouraged by statements made by the Minister of Intergovernmental Relations, Mr. Massé, on the day the Chrétien government took office, and by a very good speech made by Mr. Massé on December 1 to the National Conference on Government Renewal. Acknowledging that constitutional reform is unlikely to succeed at present, Mr. Massé suggested we could, within the present Constitution, have what he called "a very different allocation of resources" if there is a need for that.

I quote Mr. Massé as reported in the media:

> We may see, agreement by agreement, and over time, a significant change in the roles of the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Massé went on to say:

> Quebec is, of course, a distinct society and can, in some ways, be treated differently as long as all provinces are treated equitably.

Since then, the federal government has been sending rather negative signals as to openness and flexibility on these matters. I trust the progress report on these negotiations which Senator Gigantès purported to give us earlier today is well founded.

An example of the problem, however, is Ottawa's refusal to implement the agreement in principle on job training reached between Prime Minister Campbell and Premier Bourassa. I thought I heard Prime Minister Chrétien speak quite positively on television about that agreement during one of the Christmas interviews. I had some hope that he would carry through.

This is an area where there is a history of successful cooperation between the public and private sectors in Quebec. They do not accept the Ottawa argument that its implementation of this agreement must be delayed pending the review of the social security programs. If the federal government persists in this approach, they will play into the hands of the separatists, who will need only to repeat the arguments of the provincial Liberal Party and of the largely federal business community in Quebec in favour of the agreement, and then hold up Ottawa's refusal to implement it as another illustration of the inability of the federal system to adopt and accommodate Quebec's needs.

Apart from this area, I realize that the federal and provincial governments cannot be expected to conclude in a few months negotiations on the kind of administrative agreements referred to by Mr. Massé. However, there is time for Mr. Massé and the government to put some flesh on the bare bones of his earlier statements.

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret to interrupt the honourable senator. However, since he reminded me of the 15-minute rule when he first stood up, I feel I must ask leave of honourable senators for Senator Murray to conclude his remarks.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: I will not abuse the courtesy which has been extended to me, honourable senators. I am coming quickly to a conclusion.

As I said, there is time for Mr. Massé and the government to put some flesh on the bare bones of his earlier statements. He could articulate a more modern vision of Canadian federalism. He could open up some possibilities for devolution and for ending overlap and duplication. I think he can put together an interesting and attractive package. In so doing, he would provide encouragement and leadership to the federalists in Quebec.

The interventions of Senator Beaudoin and Senator Rivest suggest to me that a stubborn reliance on the advantages of the status quo will not be enough for Quebec federalists to win an election, or a referendum if it comes to that. The government should heed our two colleagues. Mr. Massé should be encouraged to follow through on his earlier statements. The government should seize this opportunity to remove from the federal Liberal Party the yoke of Trudeau dogmatism in Quebec-Ottawa relations and put this relationship on a new and more stable basis.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure to rise and take part in this debate on the Speech from the Throne. As I am sure honourable senators are aware, this is traditionally a general and far-ranging debate, and there are some specific items which I wish to address.

Before I begin, however, I wish to express my personal congratulations to my fellow New Brunswicker, Senator LeBlanc, on his ascendancy to the Chair of the Senate. His are weighty responsibilities. I know he will fulfil them with distinction. I should also like to bring to him greetings from our home riding of Beauséjour.

In a similar vein, I wish to congratulate Senator Fairbairn, the first women to lead the government in the Senate. Viewing her performance over the last three and a half years, I have seen her strong capabilities and the reasons she qualifies to take this honour in the Senate.

I would also like to congratulate my own leader, Senator Lynch-Staunton, and pledge to him my loyalty.

The new Parliament is, of course, a great source of satisfaction for the members of the Liberal Party. I want to join other senators in wishing success to Prime Minister Chrétien. He has received a clear mandate to govern from the people of Canada, and they have high hopes for his government. The democratic will of the people, expressed in a general election, is a weighty responsibility.

For our part, the onus is on us to conduct a frank self-examination, to acknowledge where mistakes were made and to identify where changes are necessary. It is a process which I believe is already well under way. In the meantime, we have an important role to play, one which honours our Constitution and the over two million Canadians who supported our party, even in defeat.

The Liberal Party promised great things to Canadians, and we will be here to ensure that this government does not forget its promises. Among them is a new civility and openness in politics, a lowering of partisanship and acrimony in debate, and a willingness to approach the problems we face as a nation in new ways.

There are some of us with longer memories who have reason to be sceptical about the sincerity of these commitments. We have not forgotten the Liberal Party's assumption that they were Canada's natural governing party and that all dissenting voices were simply ill-informed or, worse, ill-meaning. Honourable senators, I want to suggest with respect that if Canadians were to see the attitude of the government as expressed by the seconder to the motion that is now being debated, they would find great cause for concern. They would see in those words that nine years in opposition taught no lessons to certain members of the Liberal Party.

Honourable senators, we approach our duties to our country and our debates in this chamber on the understanding that all hold the best interests of our nation at heart. We accept that persons of honest goodwill can have honest disagreements about how those goals should be ordered or achieved. At times, in the heat of debate, all of us may have succumbed to the temptation to overstate our causes. However, how are we who sit on this side — the majority side of the chamber — to respond to suggestions that, as a party, we ruled Canada with malice for her citizens? Honestly, what seeds of division and ill-feeling are sown by such an attack? Are we to build these new politics on statements that the members of other parties ruled through the promotion of greed, jealousy, prejudice, division, regionalism or even racism?

Honourable senators, I do not wish to belabour this point any further, lest I descend to that which I now condemn. I do want to ask each of us not to go so far. If the fabric of our nation is in need of repair, words like those uttered by the government seconder of the motion only serve to rend it further. Attacks such as those serve no cause so well as those of partisanship, division and acrimony. We seek a better way in this chamber. I hope that we are united in our belief that Canadians deserve no less.

Honourable senators, I want to turn now to the Speech from the Throne itself. To begin with the obvious, it is a surprisingly sparse document, especially from a party which prided itself on the scope and detail of its policy manual. I would feel much better about this government if its first major statement in power showed a fraction of the effort which the party expended in its election propaganda. While it may be true that the sizzle sells the steak, the election is now over, and Canadians may be surprised to see how little meat there is in the government's policy. Let me be frank with members of this government: There are great expectations of you, but there is also an underlying fear that yours will be a government of style without substance. This Speech from the Throne does little to respond to the real desire of Canadians for action and leadership on issues of pressing concern.

One of the most remarkable things in this Throne Speech has been the near-total neglect of Atlantic Canadian issues and concerns. Aside from the brief nod to the fishery, which is in crisis, Atlantic Canada seems to have escaped the attention of the government altogether. How soon the great Liberal Prime Minister forgets the place of his political transplanting.

Sometimes silence can be golden, but many thought that the silence in the Speech from the Throne was ominous. Now we see they are right. The proof comes in the budget, which strikes at the most vulnerable region of our country and the most vulnerable sector of our society above all others. In areas with limited infrastructure, senators should understand that closures of bases have a disproportionate impact. Communities such as Chatham have no capacity to absorb the loss of jobs that a base closure brings. These cuts, both in Chatham and Moncton, will drag down entire portions of the province. I quote from the Fredericton Daily Gleaner editorial, speaking of the Chatham closure:

> This loss will create a devastating impact, not only on Chatham, but the entire Miramichi region.

• (1600)

Honourable senators, what kind of leadership is this which hurts most those least able to endure it? New Brunswick Minister of Finance, Allan Maher, a Liberal, says that the changes to UI will cost that province alone $200 million, and $100 million is being cut from ACOA, a program which New Brunswick's Liberal premier described as "perhaps the best tool for regional development and diversification ever seen in Atlantic Canada."

Atlantic Canada was ignored in the Speech from the Throne, but we wish we had received similar treatment from the budget. What we are seeing now is a betrayal of the hopes of our region and a betrayal of the faith that Atlantic Canada placed in the Liberal Party.

What shall we say, then? It is fortunate for all of us in Atlantic Canada that they elected Mrs. Wayne, one of the two finest members in the other place. All of us who know her know that she will fight for Atlantic Canada, but what of the Liberal members of the caucus who were there? Where were they when Mr. Martin laid out his plans to gut our region's infrastructure? Where are their voices among those of the many Atlantic Canadians who are dismayed, disillusioned and disheartened by this government?

What is the signal to Atlantic Canada? Not that this government is committed to making our region a full partner in the economic life of the nation, nor that our special needs are understood or addressed. Today many Atlantic Canadians are wondering what good it did them to follow the Pied Piper of Shawinigan. Perhaps they should have embraced some more factionalist element, as have Canadians elsewhere. These are the questions being asked when it seems that the only reward that Atlantic Canada has received for its support of the Liberal Party has been to be taken for granted.

Honourable senators, it is all very well to crow about elections won and quote from great works of literature, but the Liberal Party has to remember that that is not what governing a country is about. Governing a country is about putting people to work, giving their children a chance for a better future, and managing their tax dollars wisely and effectively. This is where the rubber hits the road. This government's first efforts are not at all encouraging.

I say to honourable senators opposite: Your leader, Mr. Chrétien, of whom you are so proud, said that his government's priority would be jobs. He set the focus, not us. He drafted and printed and waved his shiny Red Book all across this country and boasted of his government's plan and its team. Very well; get on with it. You have said the problems we face are urgent, and we agree. Start putting Canadians back to work in the way that you promised.

In order that these issues can be discussed, I raise the matter of an urgent need for work to begin on the Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick. Transportation links are the key to development of the region and the bonds that keep the country prosperous and united, and that create jobs. As the connector for the rest of the region, New Brunswick's deplorable highways hurt all of Atlantic Canada. Members of the Liberal Party have often spoken of their commitment to this needed infrastructure. Now they have the opportunity and the obligation to show that they meant what they said.

Senator Corbin: Hear, hear!

Senator DeWare: Let us begin construction on a four lane Trans-Canada highway through New Brunswick this year.

I also call on the government, in the wake of its many base closures, to make efforts to minimize the impact of those closures, especially when they occur in smaller communities. Specifically, in my own area, I ask the government to consider the alternative use proposals which have been developed for CFB No. 5 in Moncton. These are responsible suggestions that would allow the government to make substantial savings without devastating the character and the economy of the Moncton region. A government which "attaches a high priority to job creation" must surely recognize the value of such alternatives. Members of the community committee have met with the minister and presented their proposals to him. I ask for senators on the government side to use their influence to make those proposals a reality.

The Throne Speech also repeats the government's promise to replace the goods and services tax. "Replace" is a newer word here. The government used to speak only of "removing" the GST. But their present phrasing is more honest. How much more honest we will know when we see with what the government plans to replace the GST. Clearly they must not impose a tax which punishes exports and encourages Canadians to buy imports, as the old taxes did. But will they be honest enough to let Canadians see what they are paying, or will this be another hidden tax which strips the power from the purchasing ability of Canadians like an unseen pickpocket? Time will tell. Some of us with long memories remember all too well the Liberal Party's campaign in 1980 against gasoline excise taxes and their subsequent record in government, where they raised taxes far beyond what they campaigned against. We shall be watching carefully to see if the government has learned any lessons in honesty since then.

Honourable senators, I want to turn quickly to two other proposals which received quick mention in the Speech from the Throne. The first is the Youth Service Corps. Many of us recognize the need for a real program to help our youth receive training and discipline in order to succeed in this life. This is an area where we will be looking for more details with much interest.

Finally, I want to mention the reference to the pre-natal nutrition program. This program was created by Conservatives and funded through the Brighter Futures program. The results have been very exciting. As more and more research comes in highlighting the importance of pre-natal nutrition to later life, the need for this program to be expanded becomes more apparent. I was glad that this received mention in the Throne Speech.

Honourable senators, as I stated, this Throne Speech is the lightest we have seen in a great many years. We hope that does not reflect the government's commitment to action. We will be watching as the government brings forward its legislative program, and we look forward to working together for a better Canada.

On motion of Senator Berntson, debate adjourned.

MERCHANT NAVY VETERAN AND CIVILIAN WAR-RELATED BENEFITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the second reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-Related Benefits Act.—(Honourable Senator Molgat)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would ask that this matter stand again. I know that Senator Marshall is anxious to proceed and I want to assure him that I am not trying to hold up the matter. The problem, as I have it from the department, is what effect this bill will have. They have not yet been able to give me an answer concerning that, but I will be prepared to speak to this order on Thursday, if that is suitable to Senator Marshall. I want to assure him once again that I am not trying to delay the matter.

Order stands.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to an appeal from the Canadian Vietnam veterans to the federal government to provide National Capital Lands for the site of the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, without any doubt, Senator Marshall has been the great defender of veterans in this country. As a veteran, I thank him. This proposal that he makes does him credit.

However, I have enquired around among veterans' organizations, and they are not certain about this measure. I am not opposed to it; I am simply saying that we should discuss it more carefully amongst ourselves. My veteran friends tell me there are certain traditions that we honour with Canadian monuments to Canadians and others who have fought in Canadian wars. I know there were Canadians who fought in the Crimean War, but in those days we were a colony. Therefore, our ancestors were fighting as British soldiers in British units. In the Boer War, Canada was still much more an integral part of Great Britain and Great Britain's war efforts. Canadians who fought in the Boer War were fighting in a war that was Canada's, in a sense, because Canadian units went there.

• (1610)

There are other precedents in which Canadians participated, but these were not Canadian wars and, therefore, those who fell in those wars were not honoured. One of them was the Italian war in which the Savoy dynasty took power in Italy. There were Canadians and Americans who enrolled in Zouave units and went to defend the Papal territories. We have not honoured those in monuments in Canada.

We have honoured Americans who came and joined the Canadian forces in wars in which Canada was engaged because they were fighting under our flag in our forces.

Maybe there are precedents, but I do not know of any. If I am correct that there are no precedents, we did not honour such soldiers because this kind of honour is a tradition. In matters such as honouring war dead and the brave acts of people who fight under our flag, tradition is surely important. Military orders and monuments are part of this tradition.

We should look into this matter further and continue this inquiry. I would love to hear from other members of the Senate on this issue because, as far as I can see, by erecting such a monument we would be breaking a precedent.

I am not disputing that the Canadians who went to Vietnam and fought under an American flag did so, as they say, to defend freedom. However, Canada was not a combatant in that war. In fact, we were acting in various ways as non-combatant arbiters, trying to put an end to this war. There were Canadian missions on the various peace negotiations which went on for years and years. We were neutral in that war. We were out of it.

There were Canadians who fought under the American flag in Vietnam. There were Canadians who fought in the French Foreign Legion when the French were defending their colony against the Viet Cong liberation movement, before the Americans took over. Do we honour members of the Foreign Legion?

There were Canadians who fought in the International Brigade in Spain against the Franco forces. We have not erected a monument to them. Yet, our enemies in the war which came immediately afterwards, the Germans and the Italians, were in Spain on the side of Franco, and one could say that Canadian members of the International Brigade were fighting in anticipation against nations which would become our enemies very shortly thereafter, just as Americans who joined Canadian forces in World Wars I and II were fighting in anticipation against countries that were to become the enemies of America.

I do not see a parallel. I do not see anything in our tradition that fits the case of Canadians who went to fight under the American flag in Vietnam. However, I would like to hear the opinion of other senators on this, and I hope many of them will speak.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: May I ask a question of Senator Gigantès? There is a controversy in the United States stemming from allegations that full veterans' benefits are not being extended to Canadians who fought in the American army in Vietnam. I would like to know whether the honourable senator has any firm information on this point. Perhaps Senator Marshall has some information on the current case before the American government in which Canadian veterans are said to be denied U.S. veterans' benefits?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to that question. I just do not have the information. However, we could find out. Perhaps Senator Marshall knows?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, Canadian Vietnam veterans, through our foreign relations office, are in touch with the American Department of Veterans Affairs, and they get certain benefits.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, my suggestion is that if, in fact, the Americans are unwilling to provide benefits for Canadian veterans who fought and died for them, surely a case can be made to resolve that issue first.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, the veterans do get benefits.

Senator Perrault: I understand that they do not get full benefits.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senator, I cannot answer you fully at this moment. I will ask the question.

We must remember that the Americans are donating a memorial to Canadians. It is a matter of recognizing the 113 Canadians who died. In talking about tradition today, there is nobody who believes more in tradition than I do. Unfortunately, our traditions are diminishing too fast. I do not want to say too much because I might be accused of ending the debate.

This matter arose in the U.S. Senate. Senator Kennedy was a strong supporter of the Canadian Vietnam veterans, as was Senator Kerry, who was a hero in the Vietnam war. Traditions aside, 113 Canadians lost their lives in that war. I think we owe their families a remembrance. It is only a matter of a piece of land being provided to erect a memorial; a piece of land in this vast land of Canada for a memorial to recognize those 113 who died for peace.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a suggestion for the honourable senator: In various locations across this country, we have international peace parks right at the border. There is one in British Columbia. Half of the parkland is held by the United States and half by Canada, but neutral parks have been created. One of those parks may be the ideal location for the Americans to erect that monument — on the border, in their territory.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, in the short space of time since I introduced this inquiry, we have had five offers of locations for the memorial. I will be flooding this place with petitions starting next week.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would ask Senator Marshall's opinion on whether or not the land that has been given to the United States along Sussex Drive in Ottawa on which to build an embassy would be a good place? It is not a great deal of land. The Americans would be honouring, on land belonging to them, Canadians who fought under the American flag. It would be here in Ottawa, and if Canadian veterans' organizations wished to go and lay wreaths on that monument, there it would be.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I am glad we are having this debate. That is one choice, and I will bring it to their attention. They may accept it. However, there are other choices. That would not be their first choice.

In any event, I am pleased that we are having a debate on this very important question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if I have no more interventions on this inquiry and no motion to adjourn this debate to another day, then I would have to declare the inquiry debated.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Berntson, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE FUTURE DEVELOPMENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Simard:
>
> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the future of the Department of Veterans Affairs; and
> That the Committee present its report no later than October 31, 1994.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Senator Marshall, Senator Graham and I would like to speak to you on this matter. Because we wanted information, we asked questions of certain officials and ministers on this issue, and now we wish to discuss it with you. Therefore, I would stand the order, but not for long.

Order stands.

HEALTH

EXTENSION OF VETERANS INDEPENDENCE PROGRAM TO SENIOR CITIZENS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, February 9, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the advisability of extending the Veterans Independence Program to all Canadian senior citizens.

He said: Honourable senators, I am ready to speak on this matter. I will take about 20 minutes, but I could speak for ten minutes today, adjourn the debate, and continue at another sitting. I leave it to the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, you have heard Senator Marshall's suggestion. Are you prepared to agree to this procedure?

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: I should like to hear what the normal time limit is. Does the honourable senator have unlimited time?

The Hon. the Speaker: I am informed that the time would be 15 minutes in total.

Senator Marshall: Your Honour, I take it that my request for an extension to 20 minutes is not in order? It is not acceptable?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senator, asking for leave before the 15 minutes is reached puts me in a difficult position. However, I am in the hands of the Senate, and I think it would be Senator Marshall's privilege to ask for leave when the 15 minutes are terminated normally.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator Marshall, there will be no problem in giving you the extension. We know how much work you have done on veterans matters and how dear this topic is to you. However, I think it would be better procedurally to agree to an extension when you reach the time limit.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I do not mind our making exceptions to the rules, but we do have rules. If we proceed in this fashion with one senator on one topic, I hope the house will be understanding when it comes to another senator on another topic. I will not oppose anything that is agreed to here today, but let the record show that —

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Order! Order!

Senator Corbin: What do you mean, "Order"? I am speaking on a point of order.

Senator Kinsella: The Speaker is on his feet.

Senator Corbin: I did not see the Speaker. I am sorry.

We have been told in no uncertain terms that these are to be the Rules of the Senate — your holy rules. I do not mind playing by the Rules of the Senate, but if we are building a tradition of exceptions, I want those exceptions noted, and I want them to be considered precedents when another senator wishes the same privilege.

Senator Molgat: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: I apologize to Senator Corbin. Perhaps his hearing piece was not connected when I indicated that I would have some difficulty giving a five-minute extension before the 15 minutes were used up. In other words, I do not think we could engage in such a practice as giving leave by notice on some preceding day.

When the honourable senator has reached 15 minutes, I believe we will extend the normal courtesy to him and ask if there is leave for him to continue.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I take this opportunity under Order No. 5 to call the attention of the Senate to the advisability of extending the existing Veterans Independence Program to all senior citizens in Canada. The subject is worthy of serious consideration by this chamber and by the government. Even though the program is at present limited to veterans who are seniors, it is one which could be readily adapted to all senior citizens because of advantages in its practical approach to the health care needs of our growing senior population, and, most important, because it provides a better service and proven savings to the public purse, something which is so vital in our present overwhelming health care cost environment.

Honourable senators, the recent Throne Speech emphasized that:

> Canada's universal Health Care System is founded upon the principles of the Canada Health Act and the government is deeply committed to these principles and rejects any measure which undermines them.

That is a very noble proclamation, honourable senators.

The Throne Speech also announced the creation of a National Forum on Health to be chaired by the Prime Minister to foster, in cooperation with the provinces, a national public dialogue on the renewal of Canada's health care system.

I am sure that all seniors across Canada are waiting in anticipation for these laudable initiatives to become a reality, and I hope that my contribution today, and perhaps at the next sitting, will provide a basis for consideration that might help in one aspect of health care.

Honourable senators, for many years researchers in the field of health care economics have warned that changes in the age distribution of the Canadian population, combined with fiscal restraint in the delivery of health care services, will make it very difficult to maintain present levels of entitlement. Current estimates suggest that, by the year 2036, approximately 29 per cent of Canadians will be over 65 years of age, a dramatic increase from 11.6 per cent in 1991. That means that there will be increasing pressure on health care delivery budgets, and the relief of those pressures is an important feature of the Veterans Independence Program.

A wealth of evidence indicates that seniors require expanded services as well as greater flexibility in their delivery. As a matter of fact, a study on accessibility to hospital services by our own Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology in 1990, under the then Chairperson, Lorna Marsden, and the Deputy Chair, Senator Robertson, made it clear that failure to respond to this situation will likely mean that an ever greater number of senior citizens will have to depend on institutionalized health care.

It has been calculated that unless alternative measures are taken, every single hospital bed available today will be occupied by someone aged 65 or over by the year 2031. Canadians will require 100 million bed days per annum by that time, compared with 41.5 million in 1984, and 90 per cent of that increase will be caused by the growing needs of the elderly. Of course the requirement for more hospitals will tax our already exorbitant deficits.

Representing about 11 per cent of the population at the present time, senior citizens need acute facilities more frequently than other groups, and their average length of stay is twice that of other groups. Some of this is perfectly natural, for there is a dramatic increase in the use of acute care hospital services in the short period before death. However, hospitals complain that too many acute care beds are being occupied inappropriately by patients awaiting transfer to chronic and extended care facilities, or by patients who cannot go home because of inadequate community support and home support systems. The estimates of such range from 10 per cent to 35 per cent. Compared to many European countries and even to the United States, Canada has already a larger percentage of seniors living in institutions. This is one of the most expensive and least desirable solutions for the long term care of our elderly.

• (1630)

Honourable senators, Canada already has a proven program, the Veterans Independence Program, which enhances the living conditions of seniors in their own familiar surroundings, and at the same time reduces the need to send seniors to hospitals and other institutions at much greater cost. As former Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, I have followed the progress and have been very impressed with the Veterans Independence Program. As far as I am concerned, the VIP is one of the most worthwhile and sensible veterans' programs to be introduced since World War II. Not only has it been a model program, encouraging independent living among veterans and thus enhancing their quality of life, but it has also saved the taxpayer a lot of money by reducing the need to place veterans in nursing homes and other institutions. I do not hesitate to say that the program was introduced by the Liberal government in 1981.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Marshall: It has been improved over the years since by extending it to more veterans until, at the present time, about 94,000 veterans are receiving benefits at a cost of some $172 million.

It has been proven that eight to ten veterans can be maintained on the VIP program for the cost of keeping one veteran in an institution. The program offers a comprehensive range of benefits that allows veterans to stay at home longer with their families, which I shall briefly outline further, the costs of which are indexed each year. It grants financial assistance for home care to provide services to the client in a residential setting, including direct patient care, personal care support, housekeeping and basic groundskeeping. If the need arises, veterans may acquire the benefits of nursing home care or adult residential care, which provides services in an approved residential institution. This applies to temporary or long term situations and also provides for the activities of daily living, board and lodging.

An innovative feature in the VIP program also offers funding for home adaptations. This provides money to construct alterations to residences so that the veteran may remain comfortably in his or her own home. Physical changes may include such additions as wheelchair ramps or various walking supports. The government, I hope, will look at the extension to low income seniors of the Residential Rehabilitation Program. This program has already been announced, and I am sure will prove to be very popular. This feature of the VIP could be adapted to provide structural alterations to the residences of low income seniors.

The program also includes ambulatory health care provisions which ensure specialized services available through clinics, outpatient departments, day-care hospitals and day-care centres. These may include health assessments, diagnostic services, minor treatments, rehabilitation support, physiotherapy and diabetic care. Recreational counselling and other related services are also available.

Finally, VIP pays for transportation services for eligible low income veterans so that they may carry out daily activities such as shopping, banking and medical visits. All of the above-mentioned aspects of the VIP program are providing the essential services required by Canadian veteran seniors.

While the benefits I have described may appear to be costly, numerous estimates have suggested that a well-integrated home care program delays or makes unnecessary institutionalization, and is therefore cheaper than forcing seniors to opt prematurely for some form of institutional care. As I said, it has been proven that eight to ten veterans can be maintained in their own homes for the cost of maintaining one in an institution. That benefit should be carefully weighed in any such considerations.

A letter from the Secretary of State just last month explains how the formula works. It reads in part:

> The eight to one ratio is derived by extracting actual VIP expenditure information on bed costs per client and comparing those costs to the remaining VIP expenditures which are entirely attributable to home care costs...
> The 1992-93 fiscal year end costs were at a ratio of ten to one, and the year-to-date costs for 1993-94 are at a ratio of eight to one for institutional care verses home care.

The figure, of course, does not take into account the huge costs that will be involved in building the hospitals and nursing homes necessary to care for our elderly in the future if current rates of institutionalization and hospitalization cannot be reduced. The VIP offers such relief.

On the matter of jurisdictional responsibility, even though health care is a provincial policy area in terms of our constitution, in practical terms concurrent jurisdiction has prevailed in terms of cost-sharing arrangements between Ottawa and the provinces. The federal government, as we all know, has established national standards through the Canada Health Act and has provided transfer payments to the provinces ever since health care was founded in this country. This type of arrangement can and should be sustained for all the senior citizens of our country, and allow for the extension of VIP benefits to each.

Honourable senators, there are precedents to support the federal involvement with the provinces in that they have created many joint cost programs in areas of provincial jurisdiction. In the past general election, for example, all three parties promised programs on child care, which is under provincial jurisdiction. Indeed, the Red Book of the current government clearly promises:

> A Liberal government, working with the provinces, will implement a realistic and fiscally responsible program to increase the number of child care spaces in Canada.

I wish they had made a commitment to at least study the idea of implementing a national seniors independence program, like the VIP which is already in place, proven and popular, in collaboration with the provinces that would provide for the cost-sharing of home care, residential care and other services needed by seniors.

Indeed, some may remember the day when the then Department of Regional Development and Economic Expansion did not hesitate to enter the provincial field of education in partnership with the provincial government of Newfoundland when they built very impressive and modern regional access schools which provided students of all denominations with a modern educational environment.

Honourable senators, Canadian senior citizens need and deserve quality health care. However, that does not necessarily mean the status quo. Seniors do not want to become a burden on the system. This program resists such a shift, and also curbs upward pressure on total health care costs. The Veterans Independence Program makes health care services more applicable to the realities faced by Canadian seniors, and it is a relevant alternative for those who challenge the government's management of the system. Here in Canada we have a tailor-made program already in existence, and proven as a model or pilot project over the past 12 years to the benefit of 94,000 veterans tested in an expensive evaluation report by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Honourable senators, I also wish to place on record something on client satisfaction and the impact of the program on clients. There was a high level of satisfaction with services received under the VIP. Many veterans were visited and polled. About 90 per cent of veterans and 91 per cent of informal care givers included in our case review said they were moderately or extremely satisfied with the services. About 76 per cent expressed high levels of satisfaction. With respect to the impact on clients, the VIP was rated as having a positive improvement on veterans' health. It was assessed as improving their health by 70.9 per cent of veterans surveyed, and by 73.6 per cent in the case reviews.

• (1640)

Honourable senators, while I realize that the national health care program under the chairmanship of the Prime Minister of Canada might be valuable, if the government looks at all the reports from the cross-section of experts across the country who have given their opinions, the VIP program under the Department of Veterans Affairs should be looked at very carefully. It could be applied to all seniors in Canada and save moneys badly needed to extend health care services to seniors.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Marshall: Certainly, senator.

Senator Molgat: Have you had the opportunity to do any costing on this matter? You said there would be substantial savings. Have you done any research on what that might amount to?

Senator Marshall: It is very difficult for the department to give us that information. Some regions are more costly than others. In 1985, the figures suggested that you could maintain ten people in their own homes for the cost of one in an institution. That figure has dropped to eight because costs are rising.

I know of a formula, honourable senator, but I am not actuarially competent to define it. It is available through the department. The department believes in it. It has proven to be successful over 12 years, and it is worth looking at.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I would be happy to adjourn this debate, with the understanding that I would not be prepared to speak to this matter for some time. I wish to obtain more information and statistics in order to assess your arguments.

Is that agreeable to you, Senator Marshall?

Senator Marshall: Yes, it is.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

RADIO CANADA INTERNATIONAL—COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY IMPLICATIONS OF REDUCTION IN FUNDING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, pursuant to notice of February 9, 1994, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon the mandate and funding of Radio Canada International; and
> That the Committee present its report no later than October 19, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, as you are aware, we have been considering the possibility of investigating Canada's international communication efforts over the past few months. I welcome the opportunity to speak to the subject today and, I hope, have this matter referred to committee.

We talk so much these days about the information highway, how important it is, not only within the boundaries of Canada but internationally. It is a challenging and very competitive world environment out there, not only for markets but also for the minds of men and women in other countries. The way in which we communicate with the people of other nations is very important from the standpoint of culture but, as well, for good, practical commercial reasons.

Forty-eight years ago, in 1945, Radio Canada International was established. It was a good decision. We are all agreed on that. Administered and managed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, RCI was funded by the Department of External Affairs. From its very inception, RCI won a loyal following of dedicated friends worldwide. RCI became Canada's window on the world, winning new friends in every part of the world.

Honourable senators, I have a collection of letters here that I would not have believed had they not been deposited on my desk in recent months from several countries in the world. People are writing and asking for more shortwave broadcasting from Canada.

Radio Canada International proceeded to establish a worldwide reputation for objectivity and fairness. It became known for quality programming in a number of the world's languages. Only the BBC rivalled RCI in general international quality and acceptance. That is quite a compliment. The BBC, of course, does an outstanding job with its international service.

In addition to RCI's transmitter site in Sackville, New Brunswick, RCI used relay facilities in Korea, Austria, Portugal, the United Kingdom, China, Germany, Japan and a number of other locations. Yet in 1991, just over two years ago, after 46 years of outstanding service, Radio Canada International was drastically cut. Languages were cut from 14 to 7, and international programming in Canada's two official languages was totally eliminated. This program was replaced with rebroadcasts of CBC domestic programming, with little appeal for international audiences which had become accustomed to RCI's informative international programs concerning Canada.

Honourable senators, in recent months a limited number of RCI programs have replaced domestic programming, but the bulk of the English and French service programming constitutes relays of CBC domestic programming. Significantly, Canada is the only nation in the G-7 not undertaking significant expansion in the field of international shortwave broadcasting or international satellite television communications.

Yet, superb new techniques for delivering Canada's message abroad are now available, and the digital satellite technology, which is now a feature of the broadcast industry, is being used by some of the international shortwave services, such as Radio Switzerland, to send a better signal throughout the world than was previously possible.

The cuts to RCI language services in 1991 eliminated the broadcasts of programming in the official languages of all G-7 nations, with the exception of Italy. It should be observed, however, that Italian was not carried by the RCI prior to the Draconian budget cut-backs in 1991.

Honourable senators, all of this has occurred at a time when we have a problem with communicating Canada's message to Europe. I was at a conference involving the members of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Group in Vancouver the other day. The Europeans were there, and their lack of knowledge about many aspects of Canada was totally frightening. The German representative did not seem to know very much about our forest policy, and here we are struggling to maintain our overseas export markets for forest products. They obviously have not had very much exposure to the Canadian message.

Of particular note is the fact that programming in the German, Japanese and Portuguese languages — the latter directed to Brazil — languages which are the vernacular of three of Canada's major international trading partners, were three of the language services eliminated in the 1991 RCI budget cuts. When over 150 countries of the world realize the benefits of international broadcasting, and when most of these countries are increasing, and not decreasing, their presence in the international short-wave area, it is baffling, to say the least, that Canada has chosen to cut back so dramatically on its outreach to the world.

• (1650)

With regard to the BBC, I mentioned that about five years ago the British Parliament decided that it would be in Britain's commercial and cultural interest to have a 24-hour satellite service available in every part of the world. That service is now available world-wide. That is why BBC signals feature regularly on the Newsworld network here in Canada.

Using satellite technology, Germany has now gone to the same 24-hour format, telecasting to the world that country's views regarding commerce, trade, culture and events international.

It is interesting that at my home in Vancouver I can receive Deutsche Welle English language international satellite television. The Germans cannot get any German language service from Canada at all. One of the results? The Germans are very adept at explaining their forest policy to us, but we cannot answer back internationally, using modern communication techniques.

The BBC and Deutsche Welle in Berlin are giving their views widespread satellite and shortwave coverage in many parts of the world. Even Dubai now has a satellite channel connection with North America and Canada. In British Columbia, one can watch programming from Dubai via satellite, but we cannot get a Canadian signal to the other side. There is also a new Arab satellite in operation. Other programming is now available from Russia, Ukraine, France, Korea, China, Chile, et cetera.

All this is happening when Canada, one of the largest trading nations in the world on a per capita basis, is actually retreating from the stage of international communications. We are not even maintaining international minimums in our shortwave service, let alone supplementing our shortwave service with satellite television. For the sake and welfare of this nation, something must be done to restore and enhance RCI service to the world.

These are the kinds of things that I, for one, would like to see our Committee on Transport and Communications involve itself in. Let us first look at the cuts that were made, then let us look to the future of international broadcasting and telecasting.

Did the CBC really have the legal right to relieve itself of responsibility for financing RCI? The Broadcast Act suggests the contrary. At least, this is the view of people who were formerly associated with RCI.

By cutting one-third of RCI's $20 million budget, did the government really save $6.5 million, or did it have to spend $13.5 million more because the CBC took the $20 million marked for RCI in its budget cut of December, 1990?

Who made the decision that RCI would either be eliminated or have a reduced budget? Why were some ministries contacted for financial help and input, and such an obvious one as tourism left out? What degree of consultation was there with our international trade department? Why was it felt that we could stop broadcasting to our major economic partners — the United States, Germany, Japan and our largest Latin American partner, Brazil? Why, when the countries of Eastern Europe need our programming even more to guide them through their democratic experiment, did we abandon them?

After the committee has looked at these questions, we should charge onwards, showing how Radio Netherlands, Deutsche Welle, Radio France International and the Spanish are rushing into Eastern Europe and Russia, buying transmitter time to extend their shortwave broadcast reach. If Canada wants to be a world player, it must restore its world-class shortwave service to at least its 1990 levels or better, and we should start looking at satellite technology so that we can put Canadian television programming signals into areas of special importance to this country.

I mentioned before that I have received many letters. I intend now to read excerpts from a couple of them. I received one letter from Eric Schneider of Bechstein, Germany. He says,

> I am very interested in the reintroduction of German programming. I think that today we should be learning more about our neighbours in other countries.

Peter Wiltschka of Marktheidenfeld says:

> As a dedicated former listener to RCI's German programme from 1979 to its termination, I just want to say that I am very much in favor of this action. The way the programmes were dismantled after over 40 years on the air was very...

Let us say, unfortunate.

> I do not have to stress, that RCI's German programme used to be always among the most popular shortwave-programmes in Germany.

I received a great letter from a resident of Nauheim, Germany, Frederic Lister. He says:

> Restore full German language programming to Europe in general. After English, German is probably the most widely used and spoken second language in Europe; apart from Germany itself, along with Austria, Switzerland, Lichtenstein, and other parts of Europe where German is used by some 100 million people, German is known and used throughout all of Scandinavia, the Baltic region, and throughout the newly freed lands of Eastern Europe. Beyond that, German is used throughout much of the Mediterranean world... German is also the third language after English and French in the European Community administration.

The letter gives an excellent description of why it is of great commercial importance to Canada to be involved.

I received a letter from Toshiaki Matsui of Japan, and another one from Salvatore Placanica of Italy who says that "RCI is one of the most loved radio stations in the world." He cannot believe that many RCI signals were silenced because of budget considerations. He also sent me a postcard from his home town.

I received a letter from Hermann Josef Muehlleitner of Austria. He said:

> I wish to state that even very poor countries like Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Korea or Indonesia conduct foreign service in German language out of good reasons.
> Therefore, Mr. Perrault, please help furthermore RCI to start again a German program.

I have many letters. However, I will not burden the Senate by reading them all.

One letter from Germany said that in the desperate ethnic struggle they are undergoing in parts of Germany today, especially in areas which have been subject to neo-Nazi activity, it is important for Canada, described by the writer as "one of the most respected democracies in this world" to be heard in Germany.

Honourable senators, this committee should not hesitate to get involved in a study of where we have been with our international shortwave service. There is a coalition to restore full RCI funding. Perhaps we should be spending more in the area, or we should be expending our resources in different directions, perhaps deploying our dollars more skilfully.

Since the 1991 decision to cut back, many of those who serve in Parliament, representing all parties, have been sympathetic to the efforts of the coalition to restore RCI funding. The cut that hit Canada's shortwave service has been devastating. It was a move initiated by the CBC which eventually removed one-third of RCI's $20-million budget, eliminating half of the staff and three-quarters of RCI-produced international programming at a time when it has never been more important for Canada to communicate its message to the world.

We are one of the very few nations withdrawing from this international information highway. We have skidded off the road and we may land in the ditch of that highway. It is time to restore the service and make it better than it ever was before.

I ask honourable senators to support this initiative, which is to refer this matter to our respected Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I do not expect that all senators will feel as passionate about this subject as do Senator Perrault and I. I take great pleasure in supporting everything he said, but I do not intend to repeat the case he has set forward. As with Senator Perrault, there is no file in my office bulkier than my file on Radio Canada International.

We have silenced our voice to the world. What has really bothered me over the last number of years is that in this country we are apparently so broke that we no longer have any priorities.

Millions of dollars are spent, probably for good reasons, but there does not seem to be any priority. For $13 million we could restore our voice to the world. We have not done so, and no one cares about that. No one seems to care in the Department of External Affairs.

We have been attempting to launch this inquiry since 1991. I have spoken on it twice. Senator Perrault has spoken on it on at least two occasions. Senator Chaput-Rolland and Senator Roblin have also spoken. A number of other senators have an interest in this subject.

The definition that Senator Perrault puts on the reference, to look at the mandate and funding of Radio Canada International, covers the field. That will keep us busy. We can have many people answer many questions and possibly hold out the hope that sometime, somewhere, we might have a communications service from Canada to the rest of the world that is worthy of the country.

I second the motion of Senator Perrault, and at the appropriate time I shall move that the matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ST-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE— EFFECTS OF PROPOSED CLOSURE

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, a few decades ago, lower francophone recruitment levels were a problem in the Canadian Armed Forces, and right after World War II in particular. Francophone officers maintained that francophones did not have the same opportunities as anglophones. Anglophone officers said that there was no problem.

Many parliamentarians at that time addressed this issue. Léon Balcer, a Conservative member of Parliament in Trois-Rivières, joined those who sensitized the House of Commons and the media at the time. Balcer found both anglophone and francophone allies in the Progressive Conservative Party. George Drew, leader of the party, George Parker, who was the defence critic, and MP George Hees soon joined Balcer in supporting the initiative. Liberal members of Parliament André Gauthier and Louis-Phillipe Picard also supported the idea of a French military college, as did Frédéric Dorion, President of the PC Executive Committee of Quebec district and also president of the Quebec Bar.

Members of the Chiefs of Defence Staff Committee were against the project in the name of national unity. They said that it would cause a rift between francophones and anglophones, and would open the door to similar demands from other provinces.

Happily, on June 12, 1952, one month after a by-election won by the Progressive Conservatives in Roberval, the Honourable Brooke Claxton, Liberal minister of the day, announced in the House of Commons the establishment of a bilingual military college in St-Jean-sur-Richelieu.

Honourable senators, a few weeks ago the Minister of National Defence, David Collenette, stated in the other place:

> I completely reject the idea that you can only have a bilingual institution in Quebec. In Canada, francophones should feel at home everywhere, and that's the dream of Mr. Trudeau and the old Liberals.

The minister added that he thought closing St-Jean College and concentrating the officer training program in Kingston could be a force for the unification of the country and the military.

Honourable senators, in contrast to that view expressed by Minister Collenette, former Prime Minister Trudeau gave a speech at the Royal Military College in St-Jean on October 8, 1977, on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the college. This is what Prime Minister Trudeau said about the college:

> ...it has one even more significant feature: It is a totally bilingual institution. I cannot think of any place where bilingualism is more respected or more thoroughly practised than here. When we recall the wearisome difficulties we come up against elsewhere in the public and private sectors, your success in this area — which seems somewhat disconcerting at first glance — really excites the imagination.

Prime Minister Trudeau went on to say to the students there at St-Jean:

> You are the living proof that the ideal of Canadian bilingualism is not an illusion but an immediate possibility, ready to spring forth from the roots of the nation — given a small but sincere effort to reach beyond ourselves and our own particularities.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, the fact is that some things had to be cut in Quebec.

Senator Doody: It should have been you, but they went to St-Jean!

Senator Gigantès: Will you do me the courtesy of listening? Instead of cutting the college at St-Jean, suppose the government had cut the base at Bagotville?

Senator Kinsella: Cut the whole barracks; cut the base in St-Jean, but don't cut the college!

Senator Gigantès: You could hear from here the PC and the Bloc Québécois and their friends saying, "Why are they taking the airplanes out of Quebec? What sinister plot is this? Do they want Quebec to be deprived of armaments?" There would have been the same demonstrations around Bagotville as there are now for St-Jean.

Senator Simard: Let's not deal with suppositions.

Senator Gigantès: There is no list that any honourable senator, on either the other side or this side, could prepare of any acts, blessed by God and the Virgin Mary herself, in which the Bloc Québécois would not find something to complain about. It is their job. They tell us they were elected to come here and demonstrate that federalism does not work. They do that job very well. I do not blame them for doing it.

However, with respect to people who are in favour of Canada, as Senator Kinsella certainly is, I must say that hearing them join in these cries of alarm surprises me.

ENERGY

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT— PRODUCTION OF SYNTHETIC FUELS

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, yesterday, Senator Corbin quite properly drew our attention to the rule which suggests that preambles should be kept to a minimum. Chastened — nay, admonished, by that suggestion, I fretted all night until my wife told me it was nothing personal, that Senator Corbin certainly did not have me in mind when he made that suggestion, because he is a fellow maritimer and I was addressing a maritime issue.

Senator Molgat: You maritimers stick together.

Senator MacDonald: Yes, and as my leader says, if the preamble fits...

However, I was quite pleased to realize that the questions I asked yesterday of the Leader of the Government in the Senate brought forward information which I did not have at that time. Rather than ask questions, therefore, I wish to put these matters on the record as a statement.

Senator Corbin: On a matter of national interest?

Senator MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Corbin: You are on.

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, Canada has pioneered in the production of synthetic fuels, so far produced only in Western Canada.

I want the government to be aware that the Scotia Synfuels project in Nova Scotia would extend the Canadian lead through new, innovative technology to the upgrading of coal with heavy oils.

We understand that the Lloydminster upgrader is performing well technically, but that the financial performance is less than expected, owing in large part to inadequate spreads between the cost of livestock and the value of the end product.

I trust the government realizes that the corresponding spreads with respect to the Nova Scotia Synfuels plant, based on current oil prices, are over twice those available for the Lloydminster upgrader.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

SELECT COMMITTEES AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, March 15, 1994, moved:

> That for the duration of the present session, any select committee may meet during adjournments of the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a standard motion which is passed every session, and it is simply to permit our committees to meet during adjournments. As is normal at the beginning of a Parliament, little legislation flows through, and there can be more adjournments in the Senate than usual. However, our committees are expected to continue working, so I would urge you to support this motion.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES, 1994-95

VOTE 10 OF THE ESTIMATES REFERRED TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, March 15, 1994, moved:

> That Parliament Vote 10 of the 1994-95 Estimates, which were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on February 24, 1994, be withdrawn from the said Committee and referred to the Standing Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators, the explanation for this motion is as follows. You will recall that in recent years when we received the Supplementary Estimates, we would ask that the votes regarding official languages be sent not to the National Finance Committee but to the Joint Committee on Official Languages.

With respect to the Library of Parliament vote, however, a similar practice was discontinued. For some years, although the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament existed on paper, it did not exist in fact. Therefore their Estimates were referred to the National Finance Committee along with the other Estimates.

Having reconstituted the Joint Committee on the Library — which is a move I certainly support, and I regret that it had not happened in past years — the House of Commons has now referred the Library of Parliament portion of the Estimates to that joint committee. This motion simply carries out the same procedure in this place.

Honourable senators, I recommend the adoption of the motion, and I trust that the chairman of the National Finance Committee will agree with it.

Senator Doody: I hope it is no reflection on the chairman, that's all.

Senator Molgat: None whatever.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES, 1993-94

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, March 15, 1994, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, once again this is a standard motion. Having just removed some work from my colleague on the National Finance Committee, I am replacing it with more work.

Senator Doody: I am powerless.

Senator Molgat: I recommend the adoption of the motion.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Molgat could advise the chamber on another matter. There are votes in the Estimates that other committees might wish to have referred to them for study and more detailed examination. Would that be possible when all the committees are constituted, even though you are passing the motion at this time?

• (1350)

Senator Molgat: So far as I know, there is nothing preventing the Senate from entertaining a motion of that kind, should one come forward. The normal practice has been to refer all votes to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, but within its powers the Senate has the power to change that practice.

Motion agreed to.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—MOTION TO AMEND CONSTITUTION OF CANADA—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

That whereas section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies;

Now therefore the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by His Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE
AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

1. The Schedule to the Prince Edward Island Terms of Union is amended by adding thereto, after the portion that reads

"And such other charges as may be incident to, and connected with, the services which by the "British North America Act, 1867" appertain to the General Government, and as are or may be allowed to the other Provinces;"

the following:

"That a fixed crossing joining the Island to the mainland may be substituted for the steam service referred to in this Schedule;

That, for greater certainty, nothing in this Schedule prevents the imposition of tolls for the use of such a fixed crossing between the Island and the mainland, or the private operation of such a crossing."

Citation

2. This Amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1993 (Prince Edward Island).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to yield the floor to Senator Spivak of Manitoba, saving always that I might have the right of adjournment when the day is over.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, we are being asked to approve an amendment to the Constitution in order to enable a bridge to be built from the mainland to Prince Edward Island, the Northumberland Strait Crossing.

It is, of course, understood that this is a done deal. Most elected representatives of the various governments involved are in favour of the proposal. We are told that a majority of the people of Prince Edward Island are also in favour of it, even though the only plebiscite held on the subject in the province of Prince Edward Island in 1988 did not specify that the fixed link was to be a bridge.

Honourable senators, I want to make some brief comments on this matter because I think it is important to put on the record the serious concerns that have been raised during the life of this project proposal, concerns about the environmental risks, the economics of the deal, the real social and economic impact of this proposal, and the process by which this proposal was approved by the federal government.

Indeed, some of these concerns were put on the record during hearings held by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications last June on Bill C-110, respecting the Northumberland Strait Crossing. Among those who put their views forward forcefully at the time was the Honourable Angus McLean. He expressed doubts about both the elevated expectations — "propaganda," he called it — of the economic prosperity relating to the bridge project and the concomitant soft-pedalling of the environmental risks involved.

At the same time, the possibilities for improving the ferry service were put on hold. In his opinion, that would have been the better option, because, as he said, a bridge will certainly have to be closed during severe weather conditions in the winter, especially if there is no backup or alternative service. The bridge will wipe out 600 permanent jobs, drain millions of dollars in subsidies and tolls out of the maritimes, and it could be a danger to the lobster and scallop fishery in the Northumberland Strait, one of the greatest lobster fisheries in the world and one of great economic importance to all three maritime provinces.

Honourable senators, others, both at the same hearing and over the course of the last year and a half, have questioned whether the bridge makes economic sense. As well as being committed to the subsidy guarantee to SCI, Canadian taxpayers are also committed to guarantee, up to 30 per cent, a cost overrun.

Megaprojects frequently greatly exceed their estimated cost. The "Chunnel" overrun exceeded by 92 per cent, and the overrun on the Penang bridge in Malaysia, built by the Japanese, was 70 per cent over. Our Canadian experience has been far worse, with Mirabel, Stade Olympique, Skydome, Cape Breton's heavy water plant, the Darlington power plant and Hibernia, not to mention cost overruns in the building of the national museums, of which I have had some personal experience, and the National Arts Centre.

Additional costs and potential costs for taxpayers, which are not part of the SCI deal, total at least $100 million. These include the following, to cite only a few:

> There will be $41 million for additional highway expenditures by two provinces.
> There will be $20 million for the Borden/Cape Tormentine communities as compensation for loss of the ferry terminals.
> There will be $25 million in termination settlements for the equivalent of 525 full-time jobs, plus the cost of their retraining and relocation.
> Compensation will go far beyond the $10 million that SCI has already agreed to pay for destroying some of the Northumberland Strait fishery resource.

There has never been a cost benefit study of the economic benefits of alternatives to this project, such as improved ferry service or a tunnel.

Mr. Donald Deacon, past chairman of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and former member of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, estimated before the Senate Transport Committee that a P.E.I.-run ferry service could indeed have been quite profitable for the province. The ferry subsidy has not been indexed for the past 12 years, and yet under the bridge contract $42 million per year, indexed, will be paid to Strait Crossing Incorporated. Mr. Deacon's opinion was that if $42 million, indexed over 35 years, had been offered to Prince Edward Island rather than SCI, the Island might have chosen another alternative; not a bridge that could be knocked out in winter with no back-up.

• (1400)

The minister responsible for the fixed link in the previous government was Elmer MacKay. During the same Transport Committee meeting before the Senate, the then minister admitted that not all the steps or options available to him, or at his discretion under the environmental evaluation assessment process, had been exhausted prior to that day in June of 1993, more than five years after acceptable proposals were presented.

The only independent, expert Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office panel that studied the fixed link recommended in August, 1990, that:

> ...there is a need for an improved transportation service between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. After careful consideration, however, the Panel concludes that the risk of harmful effects of the proposed bridge concept is unacceptable. The Panel recommends, therefore, that the project not proceed.

They also said:

> The Panel concludes... that a tunnel concept might be an acceptable alternative...
> The Panel further concludes that an improved ferry service might be an acceptable alternative.

On March 19, 1993, Mr. MacKay was ordered by Madam Justice Reed of the Federal Court to perform an environmental screening of the specific bridge design rather than the previous generic studies. Justice Reed noted in her decision that the process to that point had been "downright silly." A specific evaluation was done by the Department of Public Works, incredibly, in less than a month, based on a review conducted by the bridge developers. Approval was given to the project without public hearings on the specific bridge design, as was within the minister's discretion.

The cursory review of the specific bridge design was of concern to the engineering firm used to help win federal support for the bridge. In a December 1992 report obtained through the federal Freedom of Information Act, it is stated that no examination was made of the bridge's two approach spans because Strait Crossing Incorporated did not supply the information. To quote from the report by Buckland and Taylor Limited of North Vancouver:

> No details were provided by SCI and no analytical check was made by Buckland and Taylor Ltd.

Sprinkled throughout the report are comments by the engineering firm on the lack of information available on ice in the Northumberland Strait. The report says there is "a serious lack of data on ice conditions in the strait..." There is "no data available...on either the depth of the consolidated ice layer or its compressive strength."

The question of ice build-up in what has been described as the most unforgiving body of water in the world is a key issue both to the fishery — as those from the maritimes will know much better than I — and the safety of the structure of the bridge. While the body of "ice experts" considering the specific bridge design concluded that the "ice-out" criteria could be net of less than two days in 100 years, or no more than four one-hundredths of a day in any one year, Mr. Leslie McKay, past chair of the P.E.I. Land Use Committee, a potato farmer, stated:

> I do not believe the ice experts really know what kind of structure could be put in place that would withstand the ice.

Another question is: Has the company changed the bridge design that the ice experts looked at? I am sure that will be addressed in more detail by others.

What about the alternatives? The Honourable Charles Caccia, chairperson of the Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development, in the House of Commons on February 15 of this year, stated that:

> ...there is an alternative which is safer, environmentally preferable and less expensive than the proposed bridge. It is an alternative that would create more jobs in the long term. That alternative is an improved ferry service.

Based on analysis provided to him by the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers, he estimated that:

> ...an improved ferry service would provide...400 year-round jobs and an additional 325 summer jobs. By contrast, the bridge after completion would provide only an estimated 60 to 80 operating jobs.
> In essence, the emerging employment picture is very much in favour of the improved ferries alternative because it would provide more jobs than the proposed bridge, namely 5,800 more person years during the next 35 years, an estimated 340 more jobs in winter, and an estimated 645 more jobs thereafter in summer.

Lee Morrison, the Reform member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, said:

> Let us provide the first class ferry service in perpetuity as promised...

He also said:

> ...larger, faster ferries with better ice capabilities than those now in use could be had for a fraction of the cost. First class ferry service would not be a discriminatory burden on the people of Prince Edward Island.

The present ferries were built and designed before railways were eliminated from P.E.I, and the main ships were built to carry trains, not trucks. What would happen if, with the passage of time, trucks became less feasible an option for the long-distance transport of freight? Certainly without the ferry service, the bridge would not be the alternative.

Ironically, this deal between SCI and the Department of Public Works was signed on October 8, 1993, one day after the Pearson airport deal was signed. Mr. Robert Nixon commented that signing contracts after the call of an election flies in the face of normal democratic process. The question then arises: Why was the Pearson airport deal cancelled and this one approved?

The vice-president of the Central Northumberland Strait Fishermen's Association has suggested that:

> Without first commissioning scientific tests, such as baseline data on the Northumberland Strait's productivity, ecology of phyloplankton and zooplankton, lobster larval surveys and many other studies, that without this information, to locate a massive concrete and steel structure in the last viable fishery in Atlantic Canada, is a crime against the environment.

The construction of a fixed link would mean, obviously, a change in the transportation, and any change in transportation results in changes in landscape and land use. As a landscape issue, a fixed link as proposed by SCI may change something more than the aesthetic quality of the long-range view of the province on the vista presented in crossing the strait. Doug Boylan, chairman of the province's Royal Commission on Land, which reported in October of 1990, took into account the experiences in land use from a seemingly unconventional source, the Walt Disney World Company of Lake Buena Vista, Florida. To quote from the report itself:

> ...the Magic Kingdom at Disney World is but a tiny fraction of the 27,400 acreage acquired by the Disney Company in planning its amusement park outside Orlando, Florida. ...the park's outer perimeter was set some 4 miles from the nearest public highway. From there it is another mile to the main entrance complex. Even then, Magic Kingdom visitors have not completed their journey, for there remains a brief ride by ferry across the man-made lagoon.

The Northumberland Strait, viewed by the pro-link supporters as a barrier to trade and prosperity, would seem to be just the psychological separation that the Disney Corporation went to extraordinary lengths to create in order to achieve the imagery of a special destination.

Catherine Edwards, coordinator of special projects at the University of Prince Edward Island's Institute of Island Studies, was quoted in Maclean's in February, 1992, as saying:

> Island people derive their strength and uniqueness from being separate from the mainland.

They might also derive some economic benefit from the strait. A study undertaken in 1987 indicated that 71 per cent of summertime visitors to Prince Edward Island consider the ferry service to be an attraction.

British Columbia received increased support for its ferries from the federal government. It is a pity that PEI will not share the same fate, but I sincerely hope that all the concerns raised here will not be realized when this megaproject linking a small, beautiful island to the mainland of Canada is realized.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honorables senators, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to what is commonly called the 1993 Constitutional Amendment concerning Prince Edward Island. The province has requested an amendment to allow replacement of the ferry service by a bridge.

I will not discuss the pros and cons of this constitutional amendment. Honourable Senators Fairbairn and Phillips have already done so, and, in fact, Senators Spivak and Macquarrie seems to have some reservations.

I would, however, like to comment briefly on section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982, referred to as the bilateral amending formula. This section applies when a constitutional amendment affects one or more, but not all, of the provinces. It is correct, as was pointed out in this house by Senator Fairbairn, that section 43 cannot be used to change the division of powers. This section, like section 41 on the unanimity formula, is an exception to the general formula provided under section 38.

So far, section 43 has been used successfully on two occasions. In 1987, it was used to give Pentecostal schools in Newfoundland the same rights as other denominational schools. In 1993, a constitutional amendment recognized the quality of New Brunswick's two linguistic communities.

This is not the first time our Constitution has allowed for asymmetry. Section 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867, has a somewhat different wording in some provinces. Section 94 of the Constitution Act, 1867, allows legislation for uniformity of private law. Quebec is not covered by this section because it is the only province which has a civil code. Section 98 of the Constitution Act, 1867, allows for this asymmetry with respect to the appointment of judges in Quebec.

The 1993 Constitutional Amendment concerning Prince Edward Island illustrates the potential that resides in section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982. This section applies to any alterations to boundaries between provinces, paragraph (a), and any provision that relates to the use of the French or English language within a province, paragraph (b), and again, to amendments that concern only one province and amendments that affect one or more, but not all, of the provinces.

That, I believe, is how the word "including" used in section 43 should be interpreted. This is, of course, a flexible amending formula. Only the consent of the legislative assemblies concerned is required, in addition to the approval of the Parliament of Canada. The use of this section allows Canadian federalism to accommodate certain asymmetries which are very important to the provinces to which they apply, but nevertheless allow the federal Parliament to exercise its full legislative powers.

In my opinion, honourable senators, the 1993 Constitutional Amendment concerning Prince Edward Island comes under section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and I shall be glad to support this amendment.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we proceed to Senate Public Bills, this might be a good time to try and inject some predictability into an otherwise unpredictable situation, and by that I mean the future sittings of the Senate.

As best I can tell at the moment, there are still a number of items of business to come to us from the House of Commons. I have had discussions with my honourable friend opposite, and it appears that we can proceed in an orderly way and complete our business next week. This would necessitate our sitting on Monday night at eight o'clock and on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, with possibly a sitting on Thursday evening. It is conceivable that we could finish then, or on Friday morning. The understanding is that we would complete all of the business that is now before us, as well as the business still to come from the House of Commons.

The fixed link is before us now, as are some bills. The understanding is that, by the time of the adjournment, any bills that are then before us would have gone through committee and received third reading. If that is accomplished by next Thursday night or Friday, I would propose that we then adjourn until April 19.

I realize that that sounds like a very long break. The circumstances are that the House of Commons will adjourn on Friday, March 25, and will not return until April 11. If we have completed our work here, we would then not have anything to deal with directly.

That does not mean that committees conducting inquiries would not be working; they would continue. However, we would have no new business to send to committees, and no new legislation to deal with here, because the House of Commons would not have been sitting for two weeks. There would therefore be no need for the Senate to return at the same time as the House of Commons because, in that first week, there would be no business coming to us immediately.

Because of the cost involved, it is my belief that the Senate should not sit unless there is work to be done. I would, therefore, propose the aforementioned as our course of action.

As usual, I have to make the caveat: We are always subject to recall. At the moment, I see no reason why we might be recalled, but it is something we must recognize as a possibility. The adjournment would be on the understanding that all business would be concluded before we rise, except for the inquiries that are before committees. However, if the agenda I have outlined is impossible to accomplish in the next week, then the Senate would need to sit on Monday and Tuesday of the following week. We have discussed this, and both sides see that as a possibility.

Does that cover our agreement, Senator Lynch-Staunton?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I confirm that that is the tenor of our discussion, based on the legislation that we know is now before the House of Commons and will be coming to us shortly.

However, in today's Globe and Mail there was an item regarding the possibility of a bill being passed by the House of Commons shortly to postpone the redistribution which is required by law following a census. Perhaps the deputy leader could tell us whether he expects that matter to come before the Senate within the time frame that he has been discussing with us?

Senator Molgat: Yes, honourable senators. Although I cannot give the timing with absolute precision, it is my understanding that that matter will be coming from the House. This is not a new item. We did exactly the same thing here back in 1992 with Bill C-67 when there was a suspension. My expectation is that that bill might be introduced in the other place today or tomorrow and, yes, we would expect that it would pass. The reason it would be required is that the first hearings of the commissions that are set up under the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act will begin in the province of Quebec on April 12. If there is to be a suspension, it is desirable that it be in effect before these commissions start. Yes, I expect that that would be required as well.

• (1420)

At this moment, I know of no other legislation expected from the other place except the routine matters I mentioned before, such as some appropriation bills and matters of that nature.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, could Senator Molgat give us the latest word with regard to the proposal for a special joint committee on Canada's foreign policy? Is a message relative to such a committee likely to come from the other place before the proposed adjournment?

Senator Molgat: Yes. We expect to have that item passed so that the joint committee will be able start its work immediately. I understand a vote on that motion in the other place was deferred until 5:30 p.m. today. We should have that matter before us tomorrow.

I am pleased to report to honourable senators that seven senators are to sit on that joint committee. By comparison, there are only five senators involved in the national defence study. I believe the joint committee on foreign affairs will prove to be of benefit to the Senate.

THE BUDGET

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On notice of Hon. Orville H. Phillips of Wednesday, February 23, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday, February 22, 1994.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my friend Senator Phillips asked me to open this debate for him. In doing so, I want to assure his many friends and colleagues who had been looking forward to his speech with keen anticipation, that he will be back personally to take part in the debate in a few days.

For the record, let me begin by referring to the numbers game that the Minister of Finance has been playing. The game began on November 16, less than two weeks after Mr. Martin and his cabinet colleagues had been sworn into office. On that day, he announced that the 1992-93 deficit was some $5 billion more than had been projected by Mr. Mazankowski in his April budget. Closer examination reveals that $3.6 billion of that amount resulted from accounting changes that, in the past, had been opposed by the Department of Finance but were quickly agreed to and implemented by the new government.

At the same time, he indicated that the 1993-94 deficit would be some $13 billion more than forecast by Mr. Mazankowski last April. Much of this is due to slower economic growth and lower revenues, but some of it, again, is part of Mr. Martin's numbers game.

For example, the government decided to pay out $1.2 billion in stabilization claims to the provinces now rather than in 1994-95. They decided not to proceed with the proposal to pay GST tax credits on a quarterly basis rather than semi-annually — another $625 million added to this year's deficit rather than to next year's. Then there were the faster payments of income tax refunds in February and March — another $1.2 billion on to this year's deficit rather than next year's.

The government inflated the 1993-94 deficit in the hope that against this benchmark their subsequent efforts would appear to have been effective — indeed, heroic. Mr. Martin is not, let me hasten to say, the first Minister of Finance, either federally or in the provinces, to indulge in such cosmetics. His problem now is that, partly as a result of having played the numbers game, the credibility of the new government's first budget is in question. Also in doubt is the government's longer range fiscal plan, which, increasingly, is being subjected to harsher analysis and speculation than might otherwise have been the case had he played the game straight.

The government is getting a reputation for playing the numbers game. It is the kind of reputation that sticks. Thus, on March 4, The Ottawa Citizen carried an analysis under the byline of their correspondent Eric Beauchesne. It begins:

> Paul Martin has gone from padding the deficit to padding the unemployment rate, in what appears to be a two-pronged political ploy to paint the Tories in the worst possible light and the Liberals in the best.

The article then goes on to say that Mr. Martin is proclaiming that the real unemployment rate is 20 per cent and not the official rate of 11.4 per cent. Mr. Martin's unemployment claims, states the article, "...are making some officials at Statistics Canada cringe."

The analysis, referring to the Liberal attempt to pad both the deficit and the unemployment rate, concludes:

> But one would also think that with the official jobless rate at a near record high of 11.4 per cent, and the real deficit at a record $40 billion, both of which are disastrous levels, Martin could also start with some honest numbers.

Media commentators and, more important, the national and international investment community are pouncing on the deficiencies in the February budget. They note the lack of effort to reduce spending this year and in the new fiscal year beginning in April, which will be the first full fiscal year under the Liberal government. They note that Mr. Martin's promise of $5 of spending reduction for every $1 of revenue increase is not for year one; it is to be spread out over three years. In year one it is more like $1 of spending reduction for $1 of revenue increase.

They note that while the minister promises to bring the deficit to $25 billion in 1996-97, he has provided few projections of revenue or spending beyond 1995-96. They are not very impressed with all of this.

The deficit reduction target would be achieved entirely by revenue growth from a faster growing economy, and would add another $143 billion in net debt over a four-year mandate. They conclude that to achieve even these unimpressive targets the government is gambling — gambling on economic growth in revenues, gambling on higher inflation, gambling on continuing low interest rates and, what is most significant, gambling on their ability to produce a drastic overhaul in social programs in a very short time.

Therefore, the government has inflated the 1992-93 deficit and the 1993-94 deficit for the purpose of making its own budget look good. However, when pressed on the inadequacies of his budget and his plan, Mr. Martin now says, "Don't judge me on this budget. Judge me on my next budget."

• (1430)

Those are words the minister may come to wish he had never uttered. Next year's budget exercise looks problematic enough without him raising the bar of expectations on himself. As a result of this budget, the government will need phenomenal luck to avoid a political crisis or a financial crisis — or both — within two years, and perhaps as early as a year from now.

Mr. Martin is quite preoccupied with ensuring that his forecasts, especially his deficit forecasts, turn out to be correct. This is understandable. These forecasts are a factor in a government's credibility, and Mr. Martin himself tells us that with this in mind he cautiously chose the lower point from the range of private sector forecasts on matters like economic growth.

I accept the criticism that the forecasts of the former government, notably on economic growth and revenues, and therefore on the bottom line deficit, especially in recent years, proved to have been unduly optimistic. However, it is worth noting that even when our economic growth projections went awry, as international projections frequently did during that period — and with them our revenue expectations and our deficit forecasts — what saved Canada's and the government's credibility was the seriousness and the success of our spending restraints.

In 1987-88 we turned around an operating deficit which had been incurred every year for 12 fiscal years under our predecessors. For the next six years we achieved an operating surplus every year including 1992-93, until Mr. Martin's retroactive accounting change wiped it out with the stroke of a pen. We did this by holding down growth in program spending. It is noteworthy that during that time we never failed to achieve our annual program spending targets.

During our second mandate, the variance between forecast and actual program spending was less than one per cent, year after year. On program expenditures of more than $100 billion, this is remarkable. Such results were not achieved by good luck or even by good forecasting alone. Whenever we saw that circumstances had arisen which would likely make us exceed our spending targets, we went back to the table and imposed new economies, usually quite painful, in order to stay within our spending plan. This is something that Mr. Martin may come to wish he and his colleagues had done soon after taking office, in the period between November and February, in order to get the deficit for 1993-94 down and get spending down closer to the track that Mr. Mazankowski had set out. But that is another story.

Mr. Martin criticizes the former government for our approach to spending restraint. He complains that we did not really cut or eliminate programs and services, but rather, to use his description, we "cut at the margins." That is, we slowed down spending growth or froze spending, but kept the programs and services going.

I accept the reproach, but is Mr. Martin's strategy not a much riskier one? In the budget he has stated his bottom line on transfers to the provinces for social programs, thereby overtaking renewals of the Canada Assistance Plan and Established Programs Financing that were due in the next couple of years. In the process, he has also overtaken the social security review announced by Mr. Axworthy. He has done so, first, by taking $5.2 billion out of unemployment insurance over the next three years; this while unemployment insurance is being reviewed.

He purports then to dictate the outcome of Mr. Axworthy's review of the Canada Assistance Plan and the post-secondary education component of Established Programs Financing. He has booked these savings beginning in 1995-96, into 1996-97 and beyond. These savings are $466 million in 1995-96 and $1.5 billion in 1996-97. These savings are the minimum, Mr. Martin tells us, and they are transitional. Beyond 1996-97, he says that there will be significant further reductions in unemployment insurance expenditures.

Honourable senators, if any of these great plans for reform come to grief, as they well might do, dependant as they are to some extent on economic and political factors beyond the control of the government, or even if some of the grand redesign falls short of Mr. Martin's expectations, we could soon face the most serious financial crisis that any federal government has ever faced. Mr. Martin acknowledges in his budget speech and in the budget papers the possibility that these great plans might not yield the great savings on which he is counting. If that turns out to be the case, he says that he will have recourse to "alternative measures." Honourable senators may wish to ask him about this in committee, if they get the opportunity. Even if his bottom line is met, honourable senators should be asking: What kind of social security system will emerge from such a frantic, fiscally-driven and deadline-driven process?

Honourable senators should also ask what Mr. Martin's budget will do to bring down the rate of unemployment in the country. This was the central theme of the Liberal election campaign, and it is surely the central issue on which they will be judged. Measures to attack unemployment are pretty thin in this budget, and the government acknowledges this by projecting an unemployment rate still in the vicinity of 11 per cent to the end of 1995. Of course they have the famous infrastructure program of $6 billion to be shared equally by the federal, provincial and municipal governments. To finance the federal share, the government, among other things, cancelled the EH-101 helicopter program. They will close military bases, reduce support for regional development, and cancel the commitment to the KAON research project. In other words, they will eliminate a lot of permanent jobs in order to create some temporary jobs in infrastructure.

The Liberals announced during the election that they would cancel the helicopter program. They can fairly claim that their election gave them a mandate to do this. But beyond the electoral considerations, what analysis did they do concerning the implications of this decision? Senator Doody referred recently to the horribly inadequate state of search-and-rescue capacity on our coasts, a situation which is perpetuated by the cancellation of the helicopter program. Armed forces spokesmen say that ultimately the government will need to replace the present fleet of helicopters by buying new helicopters off the shelf. "Off the shelf" where? In the United States or in some other country?

A study by the Informatics research firm stated that the EH-101 project would have created 185,000 person years of employment, directly and indirectly. The main beneficiaries would have been industries providing computer and electronic design software, manufacturing and professional services. Approximately 13 per cent of the added employment would have occurred in Atlantic Canada, 30 per cent in each of Quebec and Ontario, and 27 per cent in Western Canada. Contracts worth over $3 billion, involving more than 40,000 direct jobs, had already been given to 20 companies across the country. In relation to its impact on the future of the aerospace industry, the decision to cancel the helicopters has been compared to the decision to cancel the Avro Arrow in the late 1950s.

Hon. Royce Frith: When you say that it has been compared, who did the comparison?

Senator Murray: Yes, it has been compared. Some of the responsible people in the aerospace industry did the comparison. I can get the quotation for the honourable senator, if he wishes.

Senator Frith: That would be good.

• (1440)

Senator Murray: With this political decision, the government may have pronounced a virtual death sentence on an entire sector of the Canadian economy.

The federal government will throw $2 billion at infrastructure. Meanwhile, we are stuck with another dubious political trade-off. In the heat of an election campaign, the Liberal Party promised to cancel the redevelopment program for Pearson International Airport in Toronto. This was to be private investment of $700 million, creating 14,000 jobs during the project. The government commissioned the report by Mr. Robert Nixon and then cancelled the project, as they had promised to do.

Honourable senators, there are many other issues that should be discussed during this debate. Progressive Conservative senators from the Atlantic provinces will want the Senate to consider the disproportionately harsh impact of the budget on their region and to ask what has become of the political process in the Liberal caucus and cabinet which should have prevented such an unequal distribution of pain across the regions.

Finally, honourable senators, there is the GST.

Senator Frith: "Finally" is the right word.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators surely will not begrudge me a few words on this fascinating subject.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not wish to interrupt the honourable senator, especially when he has reached this subject, but I would ask, is there leave for him to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Abolish the GST, but not Senator Murray.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have not been following as closely as I should the deliberations of the House of Commons committee under the chairmanship of Mr. James Peterson. However, I do hope that there, or in some other forum soon, we will have some solid information on several important aspects of this issue.

There is the underground economy. We all know that there was an underground economy long before the advent of the GST. The question is: How much bigger is the underground economy as a result of the GST? Is it so big that we should forget about trying to implement a broadly based national sales tax, especially one that is applied to services?

The Department of Finance has done a study on the GST and the underground economy. Has that study been produced to the committee? If not, let us have it.

What is the extent of the underground economy as a whole? The Minister of National Revenue says it amounts to some $56 billion per year, 6 to 8 per cent of the national economy.

Mr. Martin, as far as I know, has steered clear of trying to quantify the underground economy. He has, however, taken it upon himself to pronounce a general absolution for the cheaters and smugglers. These, he tells us, are just honest citizens who have withdrawn their consent to be governed.

There are elements of this approach in Mr. Preston Manning's discourse and in his offer to provide a command headquarters for a so-called tax revolt. The vast majority of Canadians, who do not cheat and do not smuggle, and who end up paying more because of those who do, expect better leadership than this from their politicians.

Then there is the question of the administrative costs of the GST in the private sector and in the government compared to other taxes. We need more facts and less rhetoric on that subject, too.

The replacement tax for the GST being considered by the committee looks very much like the present GST. It would have a different name, of course. It would be more broadly based, including on food, for example. It would be harmonized with provincial sales taxes. Much of this makes sense, even if it is not what the government promised. It also would be a hidden tax, which, in my opinion, would be quite a retrograde step.

The government should not be reluctant to play hardball with the provinces on the subject of harmonization. Harmonization is clearly in the interests of consumers and taxpayers. The government may wish to add a verse to Premier Rae's catchy little tune, "We are all in the same boat now," to tell him and others that, to keep the boat afloat, we need the oars persons going in the same direction.

Harmonization and a broader base would allow a reduction in both the federal and the provincial rates that would produce the same amount of revenue. But wait; fiscal conditions may suggest to Mr. Martin that more revenues are needed from this source. Thus we would get harmonization, the same rate, and more revenues.

Could it be, could it come to pass, that this hateful tax, as Senator MacEachen once described it, would come to the rescue of a Liberal government's fiscal plan?

In the immortal words of Mr. Diefenbaker, it is a long road that has no ash garbage cans.

Senator Frith: It is a good metaphor for the GST, an ash can.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable senator a question? Could he please promise hereafter not to say "oars person" but to say "rower"? It is neutral, and is not a barbarism.

On motion of Senator Graham, debate adjourned.

MARINE SAFETY—EXPANSION OF ROLE OF LIGHTSTATIONS—NOTICE OF MOTION

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Pat Carney: I give notice that on Thursday, March 17, St. Patrick's Day, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine the mandate of the staffed lightstations on the west coast to determine whether their role should be expanded to accommodate the increase in the number of marine users, in light of the expansion in the number of recreational users, keeping marine safety in mind, and the current restructuring of the Canadian Coast Guard.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PERMIT ELECTRONIC COVERAGE OF PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(f), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be empowered to permit electronic coverage of its public proceedings, with the least possible disruption of its proceedings.

He said: By way of explanation, honourable senators, some of you know that the Governor of the Bank of Canada is appearing before the Banking Committee next Wednesday afternoon. It is the view of the committee that it would be highly desirable to have those proceedings televised. The media have also expressed an interest in the appearance of the Governor, and that is the purpose of this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we have heard Senator Kirby asking for leave to proceed. Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ST-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE— EFFECTS OF PROPOSED CLOSURE

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, the issue I want to address is of national interest, and must be dealt with on an urgent basis. This issue is the upcoming closure by the current government of the military college in St-Jean, the only French-language military training institution in America, although courses there are given in both official languages.

I would like to add my voice to the widespread protests raised by the closure announcement since the budget was tabled in the House of Commons. I think the national outcry shows that this issue is much bigger than a $23-million saving, and even this amount is challenged by many Canadians. Yet this $23-million figure is being used by the government to justify its decision.

I think, rather, that once the National Finance Committee has obtained the true figures, Canadians will see that the government will save much less than expected and that this would be, in fact, a cheese-paring economy within a national unity context.

However, let us put aside the purely financial aspect for a moment. I think the Senate has here a golden opportunity to state its position on this issue and tell the government that when it attacks a Canadian institution, because that is what the military college in St-Jean is, senators can set aside their political differences.

In fact, I hope that senators of all parties will want to debate this issue to express their views and support those who demand that this institution be maintained. I think that when the best interests of the nation are at stake, the Senate can speak up.

I, for one, feel that our best interests lie in basic principles such as national unity and equal chances for all citizens. That is what prevailed at the foundation, in 1952, of this highly valued institution which became a success by training francophones as well as anglophones to become bilingual military officers.

As Senator Kinsella told us a few days ago, over one third of officer cadets in St-Jean come from the maritimes. A small majority of this third consists of anglophones who went to St-Jean to study in a French-speaking environment. They became top-notch officers who served Canada well and with a better understanding of our two cultures.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Honourable Senator Simard, but I thought he would conclude his speech earlier. It has been pointed out to me that three minutes have elapsed. He would need unanimous consent to continue unless he wants to wrap up his speech.

Senator Simard: I am almost finished.

In conclusion, I hope that my party, faithful to its contemporary tradition in matters of language, and as a truly national political party, will practise as well as preach national unity and ensure that our national institutions are protected, and indeed promoted. I urge this, even if it means taking an electoral risk, just as Messrs Stanfield, Clark and, more recently, Mulroney took a calculated risk when national unity was threatened. That is why I ask you to debate the issue of the St-Jean Military College and attempt to find a better solution.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I listened carefully to my honourable colleague. I would like to remind him and other honourable senators that I supported the Meech Lake accord, as well as the Charlottetown agreement. I sat on a committee, chaired by Senator Beaudoin, that looked for ways to resolve our constitutional problems. I sat on this committee as a Canadian, not as a representative of a political party.

We should be looking for solutions. What do we want? We want francophones to be able to pursue a military career without being uprooted. We want our armed forces to be bilingual and bicultural; in other words — let us not kid ourselves — this means mainly giving anglophones tools to communicate with francophones.

In terms of solutions, the St-Jean Military College is not the only one. It is an establishment which the military gave themselves because they wanted their own university. We could return to a system that exists not only here but in some other countries, where the young francophone wishing to become an officer would be told to take all the academic courses in a francophone university in Quebec, and afterwards to take purely military courses for a year in Kingston.

Conversely, young anglophones could be told to take their courses in universities, and for one of their academic years I would really like that they be sent to, say, a university in Quebec City, where they could be somewhat immersed in a separatist environment and experience a part of Quebec that they would not experience at the St-Jean Military College.

Those are constructive solutions that seem to me better than taking part in a campaign that can only help defeat the federalist government of the day in Quebec.

I ask my colleagues opposite to look with us for solutions that will allow us to cut expenditures. When you were harping about cutting expenditures, you never wondered whether the individual put out of work was a francophone or an anglophone. It is somewhat the same thing: Lean and Mean! Downsize! Let us do it without hurting bilingualism and biculturalism. We can do it with a little goodwill.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED SITE OF CANADIAN VIETNAM VETERANS' MEMORIAL

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I must rise under Senators' Statements to provide answers to questions raised during the debate on my inquiry concerning the appeal from Canadian Vietnam veterans to the federal government to provide national capital lands for the site of the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial.

The question was asked by Senator Perrault as to whether Canadian Vietnam veterans are being denied U.S. veterans' benefits. I should like to put on the record a letter I have just received from the Canadian Department of Veterans Affairs, Foreign Countries Operations, in response to that question. It states, in part:

> As of May 20, 1988, the Canadians who fought in the United States Armed Forces (for example in Vietnam) are afforded the same services and benefits as any other U.S. veteran.

Even today, 45 years after the Second World War, legislation concerning veterans still seems to have omissions. With those qualifications, honourable senators, that is the answer to the honourable senator's question.

Another question was asked by Senator Gigantès as to whether or not the land that has been given to the United States for its new embassy along Sussex Drive in Ottawa would be a good place for the memorial.

I have brought this proposal to the attention of the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' Association, and their response is that the memorial is a gift from Americans to the Government of Canada, in effect, the people of Canada, to commemorate the supreme sacrifice of Canadians who served in the American Forces in Southeast Asia.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MEMORIAL GARDENS IN CAEN, FRANCE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my statement also concerns military matters, although they are military matters that go back many years. I refer to the Normandy invasion in 1944.

This year we are celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the invasion of Normandy. Both Senator Marshall and I are involved in a group called the Canadian Battle of Normandy Foundation. This foundation is raising money now to establish a memorial in Caen, Normandy.

Caen was liberated in 1944 largely by Canadian troops, with the assistance of some British troops on the left flank. There is a memorial in Caen which was established by the City of Caen. Unfortunately, that memorial was put in place largely with American and British input; there was very little Canadian input into its establishment.

Thus, our group, which we call the Canadian Battle of Normandy Foundation, has determined that there ought to be some Canadian input into this memorial. Those who established the memorial have decided to set aside a place for some memorial gardens alongside the present museum, which is not dedicated to war but to peace.

At this stage, an American group is in the process of setting up a garden with a wall similar to the one that is in place in Washington honouring Vietnam veterans. The British are prepared also to establish a garden. It is the hope of our foundation to set up a Canadian garden. I say "our hope," but I will go beyond that; it is very much our intention. We are presently conducting a fund-raising campaign for $1 million in order to accomplish this purpose. We will use the money to fund various other projects as well, such as providing bursaries for young Canadians, not to study war but to study peace. This is a fitting Canadian endeavour. They have Big Ben at Westminster, but the tower of our Parliament Buildings is called the Peace Tower, which I think is fundamentally Canadian.

We want to have a memorial to peace in Caen, recognizing the contribution of Canadians to the liberation of Europe. Last week, here in the Parliament Buildings, we inaugurated a model of that garden which we hope to establish next year. You will find it in the Hall of Honour by the Parliamentary Library. I invite all honourable members of the Senate to go and see this model and to assist us in this campaign of proper recognition of the contribution of Canada to the conflict in Europe, and to the liberation and peace that followed.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY HOCKEY CHAMPIONSHIPS

CONGRATULATIONS TO UNIVERSITY OF LETHBRIDGE PRONGHORNS HOCKEY TEAM

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to direct your attention to my hometown, Lethbridge, Alberta, and extend congratulations to the players and coaches of the University of Lethbridge Pronghorns hockey team for their exciting victory in the National University Hockey Championships, held this past weekend in Toronto, at Maple Leaf Gardens.

The final tournament, as my friend Senator Atkins will know, included fine teams from the University of Guelph, the University of Western Ontario and the University of Acadia, as well as the winning team from the University of Lethbridge. From start to finish, it was a showcase, not only of high quality hockey but of very fine teamwork and good sportsmanship.

I am rising now because this is the first time the University of Lethbridge has won the national championships, and I want to salute their effort and achievement, which has brought pride to one of the finest small liberal arts universities in this country as well as to the people of the city of Lethbridge.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ST-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE—PROPOSED CLOSURE

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few comments on Senator Gigantès' remarks. I am delighted with Senators Molgat and Marshall's initiative.

I would like to come back to the subject of the St-Jean Military College. Having served in the army, but also having acted as liaison officer with the air force for a while and, of course, having had contacts with the navy, I think that most people know that the number of French-Canadian naval officers who took part in that particular war was minimal. In the air force, there were a few francophones but still not very many.

I would say that the Honourable Brooke Claxton found the solution in 1952 when he suggested that this college be founded in St-Jean, an idea that was supported by all parties.

Figures have been handed over to me which show that today there are about 23 or 24 per cent of French-Canadian bilingual officers in the forces, which corresponds to the French-speaking population of Canada.

I do not see why you are looking for a solution, Senator Gigantès. The solution was found in 1952 by Mr. Claxton, who was Minister of Defence at the time, and it was very successful.

I think that, in the interest of national unity and the proper operation of our armed forces, the military college should continue to exist in its present form because it has given excellent results. When we have all the figures before us and can examine them carefully, we will see that this $23-million saving, which the government claims will result from the closure of the college, is not quite accurate and that the amount actually saved will be much lower.

I think that, for the sake of national unity, the government should look into this problem further before closing the college.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry, but I must inform the honourable senators that the time for senators' statements has expired. Might I remind all honourable senators that, if comments were shorter, more senators would have a chance to speak.

HEALTH

PROTECTION OF CONSCIENCE IN MEDICAL PROCEDURES—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a petition which reads as follows:

To the Honourable the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled

On the Subject of the protection of conscience in medical procedures:

We, respectful subjects of the Parliament of Canada, the undersigned, being practitioners and students of Health and Health Care in Canada, and concerned citizens of Canada, all being of the age of majority draw to the attention of the Senate in Parliament assembled the following:

That developments of practice and interpretations of what lies in the ambit of Health predicated in the Canada Health Act have rapidly embraced experiments and procedures that place upon human lives avoidable threats which are open to moral objection by health care students and practitioners who are expected to assist in or perform such procedures, and

That there is historically no effective recourse, for subjects of dismissal or coercive implications such as dismissal for failure to comply in such procedures, to the provincial Human Rights Tribunals, as the matter of avoidable harm is deemed to belong under the head of the criminal law, and

That entrenched in section 2 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is the right to hold and to express the conviction or religious belief that every human life is inviolable.

Therefore your petitioners plead that the Parliament of Canada undertake to enact as federal statutory law or amendment thereto the needful defence of conscience from coercion, reprisal or inequity, in the pursuit of and practice of our chosen vocations as health caregivers.

This petition contains 25 handwritten signatures and addresses of Canadians from Saskatoon and other places in Saskatchewan, and 100 names from various cities and towns of Ontario.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE BUDGET

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN LIEU OF TAXES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when the former Finance Minister, Mr. Mazankowski, announced in his December 1992 budget that grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes were to be frozen, the Liberal opposition at the time, both here and elsewhere and on more than one occasion during the campaign, condemned that decision and committed itself to reversing it at the first opportunity. Yet the budget is silent on this, as it is on so many other matters that so preoccupied the Liberal Party before last October 25.

My question to the Leader of the Government is as follows: Can she confirm that this is another of the numerous promises made by the Liberals last fall that have been discarded, and another example of condemning Conservative policies before October 25 and embracing them once the election is over?

Honourable Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no, I cannot confirm. I will defer to my colleague the Minister of Finance on that issue. I will endeavour to transmit his comments to the Leader of the Opposition.

• (1440)

I note as well, however, that the government has brought forward a commitment to the infrastructure program, which I am confident will be under way very shortly and will have Canadians working as the snow disappears across this country.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, as the minister makes inquiries of her colleagues, I trust she will remind Mr. Martin, the Minister of Finance, of a statement he made when he appeared before the 1993 annual conference of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities and called the property tax freeze a "charade" and a "breach of faith."

I should like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to remind the Prime Minister that, during the campaign, he wrote to the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, stating that "the federal government must live up to its obligations with regard to grants in lieu of taxes."

My question is a simple one: Is this just more empty rhetoric and, if not, what is it?

Senator Berntson: The short answer is "yes."

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would be glad to transmit both of those quotations to my colleague. I would underline that the members of the federal-municipal body in this country have been very supportive of our efforts on their behalf in terms of the infrastructure program. Indeed, I was in Alberta not so long ago meeting with Mr. Ken Kowalski, Alberta's Deputy Premier. The municipal representatives there were very keen on working with the other two orders of government on this project.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I do not want to belabour this point, but I should like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to bring the following quotation to the attention of the Minister of Finance. It was made by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities:

> The federal government had to deal with a tax revolt affecting the purchase of tobacco products, but the worst example of tax revolt in Canada today is the federal government's unilateral freeze on its property tax payments to 2,200 municipalities with federal properties!

That, Madam Minister, has nothing to do with the infrastructure program.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Lynch-Staunton, I will gather those comments together and transmit them to my colleagues for further comment.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ST-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE—EFFECTS OF PROPOSED CLOSURE ON MARITIME STUDENTS

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, I am informed that students from the maritimes are presently accepted into the Royal Military College at St-Jean, Quebec, after completing high school.

My question is to the Honourable Leader of the Government: If and when Canada has only one military college, as the government has stated, namely, the Royal Military College in Kingston, Ontario, will maritime students be accepted for admission on the same basis as they are presently being accepted at St-Jean, or will they be required to take an extra year of academic training before they would be considered for acceptance?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senator, I do not have the answer to that question at this time. However, I will attempt to obtain one for you.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE IN RUSSIA OF UNITED STATES PHARMACEUTICALS—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on January 28, 1994, a memorandum of understanding was signed by the American Food and Drug Administration and by the American

Commissioner of Foods and Drugs Directorate, and ratified on February 15, 1994 by the Minister of Health and Medical Industry for the Russian Federation. This memorandum expedited the certification of American pharmaceutical companies by Russia and other members of the Russian Federation, thereby giving them virtually unfettered access to markets in the Russian Federation.

In view of these developments, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate the following question: Has the Canadian government made any representations to the government of Russia, seeking to obtain similar opportunities for Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers and exporters currently doing business or seeking to do business in the Russian Federation?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Haidasz for his question, and I would tell him that Canadian officials in Moscow and Ottawa have been in contact with the relevant Russian authorities since new health and safety standards were introduced last July. The specific areas for bilateral negotiation, such as health care products — and that would also be inclusive of pharmaceuticals and foodstuffs — have been identified. They will be pursued shortly. We will be requesting the same types of concessions as those granted to the United States.

In the meantime, honourable senators, I am told that sales of Canadian health care products are now entering Russia unimpeded, and have grown at a healthy rate in the past year and presumably will continue to do so.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, by way of supplementary, the Leader of the Government in the Senate referred to other health care products entering Russia. Does that include medical products for children's hospitals and clinics in that country? Despite the fact that successive Canadian governments promised a $30-million credit to Russia, those credits were, in fact, frozen, thereby impeding the importation of such medical products into Russia.

Senator Fairbairn: On the question of lines of credit, Senator Haidasz, as you may know, Russia became current on its debt owed to the Canadian Wheat Board and the Export Development Corporation just last week. While it was in arrears, two lines of credit — $100 million on capital goods and $30 million on medical and educational products — were suspended. As senators will know, grain sales were halted. Reactivation of those lines of credit is not automatic. Several factors need to be taken into consideration, including a claim filed under the Foreign Investment Insurance Program.

In addition, Senator Haidasz may or may not know that the $30-million line of credit was never actually signed. Therefore, the reactivation of that line of credit would need some negotiation, but this could take place in a few weeks.

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE OF ST-JEAN—REVERSAL OF DECISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I should like to ask her if she shares the view expressed by her colleague Senator Gigantès that representations made by my colleagues concerning the military college in St-Jean will help defeat the Quebec Liberals at the next election. Is she suggesting, as other federal Liberals have already done, that when members of this house promote the best interests of Quebec and of Canada — in this case the protection of the linguistic duality of this country and of its institutions — we are supporting separatist elements in Quebec? I would like to know if she shares this opinion, which has been expressed in other words by other government members.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in response to Senator Lavoie-Roux, I did not get the same sense from the answer or the comment of Senator Gigantès as perhaps she did. I should like to review the record and respond on that point.

I would say, however, that I fully appreciate the sincerity, conviction and emotion of senators on both sides of this house regarding this very difficult issue.

• (1450)

I do not believe that this particular issue is tied to an election in Quebec. I will say to Senator Lavoie-Roux that all senators on this side, including Senator Gigantès and others, are fervently supportive and committed to the election of the Liberal government of Mr. Johnson in the next election.

[Translation]

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I am pleased to hear that the Leader of the Government intends to review the speech made by our colleague Senator Gigantès. I believe she will find out exactly what he said.

However, since this is not the first time this sort of thing has happened, could I ask her to carefully review these remarks, and others in the same vein, so that such comments are not made again? As she said herself, they fly in the face of the very sincere efforts, based on strongly held beliefs, made on the part of many Quebecers to keep this country together.

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: I would be glad to examine any statements, and I would simply repeat what I said before: The concerns about this particular issue in Quebec are strongly and sincerely felt, and I appreciate the concern of the members.

SAGKEENG FIRST NATION—EFFECT OF PULP MILL POLLUTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I want to say at once that I do not necessarily expect an answer today.

The new owners of the Abitibi-Price pulp mill in Pine Falls, Manitoba, have been granted a reprieve until December 31, 1995, from the stricter regulations on new emissions standards that were to have been in place as of December 31, 1993. As a result of extensions granted by federal departments, this mill has become the seventy-eighth mill in Canada not to comply with existing legislation.

This week the results of that policy affected the Sagkeeng First Nation, which has long been suffering from downstream pollution from the Pine Falls mill. A toxic spill of 828 kilograms of BUSAN B-52, a corrosive chemical hazardous to human skin and eyes, was accidentally dumped into the Winnipeg River. The company failed to notify the reserve. The band learned of the incident from Environment Canada three full days after the spill. Water is now being trucked in to the reserve, but for three full days the people of the Sagkeeng First Nation, located less than 300 metres from the spill site, unknowingly drank polluted water.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate determine from her colleague the Minister of the Environment what disciplinary action, if any, will be taken on this matter by the federal government in connection with what I think is shocking action by the pulp mill?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for her question. I am not clear whether this is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. At any rate, I will take the senator's question to my colleague.

Senator Spivak: The emissions standards, if I may just say so, are a federal matter.

[Translation]

THE BUDGET

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE OF ST-JEAN—REVERSAL OF DECISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: The question I am about to ask will be the first I have asked from the opposition benches in my 23 years in Parliament.

I would ask my colleagues opposite, especially Senator Corbin, to forgive me if my preamble is a little long. I will try to discipline myself. With the training I received from such excellent teachers as Senator Olson, Senator Thériault and others, I feel sure that I will stay well within the rules.

That having been said, I would remind you, honourable senators, that I often asked embarrassing questions when I was sitting as a government member in the New Brunswick legislature, as well as in the last nine years in this chamber. I did it at my own risk, and my leaders at the time did not always appreciate my questions, probably because they were already swamped with work. They would no doubt have preferred that all questions come from the other side.

However, I did it whenever the best interests of my community, my province, my region, and national unity required it in my opinion. On the issue of the military college in St-Jean, our many speeches in recent weeks show that we in this political party are interested in this national institution.

I do hope that Liberal senators opposite will return the ball to our court and ask questions on this issue of their government representative in this chamber, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, even though it may irritate or embarrass her or her government ever so slightly.

The purpose of my first question is to determine how stubborn Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and his government are. My colleague Senator Lavoie-Roux told us we should all accept the Liberal argument that associating with the Bloc Québécois on this issue is nearly tantamount to promoting separatism, and will surely lead to Canada's breakup. Another argument put forward by Liberal senators and trustworthy sources is that the national Liberal government will not change its mind on this issue, because it is its way of saying to the Canadian people that any decision made by the government or the Prime Minister is final and irrevocable, and that any hesitation or measure to review it would be an indication of weakness.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): You are going too far. Is this a question? Frankly, there is a limit, Senator Simard. You often go too far. This is long enough.

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand that preambles can be quite long, but at least two of your colleagues are waiting for their turn to speak.

Senator Simard: I remind you, honourable senators, that I had a good teacher in Senator Olson, but I am coming to my question.

Is the announcement of the closure of the St-Jean Military College final? Even if we could demonstrate in this chamber — like all stakeholders and those worried about this issue — that the savings are not in the order of $23 million but around seven, eight or nine million, and that this decision will result in the destruction of a national institution representative of both linguistic communities, will the government continue to say no? Is this what Canadians can expect from the government in the next four years, that even when the government is wrong, because it is afraid to show weakness it will continue to follow the wrong course and refuse to consider other alternatives?

• (1500)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Simard, I am conscious that you are making this intervention, as you said, for the first time on the other side.

If I may be permitted a personal observation, I feel a certain sense of guilt because, over the past several years, I have counted you as one of my very strong supporters and have appreciated your encouragement when I was learning my way in this business of questions from the other side.

At the beginning of your question you raised the issue of the Bloc Québécois. I want to make it absolutely clear, as I have attempted to do with Senator Lavoie-Roux, that the concerns expressed here by senators from the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and elsewhere are, in my view, sincere, well motivated, and obviously stemming from a sense of great commitment to the Senate as an institution.

In response to the other question you raised about the alleged stubbornness of the Prime Minister, I must tell you, as he has said himself, that this was an enormously difficult decision to make, taken in the context of the necessity of the government to reduce expenditures. The Prime Minister and his Minister of National Defence have taken painful steps; steps that have been felt all across this country, in order to bring down the cost of a structure that was built for another time. This involves a reduction of our armed forces as well as a reduction of the cadet population in our military colleges in Canada.

In the United States, three colleges serve two million personnel in the armed forces. In Canada, we will be moving towards a force of 65,000. Our cadet population is projected to drop from 1,600 to 900. In the context of this scenario, the judgment has been that it would not be possible to sustain the military colleges that we currently have in Canada.

Discussions have been continuing between the Prime Minister and the Premier of Quebec, the Intergovernmental Affairs Minister and the Minister of Education for Quebec to see what accommodation can be reached on the issue of the future use of this institution. I am not privy to the substance of those discussions. However, I am sure that that information will become available in the very near future.

Far from being "stubborn" on this issue, the Prime Minister, with the same sense of great regret and emotion that is shared by others in this house, is also attempting to find a solution to this problem.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Since the Leader of the Government has alluded to possible options which her government and the Prime Minister are considering with the Government of Quebec, I get the impression that the Liberal government — as evidenced by the statements which the Prime Minister is reported to have made — is bluntly refusing to allow any kind of military training to take place in St-Jean.

As a matter of fact, when Prime Minister Chrétien speaks of academic training, it encompasses all kinds of other things. The point we want to make, however, is that military training should continue to be provided in St-Jean in both languages. I have the impression that the government and the Prime Minister are considering instead options which will not be acceptable to the vast majority of Canadians, who are interested in the training of officers so that we can continue to make the kind of progress we have achieved over the past 40 years.

In conclusion, I want to come back to something Senator Gigantès said a while ago. He invited us, as well as all those interested in this subject, including officer cadets, to come pay a visit to separatist country. That is what you said a while ago, Senator Gigantès.

There may indeed be separatists in Quebec, but believe me, there are also federalists. In fact, there are a number of such federalists in our political party, and even others who are not members of our party. There are federalists in New Brunswick and elsewhere who are interested in the national question; that is, in the question of language and Canadian duality, contrary to what the Liberal Party has always claimed, namely that only the Liberal Party of Canada could speak for the two official language communities. As far as our party is concerned, that was perhaps true in 1940, or around the turn of the century, when our party seemed to have difficulty in dealing with matters of language, but that has not been the case for a long time.

In fact, the examples given to us by the Stanfields, Clarks and Mulroneys proved that when confronted with an issue of national importance, our political party was prepared to wade into the fray and take a stand. That is what we are asking Liberal senators to do today.

[English]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of personal privilege —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is out of order, since this is Question Period.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not pretend to be an expert on the rules. However, I have been told that no points of order are permitted during Question Period. If we could bring this Question Period to an end, perhaps we could look at some other aspects of this discussion.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, in response to the supplementary question of Senator Simard, there is, and always has been, a fundamental commitment and concern within the Liberal Party of Canada about the importance of the linguistic duality in this country.

I can assure honourable senators that every conceivable effort will be made — and I am convinced successfully made — to accommodate, not only academically but socially in every way —

Senator Thériault: Culturally.

Senator Fairbairn: And culturally, thank you — the duality of our country within RMC, within the programs it offers, and within the lifestyle that will exist in that institution.

• (1510)

Again, I want to make this abundantly clear: When we talk about motivation, there may be motivation on the part of the Bloc Québécois on this issue, but that, I stress, is not the motivation that moves senators in this house to have a concern about the future and the history of the Royal Military College in Quebec. There is a fundamental difference, honourable senators; one which I think all in this house accept.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am in a most difficult situation, because, although we have a finite time set aside for Question Period and that time has already expired, I see four senators trying to get my attention. I am too new at this job to pretend to lecture anyone. I understand the vigour of honourable senators in Question Period today, and on other days since this new session began. That has some positive aspects.

Blaise Pascal, one of my favourite authors, said:

[Translation]

> This letter would not have been as long if I had had more time.

[English]

I might borrow from those words and say that we should all try to take less time in order to have more time. We are running into a bit of difficulty.

I would not attempt to change the Rules of the Senate. They have been given to me. However, I think with goodwill on all sides, both in questions and in answers, we could have more time if we were to be briefer.

I might tell Senator Gigantès that it was rule 23(1) which I had to invoke in order to refuse his intervention.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is my pleasure today to supply responses to six questions. The first is in reply to a question asked on February 8 by the Honourable Senator Rivest regarding labour market training. The second is in reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Corbin regarding GST and the underground labour market. The third response is to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Forrestall regarding the purchase of Halifax-Dartmouth Industries by Saint John's Shipbuilding Ltd. The fourth is in reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Johnson on February 23 regarding the Centre of Excellence for Women's Health. The fifth is in reply to a question asked on February 24 by the Honourable Senator Marshall regarding unemployment insurance cuts to lobster fishermen. The sixth response is to a question asked on February 24 by the Honourable Senator Carney regarding the Space Station.

HUMAN RESOURCES

(Response to question raised by Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest on February 8, 1994)

The Minister of Human Resources Development has recently launched an action plan for reform of the broad social security system, including labour market arrangements.

The social security reform will be focused on ensuring security and opportunity for Canadians, and this will require a reconsideration of the roles and responsibilities of both levels of government.

The federal government is not closing the door to new labour market arrangements with the province of Quebec or any other province. Indeed, discussions are ongoing with a number of provinces, including Quebec on how to better serve clients and eliminate any duplication and waste.

Supplementary

Under the Constitution, labour market training does not belong to either order of government.

There are important reasons for both orders of government to be involved.

The federal government has never been involved in conducting training and instead purchases training courses from provincial or other institutions through our network of local Canada Employment Centres (CECs).

The federal government offers an extensive, community based labour market network across the country through its 490 CECs, with 119 in Quebec alone.

Decisions regarding training as such are made at a level closest to the people.

THE ECONOMY

UNDERGROUND LABOUR MARKET—LOSS OF TAX DOLLARS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Eymard G. Corbin on February 10, 1994)

Revenue Canada has active, ongoing enforcement programs that deal with unreported and under-reported income. In addition to our regular enforcement activities, projects are initiated to help us develop a better understanding of non-compliance and to identify the sectors in which non-compliance is most prevalent.

Specifically, the Department is currently implementing a joint audit program between Taxation and GST. We are also seeking provincial cooperation to develop a closer working relationship with our sales tax administrations and to cross-match data banks. We are increasing the use of technology to better target audit activities and reassigning departmental resources to increase enforcement activities. In addition, all leads on non-compliance are being examined and a coordinated strategy is under way for gathering such information.

Individuals or corporations not reporting or under-reporting their income, or not remitting GST, are subject to assessment of tax and any interest related to overdue taxes, as well as being subject to penalties and prosecution as defined by the Income Tax Act and the Excise Tax Act.

Suspected cases of tax evasion are investigated. In all cases where the evidence accumulated indicates guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, a referral is made to the Department of Justice for criminal prosecution. If the Department of Justice concurs with this recommendation, charges will follow.

TRANSPORT

(Response to question raised by Hon. J. Michael Forrestall on February 22, 1994)

The transaction between SJSL and HDIL was a private sector matter to which the federal government was not a party.

Although this transaction resulted in a change of ownership of a major subcontractor, the construction of twelve Maritime Coastal Defence Vessels for the Department of National Defence will not be affected.

I understand that SJSL President William Haggett has announced that the Maritime Coastal Defence project work will continue to be done in Halifax, and that shipyard operations will remain in Dartmouth and Halifax.

HEALTH

CENTRE OF EXCELLENCE FOR WOMEN'S HEALTH—NATURE AND FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Janis Johnson on February 23, 1984)

To ensure that women's health receives proper attention, we will proceed with the Centre of Excellence for women's health as outlined in the Red Book.

Initially we will support one centre, and subsequently we will be considering adding several more centres.

We are in the process now of developing the specific criteria and application process.

We expect to issue the call for applications by June and select the successful applicant in the Fall. We would like the first Centre to commence its work early in 1995.

The Ministry of Health will work very closely with the Centre to ensure that high priority women's health issues remain the focus of the Centre's work.

One of the Centre's initial tasks will be to determine the most important women's health issues, and then to undertake further work on these issues. The ultimate objective of the Centre is to increase the responsiveness of the Canadian health system to the health needs of women.

We are well aware of the fact that only a small percentage of medical research funding Canada has been allocated to women's health research. The Centre will help rectify this situation, but in addition, we must work with research funding bodies such as the Medical Research Council to ensure they are more receptive to funding women's health research.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CUTS—PLIGHT OF LOBSTER FISHERMEN

(Response to question raised by Hon. Jack Marshall on February 24, 1994)

The intent of the Government is certainly not to make it impossible for anyone to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. However, all workers will be required to work longer in order to receive benefits.

Fishermen must have 6 weeks of employment in fishing, but the remainder of the 12 weeks which will be needed to qualify for benefits can be obtained by working in any type of insurable employment.

THE BUDGET

INTERNATIONAL SPACE STATION PROGRAM—STATUS OF CANADA'S COMMITMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Pat Carney on February 24, 1994)

The U.S. has been aware since this Government took office that all programs, including Space Station, were under review because of the difficult fiscal situation facing this country.

The Government has therefore been looking at all its options to see how it could best achieve substantial savings in the Space Station program while retaining a beneficial role for Canada.

The Minister of Finance, the Honourable Paul Martin, pointed out, discussions were engaged with the U.S. prior to the Budget on ways of achieving this objective.

The wording was changed from "withdrawal from our current commitments" to "reduction in our current commitments" to avoid any misunderstanding about the Government's objectives in this program.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS INDEPENDENCE PROGRAM— QUALIFICATION OF VETERANS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wish to bring to the attention of Senator Molgat what I feel is a variance in an answer I was given yesterday to Question No. 2 on the Order Paper. It has to do with the extension of the Veterans Independence Program to Canada-service-only veterans.

The answer provided by the Honourable Senator Molgat is that there are 10,336 veterans receiving expenditures of some $68,069,311. The Veterans Independence Program for the Canada-service-only veterans has completed its five-year mandate.

In 1988, it was stated in the Canada Gazette that the amendments to the Veterans Independence Program which would extend the benefits to the Canada-service veterans would result in an additional 16,000 veterans qualifying for benefits at an estimated cost of $227 million through 1992-93. I know that an error could have been made in the numbers between 10,000 and 16,000. However, I am wondering at the discrepancy between $227 million and $68 million. Either that is an error or someone was extremely inefficient in projecting such an amount over five years.

If the figure is not in error, then I wonder why my requests to past Ministers of Veterans Affairs to extend these benefits to ex-prisoners have gone unheeded. There are some ex-prisoners of war who are not entitled to receive benefits under the Veterans Independence Program because they were not in receipt of a disability pension, even though they suffered under terrible conditions in prisoner-of-war camps.

I am asking the Deputy Leader of the Government to clarify the amounts in order that I may press the matter further.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Senator Marshall for his question. As he knows, what I tabled yesterday was a response to a written question that he had presented some time ago. I do not have before me the answer I gave to him yesterday.

Answers to such questions come directly from the departments and not from our side of the Senate. I shall inquire with the department.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

FELICITATIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is a most important day for many Canadians. March 17 has important historical significance. I note today that several senators on both sides of the house are sporting the colour green. I compliment them, and I wish all of those who are of Irish descent, or those who wish they were Irish, a very happy St. Patrick's Day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

ORDERS OF THE DAY

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND FEDERAL POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Pierre De Bané moved the second reading of Bill C-3, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill also seeks to renew the equalization program.

As honourable senators will know, equalization is so important that the principle of it is enshrined in the Canadian Constitution. In fact, Canadians' unique sense of sharing goes back to the very beginning of Confederation, and shows that the Canadian federation is working.

Equalization officially became a specific program in 1957, under the government of the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent. However, the tax allocation agreements during and after the war had an important equalization element for provincial government revenues. Already in 1867, higher legislative subsidies were paid to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick than to Ontario and Quebec because those first mentioned two provinces lost a disproportionate share of customs duties and excise taxes when they joined Confederation.

The importance of the federal equalization program for the unity of our country cannot be overestimated. The equalization program helps ensure that all provinces can afford to offer the public services which Canadians need.

The transfers also help to maintain Canada's economic union since they make it easier for Canadians to move throughout the country. Canadians can receive basically comparable services and expect to pay about the same income tax regardless of where they live in Canada. Without the equalization program, the richer provinces would have more or better public services such as roads, schools and medical facilities. Such a situation, honourable senators, would lead to injustices that Canadians reject. Canadians believe firmly that they should have access to more or less the same benefits wherever they choose to live.

I would also like to point out that equalization payments are unconditional. Thus, the program simply seeks to reduce fiscal disparities among the provincial governments and not to influence the provinces' spending priorities.

[English]

In considering the renewal of equalization, the government has had to balance the need to provide those provinces that are the recipients of equalization payments with appropriate financial resources on the one hand, and the need to be fiscally responsible on the other. I have no doubt that this bill does both. Equalization is projected to rise from $8 billion this year to $10.4 billion in 1998-99. All seven provinces that are equalization recipients are expected to gain from these increases. The provinces currently eligible for equalization are Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Equalization is the most important federal transfer program for reducing disparities in the ability of provincial governments to provide public services. Before equalization payments, the revenue-raising capacity of the seven recipient provinces is 85 per cent of the national average. After equalization, it is roughly 93 per cent of the national average. In practical terms, this means that any province, along with its cities and municipalities, that levies average rates of tax will have at least $4,800 per person with which to fund public services to its residents.

[Translation]

Finally, the fact that equalization payments should increase by more than 5 per cent a year clearly demonstrates the priority that the government is giving to that program. In the next two years, expenditures for all federal programs should only increase by 0.4 per cent a year; in fact, except for equalization payments, these program expenditures remain unchanged for the next two years.

At the same time, the renewal is affordable and fully compatible with the interim objective of the government to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of the GNP. As I already pointed out, the total federal expenditures are controlled.

The equalization program must take into consideration, of course, the government fiscal situation. Canadian taxpayers' money must be spent wisely on their behalf. We must not lose sight of the fact that our long-term ability to fund our social security programs depends on the fiscal and economic health of this country. We must therefore provide responsible management if we want to continue helping families and individuals whose well-being depends on the social security programs of the country.

That is why the bill before us today provides for the capping of the total cost of the program for the five-year period, that is from 1994-95 to 1998-99. The cap is a means of ensuring that the growth of equalization payments will not exceed the overall economic growth. That cap, which was first established in 1982, makes sure that the cost of the program remains under control and, therefore, that the program stays within the financial means of the Government of Canada.

The cap has provided the federal government a considerable protection during the last half of the 1980s. Essentially, it protects the government from a too rapid growth of the program costs.

[English]

I will now briefly review the details of the bill. First, it is proposed that equalization be renewed for five years. Accompanying that five-year renewal is a commitment by the government not to change the structure of the formula. This means that there will be greater certainty in budgetary planning for the provinces.

Second, the equalization standard will be unchanged. The so-called five-province standard measures the fiscal capacity of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. As noted, this provides receiving provinces with 93 per cent of the fiscal capacity of the national average.

Third, as already mentioned, a ceiling will be retained. The ceiling will continue to be based on the 1992-93 fiscal year, a year of relatively low program payout.

[Translation]

Fourth, the program floors will remain unchanged. The floors provide protection to provinces against large year-to-year declines in equalization. The floors are determined by the fiscal capacity of the provinces, the less well-off getting better protection.

Fifth, certain tax base changes to update the measurement of the provinces' fiscal capacity will be introduced. This is essential to maintain the integrity of the program.

[English]

Finally, the legislation contains a means to alleviate excessive reductions in equalization for provinces with specific and exceptionally large portions of the tax base for certain natural resources. This will remove a longstanding irritant to the provinces on the so-called "tax-back issue." It will enable provinces to retain 30 per cent of the revenues from the relevant natural resources rather than losing equalization on a dollar-for-dollar basis. This measure has been welcomed by the affected provinces.

[Translation]

In closing, honourable senators, this bill will provide to the seven less wealthy provinces stable funding on which they will be able to rely during their financial planning for the next few years. As for the residents of these provinces, they can rest assured that the services to which they are entitled will continue to be provided, and that our government will maintain the commitment of sharing among all Canadians the possibilities and advantages of the Canadian Confederation.

[English]

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I want to speak to Bill C-3, which renews current equalization payments, because of the importance of equalization to the province of Saskatchewan. Particularly, Bill C-3 provides relief on tax-back provisions of the bill on some unique resource capacities, which is potash in our particular case in Saskatchewan.

• (1530)

In preparing for these remarks, I needed help because my usual industriousness prodded me to get as much information as I could. I found that that was a large mistake. There are about 11 experts on this program, one in Ottawa and one in each of the provinces, and they all disagree. However, I did note that Saskatchewan obtained a large increase because of a change in provisions on resource taxation. This additional $60.2 million, not an insignificant amount to our province, will be buried deep in my province's provincial budget, no doubt. But the provincial government, particularly the one now in Regina, is never embarrassed to take credit for sound fiscal management.

Honourable senators, the equalization program is one of the federal government's most important federal transfer programs, especially for reducing disparities within the country. I say to the honourable senator who spoke before me that without equalization the ability of the provinces to offer Canadians comparable levels of service would be seriously undermined. Canada's provinces do not all have the same ability to raise revenues, because they do not have the same level of income and economic activity.

The Progressive Conservative Party views the equalization program as one of the cornerstones of fiscal federalism. It is vital to our economic union. When I speak to this issue, it is in view of a particular interest that I find objectionable: the arguments made against the equalization formula by the Reform Party in the other place.

The Reform Party fancies itself as the defender of the principle of equality of all provinces, but what do reformists say about equalization, a program that promotes the equality of all provinces? They use words like "over-equalization" to imply that the program is going too far.

If they are so confused about how it works, why do they so often draw attention only to what certain provinces get? Why do they continually imply that there is something sinister in the administration of the program? Why, when he is in Atlantic Canada, does the leader of the Reform Party say, "We should refocus transfers only to those provinces most in need," but when he is in Alberta or B.C., he emphasizes that those provinces contribute too much.

It seems that Mr. Manning is deliberately promoting further confusion about this program, depending upon which province he is visiting. This tax illustrates that the Reform Party lacks a national vision that would treat all Canadians equally. That is not to say that we should not be updating our institutions to reflect changing times, but the point is to what ends we want to change Canada's institutions or how consistent the principles that guide these changes will be with the values upon which this country has been founded and has evolved.

It is with this in mind that the Conservatives would look favourably on a couple of specific aspects of Bill C-3.

One improvement that we support is the gradual elimination of the tax-back irritant for some unique resource capacities in certain provinces. This helps Newfoundland and Saskatchewan. As a senator from a province with a potash industry, I view this measure as positive and equalizing. Minor changes will also add $166.2 million to the program this year and $900 million over the next five years.

This bill illustrates to me and to Canada the need for those of us in the Progressive Conservative Party in the Senate to speak as a national alternative to the Liberal government.

In preparing for my response, I thought I would read the responses to this bill in the other place in order to learn something about how they feel, so I collected Hansard of February 8, 1994. The member from St-Hyacinthe—Bagot, speaking on behalf of the Bloc Québécois, shared with the other members his opinion. While he began his speech with an overall lament on how the program is unfair because of the caps for increases, he got to the point. In his opinion, Quebec was the big loser. He went on to add that the ceiling will cost Quebec some $900 million in the next five years in forgone revenue. That is a neat trick from someone who is advocating independence and will lose the revenue anyway — or is that the definition of sovereignty?

After they declare independence, I can hear this party exclaiming, "Just one minute. We were not talking about the equalization payments."

Meanwhile, the member from Calgary West representing the Reform Party wants to reduce the payments and eliminate middle-income provinces, but he will not tell us which ones they are. I know that one would be Saskatchewan. We would have to increase taxes in our province by $650 for each man, woman and child, or $1,600 per household, to replace revenue sharing. Mr. Manning says that national wealth will not be distributed across the country but only to poor provinces. According to the Reform Party it comes down to this: Because Alberta has too high a capacity to tax, Alberta receives nothing, while Quebec receives $3.7 billion.

Another Bloc Québécois member then asked, and I am paraphrasing here, "Well, what about the millions for wheat for Western Canada?" I might remind the Bloc Québécois that not much wheat is grown in British Columbia.

The Reform Party member from Calgary West then went on to talk about globalization in answer to that query. The Bloc Québécois member was then offended that the Reform Party member mentioned that Quebec receives 45 per cent of the equalization payments.

I should like to point out again that this is occurring between a Bloc Québécois member who wants to leave Canada and a Reform Party member whose policy is to get rid of agricultural payments, and who could not care less if Quebec did leave. That is not the way to run a country. Needless to say, although at times I was amused, it was not for the right reasons. I was not impressed.

In conclusion, I should like to reiterate that the Progressive Conservative Party views the equalization program as a unifying and equalizing force in Confederation. We support the changes made to this program in Bill C-3 as constructive and perfectly consistent with the principles upon which Canada was founded and has evolved.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Molgat for Senator DeBané, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault moved the second reading of Bill C-5, to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-5 will extend the General Preferential Tariff, also known as the GPT, for a period of ten years beyond the present expiry date, which is June 30, 1994.

[English]

• (1540)

Honourable senators may be aware that during the 1970s a generalized system of tariff preferences was established by most industrialized countries for the developing countries. It was anticipated that that would encourage economic growth in the developing world through increased trade. On July 1, 1974, Canada introduced its version of the tariff preference, the General Preferential Tariff, or GPT.

Under the Canadian GPT, the preferential tariff rates are generally one-third of the MFN rates, although a number of exceptions exist. For example, since 1983, Canada has permitted duty-free entry for all GPT-eligible imports from the least-developed developing countries.

The GPT and other similar schemes in other developed countries have been shown to be a success. A recent United Nations review of these schemes underlined the fact that exports from the developing world under preferential tariffs increased fivefold between 1976 and 1990, from $12 billion to $60 billion.

Honourable senators, during 1993, Canada alone imported over $3.7 billion in goods from the developing world under GPT. Those imports stimulated the export sectors of many developing countries. In addition, they were of direct benefit to Canada. As a result of lower tariffs on goods from the developing world, Canadian consumers have access to imported goods at competitive prices. In addition, Canadian producers benefit from the reduced tariffs on inputs they import from the developing world and use in the production of goods in Canada.

The GPT is a unilateral program and Canada is free to withdraw GPT preferences at any time. Moreover, since 1980, the Canadian International Trade Tribunal has had the standing authority to receive petitions directly from Canadian industry for the withdrawal or temporary suspension of GPT rates where injury from increased GPT imports is alleged to have occurred.

Honourable senators, as I said at the outset, this is an extension of legislation that started in 1974. According to the act, it must be renewed every ten years. This will cover the period between 1994 and the year 2004. As stated, the minister has the authority to take some countries off the list if they get to the developed stage and add other countries if the minister sees fit.

That is the only explanation I need give to the Senate on this legislation. I do have other information, if any senator is interested in the figures involved.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I would like to take a few seconds to refer to a remark that was made by Senator Lavoie-Roux. I am sorry that she is not here.

Honourable senators, I cannot keep from reflecting upon proposals such as, for instance, the ones made by my colleague who just expressed his party's opinion of the bill tabled by Senator De Bané.

I think there are two threats to this country at the present time. One of the great problems is that these threats exist within the Canadian Parliament; not here in the Senate but in the other place.

In my humble opinion, these threats are coming first from the Bloc Québécois and second from the Reform Party.

[English]

That is why I am happy when I hear my colleagues in this place talk about the Reform Party, and let people know the true facts about the Reform Party.

[Translation]

What worries me a little is that I never hear a francophone senator from Quebec talk about the Bloc Québécois here. They are almost always ready to defend the same causes as the Bloc Québécois.

I am not trying to put the Conservatives here in the same basket as the Bloc Québécois. That is not my intention. It is hard for a francophone from outside Quebec to hear, day after day, from his francophone colleagues, especially those from Quebec, who seem to be very happy with any criticisms of the government made by members of the Bloc Québécois.

I have no problem, and I am not sensitive. I do not have any problem with Conservatives attacking the Liberal government in power. I never said, and I will never say, that a government, be it Liberal, Conservative or Bloquiste, should not be attacked by the opposition. That is the role of the opposition.

What worries me is that, with respect to many of the subjects raised here, the Quebecers in this chamber almost always agree with the positions of the Bloc Québécois. That worries me.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators — Your Honour, you will not let me ask a question!

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Lavoie-Roux, you put me in a difficult situation! The connection of one subject to the other seemed tenuous, to say the least, when Senator Thériault raised this issue.

Perhaps, under the circumstances, I could ask Senator Lavoie-Roux to be quite brief so that we can conclude the remarks on this topic, and then I will give the floor to Senator Stratton.

I would not want to be unfair to an honourable senator who had risen to speak. With your leave, honourable senators, I would allow Senator Lavoie-Roux to speak briefly, please.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Thank you, Your Honour.

Senator Thériault says it makes him sad when French-speaking senators — particularly those from Quebec — seem to side with the Bloc Québécois.

The only such instance I have witnessed in this house is, of course, in the case of the Collège militaire de St-Jean. Let us not forget that that college was not created by independentists or separatists, whatever you want to call them!

I remember, I had just finished university back then. It was created thanks to the will of French Canadians across the country, even though a larger number lived, of course, in Quebec.

Senator Thériault: And it was created by a Liberal government!

Senator Lavoie-Roux: That is irrelevant!

What other examples can you give us? If you want us to allow Bloc Québécois members to be the only people who are looking after Quebec's interests, you can imagine what will happen in six months, eight months, or two years!

[English]

• (1550)

Hon. Terry Stratton: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on Bill C-5, which in basketball lexicon should be a slam dunk, so I will be brief.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Not after what I heard.

Senator Stratton: I will try.

Honourable senators, Bill C-5, to amend the Customs Tariff, will extend the General Preferential Tariff — commonly referred to as the GPT — for a further 10-year period. The extension will be to June 30, 2004.

The GPT is a special set of low tariffs for developing countries. They are usually set at one-third the rate of the most favoured nation tariff. The objective of this favourable access is to help developing countries develop export sectors within their own economies.

Honourable senators, I reiterate what the previous speaker has said, that during the seventies, industrialized countries instituted tariff preferences — referred to as the General System of Preferences or GSP — for developing countries to encourage their economic growth through increased trade.

On July 1, 1974, Canada introduced its version of the GSP called the General Preferential Tariff. The GPT was introduced for an initial 10-year period, but was subsequently extended to June 30, 1994. Today, over 180 countries and territories benefit from the GPT.

Items which qualify for GPT must comply with certain regulations. Goods qualify for GPT if at least 60 per cent of the factory price of the goods exported to Canada originated from one or more GPT countries. In the case of the least developed countries, the content requirement is 40 per cent. Since 1983, duty-free entry has been extended to all GPT eligible imports from least developed and developing countries.

The GPT does not only benefit developing countries, it also benefits Canadian consumers. Lower tariffs on goods from developing countries mean that Canadian consumers have the benefit of access to imported goods at competitive prices. Furthermore, Canadian producers who depend on goods from GPT countries as imports also benefit from the reduced tariff. Clearly, the GPT contributes to the economic development of the developing world and benefits Canadians. The GPT is a unilateral program, and Canada is free to modify preferences at any time without breaching any obligations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

Canada has developed an excellent reputation for development assistance. Canada's General Preferential Tariff scheme is widely regarded as being one of the best in the world. It is transparent, simple, and non-discriminatory. Domestic producer interests will not be injured by extending the GPT because of a safeguard mechanism which is in place. Since 1980, the Canadian International Trade Tribunal, or CITT, has had the authority to receive petitions directly from any Canadian industry for the withdrawal or suspension of GPT rates where injury from GPT imports is alleged to have occurred.

The GPT is an effective and efficient market-based policy instrument to deliver assistance to the developing world through trade. I call on all honourable senators to support this legislation, as I intend to do. By supporting Bill C-5, Canada will continue to contribute to economic growth within the developing world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask Senator Stratton a question along the line of Senator Thériault's argument.

Since the Bloc Québécois supported this legislation in the House of Commons, could that be interpreted as meaning that the Liberal Party is tied in with the Bloc Québécois?

Senator Kinsella: Good question!

Senator Stratton: I believe the other side should answer that question.

Senator Frith: A very weak question. It had nothing to do with what Senator Thériault said.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Thériault, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE OF ST-JEAN—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

In commenting on what I said previously, Senator Simard seemed to suggest — and I have not seen his blues — that I thought all the people in Quebec or Quebec City were separatists. Of course that is not the case; there are federalists.

I have always thought it useful for Canadian federalists and Quebec separatists to talk together. I do so every Christmas. Twenty of us sit around the table. There are three federalists — my wife, my daughter and I — and seventeen extreme separatists, all of whom I love dearly. Until they separate, they are my fellow Canadians. They do not like my telling them that, but I take pleasure in doing so.

Honourable senators, when I was Dean at Bishop's University in Lennoxville, I made a point of inviting separatist intellectuals to talk to my anglophone, federalist students. I thought the exchanges were useful for both.

It is in this spirit that I suggested — and I thought my suggestion was very clear — that young, aspirant, anglophone officers would benefit from studying at a francophone university where there are separatists, such as in Quebec City. That is what I said, and that is what will appear in the blues when they are read. Senator Simard, not intentionally I am sure, misinterpreted me.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I will say no more at this time on that matter. We will all wait for the blues, and I will perhaps offer some comments next week.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

That whereas section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies;

Now therefore the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by His Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE
AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

1. The Schedule to the Prince Edward Island Terms of Union is amended by adding thereto, after the portion that reads

"And such other charges as may be incident to, and connected with, the services which by the 'British North America Act, 1867' appertain to the General Government, and as are or may be allowed to the other Provinces;"

the following:

"That a fixed crossing joining the Island to the mainland may be substituted for the steam service referred to in this Schedule;

That, for greater certainty, nothing in this Schedule prevents the imposition of tolls for the use of such a fixed crossing between the Island and the mainland, or the private operation of such a crossing."

Citation

2. This Amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1993 (Prince Edward Island).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I was much impressed by the thoughtful and informative speech of Senator Spivak yesterday. As a nationally known and respected environmentalist, her analysis was an important statement on a most important matter.

My honourable and learned friend Senator Beaudoin gave us a most excellent appraisal of the constitutional situation, but as I told my colleague on this matter, it was not the Constitution but the construction — that is, the bridge — that troubled me.

Honourable senators, it is to the opening speeches of a few days ago that I must turn. I sat enthralled, if not enraptured, as Senator Fairbairn and Senator Phillips extolled the blessings of the bridge. Senator Fairbairn's first sentence was this: "As I look across the floor at Senator Phillips, I am delighted..." At the beginning of Senator Phillips' 28-minute speech, he said he was delighted that Senator Fairbairn herself was introducing the measure and not Senator Molgat. Such mutual admiration, nay it was almost adulation, as they plighted their troth in bridge building! I have known Senator Phillips for nearly 40 years.

Never have I heard him express such a sentiment as delight with any person, place or thing.

• (1600)

Honourable senators, this amendment received a euphoric launch. At times I thought I heard the strains of an Amati violin, and I am sure I heard the Aeolian harp once or twice.

Although loath to depart from this harmonic theme, I fear I must, and will, bring myself to do so. I do this because of a comment made by Senator Fairbairn, for whom I have a high regard. She said that the last time we heard about this project was from Senator Phillips, but after Senator Phillips spoke, much else was said by those deeply concerned about the dangers to the ecology of Prince Edward Island from this mega-project. This government, alas, seems not to hear. My usual candour compels me to say that the preceding government was equally deaf. Bill C-110 was rushed through this Parliament and its committees in great haste. The goal, as we all knew, was to get the signing ceremony over and the hammers hammering and the shovellers shovelling before the election day. Of that grim event, nothing more need be said.

I will try to highlight developments since the passage of the bill.

The first newspaper picture I saw of the work showed the bulldozers in action. What were they doing? Uprooting some beautiful pine trees whose planting in a reforestation plan a few years earlier had been applauded by Islanders. The bridge goes up; the trees come down. Environmental progress?

As things on the construction site of Borden, called after that great man Sir Robert Borden, moved ahead, I heard accounts of dust storms in nearby areas. We do not have dust storms in Prince Edward Island, certainly not in winter, and were doing quite well without them up to now. Then I read that the mayor of Borden wants a larger police force.

Later, when the ice melts, we can look forward to dredging. Honourable senators can readily imagine the amount of dredging necessary for a structure of this magnitude and length. Unfortunately, the lobsters on our rich fishing ground do not have such foresight. Too bad, because the product of this dredging, tons and tons of it, will be dropped into the sea with the prospect of terrible damage to the environment of marine bottom feeders. Meanwhile, the rich scallop beds are still directly in the path of the bridge, and I need not dilate upon the state in which that ancient fisheries industry finds itself. Did it need another blow?

Other new aspects are disturbing. The company building this Bridge of Sighs, as some call it, assured everyone that the design was magnificent and perfectly safe. All was in order. Now we hear that the high arch is to be lowered about 33 feet. If all allegations on the safety side were erroneous, why then the change? What will this do to navigation? What is the effect on the Navigable Waters Protection Act, to which, and from which, we have international commitments?

I also read that such changes might invoke an inquiry by the Environmental Assessment Review Panel. That was what many Islanders thought at the time the bill was passing through Parliament, but that was denied.

What other changes may be ahead? For many of us, the first mega-project we ever heard about failing was the Tower of Babel, but, honourable senators, it was not the last. Along with the question of cost overruns which Senator Spivak dealt with so well yesterday, we must now reflect on the grim prospect of an abandoned mega-project, rusted, discarded part way across the Northumberland Strait, the ferry service gone or on its way out. We know a bit about this in Prince Edward Island. In the 1960s, we had rusty railways for a few years. We had $19 or $20 million worth of approaches going to nowhere.

The bridge is often hailed as a triumph of free enterprise and a paragon of the private sector, yet it is the people of Canada, the taxpayers, who will be forking out $42 million a year for 35 years. That is how private that deal is. This figure is supposed to be equivalent to the subsidy paid to the existing ferry service. The fact that, as our Public Accounts show, the figure is $21 million, not $42 million, is not given much attention by the bridge enthusiasts.

As I have said before, honourable senators, this project has deeply divided the people of my province. I have actually been called an old fogey, someone living in the past, and much worse. I have even been called "yesterday's man," and that is one of the greatest political put-downs in our social structure. I have not heard so much of it since last October 25, as a matter of fact. Now I am reflecting on one of my favourite poems by Sir Walter Scott, and it is only lately that I began to identify myself with the Douglas minstrel Alan Bain. Do you know who he was?

> ...a gray-haired sire whose eye intent > is on the distant future bent...

At your service.

Honourable senators, this question is painful. It is profound. It is challenging and sometimes disturbing. We are dealing with much more than a constitutional amendment. I deeply believe that it is not only the identity and individuality of my beloved province that is at stake, but its future provincehood and its role in the Dominion of Canada. Everybody knows that in these economies of scale, the advantage goes not to the smaller components but to the bigger ones.

I notice that the Premier of New Brunswick is very interested in the bridge. I do not recall the Premier of New Brunswick mentioning anything when our ferry service was in danger. At this very time, people in my province are distressed and a little fearful as they contemplate their electrical utility coming under the jurisdiction of another province. In the process, a vital part of our economy will be weakened.

Many times I have urged that, in so important a step, so crucial a development, the Island people should be consulted. They have never been asked to choose between this bridge and an efficient, modern ferry service. I believe that before this constitutional amendment is made final, the Island people should be consulted fairly and squarely on an issue so vital to their future. As for me, I continue to believe that this mega-project is a mega-blunder. I know that today, the bridge builders are ascendant and they are cheerful, and I do not want to dampen their parade in any way.

I cannot help but recall a great Englishman, the first Prime Minister of that mother of Parliaments, Sir Robert Walpole. When the war hawks were demanding that the British get into the war of Spanish succession and have some more killings, he delayed but finally he went along. As they danced in the streets and the church bills were ringing, old Walpole said: "They may ring their bells now. Before long they will be wringing their hands."

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator Macquarrie has been his usual eloquent and interesting self —

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If the honourable senator speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Molgat: I wished to adjourn the debate for Senator Fairbairn who has some closing comments to make, so perhaps I will ask one of my colleagues to do so.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie made reference to a proposed change in the design of the bridge. Has he been able to ascertain why that proposal, if indeed there is such a proposal, has been made? Is it to make the bridge more stable?

When Bill C-100 was before the committee, we were assured that the design of the structure had been perfected. What is the reason for this additional improvement? What assurance do we have that additional improvements will not be necessary? In other words, what information has the honourable senator been able to gather with regard to the proposal, if indeed there is a proposal, for a change in the design?

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, if Senator Stewart is looking for assurance that everything is all right, he is coming to very much the wrong person. I am far from assured. In fact, I am fearful of what may be ahead.

I, too, remember the call of perfection, that everything was just fine. I can read only what I see before me, and it is unfortunate that in Prince Edward Island there is not balanced treatment in the media on this matter.

It seems that it has been said by spokesmen for the company — and that is pretty well the spokesmen for the department — that the change will make the drive easier. This is the very reason why I think a committee should be looking at this matter and finding out about these letters that are coming in. Someone has stated that he or she did not know whether or not there was a letter; someone else has stated that he or she was not sure if this would require environmental research, or if it were so serious that one would have to get it through the Access to Information Act.

In other words, I do not know. I want to know. We would be far wiser legislators if we knew right now. There is no great hurry, as Senator Molgat has said, about this measure. At best, the bridge will not be completed before 1997.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Phillips, calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday, February 22, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Graham).

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, someone once said that you cannot step into the same river twice. If any country is like a river, it is this country. Canada is always changing and becoming something else, Morley Callaghan once observed. Today, if you listen carefully, you can almost hear the sound of a distant river's voice. The waters churn, the river runs deep; the currents can be treacherous. But the voice of the river is a harbinger of hope. The transition is coming and Canada, our country, is becoming something else.

For a long time, many of us had lost heart. Many of us have been demoralized and indifferent. There have been many reasons for this. The problems we face as a nation have appeared irresolvable. Look at our combined debt. It stands at approximately $650 billion and, if one works it out, that means about $100,000 for each family of four. We are now prisoners of the Draconian laws of compound interest. The interest alone on our accumulated foreign debt is about $25 billion a year, and one third of our federal tax revenue goes to pay it.

We have been told recently that Canada's international competitiveness is declining rapidly in comparison with that of other OECD countries. In fact, the statistics have spoken of what some people have referred to as our "humiliation" over the last few years. They have spoken of a country which, in the eyes of many, was not prepared to take front row seats on the playing field of a new age.

Here at home, a 49-per-cent tax rate has contributed to the agony of the middle class. It has driven more and more Canadians into the underground economy which was referred to yesterday by Senator Murray. That economy has been estimated to be as high as $50 billion — the equivalent of one million people each earning $50,000 a year of untaxed income.

Recently, we thought we saw relief as Statistics Canada demonstrated that unemployment insurance benefits were down 5.2 per cent from last year's record $19.3 billion. The underlying reasons, however, were no cause for celebration. Very simply put, more unemployed Canadians are exhausting their benefits as long-term unemployment increases.

• (1620)

As I said in this chamber several weeks ago during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, 52 per cent of our people are now employed on a part-time basis, or underemployed, or unemployed. With regard to the latter, about one-third of unemployed Canadians have been out of work for more than six months.

As we all understand, high unemployment means many things. It means that the basic human tools, be they psychological or social — the tools we need to make change happen, the fundamental secrets of making change in life happen — are rusting away. However, it means more than that if we extend the analysis a little bit further. It means that the conscious link between the individual and society is severed. That breeds despair. It means the dissolution of a lifeline and a sense of powerlessness. That breeds demoralization. It means that too many Canadians in the recent past have lost heart; that too many Canadians say, "Why Canada? What's in it for me?"

The Prime Minister has told us that the restoration of hope to the individual will be the engine of our renewal. There is nothing mysterious about this. In fact, the idea of individual dignity is the central premise upon which our western liberal democracies have been built. It has been the individual actions of Canadians over the decades that have built this country with responsible foundations and endowed it with a radical heart. More than ever today, people must be considered our primary resource. The future will not be won by what the land alone can generate; the future will be won by what people can produce. The beacon by which we will measure our present realities will be a high value-added labour force.

Allow me to reflect a little on the recent budget, honourable senators. In my opinion, there were a number of important concepts at work in Mr. Martin's thinking which bear further analysis. First, the budget was conceived solidly around the Prime Minister's message of individual dignity. Second, it was a dramatic message to the private sector that the Government of Canada recognizes that whatever happens to employment in the 1990s will depend on the decisions of that sector. The message is clear: No one benefits from a situation where goods and services are produced but jobs, which allow the average individual to purchase those goods and services, are nowhere in sight. Henry Ford saw that a long time ago. He increased his workers' pay packages because he knew his employees were also his consumers.

I must say that there is no great mystery behind what Mr. Martin has tried to do. For some time, the combination of growth and high unemployment had produced the frightening spectre of a jobless economy. This is one of the most intractable — not to speak of frightening — problems facing the Group of Seven countries which met this week in Detroit.

The Minister of Finance recognized at first instance that the state could not penalize employers who tried to employ people. Rising payroll taxes since 1989 had increased by 43 per cent and had become, as Mr. Martin has so well put it, "silent killers of jobs." The tendency of government to rely on payroll taxes in times of high unemployment had become an entirely destructive device. In many ways, it had become a means of transferring the deficit to small- and medium-sized businesses. In order to make employment his highest priority, the minister had to allow the business community to create jobs and not tax those incentives.

I believe we will get some interesting feedback from the recent budget, in particular from the Europeans, for it has become evident that we will have here a significant labour cost advantage over Europe, where non-wage payroll costs now range from 30 per cent to 50 per cent of the wage bill. The simple truth is that no government can break the back of industry and expect industry to create jobs. The key to reconstruction in the wake of some of the worst lay-offs in Canadian history is new start-ups. It is as simple as that.

Let us look south at the American experience for a little food for thought. In the early 1980s, more than 3 million jobs were eliminated by the 500 largest corporations in the United States. At the same time, 18 million new jobs were created as 2.1 million new businesses started up. That recession was worse than the one the Americans are now leaving behind.

In spite of the 1991-92 recession, more than 200,000 new companies were started annually in the United States. It is hoped that, as a direct result of the recent budget, there will be many new Canadian start-ups, or the expansion of small- and medium-sized businesses now resident in Canada.

I can think of many home-grown firms in my own part of the world which have shown real global success, and which have become role models for new entrepreneurs. There are the big ones like McCains. However, I believe Mr. Martin wants to concentrate on, for example, innovative small ones like Seagull Pewter of Pugwash, Nova Scotia.

In that respect it is worthwhile remembering that the central engine of growth in the Canadian economy is small business, a sector where, in the 1980s, over 87 per cent of our new jobs were created. I think we all realize that Canadian-owned companies spend a high proportion of their revenue on domestic research and development. Nortel, for example, invests 12 per cent of its revenue in R&D at home, while earning the bulk of its revenue in the United States. The investment in R&D is obviously one of the main reasons why Nortel is now the world's leading supplier of fully digital telecommunications switching equipment.

There is a major role for government here, as Mr. Martin and Mr. Manley, the Minister of Industry, well understand. The costs of a big commitment to R&D may be so prohibitive and the risks so great that one small company may not be able to do it without government support.

A few months ago, in the Financial Times, I read something that was reported to have been said by Laurent Beaudoin, who is now the Chairman of Bombardier. He pointed out that government and industry should share the costs of research and development in order to maintain an aerospace sector in Canada that was competitive in world markets. I believe that the establishment of an R&D bank, through which government provides matching funds to the private sector, is a logical way to take some of the uncertainty out of private sector investments in this very critical period for this very critical activity.

• (1630)

There are many, like my friend C.E. Ritchie, Chairman of the Board of the Bank of Nova Scotia, who feel confident that Canada has a great economic future beyond the dangerous reefs we are presently navigating. Mr. Ritchie recently decried the people who cannot see beyond the immediate threats to existing jobs. The truth is, he said, that information technology and its offspring will eventually create tens of millions of new jobs throughout the industrialized world. He pointed out that employment in the computer industry in the U.S. is twice that of the auto industry. New jobs will correlate with new technology. It is a simple fact. They will be created to tailor new, computer-based applications in education, in health care and in the delivery of new and more efficient financial services — all areas, he stressed, in which Canadians excel.

Honourable senators, there is a new optimism out there. As I said at the beginning, if you listen carefully you can almost hear the sound of a distant river's voice — a harbinger of hope — as a transition emerges and Canada becomes something else.

The key to all of this is the empowerment of people, for they indeed are our primary resource. That is what the recent budget was about; that is what the renewal of our social programs are about — the empowerment of people. Budgets and social programs are now, of course, immutably linked. Social policy will have a direct impact on our competitiveness as a nation. That is why Mr. Martin has told us that when our social programs are redefined, we will see a more comprehensive attack on the deficit.

Senator Murray: Lean and mean social programs.

Senator Graham: Senator Murray and others will have an opportunity to comment on that at the appropriate time.

As Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, I can say that the members of my committee look forward to examining in considerable detail any recommendations in this respect which may come forward from the government.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I am sorry to interrupt, but the rules require that I point out that the time allotted to the honourable senator has expired. Does the honourable gentleman have leave to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Graham: I thank honourable senators.

There is one simple fact to remember here: The government plans to overhaul our unemployment, welfare and training systems for one central reason, and that is to remove the disincentives to work. Again, I must point out that work is the link between the individual and the society in which he or she lives. I believe that when that link is severed, the conscious sense of responsibility of the individual to society disappears. As Mr. Martin well understands, the state cannot call for sacrifice from people who have lost their stake in the creation of a fair society.

For a long time, Mr. Martin has said, despair has stalked this country. The recent budget, I believe, was a budget of hope in very difficult times. It gives hope to private enterprise by guaranteeing it the tools to prosper in the global market. It gave hope to the middle class, whose silent agony has been one of the more tragic dimensions of the recent recession. It gives hope to our young people because they have been told that unemployment is not their destiny. Rather, employment is their future. And the Finance Minister has continued the traditional "guardian" role of Liberal philosophy in that the budget improves UI benefits for single parents in the lowest income categories. In my opinion, it was a realistic budget of hope. Mr. Martin's optimism was palpable as he factored in a $5-billion national increase in fiscal revenues by 1996, all that to be generated by an improving economy.

I believe that if you look south of the border, you will see that that optimism is more than justified. The U.S. economy is back on top, as the New York Times trumpeted recently, and it is being predicted that the recovery in the United States can have a double or triple effect in Canada.

Therefore, I believe the transition is coming. There is a strong feeling in international money markets that the Government of Canada and the Bank of Canada are fiscally and monetarily responsible players. For that, Mr. Martin can take much credit. He has convinced financial markets that the government is serious about the 3 per cent pledge; that is, the targeted $25-billion deficit, or 3 per cent of the gross domestic product by 1996. In my opinion, he has aimed low in this cautious three-year outlook. This may mean he will do better than his present deficit goal. Financial markets, of course, respond to what might be termed "modest" targets.

As well, he has set himself an unusually high cushion in the form of a reserve fund for contingencies. That fund gives him the room to make unexpected expenditures without undermining deficit targets. In theory, he can lower the final deficit just by leaving the money unspent.

Therefore, honourable senators, I believe there is much to look forward to as Canada edges into the twenty-first century. We have leadership in this country which puts people at the centre of our national reconstruction. We have a Prime Minister who believes that individual dignity is the engine of all we will do together and of all we will accomplish together. The recent budget was a mirror of this basic assumption, and it is this assumption upon which the government will enact reform and renewal.

The change will come, and I believe that it will come primarily from our young people. We must celebrate our young people because it is they who must seize the future. We must give them hope. As I said once before, they are really our North Star. We must ensure our young people the basic skills which are relative to job market requirements. No longer can we tolerate an economy where we see the coexistence of skills shortages and high unemployment, one of the great failures of the Canadian labour market. We must ensure that our educational institutions have strong linkages with the workplace.

In Germany, as many of you know, 70 per cent of students enrol at the age of 16 or 17 in the well-known "dual system" in which part of each week is spent in the classroom and part on the shop floor acquiring practical experience. The apprenticeship system must become a vital component of our national experience here in Canada as we build a high value-added labour force together.

We must ensure our young people a stake in our society, for without that we cannot build together; we cannot achieve what we must together. We will only navigate that river I spoke of earlier, the river which is continually transforming itself and becoming something else, if our people believe in their own worth.

However, before we begin the adventure of renewal, I believe it would be timely to keep in mind the famous words of Paul of the Corinthians to his young friend, Timothy. "Timothy," he said, "keep safe what has been entrusted to you." Whatever the new global reality will become, whatever new maps we see, whatever new boundaries we see, I hope that new entity will inherit the best of what came before, that the new age will carry the footprints of Canadians who built a compassionate country at the northern end of the world, a country with a radical heart.

It is these values that we must bring to a brave new world, and it is these values which must underpin our brave new policies. We must remember, as Paul reminded his friend Timothy, to keep safe what has been entrusted to us.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, debate adjourned.

> That the papers and evidence taken on the subject and the work accomplished during the Third Session of the Thirty-fourth Parliament be referred to the committee; and

> That the committee present its report no later than December 31, 1994.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

MARINE SAFETY—MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE ROLE OF LIGHTSTATIONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Pat Carney, pursuant to notice of March 16, 1994, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine the mandate of the staffed lightstations on the west coast to determine whether their role should be expanded to accommodate the increase in the number of marine users, in light of the expansion in the number of recreational users, keeping marine safety in mind, and the current restructuring of the Canadian Coast Guard;

She said: Honourable senators, first, I inadvertently sent the wrong copy of the motion to the Table yesterday. Therefore, with leave of the Senate and pursuant to rule 31 of the Rules of the Senate, I should like to amend the motion by adding the following paragraph after the words "Canadian Coast Guard":

> That the committee present its report no later than December 31, 1994.

Therefore, pursuant to notice of March 16, 1994, I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine the mandate of the staffed lightstations on the west coast to determine whether their role should be expanded to accommodate the increase in the number of marine users in light of the expansion in the number of recreational users, keeping marine safety in mind, and the current restructuring of the Canadian Coast Guard; and
> That the committee present its report no later than December 31, 1994.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Carney, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine the mandate of the staffed —

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Dispense!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith: Is that it? We will not hear anything about it? Will you not tell us about it?

Senator Molgat: Will there not be an explanation by Senator Carney as to why we should be undertaking this study?

Senator Frith: I wanted to hear about the Three Sisters and all those historic West Coast lighthouses.

Senator Molgat: The explanation need not be given today, if Senator Carney has an appointment. Simply adjourn the debate and we will continue with it next time.

Senator Carney: I would be glad to indicate my interest in this matter to honourable senators.

The Canadian Coast Guard in much of the rest of the country, except for Newfoundland, has de-manned or de-staffed our lighthouses. This is in keeping with what has happened in other areas of the world; for example, the United States.

It is our position that on the B.C. coast, which is the wildest in the world, there is a real need for having people staff the lighthouses, not only because of the safety considerations that they supply, but also because they are very cost-effective.

In the lightstations I have visited down the coast, having a lighthouse family — in which, incidentally, everyone over the age of 10 is looking at the water, listening to the radio and giving assistance to local users — is more efficient than having a helicopter take the time to go out to a lighthouse after the equipment has broken down. Moreover, the fact that a light is out is often not made known until some unfortunate fisherman or marine user reports it. That is why the former Conservative government stood the whole issue of de-staffing the lightstations because of the concern of the B.C. coastal community.

The current situation is that the Canadian Coast Guard is restructuring its western operations. Because it is restructuring as we speak, it is a timely move by the Senate to examine this matter of great public concern and to examine what issues are involved here between the bureaucrats in Ottawa, the people on the lights and the people on the coast who rely on the lights. The Senate could then report on whether the whole issue of de-staffing should be reviewed and whether the mandate of the lightstations should be expanded.

The ridiculous aspect of the mandate of the lightstations as set out by Treasury Board is such that if a lightkeeper sees someone, say a windsurfer, sailing by the lightstation, his or her mandate does not permit him or her to put his or her boat into the water and go and save that windsurfer. If a diver off my island of Saturna is separated from his equipment and is drowning off the lightstation, the current mandate of Treasury Board does not permit my lightkeeper to go out and pull that person out of the water. But they do it anyway.

My desk is filled with letters from people saying, "Thank you for saving my life. Please let's save the lightstations." Since there is restructuring and this issue is on hold, and since this is an issue of great importance not only to B.C. but also to Newfoundland, which still has staffed lightstations, it is timely for the Senate to examine this issue of marine safety in view of the expansion of recreational users on the B.C. coast where, on any given weekend, there could be 30,000 boats in the water. Because of the particular nature of the Newfoundland coast, the advice we got was that this would be a matter of concern to that coast, too.

Some 194 lights have been de-staffed. Some other lights can be de-staffed. However, I think this is an opportunity to take a look at whether we are going in the wrong direction by taking people off the lights, and whether there is a place in some parts of Canada, which is unlike any other part of the world, for keeping people manning the lights in the interests of people like me and my family and your family, and the people who work on fish farms and the fishermen, as my daughter still calls herself, and the people who live in the coastal communities who rely on the lights.

Just as an example, on February 15, the wind storms were so bad that the ferries running from Vancouver Island to Vancouver did not know whether they could run past the island barrier of the Gulf Islands into the open Strait of Georgia. The skipper of the Queen of Saanich phoned my lightkeeper to ask him about the wind conditions and whether it was safe for the ship and the people aboard her to travel into the Gulf. My lightkeeper gave him the winds. No automatic detector will be able to do as good a job as my lightkeeper at my lightstation on Saturna Island.

It is time to review this issue. There is a great increase in recreational use. I think the roles of lightstations and of the people who man the lights should be properly examined, and they should, for once, get the credit that is due them.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, may I ask a question? How many staffed lightstations are there left in British Columbia and, if the figures are available, in the rest of Canada? Of the total number of lighthouses, roughly what percentage are staffed lighthouses?

Senator Carney: There are 36 lightstations on the West Coast and there are more on the East Coast. I do not know what percentage of those have been, or are, staffed.

Senator Frith: Are those 36 staffed?

Senator Carney: No, not all of them are staffed. Some 194 have been successfully de-staffed. However, they are in areas where it is possible to replace people with automation.

Senator Frith: You would include in the study the possibility of re-staffing some of the de-staffed places?

Senator Carney: I will not preclude anything, and I will certainly not anticipate the results of the studies. I am concerned about further moves to de-staff lights on a coast which you will recall was the last one settled, where many people died before Ottawa would ever part with the dollars necessary to put up the lightstations.

I cannot think of a single light existing on the West Coast which can be successfully de-staffed. Any light which I identified as one which could be de-staffed has promptly thereafter proved its worth by virtue of the staff pulling people from kayaks, people from wind surfers, people from recreational boats and fishermen out of the water and saving them from certain death.

Senator Frith: That is the reason I asked. You want this matter referred to a committee which would be authorized to examine the mandate of the "staffed" lightstations. I want to be sure that you feel the committee should look at not only the possibility of stopping any further de-staffing but perhaps also re-staffing of some. The implication is different.

Senator Carney: The reference deals with staffed lightstations. What the committee wishes to do in that context is, of course, the role of the committee.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I want to be sure that it was not limited by the terms of the reference, as you have said.

Senator Carney: Honourable senator, you will know that committees interpret motions as they feel best serves their interests and best serves their terms of reference. I will not tie the hands of the committee by narrowing their mandate. I have examined the issue of staffing.

Senator Frith: I wanted to be sure that we were not tying the hands of the committee by failing to have broad enough wording. I was trying to be helpful.

Senator Carney: Thank you, senator. You are always helpful.

Senator Frith: Thank you. Let the record so show.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have a great affection for the people who staff lighthouses. My life has depended on them. I am in sympathy with the sentiments expressed by Senator Carney and I wish to adjourn this debate.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Day Hays, pursuant to notice of February 24, 1994, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters and estimates as are referred to it.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONTINUE SPECIAL STUDY ON REPORT OF NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT REVIEW COMMISSION

Hon. Donald H. Oliver, pursuant to notice of March 16, 1994 moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to continue its special study on the report of the National Transportation Act Review Commission, entitled Competition in Transportation, Policy and Legislation in Review, tabled in the Senate on March 23, 1993 (Sessional Paper No. 323-912), and other matters relating to transportation; and

That the papers and evidence taken on the subject and the work accomplished during the Third Session of the Thirty-fourth parliament be referred to the committee; and

That the committee present its report no later than October 31, 1994.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reservation with respect to this motion. I want honourable senators to reflect on it for a moment.

I have no problem at all with the first part of the request. However, my problem involves the last line which states, "and other matters relating to transportation." This is an absolutely open-ended mandate. Transportation in Canada is such a major question that I have grave reservations with respect to this item.

The initial intent of the Senate in making a reference to a committee is that we refer specific issues to a committee. If a committee wishes to have further mandate, then they come back and ask for that mandate. Open-ended mandates such as this one are, therefore, not acceptable.

Would Senator Oliver consider removing those words, "and other matters relating to transportation"?

Senator Oliver: Honourable senators, this is the language that was used in the order of reference last year, in the last session. The particular study in question deals not just with trucking but with air and with rail and with all other forms of transportation. It was hoped that by adding the language "and other matters relating to transportation," the mandate would, in fact, be broad enough to cover all the various matters which were covered in the competition in transportation review.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Would be it helpful to change it to "other matters relating thereto"?

Senator Molgat: That refers specifically to the issue. I understand Senator Oliver to be saying that we did it this way last year and we did it for other committees. However, we have landed ourselves in trouble by doing things in that way, and we should change the procedure.

I would be agreeable to the wording: "other matters relating thereto."

Senator Oliver: That is quite acceptable.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, March 21, 1994, at 8:00 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE SENATE

STATEMENTS OF PRESS CONCERNING CERTAIN SENATORS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I want to take this opportunity to deplore the inaccuracy of the terms used by Mr. Michel Vastel in his report, published on Friday, March 18, of a conversation he had with Senator Jean-Claude Rivest.

According to Mr. Vastel, Senator Rivest said that we ostracized him. To ostracize means to pass legislation banishing someone beyond the borders. This was a practice in Athens between 487 B.C. and 417 B.C. People voted to banish popular leaders who were suspected of wanting to become dictators. Well, we never suspected the Honourable Jean-Claude Rivest of wanting to become a dictator. I would even say we never suspected him of being popular. Come now, Mr. Vastel, who would ever suspect a senator of being popular?

We are asked to believe that because of this non-existent ostracism, Senator Jean-Claude Rivest would stop being a federalist and become — listen to this — a separatist. Senator Rivest is far too sensible to change his political orientation because he might have been ostracized in Ancient Greece.

And who are these villains who ostracized Senator Rivest? None other than the "mignons de Trudeau," Senators De Bané, Hébert and myself, as Senator Rivest told Mr. Vastel. Is the word "mignon" used as it was before 1530, as in "les mignons du roi Charles VII," or "les mignons du roi Henri III," in other words, Their Majesties' paramours? Anyone who knows Senator Rivest as we do knows he is incapable of such a gross remark.

We must therefore conclude that he thinks we are simply "mignons," Senators De Bané, Hébert and I, like our nephews and nieces or grandchildren who think we are sweet, when they say "mon grand-papa Jacques est mignon," or "mon tonton Philippe est mignon."

Mr. Vastel says that we think Senator Rivest is "disturbing" because he does not always agree with us. Now democracy is a way to institutionalize and channel disagreement, which is the very essence of democracy. Unanimity is not only insipid but also typical of political movements with fundamentalist leanings.

Besides, how could someone who thinks we are sweet be disturbing? Pierre, Jacques and I do not think our colleague Jean-Claude is disturbing. We think he is too sweet for words.

UNITED NATIONS

INTERNATIONAL DAY FOR THE ELIMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Hon. Nöel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, it is appropriate that we in this chamber not allow March 21 to go unmarked in Parliament, that being the day on which the United Nations and the world community turn their attention to combatting racism in all its forms. Today has been declared the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.

As honourable senators will recall, this day was chosen because it was on March 21 that the unfortunate disaster occurred in Sharpeville, South Africa. Undoubtedly, it is with a degree of hope and optimism that we watch events unfolding in South Africa. I am sure all Canadians share in the aspirations for freedom and the full enjoyment of human rights in that part of the world community.

As Canadians, we are also aware that racism, wherever it rears its ugly head, must be fought. As many of us have had occasion to say in debate on the Speech from the Throne, we are delighted that the government has decided to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation. We know that the work of that institution will be for the betterment of race relations in this country.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to join with Senator Kinsella and others in this house in commemorating this special United Nations day. All of us are very conscious that there are signs of hope in South Africa, as Senator Kinsella noted, and in other parts of the world where advances are being made. But on the other side of the coin, we still grieve because of the situation that is taking place in the former Yugoslavia, where race relations is very much at issue, and there are not enough signs of hope yet along the way.

Here in Canada, as we look outward to the world, we must also look inward at ourselves. A day like this special United Nations day reminds us that we have lessons to learn, and we have many miles to go on this issue as well.

I am sure the work that we do in this country through the Race Relations Foundation, as it will develop, will have that balanced approach and that double edge to it.

GLOBE '94—ENVIRONMENTAL EXPOSITION, VANCOUVER

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like the Senate to note that tomorrow will be the opening day of Globe '94 in Vancouver. Globe '94 is Canada's largest effort to participate in the world of environmental policy and environmental technology. In excess of 1,000 exhibitors will be present and more than 5,000 visits are expected to this environmental exposition in Vancouver for the balance of the week.

This morning the Honourable Maurice Strong opened a public session of the North American Institute on the subject of Rio, post-Rio, and the obligations of the developing world and the developed world to control the massive onslaught of environmental degradation, which is growing so rapidly as a result of the demand for resources not only in the developed world but also in the developing world.

At lunch today, the Honourable John Fraser made his first public speech since his appointment as Ambassador to the Environment. His speech dealt with the role of Canada in bringing about a better consensus in the definition of sustainable development and the responsibilities of all of us to deal with sustainable development.

Honourable senators, these are issues of the real world. They are no longer issues of theory or of academic interest. Today the forest industry of British Columbia is subject to massive assaults by way of representations from a group called Greenpeace International, based in Europe. That group, not well informed but highly organized, has put consumer pressure on Kimberly-Clark and Scott Paper of Britain, and other companies, to withdraw their purchases from British Columbia pulp and paper manufacturers. MacMillan Bloedel took out a full-page newspaper advertisement on Saturday and Sunday attacking Greenpeace International for bad science and poor advocacy.

Today in British Columbia, 15,000 to 20,000 forest workers in a 15-kilometre line of logging trucks and other vehicles are amassing on the lawn of the legislature in Victoria, protesting an agreement with respect to the allocation of forest resources in the so-called Clayoquot area of Vancouver Island. This agreement amongst all of the interests of that community, brokered by an independent facilitator appointed by the provincial government, is now being attacked by forest industry people, mayors and heads of municipalities, as an assault on their jobs and on their economic security.

The issues are becoming massively difficult in British Columbia. I believe that British Columbia is a cockpit for this type of action, and we will see more of it unless we address these issues more aggressively.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE BUDGET

INTERNATIONAL SPACE STATION PROGRAM—STATUS OF CANADA'S COMMITMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on February 24 I asked a number of questions of the Leader of the Government. I asked her to confirm or deny that there had been a budget leak to the main Canadian contractor of the international space program and to the President of the United States. Senator Carney then asked, as a supplementary question:

> How did the President of the United States know what was in the Canadian budget, and when did he know it?

The delayed answer tabled by the Deputy Leader of the Government on March 17 does not even attempt to answer Senator Carney's question. In fact, it ignores it completely. The government is obviously hoping that this matter will go away by what I can only call "stonewalling." However, it is seriously mistaken in its expectations.

Let me repeat the question so the minister and her colleagues are clear on what we are asking: How did the President of the United States know what was in the Canadian budget, and when did he know it?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as we have tried to indicate, there have been ongoing discussions and negotiations with the Americans on what the Canadian position would be on the space station long before the time of the budget.

I appreciate the honourable senator's comment that he did not get the direct answer he desired. I can pursue the matter if he wishes. I think the response was that the wording was changed in the budget to avoid any kind of misunderstanding about the government's objectives with the program. However, I will take it back, and I am prepared to explore the matter further.

As I told Senator Carney at the time, I obviously am not — nor should I be — privy to the exact discussions that take place between presidents and prime ministers. However, in this case the intention of the government to reduce its involvement in that program was well known in advance.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: To help the minister find the information we are seeking, allow me to quote from two news reports of many which the government obviously wishes us to ignore.

On March 3, the Montreal Gazette said:

> A Canadian official leaked news of Canada's plan to withdraw from the space-station program to NASA several days before it was to be announced in the federal budget, sources say...
> "There was a leak to our partners in the space station," a senior federal official confirmed.

I agree that there are no names mentioned, but there has also been no denial.

I would also quote from Maclean's magazine of March 14, which is more pertinent to the question Senator Carney asked and which I repeated tonight:

> A senior federal official confirmed that a public servant had leaked news of Canada's plan to withdraw from the space station program to the U.S. space agency NASA several days before it was to be announced in the February 22 federal budget.

This has absolutely nothing to do with any ongoing discussions with U.S. government officials over a long period of time.

The article finishes by saying:

> Canada decided to stay with the space program after President Bill Clinton urged Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to reconsider in two separate phone calls in the week leading up to the budget.

The question is very pertinent: How did President Clinton find out about confidential items in the budget before Canadians did, and when? It is very straightforward. Has all of this just been made up by irresponsible newspaper people? It has to be one or the other, or somewhere in the middle.

The government is stonewalling by saying, "Oh, well, we made a mistake in printing the budget. We didn't mean to say a complete withdrawal; we just meant a phased withdrawal." That does not wash. There were obviously leaks to the main contractor; the President of the United States intervened, and the budget of Canada, of this government, was changed as a result. This is completely improper, to say the least.

Senator Fairbairn: I listened with interest to the honourable senator quoting from the media, with mention of nameless officials and unconfirmed sources.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Deny it, then.

Senator Fairbairn: I will simply repeat that I will go back and see what else I can find out. However, I have confidence in the response that I have received to date indicating that this process was well in progress before the budget.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Only the Americans knew.

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE OF ST-JEAN—REVERSAL OF DECISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a question, with a very brief preamble.

The last general election was described by Liberal supporters, and by the media in general, as an election of hope. The Red Book was also called the Red Book of Hope. The day after tabling his budget, Mr. Martin told us that his first budget was a budget of hope.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate pertains to the issue of the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean. I would like to know if we on this side, and Canadians in general, can have a glimmer of hope, the hope to see a Liberal member of Parliament and a Liberal senator speak out for the military college in St-Jean, particularly with regard to its mission as a military training facility.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure us, knowing her colleagues from this place and the other place as well as she does, that we will have at least one Liberal senator or one Liberal member of Parliament on our side to help us fight her government on this issue?

• (2020)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Simard, I thank you for the preamble. Although this country is facing incredibly difficult times, I have every confidence that the intent and the efforts of my colleagues the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Human Resources Development and others, will bring hope to the many Canadians who have spoken to us since the election and since the budget; hope that their lives will be strengthened by the measures this government will bring forward in the months ahead.

On the question of the military college, while it is true that there has been tremendous support by Liberals, both in the House of Commons and in the Senate, for the outstanding history and effort of this young college, the circumstances in which we find ourselves in this country have forced the government, with considerable pain, to make the kinds of cut-backs that have resulted in the consolidation of the three military colleges.

As I mentioned the other day, the Prime Minister has been in consultation with the Premier of Quebec, and I will seek further information on that tomorrow. The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs has been in consultation with the Minister of Education of the Quebec government; they are trying to come to some arrangement that will assist the area, in respect of the use of that college. Beyond that, I honestly cannot say more.

I will try to get an update on those discussions. I have repeated many times the degree to which people on this side of the house sympathize with Quebec, and grieve over the results of the cuts that have led to this consolidation. However, I cannot say tonight what Senator Simard would like me to say.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I have a very short question which I think would qualify as a supplemental, since I did not get an answer to my first question.

I asked whether or not there were at least one Liberal senator and one Liberal member of Parliament who could, publicly or otherwise, indicate that they were prepared to fight against the closure of the military college in St-Jean and for the retention of its military mission. The Leader of the Government in the Senate told us how much Liberal senators and members sympathize, and that they were aware of the outstanding history of the military college, but she did not answer my question.

I therefore conclude, if I may put it like that, that the people of Canada will not forget that not one single Liberal, whether senator or member of Parliament, could be found on Parliament Hill today and for the past three weeks to take on this fight. Having pledged total, unconditional obedience to the Liberal Party and its leader, all of them prefer to approve and support the Chrétien government's obstinate decision to close the college, although, as it will turn out, the government will save next to nothing, while we will lose this military training institution for francophones set in a francophone environment like Quebec.

[English]

• (2030)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would not presume to speak on behalf of all Liberal senators or all Liberal members of Parliament on any issue, including this one. I cannot answer Senator Simard's question today in the way he wishes me to do.

Members of the House of Commons and of the Senate are all very anxious to participate with the Government of Quebec in its efforts and desires to find alternate uses for the college, including, if it so chooses, the continuation of the college in the field of higher learning. There is no question, honourable senators, that we stand ready to assist the Government of Quebec in this way.

CANADA-CHINA RELATIONS

REPRESENTATIONS ON HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning a statement that the Prime Minister made in Moncton last week. He said that on his forthcoming visit to China, he would not be making representation to that government on their human rights abuses.

My question is two-fold: Does this statement indicate a new policy orientation regarding human rights to the effect that the Government of Canada will not make representations to foreign governments with respect to human rights abuses? If that is the case, could the honourable senator give justification for that policy?

Second, if this statement is not a new policy of general application but rather a position to be applied selectively, what criteria will determine Canada's position in particular instances?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a very important question. Rather than answer without precise information, I should like to seek out the context in which the Prime Minister made his remarks and report back.

Senator Ottenheimer: I appreciate the position of the Honourable Government House Leader. Perhaps by way of background, or data that the honourable minister would be seeking, I might state that there is at least a suspicion that Canada's economic self-interest could be construed or interpreted as being the main criterion. Certain individuals feel this is contrary to Canada's general and traditional position with respect to human rights. I just add that as part of the res gestae of the matter.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senator, I will pursue the context and the precise wording of the Prime Minister's remarks and report back to you.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

FUTURE OF AGENCY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, I wish to direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Since the board of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has not met since last September, except for a brief two hours in December, and since a review of the board's role, mandate and operating practices is now taking place, would the minister please tell us if ACOA is to suffer the same fate as FedNor, which was dissolved two weeks ago?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly seek reinforcement from my colleagues for the statement I am about to make: The future of ACOA is assured, as is the future of the Western Diversification Program on the other side of Canada.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is why you cut back.

THE BUDGET

CLOSURE AND FUTURE USE OF DOWNSVIEW MILITARY BASE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and has to do with the strategic planning for the future use of the Canadian Forces Base Downsview, which is in my Metropolitan Toronto riding.

Downsview occupies about 1,000 acres of the most valuable real estate in this country. It is not only those who live close to its boundaries who are curious to know what will happen when the last air force plane leaves for far and away.

When the budget bells tolled for Downsview, there were reassuring words for those of us who asked, "What next?" Much currency was given to a press release that suggested the North York site would accommodate a recreational area twice the size of High Park, the largest of all Toronto's many parks. Later, North York officials were advised by Treasury Board President, Arthur Eggleton, that only an 80-acre parcel was earmarked for a park.

Can the Leader of the Government give us more details on what is intended, including housing sites, commercial and industrial uses? Who will regulate or free up disposal of the land? Will attention be paid to the suggestion of Colin Vaughan of City TV that the airport be turned into an airport for short-haul services?

Finally, what steps will be taken to make certain that this splendid site will not be squandered as Harbourfront on Lake Ontario was squandered by Toronto developers who baited their traps with highrise cheese?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Doyle for the question, which will allow me to be very specific when I approach my colleagues Mr. Eggleton and Mr. Collenette in the hope of obtaining an answer that will satisfy his concerns.

NATIONAL FINANCE

DOWNGRADING OF GOVERNMENT'S CREDIT RATING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is very succinct. I understand the federal government's credit rating has been downgraded. This flies in the face of the hope discussed in Mr. Martin's budget.

My question is this: Is there a definitive strategy to deal with this important issue at this time? Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform honourable senators what the strategy is for dealing with the recent downgrade?

• (2040)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must confess that I am not aware of the credit rating statement just read. I will inform myself and endeavour to have something to share with you tomorrow.

Senator St. Germain: When in opposition, the Liberal Party always advocated lowering the value of the dollar and allowing it to float, possibly to have it end up in a free fall, although I am sure they were not advocating that. Could the honourable leader elaborate on whether the present government might simply allow the dollar to drop without raising interest rates? Could she possibly elaborate on the position of the government on this particular issue, in view of the fact that the Liberals were so adamant that we had held rates high in order to maintain the value of the dollar?

Senator Fairbairn: I think it would be prudent of me to rely on my colleague Mr. Martin, the Minister of Finance, to deal with that kind of question. I will seek his advice.

AGRICULTURE

TORONTO—STATUS OF TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators will know that today an important trade meeting was held in Toronto relating to agriculture, especially to marketing boards and to grain exports into the United States.

Has the Leader of the Government in the Senate anything to report on the outcome of that meeting? Farmers are anxious about the important decision that will be taken by the United States. If the leader has anything to report on this today, I would be pleased to hear it.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish I had. As you know, the meeting began this morning, and I am not sure when, or even if, it ended. The honourable senator will know better than most the extraordinary difficulty that has existed in these talks as they have continued since the GATT agreement of last December. I can assure him that the Minister of Agriculture has been extremely aggressive throughout these discussions, and I will be glad to pass on tomorrow what I can learn about the talks that took place in Toronto today.

ANSWERS TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS TABLED

VETERANS AFFAIRS CANADA—BREAKDOWN OF DEPLOYMENT OF STAFF

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 9 on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

NEWFOUNDLAND—EFFECTS OF FEDERAL INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 14 on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS—1993 CANADIAN FISH EXPORTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 20 on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, events in the other place have not gone quite as expected; as is frequently the case, certain legislation that was to come to us has not arrived.

The agenda for the rest of the week also seems rather murky at this point. It is still my hope that we will finish our work this week. That may mean that we will have to sit on Saturday, but I think that would be preferable to bringing the Senate back next week.

I will keep you informed as best I can as the week proceeds. It may be, depending on what happens in the other place, that we will have to come back on April 12 rather than April 19. As soon as I have information, I will inform you.

POINT OF ORDER

CONTRAVENTION OF RULE 26

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to raise a point of order. I believe this is the first point at which one can do so after Question Period.

We witnessed again tonight an unusual transformation of the Question Period into a debate period. We had two outstanding violations of the very rule Senator Lynch-Staunton and others constantly accused me of breaking. They said that preambles should be short, yet Senator Lynch-Staunton's preamble today was longer than five minutes. I never got that far in my entire parliamentary career. Then it was Senator Doyle's turn, and I saw at least two full pages of notes from here. There could have been more.

I raise this point of order because, although I like to hear about these things, there is a limit, and they went entirely beyond it tonight. Perhaps the problem is that Senator Kelly has not been around to keep them in order, as he used to do for me, but tonight they went entirely too far.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, on the point of order, I would just quote for His Honour's guidance a line from Beauchesne, and it may well be in scripture too: "Let not the kettle call the pot black."

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Along the same lines, honourable senators, I do not mind being admonished by Senator Olson regarding the length of my preambles. He is quite right. But at least I ask my questions.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, on the point of order, doubtless my predecessor in the roll of whip was from a different school, and on the other side of the house, but this speaks to the question of what constitutes a preamble. There is a distinction between giving a preamble and setting the context of a question. A preamble gives guidance on the intent of the legislation which the preamble generally precedes. However, the alleged preambles that I heard this evening — and perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would agree — did not meet the test of a preamble, for they did not necessarily shed any great light on the substance of the questions that followed.

Senator Frith: And neither a kettle nor a pot knows the difference.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

That whereas section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies;

Now therefore the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by His Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE
AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

1. The Schedule to the Prince Edward Island Terms of Union is amended by adding thereto, after the portion that reads

"And such other charges as may be incident to, and connected with, the services which by the 'British North America Act, 1867' appertain to the General Government, and as are or may be allowed to the other Provinces;"

the following:

"That a fixed crossing joining the Island to the mainland may be substituted for the steam service referred to in this Schedule;

That, for greater certainty, nothing in this Schedule prevents the imposition of tolls for the use of such a fixed crossing between the Island and the mainland, or the private operation of such a crossing."

Citation

2. This Amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1993 (Prince Edward Island).

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would advise the Senate that if Senator Fairbairn speaks now, her speech will end the debate on this issue.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, in concluding the debate on this important issue, I want first to thank senators opposite for their contributions and to thank Senator Macquarrie in particular for his eloquent speech. I spoke to him and indicated that I would not be able to listen to it, but I was told, even before I left the building, that it was a smash hit and much appreciated.

• (2050)

During the course of this debate, important questions were raised by Senator Stewart, Senator Macquarrie, and also Senator Prud'homme. Tonight, I should like to attempt to answer some of those questions, or provide information that I have been given as a result of the questions which were asked in this house.

One of the points emphasized by both Senator Stewart and Senator Macquarrie was a question on the design of the proposed bridge and whether or not it had been changed, or whether or not the government had agreed to a change in the design. The answer to that question is no, it has not been changed. The government has not agreed to a change in the design.

However, I believe I indicated earlier to Senator Macquarrie that there is a provision in the contract with the builder, Strait Crossing Development Inc., which gives them the opportunity to propose alterations. In this case, the builder has requested a clarification of the requirement for a 49-metre clearance across the navigational channel, which is 250 metres wide.

I stated previously, and will repeat, that under the terms of the agreement signed with the Department of Public Works, the bridge must provide clearance of at least 49 metres across that 250-metre navigational channel which is located under what will eventually be the middle of the bridge. I am also advised by the department that the builder's design actually exceeded the clearance height requirements which had been established by the department. Now the builder is seeking clarification as to whether that clearance must be the full 49 metres right across the entire span of that channel, or whether the bridge could be arched slightly on either side of the span to a middle height of 49 metres.

Senator Macquarrie mentioned that process first of all as a question for clarification, which is all there is right now. However, should the process move beyond that, and there is no indication to me that it has, the process will include the review of any formal application by the Minister of Transport under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Any such formal request would have to be considered under the applicable environmental guidelines and contractual obligations.

When Bill C-110 was passed in the last Parliament providing for the financing of the bridge, it gave the Minister of Public Works the authority to enter into the necessary construction agreements. Those issues are covered in the agreement entered into with the builder, and again that is where the 49-metre clearance obligation appears. Once again, no change in design has been approved by the government, and should the process go beyond that, then there is the review process that must be undertaken.

With regard to the letter written by the builder, which was mentioned by Senator Macquarrie, that letter contains third-party information and it cannot be released without the agreement of the writer. We have been in touch with the officials of the department several times and they are speaking to the developer to see if it is possible to release that letter. If that release is agreed to, I will certainly ensure that Senator Stewart and Senator Macquarrie receive a copy.

The second area of questioning of very particular interest to Senator Stewart was on the issue of the continuing obligation of Canada to maintain the present linkage between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. This question was also followed up by Senator Prud'homme in his contribution to the debate on February 24.

This amendment does not change the constitutional obligation of the federal government. It obviously changes the manner in which that obligation is met. The reason the constitutional amendment was brought forward was so that the federal government would avoid a situation in which it would find itself obligated to provide for both a bridge and a ferry service. There is no backup ferry service, just as there is no backup for the existing ferry service on an on-going basis in Prince Edward Island at the present time. The ferry service is kept operating, to the best of everyone's ability.

If I recall correctly, honourable senators, on February 24 we were in the grip of an enormous blizzard here in Ottawa which added a dimension to Senator Stewart's questions. At the moment, the ferry service keeps operating to the absolute best of everyone's ability, given the conditions that exist. Honourable senators will know that bad weather and ice build-ups cause delays and sometimes cancellations of that service. With the bridge, it is strongly believed that those problems will be considerably lessened, if not eliminated altogether.

The most common reason for weather-related delays is the accumulation of ice blown into the shores of P.E.I. or New Brunswick. From the studies that have been conducted on the impact of the weather conditions on bridge traffic, we learn that the bridge would provide a more reliable means of transportation between the island and the mainland than the ferry service does today. The bridge will be maintained 24 hours a day by the developer; it will get the very highest level of attention. If the bridge were not passable because of weather conditions, senators from that area know much better than I that the highways leading to it would not be passable, either.

Senator Stewart: That is not true.

Senator Fairbairn: — would most likely not be passable. The studies that have been done in preparation for this new linkage demonstrate that it would be highly unlikely that the bridge operation would be interrupted for long periods of time. As I said before, the engineering experts have stated that the bridge is designed to sustain the ice forces of Northumberland Strait, and to last for at least 100 years without major refit.

• (2100)

In attempting to pursue the notion of what kind of backup might be available, it was pointed out to me that the ferry service between Caribou, Nova Scotia and Wood Islands, which operates approximately nine months of the year, will continue. Senators will know that this is a privately owned service which operates with the assistance of substantial federal subsidies. Its costs are separate from, and were not considered in, the building of the bridge which will replace the New Brunswick-Prince Edward Island ferry service. However, there are no plans to discontinue the subsidy, and there are no plans about which the government is aware for the company to alter its service in any way. In fact, there will continue to be an alternate ferry route during most of the year as there is at the present time.

In the proposed new development, the builder is clearly responsible for keeping the bridge open and operating. However, in the remote case — and I am told it is a remote case — where bridge traffic is unduly interrupted, I am told that by the time the bridge opens in May of 1997, Transport Canada will have in place a plan to ensure that the constitutional obligation of the federal government is fulfilled. I am further told that this plan will have to consider such parameters as the time of year that this may happen and the availability of equipment.

The measures being considered by Transport Canada during the construction phase now include: augmenting the Wood Islands-Caribou service in the summer months or adding ice-breaking ferries to keep that route operating in winter months; the use of other vessels when required, such as those called roll-on, roll-off vessels for the transport of trucks in particular; the use of alternate docking facilities; bringing in ferries from other points in Atlantic Canada, and the possible use of aircraft in certain circumstances which one does not want to contemplate. Other measures will be looked at in terms of what the government deems necessary to meet its constitutional obligation to provide a continuous link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

My comments tonight are the result of questions raised by honourable senators and transmitted by me to the departments involved. They are responses as specific as I could obtain. In reviewing the information and the enormous amount of study that has gone into this project, and I must say quite honestly that I am not an engineering expert —

Senator Stewart: That is reassuring.

Senator Fairbairn: I am sorry, Senator Stewart. I would not claim for a minute to be one.

The tremendous care and effort that has gone into the research and investigation of this massive project leads me to have confidence in its validity. As I said in February, we are not just dealing with converting from a ferry service to a bridge. I believe this bridge linkage will have enormous continuing benefits for Prince Edward Island and, indeed, for all of Atlantic Canada. The health of Atlantic Canada and Prince Edward Island corresponds to the health of the country as a whole.

I hope that honourable senators will agree to the amendment which is before us, thus allowing the construction process of this bridge to continue. I hope that my comments tonight have in some way lessened the concerns of my colleagues on both sides of the Senate.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I do not want to be so impolite as to say I have a question before the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate resumes her seat, but that is the foolish formula we have in this place.

Tonight, I heard something that surprised me greatly and pleased me immensely. I hope the honourable minister can assure me that I heard correctly that one of the options for maintenance of service, no matter what happens to the bridge, is the winterizing of the Wood Islands-Caribou ferry. If that is a plan to turn that into an ice-breaker service, then that is something entirely different. Because of my good nature, I will not vote against the measure tonight.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable senator a couple of questions? The first question is short: Will a formal request with regard to the plan or the interpretation of the plan be necessary if it is decided by the company to seek to go ahead with a flat span rather than an arched span over the navigation channel?

We have been told that the Government of Canada recognizes its constitutional obligation to provide a continuing connection, and that, accordingly, the Government of Canada proposes to develop a plan for an alternate way of performing its obligation if it should happen that the bridge is not fulfilling that obligation. I must say — and this reveals my ignorance — that I had not heard about this plan before. It is most reassuring, as Senator Macquarrie says.

When will the details of the plan be made available? I assume that it is not the intention of the government to delay this particular motion until such time as we have had the assurance that that plan would give us. Thus, I ask when the plan will be revealed to the eager public.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as has been said before, the company is seeking clarification to change the design somewhat. The first question, Senator Stewart, if I understood it correctly, is whether or not a formal request is required for that to happen. My belief is that, yes, such a request would be required to make such a change. However, I will ask that specific question and relay the information to the honourable senator.

Honourable senators, I asked repeated questions about the intent to have something in place should the untoward happen. I was given details in that respect which I have conveyed to the Senate tonight. They are among a number of measures being considered by Transport Canada in this plan which it will have in place by the time the bridge opens in May of 1997. However, I cannot say when they will reveal the blow-by-blow plan to the interested public. I cannot give you the timing.

Senator Stewart: I do not want to persist, but if the plan is available only when the bridge is opened, and if the alternate facilities require construction, we might be confronted with a period when the bridge is there, but not available for traffic; and, second, the alternate facilities have not yet been provided. If you are to provide service with these roll-on, roll-off icebreaking car ferries between Caribou and Wood Islands, it will take years to put them in place, to build the ships and the docks. They have had sorry experience building ships to fit the existing docks, as we all know. To say that the plan will be available at the time the bridge opens confronts us with ludicrous possibilities.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Stewart, the words that they gave to me were that it "would be in place."

Senator Stewart: The plan "would be in place," meaning the facilities would be in place? Your nod is not on the record.

Senator Fairbairn: I will put my nod on the record, then. That is my understanding.

Senator Stewart: That is the commitment of the government?

Senator Fairbairn: That is my understanding, yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat:

That whereas section 43 —

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Dispense!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: On division.

Motion agreed to and Constitution of Canada amended, on division.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this will be the last day for this debate. I understand that there is an honourable senator who still wishes to speak.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Yes, tomorrow.

Senator Molgat: We will then stand the order and presumably the honourable senator will speak on it tomorrow.

Order stands.

MERCHANT NAVY VETERAN AND CIVILIAN WAR-RELATED BENEFITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the second reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-Related Benefits Act.—(Honourable Senator Molgat)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when I adjourned this debate, I commented on certain problems I saw with the bill. I have received a memo from Senator Marshall indicating that he will be proposing changes to the bill.

I was prepared to speak on it this evening, but in view of his absence, and as a courtesy to him, I will stand the order until tomorrow.

Order stands.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, presented in the Senate on March 17, 1994.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report. In doing so I should like to say that, in its form and content, this report is similar to reports that have been made by this committee in the past.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON REGULATIONS PROPOSED TO THE EXPORT DEVELOPMENT ACT ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Study re: Export Development Act), tabled in the Senate on March 15, 1994.

Hon. Michael Kirby, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, moved the adoption of the report.

He said: before we vote on the motion, I should like to say a couple of words about the report because it establishes an interesting precedent for the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which I would hope we could continue to pursue in the months and years ahead.

Last May the committee, and subsequently this chamber, passed Bill C-118, to amend the Export Development Act. That act substantially broadened the powers of the Export Development Corporation, giving the corporation a mandate to support international exports for expansion of Canada's export trade. The word "support" replaced "facilitate," which is a more narrowly defined legal word.

At the time the bill was before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, it was very clear that there was a clause in the bill which said that a significant amount of the constraints which would be placed on the Export Development Corporation would be established by regulation. The regulations were not ready at the time the committee was considering the bill. Therefore, we had some difficulty deciding whether the bill was a particularly good or bad one.

At the time the Honourable Michael Wilson, then Minister of International Trade, volunteered to the committee, in a sort of precedent-setting offer, that prior to the regulations being put into force and after they had been published in the Canada Gazette, he would institute a period of delays so that the committee could hold hearings on the regulations. This would result in businesses affected by these regulations having an opportunity to appear before the committee and the committee would, in turn, have an opportunity to give the government advice on whether or not the regulations should be amended.

An election intervened, the regulations were published in the Canada Gazette and the new Minister of International Trade, the Honourable Roy MacLaren, continuing the offer that Mr. Wilson had made, said to the committee, "I will not put the regulations governing EDC into effect until such time as the committee has held hearings."

We held those hearings about three weeks ago, focusing on two specific issues. One of these issues related to the extent to which EDC would provide commercial bank financing for companies doing business in Canada; companies that might only be peripherally involved in the export business. The second issue related to the concerns of the insurance industry. They felt that EDC was substantially increasing the range of insurance products it could provide to its customers.

One reason the government was anxious to have us proceed with these hearings was the very clear and almost diametrically opposed points of view between EDC on the one hand and the banking industry on the other, and between EDC and the insurance industry, each with respect to a different set of regulations.

The committee held hearings, and we then took the unusual step of encouraging an element of dialogue between the conflicting parties before we made our ultimate recommendation to the government. Accordingly, the report which I am asking the Senate to adopt tonight contains two or three major changes to the regulations which the government had originally published in the Canada Gazette. It is my understanding that, in fact, the government will adopt the changes to the regulations which the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is proposing.

I draw this to the attention of honourable senators, not because I think you necessarily want to get involved in the nuances of what the banking and insurance industries liked or did not like, but because this is a new and important area in which the Senate can become involved.

Here we have a situation where, in a technically complex area, we did not follow the traditional method whereby the government simply proclaims a set of regulations and immediately puts them into effect without seeking an opinion from anyone. In this case, both the Conservative administration and the present Liberal administration asked the Senate Banking Committee to hold the hearings. In effect, what was said by the ministers was that they would take our point of view very seriously. They will, in fact, adopt the changes we made.

Honourable senators, speaking not only on behalf of the Liberals on this committee but also on behalf of the Conservatives there, this is an area which we hope to continue to study. There are a myriad of regulations which governments are constantly imposing upon the business sector. It is our hope that we could hold subsequent hearings when regulations are initially put forward in draft form, particularly in major regulatory areas, with a view to presenting to the government the opinions of the committee as developed on the basis of public hearings.

This could be an important role for the Senate, providing a point of view on issues upon which the government, until now, has not really focused. Previously, governments have simply proclaimed regulations with some minor consultation process but no formal public process. I would hope, honourable senators, that the business of holding hearings on major regulatory areas affecting the business community can become an element of focus for the Banking Committee in the years ahead.

Having said that, honourable senators, I reiterate that I move the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Phillips, calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 22, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Kinsella).

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I request that this order stand.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, this debate was adjourned by Senator Kinsella. Would honourable senators agree to my making a few comments at this time?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: With the appropriate preamble.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the preamble will be very short. I had no intention of getting into the debate on the budget, and I suppose I would not have done so except for the problem that Senator Murray raised when he made his speech on this same item on Wednesday, March 16. That speech is almost incomprehensible. It is impossible to read that speech and follow the convoluted reasoning which went into the construction of it.

Let me explain why. Senator Murray says some things, and I do not want to be unfair so I will quote him directly from page 208 of the Debates of the Senate, where he is speaking about the last budget in April of 1993:

> Much of this is due to slower economic growth and lower revenues, but some of it, again, is part of Mr. Martin's numbers game.

This is the first time that Senator Murray introduces that term, "numbers game," but he uses it again and again in this speech. I quote again from the same page:

> The government inflated the 1993-94 deficit in the hope that against this benchmark their subsequent efforts would appear to have been effective — indeed, heroic.

That is what Senator Murray said. He goes on, on the same page, next column:

> The government is getting a reputation for playing the numbers game.

My question is, who is giving it that reputation?

Hon. Lowell Murray: Read the quotation from The Ottawa Citizen that follows that comment.

Senator Olson: Here is the quotation that Senator Murray would like me to read:

> Paul Martin has gone from padding the deficit to padding the unemployment rate, in what appears to be a two-pronged political ploy to paint the Tories in the worst possible light and the Liberals in the best.

Is that fair? That is what was said.

I want to be sure that Senator Murray understands that I do not want to say a lot of things. However, when I began my remarks I said that there was a convolution of some kind, a convoluted reasoning.

After Senator Murray accuses the Liberal Minister of Finance of doing these things, he returns to the old argument on the next page:

> In 1987-88 we turned around an operating deficit which had been incurred every year for 12 fiscal years under our predecessors.

That was the Conservative government of the day, in case anyone does not understand what that means.

> For the next six years we achieved an operating surplus every year including 1992-93...

How did he get there? This is where we get to the "convulsions."

> ...until Mr. Martin's retroactive accounting change wiped it out with the stroke of a pen. We did this by holding down growth in program spending. It is noteworthy that during that time we never failed to achieve our annual program spending targets.

That is what Senator Murray said.

I do not know who on the Tory side invented it, but I am absolutely certain that there is no accountant who would ever invent a reasoning or an argument to leave out certain expenses — in this case, the national debt charges — and to do the accounting with all the revenue against what they call program spending. Every government that has ever been in office in Canada, or in any one of the provinces, has always included the debt service charges as part of the expense of running the government, of running the public accounts, of running the whole business of a government for a province or a country.

• (2130)

Senator Murray is trying to perpetuate the myth that somehow they created surpluses. Who was to pay the debt service charges if not you, the government of the day? I think it is fair to say that that was $32 to $38 billion every year while the Tories were in office, but they did not include it in their accounting because it did not fit in with something called "program spending."

Senator Murray: Mr. Martin makes the same distinction several times. He refers to program spending and to the interest on the debt.

Senator Olson: Part of the reason I am making this speech now is that I think the Canadian people have the right to know that there is not some fairy hovering about who will pay the debt service charges. The government will take that money out of the consolidated revenue fund, along with all the other expenses, or it will not be paid at all.

I was looking in the dictionary. I brought one with me, a rather big one with a lot of words in it. I was trying to find some appropriate words to describe this kind of convoluted reasoning. Even the dictionary is unable to describe what Senator Murray was saying.

Senator Murray is not the first to say this. I do not like to talk about senators who have left our midst, but Senator Barootes used to make that same argument over and over again. We would ask him to explain how he could make those "convulsions," and of course he had a problem with that, to say the least.

I did say I would be brief, but I do want Senator Murray to know that it was a very bad habit, this trying to deceive the people of Canada into believing that you had anything near a surplus when you actually borrowed more money in the nine years from 1984 on than all the governments in previous Canadian history. We are not talking about just a little bit of money. When you took over in 1984, the total national debt was about $160 billion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What were the interest rates?

An Hon. Senator: It was $280 billion.

Senator Olson: That is not right. It was about $165 billion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What was the rate of inflation?

Senator Olson: When you left, it was almost $500 billion. That is a 300-per-cent increase. The Tories, in nine years, borrowed twice as much money as all previous governments, including the costs incurred by Canada in two world wars.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What would it have been had you still been there?

Senator Olson: You should hang your head in shame for leaving that kind of legacy to the Canadian people. Your children and your grandchildren will be foregoing a very substantial part of their total income just to pay for that $300 billion or so that you added to the national debt in nine years.

You almost get a feeling of outrage when you look at it, and some people do. That is how bad it is.

Senator Molgat: Now they're pretending it's not true.

Senator Olson: But the figures are there.

Senator Murray got up and made that speech again. I thought perhaps that after you got out of office you would stop, but you still try to make people believe that that kind of accounting has some sort of validity. If you continue on that course, the Conservative Party will never have any credibility. The people do not buy that kind of argument. If you want my opinion, and I am sure you do, a big part of the reason you are reduced to two members in the House of Commons is that you tried to make yourselves believe that intelligent Canadians would buy that kind of reasoning.

I was almost shocked. I could not believe the Conservatives would keep on trying it again and again. I plead with members opposite to stop this, because first, you cannot get away with it and the people do not buy it; and, second, it leaves a distorted impression that is absolutely ridiculous.

On motion of Senator Berntson, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

MARINE SAFETY—COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE ROLE OF LIGHTSTATIONS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Carney, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella:
> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine the mandate of the staffed lightstations on the west coast to determine whether their role should be expanded to accommodate the increase in the number of marine users, in light of the expansion in the number of recreational users, keeping marine safety in mind, and the current restructuring of the Canadian Coast Guard; and
> That the committee presents its report no later than December 31, 1994.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I am in agreement with Senator Carney. It is a precarious existence to be at sea in a storm. The people navigating a vessel are right to be scared and to worry about automatic devices that do not always work. You might run a large oil tanker on to some rocks and have another Exxon Valdez, even though the crew may be sober.

I believe Senator Carney is right. We should ask the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to look into this matter of manned lightstations.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 22, 1994

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

CHINA-CANADA RELATIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS ISSUES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I have missed several days of this sitting and feel it only proper to account for my absence. For the fifth time, on a personal trip, I was on the other side of the world participating in the search for hope and freedom among the people of a proud and ancient culture.

Only hours after having participated in the World Parliamentarians' Convention on Tibet, attended by some 40 parliamentarians from 25 countries and dealing with Tibetan issues and the brutally repressive treatment of Tibetans by the occupying Chinese forces, I read on the front page of The Globe and Mail of Saturday, March 19, the comments of Canada's Prime Minister on the cowardly and hypocritical stance of his government on human rights issues in China.

The conference heard a litany of examples of human rights abuses and denials of freedoms in China, and particularly in Tibet; abuses well documented by the U.N., international human rights organizations, and official parliamentary fact-finding delegations from several countries.

When I first read Mr. Chrétien's comments, I felt a strong sense of shame, quickly followed by an even stronger sense of outrage. These comments from the head of government of a nation that is one of the world's most respected defenders of human rights and freedoms disgraces Canada's long and proud tradition in the defence of the self-respect and dignity of every human being in every corner of the globe. This is not the tradition of his predecessors, who left him a legacy of courage and determination as staunch defenders of the rights of those who cannot defend themselves.

Honourable senators, what kind of message is Mr. Chrétien sending the millions of oppressed and downtrodden peoples of the world in their quest for minimal and most basic rights? What kind of message is Mr. Chrétien sending to Amnesty International, Asia Watch, and others, about Canada's support for their struggles? What kind of message is Mr. Chrétien sending the Chinese dissidents inside and outside China who are putting their lives at stake on behalf of millions of their brothers and sisters who are even today being persecuted? Has Mr. Chrétien ever heard of David and Goliath? Has Mr. Chrétien ever heard of Tiananmen Square? Or is he suffering from convenient memory loss? Has he ever heard of leadership?

Honourable senators, there are ways to do business with a nation while at the same time taking tough and courageous positions on certain issues with that nation's government. But history has shown that Mr. Chrétien will dodge tough issues. Sadly, this is but another example, only a most tragic one.

Mr. Chrétien does not speak for me, and I fervently believe he does not speak for the majority of his party or the majority of Canadians. Canada has been universally recognized as one of the strongest beacons, sending the world a powerful message of hope for all those who have been denied. Canada has always been praised for its exemplary leadership on difficult issues of freedom and dignity, and prior Canadian governments have not been afraid to act unilaterally on issues of ethics and morality.

Honourable senators, I hope the Chrétien government has not extinguished that beacon of hope.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE BUDGET

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, the media continues to publish varying accounts of the annual savings to be realized through the government's planned closure of the Royal Military College at St-Jean-sur-Richelieu. Much doubt has been generated as a result, and clarification should be given to demonstrate the government's claim that the closure of this college will result in an annual saving of $23 million. Honourable senators, even if this figure is correct — and I believe it is not — the threat to national unity which this measure entails does not justify what I believe to be an ill-advised decision.

Long before the various studies on bilingualism, including the royal commission, the reasons for establishing a military college for francophone and anglophone officers in a predominantly francophone cultural milieu were well understood. Those reasons are as valid today as they were in 1952 when the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean was opened.

Many colleagues in this chamber are aware that this decision is part of the newly elected government's first budget. Mindful of that, we are prepared to work on a collaborative basis to find creative and imaginative solutions to this question. I wish to build upon the declaration of our colleague Senator Gigantès, and responses to questions by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, that imaginative and creative solutions be found. However, those solutions must be such as to enhance and enrich our federalist vision of Canada as a great, bilingual country.

MERCHANT NAVY VETERAN AND CIVILIAN WAR-RELATED BENEFITS ACT—EFFECT ON PARALLEL LEGISLATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Molgat for adjourning the debate on Order No. 1 last evening, and although I may be pre-empting him at this stage in the process, I want to bring the matter of Order No. 1 to the attention of the Senate at this time in order to simplify the process.

When Senator Molgat adjourned the second reading debate on Bill S-4, to amend the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-related Benefits Act, he explained that he wanted to find out whether the proposed bill, if enacted, would have an impact on other legislation, which is reasonable. After Senator Molgat raised this question, I looked into the matter and I have since learned that clause 3 of the bill would indeed have an effect on the War Veterans Allowance Act. Although the title of that act refers to the veterans covered by the act as "war veterans," the term "war veteran" as such does not appear in the body of the act. Instead, the single word "veteran" is used throughout the act as a defined term.

Since the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-related Benefits Act is parallel legislation to the War Veterans Allowance Act, it would, on reflection, certainly not be appropriate to have merchant navy veterans referred to as "war" veterans in the statute that applies to them when all other veterans of World War I and World War II are referred to throughout the War Veterans Allowance Act simply as "veterans." Indeed, this would be contrary to the original intent of Bill S-4, the purpose of which is, as I stated on February 23, to establish and reinforce consistency between the two acts. My intention in so doing is to reinforce recognition of the contribution made by war-time Canadian seamen.

This, I believe, would be achieved by ensuring that each act uses the same wording when referring to Canadian veterans who, in both world wars and in the Korean conflict, were directly involved in war-related operations.

Such consistency would be achieved if both the long and short title of the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-related Benefits Act were amended by inserting in them the word "war" to qualify the word "veterans" in the long title, and the word "veteran" in the short title. No further change would be necessary.

• (1410)

In order to allay Senator Molgat's concern, I believe that the solution is to remove clause 3 from the bill, and I am prepared to move a motion to that effect, either at the third reading stage of the bill or in committee, should the bill be referred to committee.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 23, 1994, at one thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the Honourable Senator Molgat? May we assume that the government business coming to us before the end of week, when we are still expected to adjourn, is so light that we can afford to have a "short" Wednesday?

Senator Berntson: Where is Harvie Andre when you need him?

Senator Molgat: I appreciate the comment of my honourable friend. The situation is that the legislation is not moving through the House of Commons as quickly as anticipated. That is why I commented last night that the proposed schedule that I had mentioned to the Senate last week might not be followed. At the moment, I do not know exactly when the anticipated legislation will come to us.

I discussed the adjournment that I am proposing now with my honourable friends opposite. If committees had not been meeting, I would have proposed carrying on with the normal schedule. However, the Banking Committee is meeting tomorrow. The Governor of the Bank of Canada is to appear. It seemed to me, after discussion, that it would be better to proceed with that tomorrow rather than with a longer sitting of the Senate.

As soon as I have a better idea of what the House of Commons may send to us, I will advise my honourable friends.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I hope we are not getting into a situation where the tail is wagging the dog — in other words, that the Deputy Leader of the Government is saying that, because committees have already scheduled meetings for Wednesday afternoon, we must adjust our schedule to theirs. I think it would be more appropriate for committees to ensure that the Senate need not sit for a full day on Wednesday before scheduling their meetings.

Senator Molgat: I understand my honourable friend perfectly, having made the same speech on numerous occasions from the side of the house on which he now sits. Obviously, the Senate must determine its own schedule, which is what we shall do.

However, the facts at the moment are such that I cannot guarantee what legislation we will have tomorrow. I believe it is an Order of the House that two financial bills will pass this evening. They could be given first reading tomorrow. With agreement, we could then move them forward and deal with them quickly. We will have to wait to see.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, regarding the matter of scheduling the business of the Senate, I would like the deputy leader not to take for granted the unanimous consent necessary in this chamber to speed up certain procedures so that we may accomplish the task at hand. Unanimous consent may not be granted.

I, for one, will review each case individually. It will be my way to put pressure on the Chrétien government so that it speeds up the review of the issue of the Collège militaire de St-Jean. The Leader of the Government should take this notice into account even if I arouse the ire of some honourable senators on both sides of the chamber by encouraging the Senate to sit a few days longer. The government's reaction on this issue could probably change the way I proceed. You will have understood, honourable senators, that on this side of the chamber one must fight with the arms at one's disposal.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): I can assure Senator Simard that I never take anything for granted, no matter what the circumstances. Of course, senators are always free to agree or disagree with the government, and I respect their right to do so.

On the other hand, I will try to keep the Senate up to date regarding what I know and what we can expect, and it will be up to the honourable senators to decide.

Like Senator Simard, I spent several years in a provincial legislative assembly, and I know from experience that you can never take anything for granted.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday next, March 23, 1994, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and estimates as are referred to it.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION OF LUTHERAN CONGREGATIONS—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition from Garth Wagner of the city of Calgary in the province of Alberta and others, praying for the passage of an Act to Incorporate the Canadian Association of Lutheran Congregations.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN VIETNAM VETERANS' MEMORIAL—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table petitions with 580 names, showing the support of the people of Canada for the Canadian Vietnam veterans' national memorial.

Honourable senators, without going into the whole petition, perhaps I will read paragraph 3, which will explain the purpose of the petition:

> WHEREAS this memorial will be a fitting tribute to those courageous Canadian men and women who sacrificed their lives serving as members of the United States Armed Forces in Southeast Asia. The pain that is felt at the loss of lives in war may be eased by the knowledge that the deeds of those taken from us are not to be forgotten. For the devotion exhibited while in military service, each person whose name appears on the memorial deserves nothing less than our respect and admiration.
> WHEREFORE the undersigned, your Petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to provide a suitable site in the Nation's Capital.

QUESTION PERIOD

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

APPOINTMENT AND COMPETENCE OF CHAIRMAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do have a preamble to my question, but I am sure even Senator Olson would allow it since it is from his party's Red Book.

> ...the Conservatives made a practice of choosing political friends when making the thousands of appointments to boards, commissions, and agencies that the cabinet is required by law to carry out.... To fill the vacancies that remain, a Liberal government will review the appointment process to ensure that necessary appointments are made on the basis of competence.

That is from the Red Book which is still available, strangely enough, despite all its contradictions of reality.

I would ask whether the Leader of the Government can confirm that the appointment of Robert Nixon, a former leader of the Liberal Party of Ontario, former Treasurer of Ontario in its last Liberal government, longtime prominent, active and faithful supporter of the Liberal Party of Canada, as chairman of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited meets the criteria set out in the Red Book; namely that Mr. Nixon is not a political friend and that the appointment is based on competence.

In other words, does Mr. Nixon have the technical and professional background to be responsible for AECL, the second largest investor in Canadian research and development in corporate Canada, the designer and marketer of the world's best nuclear reactor, the producer of more than 75 per cent of the world's molybdenum-99, the designer and constructor of the world's largest and best commercial accelerators, and the employer of 4,300 Canadians, of whom 3,000 are directly involved in research and development?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the answer is yes. Mr. Nixon's competence is beyond question. Mr. Nixon's appointment is one of those which will do credit to the Government of Canada, the people of Ontario, and the people of Canada.

This is an important appointment. Mr. Nixon is an extremely qualified, experienced public servant, and his appointment will do this country a lot of good.

Senator Gigantès: And he is honest.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, it may be that we are speaking of two different Robert Nixons. I would ask the Leader of the Government if she can confirm that this Robert Nixon, this distinguished, apolitical Canadian citizen of whom she speaks, is the same Robert Nixon who, on direct instructions from the Prime Minister, prepared a report to support foregone Liberal Party conclusions on what is known as the Pearson International Airport agreement? Is the new chairman of AECL not, perhaps, the same Robert Nixon who, without giving a single name, by innuendo and unsubstantiated allegations soiled the reputations of many individuals involved in the agreement?

And if both Robert Nixons are one and the same, what other conclusion does the leader suggest we come to, except that the closer the political friendship with the Liberal government, the greater the competency to do its will?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, there is one Robert Nixon who is a very dedicated —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Liberal.

Senator Fairbairn: — public servant, a dedicated Canadian with great experience in the public sector.

Mr. Nixon performed a service to Canadians in his study on the Pearson International Airport. He was not instructed to come to conclusions. Because of his experience and his fairmindedness, he was given the assignment to review what clearly was felt to be a questionable arrangement.

I am surprised that the Leader of the Opposition would raise this matter, because that particular agreement on the Pearson International Airport, made in mid-campaign, was a rather sorry incident, and one that required a very close review by the government. Mr. Nixon did an extremely good job —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: A hatchet job!

Senator Fairbairn: — of reviewing that particular transaction. He came to a conclusion which is, I believe, supported by a vast majority of Canadians.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Of Liberals.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSION

SUSPENSION OF OPERATION UNDER PROPOSED LEGISLATION— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, this question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Honourable senators, under Bill C-18, the government will suspend the work of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for a period of two years. Knowing that 50 per cent of the $7.8-million budget has already been spent by the commission and that the existing electoral boundaries are based on the 1981 census and do not represent the current population trends in Canada, why is the government not proceeding with the redrawing of the electoral boundaries which would better ensure the appropriate representation of Canadians in the Parliament of Canada?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a bill which is now before the House of Commons. I believe it would suspend the operation of this review for 18 months, not two years.

At any rate, the honourable senator alluded to the findings of the Lortie commission. That, too, was conducted at an enormous public cost of, I believe, over $20 million. That commission made very important recommendations that have never been subjected to a proper study by Parliament into the whole question of representation in the House of Commons.

It is the government's view that the commission's work should be put aside for a period of time to enable a Parliamentary committee to conduct a study and to look into the suggestions of the Lortie commission. That is why Bill C-18 is currently before the House.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. First let me point out to the Honourable Leader of the Government that I did not make mention of the Lortie commission. Second, my understanding is that the term involved is two years, but I stand to be corrected.

Here is my basic question: If we do not act upon the findings of this commission now, and we postpone it for 18 months to 2 years, provinces such as British Columbia, my home province, will not have the benefit of redistribution before the next federal election, as I understand it. As a consequence, British Columbia, a province that has already been penalized by the Liberal government, will be further penalized. There is already a list of things that have taken place since you took office.

• (1440)

As a British Columbian, I feel that it is very important that we experience the benefit of proper representation in the House of Commons. I would urge the Leader of the Government in the Senate to make representations, and I would ask her if she is prepared to do so on our behalf, with respect to deliberations that I am sure will be taking place in cabinet.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will be pleased to convey to my colleagues Senator St. Germain's views on this issue. There is certainly no intent on the part of the government to penalize any province in Canada.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

FUTURE OF AGENCY—OBJECTIVES AND SCOPE OF GOVERNMENT REVIEW

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government. Since the honourable senator informed this chamber last night that the future of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and of the Western Diversification Program is assured, and because of the importance of ACOA to the Atlantic region, will the honourable senator state in specific terms the objectives and the scope of her government's review of ACOA?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Thank you for the question, Senator Cohen. Perhaps you will understand if I say to you that I should like to take your question as notice and provide a detailed answer to it.

NATIONAL FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA RATE—EFFECT ON INTEREST RATES

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I want to ask this question only because Senator Olson is too shy to do so.

Is the Leader of the Government in a position to confirm a rather disturbing report I heard on the way in here today to the effect that the bank rate was set at more than half a percentage point higher at noon today?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret to say I am not able to confirm that, but I will ask immediately.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, at the rate they are going, it will not be long before we will be back to the historic Liberal highs of 18- to 20-per-cent interest rates. That is just a comment.

When the minister is enquiring into this matter, will she undertake also to get a statement from the bank or from the Minister of Finance as to the factors that are in play here? As it happens, there was a widespread expectation of an increase in the United States interest rates today, but that did not materialize. The governors of the "Fed," as it is called, apparently decided to leave interest rates at approximately their present level.

That being the case, I wonder what the Minister of Finance and/or the central bank have to say about the factors that are at play in today's increase in the Canadian bank rate.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would be glad to seek the views of my colleague the Minister of Finance. I think all of us in this house know that there has been general uncertainty within financial markets in recent days, so I would feel indefinitely more comfortable if I spoke to the Minister of Finance and obtained a response from him.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Add more consultation. Form a task force.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

EVALUATION OF OPERATIONS OF CORPORATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Ottawa Citizen today carries comments made by CRTC Chairman Keith Spicer that Canadians will not be content forever with today's CBC programming, however excellent it is. He also recommended that changing technologies and further cuts to the CBC subsidy require a complete evaluation of everything about the network.

Would the Leader of the Government ask her colleague in cabinet responsible for the CBC whether they are taking that comment to heart, and would they be considering an examination or evaluation of the entire operation of the CBC?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I would be pleased to make that enquiry from the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

That the committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting of any or all of its proceedings;

That the ccommittee present its final report no later than October 31, 1994; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons —

An Hon. Senator: Dispense!

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, before proceeding with the motion, pursuant to rule 31, I would ask leave to modify the motion by adding immediately after the fourth paragraph thereof the following:

That, notwithstanding rule 86(1)(b), the members to act on behalf of the Senate on the committee be the Honourable Senators Andreychuk, Bolduc, Carney, Gigantès, Kelleher, MacEachen and Perrault.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed to modify the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, once again I am pleased to speak to a motion for the creation of a joint committee, this time for the study of foreign policy for Canada. I think many senators will agree that it is appropriate to undertake a special review of our foreign policy in light of the many changes that have taken place in the world in recent years.

As has been noted here and in other places, the end of the cold war has opened up new areas of opportunity, but it has also exposed us and other nations to great risks. There are new levels of complexity in our relationships with other countries. The simple fact that our former adversary, the Soviet Union, now consists of several independent and very different countries is only the most obvious manifestation of that change.

While issues surrounding those countries in particular have been in our minds most recently, there have also been other changes in the international arena which make this review both timely and necessary. Not the least of those changes is the enormous growth in our interdependence as nations.

As a middle power with limited economic and military influence, a middle power with a small population living beside an enormous country with perhaps the greatest mass of power in the world, we have a special challenge in maintaining an independent point of view while still being an active member of the international community.

• (1450)

Canada, as all of us know, has traditionally filled that middle power role with great success and pride. We believe that Canadians want an active, independent, foreign policy, a policy that reflects our values and serves our interests as a nation. To produce such a policy, we believe that at this point in time, as has happened periodically in the past, we must again consult Canadians; in so doing we will fulfil one of our major campaign commitments in this area.

One aspect of that commitment to consult is already under way even today, and that is the occasion of the First Annual National Forum on Canada's International Relations. This forum, which is taking place at the Government Conference Centre, began yesterday and concludes today. It has brought together about 120 different participants, from business, labour, the academic community, nongovernmental organizations, aboriginal Canadians and the media, to offer their views and expertise on the directions which we should be pursuing. The views of the forum participants will be presented to the members of the joint committee as they undertake their own review of our foreign policy.

As my colleague the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Honourable André Ouellet, has said in the other place, the forum and the work of the joint committee will certainly not be the last step in that consultative process. We want that process to continue, and we want the forum to examine ongoing issues as they develop.

As the motion before us today indicates, the Joint Committee on Foreign Policy will meet from time to time with members of the Joint Committee on Defence Policy. As I mentioned when I introduced the motion on defence policy last month, there obviously is a crossover between the two areas. The government considers it advisable to propose two separate joint committees, primarily because questions related to the development, the outfitting and the deployment of our forces at home and abroad are somewhat more specific and technical than the more general questions regarding our international outlook through our foreign policy. In addition, the findings of the Joint Committee on Defence Policy are intended in themselves to be the foundation of a government white paper on that particular subject. In both cases, however, the special joint committees are being asked to look at a list of issues and to report their findings within a few months. Those who serve on those committees will find them extremely action-oriented exercises. Members know that the Joint Committee on Foreign Policy is expected to report by October 31 of this year, while the Joint Defence Committee will report by September 30.

Honourable senators, I want to emphasize a point that has been raised by Senator Stewart. These joint committees are not intended to usurp or replace the ongoing work of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs or, for that matter, the complementary committee in the other place. On the contrary, the work of the joint committee and its report next fall, I hope, will be extremely useful to the Senate committee in its studies.

Honourable senators, I would like to insert a personal comment here. I have read, as have many of you, the discussion in the House of Commons on this particular issue. The view was expressed by some members there that the Senate had no place in these discussions; that only the people who were legitimately elected had a responsibility to discuss and debate and to offer their experience and points of view on issues that go to the very heart of the security of our nation and its not inconsiderable role historically abroad. I simply want to say that I profoundly disagree with that point of view. I believe that this chamber and the members within this chamber have shown, time and again, through their committees and their studies, that the experience and the wisdom here is of tremendous importance to the shaping of these great issues in national public policy. I am glad that the Senate will play an active and important role on both of these committees.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, in many respects the history and geography of Canada have put Canadians in a unique position in the world. We have strong ties to our largest trading partner and closest neighbour, the United States. However, we also have very strong ties to Europe and Asia and we are building stronger links with the countries of South and Central America.

Some of the questions that need to be discussed at this point in international affairs are: How can we assist the continuing movement towards greater democracy and market economies in the former Soviet Union and Central and Eastern Europe? How can we manage our relationship with the countries of the European Community as they move toward a greater degree of integration? How can we manage our response to the increased globalization of corporate activity in world markets and the impact that that is having on investment as well as on technological and financial linkages? How can we participate in the establishment of the World Trade Organization that will implement the new trade and investment agenda set out by the Uruguay Round of multinational trade negotiations? What should our role be — and this question has been asked over and over again in recent weeks and months — in the United Nations as it takes a more active position in directly addressing issues such as the famine in Somalia, the Gulf war and the situation in Bosnia, in which Canada has been a competent and dedicated player?

At the same time as we are reviewing our overall directions, we must also continue to be participants in world events. To that end, senators will know that the Prime Minister took part in the recent NATO summit in Europe. He will attend the annual G-7 Summit in Italy this summer, and in the fall he will attend the summit on Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation or APEC, the summit of the Organization of America States and the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

It is important to note that as we set out to review all aspects of our foreign policy, the objective is not to reinvent the wheel; rather, the objective is to capitalize on the special place we have created for ourselves in the world and the respect we have earned throughout a history of active involvement in international events. Democracy, respect for human rights, the Rule of Law, the freedom of movement of goods and people, equality of opportunity, these are some of the values I believe Canadians share and want to see reflected in our foreign policy.

In particular, honourable senators, the committee will be asked to look at our assistance to other countries and how more of that assistance can be channelled to meet basic human needs, environmental sustainability, the alleviation of starvation and poverty, and other initiatives which encourage human development. For example, how can we respond more effectively to the increase in issues that cross national borders, such as persistent poverty in developing countries, the increasing movement of peoples, environmental degradation, international lawlessness, international health and education concerns? These and many other issues and questions, which will form the substance of the committee's deliberations, are outlined in a document entitiled: "Guidance Paper for the Special Joint Parliamentary Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy." I should like to table that paper at this time.

Honourable senators, I hope senators on both sides of the chamber will support this motion, thus allowing honourable senators to assume an active and important role in shaping Canada's foreign policy for the coming years.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, while I agree with everything the Honourable Leader of the Government has said, under what strategy was it proposed to strike two committees, one on defence policy and one on foreign affairs? Those subjects are intertwined. Past history shows that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs under Senator Stewart and the Subcommittee on Security and National Defence under Senator Balfour were intertwined. Why have two committees tax the staffing resources of the House of Commons and the Senate? What is the purpose?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, there was a great deal of discussion and thought among colleagues in the government when the question of the review was addressed shortly after the election. It was concluded that although the two issues obviously intertwine at certain points — and this will be reflected in the work of the committees, because at times they will work jointly together — the task of the defence committee was specific, and therefore the two committees should divide their work, set out their areas of study, and then come together when issues warrant.

The committees will have different agendas; they will operate in different ways. That was the conclusion drawn by the Prime Minister and ministers involved.

Senator Marshall: In past joint committees, the Senate has always been subservient to the House of Commons. You mentioned an example of immaturity in that someone said that senators should not be on the committee because they were not elected. That shows the immaturity and childishness of some members in the other place. Why should there not be an equal number of senators as members from the other place, and co-chairmen rather than a deputy chairman from the Senate? Should we be subservient to the other place?

The work of the Senate committees on defence and foreign affairs has been hailed across the country. Why should we not stick out our chests and say "Who do they think they are?"

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I do not believe we are in any way subservient to the House of Commons with respect to these committees. Other senators who have been here longer than I can perhaps correct me, but in very many of our joint committees there is a different balance of membership. There are co-chairpersons for both committees. There will be co-chairmen, one from the House of Commons and one from the Senate. That is very important. Indeed, we worked very hard to get a better balance of membership on these committees than perhaps there has been in the past.

Senator Marshall: Senator Stewart could teach them more than they will ever know.

Senator Fairbairn: I would agree with that.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, with respect to the membership of the committee, Senator Marshall suggested that there is an imbalance, despite the assurances of the Leader of the Government in the Senate that, officially, we do have co-chairs. How will budgetary matters relating to the operation of the committee be handled? Will they be handled on a 50/50 basis or a one-third/two-thirds basis? Could you provide us with more information in that respect?

Senator Marshall: That is a good question.

Senator Fairbairn: Regrettably, Senator Graham, I do not have the details for you. Under normal circumstances, it would be one-third/two-thirds. I would be glad to seek out the exact ratio and report back to you.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, those of us who have had an opportunity to look at the document tabled by the Leader of the Government entitled, "Guidance Paper for the Special Joint Parliamentary Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy" are all impressed by the inclusiveness of that guidance paper. No subject has been ignored therein. I believe there is no mention of outer space, but beyond that, almost everything else is included.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Or the polar ice cap.

Senator Molgat: Are you proposing an amendment?

Senator Marshall: Go ahead. I would second that motion.

Senator Stewart: Yet, we are told that this committee is to report within a few months.

The committee will examine Canada's policy in relation to international trade, Canada's policy with regard to international assistance, Canada's policy with relation to the United Nations, and Canada's policy with regard to other alliances and defence arrangements.

Honourable senators, how can all of this be done in the way it ought to be done before the deadline? Or will the committee concentrate on those aspects of its mandate which seem to be most urgent, with the thought that the committee will come back to the two Houses and ask for an extended mandate to deal with the other matters? How much thought has been given to the timetable of the special joint committee in view of the fact that its waterfront is so very broad?

• (1510)

Senator Fairbairn: I do agree with you, Senator Stewart, that the waterfront is broad, as demonstrated in this document.

Perhaps you will appreciate my reluctance to get into any discussion of how priorities might be set within the joint committee. That is the responsibility of the membership of that committee. I do know that the intention is for the committee to work, not at a leisurely pace, but at an intensive pace with this October deadline in view.

I cannot enlighten you on whether the committee will decide at the end that it needs an extension. I cannot comment on that. I am sure that during the period of hearings and the period of deliberations every effort will be made to cover, if not every position, certainly the groupings of issues that are in this guidance paper. It is indeed a guidance paper to be of assistance to the committee as it charts its course and its work. How the committee chooses to set the priorities of the issues is really up to the members of the committee.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY ADOPTED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cools, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the Opening of the First Session of the Thirty-fifth Parliament.—(8th and last day of resuming debate)

Hon. W. David Angus: Honourable senators, apart from a brief question several weeks ago, this is the first time I have had the privilege of speaking in this chamber since my swearing in last June 15. I rise to do so today with pride and pleasure, but also with humility and trepidation, being respectful of this institution's great history and traditions and conscious of my own status as a genuine senatorial neophyte.

Since I first took my designated Tory seat here on the Liberal side of this chamber, I have been encouraged and inspired by the friendly welcome all honourable senators have accorded me. Thank you all for that.

As well, I have benefited from, and been truly grateful for, the helpful and understanding direction and guidance I have received from the Senate's professional and cooperative officers and staff.

I extend special thanks to my friends Senator Lowell Murray and Senator John Lynch-Staunton for their kindness, reassurance and generosity to me, not only on swearing-in day, but also during my first several uncertain days in these then unfamiliar surroundings.

[Translation]

Also, I wish to thank sincerely my friend and associate Senator Maurice Riel, former Speaker of the Senate, and Senator Marcel Prud'homme, a former colleague in the University of Montreal parliament — some 25 years ago — for their warm words of welcome when I took my seat.

[English]

To the many other such expressions already accorded to them, I am happy to add my own sincere congratulations to His Honour on his well-deserved accession to his new position of honour, prestige and responsibility, and to the Honourable Senators Joyce Fairbairn and John Lynch-Staunton upon their becoming Leader of the Government and Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, respectively. I wish all three of them much wisdom, cooperation and success as they carry out their key leadership roles during this critical period in the Senate's history.

Following my appointment to this place, I had occasion to consult briefly with my eminent predecessor, who was the Quebec senator from the district of Alma for 38 years. I speak of the Honourable Senator Hartland de M. Molson. I consulted him on the current state of the Senate and sought his counsel in my capacity as a new and enthusiastic, but thoroughly inexperienced, senator. He expressed to me several deep and substantial concerns about changes that he felt had occurred here in recent years.

This will come as no surprise to you, honourable senators, given that when he announced his resignation as dean of the Senate here last May 26, just three days short of his 86th birthday, Senator Molson referred to these changes, stating that some of them had left him with a "sense of regret and disappointment." He observed that there had been "a very obvious deterioration in the atmosphere of the house...with a substantial, almost catastrophic, decrease in public respect and support."

What he deplored the most to me, honourable senators, was his sense that basic good manners and heretofore mutual respect and decency among senators had deteriorated substantially in recent years. Not wont to using hyperbole or misplaced emphasis, I have no doubt Senator Molson knew whereof he spoke. His sage suggestion to me was that, if Senate reform is to succeed, if we wish to make a difference in building the future Canada, we must, as a first step, start acting with more dignity at the human level.

Honourable senators, we might do well to recall Senator Molson's admonition when we sense that our enthusiasm over some partisan or other point is starting to get the better of us.

At this point, honourable senators, I wish to record a brief word of tribute and thanks to Senator Molson. We can all learn a great deal from this remarkable Canadian who has devoted so much of his life, both in peacetime and in wartime, to distinguished public service in this nation. He is a unique individual who has been able to combine his qualities as a patrician gentleman of high intelligence and talents with a real zest for life and living, a quixotic sense of humour, humility, tolerance, compassion for and understanding of his fellow human beings and a responsible but self-effacing sense of public service and duty.

Senator Molson is a discreet, modest and private individual whose quiet and often anonymous eleemosynary works and activities are legion in this country. As well, he is tough-minded, courageous, loyal and of strong moral and physical fibre. He is a man you would always want to have on your side, whether in wartime or at the Montreal Forum cheering on your favourite hockey team. The Senate is surely a better place for his having been here. Let us heed his counsel and not disappoint him.

I am here because I love Canada, Canadians and the Canadian way of life. I am also here because I earnestly wish to contribute to and participate in this nation's economic renewal, the national reconciliation of our profound regional and cultural diversities and the Canadian people's adaptation to fundamental change, all of which are so necessary if our wonderful country is to flourish and prosper, and remain independent and free in the twenty-first century and beyond.

Canada is characterized by extraordinary regional, social, cultural, geographic and economic disparities. We have become a truly pluralistic society and are becoming more so almost every day. These features are not liabilities; they are assets, and they are strengths which distinguish us from other nations. We must preserve these assets by continual accommodation, combined with sensitive mutual understanding and respect amongst our various regions and peoples.

I have been living in "la belle province" for 48 years. My family and I moved there in 1946, after some short stays in Toronto, where I was born, and later on the coast in Chester, Nova Scotia and Shediac, New Brunswick, during the last world war. I consider myself a Quebecer.

[English]

• (1520)

I am one of that diminishing species, honourable senators, an English-speaking Quebecer; an anglophone.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I had the good fortune to be in a situation where I learned to know my French Canadian compatriots and was able to discover, appreciate and respect their way of thinking, their concerns and their aspirations.

In my opinion, all — or at least the vast majority — are proud Canadians who would not support, or even consider, separation unless provoked or frustrated beyond reason, to the extent that if a referendum were held, their decision would be based more on emotional considerations than on logic and reason. They are sensitive and sensible, with a wealth of common sense and insight, and they can usually be counted on to make the right decision in the crunch.

[English]

They will be there in the crunch, honourable senators. French Canadians, at least the ones I know — and I intended to address this to the Honourable Senator Thériault — are a loyal, passionate and creative people who understandably revere their language, their culture, and their distinct status as guaranteed at the time of Confederation. To accommodate their legitimate aspirations is not, in my respectful view, an unreasonable price to pay to preserve the integrity of our country.

[Translation]

Acts of provocation like the rejection of Meech Lake and the untimely decision to close the Collège militaire in St-Jean are imprudent, and do not contribute to the national reconciliation we would like to see. I share the concerns of my colleagues Senators Rivest and Beaudoin and other honourable senators, who during the last few days have appealed for prudence in this house. In Quebec today, we have a situation that is potentially unstable.

[English]

I would thus urge the government to keep the national unity file open and on the government agenda, in lieu of ill-conceived and poorly timed shut-downs of highly visible and symbolic institutions.

Over the past 35 years, but more particularly in the last decade, we have witnessed rapid and almost unbelievable change at all levels in Canadian society. This has not been exclusive to us, but rather has been part of a global phenomenon brought about by the "shrinking of the world," the development of the "global village," the communications revolution, and all of the other related, extraordinary technological breakthroughs. For example, today "information superhighway" are buzzwords. It is difficult to imagine that only two or three years ago the expression was virtually unknown.

Our most basic institutions and values are being affected, questioned and challenged. Canada's legal and constitutional framework is being critically tested over and over again; our educational and health systems now are feeling remarkable pressures. Much of the infrastructure and the technology of our natural resources and other basic industries has become obsolete. Our economy has been, and continues necessarily to be, restructured; old alliances and mutual support systems between the regions have broken down; international trading patterns have been revolutionized and our transportation network is in total disarray. Canadians are being called on daily to meet enormous challenges involving the need to adapt to fundamental change at all levels of society; challenges which involve as well finding a way to maintain the underlying fabric which is Canada — respecting and supporting each other as we go forward together, still accommodating and compromising from time to time, as is necessary in the interests of national survival and integrity.

As I indicated earlier, the Senate has not been exempt from the stresses of change. We too must meet the challenges which beset this institution. We must adapt to the changing times and adjust to the new order of things in a responsible and effective fashion so that, as in the past, this unique element of our Parliament can enjoy the trust, the respect and the confidence of the Canadian people and play a role — perhaps different, but useful and significant — in the positive growth and development of Canada into the twenty-first century and beyond.

Honourable senators, I hope you will not find it overly presumptuous of me, as a new senator, to say that I have been most encouraged these past few months to observe here, on both sides of the chamber, a genuine will to meet these challenges, a spirit to reform and preserve this fine institution and to have it regain the public respect and confidence it so evidently has lost. This spirit will, I trust, be maintained and nurtured. In this regard, I heartily subscribe to the message so articulately expressed in Senator Ghitter's February 9 contribution to this Throne Speech debate, especially when he summed up on Senate reform with the following words:

> We are focusing on the wrong issues. We should be focusing on ways to get better people into political life, people of background, talent, wide experience and business acumen. Our parliamentarians are running the biggest enterprise in Canada. We have the challenge of dealing with a debt of half a trillion dollars. We must spend less time fighting each other on issues of little consequence or financial moment and more time building up our institutions and the people who serve them.

Honourable senators, I have mixed feelings about the Speech from the Throne, and will be observing with much interest as the government attempts to flesh out or provide some substance around what was very much a thin or bare-bones listing of alleged policy objectives. Like Senator Ghitter and several other honourable senators who have spoken before me in this debate, I applaud the government's commitment to enhance the credibility of Parliament. My earlier comments about what we can do, and seemingly have already started to do in the Senate reflect this. Also, I am encouraged that the new government claims to be focused on preparing Canada and Canadians for the new century which will soon be upon us.

In this regard, I sincerely hope the government will pursue and build upon the important initiatives begun through the difficult but correct decisions taken by the previous government led by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney. So far, I have detected some positive signs that it will. After much initial negative rhetoric before, during and immediately after the election campaign, the Liberals now appear to have recognized the many virtues of those decisions, and the profound importance for the future of Canada and its people of the free trade agreement with the United States and of NAFTA. As well, the Liberals seem now to acknowledge the importance for Canada of having finally joined the Organization of American States and thus becoming a full-fledged player in the social, cultural and economic interaction within our own continent and on the north-south axis.

As to Canadian-American relations, I submit, honourable senators, that one of the Mulroney government's truly outstanding and necessary accomplishments was to re-establish open, civil and pleasant relations with our good friend, neighbour and key trading partner to the south. By the early 1980s, Canada's relations with the United States and its peoples on many levels was in a deplorable state. In some major international matters of mutual concern, we were not even being consulted by the Americans, and the atmosphere between our senior government people and departments was cordial but frosty and strained, at best. Prime Minister Mulroney and his government addressed this pitiful state of affairs right from the outset as a priority foreign policy issue. This was carried out in a determined and professional manner, not in an obsequious or kowtowing manner, as the naysayers, cynics, ultra-nationalists, and political opportunists would have us believe. The result is a happy one indeed, for today Canada and the U.S. are working positively and openly together on a wide range of common issues —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am reticent to interrupt an honourable senator when he is making his maiden speech, but the rules oblige me do so. However, anyone who has lived in Shediac should be entitled to have a chance to conclude.

• (1530)

Senator Angus: I thank honourable senators for their consideration. I will try to be brief.

The result of this improved relationship with our neighbour to the south has had a happy result, for today Canada and the U.S. are working positively and openly together on many issues. The mistrust and negative Big Brother attitude have disappeared and have been replaced by a spirit of cooperation, mutual respect and constructive understanding. This augurs well for the future. We should all hope that this government will nurture and sustain this most valuable relationship.

As I conclude, honourable senators, I come to one of my great disappointments with the Speech from the Throne. Although the government's agenda is said to be based on an integrated approach to economic, social, environmental and foreign policy, there is no mention whatsoever — not a word — about Canada's troubled transportation system, or of any plans or policies to deal with it. Canada has developed and become strong and prosperous in no small way as a result of its vast transportation network on land, at sea and in the air. The massive infrastructure that was built up includes great railway lines, maritime ports and terminals, grain elevators, shipyards, airports, the St. Lawrence Seaway, huge roads and highways, bridges and tunnels. These have all contributed to the growth of our nation.

Honourable senators, the system is fast becoming dysfunctional. It is deteriorating. In some cases it is becoming obsolete. In others it is needing to be closed down because of better and more cost-effective and competitive alternatives elsewhere, usually in the U.S. Canada has sadly neglected its transportation sector. Repeated warnings have not been heeded. If something is not done immediately, we are in danger of not having a viable and competitive system for moving our goods in international trade.

This government needs to act urgently on the many recommendations that are already before it from government and private sector bodies alike, as well as from joint government-industry task forces. In the maritime sector alone there has been no clear statement of policy by our federal government since 1949. Mixed messages are constantly being sent out — messages of hope on the one hand, but messages of despair on the other. If current trends continue, the St. Lawrence Seaway-Great Lakes system could soon become a non-viable trading route. The result is much uncertainty and a lot of pain in our once proud transportation sector.

Honourable senators, we need now a comprehensive and integrated policy for all modes of our transportation industry. Time does not permit me to elaborate on this today, but I intend to do so here at the first appropriate opportunity. In the meantime, I urge this government to heed the increasingly strident warning signals, and to develop a transportation policy both worthy of our vast trading nation and appropriate for the new order of things now, and as we enter the twenty-first century.

In closing, honourable senators, I wish the government well in its endeavours to prepare this great nation and the Canadian people for the twenty-first century and to help us deal with the monumental and often disruptive changes that are affecting all aspects of our daily lives. At the same time, I give notice that I will be doing my utmost, in the spirit of cooperation referred to earlier, to ensure that this government carries on the many sound policies and essential initiatives commenced by the government of Brian Mulroney.

I thank honourable senators for their attention and for their indulgence as I exceeded the time limit.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if no other senators wish to speak on this debate, I move:

> That the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by the Honourable the Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On division.

Motion agreed to, and the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne adopted, on division.

On motion of the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, ordered that the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by the Honourable the Speaker.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the second reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-Related Benefits Act. — (Honourable Senator Molgat)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, last night I indicated that I had a message from Senator Marshall in which he said that he would propose some changes to the bill following on some comments I had made earlier about the difficulties I saw with it. Regrettably, I was not here when he made those comments earlier today under Senators' Statements. I assume the statement he made was the one he passed on to me last night.

Let me say at the outset that it is with the greatest of regret that I point out some problems with this bill. When I say the "greatest of regret," it is because I am aware of the interest that Senator Marshall has in the field of veterans affairs and, indeed, the debt that veterans and many of us here owe to Senator Marshall for the interest he has shown in the cause of veterans. There are not too many veterans left in Parliament. It is comforting to know that there is someone of Senator Marshall's stature who has this interest and who is prepared to follow it up.

Having said that, honourable senators, I must say that I have grave reservations with respect to the bill. My reservations have nothing to do with the intentions of Senator Marshall, but are about the effects of the bill.

Today, as a result of my earlier reservations regarding how this measure would affect other veterans and other bills, Senator Marshall proposed to remove clause 3 of the bill. It is most valid to remove it. If the bill is left intact, we will have the anomaly of having merchant seamen qualify as war veterans. In all our other legislation we do not refer to war veterans, but simply to veterans. That would place us in the invidious situation of saying there is one group of veterans that is in some way different from, or better than, others.

However, if we do that, then what are we left with in the bill? We are left with only a change to the title. I then question whether there is any real value in doing that. Are we putting one single cent into the pockets of veterans by doing that, or are we simply making a cosmetic change that will cost money? If the bill is changed and passed, it will mean that a number of acts will have to be changed.

My information is that if the title is changed simply to "Merchant Navy War Veterans," consequential amendments will have to be made to the following acts: Children of Deceased Veterans Education Assistance Act, Schedule, item 2; the Income Tax Act, paragraphs 81(1)(d) and 241(4)(f.1); the Old Age Security Act, paragraph 33(2)(b); the Pension Act, subsection 71.1(1) — paragraph (a) of the definition "civilian"; paragraphs (b) and (d) of the definition "prisoner of war of another power"; paragraph (c) of the definition "prisoner of war of Japan"; the Tax Court of Canada Act, subsection 12(2) and paragraph 18.29(1)(d); and the Veterans Appeal Board Act, section 17.

If we make all of these changes, something which will involve a good deal of clerical work throughout the system, will we achieve anything worthwhile? As I said, I know the intentions of Senator Marshall. I do not question them for one moment. What I question is the result of going through such an exercise.

We must remember that changing the title of a bill does not change the bill or its impact. However, such a change impacts on other things that we have to do to make the title correspond to other acts of Parliament.

I ask Senator Marshall to consider withdrawing the bill. It may be that some people will have an emotional reaction to being labelled a war veteran. Will the cost to the government of doing this not be beyond the benefit to be achieved?

• (1540)

Perhaps Senator Marshall might reconsider the situation, and talk to those who are urging that this be done. I am not quite sure who is urging this course of action. Is there a demand here from the Merchant Navy coalition? Are they supporting this? Who exactly is supporting it? Perhaps they will reconsider the matter and agree that, as Canadians, we have accepted all along that when we talk about veterans we are talking about war veterans. There should not be an attempt to classify one group of veterans as being different from another group of veterans.

I know what Senator Marshall has been able to accomplish for the Merchant Navy veterans. Indeed, at the moment a new book is being prepared for the Peace Tower recognizing the Merchant Navy. That is thanks to his efforts. Have we not really done what is required here by that recognition, which was a long time coming, admittedly. However, now that we are proceeding with it, is that not sufficient recognition? Why is it necessary for the government to incur the costs involved in changing a great number of statutes simply to insert one word? That excercise will not really benefit those veterans in any way.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, despite the very kind words of Senator Molgat, he read out an interpretation of what the result would be if the word "war" was inserted in the Merchant Navy veterans legislation. I quarrel with that suggestion, which must have come from the Department of Veterans Affairs, as I quarrel with many of the things that the Department of Veterans Affairs does.

In the meantime, I will adjourn the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I had been informed to advise you that if Senator Marshall spoke, his speech would close the debate. However, I did not do so because I felt that he was responding to Senator Molgat's intervention. I may have been out of order, but at least my intentions were good.

Now Senator Marshall wishes to move that this debate be adjourned.

Senator Molgat: Might it be advisable for some other senator to take the adjournment rather than Senator Marshall? It would then leave the matter open.

On motion of Senator Berntson, debate adjourned.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Phillips, calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 22, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Berntson.)

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, the first budget of Jean Chrétien's Liberal government was supposed to reflect the Red Book of the Liberal Party of Canada and restore hope to unemployed Canadians, ensure that the economic growth initiated by the previous government would continue and, finally, reduce the deficit.

However, that is not the case. Workers and the unemployed have been severely affected by this budget, and the elderly as well. For the Atlantic provinces, the budget is a real disaster. Because of the number of unemployed in those provinces, the budget comes down even harder.

On top of all that, the Liberal budget provides for the closing of five military bases and reducing the strength of two other bases in Atlantic Canada. Closings and strength reductions represent a loss of several thousand jobs in the Atlantic region. A five per cent cut in the budget for ACOA represents a loss of $16 million and will be felt particularly in northern New Brunswick, a region that did not really need more bad news of this kind.

The reduction in Special Investment Tax Credits is another disaster for the Atlantic provinces, and I am not exaggerating, because this particular measure will be very costly for northern New Brunswick and the whole Atlantic region.

In fact, the New Brunswick Deputy Minister for Economic Development, Mr. Lauzier, indicated recently that $225 million worth of investment will be lost to northern New Brunswick alone. Where the PC spent an average of $500 million annually on the groundfish program, the present budget has set up a five-year program that will spend an average of $340 million.

We cannot remain uncritical of a budget whose impact is so negative and so disastrous for our regions and our fellow citizens. As far as integrity is concerned, with this budget Jean Chrétien's Liberals have done the exact opposite of what they promised before last October.

Despite all these budget cuts, despite substantial tax hikes at the expense of the unemployed, the elderly and small business, Mr. Martin expects a drop of one-tenth of one per cent in the unemployment rate for next year. What a spark of hope for the unemployed! If only the government had been able to gain the confidence of financial markets and international markets with these measures — but that was not the case!

I want to quote part of an article that appeared in the Financial Post on March 11, 1994, under the heading: Liberals lose their innocence abroad:

[English]

> In the fourth quarter of last year, jitters about Canada's fiscal situation resulted in $7.8 billion in foreign sales of Canadian bonds.
>
> Concern deepened last week when Prime Minister Jean Chrétien was quoted as telling listeners to an Alberta radio show that no more government spending cuts were coming other than those laid out in Paul Martin's recent budget.
> ...Chrétien's comments had hit international news screens quickly and sparked foreign selling of our assets, contributing to a fall in the Canadian dollar to a seven-year low.
>
> That fall has persuaded the central bank to intervene more forcefully to protect the C$, raising short-term interest rates to try to bolster the currency.

[Translation]

Honorable senators, on March 10 last, our major financial institutions announced a fairly large increase in mortgage interest rates. These rates jumped as much as three quarters of one per cent for a five-year mortgage. As honourable senators will recall, when our party came into power in 1984, the interest on a five-year mortgage was 14.25 per cent. Under the Mulroney government, however, monetary and fiscal policies were such that this rate came down to 8.75 per cent.

This indicates, honourable senators, that this government and this first Martin budget have caused both national and international money markets, like the unemployed and the elderly, to lose confidence in the policies and directions governing this country.

Are we to witness the return of the astronomical interest rates of the early 1980s? The question does come up, and Canadians want to know. As usual, the cost will be borne by small ratepayers, who will be paying twice over since interest rates will be higher on both their own borrowings and on the national debt. The Finance Minister's budget has doubled the burden on the small ratepayer's shoulders.

This morning, the Bank of Canada increased its bank rate from 4.22 per cent to 5 per cent. This happened today and it is disturbing.

In short, this budget penalizes small ratepayers, the unemployed, small business, fishermen, farmers. It does nothing to start the fight against the annual deficit.

This government announced in the budget that during the next three years it will need to borrow more than $100 billion, most likely on the international market.

Finally, this budget includes the closing of the only institution providing military training in French for our Acadian, Franco-Manitoban and Québécois officer cadets. I am referring to the closing of St-Jean military college. Honourable senators will have realized that on this side, we will continue the fight with every means at our disposal. We recognize, as our leader Jean Charest said last week, that the democratically elected government must have the final say. But on this side, and Canadians expect nothing less from us, we shall show that the government has made a mistake in this case.

Once it has been proven that it would be a mistake and would not be much of a savings, we hope that the governement will not be so stubborn as to maintain its decision to close St-Jean college.

The Minister, Mr. Ouellet, said the other day that it was a question of money. His words were quoted in almost every newspaper in Quebec and elsewhere. It is not a question of money; it is a question of principle.

This closing attacks one of Canada's pillars. Through its cadets, through those who work for it and who are responsible for the country's defenses and for peace-keeping missions, the Department of National Defence must reflect the country's linguistic duality, and allow francophones access to military training in their own language. It must also allow anglophones who wish to do so to go to Quebec to learn a second language in a French environment, so that they can become better soldiers. We will continue this fight.

In concluding, for the Liberals, promises have given way to stark reality. For Canadians, hope for a better future has been replaced by disappointment and even despair.

For us, members of the Progressive Conservative Party, the Liberals, class of '93, bear a strange resemblance to the Liberals of Pierre Elliott Trudeau, to the Liberals of Jean Chrétien as he was at the time, to the Liberals of Allan MacEachen and of Marc Lalonde, whose main legacy was all-time high interest rates, unacceptable unemployment rates and a record federal deficit, in terms of gross national product.

As the motto of Quebec says, we will remember this first Martin budget, and a majority of Canadians will also remember it at the appropriate juncture.

[English]

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, the budget deals with economic pain to our citizenry.

Some in this chamber and elsewhere have been pained and deeply disturbed by my recent speech on the dangers of nationalism to Canada and to the world. Indeed, one Montrealer, a most articulate and thoughtful proponent of nationalism as an organizing idea, has defended Quebec nationalism on the basis of the "democratic foundation of Quebec nationalism." Thus, observers analyzing nationalism in Quebec as an organizing idea are met with the grand defence of democracy. And who, honourable senators, would readily argue against democracy?

In effect, we are told democracy can justify nationalism. A nationalist program can be legitimized by a democratic majority, rooted in nationalist ideas. This is a defence theory of some great delicacy.

Let us assay the underpinnings, the sources, the foundation of democratic thought to discover whether nationalist notions are legitimized or rationalized by democracy.

Nationalism, we have argued, is organized for the advancement and protection of one group, one collectivity, at the expense of others, at the cost of equality for all. What, then, is the essence of democracy, we must ask ourselves. Can nationalism complement — or compliment — democracy? To whom may we first turn for advice? Two individuals come to mind as being amongst the most perceptive thinkers about democracy. Both were French in origin: the writers Montesquieu and Tocqueville. Both have carefully assessed the philosophical foundations and the workings of democracy.

It was Montesquieu, of course, who drew our attention to the obvious point that democracy was not an end of society but an imperfect means to a just society. The end was as important as the means. Tocqueville agreed:

> For a rebellion, as in a novel, the most difficult part is to invent the end.

Both Montesquieu and Tocqueville were skeptical about the human condition and deeply concerned about the nature of democracy itself. Both cautioned about the inherent dangers in democracy. One great danger, one paramount danger, Tocqueville called the "tyranny of the majority." The purpose of democracies was not to reach decisions by numerical opinion alone:

> What struck me in the United States was the difficulty of shaking the majority in an opinion once conceived.

For Montesquieu, the purpose of democracy was the achievement of public "virtue." The heart of democracy for Tocqueville was the "public interest," melding the private interest of each individual with the public interest.

Both Montesquieu and Tocqueville were imbued with the theory that there can be no democracy in a state without liberty and equality for all its citizens and, as Tocqueville carefully added, "conditions for equality."

The goals of a democratic society can only be realized in a context where each citizen can evolve to his highest potential, where the state removes the impediments to individual happiness, where the opportunity for power for the powerless is open. Only then is the path open to increasing the sum of human liberty and the sum of happiness. Both of these great men recognized the inherent dangers in a purely egalitarian state, and welcomed the limitations and creative tensions between liberty and equality.

• (1600)

We are reminded by Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., the noted American historian:

> Democracy encouraged a dangerous addition to the inflated style. We must be careful in our language.

Dialogue, language in a democracy can hurt and maim and destroy. Tocqueville wrote:

> An abstract term is like a box with a false bottom: You put in verbal ideas you please and take them out again without being observed.

Care must be taken with language and ideas. Indeed, Tocqueville stressed that self-restraint was essential, was necessary in a democracy.

Tocqueville concluded, after carefully studying French, American and English democracies, that the best structure for a democratic state for individuals to achieve equality was federalism — to balance the centralization of the government against the equality of the individual. Minorities within society could be empowered in this way to enjoy all facets of equality. Is this the democracy of nationalists? In a democracy, can minorities even give consent to reduce their rights save and except in state emergencies?

Tocqueville never denied the power of groups to associate for particular needs or special purposes. Free association increased the richness of the democratic tapestry. Indeed, groups were encouraged to associate, were encouraged to collect together, were encouraged to share common interests, common desires, common economic, religious and cultural interests. But to place the power of the state in the majority for the paramount benefit of one collectivity and compel the minorities to pursue their lifestyles only through the filter of that collectivity or not at all was, for both Montesquieu and Tocqueville, an idea alien to democracy and egalitarianism.

The character of democracy based upon the political notion of "public virtue" as defined by Montesquieu originated with the Greek thinker Democritus, who wrote these words:

> Not out of fear but out of a feeling of what is right should we abstain from doing wrong... Virtue is based upon, most of all, respecting the other man... Every man is a little world unto his own... We ought to do our utmost to help those who have suffered injustice... It is good deeds, not words, that count... The poverty of a democracy is better than the prosperity which allegedly goes with aristocracy or monarchy, just as liberty is better than slavery... The wise man belongs to all countries, for the home of a great soul is the whole world...

Well before Plato's Republic, Pericles gave his famous funeral oration and set out his classic views of the ideal state. He said:

> Our political system does not compete with institutions which are elsewhere in force. We do not copy our neighbours, but try to be an example. Our administration favours the many instead of the few: This is why it is called a democracy. The laws afford equal justice to all alike in their private disputes, but we do not ignore the claims of excellence. When a citizen distinguishes himself, then he will be called to serve the state, in preference to others, not as a matter of privilege, but as a reward of merit; and > poverty is no bar... The freedom we enjoy extends also to ordinary life; we are not suspicious of one another, and do not nag our neighbour if he chooses to go his own way... but this freedom does not make us lawless. We are taught to respect the magistrates and the laws, and never to forget that we must protect the injured. And we are also taught to observe those unwritten laws whose sanction lies only in the universal feeling of what is right...

> Our city is thrown open to the world; we never expel a foreigner... We are free to live exactly as we please, and yet we are always ready to face any danger... We love beauty without indulging in fancies, and although we try to improve our intellect, this does not weaken our will... To admit one's poverty is no disgrace with us; but we consider it disgraceful not to make an effort to avoid it. We consider a man who takes no interest in the state not as harmless, but as useless; and although only a few may originate a policy, we are all able to judge it. We do not look upon discussion as a stumbling-block in the way of political action, but as an indispensable preliminary to acting wisely... We believe that happiness is the fruit of freedom and freedom that of valour, and we do not shrink from the dangers of war... To sum up, I claim that Athens is the school of Hellas, and that the individual Athenian grows up to develop a happy versatility, a readiness for emergencies, and self-reliance.

As historians have explained, Pericles, the democratic Athenian leader, was spelling out not only a program but also a defence, an attack against what he called "the arrested tribalism of Sparta." Karl Popper called it "the strongest statement ever made in opposition to this kind of movement."

Honourable senators, does history repeat itself? Are there cycles in history? The debate between an "open" society and a "closed" society raged at the time of Socrates. Then the debate swirled around two city states, Athens and Sparta, driven by two vastly different organizing ideas.

Socrates, the Athenian, was accused of undermining democracy in Athens' war against tribal Sparta. Since he had taught some of those who conspired with Sparta against Athens, Socrates was given the choice to escape and go into exile. Socrates refused. As Popper pointed out, only by defending himself under the democratic laws of Athens would he prove his loyalty to the city state, to a democracy. He showed that man could die not only for fame but for freedom of critical thought and individual self-respect, which was, for him, the essence of democracy.

After Socrates' death, Plato criticized Socrates for his attempt to construct the theory of "the arrested society." Plato supported the arguments that free thought, criticism of political institutions, teaching new ideas to the young, were all capital crimes. Why? Popper, who painstakingly analyzed this jolting contest of organizing ideas in his seminal book The Open Society and its Enemies speculated that Plato felt, after the Athenian victory, that a different program had to replace the democratic status quo. Something different! The appetite in the public was for something different, something new! The status quo was not sufficient. The democratic status quo was not exciting enough, not enticing enough for Plato. Using Socrates, perhaps abusing Socratic ideas in the Republic, Plato preached a return to the "old ideas." The "old ideas" reaffirmed the "old values of tribalism," opposing them to the faith in an "open society."

> Men must be taught that justice is inequality and that the tribe, the collective, stands higher than the individual.

So argued Plato. Since the egalitarian ideas of Socrates were too strong, too refreshing, too compelling to be challenged openly, Plato was driven to reinterpret them as support for his elitist, closed society.

No doubt Plato was sincere. No doubt he sincerely believed in preserving the "old ways." He grafted Socratic ideas onto his notions of a "closed" society:

> According to the humanitarian creed, one should be ready to help one's neighbours.

But Plato feared an "open" society. Plato feared individualism. Plato feared the masses. To keep the door closed and arrest society, Plato added alluring, brilliant, simple arguments. Arguing against equal justice but a form of justice for all, he sought to convince all righteous men that he was an advocate of justice. While combatting freedom of thought, he became a champion of freedom of thought. According to Popper, he used the technique of appealing to the "moral humanitarian sentiments for anti-humanitarian purposes." Popper pointed out that Plato "transfigured" the idea of individual justice and his wish to arrest changes in his society from tribalism into "a love of justice and temperance" in a "heavenly state" in which everyone would be happy.

> This dream of unity and beauty and perfection... this collectivism, is the product as well as the symptom of the lost group spirit of tribalism.

It was these conflicting principles, these conflicting ideas, that added to the confusion of the youth, and resulted in the stress and distress to them, rather than to their happiness.

• (1610)

Confusion created detours on the road to a higher state of political perfection, a state of equality. Whenever equality was strained and distorted through the sieve of a society premised on the protection of a certain collectivity and the advancement of one set of values important to one group, confusion and distortion always followed.

What, then, is the goal of modern-day democracy? An "open" society? This debate is as old as Athens and Sparta and as new as Ottawa and Quebec City. The raging debate between the schools of thought of Plato and Socrates continues. Let us recall that Socrates preached for an "open" society while Plato fought for a "closed" society for certain elites. It was on this "closed" society that Plato sought to paint democratic notions to make the picture of the "closed" society more palatable, more acceptable, more accommodating, less threatening to the masses, to the minorities and to their neighbours. Plato sought to tranquilize the democratic impulse for his own purposes.

We must remind ourselves that Socrates' central thesis of politics was his theory of individuality or, as he called it, "the soul." As Karl Popper points out:

> Individualism should not be merely the dissolution of tribalism but that the individual should prove worthy of his liberation.

There is more in man than tribalism.

> There is a divine spark, reason; a love of truth, of kindness, of humaneness, a love of beauty and of goodness. It is these that made a man's life worthwhile.

It is man's reason more than his tribalism that makes man humane. For Socrates, caring for one's soul, one's individuality, was what mattered. This was the essence, this was the foundation, this was the heart of democracy. Popper concluded his first volume with the following insight:

> Once we begin to rely upon our reason, and to use our powers of criticism, once we feel the call of personal responsibilities, and with it, the responsibility of helping to advance knowledge, we cannot return to a state of implicit submission to tribal magic. For those who have eaten of the tree of knowledge, paradise is lost. The more we try to return to the heroic age of tribalism, the more surely do we arrive at the inquisition, at the secret police and at a romanticized gangsterism. Beginning with the suppression of reason and truth we must end with the most brutal and violent destruction of all that is human.

Some honourable senators have suggested that that may be an exaggeration.

The Hon. the Speaker: I apologize for interrupting the honourable senator, but 15 minutes have elapsed. However, with leave, the honourable senator may continue.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grafstein: Thank you, honourable senators. Some honourable senators have suggested to me that they feel that my criticism of nationalism abroad and at home was exaggerated. For a moment, let us examine Quebec nationalism as filtered through the eyes of one narrow-minded Torontonian. Let us lay aside the historic economic evolution of the Province of Ontario as a donor province in federalism, and Quebec in economic terms as a donee province through the mechanics of transfer payments, federal grants and other cross-border and linguistic subsidies.

If not with history or economics or even profitable federalism, where should one start? What of modern symbols? What do symbols tell us of democracy? Let us start with the most pervasive symbol in the modern age, the automobile licence plate. Ontario has impressed on its licence plate these words "Yours to Discover," reflecting, I believe, an internal as well as an external invitation of pluralism for the greatest freedom and happiness for all.

Quebec's automobile plates reflect a different symbolic notion, "Je me souviens." The questions this Torontonian has are: Who is the "Je"? Who is the "I"? What is the "I" being asked to remember? What is meant by the earlier slogan, "Maîtres chez nous"? Who are the masters? What is the house? Whose house is it? If there are masters, who are to be the servants?

These symbolic notions, these slogans, appear fraught with a hierarchy of values different in substance and kind from what Montesquieu had in mind. Montesquieu's spirit of the law was based on equality. The French Revolution itself was premised on the ideas of liberty, equality and fraternity for all citizens. In no small measure, all the leading patriots in the Western World of their day felt that they were French in spirit and in kind because of this trilogy of organizing ideas. To be French meant to be infected by, to be imbued with, to be galvanized with the ideas of equality. A citizen of France meant ripping away the notions of class, race and discrimination. To be French then, for that brief, shining moment in history was to be a citizen of the world. There was no confusion; there was no ambivalence; there was no lack of clarity.

Nationalism and democracy can march side by side; but they follow the beat of different drummers. They follow different lyrics and different tunes. One becomes confused because one hears not a symphony but a cacophony of conflicting, dissonant sounds. Why, then, be surprised when the youth of Canada, the youth of Quebec, remain confused about themselves and their neighbours as they march toward a more complex, difficult economic future following the confusing ideas of their leaders?

Nationalists cannot be shaken in their belief in the primacy of one group, while democracy's credo was simply summed up two thousand years ago with these words: "The last shall be first and the first shall be last."

T. S. Eliot, in his masterful play Murder in the Cathedral, wrote these words: "The last sin was the greatest treason, to do the right thing for the wrong reason." Who can deny the sincerity of those who call themselves nationalists? Not I. Who can deny that nationalists' hope for a better and fuller life for themselves and their national collective? Not I. But the original sin of nationalism lies buried in the intellectual ferment that results in confusion rather than clarity in the minds of the youth. That confusion rests with the dual promotion of equality on the one hand and collectivity on the other. Who can hope to understand nationalists who would seek to help their youth exploit their full potential as individuals, yet would destroy the federal bridges to equality through bilingualism? Is the bridge of bilingualism one bridge just too far for nationalists? If so, they must answer to their youth and to their history, not I.

Honourable senators, I am indebted for for support for some of these ideas to Karl Popper, a brilliant mind, in his classic work The Open Society and Its Enemies, Arthur Schlesinger, American historian of democracy, in a book entitled, Cycles of American History, Julian Benda in his chilling book, The Betrayal of the Intellectuals, and a wonderful collection of essays on Tocqueville printed by Rutgers press under the title Reconsidering Tocqueville's Democracy in America. Of course, one is always indebted to the Greek classical theorists whose ideas remain evergreen. Even though the world continues to change, their ideas remain as alive and vital today as when they were first written centuries ago.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Would the honourable senator permit a question or two?

Senator Grafstein: Of course.

Senator Murray: Unfortunately, I have already taken part in the budget debate, so I will not be able to engage in the discussion that the honourable senator launched during the Throne Speech debate and has continued today; not that, in any case, I could approach the level of erudition that he has attained here. I ask him whether, in his contribution to the Throne Speech debate and again today, right at the beginning, he has not given a definition of nationalism that is completely pejorative, after which, of course, it becomes duck soup to denounce it.

• (1620)

Senator Grafstein: No.

Senator Murray: I will read the honourable senator's speech again, but within the first minute or two of his speech, he offered a definition of "nationalism" that involved the feelings of superiority of one group over another and, at the same time, a loss of the principle of equality in society. That seems to be the definition of "nationalism" he offered.

At the same time, I ask the honourable senator whether he has not been unfair to Lise Bissonnette. I presume it was to Madame Bissonnette that he was referring in his early remarks. He attributes to her a defence of Quebec nationalism on the basis that it is legitimized by democracy. He imputes to Madame Bissonnette a majoritarian impulse that is quite unfair. Her argument is not nearly as narrow as the honourable senator suggests.

Senator Grafstein: First of all, honourable senator, I wish to comment on the notion of superiority. I do not think I have used the word "superiority" in my text. If I have, I did not mean it in the terms that the honourable senator suggests. I am talking about "primacy," "giving paramountcy," "giving priority to" as opposed to "supremacy." They are different notions.

As to the question of the editorial writer in Quebec, I took an important comment from her text. In fact, it was a direct quoté from her text. Her response to my speech on nationalism was based on the principle that I should carefully examine the fact that there is a democratic, nationalist program based on democracy in Quebec. I was attempting to respond to that notion, and pointed out that democracy is more complex than suggesting that a majority having come to a decision makes that decision democratic. That was one purpose of my speech today.

Senator Murray: I appreciate that, honourable senator, but in the same vein, what might be described as the "nationalist impulse" is also more complex. Madame Bissonnette's argument is more complex and sophisticated than that.

I am attempting to ascertain whether the honourable senator can think of anything good to say, or whether there is, in his view, anything positive about nationalism.

I heard the honourable senator some years ago stand in this place and pay an eloquent tribute to the late Honourable Walter Gordon. Walter Gordon would have described himself quite proudly as a Canadian nationalist. While one might disagree with his analysis or his prescription, I certainly would not recognize him — or the views of people who think like him and talk like him in this country — in the anti-nationalist polemic that I have heard now on two occasions from my honourable friend.

Senator Grafstein: I was, and am, a great admirer of Walter Gordon. In 1963 I wrote an article in The Toronto Star that argued precisely the opposite position to Walter Gordon's views. My position at that time was that by fomenting nationalism in Canada, how could we deny nationalism in Quebec? I thought the roots were exactly the same. Therefore, while I am a great fan and supporter of Walter Gordon in many of his good works, I am not suggesting that I was a follower of his narrow nationalist views.

Senator Murray: The answer to the question, honourable senator, is that you cannot deny either Quebec or Canadian nationalism, and that you must harmonize them and make them compatible. I have always regarded this as possible and, under our circumstances, desirable.

At the GATT negotiations a couple of months ago, the government of France fought and fought to obtain the same cultural exemption, in effect, that Canada now has under the NAFTA. France wants to protect the French culture against the completely free invasion of American culture, particularly television and film. Does the honourable senator see something negative or wrong with that?

Senator Grafstein: No, I do not. This is not the time —

Senator Murray: Senator, it is an expression of nationalism and loyalty to the group, to the nation, or what you would pejoratively describe as "the tribe," and one that I do not see as necessarily negative.

Senator Grafstein: That is a fair question. The response requires some complexity. I find myself staunchly Canadian in terms of promoting Canadian culture. That, in my view, does not make me a Canadian nationalist in the sense that the honourable senator alludes to. I feel strongly about culture in Canada because of equality. The issue is equality. Given the economic infrastructure in North America, I do not believe that we are being fair to Canadian culture in Canada. In fact, there is a lack of equality for Canadian culture. Therefore the motivation for my "culturalism" is based on equality. I want Canadians to have a fair share — not a total share — of the cultural highway in our country. That makes me a patriot. It does not make me a nationalist.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senator, are you implying that it is acceptable for a political unit, through its government, to equally promote the interests of all inhabitants of that unit, but if you detect favouritism towards one of the components of the population of that unit, then it is not acceptable?

Senator Grafstein: In part.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: How can you reconcile agreeing with Senator Gigantès, in part, and the notion of affirmative action by various governments?

Senator Grafstein: Again, I personally do not have any problem with examining issues of equality and designing programs to develop conditions of equality, as Tocqueville said. An example would be the native people of Canada. I have no problem seeking to promote policies that increase economic opportunity and conditions of equality for native people. That is a priority. However, if you then ask me if I am in favour of self-determination, that is where I begin asking questions because I do not think it is necessary to embrace those principles to accomplish the economic equality that each Canadian is entitled to, and deserves.

Therefore, honourable senator, I do not have a problem reconciling that issue. I have a problem with the larger question of where you take the issue from there, and how you organize that part of our society in a different way. They are different notions.

On motion of Senator Ghitter, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN FOREIGN POLICY

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion, as modified, of the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to consider Canada's foreign policy including international trade and international assistance;

That the document entitled: "Guidance Paper for the Special Joint Parliamentary Committee reviewing Canadian Foreign Policy," be referred to the committee;

That the committee be directed to consult broadly and to analyze the issues discussed in the above-mentioned document, and to make recommendations in their report concerning the objectives and conduct of Canada's foreign policy;

That the committee be composed of fifteen members of the House of Commons and seven members of the Senate;

That the committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting of any or all of its proceedings;

That notwithstanding the usual practices of this House, if either the Senate or the House of Commons is not sitting when an interim report of the committee is completed, the committee shall deposit its report with the clerks of both houses; and said report shall thereupon be deemed to have been presented to both Houses;

That the committee present its final report no later than October 31, 1994; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, a careful reading of the statement by the Minister of Foreign Affairs when introducing this motion in the House of Commons, as well as that of the Minister of International Trade during the debate on the motion, and finally of the document entitled "Guidance Paper for the Special Joint Parliamentary Committee Reviewing Canadian Foreign Policy" can only leave honourable senators feeling some concern for the seemingly impossible task which the government is asking of those who will serve on the joint committee. The remarks made yesterday by the Leader of the Government in the Senate only serve to confirm this impression. The joint committee's mandate is vague and broad, without any specific direction, and leaves the unfortunate impression that the whole idea was put together in haste, and with little preparation.

The government's answer to this assessment will no doubt be that it is living up to its promise to consult, consult and consult. One wonders whether this is to be an endless exercise. With so many task forces announced — well over a dozen in the budget alone — the government has embarked on a privatization program never seen before: that of public policy.

One looks in vain in Mr. Ouellet's statement for some positive inkling of what the government itself sees as Canada's role in international affairs. He promises "an independent foreign policy" but does not say of what it is to be independent. In fact, this high-sounding slogan is soon contradicted by his more realistic assertion that:

> ...whether we talk of the economy, of international security, of respect for international law, no nation can stand alone. We face common burdens and share links that cannot be severed.

If the Liberal's Red Book can still be considered a reliable guide, then it is there that one will find what Mr. Ouellet is talking about. It says that Canadians —

> ...do not want Canadian foreign policy to be determined solely through special personal relationships between world leaders.

and in a typically snide comment, one reads that the Liberals will reject —

> ...a camp-follower approach in favour of pursuing a partnership with the United States...

This is a not too subtle reference to the excellent working relationships which existed between the Reagan and Bush administrations and the Mulroney government, on which Senator Angus so eloquently expanded yesterday. The Liberals somehow resent the fact that the two countries with the closest trade and social ties in the world had their respective leaders develop personal relationships between them. I suppose that they long for the days when Prime Minister Trudeau and President Nixon were sniping at each other, conveniently forgetting that a number of policies implemented by the United States at the time were detrimental to this country and, as Senator Angus reminded us, more often than not implemented without prior consultation. I suppose the Liberals want to forget that Prime Minister Pearson had a special relationship with President Kennedy, St. Laurent with Truman, and Mackenzie King with Franklin Roosevelt. I am not aware that Canada has suffered as a result; on the contrary.

I suspect that by "independent foreign policy," Mr. Ouellet and his party want to cater to that narrow form of Canadian nationalism which is largely based on a distrust of anything American, period. In his lengthy address, which lasted one hour and 10 minutes, Mr. Ouellet spent only four short paragraphs on Canada's relations with the United States, and in an embarrassingly patronizing fashion at that. Let me quote just a couple of his gems:

> We believe Canadian experience, particularly our approach to multilateralism, can prove useful to the Americans as they develop new perspectives.

How true, but not in the sense intended, coming as it does from a senior member of the Liberal Party which fought NAFTA tooth and nail.

Mr. Ouellet then trumpets again his favourite catch phrase:

> I also indicated to Mr. Christopher that this government was determined to set its own independent course in foreign policy.

How Mr. Christopher must have been shaken by this pledge as, along with so many others on both sides of the border, he tried to assess whether Canada's new government had any foreign policy at all. It was not so long ago that the Prime Minister was taking our troops out of Bosnia, then changed his mind. It was only recently that the Prime Minister and the Minister for Foreign Affairs said that Canada would not support air strikes by NATO, and then signed a protocol agreeing to them. For years the Liberals vehemently opposed cruise missile tests over Canadian territory; but no sooner had they formed the government than they acquiesced to them.

"But you don't understand," Liberals will reply. "We had a debate in Parliament and the general consensus was to stay in Bosnia and allow the cruise missile testing." Is this what the Liberals call leadership? Consult, always consult, before doing anything, and then only after counting who is for and who is against — that and the occasional phone call from the President of the United States.

The Liberals have a complex about the United States. Instead of recognizing the unique advantages Canada derives from having the U.S. as a neighbour, advantages unlike those existing between any other two countries, they do what they can to create scares, suggesting that agreements of any sort with our neighbour are another abdication of sovereignty. The party that historically has promoted free trade fought the free trade agreement largely because it was with the United States, thereby catering to that narrow view of Canadian nationalism that so permeates its ranks.

Senator Gigantès: We opposed it because it was a badly written, badly negotiated agreement.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then it was accepted without change.

Another indication of their attitude toward the United States is found in a most curious statement in The Gazette of this morning, referring to Mr. Chrétien's trip to Mexico. This is his first official visit outside the country since he became Prime Minister. It reads in part:

> Choosing Mexico over the traditional first state visit to the United States is significant, said Canadian ambassador David Winfield.

Yes, it is certainly significant.

One must pray that the committee will give a high priority to our relations with the United States and confirm the great value Canadians derive from them, rather than take its lead from the pettiness of this government.

On the positive side, in his speech supporting this motion Mr. Ouellet made some thoughtful comments on human rights and economic interests. It is too facile, as he said, to have "a foreign policy aimed solely at promoting human rights and their values while ignoring Canada's other interests" or "a foreign policy that would serve only Canada's economic interests." As he said then:

> It is far too easy and dangerous to simplify the debate in this manner. In so doing, we would only compromise this country's foreign policy. Of course, our economic interests are important. Of course, we want to promote human rights. Nevertheless we do not have the right to impose one at the expense of the other. Insecurity, instability and war are detrimental to international trade. Human rights, democracy and good governance are the best defences of peace and security.

To find an acceptable balance between our values and our economic interests is probably the committee's biggest challenge, and we must all hope that it can meet it.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, the minister seems to have already prejudiced the debate on this fundamental issue, based on an interview granted to Le Droit and published in the March 16 edition of that newspaper, which was the day after the minister's statement in the House.

In that interview, the minister is quoted as saying categorically that:

> ...the government will certainly not link its assistance to the respect of human rights, which was the policy stated by the previous government at the Commonwealth Summit in Harare, back in 1991.

According to Mr. Ouellet, Prime Minister Mulroney made:

> ...a serious mistake by publicly making a big fuss and passing judgment on the behaviour of some governments.

Mr. Ouellet concludes by saying that:

> ...it is preferable to maintain respectful, if not friendly contacts with these governments so as to pursue the dialogue.

What naive simplicity, not to say simplism; what disdain for the millions throughout the world who are deprived of their most fundamental rights; what blatant contradiction with the spirit of openness demonstrated only 24 hours earlier.

[English]

• (1350)

When questioned in the House of Commons on this flagrant contradiction, Mr. Ouellet could only fall back on the suggestion that the newspaper report might not have been factual, although he did not deny it.

The Prime Minister, however, was more forthcoming:

> ...if we refuse to do business with every country having a political system that is not to our liking, thus we will not be doing business with very many countries. We are monitoring the human rights situation in China, but it is equally important — and this may be the best way to improve human rights in countries such as this — that we do business with them to open the country up to the world.

Honourable senators, I do not envy the joint committee having to examine such a crucial matter with such grossly simplistic statements before it.

Mr. Chrétien is going to China in November. Mr. Christopher has just returned, and his main mission was to gather information on China's human rights record to guide President Clinton in his decision as to whether or not to renew preferred trading privileges presently enjoyed by China with the United States, and which run out on June 3. Mr. Christopher's trip was not a success. He was snubbed and effectively told to mind his own business.

Mr. Chrétien has obviously been following this matter carefully and, accordingly, has decided not to raise the matter of Chinese dissidents and the violation of their human rights by his hosts. Let the Americans burn themselves on that one. Canadians will not touch it because, you see, we have an independent foreign policy.

Senator Kinsella: Based on principles.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What a contrast with the position the Liberals took when in opposition. Following the tragedy of Tiananmen Square, the Conservative government expressed its strong disapproval by imposing measures aimed at cutting back on economic and official contacts with China. "Not enough," said the Liberals at the time. "Canada must be more blunt in its reprimand." And now? "Well you see," says Mr. Chrétien, "we are a small country. I cannot even get provincial premiers to listen to me. How do you expect me to do better with China?" Well, then, what about the support of the embargo on Haiti? "Oh," says Mr. Chrétien, "that is different. They are a small country, and we do not trade with them very much." He and his ministers repeat, in no uncertain terms, that the government has but one priority: jobs, but jobs at any price.

In this morning's Gazette there is a very disturbing report.

> Chinese community leaders say they fear Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi plans to send 4,500 rejected refugee claimants back to China to curry favour with the communist regime in Beijing.
> It's all part of a cynical plan by the new Liberal government to sacrifice Canada's traditional human rights concerns to help smooth the way for Canadian companies eager to do business in China's huge, fast-growing economy, the Chinese Canadian leaders say.
> "For Canada to degrade itself to this level, just for a few dollars in economic gain, is very sad," Kenneth Cheung, president of the Montreal Chinese Professional and Business People's Association, said in an interview yesterday.

> Instead of pandering to the regime in Beijing, Cheung said, Canada should "live up to its traditional position of playing a leadership role in international human rights commitments" — particularly at a time when Washington is considering trade sanctions against China.
> The asylum-seekers have been in Canada since the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre. They weren't deported by the former Conservative government because of concerns they could suffer reprisals.
> Marchi said yesterday he wants to decide once and for all whether to deport the Chinese asylum-seekers by next summer.
>
> A decision to deport them might make for a smoother meeting between Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Premier Li Peng in China this fall.
> But Marchi denied the government is considering deporting the Chinese to create good will with the Chinese government.
> "We want to clarify that status whether the Prime Minister goes to China or whether he does not," he said. "That's not in the equation."
> Still, Marchi claimed that the human-rights situation in China has improved.

The article refers to Walter Chi Yan Tom, a refugee lawyer and president of the Chinese Neighborhood Society of Montreal, asking this question:

> "If these people are not refugees, why the hell has Canada not sent them back before?"

He continued on in the article to say:

> "That's the real question. What has changed today? Is China's human-rights record all that much better today? The only real change is economic change."
> Ottawa, he charged, "is sacrificing rights for dollars."

Later, the article states:

> Tom said local Chinese leaders have detected other "worrying signs" that Ottawa is preparing to send the claimants home.
>
> Tom cited Foreign Minister Andre Ouellet's statement last November that the Tiananmen Square massacre, in which hundreds were killed, should now be seen in a different light.
> He also cited Chrétien's statement last week that Canada doesn't have the muscle to sway the Chinese, except through the positive influence of increased trade.

Finally, a quotation from The Toronto Star of today. At a meeting of the policy forum, Minister of International Trade Roy MacLaren concluded his remarks by saying:

> And don't expect the government to raise human rights issues one-on-one with important trading partners like China.

Honourable senators, one must wonder how many of the unemployed Canadian citizens and residents who came to Canada to flee homelands because of human rights violations, and who are now despairing for relatives and friends still living under repressive regimes, will be pleased to know that the Liberal Party has completely reversed its concern with fundamental rights — the very party that gave Canada its own Charter of Rights — in order to increase this country's trade surplus.

Honourable senators, I urge the minister not only to read the statement made by Senator Di Nino yesterday, following his return from the World Parliamentary Convention in Tibet, but to distribute copies of it to his cabinet colleagues so that they can reflect on the brutal change in traditional Liberal caring for the unfortunate people in the world — "sacrificing rights for dollars," as Mr. Tom so well put it.

• (1400)

The committee certainly has its work cut out for it, and one wishes it well, although the government could have made its task easier by forming only one committee to examine both defence and foreign policies, as the two are inextricably linked. It even recognizes this in the terms of reference which include authority for this committee to meet with the one charged with reviewing Canada's defence policy.

Why did the government not urge a joining of the two already existing parliamentary committees on foreign affairs, rather than duplicating them and effectively putting the existing ones in limbo? It is obvious that when it comes to consultation, costs in both time, money and duplication are not subject to the same discipline as those imposed by the Minister of Finance on the unemployed and senior citizens.

The Leader of the Government was asked yesterday about the costs and did not have a ready reply, although, as she reminded us, in situations similar to this one the House of Commons has been called on to pay two-thirds and the Senate one-third, a reflection of the representations of each house. I am not aware that there is any provision for this joint committee in the Senate's budget. I hope that our representatives on both the defence and foreign policy committees will alert those responsible of this, and not commit the Senate to any expenditure without a budget having been approved and at least submitted to the Committee on Internal Economy. Our committee budgets will hardly suffice for our own purposes in the next fiscal year, and I doubt if senators would like to see any of those funds diverted to the joint committees under discussion.

Finally, a few remarks on the participation of senators on this committee. Both the Bloc Québécois and Reform Party severely chastised the government for creating a joint committee on foreign policy. Mr. Bouchard deplores our presence because we:

...are not in tune with the contemporary everyday reality of electoral democracy; it is not really worth knowing what the senators think. We can do anything and not bother about what the senators think.

Not to be outdone, the Reform Party spokesman, Mr. Mills, added his comments as follows:

The public view — of the Senate

— is one of being a bunch of members overpaid, big spenders, political appointments, no credibility, no accountability, and no constituents to represent, they —

that is, senators,

— have no credentials other than political. They are out of touch and they have no constituents. Their only role is as consultants and advisers but not as equal participants. They will immediately affect the credibility of this review.

Let me just comment on that last sentence, the other blatherings not being even worthy of such, they being authored by a member of a political party whose much vaunted code of ethics is obviously seriously lacking in anything resembling an effort at civility.

Senator Andreychuk, who has many distinguished accomplishments in law, the academics, human rights and the public service, was Canada's ambassador to Portugal when she was summoned to the Senate. Senator Bolduc held senior positions in the government of Quebec and in the Quebec public service at a time when Quebec was expanding its trade and cultural presence abroad. Senator Carney and Senator Kelleher have both served with distinction as ministers of International Trade.

I am not very good at praising Liberals, but who can ignore the experience and knowledge gained as Secretary of State for External Affairs on two occasions that Senator MacEachen will bring to the committee? The opposition in the House of Commons knows that its narrow view of Canada will be overwhelmed by the abilities that the Senate is sending to the joint committee, and that is the real reason they resent our presence on that committee.

I have no doubt that their annoyance will increase constantly as they are overwhelmed by our colleagues in the months ahead. By their reaction, they will help justify the important place of the Senate in Canada's parliamentary system.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES, 1993-1994

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (B)), presented in the Senate on March 22, 1994.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, the report of the National Finance Committee on Supplementary Estimates (B) is now before us. The committee's report, which was circulated yesterday, indicates that the Supplementary Estimates (B) are the second and final set of Supplementary Estimates for the 1993-94 fiscal year. The government is seeking Parliament's approval for appropriations of $868.253 million from its reserves, of which $835.118 million is budgetary expenditures and $33.135 million is non-budgetary expenditures.

I should emphasize that these Estimates are really a tidying up of the Main Estimates in which a number of figures are allocated to various departments through these Supplementary Estimates. Statutory expenditures, which appear in the Estimates for information purposes only, are lower by $3.49 billion — $3.483 billion budgetary and $7.3 million non-budgetary — than the amounts tabled in previous Estimates for 1993-94.

There is a fascinating phrase in here. It says that there is a negative amount of $2.622 billion. A negative amount, I understand, means that the government will be actually spending that much money less than it had anticipated in the original Estimates.

Senator Olson: Senator Murray should be listening to this.

Senator Doody: Yes, but when one sees how we arrive at these numbers, it becomes quite different.

The budgetary estimates to date total $158.761 billion, some $700 million less than the expenditure framework of $159.5 billion that was set out by the previous government in the budget of April of 1993.

The committee's report explains that the Minister of Finance, in his budget of February 22, 1994, made some major provisions — and this is sort of interesting — for expenditures in future years that increase total budgetary expenditures and the deficit for the 1993-94 fiscal year, even though they do not appear in the Estimates.

• (1410)

There is an amount of $903 million set aside for potential provincial claims under the Fiscal Stabilization Program of the Department of Finance, which is a notional amount, I understand. A further $700 million has been set aside to provide for the cancellation of the helicopter program, for costs associated with the closure and reduction of Canadian forces bases and units, and other restructuring within the Department of National Defence.

These amounts of $903 million and $700 million have been added on to the deficit for the current year, although the money will not actually be spent until later and, indeed, no one is quite sure what the numbers will be. As a result, total budgetary expenditures for 1993-94 are now expected to be $160 billion, or a little more than that.

I would draw the attention of honourable senators to the tables prepared by the Treasury Board secretariat that form part of the committee's report. These are appended to the report that was tabled yesterday. These include a listing of voted items over $5 million, a summary of the 1993-94 expenditure framework and estimates tabled, a summary of supply to date, and a listing and categorization of the 36 $1 votes included in these Supplementary Estimates.

Supplementary Estimates (B) include a substantial number of expenditure increases, as well as reductions in statutory expenditures, covering some 52 departments and agencies as well as Parliament itself. I note a $5-million increase for the House of Commons. I might say that there is no increase for the Senate, which has been our custom over the years. Indeed, over the past three years we have managed to reduce our expenses, and I fully expect that, under the new chairmanship, this admirable pattern will continue.

Senator Frith: The chairmanship of which committee?

Senator Doody: Of the Internal Economy Committee. It should be expanded to become an "external" economy committee to look after the finances of the other place as well. Apparently we do a much better job!

The Supplementary Estimates (B) include a substantial number of expenditures, some of which I have outlined. The previous set of Estimates was approved early last June, and Treasury Board has had to rely on its Government Contingencies Vote, Vote 5 — which Senator Stewart and I, and others, have always found to be a fascinating source of entertainment and information — to fund urgent government department spending requirements since that time. Pages 24-27 of the Supplementary Estimates, pages 25-29 in the French version, list the expenditures by department. They total a little over $309 million, for which funds were advanced from the Treasury Board Contingencies Vote.

I might note that this table was introduced last year in response to a specific recommendation by the Senate's National Finance Committee. The effect of approving the appropriation bill for Supplementary Estimates (B) will be to replenish the Contingencies Vote by the $309.2 million previously advanced.

Honourable senators will also have noticed that these Supplementary Estimates refer to the departments and agencies as they existed in the 1993-94 Main Estimates and Supplementary Estimates (A), prior to the major departmental reorganization of June of 1993. This will ensure consistent reporting in the 1993-94 Public Accounts to be tabled next autumn. The new department structure is reflected in the 1994-95 Main Estimates documents that were tabled last month.

Your committee reviewed the Supplementary Estimates at its meeting on Thursday, March 17, at which officials of the Treasury Board secretariat appeared as witnesses. A number of questions were raised concerning some of the $1 votes and the $13-billion increase in the expected 1993-94 deficit. In particular, these officials were asked to explain some of the expenditures and asset revaluations to be charged to 1993-94, shown in the Public Accounts but which do not appear in any of the Estimates tabled to date. There were also questions about the effects of the higher deficit on the government's borrowing requirements.

I should point out to honourable senators that there will be further opportunities to examine the deficit and the government's fiscal policies in general during debate and committee review of the 1994-95 borrowing authority bill that has just been introduced, and which will be received in this house shortly.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald, that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION OF LUTHERAN CONGREGATIONS— BILL TO INCORPORATE—FIRST READING

Leave having been given to revert to Introduction and First Reading of Private Bills:

Hon. H.A. Olson presented Bill S-5, to incorporate the Canadian Association of Lutheran Congregations.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Olson, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1993-94

SECOND READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-19, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on second reading of Bill C-19. My comments on this bill follow directly the comments made by my honourable colleague Senator Doody, the Chairman of the National Finance Committee. The Supplementary Estimates (B) were referred to that committee on March 15, and officials from Treasury Board appeared on March 17 and gave explanations which I believe were satisfactory to the committee.

Senator Doody gave details concerning the Supplementary Estimates, so it is not necessary for me to go into that matter. However, I wish to point out that there were increases of $140 million to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans because of the problems in Newfoundland and the need to support the difficulties arising as a result of the moratorium on northern cod. There were also increases of some $106 million because of the additional peace-keeping initiatives in Bosnia.

There were some notable decreases: $1.9 billion in unemployment insurance payments; $1.3 billion to the costs of servicing the federal debt because of lower interest rates; $718 million in fiscal equalization payments because provincial revenues subject to equalization are expected to decrease; and $291 million in old age security, guaranteed income support and spouse's allowance payments due to lower inflation and fewer recipients than expected.

Honourable senators, I recommend second reading of this bill to the Senate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Molgat, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

• (1420)

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1994-95

SECOND READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-20, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-20, which is Appropriation Act No. 1, 1994-95, provides the interim supply for the first three months of the new fiscal year that will begin on April 1. The form of the bill is the usual one for interim supply bills.

The 1994-95 Estimates were tabled in the Senate on February 24 and were immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which will provide a detailed examination of the Estimates as time goes on.

This appropriation bill contains $13,754 million worth of voted items that are required to meet government expenditures to the end of June, while the Main Estimates are being reviewed by the various committees. A second appropriation bill will be tabled prior to June 30, 1994, to secure the release of the balance of the spending authorities outlined in the Estimates.

This bill contains a general proportion of three-twelfths of all the votes, plus additional proportions for some 36 votes. The additional proportions are required mainly to meet payments in accordance with certain agreements, and the need in other instances to make major payments before the end of June.

I want to point out clearly, however, that, as usual, in no case is Parliament being asked to pass the entire amount of a vote, nor is it being asked to support the entire amount of a vote. That is a matter which will be studied by the committee, with the exception of the two votes that have been referred to other committees. I refer to those that deal with Official Languages and the Library of Parliament.

What we are asking for now is enough money to be able to carry on until June 30, pending final approval. If honourable senators wish any further information, I shall do my best to provide it.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, there is little to say at this point in the supply process. This is the usual interim supply bill that comes to Parliament at around this time of year to bridge the gap between now and the passing of the main supply bill or appropriation bill in the parliamentary calendar. I suggest that if Senator Molgat were to assure us that this bill is, to paraphrase Senator Frith as closely as I can, in the standard form and condition and there are no surprises contained therein, we would be most pleased to pass the bill. We could then get into more detailed debate on the Main Estimates as the year progressed.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I have to depend here on the department —

Senator Doody: I never weaseled about like that. I always gave my complete assurance.

Senator Molgat: I must confess that I have not compared every comma and semicolon to guarantee that it is so, but to the best of my knowledge and according to the assurances I have received, it is in the standard form.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Molgat, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, pursuant to notice of February 24, 1994, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and estimates as are referred to it.

Motion agreed to.

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT AS PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARIAN AND DESIGNATION AS PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARIAN EMERITUS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, today it is my pleasure to pay tribute in this chamber to a very special individual who has given more than three decades of dedicated service to Parliament and parliamentarians. I am speaking, of course, of our Parliamentary Librarian, Mr. Erik Spicer, who has joined us today in the gallery with his wife, Helen.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: As all honourable colleagues in this chamber will agree, the Parliamentary Library is much more to us and to Canada than just a storage facility for books. Back in 1960, at the age of 34, the youngest Parliamentary Librarian ever appointed in our country, Mr. Spicer set about moving the library into the modern age. He introduced new methods, new computerized systems and, most important, new books, new periodicals, new publications; so that all parliamentarians had at their fingertips the kind of information and expertise they needed to do their jobs.

As a colleague said yesterday in the House of Commons, we cannot separate a library from the business of making laws, and that is something which Erik Spicer understands perhaps better than anyone else on the Hill. In fact, by providing legislators with, if not the best, then one of the best parliamentary libraries in the world, Mr. Spicer has helped all of us to make better laws because we were able to base those laws on clear, accurate and comprehensive information. I am sure each one in this house can recall an instance, or several instances where, at the last minute with 10 minutes to go, we have put the library to the test and have always received the kind of accurate and fast response without which we cannot do our jobs.

Keeping the library on the cutting edge and always current has, of course, meant handling the odd controversy over the years about certain publications. Some may remember the headline in the Vancouver Sun in November of 1961 in reference to the library obtaining a copy of Henry Miller's book, Tropic of Cancer.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: Pretty stodgy stuff by today's standards!

Senator Fairbairn: Listen to this: The headline read, "It's Too Spicy for Spicer but He Keeps it for MPs."

I have some personal recollections of those heady moments when I started as a young reporter in the Press Gallery in 1962, so I have grown up on the Hill with Mr. Spicer.

I can recall a time when we were all extremely interested to learn that the Parliamentary Library had a subscription to Playboy magazine.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: What is that?

Senator Molgat: For Mr. Spicer's exclusive use?

Senator Fairbairn: Oh, no, not for the use of the chief librarian, honourable colleagues. Evidently, a number of parliamentarians had expressed an interest in reading about the philosophy that lay behind that particular magazine. The trouble was that the copies would be lent out, but they seldom made it back into the library. Showing his ever-present sensitivity and presence of mind, therefore, Erik Spicer took the decision to hold that particular magazine in a very special place so that it would be available for parliamentarians. In short, it was put in with the rare book collection! That, I am sure, is one of the memories Mr. Spicer will carry with him into a well-earned and very well-deserved retirement.

During his time on the Hill in the Parliamentary Library, Mr. Spicer has served eight prime ministers, hundreds of ministers, members, senators, and literally thousands of staff members. He has been a friend to everyone, and has always been ready and willing to share his knowledge, humour and expertise.

Honourable senators, if I may be allowed a personal observation, I have never seen anyone retain such continuous joy in their work as did Mr. Spicer. His joy and enthusiasm remained undiminished throughout the years of his time on the Hill. He simply loved his work and the tools with which he worked, which were the books. He respected tremendously the knowledge and self-fulfilment that comes with reading and being able to read. He has been an unfailing supporter and advocate of the cause of literacy, for which I will always be profoundly thankful.

Honourable senators, Mr. Spicer leaves this place with our admiration and, most of all, our sincere and warmest thanks for a job well done.

Mr. Spicer, we salute you, and wish you and Helen and your family all the best in the years ahead. You will always have a place in our memory and a place in this chamber on special occasions.

To that end, honourable senators, I am delighted to present the following motion, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Lynch-Staunton:

> That the Senate desires to record their deep appreciation of the long and distinguished service of Mr. Erik John Spicer as the Chief Executive Officer of the Library of Parliament; and
> That in acknowledgement of the dignity, dedication and profound learning with which he has graced the office, he be designated an honourary officer of the Senate as "Parliamentary Librarian Emeritus," with an entree to the Senate on occasions of ceremony.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I feel very privileged to second this motion because the Senate today is a much brighter and more cheerful place. It is brightened measurably by the presence in the gallery of the man whom Prime Minister John Diefenbaker appointed in November 1960 as Canada's fifth Parliamentary Librarian, the youngest to hold that position — and the fifth has been there the longest.

Anyone ambitious enough to outdistance the incumbent must be prepared to spend more than 30 years stamping outgoing books and pleading with senators reluctant to return the library's treasures within six months of the due date.

• (1410)

There are some other requirements: Framed degrees from a batch of well-chosen schools and universities, a major's rank in a very proper regiment, a string of interests that includes not only history and library science, but politics, foreign affairs, and — note this one with care because I will come back to it — investigative journalism. Combine these exotic preoccupations with an insatiable yen to travel and a generous determination to pass on his skills by teaching others in the developing countries.

Fortunately for us, we have no urgent need to have a new Parliamentary Librarian prove his talents and intentions by April 8. The good news is that Erik Spicer, on the eve of his retirement, has consented to act as Librarian Emeritus. The apparatus for creating such a new, important and very senior post is already in place.

My own admiration for our distinguished friend goes back to the time when I knew him only by reputation — a snappy, knowledgeable, versatile librarian who, of all things, knew that there were times when you had to throw the book away and follow your instincts and hunches. Had this not been the case, Erik Spicer would never have built for Canada the Centre for Research which is now the jewel of the library, unequalled in its special facilities for the operation of Parliament and those charmed people who serve it.

My first contact with Mr. Spicer was during the GST debate — one of the few pleasant moments I can recall during that sad episode — when Senator Meighen and I, on one of the few occasions when we could escape from the whip's clutches, decided to visit the library which neither one of us had seen before. Like all first-time visitors, we stood in awe of what has been called — and quite rightly — the most beautiful room on the Hill, with its marvellous dome, and with Queen Victoria supervising its privileged occupants so that they do not stray from their important tasks.

We timidly identified ourselves and asked the receptionist if the Parliamentary Librarian could receive us. He no doubt had better things to do and, as it took the receptionist a good five minutes to return to us, he obviously was doing them. Perhaps it took him that long to get over his irritation at leaving more productive pursuits to meet with two craven-hearted senators who were about to support the taxation of books. However, he could not have received us with more courtesy and warmth, so much so that we even considered asking him for refugee status rather than returning to our whip's suffocating embrace.

My admiration swelled when, not long after my arrival in this chamber, I learned that if you knew and used Erik Spicer's library in the way you should, it was possible, upon catching a senator opposite in a gross error early on in an important speech, to have a fleet-footed Page carry a request to the library and return with an answer before the poor orator had finished speaking. One could then rise, humbly ask if the opponent would take a question, and only then let the guillotine fall. That, honourable senators, is really library service.

For all of this, the Parliamentary Librarian carries the rank of a Deputy Minister and is surrounded by experts of every sort. He freely admits to "social and administrative advantages which give the job a highly desirable degree of independence."

The degree increases, of course, with the added cachet of emeritus rank. Perhaps now Mr. Spicer will be able to give vent to his status as investigative journalist and find the answers to some of those questions that have bothered even him from time to time.

One would like to know, for instance, who turned out the gas lights at 3:30 in the morning on February 28, 1876, at the costume ball to mark the opening of the Spicers' other home in Ottawa.

One would also like to know why it has never been proved or disproved that wartime saboteurs started the great fire of 1915 from which the library — wonder of wonders — escaped with hardly a smudge.

Erik Spicer understands better than anyone the Senate's need and right to know such things. He has spoiled us beyond reason and we thank him and his wife Helen, who is also a librarian, but in a more traditional sense since she still borrows books while Erik keeps buying them. We thank them, and we thank their family for sparing him the time to do all that he has done and will do for us.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, since November of 1960, Erik John Spicer has been this country's Parliamentary Librarian. His retirement is one of those occasions when anyone who knows the man would agonize over the proper approach to comment: whether to celebrate the worth of all those contributions he has made or to lament the in-house loss of a mover and shaker, the departure of a key administrator of our democratic process. Choosing is made easier by the conviction that Mr. Spicer would not have failed to prepare for continuation well into the future of the splendid operational procedures he has introduced and presided over for 34 years.

Yesterday, many of those who have worked closely with our librarian feted him and his wife and family, and many of them mentioned that he is the last of the famous officers whose order-in-council appointments were made by Prime Minister John George Diefenbaker. Through the terms of Prime Ministers Pearson and Trudeau, Prime Ministers Turner and Clark, Prime Ministers Mulroney and Campbell, and Prime Minister Chrétien, our librarian, with almost vice-regal demeanour, has overseen the safeguarding of all the records and commentaries, opinions and adjudications, protests and damnations of this place, the other place, and all the places round about.

When I talked to him the other day about the revival, after 20 years, of the Joint Committee on the Parliamentary Library, he was in great form. Alert. Organized. Impatient. I had no doubt, honourable senators, that this selfless Canadian, had we asked him, was equipped, prepared and willing to serve just a little bit longer into the term of Prime Minister Charest.

His duties here have been stretched far beyond the requirements of the job. We find him, over the years, hard at work in places like Geneva, Paris, Vienna, and Strasbourg. Bonn, Lagos, Rome, Nairobi — pushing the technological development of libraries not only in his own country but throughout the free world.

At one point in his curriculum vitae, you will find that Major Erik John Spicer did work for the Centre for the Presidency. Small wonder that he would be considered an expert on the office itself. He has been president of most of the associations and committees that have occupied his interest in a lifetime of public service.

In the last week or two, I have talked about Spicer to a number of people here and in Toronto. Almost all of them have interrupted me to say: "Erik Spicer? Oh, he's a friend of mine." It would be difficult to find a higher tribute than that. I know all of my colleagues here will join me in wishing him health, happiness and Godspeed with his memoirs.

• (1420)

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, perhaps I could say that I claim a proprietorial interest in Erik Spicer. Of all who have spoken today, I am the one who was here when he arrived. The story is told of an aboriginal American who, when asked if any of his relatives came over on the Mayflower, said, "No, but all of them were on the beach when the ship came in." Honourable senators, I was here on the Hill when Erik Spicer came.

He was the most highly qualified Parliamentary Librarian ever. Indeed, some nasty people would say he was the only qualified one in the succession of Parliamentary Librarians.

I have gained much from the library, not that I was a total intellectual nonentity when I came, but it is always important to sharpen up those capacities and facilities which one has. We must recognize the importance of the library because we have engraved in stone across the way a quotation of Bacon: "Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man."

God knows how much the library has had to do with the literary emanations of senators and members of the lower House. Even I have called on it from time to time. Even I have checked a quotation from time to time. If my memory serves me right, there were a couple of times I did not have them precisely!

Ralph Waldo Emerson said that meek young men grow up in libraries — not so Erik Spicer. He is not a meek man by any means. He is not a retiring man. He is enormously popular. In that I agree with Senator Doyle. Wherever you go in the world, some people may mention Pierre Trudeau, older ones remember Lester Pearson, some who like hockey will mention Gretzky, but they all know Spicer, a great fellow. I agree with them.

My leader told us where he went during the GST debate. I wish to God I had thought of that. Certainly, this was not a place I wanted to be at that time. It reminded me, but only a little, of what F. Scott Fitzgerald had one of his characters say: "I've been drunk for a week and I thought sitting in a library might sober me up." That is not why I go to libraries. It is not why I borrow books.

I do recall that David MacDonald, my fellow Islander, came to visit me one time in the West Block where I had a big office and said, "I hear Spicer is sending over one of his staff here." I said, "Why?" He replied, "Well, they say about half the library's books are over in Macquarrie's office." I returned most of them promptly. I profited from them. There is still one quote they have not found for me, and I guess they will not do so, now that I have only six months left in this place.

This man has been an excellent person, a friend. I speak now not only of him but of all the library people who, through the years, at the other end of the telephone, proved to be helpful, knowledgeable and considerate. Without them, the work of these parliamentary places would suffer a great deal.

I join with my colleagues in celebrating this event. I am delighted to wish these two most excellent people all the best in the years ahead.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I will not make a habit of trying to add to such great testimonials as the ones we have heard today. However, there is a reason not only why I should but why I want to join in the tribute that is being paid to Erik Spicer.

The Library of Parliament Act spells out the duties of the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Speaker of the Senate in relation to the Library of Parliament and the obligation on them to approve its estimates. In the case of Mr. Spicer, however, I am sure that Speakers regarded such interaction not as an obligation but rather as an opportunity to share in his knowledge and experience.

The motion — which I am sure will be agreed to today — shows our deep respect for the professionalism and energy that he demonstrated in order to make the Library of Parliament what it is today.

[English]

Mr. Spicer, we thank you for serving Parliament so well. We wish you and Mrs. Spicer many years of health, happiness and enjoyable occupations. We shall miss you, but then we are reassured because, as Parliamentary Librarian Emeritus we shall see you often.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

COMMUNICATIONS

CANADIAN MAGAZINE INDUSTRY— PROPOSED SPLIT-RUN ENFORCEMENT MEASURES

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, shortly after one o'clock I received a copy of "A Question of Balance: Report of the Task Force on the Canadian Magazine Industry." Obviously, it has not been possible to read it all, or to begin to read it all, but it does not all look bad.

I should like to quote from a release by the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association in Toronto on March 24, 1994, which states:

> No new split-run magazines: that would be the effect of changes to the Excise tax Act proposed in the final report of the federal Task Force on the Canadian magazine industry. And while the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association says it would welcome the measure, a brief by the Association calls the decision to exempt Sports Illustrated from the proposed new rule "baffling".
> Sports Illustrated is being rewarded for exploiting a regulatory loophole, even though the magazine's split-run edition has been in clear contravention of Canadian cultural policy from its very first issue, says Jeff Shearer, chair of the association's political affairs committee.
> The task force was set up by the former Conservative government last spring after U.S.-owned Sports Illustrated announced its intentions to circumvent existing Canadian regulations prohibiting the importation of split-run magazines. In split-run advertising editions, the editorial material is substantially the same as in the original edition, but foreign ads are replaced by Canadian ads.

The article goes on to state:

> Under customs regulations, importing split-run editions into Canada has been prohibited for almost 30 years. But Sports Illustrated got around the existing regulations by electronically transmitting the magazine to a Canadian printer, so that the magazine itself never physically crossed the U.S.-Canada border.

Honourable senators, there are other references in this document that seem to be quite positive, but I am shocked at the proposed grandfathering of Sports Illustrated. I trust that this government will take this into consideration at its earliest opportunity.

STALAG LUFT III—FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF "THE GREAT ESCAPE"

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, as we approach the fiftieth anniversary of D-day in a couple of months I call the attention of the Senate to another fiftieth anniversary in which we commemorate a famous and important episode of World War II, one in which Canadians again played a prominent role. I refer to the breakout of Allied prisoners of war from Stalag Luft III in Poland in March 1944, otherwise known as "The Great Escape," when 76 Allied airmen brazenly tunnelled their way out of a German prisoner of war camp. They fled into the surrounding countryside in a desperate attempt to evade their pursuers, but all but three were quickly rounded up, 50 of them never to return to tell of their exploits. It is a tale of heroic and, at the same time, tragic proportions.

Starting in the early spring of 1943, the Allied air officers who were held prisoner began to construct one of the most sophisticated escape tunnels of the war. It was an engineering marvel. A Canadian, Pilot Officer Wally Floody, supervised the tunnelling. Working 30 feet beneath the surface in order to avoid detection, the POWs worked night and day in dangerous conditions to build a 336-foot tunnel that came complete with underground railways, work shops, ventilation and lighting.

Over 600 men, representing many Allied countries, worked on its construction. The moment for escape finally arrived on the night of March 24-25, 1944. While it was envisioned that upwards of 200 prisoners would crawl through the tunnel to freedom, only 76 were able to make it beyond the wire before the Germans were alerted.

For all but three of the escaped POWs, the journey was to be a short one. Within days the vast majority were rounded up. It required an enormous effort by the Germans to thwart the escape, and on that basis alone the escape should be considered an unqualified success.

However, the German high command was determined to exact a savage revenge. With the approval of Adolf Hitler, the Gestapo executed 50 of the officers, including six Canadians, as an example to other prisoners of war.

Like Allied soldiers on the battlefield, these prisoners gave their lives in the name of freedom. These men should not be forgotten, nor should all the other prisoners of war who suffered the physical and emotional hardships of the POW camps.

Tomorrow the Ex-Air Force Prisoners of War will gather from across Canada to lay a wreath at the National Cenotaph in Ottawa in memory of the 250 Allied Air Force POWs whose young lives were taken from them. I am sure that the Senate would want to acknowledge this anniversary of an example of the heroism and valour of our Canadian airmen.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this might be a good moment for me to tell you what the likely order of business will be for the next while.

As honourable senators are aware, the House of Commons will adjourn tomorrow for two weeks and will return on Monday, April 11. As far as I know at this time, there is no further legislation to come to us from the House of Commons this week, with the exception of Bill C-14 which we will be receiving this afternoon.

I have had a discussion with my honourable colleague opposite about the situation, and we are agreed on the following facts: There is no further legislation pending. The House of Commons is returning on April 11, and there is no indication that there will be any legislation from the House of Commons for us to deal with until, probably, Thursday, April 14. Logic dictates that we consider the economy of not having senators here in Ottawa, with all of the attendant travel requirements, unless there is work to do. Provided that we can deal completely with Bill C-14 this afternoon, and considering that Bill C-5 has been reported and will be completed this afternoon, then our business will also be completed here this afternoon.

Thereafter, we could return on, say, Thursday, April 14, in order to give first reading to bills and to give the necessary two days' notice before coming back again the following week. However, that did not seem too logical to us.

We have agreed, therefore, to return on Tuesday, April 19, with the understanding that we would proceed to the second reading stage of whatever bills we had received by that time. To us, in our discussions, it seemed illogical to come back three days ahead simply for the routine business.

With that understanding then, honourable senators, later this day I will propose that the Senate adjourn until Tuesday, April 19, subject always, of course, to recall if circumstances change.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1994-95

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-14, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1994.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

QUESTION PERIOD

PARLIAMENT

PROGRAM OF LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask the Leader of the Government if we can expect any significant legislation from her colleagues in the next few months, or, for that matter, at any time this year. I ask this in all seriousness, since, except for the bill ordering Vancouver dock workers back to their jobs, the few bills that have come before us to date have been what I would call mandatory and routine — and all this five months after the election. After what we have just heard from the Deputy Leader of the Government, there seems to be nothing of substance ahead.

Contrast this appalling record with what took place after the September 1984 election. On December 20, three and a half months after the election, Royal Assent was given to nine bills, and most of them arose from the new government's election commitments. Here, five months after the election, we have had nothing.

The question is important: How long will this state of inertia, not to say paralysis, continue?

Senator Frith: Let us have bills, even bad bills. That is the way the Tories did it. In their case, especially bad bills.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his question.

The government has brought forward a budget, and the legislation flowing out of that is now in the other place. We have introduced important legislation concerning the tobacco issue, and that is now passing through the system over in the House of Commons. We have also engaged in a number of extremely important exercises that will themselves produce legislation in the area of job creation and a task force that is considering the kind of reforms that we will be putting through in respect of our social programs.

Those are not issues that can be put into legislative form within a month or two. We are consulting with Canadians, and we are consulting with the provinces. Out of these consultations there will be significant legislation in these very important areas.

I can understand the frustration of the Leader of the Opposition with the way the system is working, but we know there is activity on the other side; there have been changes on the other side in terms of their rules. I am happy to say we are dealing expeditiously with the legislative schedule as it moves ahead, and I can assure you that there will be continuing legislation coming from the government in the other place.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You have just made a reference to the tobacco legislation as significant legislation. From what you are saying, I take it that we might just as well throw the Red Book away. However, if the Liberals are ignoring what they put in that document, I am not. It is full of all sorts of actions that are to be taken to correct what the Conservatives did in the past. It talks about an ethics counsellor and lobbying legislation, and about all the things that we did wrong that are about to be corrected. We want to see how those corrections will be made.

All we hear is the repeated refrain, "We are going to consult; we are going to create task forces. We are going to consult; we are going to create task forces; and then we are going to create task forces and consult."

We want to know when the key elements of the Red Book, those scurrilous insinuations regarding the previous government, will be debated here through legislation.

Senator Molgat: As soon as we can clean up the mess.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, one of the important ingredients of the election campaign and of the Red Book was a commitment to develop our legislative program with the assistance of interested Canadians, and that is what we are doing. I certainly do not consider the legislation surrounding the tobacco taxes, the regulations on the availability of cigarettes for young people and the health issues involved in that particular program as insignificant.

At any rate, honourable senators, as indicated in the Throne Speech and in the budget, which is most important, we are following very closely the recommendations contained in that document to which my honourable friend refers so frequently.

Indeed, not all of the programs that we put forward in that document have a legislative capability initially. I refer to the committees that we have set up in this Parliament to look at the important areas of national defence and foreign affairs. In the future, those areas could generate legislation, or perhaps a white paper on defence, for example.

We have a full agenda ahead of us and I am sure it will keep both this house and the other place busy.

We have also discussed among ourselves on both sides of this house other issues of importance to Canadians, which the Senate has already taken steps to address. I refer to the special references to our Senate committees of issues that are not being followed by the House of Commons. These include euthanasia and the right to die, as well as Senator Marchand's initiative on behalf of aboriginal veterans. I hope there will be more of those kinds of initiatives to occupy the time, experience and wisdom of senators on both sides of the house.

NATIONAL ELECTION

RED BOOK COMMITMENT TO APPOINT ETHICS COMMISSIONER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is a quite a simple question. It is to the point and requires no study.

There was a commitment in the Red Book to appoint an ethics commissioner. When will that be done? The answer requires no study; it is just the meeting of a commitment.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): That commitment will be met, honourable senators. I cannot give you the exact timing, but I am sure it will be soon.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSION

SUSPENSION OF OPERATION UNDER PROPOSED LEGISLATION—PROPOSED USE OF CLOSURE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, this question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is my understanding and information that the government, for the first time, has had discussions regarding invoking closure to cut off debate on Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Honourable senators, section 3 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms states that:

> Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein;

In addition, in the case of Dixon v. British Columbia (1989), Chief Justice McLachlin of the B.C. Supreme Court, now a member of the Supreme Court of Canada, stated:

> Equality of voting power is the single most important factor to be considered in determining electoral boundaries...
> Because equality of voting power is so important, it is appropriate to set limits beyond which it cannot be eroded by giving preference to other factors and considerations, such as the 25-per-cent limit applied in Canada to the federal electoral districts.

Thus, my question: Is the government aware that under the 1991 census date many of the existing federal electoral boundaries do not fall in line with the 25-per-cent deviation limit, and, therefore, not proceeding with redistribution may be a violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, or, at the very least, a denial of proper weighting of voting?

• (1500)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with regard to the legislation that the government has put forward in the House of Commons, I have no doubt whatever that it has been done with great care and with the appropriate legal advice. The honourable senator is correct that the bill has been moving in the House of Commons and is today under the rules of time allocation.

Senator Berntson: Is that closure?

Senator Fairbairn: No, that is a little different.

Senator Frith: Only when you do it.

Senator Fairbairn: There has been an effort made to get the legislation moving in order to accommodate the rules of the commission holding public hearings. The legislation will come to this house, I believe, immediately after we resume, and we will have an opportunity to study it.

Senator St. Germain: It is my understanding that the legislation would delay the redistribution process. I understand from the reply of the Honourable Leader of the Government that, in her view, the legislation will further the cause, but in fact it will delay the cause. In an earlier answer that I received on this question there was reference to a connection to the Lortie commission, a very expensive commission. I do not believe that, inasmuch as they are related, one can go without the other. Does the Honourable Leader of the Government not believe that democracy would be denied to some if we did not proceed with the recommendations of the Electoral Boundaries Commission and carry out the redistribution, as has been done historically?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, if one looks back into the records, one will find that there have been delays in this process on other occasions. In this case, there is a desire on the part of many members of the House of Commons to have an opportunity to see whether or not some of the recommendations that have been put forward in another very important commission, the Lortie commission, could be looked at and perhaps incorporated in the next round of redistribution of boundaries.

Senators will have an opportunity to express their agreement or disagreement with these proposals as soon as that bill reaches this house, which will be very soon.

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry, is the honourable senator posing a supplementary question?

Senator Ghitter: Yes, I am.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please go ahead.

Senator Ghitter: Honourable senators, recognizing that Alberta now has some 97,000 voters per riding, and considering that the largest riding in Alberta has 114,000 voters, the highest in Canada; and considering that the province of Alberta, under the Constitution, should have at least two more seats in order to have representation by population, I find it unacceptable that we would delay this provision for a further number of years, thus depriving the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario of their rightful representation in the House of Commons.

Perhaps the Honourable the Leader of the Government would use her influence to explain that situation to the government, in the hope that they will proceed with this legislation and not carry on for another five years on the basis of the 1981 census. That would be totally unfair to several regions of this country.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Ghitter, I will be more than pleased to put your representation forward.

REVISIONS TO RIDING BOUNDARIES—STATUS OF HEARINGS

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As I understand it, the leader has said that Bill C-18 will be awaiting our return on April 19. According to a recent press report, the independent commissions that are overseeing revisions to the riding boundaries in the ten provinces and the territories will have to decide for themselves whether or not to proceed with the public hearings scheduled to begin next month. I ask the Leader of the Government for her assurance that the government is not taking the Senate for granted in this situation.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I profoundly hope they will not take the Senate for granted. As is the usual case, the Senate will have an opportunity to study this legislation and put forward its —

Senator Doody: Amendments.

Senator Fairbairn: — points of view on both sides of the issue.

TOURISM

EFFECT OF BUDGET CUTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The tourism industry in Canada employs, directly or indirectly, 1.2 million people and generates approximately $28 billion in total sales annually. In fact, tourism provides approximately $11 billion in tax revenue and $8 billion in foreign exchange.

My question is: Why is the government falling into the trap of cutting its tourism budget at a time when additional financial support, especially in the area of tourism marketing, would help create jobs and additional tax revenue?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should hope the government is not falling into a trap. I know that the view of the government and its ministers on the question of tourism is that it is a vital part of our economy, not just with regard to people visiting from other countries but also with regard to job creation across this country. That interest, and the desire to promote to the maximum degree the incredible advantages of this industry to Canada, is important to this government. I believe that in future months that hope will be realized by the government.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, the return on every dollar invested in tourism marketing will lead to substantial increases in jobs and revenue, at a time when the economy needs a boost. Will the government consider seriously a presentation made by the Tourism Association of Canada to the Liberal Party caucus members on February 9, 1994 and, if so, would it consider directing the additional monies where they might count the most in generating tourism customers, namely, through a well-developed marketing program?

The evidence is clear at the moment that they are reducing the budget at a very critical time. Given that the emphasis in the Red Book is on jobs, jobs and jobs, this is, in my opinion, an opportunity to change the direction of tourism and improve the situation.

Senator Fairbairn: I will be pleased, Senator Atkins, to put that plea before the government. I have to admit that I have not received a copy of that document, and I would be glad to have such.

Senator Atkins: It went to your caucus.

AGRICULTURE

TRANSPORTATION OF GRAIN—SHORTAGE OF HOPPER CARS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, a serious situation has arisen in respect to transportation of grain. The Winnipeg Free Press characterizes it in this way: "Grain sales in peril."

We are apparently short 5,000 grain hopper cars to meet the requirements of delivering gain to markets — markets we stand to lose. We have already lost, according to the report in the Winnipeg Free Press, approximately 45,000 tonnes of barley sales to Japan. That loss raises a major problem, because grain prices have increased.

The Leader of the Opposition indicated earlier that the government might find an intriguing matter to be dealt with in the next little while. Honourable senators, this is a very serious situation that will cost the country millions of dollars. It is a difficult time for our farmers. What is the government prepared to do about this problem?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government and the ministry are aware of this difficulty in the transportation system, particularly as a result of the recent longshoremen's labour disruption.

I would say to the honourable senator that the Minister of Transport is very conscious of the problem. He is working on it. I cannot give you a detailed answer at this point. I will see what details I can put together, and perhaps I can communicate with you during our adjournment.

Senator Gustafson: Would the government be prepared to look promptly at the extension of the shipping year beyond July, if we cannot meet the requirements?

Senator Fairbairn: I will certainly ask that question of my colleagues, honourable senators.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HUMAN RIGHTS ISSUES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is on the same general subject as that of my question of a few days ago, but it is not the same question. It deals with human rights in the context of foreign affairs.

Press reports today indicate that the Prime Minister may raise the issue of human rights when he meets with President Salinas of Mexico. Is it correct to state that present government policy is to continue to raise human rights issues with foreign governments in a continental context in North America, or is it the policy of the government to raise human rights issues within a hemispheric context?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government's intention is to raise our concerns with respect to human rights issues in both a hemispheric and an international context. The Prime Minister, when asked in the House of Commons the other day, did say that he would be raising these issues in Mexico during his trip.

Two or three days ago, the honourable senator asked me if there had been a change in policy in Canada. My answer to him is that we have consistently raised concerns about human rights situations bilaterally, multilaterally and wherever they have occurred, be it Mexico or China. That is the firm intention of the Prime Minister. I am sure he will raise these issues with President Salinas.

As a side comment, honourable senators, I wish to note the profound shock and horror felt by all of us at the events that took place yesterday in Mexico causing the death of a presidential candidate.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I and my colleagues are shocked as well at the attack on the Mexican presidential candidate, Mr. Colosio.

I ask this supplementary only because the Honourable Leader of the Government got into the area, and it was a matter she had taken as notice a few days ago. I refer to the honourable senator's statement that it is a policy of the Government of Canada to make representations with respect to human rights abuses to foreign governments internationally, which I assume is more or less globally.

Would it be correct, therefore, that the statement attributed to the Prime Minister, that he would not be making representations during his visit to the People's Republic of China with respect to human rights abuses, was an aberration, or has there been a change of policy since that statement?

Senator Fairbairn: Not at all, honourable senators. The Prime Minister, in the context of the original statement, reaffirmed Canada's representations on human rights to representatives of the People's Republic of China; that is something that has been done on a number of occasions between ministers and officials meeting with representatives of that country.

The Prime Minister also indicated that one very forceful way of moving into a situation where China, and other countries, may better observe issues of concern to Canada is to engage China in activities of trading rather than to isolate that country, as has been suggested by some, although not by my honourable friend. Canada has engaged in discussions with China to assist that country in reforming its legal and judicial system, for instance.

Honourable senators, the Prime Minister has been very clear that Canada has always been, and will always remain, as persuasive as it can be on the issue of human rights. Moreover, this government will pursue economic and trading activities with countries rather than isolating them and consequently having no influence on them whatsoever.

THE ENVIRONMENT

PROCLAMATION OF ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT—STATUS OF DRAFT REGULATIONS—GOVERNMENT TIMETABLE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, the presence in this chamber on opening day two months ago of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Honourable Sheila Copps, served to remind me of a number of issues that will confront her in her capacity as Minister of the Environment.

On one of those issues, the Speech from the Throne stated:

> The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will be proclaimed.

Honourable senators, my question is this: What is the plan and the timetable of the government with respect to this matter? Second, what is happening with regard to the regulations under this act?

I recall that the former government published regulations in draft form, but that the national Liberal Party expressed its entire dissatisfaction with those draft regulations and pledged to rewrite them.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate find out what the status of this matter is? When may we expect proclamation and when may we expect to see a new set of regulations? I am aware that our own committee in the Senate is looking at the generality of the process, but I should like a clear statement of the state of play in the government on this matter.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Thank you, Senator Murray. As you observed, the intention is to proclaim, and I will endeavour to deliver the relevant information to you in that time frame.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

METHOD OF AWARDING PROJECTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: My question is with respect to ACOA, an organization that has been in place for a number of years and has served Atlantic Canada extremely well.

I have read of a number of projects that have been awarded by the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency over the past number of months. I do not argue with the projects themselves. That is the subject for a different study. What concerns me is that these projects were awarded even though, as far as I know — and I am fairly confident of this — ACOA has not met once since the new government was formed.

With respect to this agency, are we returning to a method of doing business whereby the minister, together with a number of his MP colleagues in closed meetings, makes the decisions relating to the attribution of projects in Atlantic Canada? We specifically designed the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency to avoid political interference by ministers and others. These projects were to be awarded by the agency in consultation with citizens.

Would the minister look into the new workings of ACOA and try to encourage her ministerial colleagues to return to a method of awarding these projects that involves more consultation with citizens?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Comeau, I will seek information from my colleague the minister responsible for ACOA in that regard. As you know, he is a very vigorous colleague from Nova Scotia. I will be pleased to seek information from him and also to pass on your concerns to him.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to three questions from honourable senators. The first is a response to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux in the Senate on February 10, 1994, regarding social security reform. The second is a response to a question raised on February 22 by the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer, regarding Canadian policy on NATO air strikes in Bosnia. The third is in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 15 by the Honourable Senator Norman Atkins regarding necessary repairs to the Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux on February 10, 1994)

> The Minister of Human Resources Development launched the social security reform process in February. That process will build on Red Book commitments emphasizing the importance of investing in people and sharing the responsibility for our future, and will derive input from a number of sources.
> A Task Force, chaired by the Minister and utilizing analytical support from HRD officials, is working intensively to examine and assess various options for reform. The House of Commons Standing Committee on Human Resource Development is consulting widely with Canadians on issues related to redesigning social security. In addition, the Minister has consulted with provincial and territorial labour market and social services ministers, who have agreed to work together in initiating joint strategic initiatives in the social security field.

The Action Plan for social security reform that the Minister of Human Resources Development will present to Parliament in April will draw upon ideas generated in all these forums. This Action Plan will outline issues and propose options for reform, and will form the basis for continued consultations with Canadians over the summer. The Action Plan is, at this point, the only major consultation document planned for release on the broad directions for social security reform.

BOSNIA

COHERENCE OF NATO STRATEGY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer on February 22, 1994)

Canada provides one of the largest contingents of the United Nations Protection Force in the former Yugoslavia. The primary aims of this effort are to provide better protection for the civilian population and to support the channelling of humanitarian aid to this population suffering heavily from the continuing conflict.

Canada has always expressed serious reservations over the use of NATO air strikes in cases other than legitimate defence, i.e. to protect United Nations forces from a direct attack by one of the warring parties. The Canadian Government is concerned over the impact such measures would have on the peace process, on the supplying of humanitarian aid, on the safety of Canadian troops in the field, and on the role of the UN and NATO, which would be perceived and treated as parties to the conflict.

As a member of NATO, Canada has been especially active in discussions on the use of air strikes to support United Nations Security Council resolutions, and has influenced the Alliance to the point where Canadian concerns are taken into account in its Council meetings.

Most of Canada's concerns were addressed in the decision finally ratified by NATO on February 9 last concerning Sarajevo. This was why Canada supported the decision. The success of the operation showed the validity of our position and of the final NATO decision, since it increased the security of Sarajevo's civilian population while giving fresh impetus to the peace process in Bosnia.

(Response to question raised by Hon. Norman K. Atkins on March 15, 1994)

The government recognizes Lester B. Pearson International Airport's role as the predominant Canadian airport and one of the largest economic engines in Southern Ontario. In this context, the government is currently considering all options for Pearson International Airport. This examination includes the management structure, the need for expanded and improved facilities, and the future developments for aviation in the Greater Toronto Region. It is essential that the government hear from all stakeholders and interested parties before making any decisions concerning the future of Lester B. Pearson International Airport, as its future is too important to the local and national economies to be decided in Ottawa alone.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1994-95

THIRD READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-20, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Michael Kirby moved third reading of Bill C-5, to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before you contains only one clause. That clause effectively extends what we would be inclined to call, in ordinary parlance, legislation which enables the government to grant certain developing countries favoured nation status. In fact, in the bill that status is called "generalized preferential tariff." The normal media version of it would be "favoured nation status."

The clause would extend for ten years the right of the government to give preferential tariffs on specific items to Third World countries so that they can expand their possibility of exporting to Canada. That right would normally expire on June 30 of this year.

This provision has been in existence for some 20 years. It was extended once before for a 10 year period, from 1984 to 1994. This is simply an extension of that same provision from 1994 to the year 2004. The importance of bills such as this is declining somewhat with the emergence of new GATT rules covering a very large number of countries, and with the emergence of NAFTA.

That is the purpose of the bill. It does not change any of the existing tariffs. It merely extends the status quo, pending, of course, a potential change in government policy following the report of the Joint Senate and House of Commons Committee on Canadian Foreign Policy.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1994-95

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith moved the second reading of Bill C-14, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-14 grants borrowing authority to the government. I suppose many might think it properly subtitled "boring authority" because the bill is couched in rather arcane, esoteric language. However, the significance of those clauses is really quite straightforward and, of course, very important.

Honourable senators, I intend to go through those clauses with some explanation of the rather esoteric language that is used in order to explain what those sections mean.

This is a short bill with five sections, and the second section has three subsections. I wish to say a word about timeliness and why it is important for the bill to be passed as soon as honourable senators can bring themselves to do so.

I also wish to make some comments about the relationship between the borrowing authority, the budget and the Estimates. To highlight a few additional points, I will touch on the budget as it relates to fiscal outlook, reductions, broadening the tax base, a thought about personal income tax balance, and a word or two about domestic debt programs. I will then ask honourable senators to consider giving this bill approval at second reading.

Honourable senators, the first section simply states the title of the bill. The second section is the basic section on borrowing authority and it provides the government with authority to borrow up to $34.3 billion in the 1994-95 fiscal year. That amount is needed to meet financial requirements of $30.2 billion; to cover foreign exchange account earnings of $1.1 billion, earnings that are retained in the exchange fund and are not available for government operations; and $3 billion to cover contingencies such as foreign exchange operations.

The provisions for foreign exchange account earnings in the contingency reserves are standard provisions. The reason any government has to have borrowing authority to cover the earnings in the exchange fund is that the profit that is made on exchange funds is used to reduce the deficit, but it is not available for program spending, or for any spending, and has to be kept there. Therefore, borrowing authority is necessary for that.

Clause 2(2) provides additional borrowing authority to refund roll-over treasury bills that were issued during the 1993-94 fiscal year, subject to section 47 of the Financial Administration Act, up to a maximum of $3 billion. In other words, some treasury bills that were issued under a previous borrowing come due and the government needs a further borrowing to pay them off. The amount that is requested is $3 billion. The reference to section 47 comes up again, and again it sounds pretty arcane, but section 47 of the Financial Administration Act is there to cover only short-term situations.

Clause 2(3), if we follow the Deputy Leader of the Government's schedule today, is really of no importance to us because it is only applicable if the bill is not passed before April 1, 1994 — or April 1 of any year, for that matter. There has to be a deduction of any 1993-94 carry-over that is unused from the 1994-95 authority. That is the purpose of that section, and I do not think it will mean anything to us today if the schedule that the deputy leader has set out is followed.

That takes us then to clause 3 which deals with expiration, and it ensures that all unused borrowing authority granted by this bill in excess of $3 billion will be cancelled on March 31, 1995. It allows the $3-billion non-lapsing contingency reserve to be carried forward into 1995-96, a year from the end of this month, to be used for funding operations if a new borrowing authority bill has not yet been provided. Again honourable senators will see a connection between that clause and clause 2(3). In other words, next year, if the bill is not passed by April 1, then there is a provision to carry that forward.

Section 4 provides the effective date for the calculation of charges. That ensures that all maturities — another expression for any debts, any borrowings that have come due — have to be paid off. That clause ensures that all maturities in the fiscal year are covered by a fiscal year borrowing authority. As an example, that arose for the first time in the 1992-93 fiscal year under the previous government whereby the refunding authority provided in the Financial Administration Act for maturities and redemption was lost because it occurred after the start of the fiscal year but prior to Royal Assent.

Clause 5 covers the expiration of previous borrowing authority and fits together with the other sections because it ensures that any unused borrowing authority from 1993-94, the year we are now in, is cancelled once the new authority is given.

Although those sections are phrased in somewhat Byzantine or esoteric terms, they all fit together very well and cover all of the eventualities. As can be seen, we are not worried about some of those eventualities if we carry out the program suggested for today.

Honourable senators, that takes me to the second of the three-plus parts, and that is the relationship between the borrowing authority and the budget. One of the reasons that the borrowing authority legislation and these few standard clauses are so cryptic is that the basic information that is needed for the borrowing is all in the budget and in the Estimates. It means that without borrowing authority in place for a new fiscal year, there will be severe constraints placed on the government's financing program. Essentially, the government would be limited to use the section to which I referred earlier, section 47 of the Financial Administration Act, which provides only limited authority and restricts the funding to short-term funds. That would mean that no bond issues would be permitted except to fund maturing issues — the term of art used to describe debts that come due — of which there are few in the first quarter of 1994-95, so it would not help very much.

Any delay in the passage of the bill beyond the end of the current fiscal year could prove costly to the government, and perhaps to taxpayers, and would expose the government to additional interest rate risks. That is why any government wants a borrowing authority to be secured as soon as possible after the budget, and that again illustrates the connection between the budgets, the Estimates and the borrowing authority.

The policy principles and detail behind the borrowing authority are all in the budget and the Estimates. The borrowing authority — the bill we are debating today — is merely a mechanism for implementing the budget and the Estimates.

Honourable senators, that means that the debate in which Senator Murray and others participated, which is still an item on our Order Paper dealing with the budget, is all quite relevant to the borrowing authority and is the reason that, in parliamentary tradition, the presentation of a borrowing authority bill is often an occasion to examine the government's fiscal policies, its budget and, to some extent, the Estimates.

I want to say a few words about the budget. The government's proposal is for the most substantial spending reductions by governments in the last 10 years. The budget relies on cautious, prudent projections of economic growth for this year and next, so the deficit projections are much higher than those given to the house last April. The economic projections presented in the budget are based on a consensus of private sector forecasts, which consultation we read about, and not on overly optimistic — some might say unrealistic — expectations of growth presented in some previous budgets; expectations that resulted in deficit forecasts that were wrong, in some cases, by tens of billions of dollars. The use of prudent projections of economic growth, therefore, helps to generate budget numbers that Canadians can trust.

In the few additional comments I wish to make, I want to touch on the fiscal outlook: reductions; the broadening tax base, which is an important principle in the budget and therefore important for the borrowing authority; personal income tax; balance; and the domestic debt program.

The minister is confident that the 1994 budget actions, coupled with the moderate economic growth projected, will reduce the deficit from $45.7 billion in 1993-94 to $39.7 billion in the coming fiscal year. A further drop to $32.7 billion is expected in 1995-96. We will see if that comes to pass because we will be debating this borrowing authority a year from now.

As a percentage of Canada's economy, the deficit will fall from 6.4 per cent of gross domestic product for this year to 4.2 per cent of GDP in 1995-96. Looking further ahead, the budget sets the deficit on a path to meeting the government's interim deficit target for 1996-97 — 3 per cent of GDP or some $25 billion.

The emphasis is on actions that will support economic renewal and confidence and, thus, reductions in government spending. Net expenditure cuts will total $17 billion over the next three years. The minister proposed some measures to increase revenue, but there are $5 in spending cuts for every $1 in new revenue.

What are these reductions in government spending? First, there is the operating budgets of government departments reduced by $400 million in the next fiscal year with savings rising to $620 million annually in 1995-96 and beyond. Second, there is a freeze in government salaries affecting public servants, the Prime Minister, MPs, senators and other officials which will total almost $1 billion annually by 1996-97. Also trimmed are the budgets of ministers' offices and reduction in the parliamentary budget. Total savings from cuts in government operations will rise from $468 million in 1994-95 to $1.6 billion in 1996-97.

The third reduction is in the area of defence expenditures. The cancellation of the EH-101 helicopters, as promised during the last federal election, will save $1.7 billion over the next three years. This budget calls for a further $1.9 billion in spending reductions during that period.

Fourth, grants and contributions made by government, including foreign aid and grants to business, will also be trimmed for savings of $253 million in the fiscal year starting this April, rising to $409 million in 1996-97.

The fifth item on my list deals with the restructuring of Canada's social security system, about which we have been reading a lot recently, to improve it, to make it more efficient and responsive and to ensure that it remains affordable, including important targets for both UI reform and social security transfers to the provinces.

Sixth, the government has announced changes to the unemployment insurance system that will reduce expenditures by $725 million in 1994-95 and $2.4 billion annually thereafter. The measures will also allow UI premiums to decline, thus helping to create jobs and put Canadians back to work.

Seventh, federal transfers to provinces currently total some $40 billion annually, with some $14 billion of that related to social security programs. The budget calls for a two-year period of predictability and modest growth in these transfers. The plan is to cooperate with the provinces in studying reforms and testing new approaches with extensive public consultations and input along the way. However, the budget makes clear that social security transfers will be no higher in 1996-97, after reform, than they are this year. This will save the federal government at least $1.5 billion in 1996-97.

Honourable senators, that brings me to a comment about broadening the tax base, which is the third in my five additional points. The challenge to the deficit is not only one of spending, of course. We have heard about that in the very informative debate that we have already had on the budget. It is also one of revenues.

It is generally agreed that the opinion of Canadians is that taxes are already too high. The government's priority objective, therefore, is to stimulate economic growth, which will help curb the deficit and allow us to reduce taxes in the years ahead.

The tax and deficit relationship is a direct and not an inverse ratio; that is, a higher deficit leads to higher taxes while a lower deficit is the road to lower taxes. I do not think anyone disagrees with that. In order to reduce the deficit now, some revenue increases are necessary. The government has decided that the fairest way to raise revenue is to broaden the tax base and bring greater equity and fairness to the tax system.

The fourth of my five points is a comment about personal income tax. The $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption will no longer be available for gains realized after budget night. For individuals, the full value of employer-paid life insurance premiums will be taxable. The income tax credit provided to persons over the age of 65 will be income tested. However, only one senior in four will be affected by this change.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You were always against clawbacks, and universality was always a model of the Liberal Party. What has happened?

Senator Berntson: Have you changed your mind?

Senator Frith: No, I have not. I am telling you what this budget provides, and why it is relevant to the borrowing authority. If you want to bring me before a committee and ask for my opinions on universality and clawbacks, they might be the same as those of the minister that I am reporting to you today and that are reflected in the budget, or they might not.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You are not really sponsoring the bill; you are just reading the speech.

Senator Frith: Yes, I am sponsoring the bill because the bill is a bill, as I have said, which implements the budget. I am telling you what the budget provides. As I know Senator Lynch-Staunton and all other senators want me to do, I am trying to keep all sentimentality out of it.

Senator Berntson: Try to keep a straight face.

Senator Frith: I am trying to give you the facts so that you can exercise your finely honed intellects in order to make up your minds.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We know what is in it, because most of it is our policy.

Senator Frith: This is purely an attempt to help honourable senators decide whether they do or do not want to give this government the borrowing authority that flows from the approval of the budget and the Estimates.

Senator Doody: It is very difficult to keep sentimentality out of a borrowing bill.

Senator Frith: As a matter of fact, it is a very interesting challenge as to how one could get sentimentality into a borrowing bill, but thank you for suggesting that I had done so, and in doing so provoked a sentimental reaction from those on the other side.

Senator Doody: There is a touch of nostalgia here.

Senator Frith: A number of changes are also being proposed to the corporate tax system to make it fairer and to better target the tax assistance made available to certain businesses. I do feel a bit sentimental about this, as I am sure we all do. They include a reduction in the goods and services tax credit and the business income tax deduction for meals and entertainment expenses; the elimination of certain tax preferences aimed at small businesses that are enjoyed by some large private corporations; a change in the tax treatment of certain securities transactions by financial institutions; and the elimination or reduction of certain regionally based investment tax credits that have not been cost effective in attracting new investment. The proposed changes will add $575 million to federal coffers in 1994, and almost $1.4 billion the following year.

I celebrate this part of the budget because I think all parliamentarians, and all Canadians, have grown tired of hearing, year after year, by how much the deficit could be reduced and government revenues could be increased if some of these loopholes were closed. The attempt is to tighten them up and increase revenue as a partner to the objective of reducing expenditures.

• (1550)

The idea is to strike a balance, weighing a number of concerns and targeting a number of goals — that is the same balance, one of the elements of which is the question of clawbacks and universality. These are the factors that every Minister of Finance must take into account.

The present Minister of Finance has successfully brought forward a balanced approach, weighing a number of concerns and targeting a number of goals to create jobs, to stimulate economic growth, to reduce the deficit and to ensure the long term financial viability of the social programs that define this country.

Now, of course, some might call for a different balance. But the focus here is on one of the special issues or another, and the complete picture. The government has opted for a balanced picture and has done it successfully. The Minister of Finance cannot please everyone, and has not necessarily pleased every member of the Senate, but he has tried to take into account all of those factors and come up with a balance that Canadians have applauded. As he put it:

> ...for those who would have us spend more, Canadians deserve to know where the money would come from. And for those who demand we cut more, Canadians deserve to be told the extent to which that would hurt growth, hurt jobs, hurt the less fortunate.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, I have a word about domestic debt management that should be on the record. I will quote from the comments made on behalf of the government in the other place. At page 1844 of Hansard, it states:

> As background information I would like to review the government's debt operation in the current fiscal year up to the end of January.

This is a legitimate question on the debate of the borrowing authority, the government having been in office for several months up to this point. It goes on to state:

> At this point in the domestic debt program about $25 billion in new net market debt has been issued. Of this total, $21 billion was in the form of marketable bonds, $5.5 billion in treasury bills, and $925 million in real return bonds.
> The real return bond program was first announced in October 1991 and is a modest and cost effective diversification of a debt program. The bonds offer investors a real rate plus an inflation compensation component.

That is very attractive from the investor's point of view. Mr. Walker then states:

> I would like to report to the House on last fall's Canada Savings Bond campaign...

That is a relevant item for borrowing authority and budget debate. He goes on to state:

> That campaign with bonds bearing an interest rate of 4.25 per cent had total sales of $5.4 billion. After taking into account the Canada Savings Bonds that matured or were redeemed in that period, net purchases of new bonds amounted to $842 million.
> Regarding foreign currency debt, outstanding Canadian bills increased by U.S. $2.7 billion to $4.7 billion at the end of January. These are short-term U.S. dollar denomination bills which are issued from time to time in the U.S. market to fund Canada's foreign exchange reserves. In addition, a 80-billion-yen bond issued in 1986 matured in July 1993.

The last paragraph of Mr. Walker's intervention states:

> In January the government launched a U.S. $2-billion five-year floating rate note. This issue will be used to pay down outstanding Canada bills thereby diversifying the source of U.S. dollar funding of Canada's exchange reserve. It will not increase the level of reserves or Canada's overall indebtedness.

That is the end of the quote that I wanted to put on the record dealing with domestic debt management.

Honourable senators, I doubt that you want to ask questions about these matters, but I have a briefing book containing material on the following additional points if you have questions about them: The borrowing authority recent history and statutory framework; use of the borrowing authority from April 1993 to March 10 of 1994; a special note on section 47, which is the section that deals with short term borrowing; and more detail on debt operations and the exchanges fund account profits.

The last item concerns the profits that I mentioned. I did not know about this until I got the briefing material. I did not realize that those exchanges profits are used to reduce the deficit but are not available for funding. That is why they come in under borrowing. They cannot be used, in other words, but they have to be taken into account because the money is there. Therefore, they have to be taken into account in setting up the deficit accounts.

I also have additional briefing on the public debt charges, on official reserves and the exchange rate on interest rates in 1993 and the beginning of 1994. That is something that you probably already have if you have the up-to-date issue of the Quarterly Fiscal Monitor. I also have the February 1994 issue, and we all probably have the March 1994 issue by now. I then have something generally on Government of Canada securities.

Honourable senators, those are all the points I want to make in attempting to persuade honourable senators to grant the government the borrowing authority. I have explained as best I can the connection that it has with the budget and the Estimates.

I would ask all honourable senators to support Bill C-14 and give it second reading today.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I was quite taken by Senator Frith's explanation of why the government needed the borrowing authority so speedily, and urged us to get it through in the interests of saving money on short term borrowings and going outside to try to finance it. It all sounded so familiar and it would be so tempting to say, "Well, perhaps you should wait for a little while," but we are not like that.

Senator Frith: Now senator, the only time we did that was when you did not have Estimates and did not have a budget.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the need for the budget was every bit as urgent at that time as it is right now, and the Minister of Finance of the day was no less concerned than is the present Minister of Finance.

Senator Frith: We intended to give you the budget, and we offered to give it to you.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators opposite are pretty secure in knowing that the borrowing authority will not be delayed, even though it quite obviously could be. The $34.4-billion borrowing authority which is being requested today is in the standard form of borrowing authorities as I remember them.

I noted with some dismay that Senator Frith would, on several occasions, look forward to having another borrowing bill before us at this time next year. I found that a little bit depressing. I thought they might have found a way to get us out of this downward spiral.

The fact of the matter is that the money must be found somewhere, and it must be borrowed, and the government must find a way to meet its deficit.

The deficit, I am told, will fall to just under $40 billion in the next year from the $45.7 billion projected this year. Many of us suspect that the $45.7 billion is an inflated amount. The government, I think, found ways to push every possible cost that might be incurred in the coming year into the current year's deficit so as to establish, perhaps, a benchmark against which their progress in future years could be measured.

Of course, it will also help to justify the tax increases which we can expect in the next three years. I think there is something like $3.4 billion in new tax increases projected for the country in the next three years. That is not a very pleasant pill to have to swallow.

Inflating the deficit? Yes, I think so. There is a $1.2-billion amount included in that deficit for the stabilization fund. That is the provincial stabilization figure, money which has not actually been spent but has been set aside in anticipation of claims from the provincial governments on the stabilization program, which is a very important program. I would think that the provincial governments would have a great deal more difficulty borrowing money in the marketplace if the Government of Canada's stabilization program was not standing behind the debt. Nevertheless, it is not an expenditure that has to be made in the current year, but it is being set aside in the current year and added to the deficit for utilization next year.

Then there is the faster processing of income tax returns. Once again, I cannot quarrel with that. There is nothing illegal about it. There is nothing wrong with it. The previous government put the mechanism in place to make it possible. However, the fact remains that it was a decision made by the current government to include that money in the deficit in anticipation of paying it in the next year. Of course, it takes quite a bit of pressure off the coming year's numbers.

There is a $500-million increase as a result of the failure of the previous government to pass a measure to change the timing of GST credits. That also could easily have been included in next year's numbers. The government elected to include it in this year's numbers for good reason from their point of view; however, it does distort the deficit number.

There is at least $700 million of last year's deficit that is the result of decisions made by the current government. That is the cost of cancelling the helicopter contract and the early retirement incentives for the military and the added costs of base closings and so on. I suspect $700 million is a notional amount. It will probably be a great deal more than that when the final reckoning is in. We will see what happens as we get further down the road on that one.

I should also point out for the record that this is not the only borrowing bill before Parliament at this time. The thirty-some billion dollars in this borrowing bill before us is in addition to a $13.5-billion borrowing authority which is given to CMHC, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The $13.5-billion authority is to borrow for their own purposes with the guarantee of the government. The CBC, of course, also has a borrowing authority of some billions of dollars, the exact amount of which I do not now remember, but it is included in the Supplementary Estimates (B), which adds to the number. There is really something like $53 billion or $54 billion in borrowing authority being granted to the government and to the Crown corporations that I mentioned.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can Senator Doody advise us whether that $13.5 billion is for the one fiscal year alone?

Senator Doody: Yes. I believe it is $13.5 billion, plus the CBC number, which I think is three or four but which I do not have in front me.

All of these authorities are covered, of course, in the supply bill, but the supply bill is not debated in the other place. It goes through on a wink and a nod before the end of the season and there is no meaningful debate on the supply bill itself.

Of course, traditionally, the Senate does not interfere with supply bills or appropriation bills unless there is good and sufficient reason for doing so. However, I have to wonder if the system we have developed over the past few years is conducive to an intelligent debate on the spending powers of various successive governments.

The idea of giving a Crown corporation a $13.5-billion borrowing authority without a minute's debate is, on the face of it, improper. It may be a very good program. I expect it is. I was told in the committee that the CMHC can probably borrow the money with a government guarantee at 50 to 80 basis points lower than the public sector. There may be merit in that. On the other hand, however, I do not know what the reaction of the private sector will be to that, or what the result will be with the people who have been the traditional lenders. Once again, it may be reasonable and sensible, but as far as I can tell, nobody has been told any of this. It is all just a sheet of paper in the Estimates.

The projections that have been given for future years in the budget are, in my estimation, very incomplete and too short-term by far. I remember 1975 when John Crosby introduced his budget. A remarkable man, he learned to pronounce the word the same way I do. His projections at the time were far more wide-ranging in terms of the future. It is a pity that that process has not been followed more faithfully. I think it could help in the stability of the marketplace generally. Indeed, the Auditor General has voiced the same opinion.

In any event, honourable senators, quite a few measures in that budget are taken to control spending. We certainly do not disagree with all of them. Indeed, many of them are a continuation of policies that were introduced by the government we supported.

I must say there are exceptions. Among them is the rather mindless and senseless closing of the military college in the province of Quebec. That, to me, makes absolutely no sense at all. There is the almost knee-jerk slashing of the helicopter program without examining the alternatives in terms of search and rescue facilities and so on. That was unfortunate. There are other knee-jerk reactions in there as well. However, these are matters we can look into as the year progresses. The government supporters can rest assured that this side will not interfere with the passage of the borrowing authority.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must advise you that, if Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

• (1610)

Senator Frith: First, I congratulate Senator Doody on an intelligent and, more particularly, knowledgeable intervention. He is an experienced person in these fields. He was Minister of Finance in Newfoundland —

Senator Doody: That's where I learned about borrowing.

Senator Frith: You taught them a thing or two, I am sure. That is a position I have never held, either provincially or federally, and so I think the Senate should appreciate the honourable senator's intervention, coming as it does from his experience and knowledge. We may be able to discuss some of the questions he raised in committee, which is an opportunity we will have shortly.

There were some other points he raised, such as the helicopter question and other items quite properly raised in debate on a borrowing authority, but I expect that some of those will be examined more closely either in the continued debate on the budget or in his own committee when dealing with the Estimates.

I knew when I talked about the importance to the government and to all Canadians of having early borrowing authority that I might provoke from him a reference to events in the Senate related to the timeliness of borrowing authority. I do want to underline for the record that in 1985, when the Liberals were in the opposition and borrowing authority was asked for spending that was not covered by a budget or by Estimates, the opposition did oppose the bill but offered to grant the borrowing authority for all amounts that were covered by Estimates and by budget. They quoted, in fact, the then Minister of Finance Michael Wilson, when he had been in opposition, as saying that borrowing authority should not be granted without budget and Estimates to cover the amounts that the borrowing authority was asked for.

That, as the honourable senator has said, is not the situation today, and I say it is not the situation today. As we have seen, there are detailed estimates and a budget covering everything that is being asked for in this borrowing authority bill.

I would ask honourable senators to support the bill at second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith: I move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole, and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Earl A. Hastings in the Chair.

Pursuant to rule 21 of the Rules of the Senate, Mr. David Walker, Mr. Peter DeVries and Mr. Jon Cockerline were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I welcome into the chamber David Walker, who is the Parliamentary secretary to Paul Martin, Minister of Finance.

We are delighted to have you here to help with the deliberations on this bill. Proceed, Mr. Walker, if you have some opening remarks, and then the senators will put their questions. You may wish to introduce the officials who are with you to the house.

Mr. David Walker, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance: Thank you very much, Senator Fairbairn. I would like to thank the senators for the opportunity to discuss this borrowing authority bill with them. I was listening with interest to second reading, and I appreciate your support in seeing that the government receives approval of this bill before the break.

I just want to spend a few minutes going through the bill clause by clause. The bill is technical in nature, but obviously has a tremendous impact on our capacity to borrow and to organize the financing of the government properly. I just want to go through each of the clauses.

Clause 2(1) requests borrowing authority in the amount of $34.3 billion for the 1994-95 fiscal year. This amount is required to meet the financial requirements of $30.2 billion, to cover foreign exchange earnings of $1.1 billion, and to provide a $3-billion reserve to cover contingencies. This non-lapsing reserve is the same amount requested in borrowing authority bills in recent years. This clause also ensures that the borrowing authorities provided in this bill may only be used after the 1994-95 fiscal year begins.

Clause 2(2) covers the funding of treasury bills issued in 1993-94 under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act up to a cap of $3 billion. Without this clause, these refundings would be charged against regular 1994-95 borrowing authority, even though the money was raised in the 1993-94 fiscal year. This provision cannot be used to generate additional borrowing authority for 1994-95.

Clause 2(3) ensures that any portion of the $3-billion reserve granted by the Borrowing Authority Act 1993-94 that is used in 1994-95 will be deducted from 1994-95 borrowing authority. This prevents any use of the 1993-94 non-lapsing reserve, effectively adding to borrowing authority in 1994-95.

Clause 3 states that all unused borrowing authority granted by this bill in excess of $3 billion will be cancelled on March 31, 1995. This allows a $3-billion non-lapsing reserve to be carried forward into 1995-96.

Clause 4 stipulates that the borrowing authority cover the full fiscal year beginning April 1, thereby ensuring refunding authorities for the securities maturing in fiscal 1994-95.

Finally, Clause 5 ensures that any unused borrowing authority from fiscal 1993-94 is cancelled on March 31, 1994, or the date that the new bill comes into force, whichever is later.

Borrowing authority is a normal part of the operation of the government. It is important to the smooth functioning of our government's borrowing program that authority be in place at the beginning of the new fiscal year.

I have with me two officials from the department, Mr. DeVries and Mr. Cockerline, who will help me answer questions from the honourable senators. I am now available to answer your questions.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-14, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning on April 1, 1994.

Shall the title of the bill be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the short title, clause 1, be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Can we move into a more general question period, Mr. Chairman? I should like to ask Mr. Walker just a few questions.

• (1620)

Is it too early to gauge the effect of the lowering of the tobacco tax on the receipts of that tax? The lowering was done in early February. Is there an indication at this stage that the drop in smuggling could have offset the drop in the tax, or has the drop in the smuggling been such that the receipts for the tax are starting to increase?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, we made the changes in the financial projections at a time when a decision was made on the tobacco tax. We took into account then the projections for the loss in income and factored them into our projection. It is too early for the department to assess how close we are to those targets, because the change is working its way through the system, which involves rebates, sales and so on. We have only one month of sales at this time, and it is too early to make a projection.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Are you still holding to a deficit of $45.7 billion for the current fiscal year, given the unusually optimistic forecast we can read from the January results?

Mr. Walker: We have been hesitant to change our forecasts based on the month-to-month projections. January's was more favourable. From a departmental point of view, we would like to think that some of the measures put into effect by the earlier government and ourselves are having an influence on the regime, but we will remain hesitant to change the projections until we see the figures from February and March. We do not want people in the market place thinking that we are up and down. We are holding to our $45-billion to $46-billion range at this time.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It would be a great disappointment to the Minister of Finance if he had to announce a lower deficit after having padded it so craftily.

Mr. Walker: He would welcome every opportunity to save Canadians money.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: My final question is regarding the estimates in the forecasts in the budget. The minister, on more than one page, makes it quite clear that he based his forecast on a sort of average lower range of the consensus of 38 economists. Senator Frith made reference to that in his presentation. The reason for relying on these economists is that previous budgets, at least those under the Conservative government, were guilty of overly optimistic forecasts.

I assume that, overly optimistic or not, those forecasts were made by government economists. Therefore, all I can read from Mr. Martin's statement, repeated today by Senator Frith, is that the finance minister and the government are now rejecting advice on economic forecasting from the department.

The question is not meant to be more than what it is, because it is quite clear in the budget that there is a rejection of government economic forecasters. I find that rather strange as, out of hand, they have been taken out of the picture.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, it is a very interesting question. I can tell you from my background as an academic that forecasting by different economists is, of course, a sensitive and poorly defined field. The range we have in some indices can be 100 per cent, if you look at the difference between two and four, and that sort of thing.

When we formed the government, we wanted to make sure we would not get into the problem of being too optimistic about the economic recovery in Canada vis-à-vis the United States. The officials shared that view; consequently, we have attempted to discount any overly optimistic views about the economy. The department, like other economists over the past decade, is getting more experienced in forecasting. Everyone was comfortable with being cautious about what the economic recovery in Canada would be in this twelve-month period.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: How did the forecasts of the government come out against those of the 38 experts who are now the government's advisors?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, generally speaking we are below the median of the economic forecast. That is not only the objective assessment; we also spent a long day in December talking to them.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: How do the government's internal forecasts for 1994-95 compare with the forecasts of the 38 economists who were at the one-day conference?

Mr. Walker: Our estimates are on the conservative side as compared to the general feeling among the economists.

Senator Frith: Small "c".

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then the two are fairly together on this?

Mr. Walker: Yes. The range is not that great, but if you are off by a percentage point or two, the fiscal impact is quite dramatic. We decided to base our projections on the cautious side; if we had any room to manoeuvre, or interest rates changed, or any of those other variables came into play, we would not be going back to the people in the market with excuses just as the fiscal year was beginning, let alone halfway through it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Is it the intention of the government to use private forecasters for the preparation of future budgets and exclude its own government economists?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, we do not want to exclude anybody in this country from participating in the budget process. In fact, next year, starting in September we will use the House of Commons committee to look at the budget. We will encourage economists from different fields to come forward and give us their projections.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then anybody can play the game?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Senator Frith: Canadians will be listened to, economists and others.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, the fiscal requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions for 1994-95, estimate a budget deficit of almost $40 billion, reduced by nonbudgetary transactions of, say, $10 billion for about a $30-billion deficit. Public debt charges for 1994-95 are estimated to be $41 billion. How sensitive are these charges to the deficit and financial requirements and possible changes in interest rates, for instance? What effect would an upward surge in interest rates of, say, three or four percentage points have on the deficit as it is projected?

To make it simple, for every percentage point in interest rates, how much do interest payments on the public debt increase?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, again we were cautious in the way we presented the interest rate projections to ensure that we could, as much as possible, account for any upward swing and that it would not cause undue pressures to be put on our fiscal projections.

In the budget plan, on pages 64 and 65, there is a fiscal sensitivity analysis based on 100 base points in lower interests rates and the impact that has on the budget. Perhaps, rather than go through it myself, I could refer the senator to pages 64 and 65, tables 22 and 23 of the budget papers, where we indicate the dollar implications of such a change and what we would have to do to respond.

Essentially, 100 base points in the form of lower interest rates would reduce revenue in year one by $.3 billion, in year two by $.3 billion, in year four by $.4 billion, and so on and so forth. The department was very thorough in how sensitive we would be to any interest rate change in our budget projections.

Senator Doody: The deficit projections are based, then, on the assumption that interest rates will drop —

Mr. Walker: We went both up and down. For example, the impact on the deficit of 100 base points on the interest rates would be $1.7 billion in the first year, $2.5 billion in the second year, $3.0 billion in the third year and $3.5 billion in the fourth year.

Senator Doody: There would be a negative effect on projections to that extent?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

• (1630)

Senator Doody: In the equalization bill we dealt with a few days ago, there was an estimated 5.5-per-cent growth figure in projecting equalization payments to the provinces. I believe that figure was an average for the ten provinces. Does that figure reflect the growth figures you have factored into the federal budget?

Mr. Walker: Yes, it does. It is part of the expenditure plan of the government.

Senator Doody: These projections are all based on 5.5-per-cent growth, then?

Mr. Walker: No. The equalization bill, Bill C-3, is a stand-alone piece of legislation in which we set the target for expenditure increases of 5.5 per cent with the intention of stabilizing the provincial budgets across the country.

Senator Doody: Therefore 5.5 per cent is not necessarily a real growth rate but a nominal growth rate for the sake of the projections?

Mr. Walker: It is a nominal economic growth rate.

Senator Doody: It is not a real growth rate?

Mr. Walker: That is correct.

Senator Doody: I am told that $1.2 billion of the higher deficit is due to an allocation set aside for possible claims from provinces under the income stabilization plan. On what do you base that figure? Is there some reason to suspect that provincial revenues will decrease to a degree where, at one point, you would need a $2-billion payout? It is included this year as deficit.

Mr. Walker: That is correct.

Senator Doody: Although, when it is payable — if it is payable — it will not be for the coming year. On what have you based that $1.2-billion figure?

Mr. Walker: The amount is based on claims made by the provinces in 1992-93. Those claims are not yet settled. Following the recommendations of Auditors General over the years as to booking these claims against the budget when they are made, they are, in fact, booked now but are to be settled and paid out when the actual books are done.

Senator Doody: I understand that. Is it public knowledge which provinces have made claims and the amounts of those claims? Is that a public document?

Mr. Walker: No, it is not public. That is a decision made by the provinces once the claims are settled. Some provinces make a public announcement; some do not.

Senator Doody: You would not be able to make a unilateral proclamation. You would need the authority of the provinces to do that?

Mr. Walker: That is correct.

Senator Doody: A $13.5-billion borrowing authority in the Supplementary Estimates (B) has been granted to the CMHC. I understand that will increase their borrowing authority to $15 billion, or something of that nature. Could you explain to us the rationale for that borrowing authority? We were told that the CMHC could probably obtain these funds at a considerably lower rate from the banks than the private sector could. What effect will this have on the private sector? Will there be a negative impact on their section of the housing business? How is the CMHC equipped to handle this rather dramatic increase in their authority?

Mr. Walker: The last government changed the strategy for CMHC financing during the last fiscal year. The CMHC was given the authority to go directly into the bond market, with the backing of the Government of Canada, to arrange its own financing. Based on that, they have accumulated a considerable savings in the refinancing of social housing in this country. I believe the savings amounted to $100 million last year.

The Crown corporation and the Government of Canada are negotiating as to how those funds are used. Most of that money was assigned last year to the financing in the current year of the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. The money saved through refinancing on their own is to be put directly back into the housing market across this country.

Senator Doody: Therefore the government's control over the disposition of these funds is through the annual statement of the CMHC, which is tabled in Parliament each year?

Mr. Walker: I believe it is through the minister's approval of the corporate plan.

Senator Doody: But the general accounting for the disposal of these funds —

Mr. Walker: Absolutely, yes.

Senator Doody: What I am saying is that this does not have to come back to Parliament for approval. This money is now in the hands of the CMHC. They can make their decisions, and at the end of the year when their financial statements are prepared, they will table.

Mr. Walker: It is in the hands of the Governor in Council, not just the Crown corporation. In other words, it is subject to cabinet approval.

Senator Doody: In what way? My understanding of this — and I may be wrong — is that individuals, but more likely credit corporations, religious groups, or co-ops who are interested in subsidized housing, will apply to CMHC for financing, which they will be able to get cheaper than if they had gone to the private sector, even though both are guaranteed by the government. In what respect, then, does this come to an Order-in-Council decision? Does that mean every application must come to the cabinet for approval?

Mr. Walker: No. The overall authority limit of the corporation is subject to the Governor in Council. The purposes of the corporation are defined on an annual basis by the government through the corporate plan. Discussions on social housing, co-op housing, aboriginal housing are ongoing between the corporation and the government related to spending limits and so forth.

Senator Doody: Then the individual decisions are made by the corporation?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Senator Doody: And the overall budgetary amount is approved by Order in Council.

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Senator Murray: The Department of Finance has done a study on the GST and the underground economy. I may have missed something. Has that study been shared with the House of Commons committee chaired by Mr. James Peterson? If not, is there any reason why it should not be made public now?

Mr. Walker: That study has been released to the provinces. If the Finance Committee has not asked for it, there is no reason why it cannot be shared with this committee. It certainly can be shared. I do not know whether the study has been tabled with the Finance Committee.

Senator Murray: I mentioned in the Senate last week that we would like to see that study. Perhaps Senator Fairbairn could bring it to this chamber.

I note that the Minister of National Revenue, Mr. Anderson, has put a number of between $56 billion and $60 billion a year on the underground economy. I have also observed that Mr. Martin has steered clear of putting a number on the underground economy. Is the number stated by Mr. Anderson the official view of the government on the size of the underground economy? Perhaps the answer to that question lies with the Department of Finance.

Mr. Walker: The department has shied away from giving specific figures because our sources are so diverse. Reports from Stats Canada are somewhat different than those from Revenue Canada. Efforts made by the Quebec government to estimate the underground economy by changing the rules and regulations dealing with home renovations have been inclusive. As well, how do changes to the rules regarding tobacco affect the volume of underground business?

We are receiving a lot of contradictory information as to the size of the underground economy. It is a concern for everyone because of the tax leakage, but we are having difficulty pinpointing a figure.

Senator Murray: I would be interested to know the source of Mr. Anderson's number. Perhaps Senator Fairbairn could give us that in a written reply one day.

Mr. Walker: I am sure the senator could check with her colleague and find out whether or not that figure is from an official departmental study.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN VIETNAM VETERANS' MEMORIAL

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, as senators are aware, the Canadian government, the National Capital Commission and the City of Ottawa refuse to provide land to the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' Association for the location of a memorial to pay respect to those young Canadians who offered their lives during the Vietnam conflict. They conveniently forget history. In their apparent complacency and refusal they should read the words expressed by Prime Minister Mackenzie King in 1925 regarding Americans who served in the Canadian Forces in World War I:

> Few countries enjoy the bonds of goodwill and friendship that the United States and Canada share. Our common border remains the longest unguarded frontier on earth, and our nations have shared triumphs and tragedies throughout history.

It was in this spirit that, in 1925, Canadian Prime Minister Mackenzie King first proposed a memorial to the large number of United States citizens who had enlisted in the Canadian Armed Forces and had lost their lives during World War I. It was owing to the fact that Canada had entered the war long before the United States that many Americans enlisted in Canada to join the fighting in Europe.

Honourable senators, with a land mass of some 466,200 hectares, if we cannot give up a little piece of land to provide a location for a memorial to be presented by our American allies on behalf of the thousands of young Canadians who served in the Vietnam war, something is wrong with the bonds of friendship and goodwill that we share with our neighbours. Is this the spirit of "Canada Remembers"?

WOMEN'S WORLD CURLING CHAMPIONS— CONGRATULATIONS TO SANDRA PETERSON'S RINK

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate wholeheartedly Saskatchewan's two-time world curling champions on their victory in Oberstdorf, Germany, on Sunday.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Tkachuk: The Sandra Peterson rink, including Jan Betker, Joan McCusker, Marcia Gudereit, and Anita Ford as fifth, made history by becoming the first Canadian women's team to win back-to-back world titles.

The Peterson rink hails from the Regina Callie Curling Club and has already committed itself to attempting a "three-peat" — something that Canadian teams like the Blue Jays are becoming very good at. The team dominated the tournament with an eight and one record. That achievement is, indeed, testimony to the strength of will and talent of these fine women who have faced and conquered a gruelling schedule of events and appearances in their quest for the title.

These very talented ladies have brought Saskatchewan great pride and honour, and have helped to give the province the kind of exposure that no advertising or public relations can buy. Once again, they have shown the world that Saskatchewan is home to the best curlers in the world. They are living proof that the competitive spirit is alive and well in our province.

MEN'S WORLD CURLING CHAMPIONS— CONGRATULATIONS TO RICK FOLK'S RINK

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate another Saskatchewanite, former member of the Legislative Assembly and minister of the Crown in the government of Grant Devine, world curling champion from Saskatoon, Rick Folk. His men's team, including Pat Ryan, Hert Gretzinger and Gerry Richard, were also victors over the weekend. Given that Rick Folk is really from Saskatchewan and got his start at the Nutana Curling Club in Saskatoon, I thought it only appropriate to extend our very sincere congratulations on their tremendous success.

JEWISH WAR VETERANS OF CALGARY— UNVEILING OF COMMEMORATIVE PLAQUE

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to draw to your attention that on Saturday last the Jewish War Veterans of Calgary produced and unveiled a plaque to commemorate the loss of lives of Jewish war veterans in the First and Second World Wars.

I also have the privilege of bringing their greetings to Senator Jack Marshall, a past president of that association.

It was an important event, one that will help us to remember.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP WEEK

Hon. Nöel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, this week is set aside to mark in a special way the great treasure that we as Canadians share in common, namely, our Canadian citizenship.

Canadian citizenship is not just waving a flag on Canada Day, and it is not just holding a Canadian passport. It is not paying taxes and dining on tourtière and perogies, or listening to Leonard Cohen with a Leafs-Habs game playing in the background in a room at the Château Laurier. It is Canadian citizenship, and it means a whole lot more than we think. In many ways, it is a treasure yet to be fully discovered.

When asked to name the most important aspect of being a Canadian citizen, many of us would respond without a moment's hesitation: "It is our freedom." For Canadians, that freedom means more than the freedom to vote every five years; it is the freedom to define the ways in which we wish to be Canadians. As one great Prime Minister, John Diefenbaker, put it, upon the introduction of the Bill of Rights in 1960:

> I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and for all mankind.

The words of that great Canadian Prime Minister touch on many of our most cherished rights as Canadians. In pledging to uphold these freedoms for other Canadians, present and future, that Prime Minister also acknowledged an important and often neglected component of our rights — the responsibilities each and every one of us has to preserve those freedoms.

Honourable senators, each and every one of us has a role to play in making Canada work now and for future generations. This week is an appropriate week for us to reflect upon the greatness of that which we share in common from coast to coast to coast, namely, our Canadian citizenship.

HONOURABLE DANIEL A. LANG

WELCOME UPON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that everyone in this house will join with me today in extending a very warm and affectionate welcome to our colleague, Senator Dan Lang, who has returned to this chamber after a period of some difficulty with health.

Senator Lang has the deep respect of members on both sides of this house for the contribution he has made, and will continue to make. On behalf of this side and all senators, we welcome you back, we wish you well, and are delighted to see you here with us today.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for her welcoming remarks.

First, I must extend my congratulations to Your Honour and to the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in assuming your new responsibilities in a new Parliament. But while I am here today, I should also say that I have something in common with Lazarus. Lazarus and I have shared an experience — that of being happy to be alive. However, Lazarus was more lucky than I; he only had leprosy.

Honourable senators, if I were to summarize my feelings in being back amongst you, I would raise my right hand in the signal of "V" for victory, and my left hand with fingers crossed, in the signal for "Good luck!"

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FAILURE TO FULFIL COMMITMENT—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, April 21, 1994, I will call the attention of the Senate to the unreliability of the National Film Board in that it failed to fulfil its commitment, made in 1987 by the then commissioner, to produce an historical documentary about Canada's WWI hero, Air Marshall W.A. Bishop, VC. That commitment has as yet not been honoured by the present National Film Board.

As well, there are 115 signatures from students at Carleton University.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL FINANCE

AMOUNT OF DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): As the financial results of the government for the first 11 months of the 1993-94 fiscal year showed a deficit that was $1 billion less than that for the corresponding period in the previous fiscal year, perhaps the Leader of the Government would agree that her colleague the Minister of Finance, who brazenly padded the figure for the 1993-94 deficit to $45.7 billion, should now revise that estimate in light of reality rather than political opportunism.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Point of order. The preamble is inaccurate. That is your opinion. It is not a fact.

Senator Corbin: Hire another researcher.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The preamble is taken from The Fiscal Monitor, issued by the Department of Finance, which tells us that the deficit for the first 11 months of this year, the fiscal year ending March 31, 1994, is $1 billion less than in the previous year. That is my preamble.

Senator Olson: That bit about padding the books is what is wrong.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We can make that the subject of another debate.

In the meantime, in light of the 11-month result, would the Leader of the Government not agree that the Minister of Finance should, with humility, revise his deficit projection downwards?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first of all, I think everyone will take some joy in the reduction of the deficit of this country, no matter in what month it occurs.

•(1420)

I believe the Minister of Finance has indicated that an increase in revenue has been registered which has shown, at a period in time, an effect on the deficit. He has not, however, indicated that he would alter his predictions because of the various one-time charges that my honourable friend knows about that would be recorded in that period of time. However, I again stress that any reduction in the deficit is welcomed, I am sure, by everyone in this house and in this country.

Senator Olson: You should be applauding!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are not applauding the minister's trickery, which he has included in his deficit projections, in the same way as he told us that the real unemployment rate in Canada was 20 per cent, a figure from which he subsequently backed away.

To help the Leader of the Government in the Senate appreciate the problem, let me point out that meeting the minister's deficit projection of $45.7 billion, which he has yet to revise, would result in a deficit for the month of March alone of over $12 billion. Is that the government's estimate for the month of March alone? Is the $45.7 billion therefore the government's official figure?

Honourable senators, we will be the laughing stock, not just politically, but of the world, when we come out with these outlandish statements for strictly narrow, political purposes.

Senator Fairbairn: I am tempted to recall a number of years in which deficit forecasting was wildly —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Now, Senator MacEachen is not here. It is not fair to say that in his absence.

Senator Fairbairn: — out of sync with reality.

Honourable senators, I will simply repeat to the Leader of the Opposition that the Minister of Finance stands by his projection, which, as you recall, he placed between $44 billion and $46 billion. He will be the happiest man in this country if the deficit is considerably lower than that.

The Minister of Finance has had cause for some encouragement in recently released statistics on unemployment. I realize that they represent only a small portion of time, but again they represent some cause for encouragement. These are extremely difficult times, and at this point in time the minister is not veering away from his deficit projection.

BOSNIA

UNITED NATIONS—REQUEST FOR NATO AIR STRIKES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate dealing with a specific aspect of the situation in Bosnia.

As I am sure the honourable senator is aware, the Secretary General of the United Nations has asked NATO to authorize certain air strikes to protect UN-designated safe areas — which is a misnomer, if there ever was one. This is distinct from the use of NATO air support to protect UN troops. The NATO Council will therefore have to make a decision whether to authorize air strikes or not to authorize air strikes.

My specific question is this: What position has the Government of Canada taken with respect to the decision to be made by the NATO Council?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I might preface my answer by stating the concern and horror with which we have been watching the situation in parts of the former Yugoslavia as it has deteriorated over the last few days. It has been of grave concern to those nations involved in peacekeeping operations, and there has been a plea to Bosnian Serbs that the only satisfactory and humane way of dealing with this issue is to come back to the negotiating table and attempt to work out, through diplomatic circuits, a ceasefire in an honest effort at peace negotiations.

•(1430)

On the specific question of the proposed NATO air strikes, it is now being suggested by the UN Secretary-General that we move, as the honourable senator has said, from strictly the protection of our peacekeeping forces to the protection of a variety of safe areas in that country. NATO is discussing that issue today and tomorrow. Our approval will be required before any action can be taken. The evaluation will have to take place on the basis of the safety of troops, the disruption of humanitarian aid deliveries and damage to the peace process.

As senators know, we have supported the use of defensive air strikes to protect our UN peacekeepers in response to military attack, but as a country, we continue to have very serious concerns about more broadly based air strikes, and that will be the topic of discussion and exchanges of views in reaching a conclusion within the NATO Council today and tomorrow.

Senator Ottenheimer: Would it be correct to infer from the minister's reply that the Government of Canada has not, as of now, made a decision with respect to the position it will take in the NATO Council?

Senator Fairbairn: I think it is safe to conclude, honourable senators, that Canada will be voicing very serious concerns in its discussions with its NATO allies. It will be in the context of those discussions and the sharing of concerns and the sharing of information, which has been changing almost hourly this morning and yesterday, that those decisions will be made.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ST. LAWRENCE VISION 2000—REDUCTION OF POLLUTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I want to congratulate the government on the plan announced yesterday in Montreal, St. Lawrence Vision 2000, to clean up the St. Lawrence River and, at the same time, spend $250 million.

This is a follow-up to the initiative by the previous government, of Phase 1, which created 11,000 jobs and $1 billion in indirect economic benefit. The second phase is expected to produce similar results, proving that environmental correctness always pays.

My question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is several-fold. Is it the government's intention to clean up the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes by the year 2000, or to spend $250 million by the year 2000? In that regard, can we clarify whether the objective is to achieve zero discharge or to achieve virtual elimination? I do not think that they are exactly the same, contrary to what the Minister of the Environment has stated.

Second, will the government now be willing, within this plan, to impose the "reverse onus of proof" standard which the International Joint Commission has urged for decision-making, that is, that chemicals are not presumed safe but must be proven safe before use?

Third, what are the targets for the reduction of air and soil pollution?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, each one of those questions is very important. I want to be absolutely candid with my colleague: I do not have the detailed answers, but I will be pleased to get them for her.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC GROUND-FISH STRATEGY—CHANGE IN BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eileen Rossiter: My question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable Senator Fairbairn. It is with regard to an announcement in St. John's, Newfoundland, today about the Atlantic Ground-Fish Strategy.

Under the previous program, $1 billion was allocated over two years, which was an average of $500 million per year. The new program is for $1.9 billion over five years, which, on average, is less than $400 million per year. Of those who are now receiving benefits, some will receive benefits for two years, some for three years, some for four years and some for five years.

How many of those who are now receiving benefits will lose them under the new program? As well, how many will qualify for the two, three, four and five years of benefits?

As well, could the honourable senator give us the year-by-year totals of how the $1.9 billion will be spent? For example, what is the anticipated budget of this program for next year, and what would be the anticipated budget for year five?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to get as detailed answers as possible to those precise questions.

The honourable senator is right in saying that the program announced today will be brought forward by the government. It is a five-year program with a $1.9-billion price tag, and her questions are based on those dollar terms.

As the honourable senator knows, in addition to the strict compensation to those involved, there is another aspect to the program, and that is an ambitious plan to try, through other avenues of programs and pilot projects involving retraining and literacy, to turn an incredible difficulty in Atlantic Canada into a new job opportunity for as many people as possible. That is in addition to supplying a slightly reduced compensation.

I will seek information from my colleagues with regard to the precise questions about the yearly expenditures and the numbers.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER—RECOMMENDATION TO DISCONTINUE BILINGUAL BONUS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, my first question for the Leader of the Government concerns the annual report of the Commissioner of Official Languages and the tabling of this document in the other place a week or ten days ago.

In this report, reference is made to breaches of the Official Languages Act and injustices suffered by the people of New Brunswick and other provinces.

When that report was tabled in the House of Commons, the usual opponents of institutional bilinguism, whom we know well, decided, true to character, to support the commissioner's recommendation to discontinue the payment of a bonus to those civil servants who, owing to the nature of their work, had to know and use both of Canada's official languages in the performance of their duties. I did not hear many members from the Bloc Québécois speak in support of the existing policy. That is not part of their plans, their agenda or their vision of things, for that matter.

In view of the fact that the Reform Party practically begged — without success, for the reasons that we know — to get the government to follow on up this recommendation regarding the elimination of the bonus, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what the government intends to do about this recommendation of the Commissioner of Official Languages?

[English]

•(1440)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will preface my remarks by stating that I have had a little difficulty hearing through my earphone.

On the matter of the bonus, I believe the Prime Minister indicated that he personally supported its continuation. I should like to review his exact words, but I believe that his view is that this has been a valuable tool, and should be continued.

The other statement that I will make to my honourable friend is that the government continues to support very firmly the official language programs and policies. That is a definite commitment by the federal government, and it will continue to be.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: I wish to thank the government leader in the Senate for her answer. In case I have not made myself clear, I want to say that I am one of those who are in favour of maintaining this bonus for our employees.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE OF ST-JEAN—CANCELLATION OF DECISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, with your permission, my second question is as follows.

Last week the Prime Minister, speaking on manpower training, called this demand a whim. This demand has long been made by successive governments in the province of Quebec. This demand is to ensure that manpower training, in fact, remains in provincial jurisdiction. Through federal-provincial agreements, Quebec and all other provinces that wish to make use of such an agreement can do so, no doubt on the basis of national standards.

The Prime Minister called this demand a whim. I think, from what we have heard, that the people disapprove of this use of the term by Mr. Chrétien.

My question concerns the urgent demand from federalists in Quebec and elsewhere to the government to review its decision to close the military college in St-Jean. Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate still think that this is a whim, even if federalists in Quebec and elsewhere continue to demand the continuation of military training in French in St-Jean? Is it one of those whims of which we are guilty, and will always be guilty? Is it the main reason that the government seems to be intransigent? Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us if there is anything new on this specific issue of the Royal Military College in St-Jean?

[English]

Senator Olson: That one question contained two preambles.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government: Honourable senators, I would assure the honourable senator that his questions on both subjects are extremely important, and are being taken extremely seriously.

On the question of the military college, we have exchanged views on this matter in the chamber on a number of occasions, and I understand it will be the subject of active consideration in the Senate committee that is studying the Estimates.

In that case, the government took a very serious decision which has saddened a great number of people. That decision was taken for budgetary reasons. The efforts that have been made in subsequent weeks continue with the province of Quebec, the Premier of Quebec and other interested parties in an effort to reach the best possible conclusion on the question of utilization of the facilities of that college. At the moment, I have nothing new to report to my honourable friend.

Senators — and I am sure my honourable friend will be one of them — will have an opportunity in committee to place their views on this matter, as forcefully as they wish, before those of my cabinet colleagues who are most directly involved in this area. Perhaps when those colleagues appear before the committee they will be in a better position than I am today to give new information.

On the question of manpower training, as my honourable friend knows, that is a shared jurisdiction in Canada. For a number of weeks the Minister of Human Resources Development has been engaged in consultation with his colleagues in every province, in an effort to put together the options that will guide the government in its decisions later this year. The consultations with the provinces have revolved around how we can better direct our social policy, and the issue of manpower training will obviously be part of that initiative.

This initiative stems from a very broad agreement reached last December at a first ministers conference that such a move is long overdue. There could not be a more difficult topic on which to begin study. It will take a lot of consultation and advice from all of the provinces, and very definitely from the province of Quebec, and that is what is in progress now.

ESTABLISHMENT OF INDUSTRY RENEWAL BOARDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BUY-BACK OF QUOTAS AND LICENCES

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, pursuant to my review of the information that the Minister of Fisheries gave to the population this morning, I have a couple of questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

In the backgrounder, there are some curious phrases. One of the most important components of the dialogue between the fishing industry, the minister and the department was the establishment of what started out to be rationalization offices. These were originally discussed in the Cashin report, and their definition broadened since then as the dialogue progressed. I see now that they are called "Industry Renewal Boards." That is fine.

I do not care what they are called, as long as they are there. However, the word "could" proliferates throughout the backgrounder, and there is no commitment to the establishment of such boards.

Will the minister approve the establishment of these rationalization offices, or Industry Renewal Boards, that were promised to the industry in the early stages of this dialogue? I think it is very important that we have a definitive answer on that.

In addition, will the buy-back of quotas and licences be respected? What funds are available for such buy-backs? Those are some important questions on which the industry is waiting for clear, precise answers.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for her question. On this very difficult policy there have been intensive and constant conversations and dialogue among all of the parties, because that is the only way in which this situation can be addressed. This dialogue has been guided, to a large extent, by advice from the workers and those who are involved in the fishery.

•(1450)

With regard to the Industry Renewal Boards, it is my understanding that consultations are continuing with the provincial governments and the industry with respect to the structure of those boards, the details of which are expected to be announced in June.

Those boards will be composed of members chosen jointly by Ottawa and the provinces involved. The underlying purpose of the boards is to ensure that there is local, on-the-ground direction in the whole restructuring process.

Concerning the buy-back question, I should like to obtain more information on that subject for my honourable friend.

PRECINCTS OF PARLIAMENT

PROPOSED RENOVATIONS TO EAST AND CENTRE BLOCKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to vague and unexplained undertakings to repair, remodel and revise the use of the East Block and the Centre Block of these Parliament Buildings without any recent consent or agreement of this chamber.

An earlier question elicited the leader's promise to give attention to the situation in which officials in the Public Works Department, if not the minister himself, seem to believe that senators are no more than tenants in these buildings, and that tenants must do as they are told, when they are told, or face eviction.

While waiting for an answer to the earlier question, honourable senators have received a notice from an official in the Senate's Services Directorate under the heading, "1910 Wing of the East Block to be Renovated." We are told, "Work is scheduled to begin in May and will be carried out during regular business hours."

The Senate's Services Directorate tells us in a printed notice that our cooperation will be greatly appreciated. Appreciated by whom? In whose name are these decisions being taken? It is certainly not with the authority of this chamber, which last heard of this subject on Thursday, February 10, when Senator Lavoie-Roux, the retiring chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, added her voice to mine in a plea that the matter of East Block and peripheral expenditures should be the subject of an open debate by all senators.

In the interval, some aspects of the subject have been discussed by the Internal Economy Committee, but that committee's decisions are subject to the approval of this chamber when its reports are submitted.

My question is the following: Is there to be an opportunity for senators to give their views on how very necessary repairs should be made to the East Block, and whether that work should be directly linked to the committing of millions of dollars on Centre Block changes at a time when, for want of money, Canada is shutting down employment opportunities throughout the public service?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Senator Doyle for his question. I have not forgotten his earlier question. I have been seeking more information than that which I was initially given for the purpose of responding to it.

I should like to read his remarks of today in the Debates of the Senate, add them to the pot and come up with a quick response for the honourable senator.

Senator Doyle: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

At the last meeting of the Internal Economy Committee, the chairman, Senator Hastings, advised members that "Your subcommittee agreed that we concur in the recommendation of Public Works and Government Services Canada to provide a committee room in the Victoria Building for the temporary use of the Senate" and "concurred in the recommendations of Public Works for the use of office space in the 1910 wing of the East Block." Senators will note the severe limits of the two recommendations, which subsequently were adopted by the Internal Economy Committee as a whole, but which, to this moment, have not been approved by the Senate.

I would respectfully direct the attention of the Leader of the Government and all senators to the statement made before the committee by the representative of the department and Minister of Public Works; the representative who carries messages to this house. The official transcript quotes him as having said:

> The overall plan for the development of the parliamentary precinct over the next 12 years was presented to honourable senators over the last number of years. The last time all of this was presented was in December of 1991, when the plans put forward at that time were approved by the Committee of Internal Economy and Budgets.

What constituted "approval" on that occasion? The matter — or various aspects of it — was discussed at a long and tedious meeting of Internal Economy on December 12, 1991, at which Senator LeBlanc offered the very good advice:

> If it is not affordable, we then argue for a delay. Let us not bring in a whole series of distractions to what has been accepted.

Oddly, I can find no record of the report and transcript of that meeting being approved or even presented in this chamber. Nor, to my knowledge, was there an occasion on the presentation of other budget material when reports on this multimillion dollar project were debated.

The fact remains that the government of the day decided well before December 1991 not to proceed with the program. It agreed that repairs and remodelling would have to be done, but declined to underwrite the multimillion dollar project while the economic health of the country was moving into recession.

I can report to honourable senators that the recession has not abated in my constituency.

My question to the Leader of the Government is this: Is it government policy to reach back to a time of relative affluence to revive, without question, a project that was delayed with no complaints in this chamber or the other place by a previous government?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will take the comments of the honourable senator and the transcripts to which he has referred and see what I can come up with.

The ultimate comment to make is that when reports on this issue from the Internal Economy Committee are reported to this house — and I suffer from not having Senator Hastings here at the moment to advise me — they may certainly receive a full airing.

I will take what Senator Doyle has said as notice and see what I can come up with.

•(1500)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I regret that the time allocated for Question Period has expired. Perhaps we should try to make the questions shorter so that more questions could be asked and answers given.

I apologize especially because I was forced to extend the time slightly, as Senator Doyle was standing to put forward a supplementary question and I did not think that it would be fair to interrupt him in the middle of his phrase.

Perhaps, honourable senators, we might have some discussion as to how we might accommodate our colleagues who were standing and wished to ask questions.

Hon. H.A. Olson: We need more discipline. It is a flagrant disregard for the rules.

Senator Berntson: We should have unlimited time.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: I should like to raise a point of order pertaining to what His Honour has just said. That point concerns the rules that currently exist relating to Question Period. I call your attention to rule 24(4), which states:

> A debate is out of order on an oral question, but brief explanatory remarks may be made...

Rule 26 states:

> A preamble to a question, whether it is asked orally or in writing, is out of order.

This is not to criticize anything that has just taken place, or that may occur on any day. Senator Olson invented the long preamble; we know that. He was developing sheets of paper and documents to send out to his constituents every week. We sympathized with that, but we did not have strong rules at that time. We would simply complain every now and again. We found with Senator Olson that once we raised a point of order on his long preamble, we would just get another long preamble, so complaining did not work.

Perhaps we should review our rules, with a view to changing them in an effort to dignify what we are doing, because we are now getting into long debates; we are entertaining long discussions that should be the subject of Notices of Inquiries and a full discussion. We are getting it mixed up. I urge whoever has responsibility for the rules to take a close look at them, and I urge all senators to take a look at page 29 in the rule book and think about it.

Hon. H. A. Olson: I want to support Senator Kelly in the admonition that he has just given to the Senate. Changing the rules in the rule book is one thing, but what is required most of all is the discipline necessary to adhere to the rule book.

The rules are fairly clear. Senator Kelly is something of an expert on this because he has been practising admonishing people to obey the rules for quite a long time. I am glad he is back; we missed him.

What senators saw here today was a flagrant disregard for the rules that turned Question Period into a debating period. That is what Senator Doyle and Senator Simard did a few minutes ago. But there is nothing new about that. They did it almost every day while you were gone, Senator Kelly. I want to support you completely. I hope that the admonition you have made today will result in senators exercising self-discipline in adhering to the rules. We could change the rule book, but obviously members opposite do not pay too much attention to it, in any event.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Would Senator Olson permit a question?

The Hon. the Speaker: The issue was raised on a point of order. I appreciate the fact that I was not asked to give a ruling on that matter. Perhaps at this time we should go into a period of reflection and quiet discussion, with a view to finding a solution to our problem in recognizing the clock at the appropriate times.

Senator Olson: Yes, and also out of respect for other members who wish to ask questions.

Senator Berntson: Exactly.

Senator Ottenheimer: Would Senator Olson conduct some seminars in discipline for the benefit of other senators?

Senator Olson: I will get Senator Kelly to help.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several delayed answers to questions from honourable senators. One question was asked by Senator Lavoie-Roux on February 23, regarding the closure of St-Jean Military College; another was asked on February 23 by Senator Spivak, concerning the International Joint Commission — Recommendations on Toxicity Reduction in Great Lakes. Senator DeWare asked a question on March 15, regarding New Brunswick — Changes to Unemployment Insurance. Another question was asked by Senator Kinsella on March 15, regarding expected savings from the closure of the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean, and another was asked by Senator Jessiman on March 17, regarding the admission of students from Maritime provinces to Royal Military College in Kingston. On March 17, Senator Lynch-Staunton asked a question regarding grants in lieu of taxes.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EFFECTS OF CLOSURE OF ST-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux on February 23, 1994)

After all one-time expenses have been taken into account, the closure of Collège militaire royal is expected to yield net savings of approximately $23.1 million annually, in 1993-94 dollars.

There are 92 military personnel, 173 full time and 154 short term and part time civilian personnel at Collège militaire royal employed in the education and training of 623 military students. In addition, there are an estimated additional 45 military and 50 civilians employed by CFB St-Jean who support the CMR operation.

The decision to consolidate military training at Royal Military College and to close CMR and Royal Roads Military College was taken for budgetary and operational reasons. The Collège militaire royal will not be closed until the end of the next school year. In the meantime, the federal government is working with the Quebec government officials to find a way to put the facility to good use and are prepared to provide assistance.

The Government is committed to maintaining the current overall francophone population in the military college system which is 30 percent. RMC currently has a bilingual capacity and it has been graduating bilingual officers. By combining all three colleges, and increasing the number of francophone students and faculty, RMC will have a bilingual capacity in all disciplines. We intend to change the name of RMC to reflect the bilingual nature of the school.

DND will work actively with the community in continuing to build an environment that will welcome francophones to the Kingston area. The Canadian Forces are committed to the goal of a bilingual officer corps and we believe the consolidation of english and french-speaking cadets at a single military college will help us achieve our goal.

THE ENVIRONMENT

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—RECOMMENDATIONS ON TOXICITY REDUCTION IN GREAT LAKES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Mira Spivak on February 23, 1994)

The Government of Canada, in cooperation with stakeholders, will be proactive by reducing or eliminating those discharges of toxic substances, including chlorine-based compounds that are determined, on the basis of sound science, to be persistent and bioaccumulative. This is an integral part of our strategy under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, namely, to scientifically assess the potential harm posed by specific substances and to evaluate measures that can be used to reduce the exposure to humans or ecosystems, and to determine what actions are warranted, including regulation.

The Minister of Environment has indicated in the House of Commons that she is prepared to table within the next four to six months a plan which will lead to the development of a list of timetables and schedules for the sunsetting of specific problem chemicals, some of which are organo-chlorines.

THE BUDGET

(Response to question raised by Hon. Mable DeWare on March 15, 1994)

The UI program is an integral part of the social security system and will be a key part of the comprehensive overhaul that is now getting under way. However, the budget measures are necessary now in order to protect jobs. The changes to the UI program will mean lower costs for Canadian employers which will contribute to both export growth and more effective competition, with imports in both cases generating more jobs in all regions of Canada. The reduced premium rate for 1995 and 1996 will provide tax relief for all contributors and preserve or create more than 40,000 jobs.

The impact of the increase in entrance requirements cannot be viewed in isolation. The effects will be mitigated by job creation resulting from premium reduction, the infrastructure program, youth service corps and the youth internship initiative.

- Joint initiatives such as N.B. Job Corps (announced on March 23) will also go a long way in providing meaningful work opportunities.

The government is also committed to work with the provinces to use the funds made available in the budget for social security strategic initiatives to help address the impact of these UI changes.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ST-JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE—EFFECTS OF PROPOSED CLOSURE ON MARITIME STUDENTS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman on March 17, 1994)

It is recognized that the educational system varies from province to province, or sometimes within provinces, and the military college system must take this into account. Under the current system, some candidates are accepted into first year as senior entrants; some enter the preparatory year as junior entrants; some senior entrants are required to complete a five-week "Academic Bridging Programme"; and a few senior entrants are granted advanced standing into second year. The single military college at Kingston will retain all these methods of entry. Collège militaire royal will admit one more preparatory year class in the fall of 1994. The Department of National Defence is still considering exactly how and where the preparatory year will be conducted after CMR closes in 1995. In conclusion, candidates from the maritimes will still be eligible to enter the Canadian Forces as military college candidates directly after high school graduation.

THE BUDGET

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN LIEU OF TAXES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. John Lynch-Staunton on March 17, 1994)

Grants in lieu of taxes are paid to about 2,200 municipalities across Canada at an annual cost of about $600 million.

In December 1992, the previous government froze grants at the 1992 levels for 1993 and 1994 and launched consultations with the Federation of Canadian Municipalities (FCM) to examine ways of restructuring the program.

The 1994 budget contained no action on grants in lieu because it did not want to pre-empt the outcome of consultations with the FCM.

The program of grants in lieu of property taxes experienced very rapid growth in the 1980s and early 1990s, prior to the imposition of the freeze.

In order to ensure that the costs of the program do not spiral out of control, the government is attempting to find a balance, in concert with the FCM, between reasonable federal government expenditure and fairness to Canadian municipalities.

We look forward to a satisfactory resolution of the negotiations between the FCM and the federal government.

NATIONAL FINANCE

INTEREST RATE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, on March 22 last, I asked the Leader of the Government to consult with the Minister of Finance and obtain a reasoned, prepared reply on the question of the bank rate and the increases that had taken place in the bank rate. Unfortunately, however, the delayed reply is not among those given today.

Would the Leader of the Government ask the minister, in preparing the reply, to take into account the fact that today, April 19, the bank rate has been increased a further 42 basis points, which is, in total, a two per cent increase since the February 22 budget. He may wish to take these matters and subsequent increases into account in preparing his reply.

Further, I should like to know what the impact of this increase is on the minister's fiscal plan, given that he has provided a certain amount of money in a contingency fund for such a purpose. At this rate, how long will the contingency fund last?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to do so. I should tell Senator Murray that there is not a delayed response today because I received a response that I felt needed updating. I will tell those involved to further update it.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT SUSPENSION BILL, 1994

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. P. Derek Lewis moved the second reading of Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move the second reading of Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. The bill itself is very short, being only five clauses in length, including the short title. The bill is quite clear, concise, to the point, and effects to do exactly what it states: to suspend the electoral boundaries readjustment process.

Honourable senators, the current process of adjusting constituency boundaries has been in place since 1964, and it is felt that, after 30 years, the time is opportune for a fundamental review of all aspects of the process.

It is considered that all aspects of the matter should be reviewed in a thorough way by a committee of the other place. It appears to be an appropriate time to do so while we are still at an early stage in the present process.

However, I must emphasize that the existing electoral boundaries commissions have already started to hold public hearings on their proposals for new electoral boundaries. Therefore, it is important to adopt Bill C-18 as soon as possible in order to ensure that no further effort and resources are expended.

The electoral boundaries readjustment process was suspended in June 1992 to give the government of the day and Parliament time to consider the relevant recommendations of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform — that is, the Lortie commission.

The Special House Committee on Electoral Reform, which was mandated to study the Lortie recommendations, issued two reports on electoral matters, one of which formed the basis of government Bill C-114, which came into force on June 25, 1993. The special committee had not yet dealt with the electoral boundaries readjustment process when the house was dissolved for the last general election.

The suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act was not extended, and the readjustment process was started in September 1993. Although the readjustment process is technical, I believe it is worthwhile taking a few minutes to outline how it works.

There are two stages in redistribution of seats in the House of Commons. The first stage is governed by section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which specifies the formula for determining the total number of seats in the House of Commons and the allocation of those seats among the provinces. The second stage of the process is provided for in the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, which establishes the process for drawing the constituency boundaries for the individual provinces.

Section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867 requires redistribution after each decennial census and sets out the formula for determining the number of seats per province.

The Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act sets out the detailed process for the readjustment of the boundaries. As the first step in the process, the Chief Statistician of Canada sends the results of the decennial census to the minister responsible for the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to the Chief Electoral Officer. The Chief Electoral Officer then calculates the number of seats allocated to each province by using the formula set out in section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and publishes the results in the Canada Gazette.

After having received the results of the 1991 census from the Chief Statistician, the Chief Electoral Officer published in the Canada Gazette the allocation of seats to each province. According to this seat allocation, and if this process is completed under the current formula, the number of seats in the house would increase from 295 to 301 seats. There would be two more seats in British Columbia and four more in Ontario.

On September 2, 1993, eleven electoral boundaries commissions, one for each province and one for the Northwest Territories, were created under the terms of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, the chairs being nominated by the respective chief justices of the provinces, and two other members of each commission by the Speaker of the House of Commons.

The commissions must set the boundaries for the specified number of electoral districts in the province for which they were established. In doing this they may take into account community of interest, community of identity, historical patterns and geography.

Using population data from the 1991 decennial census, the eleven commissions have published their proposals for new boundaries in each province, with notice of the time and place of the sittings to hear representations on the proposed boundaries. The public hearings started in mid-April 1994 and will continue until June 1994. Each commission must complete its report on the new electoral districts no later than one year after receiving the population data. The commissions' reports are sent to the Speaker of the other place, who must ensure that they are tabled and referred to a committee of the other place designated to deal with electoral matters.

Written objections, each signed by at least ten MPs, may be filed by the committee after the tabling of a report. The committee has 30 days to discuss any objections to a report. The committee's minutes of proceedings are sent back to the commissions, which then decide whether or not to adjust their reports accordingly.

The Chief Electoral Officer then drafts a "Representation Order," describing and naming each electoral district established by the commissions, and sends it to the minister responsible for the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. The Governor in Council must publicly announce the new boundaries in a proclamation within five days after the receipt by the minister of the draft representation order.

The new boundaries cannot be used at an election until at least one year has passed between the date on which the representation order is proclaimed and the date on which Parliament is dissolved for a general election.

As you can see, a number of steps remain to be undertaken in the examination of electoral boundaries by the existing commissions.

It appears that some dissatisfaction has been expressed with regard to the current process of readjustment. For example, the commissions publish their initial proposals without having had a chance to obtain input from interested parties. Thus, when published, these proposals often come as a complete surprise.

Although some commissions explain the reasons for their proposals, they are not required to do so. It is therefore very difficult for a person who intends to make representations to a commission to know the reasons behind the proposals and to make objections or present alternatives in an effective manner.

It is felt that the criteria that the commissions use to set the boundaries may have to be rethought. The present criteria are quite general and, depending on the approach taken by each commission, the rationale for drawing electoral boundaries can differ considerably from one province to another.

Another issue of concern is the continual increase in the number of members of the House of Commons after each census. For example, since Confederation, the number of seats in the House of Commons has increased steadily from 181 in 1867 to the current level of 295. The above are only examples of areas that it is felt should be thoroughly reviewed.

The government has therefore decided to ask the other place to refer the electoral boundaries readjustment process to its Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs for review, and to develop improvements to the current procedure. The committee is expected to report no later than December 16, 1994. I understand that there is already a motion before the other place for such a reference to the committee.

In order to allow for this thorough review of all aspects of the process, the current process has to be suspended. Accordingly, we have before us Bill C-18 which, if passed, would suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act for a period of 24 months.

Finally, the bill specifically provides that new commissions will have to be established within 60 days after the end of the 24-month period of suspension. They will follow the existing rules unless, in the meantime, legislation is enacted establishing changes which may result from the work of the standing committee. This is to ensure continuity of the requirement under the Constitution to readjust electoral boundaries after every decennial census.

When it undertakes its review of this matter and makes recommendations for possible new legislation, the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs may make recommendations regarding the time frame of 24 months or the method by which commissions are established.

Before I close, let me deal with one further point. Some have suggested that there may be some difficulty with the constitutionality of Bill C-18. Let me affirm that Bill C-18 does not contravene the Constitution. Section 51 of the Constitution Act requires that the number of members of the House of Commons and the representation of the provinces in the house be readjusted after each decennial census.

The suspension of the electoral boundaries readjustment process provided for in Bill C-18 does not in any way contravene the requirements of section 51 of the Constitution. According to section 51, the readjustment process must take place after each decennial census. Section 51 does not require that the readjustment be made at a specific point in time after each decennial census. It only requires that there be one after each decennial census.

After both the 1971 and 1981 censuses, the readjustment process was suspended to permit amendments to section 51 of the Constitution, setting out the formula for representation of provinces in the house, and to make some changes to the readjustment process. In both cases, the process was suspended at a later stage in the process when the house was considering the commissions' reports.

In conclusion, the adjustment of electoral boundaries touches important questions of democratic representation in Parliament. Now is an ideal time to have a thorough review of the process undertaken while we are still at an early stage, and to have Canadians heard through the standing committee. The committee hearings are planned to be public, and outside witnesses will be heard. I therefore recommend quick passage of this bill.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, that such a miserable piece of legislation should have such a reputable and distinguished sponsor is almost enough to make one suspend disbelief — almost, but not quite.

I thank my honourable friend for the generally factual approach that he has taken to this bill, and to explaining it to us. As he has said, it is a bill with not much nuance or subtlety to it. It is clear, it is concise and, as he said, it achieves what it set out to achieve. Well, in common parlance, you're bloody right it does. This is fitting, I suppose, for a bill that had its inspiration in an uprising on the Liberal back bench and its execution in a government bill brought in by the Solicitor General and Leader of the House of Commons in response — I think in rather hasty response — to that uprising.

Honourable senators, let us be clear about the principles that are at issue in this bill. The principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons on the basis of population was established by the Constitution Act of 1867, the BNA Act. That principle contained within it the response to the agitation for "rep by pop" The very phrase calls to mind the impassioned debates of the 1850s and 1860s in the united Province of Canada.

Representation by population was one of the pillars of the Confederation agreement of 1867. It was no less important a contributing factor and condition of Confederation than those other pillars: a federal system of government with the division of powers, the concept of partnership and equality between French and English Canadians; the terms that brought Nova Scotia and New Brunswick into the union and thereby made Confederation possible.

However, if the Constitution established proportionate representation, it was left to Parliament to draw the constituency boundaries within the provinces on the basis of the decennial census every ten years. For almost 100 years in this country, the redistribution process was in the hands of elected members of the House of Commons. That is to say, it was controlled by a majority government of whatever stripe, Liberal or Conservative, in the other place. Not much attention was given to the idea that constituencies should be of relatively equal population size. That seemed to be of less importance than a number of other factors, such as the geographic size of rural constituencies that members of Parliament had to serve.

One should not, perhaps, be too harshly critical of 19th century arrangements in applying to them the democratic standards of a later age, and one certainly should not do so if one is a senator. However, even allowing for that, the fact is that the old system of redistribution, the partisan-dominated system of redistribution, endured long beyond the time when it was recognized as being wrong in principle and susceptible to the most outrageous abuses in practice.

Redistribution under those circumstances was sometimes a bad joke; at worst it was a travesty of democracy. One of the most notorious examples in relatively modern times was the attempt in three consecutive redistributions in the 1940s and 1950s by a Liberal majority government, under the guidance of the "master machine" politician, James Gardiner of Saskatchewan, to gerrymander John Diefenbaker out of a seat in the House of Commons.

It was not until 1964 that Parliament, at the initiative of the Pearson government, cleaned up that act and gave Canada a redistribution process that would be worthy of a modern democratic state. As a result of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, we have had in this country for 30 years a process that is impartial, that is open and fair and, generally speaking, has served Canada well through three redistributions.

In 1982, the principle of proportionate representation by population was considered so important a part of our democratic society that any change to it was put beyond the reach of the federal Parliament acting alone. Any amendment to the Constitution relating to the principle of proportionate representation requires the consent of seven provinces with at least 50 per cent of the population.

•(1530)

In 1982, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in section 3 guaranteed to every Canadian citizen the right to vote in federal and provincial elections. That right to vote that each of us enjoys as individuals extends well beyond the simple casting of a ballot on election day. The courts have found that the right to vote includes the relative equality of voting power; the notion that each of us has an equal portion of democratic power. On that, Madam Justice Beverly McLachlin has said:

> The concept of representation by population is one of the most fundamental democratic guarantees. And the notion of equality of voting power is fundamental to representation by population.

In other words, equality and democracy go together, honourable senators.

We all know that from the beginning these principles, the strict mathematical application of "rep by pop" or the equality of voting power, have been modified. They have been modified to protect the smaller provinces. They have been modified to accommodate particular geographic and demographic situations. They have been modified to recognize community of interest and some of the factors to which Senator Lewis referred in his speech. These modifications have passed the test of commonsense, and have been found by courts to be justifiable in a country as diverse as ours.

However, honourable senators, the dominant consideration in our system is still population. Any departure from it and from what the courts now call "the relative equality of voting power" violates the Charter and has to be justified under section 3 as a justifiable limitation of our rights in a free and democratic society. Therefore these principles are at the core of our history, of our democratic values as they have evolved over the years, and of our democratic parliamentary system. If governments can override these principles, if a government can gut these principles or put them in the deep freeze, which is what is being proposed in this bill, then democracy is on its way to becoming a shell.

Senator Lewis has described quite fully the redistribution process that, in essence, we have had in this country since 1964, and I will not repeat what he has said. I simply draw your attention to a couple of elements of it.

The chairman of each of these 11 commissions is appointed by the chief justice of the province or territory from among the judges of the superior court of that province or territory. The other two members of the commission in each province or territory are appointed by the elected Speaker of the House of Commons. The number of seats for each province or territory is determined in accordance with the Constitution and the Act on the basis of decennial census. The number of seats for each province or territory is divided into the total population of that province or territory to produce a quotient of voters for each constituency in the province or territory. Variances are permitted by the law up to 25 per cent above or below the quotient in order to take account of community of interest, historic factors and special circumstances of the kind that Senator Lewis mentioned in his speech.

The commissions then proceed to draw up the maps. The maps are published, public hearings are held and representations are made, after which the commissions may, and usually do, make changes — in many cases massive changes — to their first proposals. When that is done the revised maps, the second draft, go to the House of Commons and there members of Parliament have an opportunity to comment, and to send the maps back for a third consideration by the impartial commissions. It is only after this careful, extensive, eminently open and fair process that the maps are put into final form and proclaimed to take effect 12 months later.

That is the process by which, every ten years, we apply the principles first affirmed in the Constitution of 1867, improved upon in 1982, and reinforced by recent decisions of the courts. That is how we keep those principles up to date: a decennial redistribution process. If we fail to respect that process, if we fail to apply it to the changing times, then the principles become meaningless; become a dead letter.

Bill C-18 will suspend that process in such a way as to ensure that the process will not apply to the next election, expected in 1997 or 1998. If this timetable holds, an election in 1997 or 1998 will be fought on the basis of boundaries from the 1981 census. In a country where population growth and internal migration are so dynamic — I have been told that 20 per cent of Canadians change their residence every year — this result of a 1981 census for a 1997 or 1998 election has to be a violation of the spirit and the integrity of the Constitution, if not of its letter.

Senator Lewis has argued the constitutionality of this bill according to the letter. His argument is, if I understand it correctly, that while section 51 requires that a redistribution take place after every decennial census, it does not specify a particular time frame within which that must be done. Government officials from the Privy Council Office have attended the House of Commons committee on this bill. They seemed to suggest, relying on testimony heard at the Senate committee a few years ago on Bill C-67, that so long as the government initiated a redistribution process before the next census, it was fine as far as the Constitution was concerned.

Honourable senators, I think that is stretching the point. I do not know any more than anybody else does how the courts might treat a bill like this if it ever went to them, but the kind of statement that Madam Justice McLachlin made when she was on the bench in British Columbia, and that other justices in the superior courts of two provinces and the Supreme Court of Canada have made, lead me to believe that their interpretation might not be as casual, as liberal or as permissive as Senator Lewis suggests.

Honourable senators, consider the result of this bill in the context of the principles of "rep by pop" on the relative equality of individual voting power. The two provinces that are the big losers are Ontario and British Columbia. Ontario will be deprived of four additional seats at the time of the next election; British Columbia will be deprived of two additional MPs at the time of the next election. I am told that the rate of population growth in British Columbia is twice as fast as the national average, and we will be asking those people to be content until the year 2002 or 2003, perhaps, with representation in the House of Commons based on the 1981 census. As if there was not already enough sense of grievance in that part of the country!

If British Columbia and Ontario are the big losers as provinces, there are millions of losers in virtually every province. These are the people who live in the faster growing and more populous areas of almost every province in the country. Their portion of democratic power becomes smaller and smaller as time goes on. The exercise of their ballot becomes less meaningful — yes, a less meaningful exercise.

Honourable senators, consider the distortions and the abuse of representative democracy that will result from this bill. The present boundaries based on the 1981 census were out of date when they were proclaimed in 1986. By the time of the 1993 election, which was the second election fought on those boundaries, one constituency in five was above or below the 25 per cent tolerance level. By 1997, given present population projections, an election held on the 1981 census — on those boundaries — will result in one constituency in four being above or below the 25 per cent variance. The 25 per cent variance is already, in my view, a very generous deviation.

Let us look at a couple of specific cases to see how it works in terms of the principles we are talking about today. In the Ottawa area, it will take two votes in Kanata to equal one vote in Westboro; two votes in Orleans will be worth one vote in the Glebe. How can you justify this kind of distortion in ridings that are within a relatively small area? It is one thing to allow some variance for the Northwest Territories, or large rural ridings in relation to urban ridings, but these distortions are within this relatively small area.

The population of North York by 1997 will be three and a half times the size of the neighbouring constituency of York Centre. Seven voters on the north side of Steeles Avenue will be equal to two voters living across the street on the south side. This bill sets up a situation in which there is a degree of manipulation and distortion of representative democracy that would be more typical of a backwoods state in the Deep South a half century ago. I mean, it is nonsense.

Honourable senators, this bill dilutes in a serious way the democratic right of millions of Canadians living in the faster growing areas of Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, Calgary and Vancouver. Their right to vote and their right to a relative equality of voting power is being treated with contempt in this bill.

What justification is offered by the government for this bill? The responsible minister, Mr. Gray, says that the time has come to review the entire redistribution process. Of course we agree. A royal commission under Pierre Lortie has made numerous recommendations, most of which will provide a good basis for consideration by the parliamentary committee.

Our friend Senator Lewis today enumerated some of the shortcomings of the present process as he sees them: There is not enough input from the public before the preliminary maps are drawn up; the criteria are too general; there is a lot of concern about the size of the House of Commons. Even if we acknowledge all of those shortcomings, all of the shortcomings of the present process put together are not as significant as the violation of representative democracy that would result from this bill!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am afraid that the shameful truth about the motivation and the purpose of this bill had already come out before Senator Lewis had an opportunity to examine it, or examine the motivation and the purpose more carefully. Mr. Peter Milliken, MP, who is the parliamentary secretary to Mr. Gray, is quoted in the Vancouver Sun as saying that this bill is a result of a revolt by MPs against the boundary changes proposed by the commissions, particularly in Atlantic Canada and southern Ontario.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Murray: Indeed, the statement was confirmed. If you read the second reading debates in the House of Commons or the committee hearings, one after another the Liberal MPs stood up, most of them newly elected, to complain about the boundaries of the new maps. They gave the game away.

Honourable senators, this bill is not about revising the process. This bill is about the discontent — understandable in a political context — of new members who see changes being made to their ridings in an impartial way. Even some Liberals are ashamed of this bill. John Nunziata, MP, is quoted by The Globe and Mail as saying:

•(1550)

> It is hard to see what was done here as anything other than self-interested politics. It makes no sense other than for self-preservation and MPs convenience.

The Globe and Mail says that at a caucus meeting last month:

> Liberal MPs from Central Ontario said the boundary revisions would adversely affect local campaign organizations, especially in weakly held ridings.

The article continues:

> The MPs burst into applause when Solicitor General Herbert Gray, the minister responsible for elections legislation, promised that the government would block the process.

That is what this bill is all about.

Honourable senators, the duty of Mr. Gray, as a minister of the Crown, was to defend the integrity and the impartiality of the redistribution process. He could have told the Liberal MPs that if they had problems with those boundaries, they and their constituents could go and make their representations in a public forum to the open hearings of the redistribution commissions in their provinces. He could have told the Liberal MPs that, in the past, substantial changes have been made by the commissions to the maps on the basis of representations heard in the public hearings.

He could have told the Liberal MPs that, even after the maps are revised and the second draft comes to the House of Commons, the MPs have an opportunity to comment and send them back to the commission for another look. He could have told the MPs that, for 30 years, this process has been impartial, open, fair, and is respected for its impartiality by Canadians, and that the government will not interfere in it for partisan political reasons. But he did not do so. Instead of that, he brought forward this bill with the applause of the Liberal caucus ringing in his ears.

This bill suspends the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act for two years. It abolishes the 11 commissions that have already completed a good part of their work. A House of Commons committee is to be appointed. It will report in December. They may draft new legislation.

The bill provides two years of suspension from the date of Royal Assent, and a further 60 days for the Governor in Council to appoint 11 new commissions. No one seriously believes that, with that timetable, an impartial redistribution will be possible before an election in 1997 or 1998. Indeed, the intent of this whole elaborate, shoddy exercise is to ensure that no redistribution will happen before the next election.

This bill has been produced by a government that is less than six months into its first mandate. It is a government that is still enjoying a honeymoon with the Canadian people, still riding high in the polls. People want this government to succeed in areas where other governments have failed. People want to think well of this government.

Whatever the partisan advantage that the Liberal back-benchers may think they will derive from this bill, surely longer heads in the Liberal Party know that it will be more than cancelled out by the damage that a bill like this does to a government's integrity and its reputation for fair dealing.

This is a government that promised to turn the page on some of the partisan excesses of the past. Instead, it reached back more than 30 years to resurrect one of the most odious and disreputable practices of an almost forgotten and best forgotten past: the practice of blatant political interference with electoral boundaries. They would lose nothing; they would only gain in stature and public respect if they walked away from this bill now, and got on with the business that the people elected them to do.

On motion of Senator Berntson, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Michael Kirby moved the second reading of Bill C-9, to amend the Income Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to make a few remarks at the beginning of the second reading debate on Bill C-9 by way of explanation as to what this bill contains.

Bill C-9 contains a number of changes to the Income Tax Act, which changes originated in the former government's financial statement of December 1992 and the budget of February 1993. In other words, this bill implements changes to the Income Tax Act which were announced by the previous government well over a year ago.

The previous government introduced Bill C-136, which contained the changes that are contained in this bill. However, these measures died on the Order Paper when the election was called and Parliament was dissolved last year. Therefore, in order to ultimately have legal effect, these changes must now be passed into law by this Parliament.

Let me explain very briefly why the government is proceeding with these changes, particularly in light of the fact that they relate to a budget of a previous administration, and the fact that some of these changes have actually run their full course; that is to say, they are now no longer required. They effectively expired at the end of March of this year.

The reason for proceeding with the legislation, honourable senators, is that Canadians, both individuals and corporations, made decisions based on the assumption that a budget introduced by a majority government would, in fact, ultimately be put into effect. They made decisions, for example, to use RRSP money to buy new homes, trusting that a budget introduced by a majority government would be implemented. It is this government's view that because many of the decisions that both individuals and corporations made in good faith a year ago, and longer, are irreversible, it is important for this government to clean up this housekeeping problem by passing legislation which puts into effect measures from these previous budgets.

•(1600)

That being said, I should also add that the government believes that the measures contained in this bill are justifiable and should be supported in their own right. There is only one measure which was dropped from the previous bill, Bill C-136, which was introduced in the last session of Parliament. It is a measure that would have had the government giving GST credits to low income Canadians twice a year as opposed to quarterly, as has been the case since the GST was introduced. The measure was dropped because the government believes that as long as the GST is in effect, it is appropriate that low income Canadians should receive their credits on a quarterly basis and not semi-annually.

Having said that, I should like to reiterate what all members of this chamber know. That is to say, the House of Commons Finance Committee is currently holding hearings to explore ways in which the GST can be changed dramatically.

With that background, I should like to point out to honourable senators two or three matters that are in the bill, and about which they should be aware. First, there was an extension of the home buyers' plan by one year from the date of the February 1993 budget. That one-year extension expired on March 1, 1994. A number of taxpayers took advantage of this provision. In order to justify retroactively those actions for tax purposes, it is necessary to pass this legislation.

Second, there is a measure contained in Bill C-9 which was also in Bill C-136 that has to do with the way in which higher income Canadians make quarterly instalment payments on the annual income tax which they owe. This measure affects people whose payable tax is $2,000 more than the total amount of tax withheld at source. In other words, if total tax payments for a year exceed by $2,000 the amount of tax withheld at source, either in the current year or in the preceding two years, then quarterly payments will be required. On the other end of the income scale, some 300,000 low-income earners will be excused from making quarterly payments and be required to pay once a year, at the end of the fiscal year.

There are two or three other minor elements in the bill about which honourable senators ought to be aware. One concerns an investment tax credit for small business which extended the original investment tax credit for purchases of eligible machinery and equipment from December 2, 1992 through to the end of the 1993 calendar year. Corporations took advantage of this measure at the time it was announced by the minister in December of 1992. What this bill seeks to do is to put into effect a measure of which many small businesses took advantage, and which has now expired.

In a similar way, the budget of 1993 extended the Small Business Financing Program for another year. That measure has also expired. This bill will legitimize the activities of which companies took advantage during that period of time.

The removal of any limits on holdings of small business shares in RRSPs and RIFs, which was announced in 1993 and which is still in effect, is included in this bill.

Finally, there is an extension of the 35 per cent investment tax credit available to small Canadian-controlled private corporations for eligible research and development expenditures.

This bill includes more flexible rules for investments in labour-sponsored venture capital corporations, a measure which was introduced over a year ago and which has been in effect since then, although it has not been legitimized by law.

The failure of this bill to pass would leave Canadians to question whether or not every time a budget is brought down they ought to act on statements in it as if they will become law. One of the trust issues between Canadian taxpayers and governments has always been that a majority government budget will ultimately become law, and that taxpayers, therefore, are justified in acting on budget announcements as if they are already law.

While I recognize that it has been nearly 18 months since the first of these announcements were made on December 2, 1992, it is important to clean up this backlog in the legislative process which was caused by the dissolution of Parliament and the fact that Bill C-136 died on the Order Paper. It is necessary to clean this up in order to move on with the new measures announced in the government's budget of a couple of months ago.

I therefore ask honourable senators to support swift passage of Bill C-9.

On motion of Senator Angus, debate adjourned.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS OFFICIAL LANGUAGES LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE JOINT COMMITTEES TO MEET DURING ADJOURNMENTS OF THE SENATE WITHDRAWN

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government), on notice of motion of Wednesday, March 16, 1994:

> That the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, and the Standing Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate; and
> That a Message be sent to the House to Commons to acquaint that House thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I ask that this motion be withdrawn. The idea of the motion in the first place was to permit these standing joint committees to meet when the Senate is sitting. However, we have now received reports from two of the three committees which have incorporated into their reports the request that my motion seeks. Thus, this motion is meaningless, and I suggest that it be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the motion be withdrawn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

HEALTH

IMPACT OF CHANGES TO TOBACCO TAXES—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, February 24, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the impact of the Government of Canada's changes to tobacco taxes.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to continue discussion on a very serious issue that affects every Canadian. The issue is cigarette smoking, and specifically the Liberal government's recent move to lower tobacco tax, a move from which I am sure my colleagues across the way are trying to distance themselves. I wish to make it clear that it is my intention to keep this issue in the forefront of future deliberations in this chamber.

The recent actions of the Chrétien government will have serious repercussions on the health of Canadians and the health sector itself. Currently, tobacco directly and indirectly accounts for approximately $15 billion in annual health costs. More important, the cost in terms of human life is estimated to be 44,000 deaths annually. The experts tell us that 30 per cent of all heart-related deaths are attributable to cigarette smoking, 30 per cent of all cancer-related deaths are attributable to cigarette smoking, and 90 per cent of all deaths due to lung disease are attributable to cigarette smoking.

Honourable senators, the government's decision to lower the tobacco tax is, to say the least, negligent. As pointed out by national organizations such as the National Campaign for Action on Tobacco:

> ...the federal plan is a public health disaster. It will undoubtedly add billions in costs to the health care system. The decision will probably prove to be the most irresponsible decision in the history of Canadian public health.

Honourable senators, I too would keep my head down if I supported this government, as many of my colleagues across the way obviously do. For it was decided in cabinet, and presumably with the participation of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, that this government would, with a stroke of a pen, undo the courageous efforts of previous governments, including Liberal governments. It is this recurring theme of hypocrisy, so rooted in the Liberal government, to which I will speak at a later date.

Honourable senators, you will no doubt recall the passing of Bill C-111 at this time last year. That piece of legislation dealt with the smoking habits of young Canadians by increasing the legal age for purchasing cigarettes from 16 to 18 years and by increasing the maximum fine from $100 to $50,000 for anyone selling tobacco products to persons under the legal age.

Among other things, Bill C-111 restricted the locations of tobacco vending machines, thus limiting access of young persons to tobacco product. This legislation received all-party support, was widely applauded by the media, by interest groups and by the tobacco industry itself. In fact, honourable senators are aware that no new initiatives were taken by this government regarding health issues. Rather, this government decided to integrate Bill C-111 under its anti-smuggling policy.

Bill C-111 was due to be proclaimed despite this government's anti-smuggling policy. It was actions taken by the previous government, such as Bill C-111 and prior legislation, that required all cigarette packages to carry one of four specific health warnings, that restricted or prohibited federal public servants from smoking anywhere in most federal buildings, that prohibited the advertising and promotion of tobacco products, that assisted tobacco farmers to diversify, and brought forth legislation that launched awareness campaigns such as the anti-smoking program aimed at the youth of Canada.

Why do I mention these initiatives taken by the previous government? Because these initiatives, coupled with a high taxation policy on tobacco products, resulted in reducing the smoking rate among Canadians. Because of that strategy, Canada became a world leader in reducing tobacco use.

As reported in The Globe and Mail on February 8 of this year:

> ...some of the credit —

for reducing consumption —

— has to go to the public education programs... But a large part of the credit, perhaps most of it, must go to Canada's high-tax policy.

As mentioned, the present government, with a stroke of the pen, reversed Canada's high-tax policy and, as such, eliminated much of the benefit that derived from the policies of previous governments. It would seem that the government of my colleagues across the way no longer places a high priority on the health of Canadians.

If my colleagues who support the present government disagree with my analysis of the government's priorities, then let them explain how they can justify a policy that will result in an estimated 840,000 more Canadians choosing to smoke, of which 175,000 will be teenagers and, as a result, 250,000 will die of their addiction to tobacco products.

I do not agree with those who are calling for more research or analysis of the problem. The Government of Canada has access to many studies that clearly show the negative effects of tobacco consumption. One can draw this conclusion from the rumblings of the Department of Health and Welfare, which has long supported the high-tax policy of previous governments and now feels betrayed by the initiative taken by the Liberal government, which clearly flies in the face of the information available.

A study undertaken by Harvard University to look at the effects of tobacco consumption in Canada concluded that a decrease in the tax applied to tobacco products could increase health spending by $3 billion annually. Honourable senators, because of a single, ill-informed initiative undertaken by the present government, Canadians may see an increase of $3 billion in annual health spending as a direct result of 840,000 more Canadians smoking, in addition to the $15 billion already spent each year to treat the effects of tobacco consumption.

It is not my intention to stand in this chamber and pretend that there is only one issue at play here. The underground economy is a real threat to the future of our social programs and our ability to govern this country effectively. However, the government has decided to take a narrow view of the problem and, as a result, has completely disregarded the severe health costs associated with cigarette smoking. The anti-smuggling plan does not present a clear strategy for addressing the health concerns other than the proclamation of Bill C-111 of the previous government, which would have been enacted anyway.

On February 8, 1994, the Prime Minister said that tobacco smuggling accounted for more than $1 billion in lost federal tax revenue and $1 billion in lost provincial revenues. The province of Ontario alone is estimating a tax revenue loss of $500 million because of this initiative.

Honourable senators, I know many of you will agree — at least I hope so — that the Liberal government has sent the wrong message to the criminals of this country. I will quote an article that appeared in The Toronto Star on February 9 of this year. It would appear that the Liberal government has also managed to alienate its traditional supporters such as The Toronto Star. The article reads as follows:

> Is the government powerless to combat criminal behaviour, the difficulties too great, the conspiracy too great to be condemned by the laws of the land or by the government agencies which have been the ultimate public defense against anarchy and lawlessness?

This, of course, is not true. However, the Liberal government, through its actions, has suggested that they will yield to the criminals of this country.

I am fully aware of the basic economic principles as they relate to the taxation of tobacco consumption. During the last election, Prime Minister Kim Campbell addressed this issue by saying that the taxation of tobacco products had reached the upper limit, and that any further taxation may not be effective in curbing tobacco consumption.

Further, we addressed this issue of smuggling with the planned transfer of Revenue Canada's border control activities to a new public security portfolio. The PC Party of Canada has always maintained that the high tax policy, in coordination with health awareness programs and law enforcement, is effective in discouraging cigarette smoking amongst Canadians.

Honourable senators, clearly the government is acting in a cowardly manner by giving in to organized crime in Canada. Organized crime brutally exploits ordinary law-abiding Canadians for personal gain. One need only look to my province where organized crime has been strengthed by smuggling, and principally smuggling of cigarettes and other products. Does the government honestly believe that lowering the tobacco tax will effectively rid them of criminals? The clear answer is no. These groups will move to other products that offer similar opportunities. Will the government also cave in to those criminals who are dealing in products such as drugs, alcohol, guns?

The government will claim that it is addressing the issue of enforcement in its strategy. I beg to differ. We are all aware that enforcement is a major factor in any strategy to reduce tobacco consumption, but does the government really believe that enforcement, to this point, has been so deficient that the initiative taken by this government will greatly affect smuggling? How does this government intend to get police forces across Canada to agree to devote more of their limited resources to the enforcement of anti-smuggling laws? It is these types of questions that I intend to raise with my colleagues opposite in the future.

I must strongly object to the way in which the province of Ontario has been treated by this government. The Chrétien government has displayed complete disregard for the Government of Ontario and, as a result, may have strained future federal-provincial relations. In essence, the federal government put a loaded gun to the province of Ontario, forcing the province to end its policy of high taxation, and undermining provincial measures designed to curb smuggling.

More important, the federal health minister Diane Marleau has lost all credibility with the provinces because of her government's actions. The Minister of Health claims she went to the wall in an attempt to persuade her government not to continue with the strategy. I agree with the health organizations in Canada who have said that the Minister of Health should have resigned, since this is the most damaging piece of legislation ever introduced in Parliament as it relates to the health of Canadians. Her credibility is lost as a defender of health issues.

Ontario health minister Ruth Grier stated the following, which clearly shows the ill-conceived thinking of the Chrétien government in dealing with the smuggling issue:

> If you —

referring to the health minister —

> — have just taken action that undermines the actions of all the provinces in their efforts to fight cancer by reducing smoking, how can you be taken seriously? I really find it hard to believe that at the first opportunity for all health ministers to meet and discuss the National Forum on Health, the federal government would pre-empt that by making an announcement that flies in the face of health care...and it will be really insulting for them to make their announcement before the health ministers have even a chance to talk about it.

Honourable senators, as I mentioned, I strongly object to the way in which my province is being treated by the Chrétien government. However, the fact remains that my province surrendered to the federal government by lowering the taxes on tobacco products. I, therefore, applaud those provinces who have taken a position to continue the courageous struggle against cigarette smoking and the related health costs, both in terms of lives and dollars.

Further, I support alternative solutions put forward by various levels of government, experts, media and non-governmental organizations. Of the many solutions suggested, I would like to touch on two which I believe warrant immediate discussion. One is the removal of the exemption for tobacco under the Hazardous Products Act. This would give the federal government more leverage in dealing with tobacco companies by enabling the government to regulate tobacco products to a much larger degree. For example, the government could enact regulations requiring the tobacco companies to disclose all additives found in cigarettes and other tobacco products. We have been reading about that in the last few days. The other solution is to legislate the use of plain packaging for all tobacco products. These and other measures will not, in themselves, reverse the harm done by the Chrétien government, but will undoubtedly curb tobacco consumption.

Honourable senators, as I said at the beginning of my speech, it is my intention to keep this issue in the forefront of future deliberations in this chamber. I encourage all honourable senators to speak out against this ill-conceived initiative that will have very serious repercussions on the health of Canadians, and will encourage criminals to continue their illegal activities.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Di Nino would permit a question?

Senator Di Nino: I will try to answer it.

Senator Molgat: I believe earlier in your comments you gave some figures as to the increasing numbers who would be smoking. I meant to make a note of the numbers then but I did not quite catch them. Can you give those numbers to us again?

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, I will check as I am responding to make sure that I am correct.

It is estimated that your government's actions will result in 840,000 more Canadians smoking, of which 175,000 will be teenagers, resulting in some 44,000 annual deaths from this initiative, added to the tragedy that already occurs.

I will just make sure. Yes, that is correct, sir.

Senator Molgat: Perhaps Senator Di Nino could give us the source of that information?

Senator Di Nino: I will supply that to you. I think it is mainly from different government sources and non-governmental agencies, but I will get that information for you. I do not have it here.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, April 20, 1994, at 1:30 p.m.

NEW BRUNSWICK

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, I rise today to draw the attention of the chamber to an auspicious anniversary for my home province and the country as a whole. Last weekend marked the twenty-fifth anniversary of the proclamation of New Brunswick's Official Languages Act. I am sure that all honourable senators will agree with me that the presence of two official languages is both the greatest blessing and the greatest challenge of our nation.

When properly approached, our two official languages make the Canadian community greater than the sum of its parts. When dealt with unwisely, our linguistic diversity has been manipulated by those who would seek to divide our nation against itself. I will leave it to others to determine who has dealt with these matters poorly, but I claim for my home province the title of "those who have dealt with it best."

A tradition of goodwill and understanding was built over our long history so that in 1969 one of our colleagues, former Premier Louis Robichaud, proclaimed in law the principles of fairness that I now point to proudly, namely that all New Brunswickers should have the right to live, learn, work and play in their own language. This principle was upheld and enhanced by Senator Robichaud's successor and our former colleague the late Richard Hatfield, who continued to build on this foundation of understanding by passing Bill C-88, which last year was enshrined in our nation's Constitution.

We have been fortunate in New Brunswick to have a succession of leaders who have valued our linguistic heritage for the great prize it is, and who built their policies on harmony and cooperation rather than narrow or partisan advantage. In 25 years, under New Brunswick's Official Languages Act, we have built a framework of bilingualism that is fair and harmonious.

Of course, there are always areas of concern and there are always areas that could be handled better, but we are human beings, after all, and we do the best we can. When we look around the world, we can be proud of our achievement. As Marc Poirier, a journalist, wrote in last weekend's Telegraph Journal:

> When we look at countries where blood is the only answer to cultural differences, lack of understanding and fear and domination, we can be happy to be living where things have evolved a bit better.

Today I salute the work of those who guided that evolution, and I thank them for their wisdom in shaping our province's policy. I am proud to be from Canada's only bilingual province and prouder still to salute the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Official Languages Act of New Brunswick.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, since there are no other speakers on Senators' Statements, as a New Brunswicker perhaps I will be allowed not only to associate myself with Senator Cohen's words but also to draw to your attention the fact that in the gallery is one of the actors of this important moment in New Brunswick's history. I am, of course, referring to Senator Charles McElman.

As a New Brunswicker, and as a former colleague of Senator McElman's, on your behalf I extend to him our heartiest welcome. I also wish to express my personal happiness in seeing him watching down upon me.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

STATUS OF MERCHANT NAVY VETERANS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, April 26, 1994:

> I will call the attention of the Senate to omissions in Bill C-84, to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the War Veterans Allowances Act and the Pension Act, and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, and in related regulations, which restrict the intent, meaning, and interpretations of such documents as they apply to the recognition of merchant navy veterans, including those who were prisoners of war, and particularly to the urgency of speeding up the process of claims and entitlements to awards.
> I will further call the attention of the Senate to the inconsistencies and the responsibilities of the Department of Veterans Affairs Canada, Transport Canada, National Defence and Government House as they relate to the above.

AGRICULTURE

DELAY IN GRAIN SHIPMENT FROM PRAIRIES— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who will know of the serious problems we are facing in relation to grain handling and the movement of grain out of the prairies. I would ask the leader to tell us if she knows what position, if any, the government is taking with respect to getting the grain moving.

We can tell from experience on the prairies that the numbers of cars are inadequate. We have a glut of grain in the elevators. The bins are full and, for the most part, the grain that is being moved is from the piles on the ground.

It seems that there is a congestion of cars at the West Coast that are not returning to where they are required. There are reports of up to 2,000 cars waiting to be unloaded, and that there are boats there to receive the grain. This congestion means that the country is losing sales. My question to the Leader of the Government is: What does the government intend to do to rectify this situation?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Gustafson for his question. I am aware of the serious problem on the West Coast at the Port of Vancouver. I suppose that that situation relates to something the Senate dealt with back in February, namely our first piece of legislation relating to the longshoremen's strike.

I have also been briefed, both yesterday and today, by Senator Olson who, during the break, visited the Port of Vancouver and is reporting back to all of us on the situation there, with possible suggestions as to what we might do constructively in this house to take some positive action in that situation.

In relation to your specific question, however, I will ask my colleague the Minister of Transport if he can give me a detailed answer on steps that may be in the works right now.

Senator Gustafson: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, I ask the question that our farmers are asking: What will this situation cost them, not only in demurrage but also in loss of sales? This is a very serious question on the part of the farmers, and people whom I represent in southern Saskatchewan in particular. We have three months left in this crop year to move the grain. This is a very serious problem. I urge the government to look into the situation.

•(1340)

Can the house leader tell us what reports the government has given her or the cabinet with regard to lost sales at this point in time?

Senator Fairbairn: Again, senator, I will check with my colleagues. I have not received such reports. I know that there are great concerns in Western Canada because of that situation, and I will do my best to get the details that he requires.

ELECTIONS CANADA ACT

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT— INTRODUCTION OF SUSPENSION BILL— EFFECT ON COMMISSIONS IN EACH PROVINCE

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. To your knowledge or that of your government, has the tabling of Bill C-18 on electoral boundaries readjustment resulted in slow-downs in the work of the various commissions established in each of the provinces?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Nolin, I will have to ask a question on that. My understanding — and this may not be a uniform understanding — is that some commissions seem to be prepared to proceed, but perhaps others are not. I will ask this afternoon and perhaps get a direct report to you on the situation across the country.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: I thank you for your answer, honourable senator. In light of the information you will receive in response to your query, would it be possible, since we are dealing with a quasi-judicial process which, until further notice, continues to be governed by the law of the land, that the various commissions be specifically directed by your government, through the Chief Electoral Officer, to carry on with their work?

The commissions should not interpret the tabling of this government bill as a sign that this quasi-judicial process could be interrupted.

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: I will be glad to clarify that point for you, Senator Nolin.

SASKATCHEWAN

APPOINTMENT OF LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR— NATURE OF APPOINTMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I want to ask the Leader of the Government about the appointment in Saskatchewan of Mr. Jack Wiebe —

Senator Berntson: A good man.

Senator Tkachuk: For those of you who are not from Saskatchewan and who may not know who Jack Wiebe is, he goes by an alias we all understand: Liberal appointee. He has been a Liberal campaign chairman, a Liberal organizer, a Liberal fund raiser, a Liberal candidate, and a former Liberal MLA.

An Hon. Senator: He has been pretty successful.

Senator Tkachuk: Successful, as it turns out, to the point of being appointed to the position of Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan.

This appointment has caused me some consternation, but not because of his Liberal affiliation. I cannot honourably criticize party appointments, being one myself, but I would like to change the essence of party appointments so that they can be properly celebrated in this chamber.

I promise not to call the Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan a Liberal hack, or other rather more disparaging terms we hear because of the excesses of Liberal patronage. In return, I would like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to ask the Prime Minister for an apology to one of ours every time they appoint one of theirs. Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to secure an apology from the Prime Minister each and every time he makes a partisan appointment? This apology could then be passed on to one of the former government appointees in recognition of the sheer hypocrisy of this Prime Minister's obviously paper-thin and transparent commitment to non-party, or, as they say in the media, non-partisan, appointments.

Senator Molgat: That's pretty sick.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be very clear: I will not ask the Prime Minister to indulge in an apology for appointing a person of the calibre of Jack Wiebe to the position of Lieutenant Governor of the province of Saskatchewan.

Senator Berntson: That is not what he is asking for.

Senator Fairbairn: As a matter of fact, when the honourable senator spoke yesterday during Senators' Statements, he indicated that he was about to congratulate a very worthy person from the province of Saskatchewan, and I thought, "My God, he is going to congratulate Jack Wiebe." I was wrong, as he was congratulating — and rightly so — the curlers.

The issue was raised not by me but by my friend. Therefore, I should like to say something about Lieutenant Governor Wiebe. As colleagues will know, he is a very distinguished farmer from the province of Saskatchewan.

Senator Berntson: He is my friend, a great man. I am not critical of his appointment, I am critical of the hypocrisy.

Senator Fairbairn: He is a friend of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, which in itself is a tribute. He is a former member of the legislature of Saskatchewan. He has been an active member of practically every farm association in the province. He is a gentleman —

Senator Berntson: But does he fit the Red Book criteria?

Senator Fairbairn: — and a qualified person, and under no circumstances should he be prevented from serving his province again because of his political label.

Senator Carney: Sounds like a Tory.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Read the Red Book.

Senator Fairbairn: I have read the Red Book.

Senator Gigantès: She wrote it.

Senator Fairbairn: The appointments by this government will be of competent Canadians. I think this appointment reflects strongly that commitment.

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I did not get an answer to my question.

Senator Stewart: The answer was no.

Senator Tkachuk: I was not criticizing Mr. Wiebe. I was criticizing the hypocrisy of the Liberal Party and the hypocrisy of the Prime Minister who, on May 28, 1993, said of Prime Minister Mulroney that "he owes Canada an apology for an orgy of patronage." What I am getting at is that I think —

Senator Berntson: What is good for the goose...

Senator Tkachuk: Exactly. I think the Prime Minister owes the people who were appointed by the previous Prime Minister an apology for not taking into consideration whether or not they were qualified, but merely taking into consideration the fact that they were Tories. Now we are seeing Liberals being appointed. It seems to me that they were leading the people of Canada to believe that they would be heading in some more magnificent direction. I think the Prime Minister should apologize. Perhaps he would like a list of our people, maybe a form letter that would help make his apologies a little easier. We could address them for him, and so on, and send one over every time an appointment is made. I think the leader should take the matter up with the Prime Minister, and I ask her to do that.

Senator Berntson: Good work, and Jack Wiebe is a good man.

NATIONAL FINANCE

THE DEFICIT—BUDGETARY AND POLITICAL RISKS—EFFECT ON FOREIGN INVESTMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mario Beaulieu: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. This morning's Financial Post contains an article headed, "European selloff for bonds? Deutsche Bank recommends zero exposure to Canadian issues." I think everybody is worried. The prime interest rate has gone up by one quarter of one per cent.

[Translation]

If the deficit for the first eleven months was $35 billion, can the Minister of Finance explain to us some day soon where the figure of $46 billion comes from? A difference of $11 billion in one month makes no sense whatsoever.

Will the Minister of Finance make a statement on that some day soon, so that small businesses can survive through it all?

•(1350)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I have said before in the Senate, all senators are aware of the state of the international markets in recent weeks. This week, there are uncertainties. That is also reflected in the Canadian market. We are not immune to international circumstances.

As the Minister of Finance has indicated, there is underlying strength in the Canadian economy. Our consumer spending has increased, our unemployment rates have gone down, and we have maintained an extraordinarily low level of inflation. The Canadian economy is showing strength, and will, I am confident, weather the vicissitudes of the international marketplace.

Senator Beaulieu: My question relates specifically to the fact that the Deutsche Bank recommends zero exposure to Canadian issues. German investors own about $25 billion worth of Canadian bonds. They have recommended that their clients reduce their Canadian bond exposure to zero because of heavy budgetary and political risks in this country. I think the Minister of Finance should take this matter very seriously.

Senator Fairbairn: I would be pleased, honourable senator, to draw the article in the Financial Post to the attention of the Minister of Finance. Indeed, I am sure he is already cognizant of it, and I will seek any advice I can from him.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

LOCATION AND NATURE OF MANAGEMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could she clarify for Atlantic Canadians exactly what the government's policy is with reference to the manner in which the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is managed?

There seems to be a great deal of confusion. The Liberal member of Parliament for Moncton and the Liberal member of Parliament for Fundy-Royal state that they believe the president of ACOA should live in the region and get to know the region, a view which I share. Yet the minister says no, that it is all right for the president of ACOA to live in Ottawa.

Has there been a change in government policy whereby we are returning to an era of centralized management, as opposed to regional development agencies managing their own affairs? Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate clarify these two visions that come from the caucus in the other place?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for the question. Other questions have been raised on the issue of ACOA, certainly by Senator Cohen. I am in the process of obtaining clarification on those questions as well.

On the precise issue raised by Senator Kinsella, it has been made clear by the Minister of Public Works and the minister in charge of ACOA that, particularly in the beginning part of this mandate, he was asking the head of ACOA to spend time in Ottawa, briefing him and organizing the activities of that organization, as well as carrying out responsibilities in the area. I will speak to the minister for any further comment he might have on that matter. However, I can say that this does not represent, in any way, a change in focus with respect to the importance of that regional body.

I say that with some feeling. Coming from the west, I know that we too put a very strong emphasis on the importance of the Department of Western Economic Diversification. I know the importance of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency to Atlantic Canada, and I will speak to Mr. Dingwall about any further clarification.

AMOUNT OF DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Madam Leader of the Government in the Senate, yesterday, I heard the question that our leader, Senator Lynch-Staunton, asked. I understand that your political position requires you to give us answers that are both political and sensible, and I will understand if your answer is not fully satisfactory.

I wish to draw your attention to the problem of the actual deficit of the Government of Canada. Yesterday, Senator Lynch-Staunton, with supporting figures, showed us what the actual deficit is. I am not talking about projections or figures for the future; I am talking about actual figures, money actually spent or committed by the Government of Canada over 11 months.

How can you reconcile this actual figure? We are not talking about a forecast; we are talking about an amount actually spent of some $32 billion, compared to the projection of your Finance minister for the same 12-month period, which was $45 billion.

This will be the subject of my supplementary question, perhaps. When foreign markets instruct their national investors to sell their Canadian securities, their decision is based on their lack of confidence in statements made by our political leaders, and the man who is steering Canada's finances is not sending a clear and precise signal. He is not inspiring investors' confidence.

Therefore, I would like to have a more precise answer to the questions Senator Lynch-Staunton asked yesterday. There is a difference here of $13 billion, and that deserves an explanation.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that my responses do not always satisfy Senator Nolin, although one continues to try.

On this point, however, the Minister of Finance has been sending very clear signals on the deficit. He also gave very definite indications, not only in the budget but also last fall in Montreal when he made a major speech on the economy and the deficit. At that time he made the point that one of the reasons for the jump in the deficit forecast was some specific one-time issues that would drive that deficit up. He still believes that those are there and will, regrettably, result in a higher deficit than we would like.

On the other hand, as I said yesterday, the indication that there is a greater income from revenue than had been forecast — and I hope will continue to be — can only be applauded by the minister, as well as by everyone in this house.

With deference to my friend Senator Lynch-Staunton, I think the signals that the minister has been sending on the economy are absolutely sincere and straightforward. No one would be happier than the Minister of Finance if the deficit were to come in at a substantially lower figure.

I would advise Senator Nolin that I have just received some information with reference to his earlier question relating to the electoral commissions on redistribution. I am advised that all of the commissions have decided to proceed with their hearings as scheduled, even as we move the bill through the Senate. This, I understand, applies to all of the commissions across the country.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: I have taken note of the response made to my question by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and it does indeed answer part of my question.

The problem is not the actual deficit or the increase in revenues. Of course we applaud the fact that the Canadian economy is rebounding. The problem lies elsewhere.

The fact of the matter is that events are being played out on the international stage. We can compare the situation to the relationship that you or I have with bankers or creditors who want to have confidence in our statements. Forty per cent of our creditors are foreigners. When the Germans, who hold $24 billion in bonds, are instructed by their central bank to sell, we are dealing with a problem of confidence. These investors have lost confidence in Canada.

How does the Minister of Finance intend to restore this confidence? His statements are to blame for this state of affairs.

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Nolin, I appreciate your point, and I would make a couple of others.

The Prime Minister has indicated, and I certainly agree with him, that one of the best indicators that Canada can give to the rest of our country, the rest of our continent and the rest of the world is a strong performance by its federal government, and by its federal Parliament.

Without belabouring the point, one may wish to put a heavy onus on the Minister of Finance, and that is fair game. However, there is another aspect to this equation, and that is that messages of a separatist party are being sent beyond our borders. That circumstance does impact on the activities here on Parliament Hill and in your province.

I make that point because, as you say, people who make judgments from far beyond our borders make them on signals they receive. All of those signals are not simply economic signals. Those signals may be misunderstood or poorly understood, but they are, nonetheless, signals that raise anxieties. This situation is certainly one such signal, and I profoundly regret it.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have responses to three questions. The first is to a question raised on March 21 by the Honourable Senator Doyle regarding the future use of Downsview military base. The second was also raised on March 21 by the Honourable Senator St. Germain with regard to the downgrading of the government's credit rating. The third question was asked on March 22 by the Honourable Senator Jack Marshall, regarding the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

THE BUDGET

CLOSURE AND FUTURE USE OF DOWNSVIEW MILITARY BASE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Richard J. Doyle on March 21, 1994)

These details are now being developed by the government in accordance with the intent announced by the Honourable David Collenette on February 22, 1994. The attached sketch map and fact sheet describe the current property uses at Downsview. It is not yet clear which lands will be surplus DND operational requirement because, although CFB Toronto will be closing, DND will require the use of parcels D, E, and F for the foreseeable future. Part G is required by the TTC for an expansion of the Wilson Yard. CMHC owns part A and the northern half of part C. These lands were to have been developed for housing purposes, but the planning for this is on hold as the government reviews the options for the Downsview lands. From the foregoing, it is evident that areas B and H on the map are currently the only parcels not encumbered in some way, and available, at least in the interim, for the fulfilment of the government's announcement.

Any lands to be disposed of will be disposed of in accordance with established government policy. Details are now being developed by the Minister of National Defence, in consultation with the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Public Works and Government Services.

The airport is wholly owned by de Havilland and is used for their manufacturing and aircraft servicing requirements.

(For sketch map and fact sheet see Appendix.)

DOWNGRADING OF GOVERNMENT'S CREDIT RATING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerry St. Germain, on March 21, 1994)

The government is disappointed with the decision of Bond Rating Service (DBRS) to downgrade Canada's foreign currency debt, from AAA to AA (high).

The DBRS downgrade is on the foreign currency portion of our debt, which represents some 2% of the total. It should not have a huge impact on our interest costs. The 98% of federal debt payable in Canadian dollars maintains its AAA rating.

The downgrade is not related to the 1994 Budget, but rather follow downgrades by Standard and Poor's (in 1992) and the Canadian Bond Rating Service (in 1993).

The Liberal Budget has embarked on a two-stage process to deal with the deficit and debt, and to promote growth and jobs.

We clearly stated in the Red Book that: "Any responsible government must have as a goal the elimination of the deficit. That is our goal. Given the current state of the economy, a realistic interim target for a Liberal government is to seek to reduce the federal deficit to 3 per cent of GDP by the end of its third year in office."

The budget of February 22, 1994, puts us on the right track to achieve our target, a target that has never been achieved during the last ten years.

DBRS did recognize the strengths of the Canadian economy: low inflation levels, low interest rates, strong labour productivity and improved exports. All these underline the enhanced competitiveness of the Canadian economy.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Jack Marshall on March 22, 1994)

On February 3rd, 1994, the government announced that it would provide stable multi-year funding to the CBC as a way of returning to a healthy financial position. When the Minister of Canadian Heritage announced that the government does not intend to impose new cuts on the CBC over the next five years and that it was prepared to re-profile the cuts announced in April 1993, the minister also announced that he would consult with cabinet colleagues, the new President of the CBC and other players in the industry to identify new revenue-generating mechanisms for the CBC. Those consultations will undoubtedly involve discussion about various facets of the CBC's operations. The government, however, is not conducting a comprehensive review of the corporation's mandate.

In addition, at the CRTC hearing for the CBC's English and French television licence renewals held from March 21 to 25, 1994, the president of the corporation noted that he intends to engage in a process of zero base budgeting in the next six months to ensure that resources are used in the most efficient and equitable manner possible.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lewis, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, for the second reading of Bill C-18, an Act to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, the House of Commons has sent us a bill which makes me wonder, even if I am new to the workings of the Parliament of Canada, whether I really understand the Canadian democratic process.

I listened very attentively to the speech made by Senator Murray yesterday. I find it hard to believe that the present Canadian government could sponsor a bill that would take us back to a practice which, out of respect for these honourable precincts, I would qualify as questionable.

In 1964, a Canadian Prime Minister managed to put in place a quasi-judicial process that would allow the democratic system in Canada to flourish, free of the too often exercised undue influence of elected members of Parliament.

The bill before us today gives the impression that we would go back to the situation that existed before 1964. This quasi-judicial process takes the final decision on redistribution out of the hands of our elected representatives.

Personally, as I said in caucus this morning, I am against this bill. I will vote against the principle of the bill. I think it would be very dangerous to agree to revert to a procedure we thought was a thing of the past.

When I arrived here in the Senate, I learned that, as senators, we are the defenders of the Canadian Constitution. I believe that this legislative document, the supreme law of Canada, contains provisions in section 51 on which this quasi-judicial process is based. I have the impression, but I am not absolutely sure, that this bill also goes against the provisions of section 51 of the Canadian Constitution.

As a political organizer — and I am not alone, since two more of my colleagues are here today — I have taken part in this quasi-judicial process. Because of its nature, it must observe the rules of evidence, certain rules as to the soundness of the arguments submitted to the commissioners. However, it is also a process in which logic and good faith can prevail.

Senator Rizzuto, Senator Prud'homme and I were involved, and in good faith I should say, at the time when we had the previous commission responsible for electoral boundaries readjustment in Quebec. We had our differences, but we managed to obtain a consensus, and we agreed, as Senator Rizzuto and Senator Prud'homme will corroborate, with the decisions made by the commissioners.

I must tell you that not all of the MPs from my political party agreed with the commission's arguments and decisions. They questioned the validity of the commission's recommendation. The commission took their arguments into consideration and made a final decision. The 1993 election was held according to the new electoral boundaries.

I am telling you these little historical facts to let my government colleagues know that the current, quasi-judicial — as I was saying earlier — process is permissible as long as the basic principle is respected. Elected representatives do not have the last word on readjusting first, the number, and second, the boundaries of electoral ridings. I personally think this is a good thing. I would go even further and say that the current process gives perhaps too many rights to elected representatives.

Why should a member of Parliament have more rights than an ordinary Canadian citizen, who must testify before the commission and table his arguments? Why should a member of Parliament have the right to a second hearing? During the initial stage, he is entitled to appear before the commissioner. Why should he have the right in the House of Commons to ask again that his arguments be heard? I have a problem even with that. I think the process should totally remove electoral boundaries readjustment from the hands of elected representatives.

It was in 1964 that Canadian parliamentarians realized how previous governments had distorted the intentions of the Fathers of Confederation. What the bill before us asks us to endorse is a return to this old practice. Personally, I will vote against it. I cannot accept this betrayal of principles. Impossible, since the current system already works well in spite of a few deficiencies. I do not understand the reaction of the new MPs. I should also draw from my own personal experience.

In 1986 or 1987, when we were involved in the redistribution process in Quebec, there were new members, elected for the first time in 1984, who did not like to see their constituency boundaries changed. I can understand their reaction to the publication in the newspapers of the new boundary proposals regarding their constituency. It was as if they owned the place.

However, we managed, each in our own caucus, to make these elected representatives understand that along with democracy came certain principles, and that these principles had to be obeyed. I do not know exactly how many new members of government are from the province of Ontario, but there must be quite a few, judging from how hard and fast the government is trying to ram its bill through. This may be its only reason for acting so diligently.

I think, honourable senators, that you have a duty. You must sit down with your colleagues within your caucus and explain to them that Canadian democracy entails obligations. It is up to you to make them understand this fact. It may well be that your bill will never materialize. That would be a blessing for Canada. There is no question of going back to the way things were before 1964.

I do not know whether Senator Prud'homme has something to add, but this is what I wished to convey to you today.

On motion of Senator Ghitter, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kirby, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, for the second reading of Bill C-9, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Hon. W. David Angus: Honourable senators, I find it surprising, indeed extraordinary, that this legislation, said to contain routine amendments to the Income Tax Act, reached the Senate only yesterday. As Senator Kirby suggested in moving second reading, Bill C-9 is housekeeping legislation designed principally to implement various Conservative government measures aimed at helping small business in Canada, as announced by the Right Honourable Don Mazankowski in his Economic and Fiscal Statement of December 2, 1992, and in his budget of April 26, 1993. Other measures covered in Bill C-9 are designed to make the tax instalment system fairer, and to help the resource and mining sectors of our economy.

We do not question either the urgency or the merit of this important legislation. What we do ask, though, is why has it taken this government so long to deal with this key but noncontroversial matter? The government was elected six months ago, on October 25, 1993, and yet Bill C-9 came to us from the other place only yesterday. What is happening to the legislative process? That is a question that we and interested Canadians may well ask.

This government's Minister of Finance, the Honourable Paul Martin, was most outspoken earlier this year in repeatedly promising Canadians a more open, efficient and effective budget process. Yet he proceeded to introduce his February 22 budget without first effectively taking urgent steps to get these outstanding tax amendments off the Order Paper. Clearly, Mr. Martin's new budget process does not apply to the important fiscal measures set forth in Bill C-9.

This is a dangerous precedent, one I trust and urge will not be repeated. It is extremely unhealthy to permit the ongoing consideration of Income Tax Act amendments from a previous budget after a further, perhaps contradictory, budget has been introduced.

The government cannot avail itself of the excuse of drafting delays, for Bill C-9 is, in reality, good Tory legislation that was already in place when this government was sworn in. It is the former government's Bill C-136, now disguised as the Liberal government's "slow-moving" Bill C-9.

Moreover, there can be no excuse based on rough passage or controversy. It was reported from the House of Commons committee without amendment. Where has it been? Possibly, I suggest, submerged in a sea of inefficiency and total legislative inexperience.

As is the case with those very few other Liberal government bills to come forward so far to this chamber, Bill C-9 is just another welcome example of the Liberals carrying forward almost word for word the Mulroney government's agenda. Other examples, and there are many, include Bills C-2, C-4, C-6 and C-7. Naturally, we in the opposition heartily applaud these excellent government initiatives and will cooperate fully in ensuring speedy passage of all such legislation.

However, honourable senators, when will we see some new legislation of substance? Where is the legislative evidence of those bold Red Book promises of a better life for Canadians? Are the iniquitous and undemocratic Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, and the Draconian Bill C-22, which purports to impose a unilateral so-called settlement on Canadian businesses that dealt in good faith on the Pearson airport deal, typical examples of the Brave New World promised by the Liberals? If so, we should grieve for our fellow Canadians.

Also, what about Bill C-10, one of the only other Liberal bills of substance to come to this chamber, an emergency bill to provide for the maintenance of West Coast ports operations? My recollection was that it would not have passed here had opposition senators not provided a quorum. We now hear from the Honourable Senator Gustafson that this emergency legislation is not working in practice, and that it is costing Canadians millions of dollars a day.

Senator Kirby indicated yesterday that this omnibus tax bill, Bill C-9, with only one exception relating to the timing of the payments of the GST credit, is virtually identical to the Conservative government's Bill C-136. However, I am given to understand, perhaps wrongly, that in fact there is a second exception whereby Bill C-9 does not include a certain Bill C-136 provision originally designed to provide fairer and more equitable tax treatment of business losses following vertical corporate amalgamation. No doubt the reasons for both these omissions and exceptions will be explored and explained during the study of this bill by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

As Senator Kirby quite correctly stated, Canadian individuals and corporate taxpayers have made legitimately and in good faith, made important financial and business decisions — irreversible decisions — based on the important measures contained in Mr. Mazankowski's December 1992 Economic and Fiscal Statement and again in his April 1993 budget. Those Canadians were justly entitled to expect that the appropriate legislation would soon be passed to legitimize such decisions. That they have had to wait so long is most unfortunate, constitutes bad government and leads to a lack of confidence by the Canadian people in the stability of our fiscal system. As a matter of equity for those Canadians affected, and for the integrity of our budget process and our fiscal system, Bill C-9 needs to go forward without further undue delay.

In closing, honourable senators, let me simply state that it was gratifying indeed to hear Senator Kirby declare yesterday that, apart from the aforementioned basic legal considerations and considerations of equity, this government believes that the legislative measures contained in Bill C-9 are good ones. They are, as he said, "justifiable in their own right." To that I say "Hear, hear!"

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, will Senator Angus deal with a question?

Senator Angus: Absolutely.

Senator Stewart: I, too, honourable senators, am interested in the fact that this bill, which eventuates from a budget delivered well over a year ago, is now before the Senate in a new session in a new Parliament. Senator Angus has told us that decisions were made by individuals and corporations in good faith on the assumption that the government would put before Parliament, and carry through Parliament, if it could convince a majority in each house, the measures set forth in the budget. That did not happen. He says this was most unfortunate. What he is doing is criticizing the former government, the government that brought in the budget; that committed themselves to enacting the bill now before this house.

I became uneasy about what had been done when I heard Senator Kirby speak on this bill yesterday.

There was a time when the House of Commons dealt with supply requests months after the money set forth in the Main Estimates had been spent. The Diefenbaker government, if I recall correctly, was defeated on February 5, 1963, when it was asking for the eleventh twelfth of the money requested in the Main Estimates for 1962-63. It was asking for interim supply for the month of February. The House of Commons dealt with the problem of belated approval of expenditure. In 1968, that house changed its rules, so that that sort of situation does not happen now.

However, let us turn to the revenue side, to the ways and means side. Here we find a situation where people — we are told by both Senators Kirby and Angus — made business decisions and personal investment decisions on the basis of the 1993 budget. We are told that they did so on the assumption that Parliament would enact a statute to give effect to the proposals in that budget.

I have two complaints: First, I find it passing strange that governments should encourage the notion that the Minister of Finance's budget statement alone is an adequate basis for major personal or corporate decisions.

Second, I find it passing strange that a government, having brought in a budget, would proceed to have Parliament dissolved without having made a serious effort to enact the legislation flowing from that budget. If there is any blame to be assigned to the present government for bringing this bill forward now, certainly it has to be said that there is a much heavier load of blame to be assigned to the previous government for not having carried through the proposals that they had put before the House of Commons well over one year ago.

Senator Berntson: Was that a question?

Senator Angus: Honourable senators, I would only say this in response to my honourable friend Senator Stewart: If we are talking about procedure, I submit that we have just had the locus classicus example of "a short preamble to a question." I do not know whether I should say more, other than that blame is always in the eyes of the beholder. I think that this government's performance is appalling.

Senator Molgat: It is a very factual preamble, though.

Senator Stewart: That is no response to a serious question.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kirby, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER REFERRED TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of April 19, 1994, moved:

> That the Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages for the calendar year 1993 be referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, this is routine business. There was even some question as to whether this motion had to be formally presented in the Senate. Since there has been no joint committee for several years and the committee consisted only of members of the House of Commons, I thought it was preferable to present the motion in the Senate. If the motion needs to be debated, we will debate it.

This motion simply refers the report to the joint committee.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Phillips, calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 22, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Ghitter).

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, first, in the spirit of positive cooperation, let me indicate what I like about the budget.

I like the fact that there were no personal or corporate tax increases. I firmly believe that a further personal or corporate tax increase would have snuffed out the faint spark of economic recovery that now appears to be under way. A tax increase would have driven more transactions into the underground economy. I am convinced that tax increases would have driven more businesses to pull up stakes and relocate in the United States, Mexico, or elsewhere.

I take from this budget, perhaps optimistically, that the government realizes that tax increases have reached the point of diminishing returns, and that in future, prudent fiscal management demands more of a focus on the expenditure side.

I was pleased that the budget statement did not mince words about the precarious fiscal and economic state in which we find ourselves. I was pleased that the budget did not reduce the maximum contributions for registered retirement savings plans. We need to do everything possible to increase the savings rate to add to the pool of capital for investment and to help people obtain financial security in their retirement years.

I am pleased that the government will review its policy on funding interest groups. For some time, I have been very concerned about the principle, the practice, and the amount of money spent in funding so-called advocacy groups. There is something faulty in the logic of governments funding groups so that those groups can, in turn, lobby governments.

How are groups selected for funding, and are we to believe that groups with positions at odds with government policy are likely to receive funding? Recent history tells us otherwise. Too often, such advocacy groups are funded to simply tell the government what it already knows or wants to hear. Then those views are characterized by ministers and bureaucrats as coming from independent, objective or expert sources in order to shore up some government policy.

I can imagine, however, the cries of anguish that will come from these groups and their political and bureaucratic patrons, and I hope the minister and government will be firm in their resolve.

I like very much the roll-back in payroll taxes. Increases in payroll taxes were a disincentive to hiring new people — perhaps more symbolic than real, but disincentives just the same.

I also like very much the first 18 paragraphs of the budget statement: the reference to determined fundamental change, the references to Canadians wanting their government to have a game plan and pursue it, the reference to the days of government simply nibbling at the edges being over, and to the budget setting in motion the most comprehensive form of government policy in decades.

I must say I very much liked the almost "Kennedy-esque" rhetoric. It certainly struck a responsive chord in me. However, I did not realize that I was being set up for a grave disappointment. It was almost as if the Minister of Finance had written the budget introduction several months ago, perhaps during the election campaign, only to be confronted later with the harsh realities and complexities of government and our fiscal and monetary situation; whereupon, somewhat chastened, he wrote the rest of the budget.

Honourable senators, where is the fundamental change? This budget could have been delivered without a hint of embarrassment or a U-turn by either of the two previous Conservative ministers of finance.

The minister talks about a game plan, but where is it? What is the vision that the minister refers to? The minister talks about the new economy, but what is that new economy and how do we ready ourselves for it?

Those who seek a vision or a game plan in this budget will be disappointed. They will have to content themselves with waiting for the results of some 16 task forces, reports, studies, meetings and forums announced in the budget dealing with a gamut of government policies.

Honourable senators, since when is setting up a committee evidence of either vision or determined fundamental reform? What are the common values, the principles, the philosophies and objectives that will bind these disparate studies together? On these questions, the budget statement is ominously silent.

Canadians can be forgiven if they conclude that this is but another stalling tactic, all too common with Canadian governments at all levels, where studies are a substitute for action. I personally find it disappointing that, in all cases but two, some fiscal action is postponed pending the outcome of a study.

One exception, of course, is defence, where massive cuts are made in advance of the outcome of a defence policy review. The other is the reduction in UIC payments, which I personally support but which are put in place before the massive social policy review is even under way. This does seem to be putting the cart before the horse. However, if fiscal actions can be taken in advance of studies in these sectors, why not in other sectors, too?

Honourable senators, I find irritating the number of deferred actions pending some kind of study. I do not believe, as I have said before in this chamber, that we as a country enjoy the luxury of abundant time. Today we find ourselves in a very precarious fiscal and economic position due, in large part, to the predilection of Canadian governments for muddling through, incrementalism and bureaucratic inertia.

In her autobiography, Lady Margaret Thatcher writes that immediately after she replaced Edward Heath as Conservative leader, she set in train a revision of the party manifesto and a detailed development of a fiscal and economic strategy. Upon her election as Prime Minister, that manifesto and strategy were handed to the bureaucracy to implement. Ministers, permanent secretaries, and others who proved less than committed or less than efficient in the implementation of that strategy were branded "wet" and quickly replaced by men and women with more steadfast hearts.

In Canada, the practice for incoming governments appears to be first to introduce oneself, politely of course, to the bureaucracy, and then ask what can be done or should be done. I firmly believe in a permanent, politically neutral public service, but I wonder if we are expecting too much of our permanent public servants to demand that they assume anything more than an administrative role in fundamental policy shifts. Such shifts require bureaucrats to disown or dismantle policies with which they have long been associated, and which, in some cases, they may themselves have originated.

The convention of a permanent public service, especially in these times, requires governments to come to power with clear plans and strategies which are given to the bureaucracy to fine-tune if necessary but otherwise to implement.

In our system, the official opposition is supposed to be the government in waiting, and to prepare and conduct itself accordingly. The message conveyed to me by this budget and by the announcement of all the task forces and studies is that this government did not adequately prepare itself for power. As a consequence, it has been neutralized by bureaucratic inertia and the practicalities of governing. Canadians have a right to expect better, particularly in light of the Red Book and the function ascribed to it during the election campaign.

Honourable senators, I know that the minister has characterized this budget as a first step in a two-phase project. I worry that the second phase, the studies, consultations, task forces, et cetera, will result in actions far less dramatic, far less resolute, and far less immediate than hoped, because that process will be exposed to vested interests, interprovincial wrangling and bureaucratic inertia. We can, I regret to say, anticipate another set of watered-down, compromised solutions. In these days, honourable senators, I do not believe that is good enough.

I suggest that bureaucratic inertia has manifested itself most in the announced cuts to the government's operating budget. Aside from defence expenditures, there are no dramatic cuts from actual expenditures. Much of the so-called savings or cuts are not from actual expenditures but from planned expenditures. In actual fact, as the budget tables illustrate, operating expenditures will increase by $800 million in 1994-95 over actual expenditures in 1993-94.

The minister also seems to have accepted Department of Finance orthodoxy in relating operating expenditures to GDP growth. Obviously, revenues will rise as a function of GDP growth. But what is the logic of tying expenditures to GDP growth? The bureaucratic mindset, obviously, is that expenditure increases in line with GDP increases are acceptable. To me, this is the road to ruin. The logic makes no sense to me at all if we are ever to be successful at deficit management and have any hope of achieving a balanced or, dare I say, a surplus budget.

This also leads me to question the GDP forecasts in the budget documents that are, of course, central to the calculation of the annual revenue projections and budgetary shortfall. The minister is forecasting a very optimistic $27.9-billion increase in GDP in 1994-95 and an even more optimistic increase of $38.6 billion in 1995-96. If actual performance falls short of these projections, obviously everything starts to unravel.

The Department of Finance's GDP projections over the past decade have been distinguished by unbridled optimism. That optimism has subsequently been proven to be misplaced, more often than not. I can only hope that this time we have it right.

Honourable senators, this is not a sure-footed, resolute budget. It is a budget of compromise and incrementalism at best. The threshold for the 29-per-cent tax credit for charitable donations is lowered by $50 from $250 to $200. The tax exemption for employer-provided life insurance plans is eliminated, but only for the first $25,000 of coverage, ostensibly to achieve more fairness and equity in taxation. Business deductions and credits for meal and entertainment expenses are reduced from 80 to 50 per cent. Either such things are valid corporate operating deductions or they are not. If they are valid, they should be left alone. If they are not, they should be removed completely. The government's compromise 30-per-cent reduction is exactly the nibbling at the edges that the Minister of Finance said were over.

Fundamental and determined policy shifts are not made by half-measures, even though I recognize that this has traditionally been the Canadian way.

Honourable senators, there is one last point I should like to make. The budget statement promises to set up a Canada Investment Fund which is described briefly in one of the technical papers as providing, and I quote:

> ...an adequate supply of patient capital for the financing of innovation by leading-edge companies.

In my speech here on February 8, I referred to the need to improve our venture capital industry for just this purpose, but I had in mind a private sector venture capital fund governed by market principles and market disciplines.

•(1450)

In that same speech, I referred to the need to develop an industrial strategy to tie together government policies and initiatives, and to help guide venture capitalists in their investments.

I worry about a government-run investment fund. I worry that such a fund will inevitably become just another source of government subsidization under another name. I worry especially about a government-run investment fund investing in innovation or investing in leading-edge companies without an overarching framework to guide those investments — in short, without an industrial strategy. How otherwise will a government agency be able to identify either innovation or leading-edge companies? Innovation in what context? Leading-edge in relation to what?

The Canadian landscape is littered — from Bricklin car plants to Nova Scotia fish farms and computer-based translation software — with failed businesses that some politician or bureaucrat judged at some time to be innovative or leading-edge.

The budget also makes much of cutting back on subsidies to business, when in fact the budget contains more subsidy programs for business, albeit ones more focused on the small and medium business sector. Experience clearly indicates that if subsidies are available they will be used, regardless of need or even merit. Yet they are often ineffective either in helping business to get started or in helping it to grow. An Arthur Anderson poll of small business last year found that only 5 per cent of businesses credited a government strategy or subsidy program with getting them started, and only 17 per cent credited a government subsidy program with helping them to expand.

The problem is, I suspect, that a large number of subsidies and programs go to support a disproportionately small number of businesses. Those businesses that tap into these subsidies and programs are usually very adept in doing so and are, in effect, being rewarded for their government-relations capabilities rather than the value of their service or product or their business acumen.

Subsidies also put governments on a slippery slope, where they become financially committed to a business or project, regardless of experience and evidence that good money is being thrown after bad. Our recent experience with the Hyundai plant in Bromont is a clear manifestation of this slippery slope.

What business wants, particularly small business, is less government involvement rather than more, less taxation, fewer government programs, less government red tape, and less government paperwork.

The budget statement recognizes that by stating:

> The last thing business needs is another massive government program.

Although no single massive government program is announced for small business, ten new programs are.

Business is coming to recognize, and governments must too, that enhanced domestic and international competition happens with fewer government programs rather than more; with fewer subsidies and with lower deficits, because high deficits discourage investment by scooping capital from the private sector and by pushing up interest rates.

In this case I am not so much speaking to government as I am speaking to business. To those businesses who reflexively reach out for government subsidies simply because they are there, I say, "Hold back." Business cannot, on the one hand, decry government's poor record of deficit management while demanding social security cuts and, on the other hand, freely avail itself of government hand-outs. If government persists in providing business subsidies, business has to discipline itself to use them with great restraint.

Government subsidies come with a large and often hidden cost, and they tend to become addictive. They mute the discipline of the market and they bring a high measure of government scrutiny and control; and, once they are established, severing the subsidy umbilical cord can be very difficult.

In closing, I want to reiterate my main point. I firmly believe this budget had to contain a clear vision and a program to achieve that vision. If this budget had done so, I would have been content, not because I necessarily would have agreed with the program, but because there was one.

As I have said many times, we do not need more muddling through. We need resolute, determined action. While consultation is great in theory, I fear that in this case consultation is a substitute for action and will only result in entanglement, compromise and delay; and delay is the worst of these sins because, honourable senators, we simply do not have time.

The Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and Finance officials know how precarious our situation is. They know that the fiscal situation of several provinces is cause for grave concern. We all know there is a prospect for increased political instability relating to Quebec over the next year or so that could have profound fiscal implications. We all know that the bond markets are increasingly wary about Canadian governments, and, to an extent, have already delivered the verdict on this budget.

Yet nowhere in this budget is there a road-map, a clear message that this government fully and realistically grasps the challenges that face us in all of their complexity, and that this government has a clear plan of action to confront and surmount those challenges. Nowhere, honourable senators; and that simply is not good enough.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

CHRISTMAS

WAY OF CELEBRATION IN CANADA—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

Hon. William M. Kelly rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 8, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to recent developments in the way in which we celebrate Christmas in Canada.

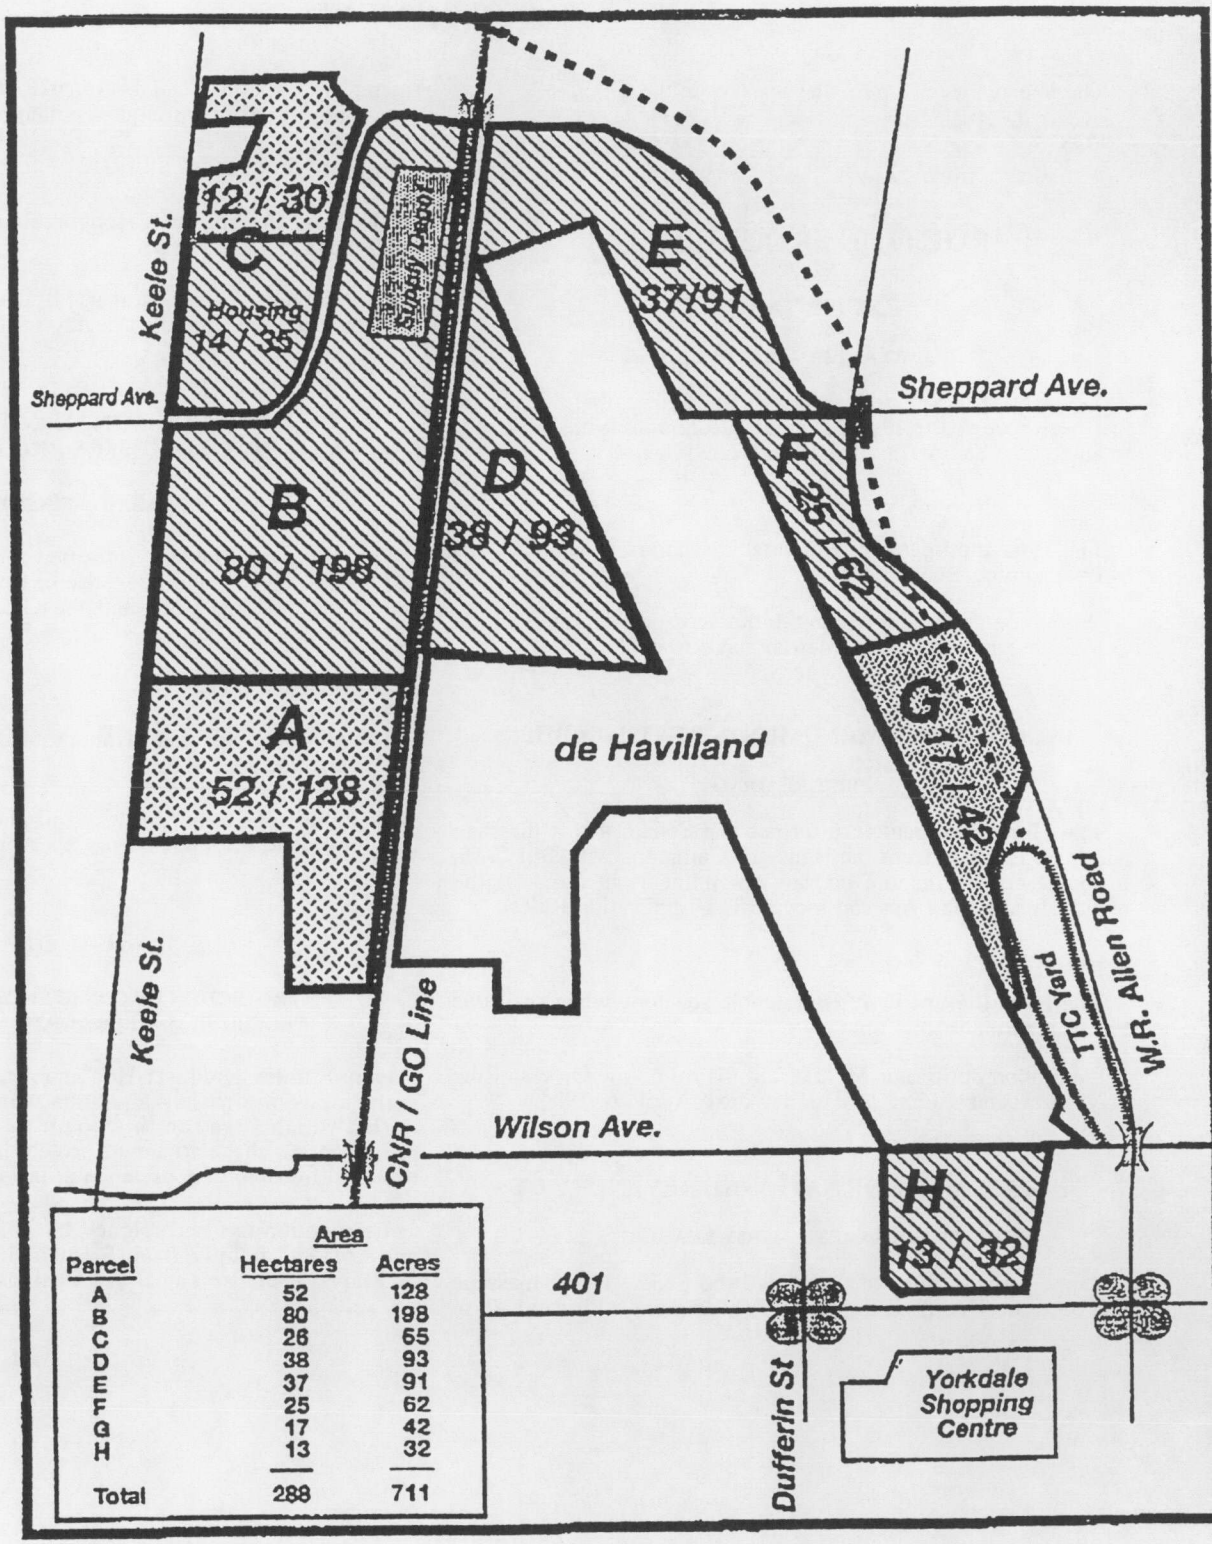
He said: I should like to state here, honourable senators, that on the February 8, when I presented this inquiry, I had some very serious comments that I wished to make on what had been happening to the celebration of Christmas in this country. I have been advised that to discuss that in the middle of April could be considered somewhat frivolous, and I accept that suggestion. I want to say to you, however, that my thoughts are not frivolous, and my concerns are very deep.

If I may, I will withdraw this inquiry, but I will be restating it later on in the fall. I assure you once again, honourable senators, I was not having fun.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: You need unanimous consent to withdraw.

Senator Kelly: My discussion on the celebration of Christmas would probably take, with leave, about 45 minutes. I am quite prepared to go ahead with it, if you wish, at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave given to withdraw this inquiry?



Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

HEALTH

PROTECTION OF CONSCIENCE IN MEDICAL PROCEDURES—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I wish to place in the hands of the Clerk a petition expressing the identical plea to that which I read in this chamber on March 17 last. The petition prays that Parliament protect health care workers with regard to freedom of conscience in the workplace.

The petition has been signed by 143 people from Winnipeg and area, 55 people from Stratford, Ontario, and 54 from St. Marys. There are a total of 252 signatures on this petition.

QUESTION PERIOD

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

FINANCING ARRANGEMENTS FOR STUDENT LOANS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, the government has announced increases in the funding available for student loans, thereby allowing individual students to increase their total monthly loan amounts. One female student has described this as "the gift of increased debt."

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if there is any connection between this announcement and the rumour that the government is considering withdrawing from federal-provincial post-secondary education financing arrangements.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Cochrane for her question, and respond to it in the negative. The student loans announcement made by the Minister for Human Resources Development a week ago stands on its own.

For a long period of time now, governments have been struggling with the whole question of student loans. This was a straightforward announcement on behalf of the government on the issue.

As far as the rumour part of the honourable senator's question is concerned, as she knows, the whole area of social policy is currently approaching a review. However, it is not yet in a review state. A great deal of consultation is going on concerning various areas of that vast issue.

I should like to stress that the student loans situation, as it was announced last Friday, is on its own.

EFFECTS OF WITHDRAWAL OF FEDERAL FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Will the Leader of the Government tell us whether or not any department of the federal government has conducted or commissioned any studies on the effects on universities or colleges of the withdrawal of federal funding for post-secondary education?

•(1410)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to ask that question of my colleague, the Minister of Human Resources Development.

BOSNIA

NATO AIR STRIKES ON UN-DESIGNATED SAFE AREAS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: My question is to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. We are all aware that certain media reports have stated that Canada and Greece are opposing air strikes, as requested by the United Nations Secretary General. Does the honourable minister have anything new that she can report to the Senate on Canada's position regarding air strikes by NATO forces on UN-designated "safe areas"?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have much more to say than I said the other day.

Tomorrow, a meeting will be held in Brussels at which this matter and all others surrounding it will be carefully debated, including the request made by the Secretary-General of the United Nations on April 18 to authorize bombing to protect the safe enclaves in the former Yugoslavia and in Bosnia.

Yesterday, President Clinton, in outlining some of his concerns, suggested that in addition to air strikes there should be stronger sanctions and an increase in the number of peacekeepers. He also emphasized that there should be strong, new, diplomatic initiatives. Canada will be very active in these discussions. The Prime Minister and the President spoke yesterday, and they will speak again today.

We will be assessing the military implications of all of these suggestions with our allies tomorrow. We will then make a decision based on whether or not these propositions assist the peace process in Bosnia, and whether or not — and this is always a concern of major importance to our country — there will also be measures to ensure the protection of the peacekeeping forces that are still in the former Yugoslavia.

BAN ON SALE OF ARMAMENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question concerning Bosnia. There is a policy banning the sale of armaments to Bosnia. Those in favour of the policy argue that it will prevent an escalation of the fighting. I am not sure what arguments they put forward to bolster that claim, though. Those who oppose the policy say that it has prevented Bosnia from defending itself.

Is the Government of Canada reviewing its policy with respect to the sale of armaments to Bosnia?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, because of some of the statements that have been made in recent days, particularly by the President of the United States, I believe that those questions will be part of the discussions that will take place in Brussels early tomorrow morning.

One thing that I might add, however; it is my understanding that there will be a discussion of some of these issues later today, perhaps this evening, in the House of Commons prior to those events taking place in Brussels tomorrow. It might be an interesting occasion on which to listen in.

FISHERIES

SUPPORT FOR VESSELS DURING MORATORIUM

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On different occasions the Minister of Fisheries has repeated that it is his intention to keep a corps of fishing vessels and fishermen so that when the stocks return, there will be a small fleet to continue the industry.

However, in reviewing the information that was given at the press conference as background material, there is no mention of how the minister intends to support those vessels that are tied up. That could be an expensive proposition. As honourable senators probably know, such expenses include berthage, insurance, storage and vessel maintenance. Previously, money was available for such support under NCARP and ACAP, but there is no vessel support mentioned in the documents that were delivered to us the other day. I should like to know the plans of the government in this respect.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly seek an answer to Senator Robertson's question. I have transmitted her question of the other day, seeking further information from the Minister of Fisheries, and I will relay this further question this afternoon.

Senator Robertson: I will reserve further comment, then.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE ST-JEAN—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Recently I received, in written form, a response to my question raised in the Senate on March 15. At that time, I was attempting to find out from the government about the savings which were publicized by the Department of National Defence relative to the closure of the Royal Military College in St-Jean-sur-Richelieu. I thank the minister for the answer that was presented.

However, as I read the answer, I am somewhat astonished by the data contained in it. If I may, honourable senators, in terms of the costs indicated in the answer provided to me, the section is called "Costs and Savings" and then "Pre-Consolidation Costs." That section makes reference to the military staff and the civilian staff at the CMR.

Then they tell us that at CFB St-Jean, there is a cost of $2.6 million. That, however, is the military base. It is not the Royal Military College. They happen to both be located in the same municipality, but they are different institutions.

If you take those two cost items of $2.6 million for the military personnel at the base, together with the $2.2 million for the civilian staff at the base, surely you cannot be assigning a saving at the base to a saving at the college?

•(1420)

If there is an explanation for that, I should like to hear it. Even if that is not a problem and can be explained, the cost for military staff, whether at the college or the base, comes to a total of $7.3 million. Then, according to the answer I was given, the consolidated cost for transferring is $6.9 million. If you add the two figures, you get a total of $14.2 million. Subtract that from the total cost provided by the government and you get a saving of $15.8 million. However, what was publicized in the backgrounder, which was the reason for my original question, was that there would be a saving of $23 million. The numbers show that that saving is not there. Would the minister —

Senator Berntson: Give us a short and snappy answer?

Senator Kinsella: Would the minister inquire further and let us know what the facts are?

Senator Fairbairn: The short and snappy answer is that I will take both of those documents and ask for a rationalization for the honourable senator, quickly.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER—QUALITY OF DEBATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I want to draw your attention to the debate which is taking place in the other place regarding official languages in Canada. I deplore the quality of debate, as well as the level of the language used. Like many Canadians, I watched the news last night.

My question is: How does your government intend to bring this debate back to a more acceptable level?

I think the government is helping the cause of an opposition party whose only objective is to split up our country. It is important that the government at least try to improve the quality of this debate.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this week there was a debate in the other place on an opposition motion introduced by the Reform Party. I am not sure of the comments to which my friend is referring. There is no question that the issue as it was pursued produced some heat.

The position of the government has been very clear: it is fundamentally committed to and supportive of the official languages program of this country. I am not sure what language my friend is referring to, but the debate begun by the Reform Party of Canada was fought vigorously by members of the government, and our commitment remains unshakeable.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, the fact that an opposition party decides, almost legitimately, to challenge a law of our country, is no reason for a member of your party, which happens to form the government, to get carried away. The opposition in the other place can resort to such a tactic, but when a member of your caucus answers in the way that member did, it only makes things worse.

We do not need this kind of debate in Canada right now; neither does the province of Quebec need a debate on official languages. It has enough problems at the provincial level as it is.

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I take note of my friend's comments.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

FINANCING OF PROFESSIONAL SPORTS INFRASTRUCTURE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to explain to us the policy of her government on investing public funds from Canadian taxpayers. Is it her government's policy to favour the financing of professional sports teams which, for their part, intend to ask for more and more federal funds to pay for facilities such as an arena?

[English]

•(1430)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Presumably Senator Simard is referring to our infrastructure program.

Senator Simard: Not necessarily.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Simard, there is no specific policy of the Government of Canada to support a professional sports team. However, it is the policy of the Government of Canada to seek advice from the municipalities and the provinces across this country on what is, in their view, on the ground in their communities, the most appropriate way to create jobs and utilize the infrastructure money that has been agreed to in our program; a program which we hope will flourish, as it has begun to, and result in tens of thousands of Canadians being put back to work.

There are several imaginative programs and suggestions by municipalities large and small across this country on how best to utilize these funds. We have criteria which must be observed. The underlying core of that program is the creation of jobs and the establishment of infrastructure that will have a lasting value in the community. That is the basic criteria of our program, and the projects will be evaluated against those criteria.

Senator Simard: The explanation of the minister is that, right now, the federal government is prepared to listen to any funding proposal submitted, jointly or separately in conjunction with the provincial governments, whether within the infrastructure program or through other programs. In other words, the government is prepared to inject federal dollars for projects to help finance professional organizations — organizations that should already have all of the resources and financial capacity necessary to conduct their business, or they should get out of the business and sell their franchise. Is this what you are telling me?

Senator Fairbairn: No, Senator Simard. I was attempting to tell you that the federal government has embarked upon a program that we hope will have very good results for Canadian workers. The program will be conducted on the basis of cooperation between the municipal and provincial governments. The projects put forward at that level will be assessed in each province by a management committee, which will be following criteria that will be based on the importance of job creation and lasting infrastructure.

FINANCING FOR KANATA PALLADIUM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: My second question is related to my first one. I understand that this present federal government, elected in October 1993, has agreed to disburse $5 million or $10 million, if not more, for the construction of an arena in Kanata. The main user of that arena will be the Ottawa Senators.

Some members of this government, in trying to explain the inexplicable, are trying to blame the previous government for this decision. I want the minister to verify that situation, and table in this house the Order in Council and any other documents that could be considered an official government commitment, justifying this obligation that had to be assumed by the present federal government.

I will add in closing that, in the case of partly financing the Kanata arena, if the present government felt it had an obligation to deliver on this commitment made by the previous government, why did it choose to do what it did with regard to the Toronto airport, although there were contracts and commitments signed to build a modern airport at Pearson? Why treat these commitments in a different fashion — if, in fact, a commitment was made in the case of the Kanata Palladium?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we will have the opportunity to debate the Pearson issue in this house as the legislation moves from the other place to the Senate. We certainly took action on that particular issue, and I think we were supported overwhelmingly by the Canadian people in doing that.

To revert to your original question concerning the Ottawa Senators and Kanata, I myself do not have any precise knowledge of that situation. However, I will certainly seek out an answer to my friend's question.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT SUSPENSION BILL, 1994

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lewis, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, for the second reading of Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, in rising to debate Bill C-18, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act, I must be very candid at the outset and state that this bill causes me grave concern. I am troubled by it.

I consider my responsibilities in the Senate are to represent the citizens of my region, Alberta, to defend the Constitution of this nation, to defend minorities, and to ensure that Canadians are treated fairly and equally.

I find this bill to be contrary to the interests of the citizens of Alberta. I find this bill to be unfair and unequal in its treatment of Canadians. I find this bill to be arbitrary and interventionist in a fundamental democratic process where elected politicians are in conflict and must not be arbitrary and interventionist.

It is my desire to be non-partisan, constructive and non-obstructionist in the fulfilment of my duties here. Unlike members in the other place, I have no conflict in this matter, for we are not elected. Boundaries do not affect us, and I cannot be accused of being partisan, for even as a Progressive Conservative, I sadly have no boundaries to protect, other than those of Sherbrooke and Saint John, so I will exclude them from my remarks. In order to explain my concerns, it is important to reiterate the basic philosophy behind legislation such as the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

First, as was so eloquently expressed by my colleague the Honourable Senator Murray on Tuesday last, such legislation is intended to ensure representation by population and the basic equality of voting power. In addition, it is designed to ensure impartiality and lack of interference by elected politicians, who have an obvious vested interest in any legislation that readjusts the boundaries of their ridings.

This sense of impartiality and non-partisanship in the setting of boundaries is fundamental to this legislation. All one need do is read the debates that occurred in the other place on April 12 to get a sense of the intensity of the feelings that members of the House of Commons experience when they deal with legislation that will change the boundaries of their ridings or give them new electors. Member after member stood up to talk about the inequities of the boundary readjustments that were being presented, and one could clearly see, on reading those debates, that their main concern was their boundaries, and not the exercise of democracy.

This is an area where the ultimate decision-making process must be taken away from elected politicians for obvious reasons, for they are in conflict. They must be allowed input, but the final decision must be made elsewhere.

This was expressed in a most concise manner by the Honourable J. Pickersgill, Secretary of State under Lester B. Pearson. Some honourable senators opposite may remember the name Pickersgill; they may have heard of him. When the Redistribution Commission and the electoral boundaries legislation was debated in the other place in November of 1963, Mr. Pickersgill stated:

> The measure now before us and the other bill, of which notice has been given on the order paper, represent a serious endeavour by this government, after a full study of the matter, to eliminate abuses of the past, to make the House of Commons truly representative and at the same time give this commission certain ground rules and directions from parliament as to the principles it should accept. It is an endeavour at the same time to grant flexibility in the interests of fairness in order to ensure that the considerations that have always been in the minds of government since 1867 shall be maintained.

The Honourable Mr. Pickersgill continues, stating:

> All these considerations shall be based on the assurance that an independent commission will bring about a redistribution that is fair, just and reasonable; one that will be determined not on the basis of the frailties of human nature, which all of us have, but on a basic principle that the political advantage of the government or a majority in this house shall not be one of the considerations to be taken into account or given any attention.

Later he states, and this is important:

> Neither do I conceal from the house that probably all of us in our hearts would secretly like to leave the whole thing alone if we could, and if it were not our duty to do something about it. All of us probably tend to have a somewhat proprietary interest in our constituencies. Sometimes we may even think we have almost a proprietary right to them, and after we get comfortably situated in the constituency, especially if we keep on getting elected, all of us feel that having new areas added to which we will have to go around and spread our charm would constitute a strain we would rather avoid. However, the constitutional obligation is here, and I think all of us should remember that, whether they live in our own constituencies or not, no one can vote in this country who is not a Canadian elector.
> It is our duty to treat all the people of this country equally, so far as we can, and if we really mean what we profess about self-government, then roughly each of them should have an equal voice in this house, which has the responsibility for overseeing the government of our country.

It is to the credit of Mr. Pickersgill and the government of that day that this legislation has served us well without partisan interference for over 30 years and through three redistributions.

The legislation sets up a process that is impartial, keeps the politicians at arm's length, sets up quasi-judicial commissions to set the boundaries, and allows input from the political side, but ensures that the final decision of the eleven commissions across this land will be binding upon Parliament.

This is as it should be. This is wise. This is excellent legislation. It is flexible. It is not partisan, and it overcomes the temptation to set favourable boundaries by politicians anxious for re-election.

In addition, the legislation must be taken in the context of our Constitution, which, under section 51, calls for the boundaries to be redrawn following every decennial census.

As Senator Murray reminded us, following this legislation came the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, by which, through section 3, every Canadian citizen was granted the right to vote in federal and provincial elections. The courts have interpreted this to mean a notion of equality of voting power being fundamental to representation by population. Variances are recognized by the courts to take into consideration the rural and outlying regions of this country which do not have large population centres. In this regard, a 25-per-cent variation is generally regarded as the outer limit of what is acceptable.

Every ten years, following each decennial census, the legislation clicks in and the government is required by our Constitution to redraw the boundaries.

This process started automatically following the 1991 census, when the Chief Statistician of Canada sent the results of the census to the minister responsible for electoral boundaries. The results were then published in the Canada Gazette with the allocation of seats to each province. Automatically, eleven Electoral Boundary Commissions were set up, all matters were examined, and new boundaries were set and distributed throughout Canada in accordance with the legislation. Public hearings were advertised and scheduled to start this very month, continuing to June of this year.

An appropriate process was underway. Over $4 million had already been spent, and voters in such ridings as York North with a population of 233,000, Surrey North with 142,000, Surrey White Rock with 134,000, Vancouver Centre with 114,000, Edmonton Southwest with 117,000, and Calgary Southwest with 125,000, could all look forward to reduced ridings where their votes would have some sense of equality with other electors in their provinces.

Yet, surprisingly, with no demand, with no public input, with no compelling reasons and no sense of urgency, and, I might add, no mention in the infamous Red Book, the government has come forward with Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act for two years and then start all over again.

That is a strange priority, I might add, when in the Senate to this date we have received no substantive legislation whatsoever from the other house. At a time when our country is crying for action on many fronts, the only substantive legislation we have received is a bill to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

This from a government that stated on page 92 of its Red Book that it would take a series of initiatives to restore confidence in the institutions of government, and from a political party that stated, and I quote:

> The most important asset of government is the confidence it enjoys of the citizens to whom it is accountable.

•(1450)

"If government is to play a positive role in society," says the Red Book, "as it must, honesty and integrity in our political institutions must be restored." Yet the first piece of legislation of any consequence we see is this bill before us.

What, then, are the reasons to suspend the operation of this act for two years? They are enumerated in the debate in the House of Commons by the Honourable Herb Gray, Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, and repeated by Senator Lewis here in the Senate. They are, and I quote, first:

> Some dissatisfaction has been expressed with regard to the current process and the rules under which it operates.

Then, further:

> The criteria the commissions use to set the boundaries may have to be rethought. These criteria are quite general.
> The continual increase in the number of members of the House of Commons after each census is another issue of concern to many... That is something we should be reconsidering.

On the basis of these three arguments, the government has decided to suspend the process for two years. The result of this suspension will be that the next election will be conducted on the present boundaries, on the basis of the 1981 census. The government is willing to trample the constitution and the basic fundamental tenet of our democracy of representation by population on the basis of arguments that "some dissatisfaction has been expressed," criteria "may" have to be rethought, and consideration should be given to the number of MPs.

These are hardly compelling arguments, honourable senators. These are arguments, tenuous at best, that frankly do not pass the smell test.

Could there be other reasons, unexpressed, behind this legislation? Could it be, and I do not know, that members in the Liberal caucus are unhappy about the suggested boundary redistribution? Could it be that political partisanship is entering into an area where that great Liberal J.W. Pickersgill correctly stated it should not enter?

I do not wish to appear cynical or partisan in my argument, but I must say that I am slightly suspicious. I have no problem with a reexamination of the legislation to review the appropriate size of membership in the House of Commons, or to better the legislation on a non-partisan, impartial basis. This can still be done and be in place for the next boundary readjustment following the census of 2001. However, to use that as an argument now for the suspension of the legislation is a sham and a deceit, and it is unacceptable.

It is completely unsupportable for this government to place upon this legislation a sense of urgency, after using time allocation in the House of Commons; a government which must now stop public advertising processes for hearings that are well under way, causing confusion throughout the land and wasting millions of dollars in so doing.

More particularly, what does this legislation mean to my province, Alberta? On the basis of the 1991 census, 7 out of the 26 Alberta ridings are either below or above the 25-per-cent variance from the provincial average which is regarded as acceptable. By way of example, the federal electoral district of Crowfoot in Alberta has 69,717 people, while Calgary Northeast, Calgary Southwest and Calgary North are at 124,000, 125,00 and 128,000, more or less, respectively. That means it will take approximately two votes in Calgary North to equal one vote in Crowfoot. That is unfair, inappropriate and probably unconstitutional, but I will leave that to the courts.

The situation is even more serious in the provinces of British Columbia and Ontario, which are the big losers if this bill is allowed to go through, for their portion of democratic power becomes smaller and smaller, and their vote becomes less and less meaningful than that of Canadians in other parts of Canada.

This Bill C-18 is unfair; it is unequal in its treatment of Canadians; it will make the problem worse, and drag this situation into the next century; and it is put forward without any valid or logical reasons expressed in the other place or, to this date, in the Senate.

Therefore, I come full circle as to what my obligation as a senator from Alberta really is. If it is my obligation to defend my region and to ensure equality for all Albertans, then I must vote against this bill. If my obligation is to defend the Constitution, then I must vote against this bill. If it is my obligation to protect minorities from partisan interventionist policies of a government with a majority, then I must vote against this bill.

Frankly, although the Constitution allows it and has done so for 127 years, it is not my wish to vote against legislation coming from the other place. I much prefer to be positive, persuasive and investigative, and to make constructive suggestions for amendments to the bill that will make it acceptable.

Personally, I would have no difficulty with amendments that would allow the bill to go forward, on the understanding that all the work that has been done already by the commissions will not be lost, and also on the understanding that by the time a new election comes about, there will be new boundaries. If such assurances can be legislated by amendments to this bill, then I would be pleased to support it. I do hope that members of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will examine these possibilities and then report back to us.

However, I must say that if the bill remains in its present form, for the reasons I have outlined in my comments this afternoon, not only can I not support it, I must not support it if I am to take seriously the obligations incumbent upon me as a senator representing the province of Alberta.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable colleagues, as a senator from British Columbia, I oppose Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Adjustment Act, now before the Senate. I oppose the bill itself, I oppose the principles of the bill, and I oppose the process of closure used to ram this bill through the other place.

Bill C-18 will suspend for two years the practice of redrawing federal riding boundaries. It also disbands the commissions that were set up in each province to draw new boundaries; commissions which were to meet in British Columbia in May and June. That means that the current boundaries will be used in the next election, expected in 1997-98. Those boundaries reflect the 1981 population figures. And it delays the addition of two more seats for British Columbia and four in Ontario for years to come.

I oppose Bill C-18 because it is unfair to British Columbia, and because it is unfair in that it undermines our Confederation. It is unfair because it would deny our right to be democratically represented in Parliament, in Canada, and therefore in making the laws of Canada. It would do this by suspending B.C.'s right to its share of MPs until well into the twenty-first century. It is unfair because it denies our right to be represented in Parliament on an equitable basis with other Canadians, at a time when we are Confederation's fastest growing province.

It is unfair because British Columbia will be underrepresented for at least 20 years at a time when we are paying a share of the money we earn to supply services to other Canadians under the equalization formula. As a "have" province, we share our earnings with the "have-not" provinces. This is a principle of Confederation, but so is the principle of representative government.

The Constitution sets out the formula for representative government based on the concept of equality of voting power, as Senator Murray has pointed out, a concept that all Canadians should have an equal voice in governing themselves. As Senator Murray pointed out in his masterful speech, this concept has been modified over time to ensure that the smaller provinces have a greater representation in Parliament than their small populations warrant, but Bill C-18 would achieve the opposite effect; it would ensure that the biggest provinces, B.C. and Ontario, have less representation in Parliament than their larger populations warrant.

This has not gone unnoticed in British Columbia. I have a letter here from Joyce Balestra who lives in Mara, B.C. She urges me to vote against this bill and says:

> The fact that British Columbia, the fastest growing province, will be deprived of its legal and rightful representation in the next Parliament is, in itself, outrageous; but more outrageous is the fact that in passing Bill C-18, the House of Commons is depriving some Canadians of their constitutional rights.

Now, why does this matter? Some people argue that Parliament is too large and too costly as it is, and that Canada cannot afford the two new MPs due to B.C. and the four due to Ontario. It may be true that Parliament is too large, but denying Canadians living in B.C. their share of voting power for at least 20 years is not the answer. Reforming the entire parliamentary system on an equitable basis is the moral alternative. If costs were the criterion, we should note that about $5 million has been spent thus far to set up the commissions and to set new boundaries. All but $400,000 of this cost will be lost if the process is repeated.

•(1500)

David Anderson, B.C.'s only cabinet minister in the present Liberal government and one of the six Liberal MPs who voted to deprive British Columbians of their share of parliamentary power, has a different answer. The Vancouver Sun had this to say about him:

> Anderson voted in favour of the Bill saying that there would be no value in giving B.C. more seats because the calibre of the politicians here is not high enough to make any difference.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame, shame!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: He knows his fellow Liberals.

Senator Carney: That is a shocking statement for B.C.'s only voice in cabinet to make. David Anderson may be describing his present Liberal caucus, but his assessment of B.C.'s political representation does not bear scrutiny. I recall that B.C. has sent three prime ministers to Ottawa. They are John A. Macdonald, MP for Victoria from 1878 to 1882, John Turner and Kim Campbell.

Historically, many B.C. parliamentarians have made their contribution. I am thinking of John Fraser of the PC Party, which is my party; Pauline Jewett of the NDP, who was the best External Affairs minister we never had; and Grace MacInnes, the first woman MP in the House of Commons. The list is long and impressive.

Anderson's statement ignores the political reality that political representation equals political clout in Parliament. Look at the political clout Quebec MPs have traditionally exercised in Parliament and how their numbers now allow them, even as members of the Bloc Québécois and avowed separatists, to be Her Majesty's Official and Loyal Opposition.

Look at the political clout of the 98 Liberal MPs in Ontario, who triggered Bill C-18 because, as my colleague has described, they are fearful that changes to their riding boundaries could hurt their chances of re-election in five years' time. This is a cowardly approach to the reality that Canada is in constant change and constant motion.

In a democracy, changes to riding boundaries reflecting population shifts are to be anticipated and implemented. MPs, who should know their ridings, have a right to comment on proposed boundary changes to identify where a new boundary might split a neighbourhood, divide an ethnic group or isolate a group of voters. In my own case, as MP for Vancouver Centre, I found myself, along with Margaret Mitchell, MP for Vancouver East, in a situation where Chinatown was to be split between Vancouver Centre and Vancouver East. We had no problem in realigning those boundaries. However, the involvement of MPs should not supplement the work of an independent commission, a system which has been in use for 30 years.

What does Bill C-18 matter to British Columbia? Why should we care about the shameful Liberal government's gerrymandering of election boundaries by MPs themselves?

In 1991, B.C. had a population of about 3,262,000, according to Statistics Canada. That figure represents an increase of 13 per cent in five years. Premier Harcourt points out that B.C. will gain about 1.5 million new citizens between 1981 and 2001, which is the date for the next census. That reflects an increase of about 50 per cent. If the next election is fought still on the 1981 census, as Bill C-18 implies, these British Columbians will be denied their rights; they will not be able to exercise their political rights because their voting power will be diluted. The biggest losers will be those British Columbians living in the rapidly growing urban regions, such as B.C.'s newest city, Surrey, and other centres in the Fraser Valley, the Delta area and the Okanagan.

In 1986, the riding of Surrey North had a population of 107,000. Five years later, in 1991, the population had grown by 33 per cent to 147,000. I ask honourable senators to think of what the rate of population growth would mean to Surrey North over the period from 1981 to the year 2001, when the next census is due to take place. Why should these voters be denied their political and constitutional rights for a period of at least 20 years, if Bill C-18 proceeds in its present form?

Another reason for my opposition to Bill C-18 is that it represents the relentless assault on B.C.'s role in Confederation, which has been a defining characteristic of the last few rounds of constitutional reform, an assault which appears never-ending. When I first came to Parliament as the newly elected member for Vancouver Centre, I gave my maiden speech on the second-class status awarded B.C. under Pierre Trudeau's proposed amending formula, which many in this chamber will remember. That formula ensured that B.C. would never have equal rights. The same would have held true for any western province as well as for the Atlantic provinces. To quote my maiden speech of October 23, 1980:

> The right to set the terms of our Confederation will live forevermore with Central Canada, and Central Canada only.

That amending formula was defeated. But it was followed by the Meech Lake Accord, with its distinct society for Quebec, a concept of concern to some British Columbians after Quebec changed its language laws to discriminate against the bilingualism which was imposed on other provinces.

The Meech Lake Accord was followed by the Charlottetown Accord, which would have denied B.C. for all time its fair representation in Parliament. Some 68 per cent of British Columbians, and as high as 75 per cent in some regions of the province, firmly rejected that accord. That margin of rejection was the strongest of any province.

B.C. has never asked for any special role in Confederation. We are special, and we are proud to acknowledge it. All British Columbia wants, and all we have ever asked for, is equal treatment. That is why we joined Confederation in the first place in 1871. The Liberal authors of Bill C-18 forget that B.C. joined Confederation as an equal, and only after vigorous and thoughtful debate about our future place in Canada.

When we joined Canada we had three options. In that way, our Confederation debate was different from that of the other provinces. We had the option to join the United States, to join Canada or to maintain the status quo, something which the government officials of the day naturally supported.

I ask you to consider B.C.'s situation at that time. It is useful to think about it, because we spend so much time in this chamber talking about the present that we forget the past that brought us here. It was more than 2,000 miles away from Canada — a Crown colony. Its western boundary of Canada was vaguely defined at a point somewhere east of where Winnipeg is today. Between the two outposts was a huge Hudson's Bay Company territory which was deemed to be too sparsely settled to become part of Canada. We are situated below the 49th parallel. Victoria was largely surrounded by American possessions, with the Pacific Northwest to the south and Alaska to the north.

Alaska had been purchased by Americans from the Russians in 1867, Canada's Confederation year, in a transaction that took place in a Washington hotel room, well supplied with liquor, between an American who did not want to buy and a Russian who did not want to sell. I often wonder if they had been teetotallers what would have happened. Possibly, we would have adopted the suggestion of B.C.'s Premier De Cosmos that Canada purchase the Alaska territory. Perhaps that is why there is such a terrific interest in B.C. in the concept of Cascadia, the Pacific Northwest Region.

What pro-union British Columbians desired above everything else was a more equitable distribution of political power with Central Canada, then and now. We know what is best for ourselves. We are able to legislate to that effect. We have no wish to pay central Canada to do our legislation. We would follow the lead of De Cosmos and Robson, who denounced the iniquities of the local administration and demanded the establishment of self-government. Historian Margaret Ormsby reports:

> Only by union with Canada, they thought, would liberal institutions be introduced, protection against American absorption guaranteed, and economic opportunity provided.

However, the debates were bitter. They took up a month in the spring of 1870. Opponents portrayed Canada as an evil giant eager to crush innocent B.C. in a fatal embrace, an argument which still works well today. The biggest factor, then as now, was distance. Dr. Helmcken, the elected MP for Victoria, summed it up when he said:

> It is absurd to attempt to ally ourselves with a people 3,000 miles away...Canada is for all practical purposes further removed from us today than England; we know less about her.

He echoed a typical British Columbian view of Central Canada, then and now: We know what is best for ourselves, and are able to legislate to that effect. We have no wish to pay Canada to do our legislation.

•(1510)

What shines through the Confederation debates of 1870 and of today is our desire in British Columbia to be treated as an equal partner in Canada. We have always rejected — and not always successfully — attempts to make us subservient to the more powerful and more populated provinces of Canada, while maintaining a strong and united Canada and respecting our diversities and differences in this, our home and native land. That was our ambitious task at the time of our union with Canada, and is the challenge we still face today. That is why I will vote against Bill C-18 in its present form.

Finally, I wish to comment on the role of the Senate. The great English constitutional theorist Walter Bagehot, once remarked with regard to the British parliamentary system that:

> ...if we had an ideal House of Commons...it is certain we should not need a higher Chamber.

I have always held the view that the Senate should not vote against the decision of an elected House of Commons except in certain circumstances. In 1980, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee's "Report on Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution" listed the four roles of the Senate, all of which are complementary to the functions of the House of Commons. They were, first, revising legislation; second, an investigative role; third, a regional representative role; and, fourth, as protector of linguistic and other minorities. These are the roles that the Senate has historically played. Our jobs as senators are to perform these roles. We can revise, we can investigate, we can protect; but at the end of day, it is my role as a regional representative for British Columbia which counts the most, in my view.

This bill is bad for British Columbia. It is bad for Canada. Therefore, I will not support it.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the question is put on second reading, I wish to make a few remarks regarding this side's position on Bill C-18, although it has been extremely well stated today by Senators Ghitter and Carney, and certainly on Tuesday by Senator Murray and yesterday by Senator Nolin. I will try not to repeat their very sound arguments against what Senator Murray has so aptly described as "this miserable piece of legislation."

Our caucus has had a full discussion on Bill C-18, and it should not come as any surprise to those in the government, if they listened to my four colleagues, that not a few of our members are so upset with this unprecedented trampling of a basic democratic process that they would like to see it disposed of immediately. And for good reason. This is bad legislation, inspired by Liberal malcontents who, no sooner elected, have become proprietorial of their constituencies. They now consider themselves untouchables, caring little whether ridings are overly represented or underrepresented. They do not want non-partisan commissions determining the electoral map of Canada, even if the commissions do it as fairly and as equitably as possible, in such a vast country with the bulk of its population concentrated in a few given geographical areas.

Who but these malcontents can be behind this affront to democracy? I have read the debates of 1973, 1974, 1985 and 1992, when the act was under discussion, looking for some indication that at least one participant in those debates was upset with the readjustment process itself which the government now wants to do away with. I have found nothing. I have searched the Liberal Red Book for some pledge to revise the process and, if need be, to overhaul it. I have found nothing. Why? Because the process is a good one. It has stood the test of time. It has flaws; certainly it could be improved, as any legislation can be improved, after its being in force for a given period of time. We have absolutely no objection to a full parliamentary review of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, as long as the next federal election is based on electoral boundaries arising out of the 1991 census.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Bill C-18 supporters are trying to make us believe that a two-year suspension of the act must be in place before a parliamentary review can begin. This is sheer nonsense, as the government itself confirmed in the House of Commons when the following motion was introduced. This motion, which I am about to read, was introduced by the Minister of Justice last Tuesday morning, even before Bill C-18 was before this house. He moved:

> That the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs be instructed to prepare and bring in a bill, in accordance with Standing Order 68(5), respecting the system of readjusting the boundaries of electoral districts for the House of Commons by Electoral Boundaries Commissions, and in preparing the said bill, the committee be instructed to consider, among other related matters, the general operation of the past thirty years of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, including:
> (a) an assessment of whether there should be a continual increase in the number of Members of the House of Commons after each census, as now provided in section 51 of the Constitution Act;
> (b) a review of the adequacy of the present method of selection of members of Electoral Boundaries Commissions;
> (c) a review of the rules governing and the powers and methods of proceedings of Electoral Boundaries Commissions, including whether these Commissions ought to commence their work from the basis of making necessary alterations to the boundaries of existing electoral districts wherever possible;
> (d) a review of the time and nature of the involvement of the public and of the House of Commons in the work of Electoral Boundaries Commissions;

That the committee have the power to travel within Canada and to hear witnesses by teleconference; and

That the committee report no later than December 16, 1994.

The Minister of Justice, as sponsor of the motion, said the following:

> On April 13, 1994, this House adopted Bill C-18. It provides for a suspension of the current electoral boundaries readjustment process for a period of 24 months in order to allow for a fundamental review of all aspects of the process.

Note that he confirms this canard that the bill must be suspended for the parliamentary review to take place. Yet the Parliamentary Review Committee has already been given the mandate before Bill C-18 has been given power, if it will ever be given Royal Assent in its present form.

The fact that the Senate had not even received Bill C-18 when that motion was introduced, and that Bill C-18 is still some way, if at all, from Royal Assent is of no consequence to the minister and the government. Therefore, this can only lead to one interpretation: The government does not need Bill C-18 to begin the parliamentary review; and only one conclusion: The malcontents can have their review without first destroying the existing system. All the government motion does is confirm that Bill C-18's sole purpose is to keep the present boundaries in place, at least until the next election, thereby depriving equality of representation, so fundamental to our electoral system, to millions of voters.

In 1992, when we asked for suspension of the act — for totally different reasons, by the way — the appropriate legislation was not introduced until all-party support had been reached in the other place. Now we have witnessed the Liberal government, having failed to get all-party support, resorting to closure to get the bill through. Such indecent haste in pushing such indecent legislation is more evidence that its instigators have indecent motives.

I detect that not a few of our friends across the way are embarrassed by what they have got themselves into. It is certainly no coincidence that the only one Liberal senator to speak on Bill C-18 was its sponsor, and I think what happened is that the Liberals drew straws in their caucus and Senator Lewis was unfortunate enough to draw the shortest one.

As I said earlier, many of my colleagues would just as soon dispose of the bill now by voting it down. Their agreement not to do this and to allow it to go to committee must not be interpreted as showing any kind of support for Bill C-18, even in principle.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We expect that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will make a full examination of the issues raised by us this week, and following its hearings we will be in a better position to decide on what next steps to take.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was delighted to learn from my colleague Senator Lynch-Staunton how speakers for bills are decided on that side of the Senate. We had not thought of that procedure of drawing straws. It may be that that is something we should look at.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is just for sponsors of bad legislation.

Senator Molgat: Our normal procedure is to find someone who has some interest and knowledge in the area, and ask them to do that job. I can assure you that we had no problems in getting someone to speak on this bill.

I was prompted by the comments of Senator Murray the other day to get involved in the debate, but since then there have been a number of other speakers, and I have to say, quite honestly, that I have enjoyed every one of the speeches. I thought Senator Murray's speech was an excellent speech. There were many historical matters put before the Senate. What Senator Carney told us about British Columbia was very interesting and very useful. The problem is that none of you spoke about the bill.

Senator Carney: Yes we did.

Senator Molgat: You did not speak about Bill C-18. In his speech the other day, Senator Murray talked about the principles of proportionate representation of the provinces, of representative democracy, and of equality of voting power — all important points, I agree. He spoke of Canadian history stretching back to 1850. He mentioned the BNA Act, the Charter, and recent court cases. He even brought John Diefenbaker into the fight. However, he forgot to talk about Bill C-18.

Senator Carney: It is only five clauses long!

Senator Molgat: Senator Murray's arguments are based not on Bill C-18 but, rather, on his assumptions with regard to the timing of the next general election, and the electoral boundaries that will be in place at the time of that election. Senator Murray claims that Bill C-18 will suspend the electoral boundaries readjustment process "in such a way as to ensure that the process will not apply to the next election, expected in 1997 or 1998." Starting from that hypothesis, he then characterizes Bill C-18 as being an affront to the most fundamental principles of representative democracy.

Senator Carney: That is correct.

Senator Molgat: He claims in very dramatic terms — and Senator Carney is saying that it is correct, that it "guts" the principles of representation by population and equality of voting power; that it distorts, manipulates, abuses, violates representative democracy; and that it dilutes the democratic rights of millions of Canadians.

Senator Simard: That is what his speech was about.

Senator Molgat: That is what Senator Murray claims. Honourable senators, Bill C-18 does nothing of the sort. As Senator Murray himself noted in his speech, and as Senator Lewis stated in proposing the bill, Bill C-18 is clear and concise. Nevertheless, Senator Murray appears to need some assistance in understanding it. Let us see what Bill C-18 does.

Senator Berntson: This will take some gymnastics!

Senator Molgat: That is, not what you assume it will do, but what it does.

An Hon. Senator: I would like to hear that.

Senator Molgat: It is clear in the bill. Senator Murray admitted that it is clear and concise. It is only the assumptions that he put into it that are important. What are the goals? Well, it suspends the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act for 24 months, that is true.

Senator Doyle: Shame!

Senator Molgat: Do not forget that we are only some five or six months from the last election. The next election is four years away, not two years.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is an assumption.

Senator Molgat: Bill C-18 provides for the dismantling of the current Electoral Boundaries Commission and it provides for the establishment of a new electoral boundaries commission 60 days after the end of the 24-month suspension. We are not talking about four years. The new commissions would operate under the current Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act unless new legislation is put in place.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is four years. There is your four years.

Senator Molgat: As Senator Lynch-Staunton has said, in addition to bringing the bill, the government has moved already in the other place, and the other place has agreed, to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs so that there is no delay.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then you do not need the bill. That is the point; you do not need the bill.

Senator Molgat: The committee will review the current electoral boundaries readjustment process and develop possible improvements, and report no later than December 16, 1994; not two years or four years hence, but this coming December.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Do not suspend the process.

Senator Molgat: Finally, the standing committee is authorized to frame legislation implementing its proposal.

From the outset, the government has made clear its intentions in bringing forward Bill C-18. The current system, which has been in place since 1964 — 30 years ago — needs to be thoroughly reviewed and, where necessary, improved. Your own government recognized that and you, Senator Murray, as a leading minister in that government, supported the establishment of the Lortie commission because you recognized that the electoral process had to be reviewed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We did not suspend the act during the commission's hearings, though.

Senator Molgat: Your government cost the Canadian taxpayers $20 million for the Lortie commission.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Democracy has no price.

Senator Molgat: That is how convinced you were that the system needed to be reviewed. That was your decision. What did you do when the Lortie commission came forward with their report? I commend what was done. You sent that report to a committee of the House, and the committee of the House proceeded to study it. What did they do? They came back with some legislation. But what did they say in addition? Here is what they said in their report of December 11, 1992. I will not quote all of it, but specifically they are talking about the fact that they intend to deal with "all other matters" in the royal commission report. They say:

> This third phase will include matters such as the assignment of seats to provinces.

They go on to state that it will also include:

> ...the drawing of constituency boundaries, measures to increase the number of female candidates and the establishment of aboriginal constituencies.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Well!

Senator Molgat: That is what they intended to do. What did they say, then? This is in December of 1992.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Did they say "to suspend the act"?

Senator Molgat: We will come to suspension of the acts. If you want to hear about that, we will discuss that as well.

What was said by the committee in their final report on May 4, 1993, their fifth report, that committee over in the other place, selected by you with a Conservative majority? Here is what they said:

> If we do not complete our work we want to make the strongest recommendation to the House that immediately after the next federal general election this Special Committee be reconstituted and challenged to continue its work until it is concluded. The electoral process lies at the heart of our democracy and Canadians have the right to the best law that our human ingenuity can devise to serve them.

I agree. That was their recommendation. Here they are talking about "immediately after the next election." However, this debate was occurring during the month of May. The government could have proceeded. Your committee over there could have gone on with its work. But what happened? You were too busy having Prime Minister Campbell attend barbeques and picnics the whole summer long, getting ready for an election, instead of having your committee deal with what is "the heart of our democracy" and "the best law that our human ingenuity can devise."

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You have lost your audience now.

Senator Molgat: That was not your interest. You were too busy electioneering all summer. There were barbeques and picnics from one end of the country to the other, but no time to deal with the electoral law. You did not deal with the electoral law, after you had paid $20 million — no, you did not; the Canadian taxpayers paid $20 million for a commission. That is only part of the report; there are four volumes like that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It was worth every penny.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, those are the facts: No more, no less.

Senator Berntson: I have never seen you so emotional.

Senator Hébert: They look astonished on the other side.

Senator Molgat: Bill C-18 is not the "miserable piece of legislation" that Senator Murray purports it to be.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is a polite term.

Senator Molgat: Bill C-18 arises directly out of the report and the recommendations of the committees.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Lortie said suspend the acts? Never.

Senator Molgat: Well, just wait if you want to hear more.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then hurry up, please.

Senator Carney: He is embarrassed.

•(1530)

Senator Molgat: Bill C-18 does not change the number nor the distribution of seats in the other place. Bill C-18 does none of that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It cannot.

Senator Molgat: Then what is your objection to Bill C-18?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It confirms the past.

Senator Molgat: It is your hypothesis. It is what you think is in the bill. Read the bill.

Bill C-18 cannot affect the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces, notwithstanding what my honourable friends are saying. In particular, Ontario and British Columbia are not the big losers in the process because Bill C-18 does not deprive them of seats in the next general election. Bill C-18 does not do that. Read the bill.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Who said it did?

Senator Molgat: You people are saying it does.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No.

Senator Molgat: That has been the whole basis of your argument, that Bill C-18 will do all of these things, and Bill C-18 does not do those things. You are only assuming the sequence. That is not what Bill C-18 does.

Senator Murray: Will the honourable senator permit a question on that point?

Senator Molgat: Absolutely.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has said that the new commissions which are to be appointed two years and 60 days from the date of Royal Assent to this bill, if it goes through, would operate according to the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. Does the honourable senator not realize that, in that case, redistribution could not be in place for an election until the fall of 1998?

Senator Molgat: Does my honourable friend not also agree that the setting up of a committee in the other place with the right to make recommendations and to propose legislation opens that up completely? The House of Commons will make a decision. They have established a committee.

Senator Murray: Talk about making assumptions!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You have already killed the act.

Senator Molgat: In any case, the 24 months does not prevent anything. There is still time. We are not dealing with that. Elections do not happen every two years in Canada. They happen every four, usually. I guess you people prefer to have them every five or five and a half or six, if you could, but be that as it may.

The other point that has been raised is that of the Constitution. Honourable senators have said that this bill violates the Constitution. Section 51 clearly says that the representation of the provinces be readjusted on the completion of each decennial census.

I urge honourable senators to think back a bit. Not too long ago, Senator Murray brought in a bill here in the Senate, Bill C-67, the Electoral Boundaries Suspension Act of 1992. It was brought in by your government. At that time, some questions were raised by ourselves on the Constitution. What happened? The matter was referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. What were they told? Mr. Graham Eglington, a specialist in the area, was of the view that the most restrictive deadlines for making the readjustments under section 51 would be either before the next decennial census, that is, 2001, or before the general election following the next census, which is obviously a later date still. Nothing that is being done now would delay the process to 2001, or to the next election after that. Hence, there is no constitutional problem, if we believe this expert.

The facts are as well that previous governments have brought in these similar acts.

Senator Carney: But we have never suspended the process.

Senator Molgat: If they were unconstitutional, why is it that we have had a suspension after every decennial census? We had one in 1971, we had one in 1981, and we had one in 1991. Were all of those actions against the Constitution?

Senator Murray: But redistribution was always ready for the election before the next decennial census, 1979, 1988, and it would have been ready for 1997 or 1998, if it were not for this bill.

Senator Molgat: And the very same thing can happen this time.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Can or will?

Senator Molgat: You are the ones who are assuming that it will not.

In short, Bill C-18 does not gut, distort, abuse, violate, dilute, nor manipulate the democratic rights and principles guaranteed under the Constitution.

Senator Berntson: And it has nothing to do with the Liberal backbenchers?

Senator Molgat: The government has acted responsibly. It has followed the recommendations of a committee of the other place —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: To suspend the act.

Senator Molgat: — in which you people had the majority, and is taking the advantage of moving as quickly as it possibly can after the election.

As I have said, this is not the first time the Senate has been asked to consider legislation to suspend the electoral boundaries redistribution process. We come back to 1992 and Bill C-67, which was brought in by your government. Here is Senator Forrestall, speaking on behalf of the government as lead speaker on Bill C-67:

> I am sure honourable senators will agree that it is preferable that a bill be passed to suspend the process as soon as possible before the current redistribution progresses further.

What was Senator Forrestall saying? Suspend. Do not proceed with the redistribution. Why? Because it will cost money. That was the reason.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It would not have been ready for the 1993 election.

Senator Molgat: Obviously, my honourable friends do not like to hear what I am saying because they insist on interrupting.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I want to correct the record.

Senator Molgat: The situation is the same today. The electoral boundaries commissions across the country have decided to proceed with their hearings, notwithstanding the clear message that the government has sent with the introduction of this bill. Though the commissions know that their work will be cut short if the bill receives Royal Assent, they have nevertheless proceeded.

What is the attitude of the Conservative Party?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform Senator Molgat that, under the rules, his time is up. Do we have unanimous consent for him to complete his remarks?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Berntson: When you are in a hole, keep digging.

Senator Molgat: Yesterday, when scrummed outside the Conservative caucus, the Honourable Jean Charest said that the commissions should continue with their work.

One is reminded of the former government's decision to enter into contracts about helicopters and the Pearson airport when all signs pointed to their imminent defeat, certainly in the case of the Pearson airport, just a few days before the election.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are waiting for that bill. We can talk about that then.

Senator Molgat: Theirs was a government that was prepared to proceed with these bills even though they knew they would be reversed. We now realize the cost to the taxpayers of Canada of those decisions by that government.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Completely irrelevant.

Senator Molgat: Now they will insist that the commissions continue their work at great cost, instead of letting this bill proceed and having the issues properly settled.

Senator MacDonald: What a great analogy.

Senator Molgat: Senator Murray saw some political intrigue, I guess I could put it, behind this bill. Let's have a look at what Senator Murray said. On April 19, in his speech, he said:

> If a government can gut these principles or put them in the deep freeze, which is what is being proposed in this bill, then democracy is on its way to becoming a shell.

Pretty strong language. The obvious question is, is it true?

The next obvious question is, what is going on in the Conservative Party? If Senator Murray is saying this here, what is the Leader of the Conservative Party, Mr. Jean Charest, saying — or is he the leader?

Surely Mr. Charest, in the great tradition of John Diefenbaker, would be the first to take the government to task if indeed the bill was setting democracy on its way to becoming a shell. Surely, Mr. Charest would have stood up in the House of Commons and, in the tradition of Diefenbaker, pounded the government. Yet what do we find? Not a word from Mr. Charest on second reading. Not a word from Mr. Charest in committee. Not a word from Mr. Charest at third reading.

This matter was so fundamental that neither the leader of the party in the House of Commons, which was mostly affected, nor by the way his house colleague, Mrs. Elsie Wayne — neither of them participated in the debate, attended the committee hearings, or took any part in the vote. What is more, to the best of my knowledge they said not a single word about it outside the chamber either, except for yesterday, when Mr. Charest recommended that the commissions continue at great cost to Canadians.

Mr. Charest was interviewed by Maclean's magazine recently. They did a special three-page feature on him last week. They quoted him extensively on a wide variety of issues, but not a single word about electoral boundaries. For example, instead of a warning to Canadians about how democracy was on the verge of becoming but a hollow shell, we have this paragraph:

> 'Canadians these days don't really want to hear from the Tories,' he says. 'They still want to kick our ass and that will last some time,' he acknowledges. 'We won't be able to eat enough crow in the next year.'

There is what the Leader of the Conservative Party is saying, after having said nothing about this bill that Senator Murray claims, and my colleagues opposite claim, is the destruction of democracy. It makes you wonder what kind of political intrigue is going on in this place. Are we to assume — surely not — that Senator Murray decided not to stay in the position of Leader of the Government in this place, but to be the real Leader of the Conservative Party, instead of Mr. Charest. Mr. Charest does not speak on this issue, but Senator Murray does.

Senator Gigantès: Surely the Tories aren't that suicidal!

Senator Molgat: Can we assume that Senator Murray, having been the éminence grise of his great friend Mr. Mulroney for many years, now feels that being Leader of the Government here is not enough, and that he must be the Leader of the Conservative Party and speak for them?

My honourable friends, it is an intriguing question. Of course I cannot answer it, but I leave it for you to consider.

Senator Berntson: I woke up for this!

Senator Molgat: In the end, by adopting Bill C-18 the Senate will allow for the eventual establishment of a regime providing better representation in the other place —

Senator Carney: Not in this century.

Senator Molgat: — and a more efficient system of electoral boundaries. I believe they will move in the direction that has been recommended, and we will end up with a better electoral system. My honourable friends, I urge support for the bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray: Would the honourable senator permit one final question?

Senator Molgat: Absolutely.

Senator Murray: If we are all agreed, and I think most of us are — I certainly said so in my speech — that it is appropriate to review the redistribution process on the basis of the Lortie commission and other recommendations that have been made, are we also agreed that we must have an impartial redistribution of seats before the next election, expected in 1997 or 1998? If so, will our friends opposite work with us in drafting the kinds of amendments that will make that certain?

Senator Molgat: I am certainly not in a position to commit my colleagues.

Senator Doyle: Who is the éminence grise now?

Senator Molgat: I don't know that any of the senators opposite can commit their colleagues, for that matter.

Senator Berntson: No problem on this bill.

Senator Molgat: I come from the province that started the independent system of redistribution under then Premier Campbell, and I support that system in principle. I think it is the right way to proceed, to have independent commissions.

Senator Murray: What about 1997-98?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I have a question for the deputy leader. I congratulate him on his very fine presentation. He occasionally did relate to Bill C-18. It is unfortunate that there were not more than nine or ten of his colleagues present to hear him. However, it is not the first time that we have seen so many empty chairs opposite on such important issues. I would like to ask the deputy leader where in the Lortie commission report it is stated that a re-examination of the whole electoral process requires a suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I do not know if it does or does not. All I am saying —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is not what you said. When we read the Debates tomorrow, unless there are corrections in the blues, it will show that there was an allusion made that the Lortie commission report could be used as a source for Bill C-18.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I don't believe I said that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You certainly implied it.

Senator Molgat: I believe I said that Lortie and the report of the committee on the other side specifically recommended that we proceed with a re-examination.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I agree with the re-examination. We all agree with the re-examination. We do not understand why the re-examination cannot take place without suspending the existing act which they will examine.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, in my opinion there is no point in proceeding with a redistribution which may have to be changed if the committee comes out with a different recommendation. Had the Conservative Party let the committee continue its work back in May 1993, the whole matter would have been settled, because the commission would have been suspended if they had come out with a different recommendation. But you people, after establishing the committee, did not let it finish its work. You went politicking instead.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And you stayed at home. Honourable senators, I have one final question. No matter what a committee of the House of Commons can decide, no matter what happens to the existing act, no matter what decisions are taken regarding the electoral boundaries and how they are set up, can the government assure Canadians that the next federal electoral boundaries will be based on the 1991 census?

Senator Molgat: I cannot answer that question.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You cannot?

Senator Stewart: No, because there might be a defeat tomorrow in the House of Commons.

Senator Berntson: Canadians couldn't be that lucky.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There may be one here first!

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. Senator Molgat has suggested that only the Conservatives are dumb enough to think that redistribution will not take place before the next election. I want to bring to the honourable senator's attention statements by three MPs: Nelson Riis of Kamloops, NDP, Ted White of North Vancouver, Reform Party, and Chuck Strahl of Fraser Valley East, Reform Party. All of them are talking about the unfortunate fact of British Columbia's lack of representation under your bill.

Nelson Riis said:

> Once again very clearly one of the fastest growing parts of Canada will be let down in terms of democratic and representative representation in the House of Commons after the next general election.

Ted White said:

> The increase in the population of B.C. entitles us to two more seats in the House.

He is expressing his concern that British Columbia is the province that will be most hurt by the bill. Chuck Strahl said:

> I am concerned about B.C. which is the fastest growing province and which already should have an extra two or three seats. We are going to go into the next century with the same number of seats and the same distribution that we had in 1981.

Given the fact that members of the Conservative Party, the NDP and the Reform Party all have come to the conclusion — and the Reform Party and the NDP voted against the bill as well — that this bill will not ensure that B.C. and Ontario have the representation to which they are entitled by the next election, I am again asking: Will senators opposite work with the Conservative majority in the Senate on the amendments — because it is your right to work with us, not anyone else's — to ensure that the two provinces which pay equalization funds for so much of the rest of the country have the representation they are entitled to before the next election? Will you give us that personal guarantee?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I should first like to make a correction. I do not believe I accused anyone of being dumb, Senator Carney. I do not think —

Senator Carney: Unable to read the act.

Senator Molgat: I said "read the act," but I did not accuse anyone of being dumb. In fact, I thought I complimented the speakers on what I thought were excellent and useful speeches.

To come back to your specific point, I suppose if I were a resident of British Columbia I would take the same position as you have. I believe, however, that at some point we have to stop increasing the number of members in the House of Commons. I am giving you my personal belief. That is what you asked me for. I am not speaking for the government.

Senator Carney: At British Columbia's expense.

Senator Molgat: I think there is a fundamental problem with the present act that will keep increasing the House of Commons forever. Canadians do not want the House of Commons to keep increasing every ten years. We have to look at this whole issue. It may be difficult.

We have now some anomalies in the system, to which Senator Murray referred today, Prince Edward Island being the notable one. It is an anomaly in "rep by pop" —

Senator Carney: So is British Columbia.

Senator Molgat: — but it is something Canadians have accepted because it is necessary to make the system work. There are other anomalies. For the province of Quebec there is a guarantee of 75 seats, is there not?

Senator Carney: No, we voted that down.

Senator Molgat: Well, there was at one time and it was considered acceptable. There are anomalies in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and there would be in Manitoba if our population were to drop. These are the things we have to look at. But I do not think we can simply continue to increase the House of Commons every ten years.

Senator Carney: This will be my final question. We have already agreed that we have common concerns about this bill, such as the size of Parliament and the cost. We have agreed to work to amend this bill so that some of those concerns can be addressed. However, we have asked you to work with us to ensure that the provinces of British Columbia and Ontario do have their fair representation by the next election. We are asking for a specific commitment from your side of the house to work with us to amend this bill in order to ensure that those provinces have their rightful representation by the next election. It is within your power to do that.

Senator Molgat: But this is not the bill that will do that. What will achieve what you are talking about is the study that will take place in the committee in the other place and the recommendations that will come forward. This bill only says this: "Because we are going to study the whole thing, let's leave matters in suspense; then when we get a recommendation we will be prepared to move."

Surely it is a reasonable position not to proceed and upset everything, when we know that there is to be a review, which was recommended by yourselves.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I am in somewhat of a quandary, deliberating whether I should request that the debate be adjourned.

I now know this motion is both debatable and votable. I also know — I am alone in my corner as usual on this— that it would seem to be the wish of the majority and the opposition to complete the second reading stage today in order to refer the bill to committee.

I will just stop and ponder for a second on moving the adjournment of the debate. As you know, some honourable senators could then ask for an adjournment and a vote on this and proceed with debate. Either way, I lose out, so, I guess I would rather put in a few comments.

When I accepted to come and sit in the Senate — it is often said, and my friend the Deputy Leader in the Senate was telling me that I may be an idealist; perhaps I am naive also, but I did think we had a role to play.

I must say that if I were a school teacher, I would distribute the bad marks equally between the government and the opposition. I listened to them carefully and I realized, once again, that the partisanship I left in the House of Commons can still be found in the Senate.

Of course we should not be naive, but I think the Senate's role is different. I promised to remain very calm for one year, but it is almost over, and I will certainly continue my pilgrimage across Canada to demonstrate the Senate's usefulness to young people and to all those who will invite us.

I think the Senate has a role to play. It is to determine whether a bill before us is good, bad or acceptable. It may not be very good but still be acceptable. Therefore, we accept the will of the majority, namely the House of Commons, the house of elected representatives.

If the bill can be improved, I think that senators must set aside partisanship and say that, in their opinion, the bill could be improved. We must make the necessary amendments and return the bill to the House of Commons, whose members should stop pretending that because they are elected, they are the only ones entitled to speak.

[English]

I do not share that opinion. Canadians should realize that we senators have a constitutional duty and a constitutional right to oppose, to ameliorate, or to pass. If the majority of Canadians, and Canadians only as I said before, are of contrary mind on this point, we will abolish the Senate. But I do not believe that. I believe our role is to look at each piece of legislation and also at the spirit of the legislation.

It so happens that I know this by heart. I have been involved for 30 years in these matters of electoral reform. I sat on the committee that studied the Lortie report. I am against the Lortie report. It is very simple. I said so then and I will say so publicly now. I do not agree with the conclusion of Lortie. I think it was a useless report and a needless expense. In its wisdom, the Senate could have done better at immensely less cost. The Senate should have done the work. I am not impressed by what Lortie says.

Bill C-18 is a piece of legislation that will suspend electoral boundaries readjustment for two years. The question is whether, if we vote for that bill, we will have a new map for the next election. Of course, I came to the conclusion that the answer is "no". There is no doubt that we will have to fight the next election under the existing map, which both senators and the elected members of the other chamber know well. That is regrettable, because it shows a lack of faith in the commission.

I am a Pearson boy. I was honoured to serve under Mr. Trudeau, but I am a Pearson boy, and there are other Pearson boys here. I call us "the club." I regret to say that none of the ladies who were appointed by Mr. Pearson are still in the Senate, but there are eight or nine of us boys.

When I was elected to serve under Mr. Pearson, one of the first debates I heard in the chamber in 1963-64 was on this issue. Many senators here were appointed by Mr. Pearson, and to me it is a feather in his cap that it was decided to let commissions decide on electoral reform.

•(1600)

It was great progress to get away from the gerrymandering that we all know took place in the past. No one was virtuous. Some say that we tried to keep Mr. Diefenbaker out of the House, but I do not believe that. Everybody tried to get their hands into making a new map in the old days. That was changed 30 years ago.

I should like it very much if the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate could get together and find some way to accommodate each other, and then present to the other chamber amendments that would be faithful to Bill C-18. We are not talking about two years, but maybe 18 months, maybe one year.

On this point I am in agreement with Senator Molgat: Review the number of members in the House of Commons. It cannot go on increasing like this. It is impossible. I remember it increasing to 262. I remember it increasing to 265. In order to have one more seat in Nova Scotia, we went from 265 to 282, and then from 282 we went to 295. If we do not stop, we will have 347 and then 369. Something has to be done.

I am for reducing the number 295. That does not take representation away. It is proportionate and fair and equitable for everyone. I am very sensitive to the views of Senator Carney. If this country is to exist, everybody has to feel included. No one from the Atlantic provinces should be upset. They are very well represented. They have 32 members in the House of Commons and 30 senators. We know that, because the number of senators is fixed. Nova Scotia could never lose more than one seat, even though they should have nine under this new distribution. We know that New Brunswick should have seven seats, but they cannot because there are ten senators; so they are protected. I agree that this is federalism at its best. I am a positive man. New Brunswick cannot have fewer than 10 members, because they have ten senators. P.E.I. cannot have fewer, even though they are allowed one member, or one and a quarter, if such a thing could exist. They have four because they have a fixed number of senators. We know that Nova Scotia should have fewer. We know that Newfoundland is protected and cannot go down to fewer than six. They have seven.

I know also that Manitoba, your province, my dear friend, is highly represented, because Manitoba should get eleven seats, but we froze it to fourteen. We know that Saskatchewan should have eleven seats, and we froze it to fourteen. For those who say Quebec is protected, for once, no. There is no way Quebec is protected by having 75 seats. That is almost equal to the proportionate representation of 25 per cent of the seats. It is Ontario that will be the loser. For these Ontario seats that you lose, you could take up two in the Atlantic and two in Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

On this point I am in total agreement with Senator Molgat, and this is probably the only point where I agree with him, but we should freeze the number. That could be done if there was a will, sir.

I served on all these committees, even though I am now deprived from sitting on any committee here in the Senate. I will keep on that subject until everybody gets sick and tired of hearing me say that. I sat on most of these committees, dutifully, faithfully, without missing a meeting. I sat on your own committee, Senator Molgat, and never missed a meeting over the years. Here in the Senate I am not found to be useful yet, but I am not frustrated, because I am very stubborn.

[Translation]

As all French Canadians, I am stubborn, but I have a positive attitude!

[English]

I am in an embarrassing situation. I want to vote against this bill. Senator Molgat said he did not know what was going on in the Conservative Party. Well, dare I tell him I do not know either? I do not know what is going on in the Liberal Party, but I have my suspicions after seeing this bill.

I say to my colleagues in the lower chamber that senior members should talk to the more junior members. My heart is an open book. I went through four redistributions. I was already a Liberal candidate in a fifth district. André Ouellet, my friend and esteemed colleague, and I were moulded together, and we would have found ways to get around that. We would have gone to court. I went to court last time. Senator Rizzuto was involved and Senator Nolin, as he mentioned. I mention their names because they were mentioned yesterday by Senator Nolin. We won, so the process worked.

We are not always happy, and you hear a member saying, "Give me that street, and I will give you that village. I am losing electors with whom I am comfortable."

Any new member of the House of Commons should have been told by the seniors, including the Honourable Mr. Gray, the guardian, the defender, to cool off and relax. We all go through these emotional reactions, saying, "I am losing my seat," as if it were yours and belonged to you. You have to adjust and readjust. Strangely enough, that has never affected any member of the House of Commons in the last 20 years. I ran four times under new redistributions after the late Azellus Denis. I do not understand why there is a panic over there. They should be reminded not to panic. They should be reminded that it is a good law, that is it out of the hands of the politicians to enhance the role of parliamentarians, to enhance the role of Parliament before the Canadian people, who have trusted the system for 30 years.

I am not going to be a bad boy today. I will say to the lady and gentleman who are in charge of the government here in the Senate that I will not ask for an adjournment of the debate. It will be on division, I am sure, even though the opposition has a majority. I feel I can reveal that, because nobody talks to me. I imagine the bill will not be defeated today but will be sent to committee on division. It is strange to have a division when there is a majority who oppose it, but to pursue the debate we will not exercise our power today. Let us see if we can have some amendments.

In the meantime, Honourable Senator Molgat, Honourable Senator Fairbairn, could you not exercise more leadership? You have all the potential for it, both of you, to lead our other colleagues. We in the Senate will not accept being a rubber stamp forever. I would rather resign from the Senate; but before I resign I will fight across Canada for my constitutional right to oppose, to cajole, to encourage, to accept proposals, but not to be a rubber stamp simply because we are not elected.

I have no inferiority complex because I am not elected! Is that clear? If some are "chicken" or are afraid of their role and say, "Well, we are not elected, so we bow down," nevertheless, I will not bow in the future to any piece of legislation if, according to my conscience, the Senate should oppose it.

I am not trying to be difficult, but why not put it on the working table? Why not see if you can make it better? We look at it in our wisdom, and we may be wrong, but we think it is a bad piece of legislation. I am not talking about Bill C-18 necessarily, but also future bills. If they are no good, we should send them back to the House of Commons. They should get used to that. It should not be the exception. It should be the general rule of a house that takes seriously its duty, its constitutional right, its constitutional duty. We should be proud to be senators. We should go across the country and say, "You can trust us."

The Senate, honourable senators, is a protector of the minorities and a protector of the regions. We are senators representing regions in this place. We should stand up for our regions, and travel across Canada defending minorities.

I just arrived from the Ukraine. I can report to you that Canada is a ray of hope on a troubled planet, but we must work harder at home.

Working more at home means that the people of British Columbia must not feel short-changed by the system. I like British Columbia. I travel to British Columbia, and I know British Columbia. Both God and Senator Molgat know how well I know Western Canada. I think I have spoken in over 200 places in Western Canada since I was first elected to Parliament. During that time I learned a lot about the people of Western Canada. I learned that they are proud to be Canadians, but they want to feel like they belong. With respect to these little, difficult pieces of legislation, difficult to understand, by the time we whistle here the people in British Columbia hear a big thunder. The further it goes, the bigger it gets. The result will not be an harmonious country. They feel short-changed, and we should realize that.

I wish to say to Senator Molgat, as I reflect on this bill this weekend, when this bill goes to committee I will attend the meetings of that committee as a non-member. I will be participating. I can take a good laugh. I will go. It is part of life.

Senator Molgat reminds me all the time that I am difficult to understand, but he is a good friend.

Honourable senators, I am hopeful that the Senate can work together and put partisanship aside. Much water has passed under the bridge in the last few years. Some members of this chamber may want to get even, but that is not why we are here. Our country is under attack, and the Senate is still here as a ray of hope to show that people with different opinions can work harmoniously together to find solutions.

Let us face it, honourable senators: We are here to find solutions. We have a deadlock now, and if we put our heads together, we can find a solution.

If the philosophy of Bill C-18 were to be changed with respect to a shorter delay, I would be ready to accept the bill.

I can say, honourable senators, that I like the motion to study with respect to the number of members in the House of Commons. I would like to see if we could freeze it at the 295 figure, or even reduce it.

If there is a will, let us work together to see if this legislation can be implemented in reducing the 2-year period to a year and a half or one year. Perhaps it could be done in a year, at which time we will have a good, harmonious electoral law. As well, Canadians would be happy to realize that there has been no tampering by politicians, and that the philosophy expressed by Mr. Pearson when he put forward the original piece of legislation has remained intact but modernized.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Lewis, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, that this bill be read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Molgat, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Government Notices of Motions:

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and pursuant to rule 31, I wish to modify Order No. 7 by inserting the word "direction" right after the word "future" to read as follows:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the future direction of the Department of Veterans Affairs; and
> That the committee present its report no later than October 31, 1994.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, shall this order stand until the next sitting?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: May I move the adoption of the motion?

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I wish to speak on this matter at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senator, I understand your disappointment. I know you have had discussions with the chairman of the committee, but perhaps the message has not followed through the lines of communication.

I think we can say there would not be any delay beyond the next time we meet. I cannot guarantee that, but —

Senator Gigantès: There will be no delay.

Senator Molgat: I know the chairman of the committee and yourself have agreed.

Senator Marshall: The chairman would have been here but he had another commitment. He indicated that you would be handling this matter, Senator Molgat.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 26, 1994, at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GERMAN CANADIAN CONGRESS

TOUR OF NORTHERN GERMAN STATES

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I rise to report to the Senate my participation in a German study tour held April 12 to 23, covering the five northern states of Germany, including Berlin, Brandenburg, Mecklenburg, Schleswig-Holstein and Hamburg. The tour was organized in Canada by the German Canadian Congress and the organization in Germany was by the Partnership of Parliaments. The group included two members of the Ontario Legislature and four Canadian businessmen.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REDUCTION OF MILITARY PERSONNEL—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, there is a report today that the Government of Canada will reduce its military personnel by some 8,100 by 1997 and, as alluded to in the budget, its non-military personnel by similar numbers. This report raises the possibility of a contradiction in the justification for a review of defence policy.

Already Canada's military structure has withstood decisions to close military bases, the cancellation of the EH-101 helicopters, and now the reduction of both military and non-military personnel to an almost skeletal force. To draw an analogy, is the government handing down the verdict before the trial? It seems appropriate that the government explain the justification for making these decisions before the policy review is completed and recommendations made.

NOVA SCOTIA

SUCCESS OF PRIVATE SHORTLINE RAILWAY OPERATIONS

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, it is seldom that one has the opportunity to revisit a report of a Senate committee and comment on the progress of its subject-matter. I am referring, of course, to the the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on the Truro-Sydney Line. That committee was set up on Wednesday, December 11, 1991, and reported on June 23, 1992.

The committee at that particular time recommended:

> That the Government of Nova Scotia should urgently reconsider its present position and make every effort to ensure that a private shortline operator would be successful. The Committee has examined the performance of shortline operators in both the United States and Canada and is persuaded that a private operator has a better chance of success than a line that continued to be operated by CN.

The Liberal minority report said:

> Moreover we recommend that the Government of Canada continue to "entrust" the management and control of the Truro to Sidney line to CN, and that CN be directed to put adequate resources and personnel in place to ensure that the potential of the Truro to Sidney line is fully realized.

The Financial Post reported the following about the Cape Breton & Central Nova Scotia Railway on March 7, 1994:

> Railtex, which operates 23 freight railways, including two in Canada, reported a net income increase of 34 per cent to $3.63 million U.S. for the year ended December 31 on revenues that jumped 52 per cent to $59.85 million U.S.

Railtex is the private line to which we sold the 400-kilometre line from Truro to Sidney.

> Railtex said its fourth-quarter results were strengthened by revenues and earnings from its newest acquisition, the 400-kilometre Cape Breton & Central Nova Scotia Railway (CB&CNS) which was purchased from CN North America on October 1, 1993. Railtex Chief Executive Bruce Flohr said the CB&CNS "had an exceptionally smooth startup and is shaping up as a very strong performer for 1994."

I would also draw to the attention of honourable senators that a bill has been introduced in the New Brunswick Legislature, and has recently passed third reading, to provide the legislative framework for shortline railways established before or after the commencement of that bill. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission views this bill as a positive step by the New Brunswick government to prepare legislatively for the likelihood that shortline railways will wish to operate profitably in that province.

Senator Corbin: So what?

Senator MacDonald: You want a railway, you got a railway.

Senator Corbin: Tell us about what happened in Ontario.

Senator Berntson: Wise people, all of them.

QUESTION PERIOD

CONFLICT OF INTERESTS

LOBBYING, INFLUENCE PEDDLING AND SELLING ACCESS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am keeping the Red Book as a ready reference on Liberal Party policy until it is repudiated, because I am sure its time is coming to an end. Meanwhile, we must assume it is still the guiding book of this government.

The Liberal Red Book includes some very damning statements regarding lobbying, implying that it is a most unethical practice requiring strict controls. Caught up in its pious prose on the subject, the Liberal Party pledged that:

> ...a Liberal government will move quickly and decisively in several ways to address these concerns about conflict of interests, influence peddling and selling access.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate explain why, nearly six months after she and her cabinet colleagues were sworn in, they have not only not moved quickly and decisively, they have not moved at all on what was, at least before October 25 last, such a high priority?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his question.

Honourable senators, the daily operations of the government are very much in accordance with the Red Book. It is still a guiding document for us. Indeed, our budget, our Speech from the Throne and many other activities that have taken place in the last six months indicate that we have been faithful to the forward-looking and positive thrust of our Red Book commitments. Obviously, you cannot do it all in six months.

•(1420)

The government is actively working on the issues to which the honourable senator drew my attention. I am sure the opposition will be pleased to know the results just as soon as they can be revealed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is certainly an answer which can be interpreted in many ways. I will be delicate enough not to give my interpretation.

My question is prompted by various reports over the past few weeks that the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada is preparing a campaign to have Bill C-91 amended, a law which we will all recall was vigorously opposed by the Liberals. The Globe and Mail of this morning speaks of "...an all-out assault to get the law watered down." It says that this will involve, "a new round of intense lobbying."

The Red Book assures Canadians that the public agenda will not be dominated by lobbyists, and that access to ministers and senior officials should not require the employment of lobbyists. If this is still Liberal Party thinking, can the leader assure us that the generously paid lobbyists of the generic drug manufacturers are being denied access to cabinet ministers and senior officials, and that this is also true for those who employ them, that is, the generic drug manufacturers?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I certainly cannot respond in detail to Senator Lynch-Staunton's comment, and I honestly do not believe he would expect me to be able to do so today. I will review his question and pass it on to my colleagues.

I am aware of the story that appeared in the newspapers today on the question of drug prices. This government is very conscious of drug prices and will be looking at that issue very closely.

I will look into the detailed question that my friend Senator Lynch-Staunton asked me and I will report back to him as quickly as I can.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If I may be allowed, my question does not require a detailed answer. I should certainly like to know whether the pious mutterings regarding lobbying activities are felt so strongly by this government that instructions have already been given that ministers and senior officials should not have access either to the lobbyists or to those who employ them. Has the Government of Canada given instructions along those lines? If not, what can we think the result is but a double standard?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, one of the strong commitments by this new government was to open up our system of consultation with Canadians so that Canadians would have access to the government, and that it would not close out the views of ordinary people by responding only to the views and the advice of lobbyists. We have been consciously doing this and the Prime Minister has been clear in his public statement on this.

I will see how I can best respond to the comments of the Leader of the Opposition. However, the order of this government is clear, and it has been operating on the basis that the people for whom the ministers, the members and the Government of Canada work are the Canadian people, who can have access to them without benefit of lobbyists.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And lobbyists are Canadians.

YOUTH

EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING— STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, the government has recently announced initiatives to promote employment and training for young people. I understand that there are currently approximately 400,000 young people unemployed. These new initiatives announced by the government are expected to provide jobs this summer for approximately 10,000 of those youths across Canada.

Could the Leader of the Government tell me how many jobs will be created by these programs for young people in Newfoundland and Labrador?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will be pleased to see if I can find a breakdown of those statistics. I point out to my honourable friend that the youth initiatives consist of a series of different programs, including the summer employment programs that are expected to create a great many more jobs than the honourable senator suggested. Indeed, we have boosted the sum of money available to the student summer employment program by 20 per cent this year.

•(1420)

I will attempt to find out from my colleague if there is an approximate figure for Newfoundland and Labrador.

FUNDING OF TRAINING INITIATIVES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, the new programs include funding for training initiatives. Will the Leader of the Government tell us how many training opportunities will be made available for the young people in my province; and further, what job opportunities will be created for them when this training is completed?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will also follow up on that question, honourable senators.

Another aspect that will enter into the equation for Newfoundland and Labrador is the overall initiative that was announced recently concerning the fishery, and the intensive efforts that will be made in terms of training, basic training, literacy and the whole labour component. Obviously, that will involve younger Canadians as well.

It will be difficult to obtain the precise type of information which my honourable friend seeks. However, I will do my best to obtain for her some information that will, perhaps, be helpful.

THE ENVIRONMENT

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—RECOMMENDATIONS ON TOXICITY REDUCTION IN GREAT LAKES—GUIDELINES FOR DETECTION APPARATUS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, in response to a question that I asked previously in this chamber regarding the recommendations of the International Joint Commission on toxicity reduction in the Great Lakes, I received an answer which stated that:

> The Government of Canada will be proactive in reducing or eliminating those discharges of toxic substances, including chlorine-based compounds, that on the basis of sound science are determined to be persistent and bioaccumulative.

I wish to pursue a question relating to the issue of zero discharge versus virtual elimination, which I think is a very important question, since both phrases are being used interchangeably. Recent studies indicate that what is virtually eliminated initially, or that which is presumed not to have been discharged at all, ends up biomagnified in fish. Even though today mass spectrometry to detect these substances is very sophisticated, the best technology available in Canada may not be sufficiently precise to detect the most dangerous pollutants. The scientific study of effluent from the pulp and paper industry, which dates back to 1987, is also very new.

My question to the Leader in the Government is this: What are the detection limits of mass spectrometry apparatus and other detection equipment that will be used to ensure that the government keeps its commitment to reduce proactively or to eliminate discharges of toxic substances that are persistent and bioaccumulative?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Spivak for giving me a little nudge by indicating that she would be asking this question. However, I received that nudge shortly before I came into the chamber. I will need a little more time to obtain an answer for the honourable senator, which I will do.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

CUT-BACK IN GOVERNMENT SPENDING—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Since the Infrastructure Program is to be financed with money that is being reallocated from one part of the budget and spent on another, and since members of the Government of Canada have been running around the country saying, "We will create 90,000 jobs through the Infrastructure Program," does the government have an estimate of the jobs that will be lost as a result of the withdrawal and cut-back of that $700 million in spending from the federal budget?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we talked about the Red Book earlier. One of the most important projects from the Red Book that was immediately undertaken was the creation of the Infrastructure Program, which is already producing projects across the country, There are, indeed, many more programs to be assessed and approved that will provide an important economic stimulus to job creation and the economic well-being of Canadians. That well-being will be measured not just by the precise number of jobs that are created but by all the services and the economic lift that those jobs will produce throughout the economy.

In terms of the honourable senator's precise question, I do not have a direct answer for him. I will reflect on it and get back to my honourable friend.

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I beg to differ on the original premise made by the Leader of the Government. The minister who appeared before the National Finance Committee the other day talked about reallocations. He said that you take from one budget item and give it to another.

The premise is that that money will be given to the provinces and to the municipalities for new infrastructure programs. However, if money is taken from old infrastructure programs to pay for the new programs, which even the minister admitted the provinces were doing, I do not understand how any jobs will be created. In other words, if a sewer is being built in one place, the government will come to you with a carrot and say, "Don't build a sewer. The only way you can qualify for this money is by doing something new. Build a convention centre or a casino." However, regardless of the number of jobs created by the building of the casino, the overall number of jobs will be diminished because of the discontinuance of the sewer project.

I wish to know the answer to this question — something that all the government's analysts and deputies sitting in the committee did not know: If it was so easy to create 90,000 new jobs, then does the government know how many jobs were lost by moving the money from one budget to another?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I do not believe that is the way the program works.

Senator Tkachuk: That is exactly the way it works.

Senator Fairbairn: I will be delighted to put together for my honourable friend as much of a package of information and background as I possibly can. I will initiate that this afternoon.

NEW BRUNSWICK

SHARE OF PATRONAGE APPOINTMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, my two questions deal with job creation. The first one arises from an article that appeared yesterday in New Brunswick's English language newspaper, the Telegraph Journal, over the byline of Campbell Morrison, the heading of which states:

> N.B. lags behind in scramble for patronage jobs.

The article continues:

> Only three of 200 appointments have gone to New Brunswickers since federal Liberals took office.

My question is not so much to express my sorrow or disappointment over the fact that Liberals did not get all the jobs that they expected to get, but to express my concern in regard to New Brunswickers — Conservative or Liberal — getting a fair share of so-called Order-in-Council jobs, whether they be patronage appointments or something else.

Can the minister assure us that New Brunswick will be getting the jobs, and that we will not be short-changed by having those jobs go to Ontario or any other province? Will New Brunswick get its fair share of jobs under any program of this federal government?

•(1450)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am pleased to answer Senator Simard's question. I can assure him that, whatever kind of job creation program is in place in Canada, New Brunswick will get its fair share.

I should draw the attention of honourable senators to two points concerning Order-in-Council appointments. First, those lists were plum full. When we came into power, they were full to the brim with people who had been appointed.

Senator Kinsella: That is what they are for, New Brunswickers!

Senator Fairbairn: That may be part of the reason that there are not a great many openings at the moment, though no doubt some will come free as the years roll on.

The second point, which has been made by both the Prime Minister and the Honourable Marcel Massé, is that there is a systematic review under way in government at this point in time to determine whether all of these jobs on boards and commissions are required.

It is the purpose of the government to be as efficient as possible in carrying out the requirements of government work in this country. It is also the stated pledge of this government, as I indicated to my friend from Saskatchewan a few days ago, that people will be appointed on the basis of their competence. I am sure that you will find that to be the case in New Brunswick, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: I can keep my preamble short and to the point, but I have no control over the answers. But that is all right.

Senator Olson: You wanted a complete answer.

Senator Simard: The minister has chosen to state those parts of the government policy that please her. That is fine, but for 10 years, during the Mulroney era, New Brunswick got its share of jobs. A lot of them went to Liberals and Conservatives. Madam Minister, you are not being innovative at all when you say that competent people will get the jobs, because that is what we did when the Progressive Conservatives were in government.

The title in the newspaper article reflects what George Rideout, the new member from Moncton, says. You said, Madam Minister, that all the "plums" had been handed out. I question the proper share for New Brunswickers. We know that 200 appointments went somewhere, but only three jobs went to New Brunswick, and they were all within the same employment board.

Senator Olson: Question, please!

An Hon. Senator: No preamble!

Senator Simard: There is one job available. I am not applying for it, but the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick has, for two years, served notice that he wants out. I hope that you can find a good Liberal. I would not mind if the government appointed a lady, even if her name was Madame Aldéa Landry. That is just a suggestion.

[Translation]

YOUTH

KATIMAVIK—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: My second question is once again about a job creation program for youth.

As you know, the Red Book was distributed during the last election campaign and was used to raise expectations among Canadians about all kinds of programs to come; and even if the Red Book did not mention it as such, Liberal organizers and candidates in New Brunswick talked about the well-known Katimavik program.

Many people remember that the present Government Whip in the Senate, Senator Hébert, went on a hunger strike to have this program reinstated. Now that Senator Hébert is his party whip and is close to the Liberal leadership, is the government now looking at the possibility of reinstating the Katimavik program?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first, I thank my friend Senator Simard for his suggestion in respect of Madame Landry. I will be more than pleased to pass it along. I reiterate that, with members of Parliament like George Rideout and his colleagues, you can rest assured that New Brunswick will be absolutely fairly treated in whatever employment and job prospects there are, be they public service, Order-in-Council appointments or the result of job creation. There is not a place in this country at the moment that is being better served by innovative projects than the Province of New Brunswick.

Senator Frith: That is true.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, with respect to Katimavik, it is one of the most outstanding programs for young Canadians ever devised in this country. When I am travelling around the country meeting people who are active in public life today, very often they will say, "I was a member of Katimavik. How is Senator Hébert?" He deserves a great deal of credit from all of us for that program, which has been his lifelong crusade.

Senator Simard: But will it be re-established? That is my question.

Senator Fairbairn: The programs that were announced recently are different from Katimavik, but they embody a great many of the principles and ideals of that program.

As my colleague the Minister for Human Resources Development has said, in addition to community employment opportunities for young people there will also be an opportunity for them in Youth Services Canada; young people will be able to take advantage of the program by travelling elsewhere in the country, away from their own provinces. That is an element that was extremely important in the Katimavik adventure.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT PROCESS

CONSTITUENCIES, PROVINCES, AND MUNICIPALITIES—PROCESS OF CONSULTATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I was impressed with the response given by the Leader of the Government to the questions that Senator Lynch-Staunton asked. In particular, I was impressed with the emphasis that she placed on the consultative process that her government is insisting on. This consultative process was identified and referred to repeatedly in the Red Book.

With that spirit of consultation, I should like to know which provinces, municipalities and constituencies were consulted before the introduction of Bill C-18.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Robertson will know that the process of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act is clear. One of the concerns that the government has had is that that process needs to be revisited. It needs to be reviewed and perhaps changed.

•(1500)

Through Bill C-18, the people of Canada will not have the substantive portion of redistribution done by Parliament. Rather, Parliament is being asked to review the process to make sure that it is still relevant today; that the process is the very best it can be. At the end of the review, the commissions will again do their work as they have done in the past, but perhaps according to different criteria.

Senator Robertson: I am sorry, but the Leader of the Government has misunderstood my question. With whom did the federal government consult to come to that decision? Did you consult with the Government of British Columbia? Did you consult with the Government of Ontario? Did you consult with constituencies? Did you consult with those areas that will be damaged by weakening their democratic process? If this consultation process is so important to the Liberal government, tell us, please, with whom did you consult? You are consulting after the fact.

Senator Hébert: Such strong words.

Senator Frith: And some honourable members said, "Oh, oh!"

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, in answer to Senator Robertson's question, with this piece of federal legislation, the government has taken its responsibility to —

Senator Berntson: To fix what ain't broke.

Senator Fairbairn: — take the opportunity that is probably long overdue in placing this method of changing our electoral map before the Parliament of Canada, to which members are elected by all Canadians to represent them. In this particular case, I would say that the members of Parliament in the House of Commons of every political party, in opposition and in government, are prepared to do their job in this regard.

The Hon. the Speaker: I apologize to honourable senators, but unless they have a short supplementary, I made a list and I try to follow it as fairly as I can.

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I do have a supplementary question. It is to the Leader of the Government. She seems to indicate that the opposition parties are supporting this process. It is clear that the opposition parties were not consulted, and that the Reform Party, specifically the members of Parliament from British Columbia, voted against this measure.

Can the Leader of the Government amplify her answer to the question being asked by Senator Robertson? Did the government consult with the opposition parties, as is the historic and traditional precedent for legislation of this kind? Yes or no?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am not sure that that is the traditional and historic precedent on legislation of this sort. I should like to go back into the records to look for that.

Senator Carney: Did the government consult with the opposition?

Senator Fairbairn: The government brought forward its proposals to Parliament. The proposals were before the House of Commons. They were discussed there, and they were passed.

Senator Carney: They were voted down.

Senator Fairbairn: I am certainly not intending for one moment to suggest that they were supported by the Reform Party. They were dealt with by the House of Commons, and I am quite sure the committee of the Senate that will study this process will have very active participation from all of the parties represented in the House of Commons.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

GOVERNMENT SPENDING—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT—RENOVATIONS TO ATHLETIC FACILITIES IN EDMONTON AND CALGARY

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to that of the Honourable Senator Tkachuk with respect to the infrastructure program. I, too, do not believe that the infrastructure program will really produce any meaningful jobs. What I see happening in the cities of Calgary and Edmonton, from a budgertary point of view, is that they are merely transforming already committed expenditures in order to receive federal money that the federal government does not have. In other words, they are just moving around the jobs that would have been there already.

I think the question from Senator Tkachuk is a very meaningful and important question. The Leader of the Government mentioned a boost in employment, and I am wondering whether she has any information, statistics or studies to show, at this early stage, whether that is occurring, as opposed to the drop in unemployment which has recently been announced, and which I think is due to many other factors.

I will pose both my questions so that the Leader of the Government can respond in both cases.

My second question is: Has the government made any decision as to whether or not they will approve the recommendations from the cities of Edmonton and Calgary with respect to renovations to their athletic facilities?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on the first question, at this early point in the program, the government cannot indicate what the employment boost has been because in some areas of the country the projects have just been approved. They are a little slower in some areas of the country, such as our area, so that information would not be forthcoming yet.

As I said earlier, though, the projects that are put forward for assessment must be within the criteria of the program, and the most important criteria of the program is job creation, followed by meaningful and lasting contributions in terms of infrastructure for the benefit of whichever community is involved.

As to Senator Ghitter's last question, the projects from the province of Alberta are just now really going through the process as it is applied in that province. I might add that in that province, the municipal influence, if you will, in the process is perhaps even more pointed than it is elsewhere in Canada because of agreement among the three levels of government.

The federal government is looking forward to receiving the projects as they move through the assessment process. Just as soon as we can all get together, you will have your answer.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REDUCTION OF CANADIAN FORCES CAPABILITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, as I alluded to in Senators' Statements, the Canadian government is intending to reduce again the structure of the Canadian Forces by 8,100 personnel. When added to the cancellation of the helicopters and the closing of military bases, this is the third serious reduction in our capability.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government can rationalize for me how it is that the government can feel so strongly that a review of the defence policy is vital to the future of the military forces, and yet, at the same time, take the action that they have, which is putting our military forces at risk with all these serious reductions.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I might go back some weeks to when we were discussing the formation of the joint committee to review our national defence policy. At that point it was made clear, as it was made clear in the budget, that there were priorities which required immediate action through the budget that affected, certainly, the size of the armed forces and a whole host of other things, as I am sure Senator Marshall will recall with considerable sadness. It was made quite clear at the time that the original cuts made up an initial and necessary part of the budget process, and that the review itself was a broadly based policy review with respect to national defence.

This morning I read the story from which I believe Senator Marshall was quoting, and frankly I would question where that fits in with the announcements that were made in the budget.

Senator, I should like to get back to you on that, if I could.

Senator Marshall: Just as a short supplementary, would the Leader of the Government prepare and produce a statement on the rationale for the plan to make cuts now, prior to whatever recommendations might come out of the committee? The committee is being restricted in its open discussion and review of the forces; and it will be restricted in its recommendations. The committee might want to make recommendations contrary to the decisions the government has made already. There is no war coming. I do not think there is any reason for such haste in making these cuts.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Marshall, I cannot promise you a statement, but I can promise you an answer.

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret that the allocated time for Question Period has expired. It is only with leave that I could prolong the Question Period, but I think that is a precedent which we should ask the rules committee to examine.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-9, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith moved the second reading of Bill C-8, to amend the Criminal Code and the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act (force).

He said: Honourable senators, I mean to try to persuade you to support this bill at second reading by presenting three aspects of the bill. I will say a word or two in introduction about the why and the what, or sort of the bare facts about the bill; then, second, I will take a somewhat closer look at the why and the what; and then I will add a little addendum about a part of the bill that is not directly related to the main portion, and that is the amendment to the Coastal Protection Fisheries Act.

First, why Bill C-8? As we like to say, what is the wrong to be remedied? The first place to look is the explanatory notes. Honourable senators will have remembered, perhaps, that explanatory notes are not always very helpful in trying to understand what the purport and intention of a bill are, but I refer with approval to the explanatory notes here, because the reference is quite short and quite clear:

> This enactment would amend subsection 25(4) of the Criminal Code to provide for the legal protection of peace officers, and persons lawfully assisting peace officers, who use force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm to fleeing suspects who pose a threat of imminent or future death or grievous bodily harm.

This bill would add a new subsection 25(5) to provide legal protection for peace officers dealing with penitentiaries, and then there is the additional amendment that I mentioned with reference to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

Those are the three main parts: First, the fleeing suspect, as they call it here; second, peace officers engaged in penitentiary work; and, third, that portion dealing with coastal fisheries protection.

Another answer to the why of Bill C-8 is given in some question-and-answer material provided by the minister. In simple terms, it says the current subsection 25(4) is inadequate and needs to be changed, and, I emphasize, an Ontario court has found the provision to be unconstitutional.

Now, let us take a little closer look at the why and the what. Bill C-8 deals with what has become an important issue in Canadian society, and that is: when can, and when should, the use of deadly force against fleeing suspects and escaping penitentiary inmates be justified in law? That is now the second time I have used the words "deadly force," and I suppose "deadly force" can be called a term of art in the sense that it has a specific meaning beyond the main meaning of the two words. It is force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm.

Section 25(4) of the present section of the Criminal Code deals with that but, as we have seen, not effectively. What Bill C-8 proposes is to update subsection 25(4) of the Criminal Code, known as the "fleeing suspect" rule. It is also known as the "fleeing felon" rule, and that, of course, is the giveaway that it is an old section, since under the present criminal law, under the Criminal Code, we do not use the words "felony" and "misdemeanour," although they still do in some parts of the United States, and of course as they did in Britain under the common law. As we know, the British criminal law is not codified. Of course, it is ironic that the Criminal Code of Canada, which is a codification, is adopted from a codification that took place, but was never enacted, in England. That is the reasoning behind the use of the word "felon."

Special provision is made here to justify the use of deadly force against escaping inmates under certain circumstances by peace officers in penitentiaries through a proposed new subsection 25(5) of the Criminal Code. It also proposes a new section to be added to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act to provide statutory authority for protection officers, and I will say a word about that in closing.

It seems that the present law needs changing. Let us take a look at why. The current subsection 25(4) of the Criminal Code sets out the circumstances in which peace officers can be justified in using force, including deadly force, to stop suspects who are fleeing arrest. On its face, the wording of the provision would appear to justify using deadly force to stop a suspect from avoiding arrest even though the fleeing suspect poses no risk of harm to anyone, unless the escape can be prevented by reasonable means in a less violent manner. This, our present law, is codified in common law as the "fleeing felon" rule.

When this rule was conceived, it was applied with respect to only the most serious offenses, namely, felonies. Crimes were divided into felonies and misdemeanours. Virtually all felonies were punishable by death at the time. There was also a time when, if a fleeing offender was not immediately apprehended, there was often no arrest at all. Times change. All of us, I think, can recall events that have lead to violent group reaction to the wounding or death of allegedly fleeing felons and the resulting difficulties, socially and politically, our society has had in dealing with them. These are events that have taken place all across Canada.

The present law has been an inadequate tool to deal with this problem. Furthermore, the current provision has been declared unconstitutional by an Ontario court in the case of R. v. Lines, because, the court held, it violated the right to life and security of the person found in section 7 of the Charter. In the words of the court, the current provision, the one based on the old common law "is over-broad and entirely lacks proportionality."

Something had to be done, and was done. I am not talking about just since the election, as the matter was also taken up by the previous government. The legislative proposals to amend subsection 25(4) of the Criminal Code have had a long evolution and have been the focus of considerable consultation and study. Calls for change have come forward from many quarters — for example, the Law Reform Commission of Canada and the Ontario Race Relations and Policing Task Force. In addition, the fleeing felon rule has been identified and targeted by a number of ethnocultural and visible minority community organizations. The extensive consultations have lead us to the proposals you see before you in Bill C-8.

What were these consultations? They have taken place over a number of years. The federal government has consulted with the provinces and the territories at various levels, both on the need for change — the "why" as we called it — and on the particular form — the "what" of the amendment. In June 1991, the Department of Justice circulated for comment a consultation document on the issue which identified four options. Then, more recently on August 27, 1992, a further discussion paper outlining detailed proposals for amending subsection 25(4) of the Criminal Code was released. The discussion paper was widely distributed across Canada to senators and members of Parliament, provincial and territorial attorneys general and solicitors general, chief justices, provincial chief judges, ethnocultural and visible minority organizations, ethnic media, about 1,300 police officers across Canada, police press, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Police Association, bar associations, law deans, law societies and other interested non-governmental associations and individuals. The overwhelming response was that the current law is inadequate.

The police and the communities were not divided in their response. There is support in the communities, and within the police community, to change that law because of the need for clearer guidelines than is presently provided, to have it accord more closely with current police practice and policy, and to help dispel the notion that the police are taking advantage of the wide latitude accorded by the current subsection 25(4), as I described at the outset. Therefore the foundation for the legislative response, which is our job, is clearly well established.

What principles must guide such a legislative response? I suggest first — and I say "first" as a numerical reference, not in reference to priority, because all these principles are important and do interlock — that the government is absolutely committed to preserving the ability of the police to protect themselves and the public from serious harm or death. The bill does that. It specifically permits the use of significant force in order to protect the public and the peace officer. A second principle is the right balance between the ability of the peace officers to maintain the safety and security of the public while respecting the rights of Canadians. Third, it seems to me we must have clarity as to when peace officers can use deadly force to stop suspects who are fleeing arrest. A fourth principle is balance in the threat posed by a fleeing suspect that is in proportion to the seriousness of that threat. Fifth, the bill must provide legislative wording that matches the law to the reality of contemporary social context and the nuts and bolts of implementation. I believe this bill puts all these principles into legislative context.

Honourable senators, let us take a quick look at the bill itself so that you will see what it is we are asking. It is not a long bill. In the first few months that I was in this place, I learned never to say, "It is a simple bill." It is not a simple bill but it is not a long bill. You will see some important words. The first section, amending subsections 25(3) and (4) of the Criminal Code and replacing them, indicates that:

> ...a person is not justified, —

An interesting and safe way of putting it.

> ...for the purposes of subsection (1), in using force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm, unless...

•(1520)

This is an interesting bit of legal draughtsmanship which is to be commended because, rather than saying "force can be used" as the general principle, it says that force cannot be used unless certain requirements are met. The bill goes on to say that "...it is necessary for the self-preservation of the person..." et cetera.

The next subsection reads as follows:

> (4) A peace officer, and every person lawfully assisting the peace officer, is justified in using force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm to a person arrested if...

The subsection then sets out the circumstances. They are listed on page 2: (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e).

Honourable senators, this change provides the police, the community and the courts with a tool which the present law does not. You can imagine yourself as a judge simply finding out what the facts are, looking at those two subsections and being able to say "Does it fall within these parameters or not?" These parameters are sufficiently flexible to give the court the opportunity, in administering the law, to come to a just result. That is the kind of tool we legislators should give to the courts and to society.

Honourable senators, the bill provides that the use of force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm to arrest a fleeing suspect may only be used in certain circumstances where the user of the force believes, on reasonable grounds, that the use of such force is necessary for the protection of any person from imminent or future death or grievous bodily harm, and "only" if the flight cannot be prevented by reasonable means in a less violent manner.

Notice that the test, as we have said, speaks in terms of the threat of imminent or future death or grievous bodily harm, in order to make it clear that the provision would apply with respect to a person fleeing from arrest who is reasonably believed to constitute a danger to society, even though the anticipated harm posed by that person is not immediate.

Bill C-8 also proposes that deadly force be allowed in order to prevent the escape of an inmate — this is the second of the three main portions of the bill — from a penitentiary in which it is known — notice, again we have serious, important conditions — that there are inmates who would be dangerous if they escaped, provided that the escape cannot be prevented by reasonable means in a less violent manner. This proposed amendment reflects the current policy and practice relating to the use of force in penitentiaries.

We can surely understand, honourable senators, that circumstances often make it impossible for an officer guarding the perimeter of a penitentiary to know the identity of an inmate trying to escape, much less the level of risk that the inmate presents. Therefore, the individualized grounds required by this proposed new subsection — and it is new because it is an addition to section 25(4) of the Criminal Code — are not practical in the correctional setting. That is why we have a separate subsection — the proposed new subsection 25(5) of the Criminal Code.

The provision, which you will find in the bill on page 2, defines grounds justifying the use of lethal force based on the security profile of the penitentiary; in other words, whether its population includes inmates who are likely to pose a threat of causing death or grievous bodily harm to other persons. In practice, penitentiaries housing such inmates are all classified at the maximum and medium security level.

Would that be right senator?

Senator Hastings: Yes.

Senator Frith: They have secure perimeters patrolled by peace officers equipped with firearms.

However, although this section on penitentiaries is a separate section tailored to separate conditions, it does parallel, to the extent that it can, the tests in subsection 25(4) by requiring the same standard of belief: belief based on reasonable grounds. It gives the court some room to apply the facts based on reasonable grounds and the determination that less violent alternatives — again, something the court can look at in the facts — will not be effective. It observes our principle of proportionality by limiting its scope to a specific class of persons: convicted offenders judged to be of high risk to public safety. In this way, it strikes a sensible balance between individual rights and community needs, and guarantees that peace officers in our penitentiaries will continue to enjoy the authority they need to carry out their responsibilities for the protection of society.

Honourable senators, those are the "whys" and "whats" of Bill C-8 on those two points: the fleeing felon, as we called it — although that is the old-fashioned phrase — and the point about penitentiary officers. I hope those "whys" and "whats" will persuade you to support the bill's principle and its referral to committee.

Finally, an addendum, as I promised, on the third and last part of the bill that should have attention at this stage. That also respects our guiding principles. This amendment, it was felt, would be needed to ensure that protection officers retain the same powers they have at present to use disabling force when necessary.

This amendment refers to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. It is the third portion of the bill and reads:

> 2. The Coastal Fisheries Protection Act is amended by adding the following after section 8:

Here we have different numbers, and not the section 25 numbers we were talking about earlier. This amendment is needed to ensure that protection officers retain the same powers they have at present to use disabling force when necessary.

You will notice the expression "disabling force," not "deadly force" because we are now talking about ships. The amendment does not authorize the use of disabling force against Canadian vessels. Domestic fishing vessels and their masters routinely remain in Canadian waters or return to Canadian ports where they can be apprehended.

As well, the amendment does not introduce new powers to be used against foreign vessels fishing outside Canada's 200-mile limit. It is intended to continue the existing capability to use disabling force when necessary against foreign vessels fishing illegally inside Canada's fishing zone.

The amendment does include the authority to create regulations establishing procedures governing the use of disabling force, and the government intends to develop these regulations so that they will be consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms — I should hope so, because they will be found unconstitutional if they are not — and with recognized and reasonable international practice in the use of disabling force at sea because there is always an important dimension to all maritime law in its international context. This will include graduated use of force to ensure that only the minimum violent level of force necessary to carry out an arrest at sea is used.

Honourable senators, this bill responds to a widely recognized need for change in the law justifying the use of deadly force against suspects fleeing arrest. It does so in a principled way, as I hope I have demonstrated, and marks a significant improvement over the anachronistic "fleeing felon" rule.

I ask honourable senators to give second reading to this bill. If such second reading is passed, I will move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for study and report.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Would the honourable senator entertain a question on a point of clarification?

Senator Frith: Certainly.

Senator Kinsella: At what level was the tribunal that found the present section unconstitutional?

Senator Frith: I do not know if it is a court of appeal. My notes simply say that it is an Ontario court. I could probably find the answer for you in a few minutes. If I cannot get that information for you momentarily, I will see that it is available at the committee stage.

•(1530)

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, although I will not be able to give you the complete citation, I will be able to give you the name of the judge, and tell you a few things about the case which the honourable senator did not discuss.

At the outset, I agree with Senator Frith that this law has to be changed. There is no question about that. All governments across Canada have been taking a lot of interest in this particular legislation. It goes back to either 1969 or 1979. When Mrs. Campbell was Minister of Justice in 1991, she wrote a paper in respect to it. There is no question that there is a need for change.

Senator Frith has given you the "whys" or the "whats." He told about the coastal fisheries. He also said that he has learned, as have I, that although this is a very short bill, it is not really a simple bill. I will repeat some of the things Senator Frith said, and I will say some things he did not say.

This bill is entitled "An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act (force)." It proposes to amend subsections 25(3) and 25(4), and to add a new subsection 25(5) to the Criminal Code. It will also amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act by adding a new section 8.1.

The amendments to subsection 25(3) of the Criminal Code merely change the use of the masculine "he," "himself" and "his" to the word "person." That is not much of a change, but I would point out a part of that subsection to which I will refer later when talking about subsection 25(4).

That subsection presently reads as follows:

> (3) Subject to subsection (4), a person is not justified for the purposes of subsection (1) in using force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm unless he believes on reasonable grounds that it is necessary...

And these are the words I want you to remember, if you will.

> ...for the purpose of preserving himself or any one under his protection from death or grievous bodily harm.

That is how it presently reads. The proposed change merely changes the masculine words to "person." I will just read it.

> (3) Subject to subsections (4) and (5), a person is not justified for the purposes of subsection (1) in using force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm unless the person believes on reasonable grounds that it is necessary for the self-preservation of the person or the preservation of any one under that person's protection from death or grievous bodily harm.

The amendment to subsection 25(4) is substantive since it limits the degree of force that peace officers are justified in using when apprehending a fleeing suspect. The section presently reads as follows:

(4) A peace officer who is proceeding lawfully to arrest, with or without warrant, any person for an offence for which that person may be arrested without warrant, and every one lawfully assisting the peace officer, is justified, if the person to be arrested takes flight to avoid arrest, in using as much force as is necessary to prevent the escape by flight, unless the escape can be prevented by reasonable means in a less violent manner.

That section, as Senator Frith said, is known as the "fleeing felon" rule. Mr. Justice Hawkins of the Ontario Court of Justice, General Division, in 1993 said the following about that rule.

> The "fleeing felon" rule developed at a time when most felonies were punishable by death. If a felon could be executed on conviction, it was apparently felt that the death of a fleeing felon was not terribly disproportionate. To those who protested that this amounted to 'execution before trial', the answer could well be made that the fleeing suspect could not have been terribly interested in a trial or he wouldn't have fled in the first place.

The judge went on to say:

> In any case, this rationale for the rule no longer exists in civilized societies where few or no crimes are punishable by death.

A section such as this that allows peace officers and others assisting them to use force against persons fleeing arrest that may cause death or grievous bodily harm to such persons must be couched in such language that protects the peace officers and those assisting them, the public at large, and the recipient of the force used. It has been the view of many that the present section is far too broad and gives the peace officer and his assistant too much discretion as to when such force could be used.

As Senator Frith said, in 1989 it was reported by the Ontario Race Relations and Policy Task Force that the police themselves are uncomfortable with the broad discretion provided by the subsection. There have also been complaints about the subsection from, among others, the Uniform Law Conference and the Law Reform Commission of Canada.

In 1993, the Attorney General of Ontario challenged the constitutionality of the subsection in the case of R. v. Lines, which was the case heard by Mr. Justice Hawkins to which I referred earlier. The court held that the section was unconstitutional in that it offended section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms: the right to life, liberty and security of the person, and could not be upheld under section 1 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, for example, limits demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. The court said that there must be some proportionality between the threat of the harm posed by the fleeing person and the degree of force that is permitted by law to be used against such person.

The amendment to subsection 25(4) makes it incumbent on the peace officer or the person assisting him, before he uses such force — and these are words similar to the previous subsection 3 which I pointed out earlier — to believe on reasonable grounds that the force used is necessary for the purpose of protecting himself or the person assisting him, or any other person, from imminent or future death or grievous bodily harm. As I say, this is similar to subsection 3 but extends it to protecting persons assisting and any other person from imminent or future death or grievous bodily harm.

The amended subsection 25(4) is broken down into five paragraphs. It actually reads similar to the previous section with the exception of paragraph (d). That paragraph reads:

> (4) A peace officer, and every person lawfully assisting the peace officer, is justified in using force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm to a person to be arrested, if
> (d) the peace officer or other person using the force believes on reasonable grounds that the force is necessary for the purpose of protecting the peace officer, the person lawfully assisting the peace officer or any other person from imminent or future death or grievous bodily harm;

Although I am in favour of the suggested amendments to subsection 25(4), I think there should be some consistency in the drafting following the words "believes on reasonable grounds" in both subsection (3) and subsection (4) of section 25. I hope that this will be dealt with at the committee level.

Subsection 25(5) is a new subsection which deals with inmates fleeing from a penitentiary. It gives peace officers much more flexibility in using force which could cause death or grievous bodily harm. The new subsection will read as follows:

> (5) A peace officer is justified in using force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm against an inmate who is escaping from a penitentiary within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, if
> (a) the peace officer believes on reasonable grounds that any of the inmates —

Not the inmate escaping, but any inmate in that prison. If he thinks there is anyone in there that poses a threat of death or grievous bodily harm to the peace officer or any other person, then he can use that force.

•(1550)

This is an exception to the provision in subsections 25(3) and (4) and was accepted by most jurisdictions, but not all. As this refers only to penitentiaries, Nova Scotia did not think it was wide enough to cover provincial prisons, and that it should. Alberta, on the other hand, thought that it should not be an exception to 25(4); that 25(4) was also sufficient for penitentiary people and that it should not be amended in this manner. The Northwest Territories thought that, in a penitentiary, such force should not be used if the peace officer knows that it is unlikely that the escaper will cause serious harm to others.

There is no doubt that, generally, the amendments were accepted by police officers, chiefs, and police officers' associations, with the exception of those in Quebec. Quebec was most interested in giving the police more flexibility and did not wish to limit their rights. I am for it, but I think that there should be some amendments.

I now wish to deal with the amendments to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. It is an additional section which explicitly provides for the use of force to disable a foreign fishing vessel whose master is trying it avoid arrest.

In committee I will raise some of the problems I have with how the proposed new section is worded. The bill states:

> 8.1(1) A protection officer is justified in using, in accordance with the procedures established...

Perhaps in committee we could discuss this section. This is international law we are talking about, and if there are such things then, although it may be clear to me, it is pretty wide:

> ...procedures established and to the extent permitted by the regulations...

I might point out that the regulations have not yet been promulgated:

> ...force that is intended or is likely to disable a foreign fishing vessel, if
> (a) the protection office is proceeding lawfully to arrest the master or other person in command of the vessel;
> (b) that master or other person takes flight to avoid arrest; and
> (c) the protection officer believes on reasonable grounds that the force is necessary for the purpose of arresting that master or other person.
> (2) The Governor in Council may make regulations establishing the procedure in accordance with which, and the extent to which, a protection officer is permitted to use force referred to in subsection (1).

I have read that this new section now brings the law in Canada into line with that of other countries. I would say before we pass it, however, we certainly should inquire and satisfy ourselves as to the procedures established, and we should also see the proposed regulations.

Other than those comments, I would support the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Jessiman for a very thorough and erudite intervention, and I agree with him that the committee is the place in which to pursue some of the avenues that he wishes to pursue, and to follow up some of the questions that he has raised.

I did not completely follow his point on the drafting discrepancy between subsections (3) and (4). However, I will be attending the committee hearings and I will learn there, I am sure.

The honourable senator is correct, as far as I know, that the last section dealing with the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act does bring this law into line with general international standards on the same subject, and in that sense we are dealing with international law. However, as far as this bill is concerned, we are dealing with domestic law, but domestic law, as he has pointed out, that apparently is brought into line with domestic law in other jurisdictions.

Senator Kinsella asked about R. v. Lines. The senator also added some interesting and useful information on that case. He did mention that it was the General Division of the Ontario Court that made the decision. Perhaps I can put on the record a couple of lines here.

As has been pointed out, the judge made the finding of unconstitutional violation of a suspect's section 7 Charter right to life and security of the person. As we both mentioned, he found that it was "overbroad and entirely lacks proportionality." What I did not know until I consulted notes given to me by the Department of Justice is that:

> He suspended operation of his declaration for six months until October 26, 1993 — the day after the general election.
> The case was unusual in the sense that it was the Attorney General of Ontario who challenged the constitutionality of a Criminal Code provision. Mr. Lines was acquitted and the Crown has appealed to the Ontario Court of Appeal. It is unlikely that the issue of the constitutionality of subsection 25(4) will be dealt with in the Court of Appeal.

That is the end of the quote from the notes that I received. The explanation is obvious: That if this bill is passed, it will be a purely academic question as to whether or not the previous section was constitutional — academic, in the sense that it will be a matter of whether the Court of Appeal approves what the trial court said, but will have no effect on the persons involved because it is quite possible that a new law will be in effect at that time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Frith, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

EXCISE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault moved the second reading of Bill C-13, An Act to amend the Excise Tax and a related Act.

He said: I have to admit that I am not totally comfortable with the idea of moving amendments relating to the Goods and Services Tax. I would have liked to have been able, on rising in this chamber to speak about the GST, to speak in support of a bill abolishing it. That time will come soon.

[English]

The amendments contained in this bill are minor in nature, but are proposed in order to facilitate some of the problems discovered in the administration of the act since its passage. I hope that the next time we deal with the GST it will be to abolish it. After that is done, it is likely that the eight senators who were appointed to assist in passing it will see the light and resign their seats.

The amendments contained in this bill will facilitate GST compliance for businesses and other organizations in their day-to-day dealings with the tax. However, we recognize that changes of a more fundamental nature are needed. Indeed, the government has promised to replace the GST by 1996, with a tax system simpler for businesses and fairer for consumers.

The honourable member who introduced this bill for second reading in the House of Commons noted that the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance is looking at options for sales tax reform. The committee will have a crucial role to play in shaping the consensus that is needed to make the sales tax system fairer and simpler. Its recommendations will help to set the agenda for consultations with the provinces on ways to achieve greater sales tax coordination.

However, it will take time to build a broad public and intergovernmental consensus on sales tax reform. It is therefore necessary to take steps to make the GST easier to comply with in the interim, which is the purpose of Bill C-13.

In several areas, the GST legislation needs to be brought into line with what is practical on an administrative level, both for Revenue Canada and for GST registrants. Bill C-13 contains measures that have been developed and refined in consultation with representatives from the business community and from other sectors affected by the changes.

This bill contains provision that will ease the administrative burden on seasonal and part-time businesses.

Bill C-13 is beneficial for charities as well. In fact, it will allow some of the smaller charities to be excluded from the GST rules altogether. For charities that do remain in the system, there are measures that will make the rules easier to follow.

This bill will also clarify and broaden the scope of special treatment in the agricultural sector and in certain exempt centres. I noted in reading the bill — and I could not help but grin while doing so — that one section being amended will remove the GST from the sale of rabbits. I suppose the people who drafted the GST legislation back in 1989 and 1990 were thinking of the Bennett days when rabbit was important as food in this country.

I would now like to take a few moments to elaborate on some of the specific measures in this bill. I would like to begin with the changes that are being proposed for the business community, especially small businesses, for it is in this sector that the need for change is particularly critical.

First, this bill contains provisions related to a simplified method for registrants to claim input tax credits, that is, to recover the GST they pay on their business expenses. This simplified method will be available to businesses with annual taxable sales of $500,000 or less.

Businesses that use this method will no longer need to calculate input tax credits by identifying the amount of tax payable on each and every purchase they make. Instead, they will simply multiply the total amount of their GST-taxable purchases, including any provincial sales tax and gratuities, by a factor of 7/107ths. Effectively, this special approach will allow them to calculate input tax credits by using the same information they need for income tax purposes.

The bill also provides for temporary cessation of filing for businesses that have virtually no sales during a filing period, that is, for seasonal businesses. This will be advantageous to seasonal and part-time businesses, for they will no longer need to take the time and trouble to file GST returns during the off-season. This measure will also save time for non-resident companies that conduct business in Canada only on a sporadic basis. Taken together, these small business measures will make the current sales tax system easier to comply with for many registrants across Canada.

Other sectors in society have special needs and practices to which the tax system must adapt. Bill C-13 contains provisions that respond to the concerns of the health, charitable and non-profit sectors. For example, this legislation will guarantee the tax-free status of adapting privately owned vehicles to the needs of individuals who use wheelchairs. Another measure will broaden the GST exemption for homemaker services that are rendered to people who require special assistance due to age, infirmity or disability.

In its current form, the GST legislation provides that homemaker services are exempt when they are subsidized by a government or a municipality. However, an individual would pay tax on any additional, unsubsidized hours of homemaker services he or she might require. This bill will extend the GST exemption to cover these additional services received by the individual.

Honourable senators, Bill C-13 contains several measures that respond to the practical needs of charities. For example, this bill will enable charities to eliminate a step in the process of calculating input tax credits on meal and entertainment expenses that they incur in the course of their taxable activities. Specifically, they will no longer be subjected to the 50-per-cent limit that applies to other persons claiming input tax credits in respect of meals and entertainment. This limit creates confusion and complexity for charities. It parallels an income tax rule with which charities do not otherwise need to comply, or even be aware of, since charities are not taxable for income tax purposes.

The GST fails to recognize another reality of life for charities. The existing rules allow input tax credits on reimbursements and allowances paid to employees or partners for expenses incurred in the course of the employer's or partnership's business. This is fine for businesses that operate with the services of partners and paid employees, but it does nothing for charities which must rely on volunteers.

Bill C-13 will fix this by entitling charities to input tax credits for allowances and reimbursements they pay, in the course of their commercial activities, to volunteers who have borne taxable expenses on the charity's behalf. Similarly, where they pay volunteer reimbursements in the course of their exempt activities, the partial GST rebates to which they are entitled in respect of their purchases would also be available in respect to these reimbursements. In this way, the charity would be able to recover the cost of the tax portion of such expenses to the same extent it would if it were to incur the cost directly rather than through a volunteer.

Honourable senators, I should now like to talk about how this bill proposes to change the criteria by which charities determine whether or not they must register for GST purposes. For charities and commercial businesses alike, this determination is made on the basis of annual taxable sales. Specifically, charities whose taxable sales are at least $30,000 are required to register.

Very often, however, charities are largely involved in GST-exempt activities, and this source of revenue is irrelevant for purposes of the $30,000 threshold. Therefore, to the extent that a charity has a mixture of taxable and exempt activities, it must make a separate reckoning of its taxable sales — just to determine whether it needs to register for GST. What a headache! This extra step is made more difficult by the fact that the charity is often unsure of which supplies are taxable and which are not.

Bill C-13 proposes a gross revenue test which will make it simpler for charities to determine whether or not they must register. Specifically, a charity choosing to use this test will not be required to register if its gross revenue, that is, revenue from all sources, was $175,000 or less in either of its two previous fiscal years. This would apply regardless of the amount of the charity's total taxable sales. The calculation of gross revenue should not pose a problem for charities since they are already required to record this amount for reporting purposes under the Income Tax Act.

In the agricultural sector, Bill C-13 guarantees the tax-free treatment of rabbits produced for food. This amendment will put these producers on the same footing as other primary producers who supply food products.

Finally, honourable senators, this bill contains an important clarifying amendment to ensure that financial institutions and other suppliers of exempt services receive the appropriate amount of input tax credits on their business purchases. Under the GST, as with value-added tax systems in other countries, suppliers are able to recover tax under business inputs only to the extent that the inputs are related to taxable sales made in the course of their business. In other words, exempt suppliers are treated like final consumers, and are not able to recover the tax they pay on inputs they acquire for the purpose of providing exempt services.

Where a business provides a mix of taxable and exempt goods and services, it is inevitable that some of its business inputs, such as indirect overhead expenses, will relate to both its taxable and exempt activities. These inputs must be apportioned in order to determine the proper amount of input tax credit that the business may claim.

This key principle was well understood at the outset, particularly by those in the financial services, which is comprised of some of the largest and most sophisticated exempt suppliers. In spite of this, however, a number of financial institutions sought to take advantage of what they perceived to be an ambiguity in the wording of the legislation and filed claim for input tax credits that were clearly excessive. Such claims were blatantly contrary to the policy intent underlying the input tax credit rules.

Many others, including others in the financial sector, refused to adopt this aggressive interpretation, knowing full well the government's policy intentions. Rather, they called for quick, decisive action to put an end to any uncertainty, and to put an end to attempts to circumvent this policy. In response, this bill contains a provision that reinforces the requirement to apportion indirect inputs between taxable and exempt activities, applicable as of the date that the GST was introduced.

Honourable senators, in conclusion I should like to say that reading these amendments was as hard for me to take as the tax itself when it came before this Senate three or four years ago. Honourable senators, after the debate is completed and the bill given second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Terry Stratton: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak at second reading debate on Bill C-13, to amend the Excise Tax and a related Act. The proposed amendments deal with the goods and services tax. This bill provides some fine tuning to the GST legislation. Bill C-13 will affect small and seasonal businesses, charities, health care services, agriculture, financial institutions, and also sets the requirement for payments and remittances of $50,000.

If I were a senator opposite, I too would feel uncomfortable with the passing of this legislation. I cannot help but feel a certain degree of sympathy for you, but I find it rather strange that the Liberal government is spending time fine-tuning this legislation when they have told Canadians that they fully intend to implement a different sales tax system in the future.

Why is this government taking so long to take action on this issue? What exactly will the new tax be, and when will Canadians be informed about the tax? Enough is enough, honourable senators. It is time to tell everyone.

I understand that the House of Commons Finance Committee has begun to explore alternatives to the GST and intends to report back to the House of Commons in June. I hope that this report will shed some light on what exactly the government intends to do. When will this government show some initiative by bringing forth a new, original piece of legislation?

Honourable senators, the GST replaced the former hidden sales tax in 1991. The GST was a major change in the way that sales taxes are collected. The Progressive Conservative government consulted widely with business, farmers, charities and others on ways to improve the GST. These talks led to several proposed changes.

The measures in this bill were announced before the election. Many are already in effect, and are given approval retroactively by this bill. Bill C-13 will exempt small and seasonal businesses from filing GST returns during periods when they have virtually no sales. It will make it easier for those registering for the first time to use the annual filing option. Disabled Canadians will benefit through improved treatment for homemaker services, motor vehicle conversions, health care expenses and drugs covered by a provincial health care plan.

The bill clarifies rules for financial institutions. It will simplify GST rules for small charities. Many may be excluded from the GST rules while continuing to receive partial rebates for the tax. The treatment of meal and entertainment expenses will also be made simpler.

Here we go again with the rabbits, because someone has to have concern for those poor little guys; they are getting it from pillar to post, and why that has not been dealt with earlier is a mystery. In any event, Bill C-13 will require payments of more than $50,000 to be paid to a financial institution, and will correct errors in the French text of the various acts.

This bill does a great deal to fine-tune the GST. Keeping in mind that this bill was the product of work done by a previous government, a Progressive Conservative government, I now want to comment on exactly what the Liberal government has been doing to date.

Much of what we have seen from this government is simply carrying forward the Progressive Conservative agenda. Sometimes, as in the case of the NAFTA legislation, they have simply seen the light and abandoned their campaign promises. In the Throne Speech, four out of every five measures were taken from our agenda. Sometimes they borrowed from our agenda outright; for others they just changed the wrapping. A handful of examples include lobbyist legislation, parliamentary reform, the information highway, training for small business managers, cutting interprovincial trade barriers, expanding Pacific Rim trade, literacy, environmental assessment, self-government, and reducing duplication and overlap. In the case of new legislation, most of the bills we have seen so far have had their origins in the Progressive Conservative government.

Some of this bill reflects decisions that the previous government took for which legislation had not been introduced. These include the reorganization of Revenue Canada, Bill C-2; the NAFTA side agreement from last September, Bill C-4; the protection of coastal fisheries, Bill C-8; the April 1993 budget measures, Bill C-9; the reorganization of the income tax statute, Bill C-15; an Indian land claims settlement, Bill C-16; and tax treaties, Bill S-2.

Others of these bills are direct copies of our legislation. They include Bill C-6, which is our former Bill C-135 dealing with the power of the government to make regulations for offshore; Bill C-7, which is our former Bill C-85, dealing with designer drugs; and Bill C-9, the former C-136, dealing with income tax changes in the December 1992 economic statement and the April 1993 budget.

It is flattering that the Liberal government is sticking so much to the Progressive Conservative agenda. What happened to their little Red Book? The GST was a major change in the way sales taxes are collected. It was a change for the better, because we no longer have an insidious, hidden, job-stealing federal sales tax in Canada. Or do the Liberals intend, once again, to hide this tax from Canadians? The GST is a much fairer tax for Canadians and Bill C-13 fine-tunes the GST legislation.

I urge all senators to support this legislation, as I intend to do.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to advise you that if the Honourable Senator Thériault speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I rise briefly, although I hate to get involved in political discussions. I do want to say to my honourable friend that I have taken note of what he had to say.

It is interesting. I am especially proud that there is one Conservative left who is still ready to defend the GST, realizing that this was probably the one main cause of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada now standing at two MPs in the House of Commons. I would have thought that all of them would have learned their lesson.

An Hon. Senator: Has it been abolished yet?

Senator Thériault: As the senator has said, this legislation actually comes from ways-and-means motions that were passed by the previous government going back to December 10, 1992, March 30, 1993, and April 30, 1993. This is all work which should have been done when your government was in power, and you are blaming us now. What can we do? We are stuck with it. We have to do it. We do not like dealing with the GST, I assure you. However, we have to do it. I for one, and I am sure the Government of Canada as a whole, would like to be able to wipe that slate clean from the last ten years, including the $600-billion debt and the $46-billion deficit.

Honourable senators, I move second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Thériault, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Phillips, calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 22, 1994.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, in the prebudget publicity, the CBC carried a picture of the Prime Minister presenting a pair of boots, instead of the usual shoes, to the Minister of Finance.

I have a particular request to make to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is unfortunately absent at this time. I am sure that the deputy will pass it on to her. That is, next year, would she please substitute for the Prime Minister and present a soft pair of slippers, because, as Elsie Wayne has said, Atlantic Canada cannot take the kicking it took in the last budget.

The Minister of Finance began his statement by saying, in a very bombastic way, that it was time for deep cuts, that trimming would not do. I thought he was going to follow the old adage of cutting the suit to fit the cloth.

Honourable senators, he presented a budget which ended up with greater expenditures, three per cent greater expenditures. In other words, he ended up with more cloth than he began with. I do not think much of him as a Minister of Finance, but one has to have respect for him as a tailor. He had more cloth left over than he began with. In fact, I would say that he is a good enough tailor to make suits for Preston Manning.

As one of my colleagues said, he could have enough cloth left over to make a matching tie.

Much has been said about the Infrastructure Program. In fact, we had reference to it in Question Period today. We were going to kick-start the economy through the Infrastructure Program.

Honourable senators, let us have a brief look at what the budget took out of the economy: First of all, it took $300 million from our senior citizens by removing the $1,000 tax exemption; then it raised the unemployment insurance premiums, and I will have more to say about that later. However, it is really surprising to me that the Liberals, in their first budget, would target the senior citizens and the unemployed. Then $7.4 billion is taken out of personal income tax, and $1.5 billion from corporate tax.

•(1620)

There appears to be something inherent in the Liberal philosophy that we must have high interest rates. Let me point out, honourable senators, that each time the interest rates go up one per cent, it costs the taxpayers of Canada $1 billion in interest payments on the debt. This does not take into account what it costs the provinces or the small business firms, nor does it take into account what it costs the ordinary Canadian for extra mortgage payments and extra payments for consumer goods such as cars and furniture. It is also an extra burden on small business firms. Remember, honourable senators opposite, that you vowed to assist small business.

The budget was not favourably received by the markets, particularly by foreign investors. For the first time since 1976, Japan has sold more bonds than they bought. Last week, the German bond dealers were recommending to Germans who held Canadian bonds that they get rid of them; that they sell them, because our debt was too high.

The Minister of Finance, prior to the budget, produced a set of figures showing an increase in the projected deficit for 1993-94. The editorial comment is worthwhile noting. The Globe and Mail said Mr. Martin fibbed. The Ottawa Sun was much more direct, and said, "Mr. Martin lied to you, buddy." I wouldn't say Mr. Martin deliberately lied, but I will say that he showed a remarkable ability to hide the truth.

The Ottawa Citizen stated that the budget bombed Ottawa. Certainly it hit Ottawa hard, but it was even more drastic as far as Atlantic Canada is concerned. In fact, it torpedoed Atlantic Canada. We had the closure of military bases, Shearwater, Chatham, Cornwallis, and I will not go into that at this time because I am sure there are others who will have more to say on that subject.

However, I do want to refer to ACOA, the Atlantic Canada Opportunity Agency, which was developed by the Mulroney government. In fact, Senator Murray was its first minister. Honourable senators, this has been a most successful program. It has supported 10,000 businesses. It has granted more than $800 million in assistance and created projects totalling $2.4 billion since its inception. Despite the Red Book's emphasis on assisting small business, ACOA faces a cut this year and an even greater cut next year.

The Minister of Finance reminds me of a pilot in pre-World War II days who asked for permission to fly the Atlantic. He was refused. He filed a flight plan showing that he was going to San Francisco. Instead of that, he flew across the Atlantic. His excuse was that he had set the compass the wrong way. That is the way this budget is: The minister does not know how to set the compass. As far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, he has become another Wrong-way Corrigan.

Plans are under way and are often referred to in the media as the government's plan to remove $5.5 billion from our social security system in the next two years. Honourable senators, this should ring alarm bells in many parts of Canada, but especially in Atlantic Canada. The first assault has been launched on the unemployment insurance system. Admittedly there are those who say there are many people depending on unemployment insurance. However, honourable senators, when you have an unemployment rate of 18 per cent, as Newfoundland has, and Prince Edward Island with 17 per cent, what else do the people have to depend on?

The Liberal government raised the employee and employer contributions in January, 1994, and the budget says they will remove them in May, 1995. They say that this removal in May, 1995 will create 40,000 jobs. Honourable senators, the converse must also apply. By keeping this increased premium in place for a year and a half, it has cost 60,000 jobs. I think this demonstrates the sincerity of this government in creating jobs, and I very much regret that they have proceeded in the way they have.

Despite the increase in premiums, the unemployed will be required to work longer to qualify. They will receive lower benefits, and they will receive fewer weeks of benefits. In the case of P.E.I., it now requires 12 weeks to qualify. Benefits are reduced from 58 to 55 per cent. All of these reductions were introduced despite the fact that the budget forecast an unemployment rate of 11 per cent. Honourable senators opposite will remember their criticism of the 11-per-cent rate under the previous government.

I should like to put on the record exactly what the reduction in unemployment insurance benefits means. Prince Edward Island will lose $50 million a year, Atlantic Canada $630 million, Quebec $735 million, Ontario $560 million, and Western Canada $430 million, for a total of $2.4 billion.

Honourable senators, the government can talk about transferring funds from one section to another, but it has been most unfair in the transferring of funds from the unemployed. I am concerned particularly about Prince Edward Island. The Mulroney government initiated a number of projects which over the next year or two will come to full fruition. These include the fixed link; potato storage sheds in Summerside, P.E.I.; an expansion of the CP Hotel in Charlottetown — an expansion with ACOA assistance — and the possible expansion of the Loyalist Inn. New companies are moving to the aerospace centre in Summerside — again with ACOA assistance; and there is an expansion of the Summerside tax centre and the Eptek National Exhibition Centre in Summerside.

Therefore, I would expect the unemployment rate in P.E.I. to fall, probably to 11 or 12 per cent. This will then require Prince Edward Islanders to have 14 weeks to qualify for benefits of 23 weeks. Admittedly, with these various projects that I have outlined, skilled tradesmen will not be as hard hit as the labourers and those in the fishing industry.

Honourable senators are aware of the difficulties in the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada. Many people in Prince Edward Island, particularly the wives in poor families, depend upon employment in the lobster fishery, packing plants, and other associated operations in fisheries. The lobster season is divided into two seasons, the spring and fall. Most of the packing is done in the early weeks of the season. As the catch drops off, so does the packing. These people may get six weeks in the spring season and, if they are lucky, they will get four weeks in the fall season. That makes 12 or 14 weeks impossible for that group. It also makes 12 or 14 weeks impossible for the so-called second men on the lobster boats. That is, the one or two people whom the boat owner employs to assist him. These people depend upon unemployment insurance.

Those employed in the tourist industry face the same difficulty, because the tourist industry really does not begin until the school summer holidays begin. Everything is concentrated in July and August. Therefore, these people do not have the opportunity to obtain 12 or 14 stamps.

The interesting thing is that if they do not acquire the required number of stamps, they are dropped from statistics. I suspect, quite rightly I think, that the Liberal government wants these people off the statistics so that they can report that their programs are working; that the unemployment insurance rate is dropping.

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret very much having to interrupt the honourable gentleman. His time has expired. Perhaps with leave he might be given a chance to arrive at a conclusion. Is leave given, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I was watching the clock. I came in here determined that this was one time I would not exceed the time limit. I thought I still had five minutes left.

Senator Olson: Take a couple, anyway.

Senator Phillips: Senator Olson, may I take a preamble and then a couple of minutes? Following the example of your preambles, I should have sufficient time.

I want to draw to your attention, honourable senators, the impact of unemployment insurance on a small town or fishing village. I do not think most honourable senators realize the situation. I should like to refer to a fishing village at Tignish in the western part of Prince Edward Island. There the fishermen have an active cooperative movement. They have a lobster packing plant. When cod fishing was available, they produced cod, candled it and packed it in wooden boxes and shipped it to the U.S. at a premium price.

Of course, the cod is no longer available. Fishermen's income has gone down. Employees will no longer qualify for unemployment insurance and the second men on the boat, the helpers, will not qualify for unemployment insurance. It affects the whole community, not only the individual working in the plant. It affects the cooperative store, because the people do not have the money to spend in the store. It affects the service stations and the rest of the service industry.

I should like to refer briefly to the fact that these people will have no other alternative but to turn to welfare. As honourable senators are well aware, the Atlantic provinces do not have a very large tax base. The Minister of Finance has already warned us that next year's budget will include cut-backs to the transfer payments. Therefore, it will be difficult for the provinces to carry out their responsibilities under the Canada Assistance Plan. I would urge all honourable senators to give this matter serious consideration. Could it not be delayed until the economy, especially the economy in the Atlantic provinces, has improved? I ask all honourable senators to consider this.

I am greatly disappointed that the Prince Edward Island Liberal members in the House of Commons, in fact the Liberal members from Atlantic Canada in general, have been awfully silent in this regard. Their silence is like the approaching darkness. Their silence gets greater as it continues.

I again ask you to consider the damage this measure is doing to Atlantic Canada. As I have said, it is unfortunate that people in Atlantic Canada have come to depend on this program, but the pattern has evolved over the last 20 years and more, and there is no substitute for it. I hope you will consider my request that this matter receive very serious consideration in the Senate and in committee.

There are other things I wanted to speak about, but I appreciate your courtesy and kindness in extending my time. I will have an opportunity to deal with retraining and other matters at a later date.

I do believe that I am within my 15-minute limit. Someone read the clock differently than I.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, this is the first opportunity I have had to congratulate Senator LeBlanc on becoming the presiding officer of the Senate. Senator LeBlanc is a distinguished New Brunswicker and a distinguished Acadian. His selection as the presiding officer is just recognition of the outstanding contribution that he has made during a lifetime of service to his profession, to Canada, to New Brunswick and to the Acadian people. As a neighbour in Beausejour, I want to congratulate him and assure him of my full cooperation in carrying out his responsibilities.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, two weeks ago, with the release of the labour force data for March, the harsh reality of what is happening in Atlantic Canada became apparent. The adjusted unemployment figures were devastating: in the province of New Brunswick, 13.3 per cent unemployed; in Nova Scotia, 15.1 per cent unemployed; in Newfoundland, 19.9 per cent unemployed; and in P.E.I., 23.6 per cent unemployed.

Honourable senators, Atlantic Canada has a level of unemployment that is 21 per cent higher than that of the rest of the country. One hundred and fifty-four thousand Atlantic Canadians are out of work.

This budget was tabled during a period of deep concern about the future of the Atlantic region. Across Canada, the difficulties posed by the economy are real. One point four million Canadians are out of work. But in no other region are the economic challenges more acute and the need for special help greater. In addition to a level of unemployment that is 21 per cent higher than the rest of Canada, Atlantic Canada is experiencing a level of income that is 30 per cent lower than the Canadian average, a declining share of Canadian exports and a trade deficit with the rest of Canada which stands at $5.6 billion a year.

I have to say that it was with a sense of profound disappointment that I listened to Mr. Martin deliver the Liberal government's first budget on February 22. The people of Atlantic Canada expected a budget crafted in the spirit of the Red Book, with fair policies that create jobs and bring back strong economic growth.

What did Atlantic Canada get? Did we get a budget which promotes regional economic development as an essential and integral part of overall national economic strategy? Are there measures in this budget targeted to those economic activities which will bring the best possible pay-off to the economy of Atlantic Canada? Honourable senators, the sad reality is that the 1994 budget hits Atlantic Canada harder than any other region. Rather than providing measures that respond to our urgent problems, this budget will only make matters worse. Nowhere in this budget is there any hope for the 154,000 Atlantic Canadians who are jobless. In fact, measures in this budget will add more Atlantic Canadians to the ranks of the unemployed.

My honourable friend Senator Phillips has mentioned some of the closures of defence bases. The impact on employment of Atlantic defence infrastructure cuts is brutal. There is no other word for it. It is a brutal slap to Atlantic Canada.

The federal government is closing CFB Cornwallis, which will result in the loss of 610 jobs; it is closing Mill Cove, with a loss of 250 jobs; it is closing Shelburne, with a loss of 180 jobs; it is closing Chatham, with a loss of 860 jobs. The closing and restructuring of Moncton will result in a loss of 460 jobs. The federal government is cutting back CFB Gander, which will result in a loss of 530 jobs, and cutting back Shearwater with a loss of another 800 jobs. If that is not a slap at the most devastated economy in our country, I do not know what is.

Honourable senators, during the election campaign the central message of the now governing party was "creating opportunity." This message was taken at face value by Canadians living in Atlantic Canada, a region where the challenges are more acute and the need for action is critical. Atlantic Canadians voted for an infrastructure program which would create thousands of jobs. Instead, we are faced with the stark reality that a major component of the nation's defence infrastructure is leaving Atlantic Canada and that we are losing thousands of permanent jobs with nothing to replace them.

The Prime Minister was burned in effigy in New Brunswick and the Minister of Transport has been confronted by large angry crowds protesting this budget's cut-backs in unemployment insurance. "The political honeymoon is over for Jean Chrétien — at least in Bathurst," blared the lead in the Telegraph Journal editorial. And little wonder. The cut-backs in unemployment insurance are devastating to places in Atlantic Canada with high unemployment and seasonal work.

Premier McKenna told reporters, "We've been hit hard and we don't want to be abandoned by the Government of Canada." The premier estimates that changes to UI would mean a loss of $200 million in income in New Brunswick and would affect more than 48,000 people.

Honourable senators, that is why I strongly supported the premier and members of the New Brunswick legislature for defending our workers on March 23. The provincial house carried a motion which reads in part:

> Be it therefore resolved that the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick register its concern with the proposed changes to the UI system announced in the Federal Budget of 1994-95; and that these changes be delayed; or that the governments of New Brunswick and Canada attempt to negotiate special measures for seasonal workers which would provide assistance for those unable to meet the new criteria for UI eligibility, and/or for those with reduced eligibility periods, and that these measures include training opportunities.

Honourable senators, one has to wonder about a Minister of Finance and a government that will simply throw to the wolves the innocent victims of these tough economic times in Atlantic Canada — tough times which have been worsened by this budget.

Historically, Atlantic Canada has had to depend on a helping hand from Ottawa to ensure that Canadians living in our region receive the full benefits of our citizenship. Cutting that dependence, while desirable and attainable, cannot be achieved overnight. And it cannot be achieved without compassion.

Honourable senators, the reality is that this budget is throwing thousands of Atlantic Canadians out of work, and at the same time it is cutting back on the safety net which is crucial for their very survival. There is only one message in this finance minister's budget, and that is simply, "Charlie Brown, you are on your own," and people down home are very worried about it. Honourable senators, it is on this basis that I believe this budget has no moral content.

Honourable senators, this is a demoralizing budget, introduced during a period when Atlantic Canada is adapting to change. More people are employed in the information and telecommunications industry than in all of the natural resource sectors combined. Atlantic Canada has small and medium-sized businesses with the technology and skilled workforces to be competitive; and, provincial governments, the universities and the private sector are cooperating on a regional level in economic development. The task facing the region is not so much to invent potential but rather to fully develop the potential that is already there. That is why the cuts to the Atlantic Canada Opportunity Agency are so very worrisome. ACOA has had remarkable success in helping to improve the economy of Atlantic Canada by encouraging investment and job creation.

Honourable senators, ACOA was the result of a different approach to regional development. It was the first time an agency had been created on the basis of an independent report written by Dr. Donald Savoie, Executive Director of the Canadian Institute for Research on Regional Development at the Université de Moncton — that itself was based on hundreds of interviews and intense input from every sector of the Atlantic economy. It was the first regional development agency to have a private sector board, heavily weighted in favour of successful entrepreneurs, and it was the first such agency to be headquartered outside of Ottawa.

ACOA is structured like the private sector business that it serves, with a president and a team of vice-presidents, who benefit from the counsel of the advisory board. Its mandate is tailor-made for Atlantic Canada and its programs have been designed in Atlantic Canada to meet the economic challenge in the region.

ACOA's efforts in strengthening economic development and entrepreneurship in Atlantic Canada have far surpassed all past attempts. From its inception to March 31, 1993, under its Action Program, 10,000 projects were approved for a total contribution of $825 million, which has generated an additional $1.6 billion for a total investment of over $2.4 billion. This has resulted in the creation of 26,000 new permanent jobs and maintained another 31,000 jobs. Over 95 per cent of ACOA-assisted projects continue to succeed, and that is the highest ratio of success that we have ever had in Atlantic Canada. Their profitability and rate of job creation are better than in the business community in general.

Honourable senators, lukewarm newspaper headlines quoting ACOA president that "ACOA will survive despite cuts" are not very reassuring to me, nor are they reassuring to other Atlantic Canadians. I urge the Minister of Finance to heed Premier McKenna's remarks of February 13, 1990:

> I am a Liberal Premier, and I will tell you now that ACOA, created by a Conservative government, is perhaps the best tool for regional development and diversification ever seen in Atlantic Canada.

Honourable senators, this budget contains other measures that clearly are not in the best interests of Atlantic Canada. Cuts in investment tax credits could result in hundreds of millions of dollars of lost investment in the region. Honourable senators, when the budget measures are taken all together — the thousands of defence infrastructure jobs lost; cuts to UI; measures to discourage investment; cuts to Atlantic Canada's flagship economic development agency — one has to conclude that the new government has broken faith with Atlantic Canadians. The new government had the basis for a budget of hope. It received an overwhelming mandate from Atlantic Canadians, winning 31 of the region's 32 seats. Atlantic Canadians believed that this government was committed to social justice, that it was committed to its election program of "Creating Opportunity."

One has to wonder why the 31 Liberal MPs from Atlantic Canada are not willing to stand up now for their constituencies. Why are the voices of MPs such as Roger Simmons, Ronald McDonald, Mary Clancy and George Rideout now silent? Lord knows, they made enough noise over the slightest cut that the previous government made. We have not heard a word from them, and the people are getting very discouraged.

This government has abandoned Atlantic Canadians. It has set them adrift to look after themselves the best way they know how. This budget is not fair to Atlantic Canadians.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, the government can use various economic policy instruments to act on its Red Book commitments, which are, in its own words, to promote growth, create jobs and reduce the deficit.

First, there is the monetary policy. When he testified before our Senate committee, the Governor of the Bank of Canada said that the bank's objective was price stability. We have always agreed with that goal and we hope that the governor will be as successful as his predecessor, even though the Minister of Finance seemed somewhat hesitant to show firmness in the face of the inflationary pressures which are bound to surface. The government will have to assume some responsibility in this respect.

As regards the trade policy, we are also pleased to see that the Minister for International Trade pursues our government's policy. The signing of NAFTA and the Uruguay Round are good things, even though NAFTA must make Senators MacEachen, Stewart, Grafstein and Stollery very unhappy, because they fought hard against it in June of last year. They even had the support of Senator Stanbury during the debate.

Another economic policy instrument, which is especially popular among Liberals and Social Democrats, is the so-called industrial strategy. This expression includes a slew of budget measures such as subsidies, or fiscal measures such as tax concessions or taxes which discriminate in favour of a given industrial group, depending on the situation at a given time, as if it were more appropriate to discriminate instead of being neutral from a tax point of view. I will come back to this later on in my speech. The measures taken by the minister regarding small businesses are not unreasonable, especially since they are in accordance with our policies of the last few years.

As for the regulatory policy, I note that, once again, the government intends to review the thousands of regulations which exist with a view to reducing their number and complexity. I am rather sceptical because those in charge of the review are precisely the ones who benefit from the regulations, in the sense that it is their job to administer them. I have told the government in the past that this exercise should be undertaken by people from outside the public service, such as a Senate committee or several such committees.

[English]

Finally, aside from social policies, such as social security measures or transfers to individuals, and legislation relative to health and education, there is still a major tool available: fiscal policy. The minister, in this case also, has taken measures similar to those taken by his predecessors: cuts in administrative spending, such as the salaries of civil servants, to the great disappointment of the public service unions that had picked a fight tainted with partisanship against us Conservatives, a few additional taxes, and finally more serious cuts in the field of defence, although these were cuts that did not diminish total spending, only the rate of growth.

In short, honourable senators, people are still wondering why we changed government, since the general direction of public policy is the same, not only in the case of monetary and commercial policy but also in terms of fiscal policy. In effect, the government has made no decisive gesture to indicate a substantial change in direction from existing policy. Consequently, the strongest reproach we could make is that the government has proved to be too timid. This has disappointed a large number of people in Canada and abroad who expected a real change, since that was what had been announced.

The government took the intellectual bait dangled by President Clinton on investment in infrastructure, incidentally a measure also proposed by President Delors of the European Economic Community. As honourable senators will know, President Delors was once a socialist minister of President Mitterand's. However, the problem with this social democratic proposal is that no one has shown that it works, in particular with governments that are in debt up to their ears. I would say more; we know that it will not work because the government is not a good investor. I will return to that point later.

Moreover, in the areas where the reorientation of governmental programs would have had a major impact on the deficit, as in the case of transfers to the provinces, to individuals and to corporations, the government has effectively more or less contented itself with creating a series of study groups, as if the problems were not at all urgent. International investors are showing their impatience in response to the timidity of the government. Who can blame them? Faced with uncertainty, they demand a higher rate.

For someone who had all the answers last fall, we cannot say that the path taken by the Minister of Finance is lucid. When economic agents bend under the weight of taxes to pay for benefits, notably for those who are not in need, and to pay for the interest on an enormous debt, it is clear that it is imperative to bring down the deficit and not to hope that prosperity will solve everything. We tried it, and it did not work.

I, therefore, enjoin the minister and the government to do their duty rapidly, but in collaboration with provincial partners. For any gesture by the Minister of Human Resources, for example, will be perceived, and correctly so, as another federal offensive aimed at dictating the course of action in matters where responsibility lies primarily with the provinces.

The Minister of Finance, who had made sensible statements during the consultation in his text on budgetary choices, and whose top civil servants prepared a diagnosis that was quite realistic on the economic challenges facing Canada, has shown himself to be indecisive with his 1994-95 budget, except in hitting the Atlantic provinces — that is, the provinces that need government's help the most. He has put off the difficult decisions for later. That is unfortunate for the credibility of the minister and the government, and for the national interest. Nor should we be surprised by the unfavourable reaction in the financial markets in Canada and abroad, in the press and in certain regions of the country, one of which is my own region where many people are at the point where they believe that the provincial government would better administer all their public funds.

[Translation]

Since my time is limited, honourable senators, I would like to take a few minutes to share my thoughts on the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean.

Why was this college established in 1952? To correct a situation in which francophones were grossly underrepresented in the middle and senior ranks of the Canadian navy and air force. Subsequently, this was extensively documented in studies by royal commissions, including the work of sociologist Pierre Laporte.

If I remember correctly, in 1952, seven per cent of the senior officers in the armed forces were francophones. In any case, the situation was common knowledge in the forties and fifties. For instance, I remember that Mr. Hees said in a speech in the House of Commons in 1952 that when he was at the Royal Military College in Kingston, 31 students out of 600 were francophones. At the request of Léon Balcer and with the approval of George Drew and Brooke Claxton, the Liberal government under Louis St. Laurent established the college in St-Jean to remedy this unacceptable situation.

In 40 years, the college was able to partially reverse the situation. It also promoted bilinguism in the Canadian Armed Forces for anglophones and francophones. It turned out a number of outstanding military officers and outstanding Canadian citizens. It developed in the forces a reflection of our Canadian linguistic duality. It also had a positive impact on the quality of our military personnel and on Canadian society. It is a powerful tool for understanding the cultural wealth and diversity of this country. It symbolizes the distinctive characteristics that set us apart from the armies of our neighbours to the south and other NATO countries.

Some people have suggested another use for this college. I think this would be a mistake. Its present focus should be maintained in the national interest, in the higher interests of Canada. Not only the interests of Quebec and francophones are at stake here. The entire country has a stake in this college.

For instance, more than one quarter of the students at St-Jean come from the maritimes. Half are Acadians, while the others are anglophones, as are the students from other Canadian provinces. We are defending an essential, national institution, and this is a federal problem that should not be passed on to the provincial authorities. Kingston cannot take up the slack, because its environment, for which I have nothing but praise, is entirely different.

I know that environment since I had the privilege of living in Kingston for a whole year in 1972-73 as a member of the National Defence College. At the time, I examined the — as yet tenuous — progress of francophones within the ranks of our armed forces, and more specifically in the air force and navy.

However, we cannot expect the RMC to change its character and carry out both its original mission and that of the college in St-Jean.

[English]

Believe me, I speak of what I know. I lived through it. As much as I am in debt to the Canadian government for having allowed me the exceptional experience of a year at the National Defence College, I am sure that Kingston would not be able to replace the immersion and cultural enrichment that St-Jean brought to young military officers of both linguistic groups.

To those who state that we can train all young officers in civilian universities, I would enjoin them to read the report of the ministerial committee on military colleges of June 1993 before making any categorical statements. Having been a member of the consultative committee on military colleges for a period of three years under the Liberal regime, I can certify that the military college as an institution is essential to the specific acculturation of our young officers. As much as RMC is necessary, so must St-Jean continue to exist. This is Canada.

We do not wish to relive the debates of the forties and the fifties, nor should we allow the disappearance of the key element that permitted the growth of equality of opportunity in the armed forces for the francophone personnel. This is why I would propose to the government that it create a committee of wise men and women to study in more depth the repercussions of the action taken at the time of the budgetary exposé. I would see as members of this committee a retired general like General Bill Turner, past commandant of the Royal Military College at Kingston; a top level provincial civil servant well versed in matters of higher learning, particularly as concerns the military such as Mr. Moirs of Halifax; a past university rector such as Ian MacDonald of Toronto; a past Minister of National Defence and veteran of World War II such as the Honourable Gilles Lamontagne; and perhaps a senator like Senator Frith, who has lived through the 20 years of linguistic debates in Canada. Finally, there are other possible wise people in Canada, for example, Kathleen Francoeur, Mr. Robert Stanfield, Ed Broadbent, Charles Taylor of McGill University, and many others.

I am not accusing the government of having taken the bureaucratic decision here, but in the interests of Canadians there is a need for a second look at the question, taking into account the additional criteria of equality of opportunity, linguistic duality and national unity. No one will reproach the Prime Minister for making this courageous gesture — a gesture of leadership — for the test here is not of rigidity but one of justice and equity.

I do not like to talk too much about those types of matters, but in this case I am very much convinced that I am right. Honourable senators, I must underline the fact that I am a convinced federalist who is now defending an institution which is a pillar of the Canadian edifice. I am a federalist in the tradition of Thomas Jefferson but not in the tradition of Alexander Hamilton. I respect that tradition but I am from the other one — that is, a federalist who is so because he believes that the citizen will have his liberty best protected in an environment where power, la puissance publique, is shared among several governments: the federal government and the provinces, who rank equally, instead of power monopolized by one.

A federalist is also a member of a minority, and he upholds that the aspects that are the most intimately linked to the Québécois' soul should be under the jurisdiction of the Legislative Assembly in Quebec: cultural affairs, education, health, welfare, municipal resources, and so on. Moreover, this is what is stated in the Constitution of 1867. But also one is a federalist because he knows that we Canadians have a common history of far more than 200 years. We have built many things together, and not only railway lines. We have so many links on so many levels — and not only on the level of economic affairs or sports — that we have a common interest in continuing to link our effort and in maintaining our traditions in a Canadian Parliament on questions of money, external affairs, international trade, transport, and so on.

Defence is the best example of this federalism. How can one expect this to be seen as legitimate without an equitable contribution from the country's francophones? It is to this permanent objective that the Collège de St-Jean is necessary, and it is for this reason that it must continue its essential mission.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE FUTURE DIRECTION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Simard:
>
> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the future direction of the Department of Veterans Affairs; and
> That the committee present its report no later than October 31, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Gigantès)

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I am in agreement with the formulation of Senator Marshall's proposal. We on this side are in agreement with it. I think it should go to committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DIEPPE RAID—MOTION TO HONOUR VETERANS BY CREATING COMMEMORATIVE DECORATION ADOPTED

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of April 19, 1994, moved:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should honour the contribution made by those who served Canada's Armed Forces during World War II at the Dieppe raid by creating a distinctive decoration for Canadian veterans of this battle.

He said: Honourable senators will be aware that on April 11, in the other place, during Private Members' Business and pursuant to Standing Order 30, a motion in the name of the member for Winnipeg—Transcona was considered as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should honour the contribution made by those who served Canada's Armed Forces during World War II at the Dieppe raid by striking a distinctive medal for Canadian veterans of this battle.

During the debate, the member for St. John's West moved that the motion be amended by deleting the words, "striking a distinctive medal," and substituting the following, "creating a distinctive decoration."

Debate arose, the question was put on the amendment and it was agreed to. Debate resumed on the main motion as amended:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should honour the contribution made by those who served Canada's Armed Forces during World War II at the Dieppe raid by creating a distinctive decoration for Canadian veterans of this battle.

By unanimous consent, the main motion as amended was designated a voteable item. The question was put on the main motion as amended, and it was agreed to.

Honourable senators, I went over these details, although it is quite boring, because I think they should be on the record. There is a lot of confusion over what really transpired and what the result of the debate was.

I might say that the debate took place over a very short period of time and there was unanimous agreement. I say that for a reason — because I might hint at it, too, after I am finished.

I am sure all senators are delighted with the result of the debate, and we should commend the member who initiated the motion and also the member who amended it. The amending motion was put by a new member, the member for St. John's West, and it is a credit to her to amend a bill which means so much to many veterans. As well, all members in the other place supported the motion. I am sure that all members in this chamber will also lend their support.

Honourable senators, it is indeed surprising that Canada has not recognized those members of the Canadian forces of the army, navy and air force who took part in the Dieppe raid over half a century ago. It is regrettable indeed that many died wondering why they were never recognized. We can only hope that the few who remain, disappointed and bitter over the complacency and lack of recognition by successive governments, will now find some solace in the reward which they will receive.

While I need not repeat the contents of the very good debate in the other place which paid tribute to the Dieppe veterans and recounted the history of the raid, I wanted to place on the record the name of a long-serving president of the Dieppe Veterans and Prisoners of War Association, Mr. George Giguère, who, for many years, led the fight not only for the medal but as well for improved benefits for his comrades. He appeared many times before the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs. Indeed, it was through the leadership of George Giguère that the city of Longueil, Quebec, in 1976 produced a Dieppe medal to recognize the valiant contributions of Dieppe veterans. Even though that medal appears to lack official sanction, it is worn proudly.

Unfortunately, George Giguère is now invalided in St. Anne's Veterans Hospital, but I am sure the award now under consideration will give him a sense of accomplishment and repayment for his long years of service to veterans. His capable successor, Mr. Ron Beal, and many veterans, including retired captain of the navy Bruce Carnell, comrades Harry Long, Jacques Nadeau, and Bruno MacDonald should appear on the records of this chamber for their persistence and drive in appealing to the government for recognition.

Honourable senators, I am sure we join with the other place in adopting my motion. That motion is:

> That in the opinion of this house, the government should honour the contribution made by those who served Canada's Armed Forces during World War II at the Dieppe raid by creating a distinctive decoration for Canadian veterans of this battle.

I hope we will get the same unanimous consent in this chamber for this worthy cause.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to amend Senator Marshall's motion. It is not enough to honour the veterans who survive. We should also honour those who died on the beaches of Dieppe. They are the ones who paid the biggest price.

The purpose of my amendment is to ensure that the decoration in question also be awarded posthumously to members of the Canadian Forces who died during the Dieppe raid, or as a consequence of their participation in the Dieppe raid.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Therefore, I request permission of the Senate to move, at this time, an amendment to Senator Marshall's motion, which will add to the end of Senator Marshall's motion the following words:

> and, posthumously, members of the Canadian Forces who died during the Dieppe raid or as a consequence of their participation in the Dieppe raid.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have no hesitation in supporting that amendment, and I commend Senator Gigantès for his thoughts.

•(1720)

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Marshall had advised my office at noon today that he would like this motion to pass today if there was agreement by the Senate. I thank him very much for that advice because it meant that I could take it to our caucus, who meet on Tuesdays at twelve o'clock.

Certainly from our side we have no objection to letting it go forward immediately. I have one disappointment, though, in that there may be other senators who would have liked to participate in the debate. Since the matter has been debated so quickly, they will be precluded from so doing.

However, this may still be the best course of action because, the House of Commons having passed their motion, the matter will now be before the Department of Veterans Affairs, and it might be well for the Senate to add its views on the matter immediately. If it is the general wish of honourable senators to proceed today, I certainly will not oppose it.

I commend Senator Marshall for having brought in the motion, and my colleague Senator Gigantès for his very worthwhile amendment. Dieppe certainly was a very sad moment in the whole Canadian war history. I have been fortunate in having been to Dieppe on several occasions. The last time would be two years ago this coming August when we were commemorating the 50th anniversary, and I was part of the official delegation. A good number of the people whom Senator Marshall referred to, Mr. Giguère, Mr. Beal, and Mr. Carnell, were members of the delegation at that time. It was a pleasure to meet them and to be with them.

Anyone who has been to Dieppe has to wonder how we ever put troops in that kind of a position. It was an absolutely impossible point to attack, in my view, with high headlands on either side and fields of fire for the defenders. That simply left our troops sitting ducks. It is a very sad story.

If the Dieppe portion is bad, the other beach at Pourville is even worse, because there the distance between the two headlands is hardly more than the length of this room. You would almost have to see it to understand the position in which our troops were placed. It is a very sad story.

Coming from the province of Manitoba, I am particularly pleased to participate in the debate and to support the motion because there was a regiment from my province, the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders. In fact, Senator Marshall referred to Harry Long, who is a member of that regiment, and who has long advocated recognition for those who went to Dieppe.

Certainly, the loss of life that day was enormous. I do not think there was ever another Canadian battle or engagement in which as many soldiers were killed in comparison to the total force. The position taken by the authorities at the time was that this was necessary to prepare for the later invasion of Normandy. I hope that that was the case, although I have personally had grave doubts about the whole matter through the years. Certainly on my first visit to Dieppe, I shook my head in disbelief. If we now give recognition to those who participated in that very gallant if unhappy event, I think we are doing the right thing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if there are no further interventions, I would put the question to the house.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the amendment of Senator Gigantès to Senator Marshall's motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: The amendment is adopted. I will now put the question on the motion of Senator Marshall, as amended. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion presented by Senator Marshall as amended by Senator Gigantès?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

GRAIN HANDLING CAPACITY OF PORTS OF VANCOUVER AND PRINCE RUPERT—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiry:

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday, April 28, 1994, I will call the attention of the Senate to the grain handling capacity of the Ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert and ask the Senate to consider establishing a parliamentary committee to ascertain the factors related to increasing the amount of grain going through the elevators at those ports on to the ships for our export customers.

I want to be very clear that I am not now asking for that committee to be set up. This is not a motion. I just want the Senate to be aware that we might be considering this matter at another time, when I will move a formal motion.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, April 27, 1994 at 1:30 p.m.

FAIRNESS AND HONESTY IN NEWSPAPER REPORTING

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I have a few remarks to make in connection with an industry of which I am a part, but they are not to do with the industry. My remarks concern fairness and honesty in reporting.

Yesterday, The Globe and Mail printed an article on page 1 saying the tax cut appears to boost smoking. Honourable senators, I am not here to defend smoking, but I am here to do what I did in the energy business when I was there and we had the explosion. I am concerned about reporting, but reporting all of the facts.
