The Globe and Mail pointed to the fact that the tobacco companies had a 60- to 65-per-cent increase in sales. I see the Leader of the Government nodding. I know she is an anti-smoker, and I still respect her in spite of that. They reported a 65-per-cent increase in consumption, and they cite a 25-per-cent increase in production. They totally ignore the fact that when the government very wisely reduced the tax differential between Canada and the United States, Canadians who, in growing numbers, had been buying tobacco products illegally through the smuggling route flocked back to buy their cigarettes or tobacco products from the corner stores, the place where they had always bought them.

The fact is that tobacco consumption, which started to decline sometime in the 1960s, continues to decline. In March of this year over March of last year, there is a 3-per-cent additional reduction in consumption. There is no indication of an increase in consumption. I have my own views about that, in terms of whether I like it or not, but the fact is that there has not been that increase.

There is nothing wrong with making a point on either side of the issue, but I do believe all of the facts should be included in the arguments that are made. My father taught me that when I was a little boy.

I just want to report to you that the facts are that there has been a 3-per-cent decline in smoking this March over March of last year. There has been a decline of more than 80 per cent in export sales and an increase of some 55 per cent in shipments to the domestic market, which is totally predictable when Canadians decide they will stop buying illegal products and instead buy legal products.

Honourable senators, I am simply questioning, as I have questioned many times before, what the role of a newspaper like The Globe and Mail really is. Is its job to report fairly, or is its job to sell newspapers? It seems to me that they are continuing a pattern which I have noticed before. They see their job as selling newspapers, so they put a scare headline in to see if that will excite people enough to buy the paper and see what is going on. However, when they see what is going on in that paper in that instance, they are not getting the facts.

INTERNATIONAL YEAR OF THE FAMILY

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I wish to draw to your attention that you should have received in your offices this week a package of materials from the Canadian Committee for the International Year of the Family.

As you may know, the General Assembly of the United Nations has declared 1994 as the International Year of the Family because issues surrounding families are of global concern. The Canadian committee, a non-profit organization governed by a voluntary board of directors, is coordinating activities in Canada. Their mandate is to sensitize and mobilize Canadians for reflection, dialogue, and action on the important role families play in society.

I urge all senators to contribute to this international year by reflecting not only on the families in their community, but on the families that they are part of. The international day will be May 15, and no doubt you will hear more about it.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN HANDLING CAPACITY OF PORTS OF VANCOUVER AND PRINCE RUPERT

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I want to endorse what Senator Olson said yesterday about the importance of the Ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert. Certainly an inquiry into the situation there is necessary. I support the direction he took in his remarks yesterday.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Hon. Eileen Rossiter Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, April 28, 1994, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries be authorized to examine and report upon the Annual Report of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, tabled in the Senate on March 23, 1993 (Sessional Paper No. 343-906) and other matters relating to the fishing industry; and
> That the committee present its final report to the Senate no later than 29th June, 1995.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we proceed to the Orders of the Day, perhaps this would be a good time to discuss the work of the Senate so far as I can see it for the next period. At the moment we have a number of bills. I believe that all of them will receive second reading before the end of this week and will be referred to committee. On that basis, the committees will have ample work to do next week.

I do not expect further legislation this week from the House of Commons, and I do not know what the situation will be next week. However, on the basis that all the bills being referred to committee, or that are in committee now, will be dealt with in the committees next week, there would be no need for the Senate chamber to sit next week.

I wish to emphasise that next week will be a committee week.

Senator Doody: You are declaring it a committee week?

Senator Frith: International committee week.

Senator Molgat: That is right. That might be a good way for us to organize our work in the future. I well remember many committee chairmen saying how great it would be to have days where they could sit full time and do a lot of work. Honourable senators, next week they will be able to do that.

My indications are that a number of committees have meetings scheduled for next week. I should like to put them on the record so that we do not end up with a situation where, 15 minutes from now, the meetings are cancelled.

The meetings presently on the books are the following: the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons for the Scrutiny of Regulations, Thursday May 5; the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Official Languages, Wednesday, May 4; the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy, May 2, 3, 4, and 5; the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy have a round table on Tuesday, May 3; the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, Thursday, May 5; the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, Tuesday, May 3 and Thursday, May 5; the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, Wednesday, May 4; the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, Wednesday, May 4; the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, Thursday, May 5; the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Tuesday, May 3 and Thursday, May 5; the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, Tuesday, May 3; and the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance as well.

There is a possibility, although nothing definite has been established, that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology will meet next week; and I believe the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology is considering sitting next Thursday.

Honourable senators, that is indeed a big agenda for the committees. If we are to operate in this way — that is, not having the Senate chamber sitting when there is no business, but to have committees sitting — and provided the committees work, we can establish a schedule that would be sensible for all senators. On that basis, honourable senators, I recommend that we not sit next week, and that we reconvene on Tuesday, May 10, 1994.

As honourable senators know, the following week the House of Commons is not sitting. Depending on the material we receive from the House of Commons in the meantime, and in keeping with what I discussed with my honourable friend opposite whereby we would try to have our breaks at the same time as the House of Commons, I would hope — but please understand me, I make no guarantees — that we could have the same break as the House of Commons. This would appear to be the sensible approach with respect to services such as the restaurant, et cetera. If the procedure I have just outlined works successfully next week and everyone is here, then perhaps we can follow that course in the future.

As far as our side of the chamber is concerned, we are treating next week as a regular week. We will have our caucus meeting, as usual, at noon on Tuesday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

CANADA OIL AND GAS OPERATIONS ACT
CANADA PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACT
NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Colin Kenny moved the second reading of Bill C-6, to amend the Canada Oil and Gas Operations Act, the Canada Petroleum Resources Act and the National Energy Board Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to present for second reading Bill C-6, to amend the Canada Oil and Gas Operations Act, the Canada Petroleum Resources Act and the National Energy Board Act.

The purpose of this bill is to give the National Energy Board the authority to regulate oil and gas activity in those frontier areas where there are no federal-provincial management agreements. These amendments present a small but important step in a process which began in 1991 with the dissolution of the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration.

Since its creation in 1981, the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration, or COGLA, administered and regulated activities on frontier lands. While COGLA served the government well, its role changed and contracted over the years. Following the conclusion of the accords with Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, regulation of the East Coast offshore was delegated to joint offshore boards. Further, it was anticipated that the federal role would continue to diminish with the signing of agreements which would transfer onshore oil and gas responsibilities to the territorial governments.

As a result, COGLA was disbanded in 1991 and its technical and regulatory responsibilities and many of its staff were assigned to the National Energy Board in Calgary. However, three years later, decision-making authority still rests with ministers in Ottawa who must approve even minor regulatory decisions. This is a time-consuming, complicated and ineffective process. It is time to act decisively to give the National Energy Board the authority to make decisions, and this is exactly what is proposed in Bill C-6.

Specifically, the National Energy Board will assume the technical regulatory functions associated with oil and gas drilling and production operations. This involves ensuring that the work is carried out in a way that maximizes resource conservation by ensuring good oil field practices, protects workers' safety, and protects our fragile northern and coastal environments.

Industry needs to have certain and clear rules by which to operate. It needs to be confident that regulation will be carried out in a highly professional and highly competent way. I think we can all agree that these qualities are nowhere better exemplified than in the National Energy Board.

Honourable senators, at this juncture I wish to bring to your attention some other elements of the bill before you. Although unrelated to regulation of petroleum activities on frontier lands, two areas of legislative amendment relating to the existing operations of the National Energy Board were identified as requiring urgent attention. Bill C-6 grants certain NEB staff inspection and enforcement powers relating to pipelines. By providing mechanisms for speedier decision-making, these amendments will help ensure the safety of the public and the protection of property and the environment. Bill C-6 also provides the NEB with flexibility to ease the regulatory burden on small pipeline companies.

In conclusion, the amendments proposed in Bill C-6 make sense, and have been three years in coming. I am sure we all recognize that the interim situation where the NEB has frontier oil and gas responsibilities but no regulatory authorities should not continue. Bill C-6 would finally give the board legal authority to do its job.

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, it is always a pleasure to have the opportunity to stand in this place and discuss well-reasoned, logical, sensible, cost-saving, Progressive Conservative legislation, as we are invited to do today.

Bill C-6, which is legislation emanating from the March 1991 announcement of the Progressive Conservative government, is good legislation and I compliment the government and Senator Kenny for their wisdom in bringing this bill forward. The bill has been fully explained in a clear and concise manner by Senator Kenny, and I compliment him again for it.

Although some would suggest that this legislation is merely housekeeping in nature, I would suggest that it is more substantive than that, and sends out a signal to the oil and gas industry that this new government is willing to work with them, is willing to move away from regulations, is willing to move away from control, and is willing to set up a background of cooperation and good work with the industry so that they can carry forward in an enlightened way.

Gone are the days, I hope, of the NEPs; gone are the days of FIRA; gone are the days of regulation. No carbon tax! Let's deal in terms of stability. Let's deal in terms of maintaining the growth and the health of a very important industry in Canada.

It is a healthy industry, honourable senators, I am pleased to report. From trips that Senator Buchanan, Senator Kenny and I have taken to Boston, San Francisco and Calgary — I got Calgary — it is interesting to note that individuals throughout North America are now looking at the oil and gas industry in a favourable manner.

It is interesting to learn at conferences that the oil and gas industry is now healthy. It is out of debt and is looking to the future and to spending money in this country. Drilling is up and everyone is looking forward to a prosperous future.

Taking into consideration the demand for gas in the United States, and taking into consideration the fact that our companies are healthy and are now operating well, what the oil and gas industry needs is stability. It needs cooperation from government, and it needs government to take a hands-off policy. It needs more legislation such as Bill C-6 before the Senate today. This legislation shows the government's commitment not to interfere, but to move the regulatory authorities out of the hands of ministers and into the hands of the people who know best how to deal with it, such as the NEB, which is highly regarded and has many talented and able people.

I compliment the government on bringing this bill forward. I am sure that all honourable senators will find it favourable and will give it their assistance and support.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kenny, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources.

CROWN LIABILITY AND PROCEEDINGS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. P. Derek Lewis moved the second reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move the second reading of Bill C-4, to amend the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act. In my comments today I will first provide honourable senators with a brief outline of the purpose of the bill and then examine some of its key provisions.

The purpose of the bill is to make certain amendments to the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act. This is legislation for which the Minister of Justice is responsible because it deals with the Crown's liability in legal proceedings that may be brought against the federal Crown.

Honourable senators will also know that these amendments have an important international dimension. They relate directly to the responsibilities of the Minister for International Trade and the work that he is doing to protect Canada's environmental and labour interests in relation to the North American Free Trade Agreement.

These proposed amendments to the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act will permit domestic enforcement by the Federal Court of Canada of determinations relating to Canada's international obligations which may be made by tri-national panels. These panels would be established under the two recently negotiated side agreements to the NAFTA, which came into force on January 1 of this year.

The amendments to this legislation are precedent-setting in Canadian law. The obligations under the side agreements are Canada's international obligations. Without these amendments to this legislation, there would be no mechanism in Canadian law that our domestic courts could use to require the government to live up to its international obligations.

Our country values and respects the rule of law, and Canada has no difficulty in making its domestic legal process available to the enforcement of international rights and obligations.

The need for Parliament to consider these amendments was created last summer, when Canada, the United States and Mexico concluded two agreements that were additional and complementary to the NAFTA. One of these agreements is the North American Agreement on Environmental Cooperation. Under this agreement, the three countries are committed to environmentally sustainable economic growth, to effective enforcement by each country of its environmental laws and regulations and to increased cooperation in the development of such laws and regulations. The other agreement is the North American Agreement on Labour Cooperation, which promotes improvement of working conditions in the North American workplace for all workers.

Under these NAFTA side agreements, the three countries are required not only to enforce effectively their labour and environmental laws, but also to correct any persistent pattern of failure to reinforce effectively those existing laws. To this end, each agreement provides for the establishment of panels to make findings of fact and determinations.

In carrying out these functions, the panel may, in its determination, require a country to adopt an action plan to correct any failures to enforce its own laws or standards. In certain cases, the panel determination may require the offending party to pay a fine.

It may be helpful, honourable senators, to have a brief, step-by-step outline of the process on which these penalties will be enforced against Canada, because Canada is not subject to certain penalties, such as trade retaliation, which can only be enforced against the United States and Mexico.

In the highly unlikely event that Canada were to fail to enforce effectively her environmental and labour laws and standards, and demonstrated a persistent pattern of failure to do so, a tri-national environmental or labour panel could require Canada to adopt action plans to correct the problems identified by the panels. Canada could also be subject to fines, which the bill calls a monetary enforcement assessment.

Under the agreements, any failure by Canada to comply with an action plan approved or established by a panel, or to pay a fine levied against Canada, could only be enforced through the filing of the panel's determination with the Federal Court of Canada. It would then become a judgment of that court and would be enforceable as such against the federal Crown.

It is in order to meet these international obligations that this bill amends the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act to permit domestic enforcement by the Federal Court of Canada of any panel determination that is addressed to the Crown in right of Canada.

The bill sets out the procedure by which a panel determination may be filed in the Federal Court. On filing, the panel determination would become an order of the Federal Court. A panel determination that is made an order of the Federal Court would be enforceable in the same manner as any other order of that court, subject to certain limitations.

I would also draw the attention of honourable senators to those provisions in the bill that promote the finality of the enforcement procedures. Under the proposed legislation, there would be no right of appeal against the panel determination or an order for decision made by the Federal Court in any enforcement activity.

The bill also contains a privative clause to exclude any domestic judicial review of the panel proceedings, panel determinations, enforcement proceedings taken in the Federal Court and orders and decisions made by the Federal Court in any enforcement proceedings. This provision is similar in some respects to one already in place concerning the NAFTA.

The procedure that I have just described applies to the federal government. An order would be enforceable by this mechanism against a provincial Crown only if the province had joined the agreement concerned and if the panel order related to an issue under provincial jurisdiction. In that case, the province would be required to amend its legislation so that the order could be filed with the appropriate provincial superior court. Such amendments would be analogous to what this bill does vis-à-vis the federal government.

At the time the side agreements were concluded, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, on behalf of the Canadian government, gave an undertaking to the United States and Mexico to seek approval from Parliament for Canadian domestic enforcement of these dispute resolution mechanisms at the earliest possible opportunity. In order to fulfil this commitment, the Minister of Justice introduced the bill in the House of Commons on January 26, which was during the second week of this Parliament.

Honourable senators, I am seeking the cooperation of this house for the passage of this bill, which will help protect Canada's international interests and aid Canada in fulfilling its international obligations. I would therefore recommend that this bill be referred to committee for study.

On motion of Senator Carney, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX AMENDMENTS REVISION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Michael Kirby moved the second reading of Bill C-15, to revise certain income tax law amendments in terms of the revised Income Tax Act and Income Tax Application Rules.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks about Bill C-15, which is essentially a housekeeping measure. It contains a new version of amendments to the Income Tax Act that were passed between November 30, 1991, and July 1, 1993. When I say that it contains a new version of amendments, I mean to say that these amendments are new in terms of phraseology only. They are not new in terms of substance.

Some honourable senators may recall that the revised Income Tax Act was passed by this house about two years ago. It has worked its way through the process and was ultimately put in place on March 1 of this year. During the period from November 1991 to July 1993, a number of amendments to the Income Tax Act were passed. These amendments were written in the form of the old Income Tax Act, not the new or revised and consolidated Income Tax Act. That had to be the case, because it was the old Income Tax Act that was in effect during the period when those amendments were passed.

Consequently, Bill C-15 takes that block of amendments from November 1991 to July 1993 and puts the whole block into the parlance which is now used in the revised Income Tax Act.

To give an illustration of the sorts of minor changes that are involved, honourable senators, the English version of the old Income Tax Act contained a substantial number of references using gender related terms. These have all been removed and replaced by non-gender related terms. The same is true not only of the words in the amendments contained in Bill C-15, but of the words in the nine schedules which are attached thereto. In the French version, for example, style and terminology have been improved and made uniform with the style and terminology now contained in the revised Income Tax Act.

Honourable senators, I hope that this bill will receive speedy passage. It does nothing in terms of changing the substance of the law. It takes existing amendments that were drafted using older terminology and transforms them, in terms of terminology, into the language that is used in the revised Income Tax Act. That act went into effect on March 1 of this year. There are no substantive policy changes of any kind whatsoever in this bill; there are only terminological changes. Therefore, honourable senators, I hope that we can deal with this bill quickly.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, in fact, I have very little to add to the comments made by my colleague Senator Kirby. As he has said, this bill takes amendments made in nine bills passed in the last few years and puts them into the parlance now used in the revised legislation. As Senator Kirby also mentioned, the substance of the law is not affected, just the phraseology and the terminology.

[English]

Senator Kirby has alluded to the fact that there is no substantive change to the legislation, and I hope he is right. But I hope that any future legislation the present government might seek to bring in will contain substantial changes that would make the income tax legislation more just, more equitable, and easier to work with so that Canadian citizens, including business people, can benefit.

Needless to say, this is certainly not a bill that would justify any of us giving it a six-month hoist. In true civil servant language, this is a bill that is basically housekeeping and no more. But we must send it to committee, and I second the motion to that effect; however, I hope that we will have it back in this chamber later this week, so that the Senate can pass it soon.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kirby, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Michael Kirby moved the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Department of National Revenue Act and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-2 may be somewhat more controversial in parts than Bill C-15, the bill we have just dealt with. Therefore, I should like to take a few minutes longer to explain the intent of Bill C-2.

Bill C-2 is essentially an efficiency bill. It is a bill which deals with the organization of government. Its purpose is to allow the streamlining and consolidation of the two departments which have historically been together under a single minister, the Minister of National Revenue. In the past, the Department of National Revenue had two portions: a customs and excise portion with its own deputy minister, and a taxation portion with its own deputy minister. This bill will take those two separate departments and bring them together. Under Bill C-2, they will stop operating as two autonomous organizations and, instead, will operate as a single department.

The rationale behind this is the following: These two departments have a number of things in common. They have a common client base, namely the Canadian taxpayers; they have many common business activities, namely they collect revenue from Canadians, both corporate and individuals, and, in terms of their employee base, they have employees who have a common set of skills in terms of many of the functions that they perform. Bill C-2 recognizes this commonality, and achieves an economy of scale by bringing them together as a unified department.

There are significant economies that can be achieved as a result of this consolidation. Specifically, there are several types of duplication that are eliminated. Take, for example, the accounts that the Department of National Revenue has historically maintained on its clients. In the past, client accounts were maintained in two separate groups: one from customs and excise and one from taxation. A consolidation into a single department results in the production of client accounts that only have one registration number for all issues relating to taxation with the Government of Canada. From the point of view of many small businesses, that is a significant advantage.

The second significant advantage concerns the way auditing can now be handled — that is, the government's auditing of firms and individuals. Businesses, for example, will no longer find themselves being audited by more than one branch of Revenue Canada at different times. This has happened quite frequently in the past. It has happened because a firm has been audited at one time by the taxation side of the department and at a subsequent time by the customs and excise side.

Similarly, the issue of tax collection can be consolidated by bringing together the collectors from customs and excise, on the one hand, and taxation, on the other. The underlying purpose of this consolidation is to enable government to become more efficient without either the government or the department giving up any of the fundamental tasks that it has historically done.

The first step in this consolidation was taken 18 months ago in October of 1992. While the departments remained separate at that time, they not only kept the same minister but also were put under a single deputy minister. That is, the Deputy Minister of Customs and Excise has also been the Deputy Minister of Taxation. That and other steps that have been taken at the headquarters level have resulted in $30 million of savings simply by consolidating operations at the national office. Of that $30 million, it is important to note that almost half, $13 million, has been reinvested in increasing security and monitoring and surveillance at Canadian border crossings.

It is estimated that another $30 million could be generated in the next three years as a result of this consolidation. That money can then be reinvested in high priority, front-line operations of Revenue Canada, specifically security at Canada's borders, which has become an increasing issue of concern for many Canadians. It is one of the highest priorities of the department.

Planned reinvestment in security at Canada's border crossings answers the criticisms which have been made of this bill by the union representing customs and excise employees. The union has said in hearings before a committee in the other place that they are concerned that the focus of customs officials will turn from law enforcement, which is what they have historically done, to tax collection as a result of this consolidation. Furthermore, they are concerned that their mandate will change and the terms of reference for their jobs will change.

Honourable senators, nothing could be further from the truth. Consolidation does not mean that any of the functions of Revenue Canada change, nor does it mean that the mandate of Revenue Canada changes. Revenue Canada continues to be the government agency responsible for security at Canada's borders. It continues to be the front line in the war against drugs, against smuggling, against the illegal importation into Canada of things like firearms and liquor. In fact, Bill C-2 allows savings to be achieved that can then be reinvested to enable the Department of National Revenue to strengthen its surveillance of Canada's borders. Essentially, it allows extra resources to be used for better law enforcement.

Indeed, honourable senators, if we look at the recent decision and announcement by the government to allocate substantial new resources to Customs Canada and to the RCMP with respect to decreasing smuggling, I would argue that it is very clear that this government is committed to not only maintaining the level of surveillance which has traditionally existed at our border crossings, but, in fact, to substantially increasing it. A clear illustration of this is the recent Customs Canada budget increase of $45 million. That translates into an additional 350 person-years of employees acting as security at Canada's border crossings.

In addition, not only will this bill improve operational efficiencies at the head office, and improve surveillance at Canada's border crossing points, but it will also have additional benefits with respect to the inland support which Canadian importers and exporters receive.

As most of you know, Revenue Canada is the department which is mandated to administer Canada's international trade policies and agreements. Last year it processed more than 45 million commercial transactions representing over $150 billion worth of activity in international trade. The efficiency with which this large volume of transactions will be handled will be increased as a result of this consolidation.

Therefore, honourable senators, it is important for us to understand, in light of some of the criticisms which have been made of this bill, that the ultimate goal of Bill C-2 is, essentially, to provide the basis for building a cost-effective, responsive and effective organization and administration. The bill does not change the mandate of any part of the department. The bill does not make any detailed structural changes. It does not change the responsibilities of any of the individuals employed in the department. It is not a cost-cutting measure. What Bill C-2 does is to provide for administrative consolidation with resulting economies that come from that kind of action. In effect, it removes the legal obstructions that are in the way of the department maximizing the benefits which come from administrative streamlining, from administrative consolidation.

Honourable senators will know that Revenue Canada is one of the largest departments in the government, both in terms of the number of employees and in terms of the number of locations where those employees work. Bill C-2 is an example of this government's commitment to eliminating red tape, to eliminating duplication, and to making government more efficient, while at the same time continuing to provide the service which Canadians want and expect from their government.

Honourable senators, as in the case of Bill C-15 which we dealt with a few minutes ago, I would hope that you would also give speedy passage to this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, this Bill C-2 may seem unimportant at first.

Without repeating what my colleague said before me, there is nevertheless one point in Bill C-2 which is quite significant. It is a cause for concern to many Canadians, not only the unionized Customs and Excise employees, who were also refused a chance to be heard by the other House. I think that the government which has been in office for six months, even though it says frequently that it listens, is still not delivering the goods. This case is an example. I think it would have been enough to give that group, and maybe other groups, a few hours so that Canadians could really see how generous and big-hearted the government is about listening actively, as it claims to be.

Although this bill carries on this part of the government reorganization begun by the previous government, I call on the present government to take this approach for all bills that seek savings and harmonization of programs so that, as my colleague just said, some of these savings can be used to improve services, such as surveillance of ports of entry to Canada.

As my colleague just said, this bill combines in a single administrative unit the Taxation and Customs and Excise sections of the Department of National Revenue, while retaining the same powers for the department. Until a year and a half ago, as we all know, Revenue Canada was divided into two parts. With this progressive measure, the government has saved money and improved services as well.

I repeat my desire that the government, as it is doing with this bill, will adopt as its own some measures intended to reduce duplication and to save money.

I now come to the point which worries many Canadians. Whether or not these fears are founded, or whether or not the union really understood the extent and nature of these changes, I would support any measure or initiative to let this and other groups appear before the Senate.

This concludes my remarks. That is all I wanted to add at this time. I will support any motion to refer this bill to the National Finance Committee or to some other appropriate committee for review. I urge committee members to give the floor to the Customs and Excise union and to any other parties who may be affected or who could make a contribution other than the explanations given by the government.

I am impressed by my colleague's comments, but it would be interesting to let ordinary Canadians come here to debate and express their opinion on this issue.

If this measure has saved $30 million, and possibly more, since it was implemented, as Senator Kirby told us, so much the better. It is this kind of change that we on this side of the chamber traditionally and continuously advocate, namely reducing the cost of duplication, et cetera, with the provinces or within Parliament, so that the government will not have to implement measures or decisions such as the one designed to save between $15 million and $23 million by closing the military college in St-Jean. But it is not my intention to revive this particular debate.

However, if there were five or six other measures of this nature, the government might not have to do away with institutions as important as the military college in St-Jean.

I support this bill and I hope it can receive Royal Assent without any undue delay.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

In saying that, I should like to support very strongly what Senator Simard has said. I, too, think it was unfortunate that the union of employees who had asked to appear before the committee in the other place did not appear. It is the intention of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, at its meeting next Tuesday morning, to hear not only from the government but also from the union, and from three other groups — a national teachers' organization, a national police organization, and a national distillers' organization. Those groups have asked to appear before the committee next week, and they are the only groups that have asked to appear.

It would be our intention at the committee's meeting next week to give all of those groups ample time to present their concerns about the bill, with the hope that we could deal with it next week. Now that the Senate has agreed not to sit next week, the committee will not be quite as constrained in terms of having to end by a particular hour of the day. We would be quite happy to give those groups and the government ample time to present their cases.

I would strongly support Senator Simard's view that one of the purposes of our committees is to ensure that people who have strong views about legislation ought to be given the opportunity to make their views known to a committee of the Senate before the committee reports back to the house.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Colin Kenny, for Hon. Pat Carney, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, April 26, 1994, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and Estimates as are referred to it; and
> That the committee have power to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada for the purpose of such studies.

He said: Honourable senators, I gather there is some confusion here. I am Deputy Chairman of the committee, and I am standing in for Senator Carney. She was unavoidably called away to another meeting and asked me to act on her behalf on Motions 22, 23 and 24. These motions were dealt with in the steering committee and again subsequently in the full committee, with substantial representation from both parties. The motions represent the proposed work plan of the committee for the coming 12 months.

This particular motion is meant to provide some research assistance to Senator Carney in her capacity as chairman. I would be happy to deal with any specific questions that may be raised on the matter.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would be the last one to hinder or delay the work of any committee. However, this seems to be, again, a request for an open-ended commitment. The motion says, in part, "be empowered to hire staff and to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada." Is there no budget or limitation attached to this motion? Once the authority is given, the Senate commits itself to follow the empowerment bestowed on that particular committee.

The reason I raise this point, and I would have raised it anyway, is that the committees budget is already stretched to the limit. I ask Senator Kenny, and if he cannot answer perhaps we can await Senator Carney: Does this proposal respect the budget limitations that are in existence for this fiscal year?

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, this is the usual conundrum we face. The Leader of the Opposition knows only too well the question: Does one go to Internal Economy and get the budget approved first and then come to the Senate for a mandate, or does one get a mandate from this chamber and then go to Internal Economy? I can assure the honourable senator that Senator Carney is scheduled to appear before the Subcommittee on Budgets and Administration tomorrow to seek approval for the budget of the committee. Obviously, the committee needs approval for both before much can happen.

This procedure is followed by every committee, to my knowledge. Given the way the system works, we cannot get simultaneous approval for both. I think the chairman is following the established practice with committees in this case.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I cannot disagree with the honourable senator. I suppose it points up the question of the practice. I have raised this matter before the Internal Economy Committee and elsewhere: When a committee comes for a special request, such as that contained in this motion, it should have the budget approved first. Otherwise, once we give authority, the committee will present itself before the Internal Economy Committee and say, "Look, the Senate has instructed us to do this. Give us the money to do it."

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, with respect, I have been a member of that committee on many occasions. Behind the honourable senator is one of the most recent chairmen of the subcommittee. That subcommittee has never felt inhibited in relation to cutting budget requests down significantly, notwithstanding whether or not the general mandate has been approved by the Senate. Those budget requests, having already been cut by the subcommittee and dealt with by the full committee, come back to this chamber again for final approval.

There are many opportunities for this chamber to deal with this issue. It is not a carte blanche acceptance at all. If the Senate so chooses to approve these issues today, senators will have a second opportunity when the budget comes back in the form of a report from the chairman of the Internal Economy Committee to reject the funding altogether. Therefore, the honourable senator would have a second kick at the cat.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I am reassured that approval of this sort of motion in no way commits the Senate financially. The situation is equivalent to saying, "Go ahead and look into it, but you are on your own," in the sense that there is no connection between giving approval today and any financial requirement that might be needed to allow continuity.

Senator Kenny: The honourable senator is quite right. This provides the committee with an opportunity to make a case before the Internal Economy Committee. If it makes its case to the Internal Economy Committee, the matter will then come back before the Senate, in the form of a report from that committee, and that report will be disposed of as this chamber chooses.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, this debate reminds me of my years with the Internal Economy Committee.

Senator Frith: Fond memories.

The Hon. the Speaker: We were never able to solve that question in all those years. However, I detect a degree of agreement on both sides, and in that sense I will ask the house whether it is ready to entertain this motion. Is the motion carried, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL PROTECTED AREAS STRATEGY— COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONDUCT STUDY

Hon. Colin Kenny, for Hon. Pat Carney, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, April 26, 1994, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources be authorized to undertake a study of the policy options available to the government to complete the network of pristine areas that represent Canada's natural regions and of the creation of a National Protected Areas Strategy and to make recommendations thereon; and
> That the committee present its final report no later than March 31, 1995.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, is Senator Kenny in a position to give us some idea of what the plan of the study would be, or is that up to Senator Carney? I think the point that Senator Lynch-Staunton raised on the previous motion now comes to the fore. Presumably, if this reference is accepted, it will indeed involve some money. True, its budget would have to be approved by the Internal Economy Committee. However, does the Senate wish to proceed with this kind of study? How much is involved? Will it involve travel? Will the hearings be held in Ottawa? We should have some indication from Senator Carney about the plans of the committee.

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, I do not have the specific dollar amounts here. Presumably they will be dealt with tomorrow. The plan, in essence, is to continue the study this committee commenced last year when it was examining our parks system and the commitment that the Government of Canada made in Rio, to increase the amount of park space or protected space in Canada by up to 12 per cent.

The committee proposes to examine the ways in which the government could achieve that objective and ensure that Canada has an appropriate array of protected spaces across the country. There is a considerable amount of enthusiasm in the committee for this study. It calls for no travel in the spring and summer, but it does call for travel — I believe only by small groups of one or two senators and a staffer — to about six different national parks or sites across the country, in order to examine different aspects of the space that is being preserved.

The intention of this committee is to reinforce and support the commitment which both parties share, and which was made on behalf of Canada by then Prime Minister Mulroney in Rio.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, this may be a point of order; I am not sure. It is a point of something.

We have argued this issue time and time again as to whether we first announce an initiative we wish to undertake, and then at a later date we talk about what it will cost. We then go to the Internal Economy Committee. Sometimes we go there first, and then come to the chamber. That way of working is very foreign to myself and to many others. I do not know why we cannot find a way of simplifying the process.

With respect to Notice of Motion No. 23, approving it creates the beginning of something. We understand the title and the objectives of the something, but we have no idea what the devil it will cost. If ever there was a time for us to put a price tag on everything presented in this place, no matter how worthy it is, now is that time. We would have a better balance in our approach to how we do our business. I would urge, as a point of order, that somehow we find our way to that destination, because we seem to be simply repeating old practices that get us in trouble from time to time.

Senator Kenny: If I may, honourable senators, the system makes good sense to me. There is instant gratification to the extent that the entire issue is dealt with at once. I accept the honourable senator's point to the extent that some of the information comes forward in a piecemeal fashion. However, before the proposal is accepted and has the ability to move forward, this chamber is aware of what is planned, how much it will cost, and when it will happen. It requires two checks; two switches, if you will, must be on before anything moves forward.

Implicit in this concern is that by obtaining approval in this chamber, there is somehow a carte blanche at the Subcommittee on Budgets in the Internal Economy Committee. Those who have served as chairmen of committees know that that subcommittee and the Internal Economy Committee is anything but a carte blanche. Many of us have left those meetings much poorer than when we went in. You know that each item is examined, item by item, and items are chopped from the budget.

Just as we set aside funds in our estimates for the year, Senator Doyle and his subcommittee sat down last December. They worked through an estimate of what we would spend in this fiscal year. They did that without knowing what each committee would spend. Yet, we were prepared to vote and agree that, yes, we would have a global amount for committees to spend on studies.

It is generally agreed in this chamber that the best and most important work of the Senate takes place in committees. There was a great deal of debate in the Internal Economy Committee with respect to ensuring that a responsible and adequate sum was set aside so that the Senate could continue its work in committees. That was all done without the slightest notion as to what honourable senators would bring forward from their various committees. Perhaps the budget for the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was known, and we might have known that they were thinking about the farm safety bill, but by and large, nobody really knew what was planned.

In this case, and with the process we are going through, this chamber will know within a week what is planned, where the trips are bound to go or where the studies are taking place, and the dollars and cents involved. In the intervening portion of the week, the Internal Economy Committee or a subcommittee thereof will have exhaustively examined what has gone on here today.

Therefore, I say to honourable senators, there is no lack of control in this chamber. The chamber can stop this motion twice; it can stop it now, and it can stop it when the motion comes back from committee. There is no lack of detailed examination. That will take place in the Internal Economy Committee. It is anything but a blank cheque in that committee.

If the chamber does not feel these are appropriate issues, that is fine, but I do not think the process is flawed. The process works. There is scrutiny — public scrutiny in this chamber and public scrutiny in the Internal Economy Committee, and again when the motion returns to this chamber.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may pick up on what Senator Kelly has said, because he said it better than I could, surely all of that process can be completed before the matter is brought to this chamber. If a committee wishes to engage itself in a special study requiring a reference from the Senate, that committee can do its homework beforehand, go to the Internal Economy Committee, present its budget and terms of reference, and then come back to the chamber with its project supported by the Internal Economy Committee. Then we will know that the budget can support the request.

We are being asked to make a moral commitment that we think this motion is a good idea. However, if we do so, we may find ourselves in the embarrassing position of having to turn down the project, or at least cut it back, when the matter comes before the Internal Economy Committee or this chamber. Why must we enter into that process? Why not eliminate the process by doing the groundwork before bringing a project to this chamber?

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have not served on the Internal Economy Committee, but I have heard these discussions from time to time. Tell me where I am wrong: The process we are following, if I understand correctly, is roughly comparable to what we use on a bill. Second reading asks the house to give approval in principle to the content of a bill. We then send the bill to committee.

It is as if a family sat down and said, "Shall we buy a new car?" Let us make the initial assumption that the family wants to buy a new car. They then go out to shop, and that is equivalent to the committee stage.

It is quite possible that, by third reading stage, the family — in this case the Senate — has seen what is available and concludes that they do not like what is available. In any case, the price is too high and they say "no," even though they said "yes" before they started this exploratory process.

With respect to the motion now before the house, we are, in a sense, at the second reading or principle stage. We are saying, "Assuming this can be done at a reasonable cost, is this something we wish to do?" This is a fairly sane way of going about our business, provided we recognize that it is always proper for us at the third reading stage, when we have finished our shopping, to say "No, what is available is not suitable or is too costly."

Senator Frith: No money, no car.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I very seldom disagree with Senator Stewart. He is much wiser than I am, certainly, and than most of us here. However, notwithstanding the process, which I totally understand, the motion says:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources be authorized...

It asks that the committee be authorized.

Let us take the analogy of my children asking dad for a new car. I say, "All right, you are authorized to get a new car." I must tell you that I would not have any time at all to catch them — they would be out the door, buying a car, because I have authorized them to do so.

I am a farm boy, so let us keep this simple. What we are saying is this: "Hey, senators, do you think it would be a good idea if we created a study to examine..." et cetera, et cetera? "Do you think it is a good idea?" That is what Senator Stewart says. He says we are being asked if it is a good idea. But that is not what the motion says. It says "authorized." The wheels start turning when you are authorized. One day it may come to the point where you find you do not have any money. It is then too late to stop the wheels turning — the money has already been spent.

Honourable senators, the point I wish to make is that the process is flawed under today's circumstances.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, as a member of the committee to which this matter relates, I must say that at no time during discussions in the committee was anything raised with respect to difficulties that might arise with the Internal Economy Committee process. Having been in this place for some time, I am amazed at the changes in that arcane process. This request is no different from any other matter that has come before the Senate to be approved.

I want to add to what Senator Kenny has said. In my opinion, it would be extremely worthwhile for the Senate to examine this piece of policy. It is exactly the kind of thing that the Senate ought to be examining, and to which we ought to give priority. If later, in its wisdom, the Senate decided that we should not have the necessary funds, I am sure we could find a way to do the study in any event.

I want to reiterate that, notwithstanding the process, there is very little risk in giving this measure the go-ahead now. There are very responsible people on the committee who will not run off and spend all the Senate's money without the approval of the Senate.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, the problem to which Senator Kelly is referring is that the Senate does not usually approve the work programs of committees. That, in my opinion, is the weakness.

Instead of approving a work program for each committee and then asking for the necessary budget, we say that, in principle, we can study anything, do any type of research and then find out if there is any money. If there is money available, we will do the work.

I think this is the flaw. It seems to me that, first, the program of each committee should be approved by the Senate and then the money should be requested from the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

[English]

Otherwise, you are asking the Internal Economy Committee to grant you the ways and means before having any authorization on the program. That, in my opinion, is the weakness.

In one sense, I do not think the analogy of Senator Stewart is a good one because most of the legislation comes from the government, which has the majority. Therefore the government decides what is required, and it expects us to analyze the situation.

That is not the case here at all. It is the program of the Senate itself which is under discussion. In that way, the committee does not have any leadership, such as the cabinet may have in the legislative process. I think it is very different.

Hon. Joan Neiman: At the moment, I am chairman of a special committee which this Senate authorized several weeks ago. I must confess publicly that we still do not have an approved budget. I assumed that when we received authority to undertake this study, that authority covered the use of the facilities within the Senate, which we are now doing. We did get an emergency approval, just in case we had some odd expenditures. We hope to have a budget to present within the next week or so because we foresee expenditures of a larger amount.

I think the authorization was perfectly in order because it was simply approval for a study, whether by the committee I chair or any other. It seems to me that the approval is only for the substance of what the committee wants to do, and that, quite properly, the question of spending any moneys beyond what has been afforded us here in the Senate can be dealt with within a reasonable time afterward.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: I make it clear that I neither represent a committee seeking funds nor the Internal Economy Committee. However, we are into a rather large problem here, and I think Senator Spivak has hit the key word.

Senator Spivak: Arcane.

Senator Doyle: Well, you can come to "arcane," but the word I heard was "priority."

If a committee comes here and asks for the endorsement of the chamber for a particular project or exercise and the Senate says, "Yes indeed, that is a fine thing you are going to do, and we approve of it," that will be recognized at the Internal Economy Committee. It will also be recognized by the members of every other committee, and they will then say, "Look, there is only so much money in the fund this year for committee work, but to protect our case, we had best stand up in the chamber, right now, and get the Senate to approve what we are doing. Then we will at least be treated on an equal basis with the Energy and Environment Committee or the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee," or whatever, and they will all bring their budgets here first.

Maybe that will cure the Internal Economy Committee of being arcane, as Senator Spivak described it. I do not know. That is a reversal of what has been the intended case.

The job of the Internal Economy Committee, as I have understood it, was to look at what was spent last year by a variety of committees, to consider what new committees have been formed, to know how much money has been allocated for committees, and to bring all of that to bear in judging the presentations of various committees for new funding. I have never thought that the Internal Economy Committee was a place where you decided upon specific committee work. Rather, you encouraged best efforts, and then, as Senator Stewart reminds us, the committees come back here to have this house decide whether funding should be approved on third reading.

In a series of questions recently, I have been trying to say that too often when committees return for third reading, their reports are totally ignored by the Senate. Senators simply say, "I do not have time to read this today. I will take it to my office and I will get to it in time." Then they find out months later that they had approved of a salary increase for senators. They say, "My God, I did not do that," and they are told, "Yes, you did. It was in that report." Then they are in difficulty.

If we are to sort out this situation, I would suggest that we consider two options: You either go for approval to the Internal Economy Committee, or you come to this chamber for endorsement, but you do not try to do both. If you do, it will not work.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, to quote Yogi Berra, this is certainly a classic case of déjà vu all over again.

There are many senators who have been in the Senate longer than I have, but I have heard this debate at least five times since I have been here. That is because there is a very good reason for the concern that every senator has expressed. The problem with the system is the mechanics of it. My experience has been that whatever system is set up, I can criticize it, because the root problem is chicken-and-egg.

The problem does not start just at this stage; it starts when the Internal Economy Committee is studying the budget for the forthcoming year and is looking at committee budgets. Every time it does, someone says, "How can we know? How do we know how much money to put in? Is there someone here who can tell us every piece of legislation that will be proposed by the government in the forthcoming fiscal year, so that we will know how many of those pieces of legislation will require study by the appropriate standing committee, and that might even involve travelling?" I have never known a senator to raise his or her hand and say, "Yes, I had a dream last night which told me exactly what legislation will be coming down, and how much it will cost to deal with it."

A further point is: What about special committees?

When we fix the budget in the Internal Economy Committee, do we then tie the hands of the Senate? Will the Senate be told at some future stage: "You can't even look at that legislation; there is no money for it." That is the absurdity of attempting to figure out the mechanics.

The essential concern raised by Senator Kelly and Senator Lynch-Staunton is very important. I was a member of the committee when a very famous chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce appeared before us. He had received authorization from the Senate and when he appeared before the Internal Economy Committee — and I am not using his exact words — he said, "I am not asking you. I am telling you this is how much it will cost, and the Senate has already authorized me to do this," which is the concern of Senators Kelly and Lynch-Staunton. "The Senate has already said we are authorized to do it, and I am telling you this is what it will cost; so you approve it, and that's that."

For the last 15 years we have struggled with attempts to figure out a system that could not be perfect because it cannot handle this time sequence. There are two ways to change the order. One is absurd — that the money is actually approved before the committee is approved. We cannot have that. We would not want someone to say, "Tell me how much money is involved and then we will give you the money," and "You have the money, but we have not got the study authorized." That would not work.

What would work, however, would be to remove the jurisdiction of the Internal Economy Committee and debate the details of expense in the Senate. Then it could be done. Then we could say that we wanted the committee to be authorized to do it; we would see its entire budget and we could debate the whole budget in the Senate before it was approved. That would be a possible way.

That has been rejected up until now, because we have felt that the better system would be to have the authorization given in principle, then have the committee study it and have the committee report, the final control being in the hands of the Senate, where it always should be, as to whether approval is given in light of the budget. It has happened that someone has said, "I voted authorizing this study." But to use the metaphor or analogy of Senator Stewart, "I voted for the principle of the study, but now that I know what it is going to cost, I will vote against it," and that is what Senator Kenny is trying to explain is always possible in the present system.

It is not perfect. However, I do not know of any other system, except perhaps to change the Senate into a committee of internal economy when it considers all committee authorizations, including budgets. That, of course, will not solve the other major problem, and that is how one can know how much money to set aside for committee study in advance, which is why we have sometimes had to go for Supplementary Estimates.

All the concerns raised are legitimate. They reflect a serious problem of sequence that has been wrestled with previously in the Senate. This is the system we have come up with. Perhaps it could be improved if we could find a word better than outright "authorization," as Senator Kelly says. Perhaps we could use "approve in principle," or words of that nature.

We might consider that as a way of profiting from the useful debate we have had on the subject here again. I am not quarrelling with the fact that it is "again," because it is a difficult problem, and it is obvious that we have not completely solved it.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I do not wish to extend the debate. However, it seems to me that we wrestled with this question some years ago in the Rules Committee, and a procedure was established. I wonder if the staff could dig out that document, because there was indeed a proposed procedure.

Senator Frith: That is the one we are using.

Senator Molgat: It is the one we are using. However, I do not think it is necessarily understood by everyone, because they have not seen the document; if it were distributed, it might assist.

Did I understand Senator Kenny to state that this study was begun last year and that this is a continuation of work that was in process?

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, that is correct. This is a direct continuation of the work that was commenced last year.

Senator Thériault: People have changed sides in that time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have no alternative but to ask if it is your pleasure to adopt the motion, although the suggestion made by Senator Molgat is good, and the officials will obviously try to freshen up the old document and bring it back for further information.

Unless someone tells me differently, I do not think I have any alternative but to ask if the motion is agreed to or not. That is what I have to do.

Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

JOBS AND THE ENVIRONMENT— COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONDUCT STUDY

Hon. Colin Kenny, for Hon. Pat Carney, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, April 26, 1994, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources be authorized to examine the issue of jobs and the environment, and in so doing, provide a forum where issues, in which there seems to be a conflict between the creation of jobs and the preservation of the environment, could be discussed with a view to moving them closer to the point of mutually advantageous integration; and
> That the committee complete its examination no later than December 15, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, let the record show that this is the last motion I am moving for Senator Carney.

Senator Frith: Today.

Senator Molgat: A wise decision.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may ask Senator Kenny if he has come to some accommodation with Senator Stewart with respect to Motion No. 25 before we vote on this motion?

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, I cannot speak to Motion No. 25. My last one was Motion No. 24.

Senator Neiman: I was curious.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If one looks at the French side, one will find the correct motion.

Senator Molgat: There is a misprint.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, are you ready to consider this motion or to pass an opinion on it? Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MONITOR AND REPORT UPON THE CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT AND THE NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. John. B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wish to read the words of the motion for which I gave notice. There seems to have been some error in the printing. It looks as if someone pressed the wrong button and some of the text of Motion No. 24 is reproduced in place of the motion for which I gave notice.

The motion pursuant to notice of April 26, 1994, and the motion which I now move is:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to monitor and report on the implementation and application in both countries of the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement, and on the implementation and application in Canada, Mexico, and the United States of the North American Free Trade Agreement, as well as any other related trade development; and
> That the committee present its report no later than March 31, 1995.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): As long as it is understood, honourable senators, that the term "be authorized" does not really mean "be authorized." What we are really saying is, "Look into it, but you must first go to Internal Economy, and then you must come back to the Senate before you are really authorized."

Hon. Royce Frith: I have a suggestion about this matter, honourable senators. It does not necessarily concern this motion, although I suppose Senator Stewart would not object, since this is to be the system that will be put in place. In any case, I suggest that you simply put in the words, "...subject to approval of budget by the Internal Economy Committee and verification by the Senate...," and go on with the rest of the wording.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is fine.

Senator Frith: But that should apply to the other ones as well.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I think what we are doing is taking specific words out of context. We have a process here. The process is that we indicate Senate support for a proposed study. We understand that, subsequently, the necessary budget will go before the Internal Economy Committee. We also understand that a report will come back to the Senate itself. The word "authorized" has to be understood in that context.

I will give honourable senators another example. We do it in legislation. A bill comes to us stating, "an act." Of course it is not an act. It is not an act until it has received Royal Assent. We do not object and get all red in the face because the word "act" appears there, because we understand it is being used in a procedural context. The word "authorized" is being used in a procedural context.

It is not as if we just came in off the sidewalk without any understanding of parliamentary procedure. We understand the parliamentary process that is involved here. The word "authorized" in this context is a term of art which every senator understands.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there agreement on the motion of Senator Stewart?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE SENATE

TRIBUTE TO DEPARTING PAGE

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would invite you to join with me in bidding farewell to our Chief Page, Bryn Jedlic. Bryn came to Ottawa in September 1991, after having distinguished himself as a young man of some significant achievement. He started French immersion in 1975, and graduated from the Dr. Martin LeBoldus High School in Regina in June of 1991 with an average of 91.5 per cent. He was awarded the Saskatchewan General Proficiency Award in September 1991, and, of course, in September of 1991 he was a successful candidate for the page competition here in the Senate.

After coming to Ottawa, Bryn completed his first year of political science at the University of Ottawa with a grade point average of 8.0. I did not know it went that high. Along the way, he also managed to excel in other fields of endeavour. For instance, he was a member of the Regina Rowing Club and, since coming to Ottawa, a member of the University of Ottawa Rowing Club. He was captain of his football team at LeBoldus. In the same period, he was captain of his rugby team at LeBoldus and, in addition, found some time to excel at playing both trumpet and piano. A rather remarkable young man.

I take special delight in offering our best wishes to this young man. He comes from Regina, Saskatchewan. His parents are well-known and important members of our business community. As an aside, his mother bought the first Canada Post dove that we auctioned off at a literacy auction for the small sum of approximately $4,000. I am also happy to say that Senator Tkachuk bought the second one for a similar sum.

What more can I say? Here is a man of excellent achievement. Today is his last day in the Senate. He has served us well since September 1991, and we wish him the very best in the future.

Senator Frith: He chose the Senate over being a Rhodes scholar, obviously.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have the privilege that my colleague opposite has of coming from the same province as Bryn; it seems they are both Saskatchewanites, but I am a close neighbour. However, I have had the opportunity to see Bryn at work here, and to appreciate what a fine job he has done for us.

Often we may underestimate the work the pages do and the interest they take in our activities here. It is notable, of course, that pages in this place can advance to high office, as witnessed by the fact that we presently have at the Table at least two people who started out as pages and who now occupy important positions here in the Senate. We hope that those who are here now, Bryn and the other pages, may consider in the future returning to us.

For the time being, however, I cannot say that Bryn is leaving to face difficult times, because I understand that he is going to the Canadian University in Nice, France. That does not sound to me like an unpleasant posting for the next while. I am told in the meantime that he will spend some two months at Laurentian University to further his political science studies — — as well as his French. Yet, working with him, I noticed that he had no problem speaking French. However, if he wants to be better at it, he should be able to do so in Nice. We wish him good luck.

We thank you, Bryn, for your good services. We are very happy for you, and hope that you will come back.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am not standing to limit your applause. I would have joined it, except I was told never to applaud when sitting in this Chair. However, I am able to say verbally that I do applaud our Chief Page's success and his future.

Day after day, when I get ready for the parade to open the sitting of the Senate, those with furrowed brows come and line up together, the Clerk, the Clerk Assistant and the Black Rod, and then out comes this bright, cheerful person in the personage of our Chief Page. I wish to thank him for his encouraging presence when we organized the parade, especially in the first days, when I was much more nervous than he was.

In the past, I am told, the tradition was that, in order to get ahead in the Senate or the House of Commons, one had to be in the right political party. Perhaps. However, as I look at our Table, I am beginning to think that the real future is for those who have been pages and Chief Page in this house.

Good luck, all the best, and thank you very much.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. David Tkachuk: I also wish the best to Mr. Jedlic. He is a bright young man, and it was a pleasure having him here when I first came to the Senate. I talked to him privately before I came into the Senate chamber and I wished him the very best.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

SASKATCHEWAN RURAL ROADS PROJECT— ANNOUNCEMENT BY DEPUTY PREMIER

Hon. David Tkachuk: I should like to make a statement regarding the Infrastructure Program of the Liberal government.

Ed Tchorzewski has to be one of the happiest politicians on the planet. For those honourable senators who do not know him, he is the Deputy Premier of Saskatchewan. On Monday, he got to announce a planned expenditure under the Infrastructure Program of $30 million in my province to upgrade rural roads. It will provide 6,000 person-months of employment, which is a way of saying 250 jobs for two years, which of course happy Ed says is 500 jobs.

Accompanying Ed on the press release was Liberal MP Georgette Sheridan, who was speaking on behalf of Lloyd Axworthy, who was speaking on behalf of Mr. Eggleton, who I imagine was speaking on behalf of the Prime Minister, who was quoted in a press release once, while Mr. Tchorzewski took all the credit.

Let me now quote from the press release:

> Of the total funding for the rural road project, $20 million will come from the provincial-municipal revenue sharing pool, while $10 million is being provided by the federal government over the next two years under the Infrastructure Works Program.

That made me a little suspicious, but meanwhile Ed waxes about jobs.

However, when we turn to the fact sheet on the back of the press release, we know why Ed is such a happy politician:

> Of total funding for the rural road project, $10 million is being provided by the federal government under the Infrastructure Works Program. The remainder will be provided by rural municipalities. Rural municipalities will finance their share of the rural road project through the normal process.

Ed's government contributed not a loony, not a penny, and he took all the credit. He was in all the media, and Georgette was nowhere to be heard.

Meanwhile, I phoned Mr. Sinclair Harrison, the president of SARM, which is the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, and he told me that about $10 million is probably budgeted already; $10 million was raised by municipalities by accessing other funds and borrowing; and $10 million was given by the federal government.

Out of all this, 500 jobs were created? Hardly. One third were already there: 83 is one third of 250; 83 were created by the municipalities by borrowing or accessing other funds, and 83 were reallocated from another federal government program.

This boondoggle, this misdirected, misguided, mismanaged, misallocated, misconceived program is misleading, and is creating misunderstanding. Frankly, honourable senators, I am developing a few misgivings. This program is so miscast that not even the wiles of the Liberals can make the job creation figures add up. I believe the Liberals should admit that they have created a little mistruth here, admit to misgoverning and admit the infrastructure program, as presently constituted, is one big mistake!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT PROCESS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—CONCERNS OF CONSTITUENTS

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I want to bring to your attention the fact that I have received more than 200 telephone calls, letters and faxes from people in British Columbia about Bill C-18, which is currently before the Senate.

Considering the fact that I am not accustomed to receiving this volume of mail on any issue, and given the nature of the sentiments expressed, I wanted to share the concerns that British Columbians have about this bill by reading you some of the letters.

The first letter I wish to refer to is from Miss Margaret Clark of Surrey, B.C., which is the newest city in Canada and one of the areas affected by the bill. She says:

> I understand that the House of Commons is considering Bill C-18, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act... the effect of which would deprive British Columbia of two new seats that it is entitled to receive under the redistribution. This means that British Columbia would not receive its two new seats in time for the next federal election.
> I write to urge you, as Senator for British Columbia, to use all means at your disposal to oppose the passage of this legislation and to protect the rights of British Columbians.

The next letter is from Mr. and Mrs. Ivo Van Bastelaere of Victoria, B.C., also requesting me to vote against this bill. The letter reads as follows:

> I am concerned that the Liberal government is using its majority in the House to prevent any delay in the bill's passage.

Honourable senators, the next letter is from Stan Hagen, who was a minister in a former government of British Columbia — if it is the same Stan Hagen. He says:

> I urge you to take whatever means possible to kill Bill C-18. It is unbelievable that while a new democracy is born in South Africa, the self-serving Liberals from Ontario and that block of traitors from the Quebec region are trying to kill B.C.'s representation by population. Where is our democracy?

Here is another letter. This is from Katherine Berg of Grand Forks, B.C. You will see that these letters come from all over the province. She writes:

> Wake up. This is British Columbia calling. It is your home. Stand up for it. You are being —

I cannot read the next word.

> Kill Bill C-18. More and more, we want out.

The next letter is from a former Newfoundlander living in my former riding of Vancouver Centre. He writes:

> I truly believe you have the knowledge, skill, power and sharp judgment to smell a rat. Bill C-18 is the wolf in sheep's clothing. Please add my name to the long list you must drag and drop on Ottawa. Please say no to this bill! Say no to Bill C-18.

There is more, including an invitation to tea, which I am sure my colleague Senator St. Germain, who is in the chamber, would love to accept with me.

The next letter is from Courtenay, B.C. Mr. William R. Ball writes:

> It is unconscionable that some members of Parliament from B.C. voted for the bill, knowing full well that they were depriving British Columbia of their lawful and constitutional right to two additional members as determined by the 1991 census.
> The only recourse remaining for fair and equal treatment for the citizens of British Columbia now rests with the Canadian Senate. I ask that you see your way clear, as a senator from our province, to vote NO to Bill C-18.

Honourable senators, we have a number of —

The Hon. the Speaker: I apologize to the honourable senator, but I must interrupt. I am told that your three minutes have expired.

Senator Carney: Do you not wish to hear more, colleagues?

Senator Olson: That is enough. We got the message.

Senator Carney: Thank you. I will bring my mail back another day.

REQUEST OF MUNICIPALITIES OF CANADA

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that when the Senate established the rule governing Senators' Statements, it was not intended that that would be an occasion for debate. In fact, I think the rule clearly states that it is not debate. However —

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is this a point of order or a statement?

Senator Molgat: I shall not enter the debate, but I wish to make a particular point insofar as the Infrastructure Program is concerned. The Infrastructure Program was clearly established as a cooperative program from the very beginning.

Senator Berntson: It sounds like debate.

Senator Molgat: Indeed, the Infrastructure Program was requested by the municipalities of Canada, and it was established very clearly as a tripartite agreement. The municipalities would participate, the provincial governments would participate, and the federal government would participate.

Senator Berntson: This still sounds like debate to me.

Senator Molgat: It was at the very specific request of the municipal corporations, through their associations, that the idea was promoted.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—CONCERNS OF CONSTITUENTS

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I too want to reinforce what Senator Carney has so adeptly put forward in this house: That Bill C-18 is just not acceptable to British Columbians. I too have been inundated with letters, faxes and telegrams urging me to vote against this bill.

I ask the members opposite, each and every one of them, to urge the government to withdraw this unfair bill that they have presented to this place, and to reconsider their position in the spirit of justice for all Canadians in relation to democratic representation in the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, it was pointed out that there is to this particular bill a side that would clearly indicate that it has been brought forward for partisan reasons as a result of pressure that emanated out of the Toronto region. I urge each and every senator of the Liberal Party to ask the government to withdraw this bill because it is unfair to British Columbians, unfair to people in the Toronto region, and unfair to Canadians in general.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I want to raise a point of order —

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): You cannot until after Question Period.

Senator Thériault: Then I will make it in the form of a statement. It is a well-established rule in the British parliamentary system —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This is out of order.

Senator Thériault: — that when a piece of legislation is before the house, there are three opportunities to discuss that legislation: Introduction and first reading, second reading, and third reading. There is also discussion at committee stage. Legislation should not be discussed at any other time.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

BUDGETS OF COMMITTEES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday, in the course of discussing a proposed program for the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, the Leader of the Opposition properly raised the point of how we handle budgets for committees. At that time I suggested that possibly we could ask the officials of the Senate to give us the information.

I have since been advised, and I should have known this, that this process is indeed covered in the Rules of the Senate. I would refer honourable senators to pages 125 to 130 in the appendices section of our rule book.

These guidelines arose out of a study undertaken by the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, of which I, at that time, had the honour to be the chairman. The results of that study became the subject of the 7th report of that committee, tabled in the Senate on Wednesday, March 5, 1986, and that report was the subject of debate in the Senate commencing on March 11, 1986. If honourable senators are interested, I would recommend that they read the background which was illuminated during the debate starting at pages 2123 in the Debates of the Senate of that day.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Michael Kirby, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, tabled the sixth report of the committee.

He said: Honourable senators, this report deals with the work plan of the committee. I request leave of the Senate to say a few words about this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Kirby has requested leave. Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Why the haste? Why can we not wait until the next sitting?

Senator Kirby: I am quite happy to leave it to a future sitting of the Senate. There is no particular reason that I have to speak to it today. However, at an early opportunity, for example, during the next week we are back, I should like to say a few words about the plan. I think it will be important, not only for members in the Senate but also for several of the organizations that will ultimately be appearing before the Senate.

However, I repeat, it does not need to be done today. I am happy to do it at a later time.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I just wanted to know.

Senator Kirby: Thank you.

Honourable senators, I will just take a couple of minutes to draw your attention to the work plan of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It, of course, does not cover legislation. It does cover other studies that the committee intends to undertake over the next couple of years.

We have taken this unusual step of laying out a work plan for the next couple of years, because there are several major issues facing the financial services sector in Canada. These issues, we believe, logically group together and are sufficiently important that it makes sense for us to announce an overall work plan rather than an issue-by-issue work plan. We want to deal with six major issues.

The first issue has to do with the stability of the Canadian financial system and, in particular, the protection of consumers of financial services. In that regard we will be looking at three very specific questions.

The first question is whether the regulatory system is adequate as it now stands. The second is whether the appropriate line has been drawn between the regulatory function, on the one hand, and the insurance function that protects depositors and consumers, on the other. The third is related to the fact that existing insurance schemes are based on industry and not on product. The CDIC insures deposits in trust companies and banks. CompCorp, the insurance industry's privately run operation, insures people who buy life insurance policies. A similar organization protects customers of members of the security industry.

A major issue for the committee is whether it makes sense to continue to look at each member of the financial services market separately, in the way it was done in the past, or whether it makes sense to look at each product separately, for example, insurance.

This issue is of particular importance, honourable senators. It was looked at by the Senate in a very preliminary way a year ago, but in light of recent developments in the financial services sector, we think that further consideration is called for at this time.

The second issue of the six, and the other one with which we will be dealing this spring, arises out of hearings which the committee held in February on regulations governing the Export Development Corporation. During those hearings, members questioned whether the Export Development Corporation has the same portfolio of tools with which to help Canadian companies expand their export business as have similar government organizations of other countries, such as the United States, France, Germany and Japan. We are concerned that EDC may be at a disadvantage, and therefore Canadian exporters would be at a disadvantage in international markets. We will therefore be looking explicitly at whether there is a greater role for the government, through the Export Development Corporation or through other means, in increasing Canadian exports and ensuring that the EDC, on the one hand, and Canadian exporters, on the other, have a level playing field internationally.

The third issue, which we will deal with in September and October, is a review of developments in the Canadian financial system. This study will be done having regard to the major reforms that have taken place since the financial services legislation of June 1992 collapsed the four pillars.

Industry and government officials support this two-year review of the legislation. It is vital to see if the framework is working as it was intended to work. Major changes in the financial system were predicted by the parties who appeared before the committee when it considered the legislation. Have such changes occurred? Are there rough spots that need smoothing? We will be doing a retrospective analysis in the early fall, keeping an eye on recommending possible changes in the legislation.

The fourth area we will look at is government assistance for small business — with two particular issues in mind. First, there is currently an interdepartmental committee looking at the role of government vis-à-vis small business. That committee will be making its report public by the end of the summer. It is our intention to hold hearings based on that document and to get feedback from the business community and other interested parties on it.

The second aspect of assistance to small business that is of interest to the committee is the Federal Business Development Bank. Senators will be aware that two years ago legislation was passed that changed significantly the mandate and role of the Farm Credit Corporation, a related agency that deals with small business. There was legislation passed last year that affected the Export Development Corporation. It is now time to reconsider the role and mandate of the Federal Business Development Bank. The purpose of our hearings will be to establish what is an appropriate mandate for the FBDB prior to legislation being introduced, presumably in 1995, which would change its basic mandate.

The fifth issue deals with pensions and capital markets. Concern has been expressed about the growing size of mutual funds and pension funds in Canada and the fact that they are in many ways unregulated. A number of analysts have expressed concern that Canadians are increasingly having to rely on private pension funds and private RRSPs as a means of financing their retirement.

An important public policy issue revolves around the extent to which Canadians are using private pension funds, mutual funds and various other vehicles to secure their retirement. How will changes in the funding of CPP/QPP affect other vehicles used for retirement planning? Is there a role for government in regulating these funds? To what extent have they become significant players in the financial services sector? It is necessary to look not only at their economic impact but also at whether or not there is a role for government to play in helping to make Canadians feel more secure about retirement.

Finally, honourable senators, later next year we will be looking at an issue about which there has recently been some discussion in the media. I refer to the question of whether or not, in the interest of growing efficiency within the financial services marketplace, the securities industry ought to have a national regulator. The current situation is that the securities industry is regulated at the provincial level. This is an issue of growing concern to a number of provinces, particularly the small provinces in the prairies and in Atlantic Canada. It is an issue we will be addressing with a view to making recommendations to the government on the extent to which it ought to regulate the securities industry.

Honourable senators, the document I have tabled, and which will be circulated to you, contains a more detailed outline. I thought it important that I explain the essential thrust of the committee's work plan and make public the document. I have done so because a number of groups will want to do a significant amount of background work prior to appearing before the committee on these issues. It is important to give those organizations as much lead time as possible so that when they appear before the committee over the next 18 months or so, their contributions will provide solid input into the committee's deliberations.

QUESTION PERIOD

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

STATUS OF RELATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, amongst its many pledges, the new government included a promise to work closely with the provinces on matters of mutual interest, to paraphrase members of that government, in order "to restore harmony and cooperation between all parties," implying that the previous government's approach to federal-provincial relations led to acrimony and ill will.

Senator Olson: That is right.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Today, not even six months after this government assumed office, we have the sad spectacle of the premier of British Columbia's pleas for proper representation of his province in the House of Commons falling on deaf ears; of the premier of Alberta not being given the basic courtesy of advance notice prior to the Minister of Health's recent outburst; of the premier of Ontario being insulted by the Minister of the Environment when she implied that his non-support for NAFTA disqualified his province as a prospective site for the NAFTA environmental agency; and of the premier of Quebec outraged, with reason, over the lack of discussions on his proper request that Quebec have greater control over manpower training.

Senator Olson: You did your research. That is terrible.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You just have to read the newspapers, Senator Olson.

Will the Leader of the Government explain how this bulldozing strategy leads to more harmonious relations between the federal and provincial governments?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Lynch-Staunton has indicated to us some areas of difficulty with some federal-provincial issues that have been raised in the media and elsewhere. I wish to assure the Leader of the Opposition that work between the federal government and the provinces continues on a wide range of issues that are taking place both at the departmental and ministerial level.

I should also point out to the Leader of the Opposition that sometimes the level of federal-provincial discussion takes on an added zest when there are electoral events in the offing. This may well be the case in some of these instances.

Efforts made on the part of the federal government, however, include the maintenance of fair and constant communications with the various provincial administrations, their officials, their ministers and their premiers. I believe that this is being done.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: My concern is not that there are disputes between provinces and the federal government — that is inevitable in a system such as ours, and it is an ongoing process. My concern is that the federal government seems to be going back to the days of the seventies and early eighties when the then Liberal government decided that Canada was more or less a faceless society, and that Big Brother in Ottawa had the first and final say. The Liberal government seems to be tending towards returning to the philosophy that this is not a country of regions with special priorities, special requirements and special values from coast to coast, but one where only Ottawa knows best, so we must do what Ottawa says, or forget it.

I am asking the Leader of the Government to assure us that we are not returning to those unfortunate days when there was tremendous acrimony between the provinces and the federal government, but rather that there is a recognition that this is still a country of regions, and where one is still a distinct society.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I assure Senator Lynch-Staunton that the federal government is not adopting the attitude of Big Brother, or of Central Canada ruling all. The federal government is very conscious of the importance of each region and each province in this country and, in its discussions and negotiations, will conduct itself accordingly.

EFFECT OF FEDERAL POLICY ON PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY OF QUEBEC

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. If the federal government is so aware of the distinctiveness of the various regions and of their specific needs, why is it about to kill the Quebec pharmaceutical industry, which had found itself in a highly favourable position after the Parliament of Canada passed the Patent Act? Has the minister come across the statement that the Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce made about this yesterday?

•(1450)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Rivest for his question. Yes, I have learned of the statements of Minister Tremblay in Quebec. Discussion on this issue began, as the senator will know, because of indications from the industry that they were setting out on a certain campaign, or taking certain action.

As far as the federal government is concerned, our position is quite simple and clear: Since 1987, there has been a requirement for a statutory review. That requirement was incorporated into the Patent Act at that time. I hope that the pharmaceutical industry will not let that kind of a requirement alter or inhibit in any way their investment intentions.

As far as the federal government is concerned, we will obey the statutory requirement at the time it comes into play. Nothing more should be read into the situation than that.

[Translation]

Senator Rivest: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. If that is the case, why did the Quebec Minister of Industry and Trade criticize the intentions of the Canadian government, and why did he say that announcements made by the federal minister, Mr. Manley, were a complete contradiction of discussions that both levels of government had had with the industry in recent months?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am not sure of the answer to that question from Minister Tremblay's point of view. Perhaps there is a misunderstanding. As far as Mr. Manley is concerned, I believe he indicated in the House of Commons this week that Bill C-91 would be reviewed as required by statute. I think that review by statute was contemplated for 1997. That would be the time it would take place.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE OF ST-JEAN

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, my question is again about the decision to close the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean.

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether she believes — and whether Canadians can still hope — that this decision will be reversed.

I am also told in connection with what is happening in St-Jean that, if the operation to close the college is not stopped within a month or six weeks, we will have reached the point of no return, and the government will be able to say: "Look, it is too late."

I want to make sure the government can find a way to save face, if necessary. The ministers were boasting and saying publicly that the Liberal government did not want to make the same mistake made by the Mulroney government when it had to give in to senior citizens, because it would be the thin edge of the wedge and that the government did not want to start its mandate this way.

Incidentally, today three different newspapers, including Le Soleil, said that the Liberal government backtracked at the last minute on the issue of taxing health insurance premiums. A first change of heart!

And another: After they preached the benefits of budget cut-backs and sound financial management, and declared that there would be no more trips for ministers on the Challenger, The Globe and Mail reported today that the Prime Minister spent a total of $250,000 in federal funds to go to and from the Caribbean. So much for promises!

And now for a third change of heart! In today's Ottawa Citizen, we read:

[English]

> The Chrétien government will now allow exhausted ministers to replenish pared-down staff.

We know that a few months ago, the new government said that ministers would have to do with fewer people and that they would save $10 million. Obviously, the government is prepared to allow ministers more staff. This is the third time that this government has backtracked on fundamental issues.

Senator Frith: Order, order!

Senator Simard: Therefore, will the government backtrack when it comes to a national institution that allows for the training in a French milieu of francophones and anglophones in Quebec? Can Canadians hope that this government will backtrack again, but this time in a good cause?

Senator Robichaud: Would you repeat the question?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Thank you, Senator Simard, for your question and for your eloquent and interesting preamble. I will not go into that in detail, other than to say that this particular minister is not exhausted but is still full of zip, and is quite content with the arrangements that have been put in place for us.

On the question of the college, I believe that last evening senators had a long and full discussion on this issue with the Minister of National Defence, and will continue the discussion with other witnesses before the committee.

Senator Simard has asked me this question on a number of occasions and I have attempted to answer it. We are still in the position of having discussions with the Quebec government and waiting to receive advice on how this facility can be dealt with in a productive way for the future.

I cannot answer in the affirmative Senator Simard's question, but we will certainly be cooperating in any way we can with the province of Quebec on the future of this institution.

FORMULA RESOLVED AMONG LEVELS OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wanted to ask a question a few minutes ago as a supplementary to Senator Lynch-Staunton's questions.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us about a meeting that was held a few weeks ago with a number of municipal politicians from Alberta, who expressed complete satisfaction for the precise, helpful manner in which the formula had been worked out for all three levels of government regarding the Infrastructure Program?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Were they hand-picked?

Senator Olson: No, no, they just came.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Move the money around; you can make them happy.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yes, I can say that some weeks ago I had the pleasure of being party to the announcement of the infrastructure agreement with the province of Alberta along with the Deputy Premier, Mr. Ken Kowalski.

Indeed, as I indicated to Senator Ghitter the other day, in the province of Alberta we have very much pulled the municipal level into the process of governing the development of the projects as they come along. We have two members of municipalities on the committee that looks at the projects.

We certainly had a positive announcement in Edmonton, and agreement among all three orders of government, federal, provincial and municipal. That is the way programs and activities should be conducted in this country, particularly at a time when all parts of the country and all parts of each province must work together in order to get the best possible deal for Canadian workers, and for Canadian cities, towns and villages, to enhance Canada's economic prospects.

SOUTH AFRICA

FREE AND DEMOCRATIC ELECTIONS—MONITORING BY CANADIAN DELEGATION

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and has to do with the holding of free and democratic elections. Members on this side have noticed, with great satisfaction, the mission undertaken by Senators Oliver and Cools, and as many as 70 other Canadian observers, who now are monitoring the history-making elections in South Africa. Canada has invested some $5 million in the South African election process and our delegation has been praised for its diplomatic application of the experience gained in this country in the delicate business of watching elections.

My question is this: Has the government arranged to fly Senators Cools and Oliver back to Ottawa immediately after the South African chore has been done so that they may observe and comment upon Bill C-18, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Bill, that miserable piece of legislation that, in the words of Senator Murray, "deprives Ontario of four additional seats in the next election and will deprive British Columbia of two additional seats"?

Senator Frith: Nobody knows whether it will or not yet. We found that out today in the committee.

Senator Doyle: Will Senators Cools and Oliver be here to record their abhorrence of a procedure that offends the Canadian Constitution and demeans Canadian citizens in every part of the country, while it aborts the arm's-length procedures imposed to block the grossest kind of gerrymandering? Will Senators Cools and Oliver return in time to rescue us from this proposed invasion of the ballot snatchers?

Senator Olson: You never get anything straight.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I join with Senator Doyle in expressing satisfaction and praise for the group of Canadians who, I am sure under interesting albeit trying circumstances, are in South Africa in an effort to lend assistance and expertise to their free election process, which has to be one of the most outstanding political events in recent memory.

We on this side also look forward to the return of Senator Oliver and Senator Cools, who, I am sure, will give us a full report on their activities. I cannot answer the specific question as to whether they will be specially flown back at this time. I assume that they will come back when they and the others feel the obligations under which they agreed to go have been discharged. We will welcome them back when they return.

Of course, we all know that the strength of the Canadian Parliament lies in the fact that its two Houses are free and able to look into all of the legislation that is put before them by their successive governments, whether that legislation is difficult and controversial or amicable and easy.

SOURCE OF FUNDS FOR JOB CREATION— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, since we know that most municipalities and provincial governments are without money, are telling Canadian people so, are taxing Canadians to the limit, and are claiming in all their budgets that they are spending money only on absolutely necessary spending and are trying to reduce their deficits, I should like to know, in light of the amicable meeting the minister said she had in Alberta, what advice does the federal government have for them with respect to where their infrastructure money should come from to create all these new jobs?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Is the honourable senator referring to the province of Alberta?

Senator Tkachuk: Anywhere in the country.

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly, one of the foundations of this program, as my friend will know — and this goes back to pre-election time — is that the municipalities of this country, through their federal organization, have urged the federal and provincial governments to come together with them in a three-part effort to get the country working. They want the governments to create jobs through projects that at the same time will enhance, in a lasting way, the infrastructure of the municipalities in Canada, from our small villages to our huge metropolitan areas.

Right across the entire country, through the North and with our aboriginal community, agreements have been signed, and the municipalities are now starting to move forward with actual projects.

I know my friend is unhappy with what is happening in his province of Saskatchewan, while I am pleased about the cooperation that is occurring in my province of Alberta.

Senator Berntson: That is a natural tendency for Tories; they cooperate all the time.

Senator Fairbairn: I cannot answer in a detailed way as to what kind of negotiations took place between the municipalities and the government in the great province of Saskatchewan, but I do know that an agreement has been reached. It is a little different from some of the other agreements. The cost-sharing differs slightly. The federal government pays one third; the provincial and municipal shares are 39 per cent and 27 per cent, respectively.

I can tell Senator Tkachuk that there will be jobs in the province of Saskatchewan, and that there will be road building that will be of tremendous benefit to that province. I think there will be a number of other very important projects that will be to the profound benefit of the people of his province. I say that with conviction and sincerity. I am just sad that he is not personally able to enjoy the prospects of this program, as we in the province of Alberta are doing now.

Senator Molgat: He is an "anti."

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I have another question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it a supplementary question?

Senator Tkachuk: Yes, it is, Your Honour.

I understand what the minister is trying to say, but that is not what the Canadian people are hearing.

Senator Molgat: From you.

Senator Tkachuk: If someone is spending $10 million to build highways in Saskatchewan or in Alberta, and the federal government says, "Let's top it up so we can add another $10 million to it and build highways," that is a lot different from what the federal government is telling the people of Canada. They are trying to tell the people of Canada that they are creating 90,000 jobs.

I want infrastructure too, as I am sure do all senators. It would be helpful. However, this is not new money. It is money moved from one program to another program, and the government is saying that it is creating new jobs, which is giving false hope and is deceptive. Doggone it! It is just not right, Madam Minister.

The municipalities of Saskatchewan had already put $10 million aside. They were intending to spend it anyway over two years; so those jobs were there. The federal government takes $10 million from another department, puts it in and says, "Hallelujah! We have created 500 jobs." They have not created any jobs, and we know that.

I want the government to admit that the program is not correct, but is deceptive and is fooling the people of Canada, which I do not think is a good thing to do. I want to know how the government has arrived at the job figures — for example, the figure of 500 jobs in Saskatchewan.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, much as I admire and respect Senator Tkachuk, he will not get that type of admission from me. I believe that all of these three-way agreements have been made in good faith by all three sides.

The job creation will be real; it is not deceptive. The senator talks about the movement of funds here and there. That is not the way it works. Of course every government, and this government in particular, is attempting to work out methods of saving money and cutting expenditures. However, it also wants to use its resources to create jobs and opportunities for Canadians. Simply because money is available for this project does not mean that jobs have been destroyed somewhere else, regardless of the movement of funds through the federal government, or indeed through any provincial government. That is not the way the program works.

I will look forward to the moment when the work is under way in Saskatchewan, and Senator Tkachuk can see those jobs and those people of Saskatchewan profiting from them.

NATIONAL FINANCE

CUTBACKS IN TRANSFER PAYMENTS TO WESTERN PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is in relation to the deficit and the debt, which is undoubtedly the most crucial issue we have to deal with as a nation at this time.

The IMF has indicated that 3 per cent of the GDP as a level at which to have the deficit is not acceptable. In the last campaign, the Liberal Party came out with the Red Book which stated that this was the level that would be acceptable. Now the IMF is stating that this is not acceptable.

Recently, we have heard there are to be cut-backs in transfer payments to the western provinces. First of all, British Columbia lost the KAON project; now reasons are being found to cut back transfer payments.

Why is the government not dealing with some of its pets such as the CBC, instead of killing programs such as KAON and now attacking transfer payments to the western provinces, namely, British Columbia and Alberta? Although we are "have" provinces and are proud to contribute, we do not want to be penalized. However, honourable senators, we are being penalized every time we turn around.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my recollection of the federal budget is that the government is not cutting transfer payments to the provinces. As far as the IMF is concerned, they were commenting on our 3 per cent of GDP over three years, and stated that that organization would like to see a greater cut than that. We are fundamentally in line with what our goal is, namely, 3 per cent in three years.

It has been made very clear by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that of course we hope to be able to surpass those amounts, due to a combination of the sound financial structure that we are putting in place, the improvement in the economy, and the creation of jobs.

Other ministers in cabinet are constantly looking for ways to make our system more efficient. As I stated to Senator Simard the other day, ministers are reviewing all boards and commissions of government as to their sustainability, and as to whether or not they can be trimmed. All of those things are being done, Senator St. Germain, and already we are seeing some results.

In the last two months, employment has increased in Canada, in that 114,000 new jobs became available. People are getting back to work. That is the largest increase in such a period in five years. Consequently, we have seen a movement downward in that stubborn unemployment figure during the last month — not, unfortunately, to a level that would make any of us happy at 10.6 per cent, but at least there has been a downward movement. We have seen a slow increase, but a definite increase, in retail sales. We are starting to see a trend in this country that will enable Canadians to have greater security and greater opportunity. Such a movement is at the core of all the plans that we made prior to the election, plans that we expressed through the budget, and plans that we will hold to in the months ahead.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, does Senator Ghitter still wish to ask a question? I would not want to cut him off.

Hon. Ron Ghitter: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Since he does not wish to do so, I have to inform honourable senators that Question Period has ended.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised on March 24, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Murray regarding the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

THE ENVIRONMENT

PROCLAMATION OF ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT—STATUS OF DRAFT REGULATIONS—GOVERNMENT TIMETABLE

(Response to a question raised by Hon. Lowell Murray on March 24, 1994)

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act to which Senator Murray referred received Royal Assent on June 23, 1992. Over a year later on September 18, 1993, the previous government pre-published in the Canada Gazette Part I the four regulations essential to the technical implementation of the Act. The four regulations are: the Regulatory and Statutory Provisions List, the Comprehensive Study List and the Exclusion List and Inclusion List.

When pre-published, these draft regulations were soundly criticized for containing loopholes and for not reflecting the recommendations of stakeholders. Subsequently, at the request of stakeholders, the Minister of the Environment extended the public comment period and ordered officials to review the regulations. My understanding is that the Minister of the Environment will be seeking the approval of her colleagues for an improved regulatory framework in the near future. An announcement regarding proclamation would follow shortly thereafter.

Senator Murray also referred to the Standing Committee on Energy, Environment, and Natural Resources which has done commendable work on this legislation and continues to monitor its progress. I am informed that the Minister of the Environment will be a witness at the committee on this very subject as soon as Cabinet has reviewed the regulations.

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION TABLED

HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT—INCLUSION OF REGIONAL REPRESENTATION ON ADVISORY GROUP ON WORKING TIME AND DISTRIBUTION OF WORK

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 24 appearing on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

CROWN LIABILITY AND PROCEEDINGS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lewis, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bonnell, for the second reading of Bill C-4, an Act to amend the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act.

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I am happy to speak on second reading of this bill, to amend the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act.

I should point out that this is another piece of legislation which originated with the Conservative government under both Brian Mulroney and Kim Campbell. I wish to note that the only bills which we seem to be dealing with in this chamber are bills proposed by the Conservative government. The only two Liberal initiatives that I can recall are the emergency legislation for the dock workers in Vancouver, which is proving to be a piece of legislation that is not getting people back to work, and the infamous Bill C-18, which would deprive two provinces of their rightful representation in Parliament. Therefore, honourable senators can understand how much we look forward to seeing the nature of the Liberal legislation that is to be brought before us.

Another point about this bill which is worth noting, and which explains my interest, is that this bill establishes a mechanism for resolving disputes between Canada, Mexico and the United States concerning the side agreements on environment and labour that were negotiated between the three governments, and deals with the NAFTA agreement on trade.

Of course, the NAFTA agreement arises out of a free trade agreement that was initiated under the tenure of our colleague Senator Kelleher when he was Minister for International Trade, an agreement that was negotiated under my tenure as Minister for International Trade, and it is very rewarding to see how this initiative has been transformed into NAFTA, the North American Free Trade Agreement.

On September 14, 1993, Prime Minister Kim Campbell signed the North American agreements on environmental and labour cooperation. This bill confirms that the side agreements which have been adopted are those negotiated by the Conservative government.

The Crown Liability and Proceedings Act is amended so as to permit domestic enforcement by the Federal Court of Canada of any panel determination that is addressed to the Crown in the right of Canada. The enactment sets out a procedure by which a panel determination may be filed in the Federal Court. On filing, the panel determination would become an order of the Federal Court. A panel determination that becomes an order of the Federal Court would be enforceable in the same manner as any other order of that court, subject to certain limitations. There would be no right of appeal against a panel determination, or an order, or a decision made by the Federal Court in any enforcement proceedings.

The bill also contains a clause to exclude domestic judicial review of panel proceedings, panel determination enforcement proceedings taken by the Federal Court, and orders and decisions made by the Federal Court in any enforcement proceedings.

Honourable senators, on August 13, 1993, the Honourable Tom Hockin, Minister for International Trade under the Conservative government of Kim Campbell, announced that Canada had met its objectives and had negotiated strong and effective measures to protect the environment and workers across North America through side agreements with the United States and Mexico. The North American Agreement on Environmental Cooperation and the North American Agreement of Neighbour Cooperation were reached after several rounds of negotiations with the U.S. trade representative and the Mexican Secretary of Trade and Industrial Development. The agreements provided the positive assurance that the three NAFTA partners would enforce their environmental and labour laws so that no country gains an unfair competitive advantage. These side agreements represented a pledge to the people of North America that Canada, the United States and Mexico will pursue environmentally sustainable growth and promote the well-being of their workers.

The new agreements contained effective enforcement mechanisms without creating new barriers to trade. Canada was successful in proposing important safeguards for enforcement without instituting the kinds of barriers that NAFTA was designed to eliminate. The agreements aim to settle disputes through cooperation, but where countries fail to enforce their labour and environmental laws and do not correct the problem, they may be subject to fines paid into special environmental and labour funds. In Canada, fines will be enforced by domestic courts. This is where the bill comes into effect.

It is amazing, honourable senators, that having brought this bill forward, the government side shows such little interest in the proceedings of this chamber.

The precedent-setting agreements commit all three countries to close and ongoing cooperation on a broad variety of environmental and labour issues. These agreements build upon the already strong commitments to work together that were negotiated in the North America Free Trade Agreement.

In closing, honourable senators, I should point out that at Globe '94, which was held in Vancouver in March, this subject was under discussion. Speakers stressed that the environmental side agreement —

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Carney: It is all right, Your Honour. We will await with interest the bringing forth of their further legislation. Perhaps they will pay more attention to it than they are doing to the current legislation that is proceeding through this chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: May I ask for order, please. There is a high level of conversation in the chamber this afternoon, even making allowance for some hearing impairment on my part. I would ask that honourable senators cooperate, and allow Senator Carney to conclude her remarks properly.

Senator Carney: Alternatively, they can withdraw the bill, Your Honour.

As I was saying when His Honour kindly called the chamber to order, at Globe '94 this agreement was noted by environmentalists from around the world who were attending the trade show. Speakers stressed that the environmental side agreements negotiated under NAFTA will be viewed as the floor for any future international trade agreements.

The next phase in the evolution of free trade will likely be the Americas free trade agreement, which is attracting interest from Chile and Argentina. Undoubtedly, these are the kinds of measures that would be included in future agreements of this sort.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Molgat, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION OF LUTHERAN CONGREGATIONS— BILL TO INCORPORATE—SECOND READING

Hon. H.A. Olson moved the second reading of Bill S-5, to incorporate the Canadian Association of Lutheran Congregations.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-5 is a bill to incorporate the Canadian Association of Lutheran Congregations, which I believe will have its head office in Kamloops, British Columbia.

Lutheranism in Canada has a long and honourable tradition. The first Lutheran service was conducted in 1619 by Chaplain Rasmus Jensen at Port Churchill, Manitoba, as part of Jens Munck's expedition. The first Lutheran congregation was organized in Halifax in 1752. Lutherans have made a valuable contribution to the cultural heritage of Canadians and, currently, Lutherans in Canada form the fourth largest Christian church.

It is as a part of this proud tradition in Canada that the Canadian Association of Lutheran Congregations seeks incorporation. This association was organized in October of 1992 and currently has functioned as an unincorporated, non-profit association of congregations and individuals. Currently there are over 1,000 persons throughout the three western provinces and six congregations in the association and the organization.

The organization is intended to have two functions. First, it will act as a denomination for congregations who wish to join. As well, there may be associate members — either persons or congregations — who agree with the goals, aims and theology of the association. The association seeks to return to Lutheran roots, with its emphasis on scripture, missions and Lutheran theology.

Honourable senators, I have looked over the bill. I do not pretend to be an expert on drafting bills of this nature, but I have checked with the Law Clerks of the Senate, and I am told that this bill is in the usual form. There is no deviation from these types of bills, which are brought forward from time to time for the incorporation of an organization. I therefore urge senators to give this bill favourable consideration.

Honourable senators, if Bill S-5 receives second reading, I will move that it be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for further study.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, on this issue, I am afraid I have the same objections as I had with respect to the Dai al-Mutlaq.

•(1530)

I do not think the Senate should be in the business of giving charters to religious organizations. If this were Anglican, and I am Anglican, I would object to it. If this were Greek Orthodox, and I used to be Greek Orthodox, I would object to it. I think we should get out of this business. They can operate without federal charters. This is an issue which has arisen before. Can we please get rid of it? It does not make sense to deal with matters such as this.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Olson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

HUMAN RIGHTS

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, February 10, 1994:

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing a Standing Senate Committee on Human Rights.

She said: Honourable senators, over the past three decades, Canada has paid increasing attention to human rights issues both at home and on the international stage. The sheer weight of this agenda is now staggering, and Canada is faced with the urgent task of responding to a growing number of complex and delicate questions. As a result, there is a need greater than ever to study, monitor, research and debate human rights issues. Parliament will undoubtedly play an important role in this process, and the Senate's contribution is vitally important.

Canada is known worldwide for its commitment to human rights and the quality of its democratic institutions. Over the years, a solid democratic foundation has been built upon, so that today a wide range of mechanisms exists for the cultivation and protection of human rights. Every province, for example, has a human rights code, and since 1977, Canada has had a federal Human Rights Act and a permanent Human Rights Commission. As well, human rights are guaranteed in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and enforceable in the Supreme Court of Canada.

However, the benefits that accrue from the human rights mechanisms and legislation are not always immediately apparent in everyday life. The real challenge is to find practical and imaginative ways to fulfil the promises of high-sounding declarations. This is not always a simple task. Although Canada may not suffer the same degree of rights tragedies as Bosnia, Rwanda or Somalia, inequities still exist, and they must be addressed.

Demographic and social change is sweeping across Canada, and it brings with it serious implications for human rights. Changing patterns in immigration and the flow of refugees are transforming the face of Canada. Canadian multiculturalism may very well be at a crossroad.

There is a growing anxiety about the impact of the present economic upheaval on structures, programs and services, the attention now shifting to the discussion of socio-economic rights as well as political and civil rights. There is also a question about the democratic process as it functions in Canada.

There are a number of other pressing issues on Canada's human rights agenda. These include aboriginal grievances, the rights of the disabled, equal status for women, the rights of children, the criminal justice system, the elderly, privacy and information, the environment, and language and culture. The list is long, and not necessarily in order of priority.

Among some of the groups associated with these issues, the high hopes raised by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms have begun to fade. In the Annual Report of the Human Rights Commission for 1993, it is suggested that there have been few substantive accomplishments in the Canadian human rights field in recent years. We have a good record in Canada, and we should be building on it, not allowing it to rust. Such sentiments are becoming more common, suggesting that it is perhaps time to forge new strategies and approaches. It has been recommended, for example, that the rules of compliance be reinforced, human rights criteria be broadened, and monitoring and implementing mechanisms be improved.

Clearly, the human rights agenda in Canada is entering a critical phase. We face a vast and growing array of difficult issues. As Max Yalden, Chief Commissioner of the Human Rights Commission, has remarked, we should:

> ...redouble our efforts, precisely because we are the fortunate ones and have so much to cherish and defend.

The international promotion of human rights has become a fundamental and integral part of Canadian foreign policy. Given Canada's own interests and values, this should come as no surprise. At the heart of Canadian policy is the belief that all governments have a legal and moral obligation to promote and protect universally recognized human rights and fundamental freedoms for their citizens. Canada's aim is to bring effective and constructive influence to bear on governments for the respect of international human rights standards in order to create a more peaceful and prosperous world.

Canada actively promotes human rights in the developing world and the new democracies of central and eastern Europe by sponsoring hundreds of individual projects in support of human rights, and in assisting the activities of NGOs. It also works closely with the United Nations and other regional organizations. Canada has signed and assisted in drafting a number of international declarations and covenants, including the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and a plethora of other agreements and instruments covering torture, the rights of the child, race discrimination, and discrimination against women.

Despite the efforts of Canada and the international community at large, however, events over the past five years — for example, the collapse of the Soviet bloc, the global upsurge in nationalism and tribalism, the bloodshed of Tiananmen Square, the end of apartheid in South Africa — suggest that the promotion of international human rights has entered perhaps its most difficult period since the Second World War. The world has become increasingly hostile and unpredictable, and protecting a new generation of human rights has become more complex and challenging as a result.

As Pierre Sane, Secretary-General of Amnesty International, recently pointed out in an address to the London School of Economics:

> The sad truth is that 45 years after the Declaration on Human Rights was written, the world has singularly failed to meet the hopes it raised. Far from accountable democracies, we see the horror of civil war and governments resorting to old methods of oppression... Far from prosperity, we see even more people plunged into poverty, sickness and despair. Far from international cooperation, we see the world community floundering in the face of human rights disasters.

Developing a strategy to confront this deplorable state of affairs continues to perplex Canada and the rest of the world. Human rights issues have only recently appeared, relatively speaking, on the international agenda, and governments, international organizations and NGOs are still struggling to define possible policy approaches in such a volatile and sensitive field.

Opinions differ as to how forceful the global community should be in trying to give effect to international principles and standards. Considerable controversy continues to surround such issues as state sovereignty, the tying of development assistance and trade to human rights, the nature of western liberal values and their relevance to other cultures, and the importance of socio-economic rights compared to political and civil rights. The questions outnumber the answers by a considerable margin.

However, in the wake of last year's World Conference on Human Rights held in Vienna, the time is perhaps right to fashion a new international consensus and redefine present human rights strategy. As Pierre Sane has remarked:

> We need new ideas, new thinking. The world is changing rapidly. The old methods and concepts are proving incapable of responding to our needs.

There are numerous options, honourable senators. For example, one can argue that there is a desperate need to strengthen the extensive network of international mechanisms that deal with human rights. The international standards have been set, but there are too many loopholes. Another key will be education. Again, Sane has remarked that "information is the lifeblood of the human rights movement." Informed debate and discussion aimed at educating the public and generating new ideas and concepts will be crucial.

As in the case of Canada's own human rights situation, the promotion of international human rights is facing major challenges on a variety of fronts. Canada clearly has a role to play in confronting some of the problems at hand and helping to redefine the international community's approach. Its stature in the world and its well-known respect for human rights suggests a natural fit in the process of revitalizing the concept of human rights protection.

With the recent political challenges, the globalization of trade, the instant communication networks and with new technologies, the line between domestic and foreign policy is increasingly blurred, if not extinct altogether. We can no longer formulate foreign policy as distinct from domestic policies. Our citizens and the world community are demanding this consistency in the field of human rights. The creation of a Senate human rights committee that focuses on international as well as domestic concerns could be an important step in this direction.

A standing Senate committee on human rights could make a difference because of the special place of the Canadian Senate in our political process. The Senate is uniquely able to bring to bear upon the issues of the day a perspective combining political awareness and experience with a degree of detachment from the partisan pressures and strenuous demands of advocacy groups. Sir John A. Macdonald expressed this well when speaking of the Senate, during the confederation debates, as a place having "the sober second thought in legislation."

Senate committees over the years have added important shades of meaning to Macdonald's phrase. Senate studies have amply provided the balanced reconsideration of issues which the phrase "sober second thought" brings to mind. However, the best work of Senate committees, such as the ground-breaking work on poverty issues led by Senator Croll in the seventies, has done much more than this. Senate committees have identified and defined issues, rather than responding to newspaper headlines. A Senate committee on human rights could thus bring a valuable dimension to the parliamentary consideration of these issues.

There remains a need for thoughtful attention to the whole range of rights, including social and economic rights recognized in international human rights declarations and charters, and for attention to the continuing process in which perceptions of fundamental needs lead us to acknowledge human rights.

Senate committees have taken the time to view issues in their full historical and social context, and to consider long-term implications as well as immediate consequences. That is why Senate committee work in areas such as the Constitution, international relations, foreign affairs and social policy continues to be read and used in these policy fields.

A central challenge in the area of human rights is precisely to deal with individual issues in the full complexity of their historical and social context, and to recognize the problems posed by the implementation of universal standards in a world of cultural pluralism. Studies in human rights need this dimension. Without it, there is a real danger of their becoming, at best, naive "do-gooderism."

Issues are emerging which need discussing in the framework of policy-making, raising some of the deep social and cultural challenges that confront contemporary human rights beliefs and actions from the local to the global level. These are the sorts of concerns which lie below the surface of the passing newspaper headlines, and to which a great deal of sober second thought could usefully be directed as societies attempt to come to terms with the issues of violence, civil breakdown and humanitarian duties, beyond the rhetoric of human rights.

The Hon. the Speaker: I apologize for interrupting the honourable senator. Perhaps, with leave, she might be given the opportunity to conclude her remarks. Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Andreychuk: Thank you, honourable senators, for being riveted to your seats. I appreciate that. I have only a little further to go.

May I refer to three examples of this new dimension. First, Jean Bethke Elshtain's Massey lectures, entitled "Democracy on Trial" focuses in one chapter on the danger of making human rights-based politics into something that is excessively juridical, tending to be highly individualistic, adversarial and zero-sum, rather than grounding it in the painstaking work of socializing, educating and building democratically to achieve a human rights culture that is civic-minded and socially responsible. Is she right?

Elshtain argues that what is needed is a:

> ...return to a more thoroughly social understanding of rights: rights are always transitive; they always involve us with others. Rights cannot stand alone... Yet each time we feel called upon to justify something politically, the tendency is to make our concerns far more individualistic and asocial than they, in fact, are.

Another example is the need to explore "human rights and cultural relativism." When we try to apply "universal" human rights values and standards of civilized behaviour, as we have come to understand them in our society, to other peoples who may have very different histories and cultural references, we are often accused of forcing our values. As R.J. Vincent said in his article published in the Royal Institute of International Affairs:

> However true it is that we all tend to devolve upon our own worlds the responsibility of being in the right against others, this is not a reason to withdraw from moral argument in world politics altogether. Otherwise, the argument for human fallibility would beggar every enterprise. At the same time, we have to recognize that conceptions of human rights do vary with culture, and that this is something that has to be taken into account in the making of policy. The problem is to find a balance between insistence on the human rights that everyone ought to enjoy, by virtue of their humanity, and the recognition that the existence, content and importance of these rights is contested.
> The response suggests that it is the duty of governments — supposing that they act for societies — to act when they are sure — not absolutely certain, which is impossible — of being right, and that it is not conscientiousness but cowardice to shrink from acting on their opinions.

Is he right?

A third example can be simply stated as the need to address environmental issues in relation to human rights issues.

If it is accepted that the Senate is suited to making a distinctive contribution in the area of human rights, it may still be asked whether a standing committee is the best mechanism for this. The obvious alternative would be some form of informal working group or task force which could promote a human rights perspective within standing committees which already exist. In comparison to this alternative, a standing committee on human rights has several important advantages.

First, the creation of a standing committee on human rights would enhance the consistency of attention in the Senate to this area, and create an environment which would foster the development of substantive policy expertise. Within the contemporary policy process, real influence requires a genuine knowledge base. In contrast, the more transitory attention likely to be given to human rights in committees not specifically mandated in this area creates serious barriers to significant knowledge and significant impact.

If it is recognized that a standing committee would be the most effective mechanism, then the decision about creating one comes down to a question of priorities. In the case of human rights, the Senate has the opportunity to send a signal about its collective priorities, about the unconditional need for a human rights perspective in modern policy-making. The establishment of such a committee, in and of itself, would be a valuable contribution. It is one that can be made immediately.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Budget Joint Committee on Scrutiny), presented in the Senate on March 24, 1994.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: I move the adoption of this report, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CROWN LIABILITY AND PROCEEDINGS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—BILL WITHDRAWN FROM LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE AND REFERRED TO FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move:

> That Bill C-4 be withdrawn from the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By way of explanation, it might well be appropriate for this bill to be referred to the Standing Senate of Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs as it is a very technical bill. However, since it deals with side agreements to NAFTA, which is a matter that has been studied by our Foreign Affairs Committee, that committee is prepared to deal with the bill. In fact, the committee has made some preparations to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

VETERANS AFFAIRS

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, April 26, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the progress in planning for the commemoration of the 50th anniversary of D-day by the Government of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, just six weeks from now, on June 6, we will be marking the fiftieth anniversary of what is probably the most significant event ever in Canadian military history. I refer, of course, to the invasion of Nazi-occupied Europe on the Normandy beaches, in which Canadian soldiers, sailors and airmen played a significant role.

Our Canadian troops fought the ensuing victorious campaign and helped to conquer the German war machine. By May 1945 we had 250,000 Canadians in arms in Europe when peace came.

It was only six months ago, in November of 1993, that the Canada Remembers Program was launched, and a coordinating committee composed of officials from various departments of government became deeply immersed in planning a series of historic events to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of World War II, highlighted, of course, by the D-day landings.

Honourable senators may recall that I raised this matter in the Senate on June 23, 1993, almost a year ago, at which time I promised a progress report. While I have been remiss in not having done so earlier, I am pleased to do so today, and to address some of the issues which should be placed on the record in order to pay tribute to those involved, and to convey what I feel is an omission in the planning which I hope can still be included.

First, it should be clearly understood that our allies of that day — the British, the Americans and the French — have long been going all out to celebrate the anniversary of D-day. Their plans are extensive and will surely have considerable impact, as they have in the past. Canada's role in that massive and historic series of events of half a century ago will have to be recalled with imagination and vigour if our story is not to be lost amid British, American and French efforts. This must not be allowed to happen.

As a matter of fact, in recent days the British media revealed the displeasure of their veterans' representation in the ceremonies being planned there.

I have to confess that initially it was difficult for me to understand why the Canadian effort was so slow to get moving. There still seems to be a certain reluctance to invest appropriate effort alongside our allies. While our plans are now under way, they certainly do not yet have the scope and momentum of those of our allies. Only a few short weeks remain until the anniversary, and much yet remains to be done.

While our plans may seem adequate to the telling of our story, they show a certain shyness on Canada's part. This reticence is certainly not at all warranted considering the contribution Canada made half a century ago when, even with our much smaller population, we were the third largest contingent on the Normandy beaches on D-day. Some finishing touches need to be made to secure our place amid the throng of allied initiatives, and these touches can still be put in place. The hard-working committee can do it despite the lateness of the hour, just as Canadian soldiers did on the Normandy beaches. I will give the Senate an example of this to demonstrate the need for further action by the Department of Veterans Affairs and DND which must be taken now.

It was proposed in many letters that I received from veterans that a component of the 200-person commemorative guard of honour we will be sending to Normandy be clad in the uniforms and equipment of that day, to bring to life and symbolize the sacrifice of our troops 50 years ago. This would allow a realistic staging reenactment of the landing on D-day. All of our allies are making use of this device in their plans. Thus far, there seems to be a certain reluctance on our part to do this, and thereby potentially missing valuable media photo opportunities for both print and television. Canadians clad in the uniform of yesterday to match those of our allies would be a valuable communications asset, gaining that media coverage at home and abroad for Canada which has been sadly lacking in past ceremonies.

I am pleased to report that the responsible minister, the Secretary of State for Veterans Affairs, Mr. MacAulay, appears to favour this course of action in the D-day celebrations both at home and abroad. However, the minister's committee appears to remain reluctant, giving us as their reason that vintage uniforms, accoutrements and weapons are no longer held by DND, nor available elsewhere.

Some officials claim that it is too late to make any changes to their program. This assertion on availability and timing is not correct. A firm in Canada has in stock some 300 sets of Canadian battledress, webbing, harnesses and rifles of the period which would more than furnish the proposed component of the guard we are sending to Juno Beach on June 6, as well as the guard that will attend those events being staged here at home. It is not true to say that uniforms and accoutrements are not available. The uniforms that I mentioned were used in the recent CBC film on Dieppe.

This firm is ready to work with the Department of National Defence and Veterans Affairs to equip our Canadian representation in France on the fiftieth anniversary, as well as events here at home. Particulars have been furnished to the minister and his people of this source, which can easily and quickly be tapped to make our efforts more media-worthy, and more in keeping with what our allies are doing. Therefore, I am hopeful that the minister will now give instructions that this equipment be made a part of our effort in Normandy on June 6, 1994. This will diminish the notion that Canada's part in the Normandy invasion was invisible or not significant, and it will win us good exposure alongside our allies.

As for planned events at home, the preparations are very promising and worthy of praise. The Canadian War Museum is planning a remarkable effort in Ottawa on the weekend preceding the anniversary, including period-uniformed reenactors, displays of vintage military vehicles, and many other imaginative elements. I am sure many senators have seen the various programs.

Overall, the Canadian War Museum is to be warmly congratulated for its outstanding efforts, which will greatly enhance our D-day plans for the national capital. In turn, this will generate more media coverage here at home, and bring the message of D-day to a large audience of Canadians who were not alive 50 years ago. Thus Canadians will learn of the gallantry of their forbears in a way that will challenge the history books, which have largely downplayed or neglected their role.

A unique and impressive event will be staged by the Battle of Normandy Foundation, in which Senator Molgat will be playing a leading role in the dedication of a memorial garden at the Caen Museum in France. I hope that Senator Molgat will want to elaborate on this ceremony when the opportunity arises.

Best of all, many local events in Canada are being organized to remember D-day, mainly by the militia descendants of the 15 Canadian armoured and infantry regiments and specialized corps which actually landed in Normandy on D-day. Most of these units still exist as reserves or militia in the order of battle, and they proudly carry the rare battle honour "Normandy Landing" on their regimental colours today. The enthusiasm to mark D-day across Canada is very heartening and is considerable.

A number of these historic D-Day regiments are sending delegations to revisit Juno Beach on June 6 to further enhance the Canadian presence there. Also, many individual veterans are travelling to Normandy, having made their own arrangements, for example by various cruises and other means of transportation.

The Royal Canadian Legion will be honouring D-day/Normandy veterans in their own communities here in Canada with special dinners, video recordings of veterans' memories of the events of 1944, and the like. As well, they will be encouraging D-day Normandy veterans in their branches and communities to participate as individuals in the national "Canada Remembers" celebrations, and encouraging legionnaires in the branches to participate in the "Adopt a Vet" program sponsored by the Canadian War Museum by opening their personal homes to visiting veterans. Many other veterans associations are planning their own events, which will be worthy of wide participation.

Honourable senators, these are just some of the efforts that Canada will be making this year, led by our Governor General, the Right Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn and our Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Jean Chrétien, to mark the part that Canadians played on the beaches of Normandy on June 6, 1944. It would therefore be unfortunate if we failed to put the finishing touches to our plans, such as having a component of World War II Canadian-uniformed participants to evoke that day, and symbolize our efforts then.

Honourable senators, the proud memory of D-day can enhance national unity and national identity both abroad and at home, and would give Canadians a sense of who they once were on the world stage. We should spare no reasonable effort to bring this about.

As one Canadian who landed on that beach on D-day, I will be very proud. I am sure that Senator Jessiman, who I understand was also on the flotillas on D-day, would also be proud to remember our Canadian troops and soldiers, and how they played their part in that great event fifty years ago.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I want to take a few minutes to commend Senator Marshall. D-day is very personal to me. I was not there, but I had a brother who was killed in action at that battle. Every time D-day is mentioned, I am reminded of the effect that that day had on my family, because I had other brothers who were also involved. The whole community where I came from was affected. I doubt that any other community was as affected because of the North Shore contingent that was provided per capita, as many people from my community had friends and relatives who were there.

The suggestion that Senator Marshall makes with respect to the uniforms is a good one. I hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will listen to it, and will use her influence so that the changes suggested by Senator Marshall can be made. I do not know if the Leader of the Government was present in the chamber when Senator Marshall put those forward, but if not, your deputy leader will be able to inform you. This is a worthy suggestion and is one that I should like to see implemented.

Publicly, from that day on, especially after my brother was killed, I became a real peacemaker. I do not have much use for wars, guns, or anything that can kill people. Once again, I want to commend Senator Marshall for his effort.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN HANDLING CAPACITY OF PORTS OF VANCOUVER AND PRINCE RUPERT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H.A. Olson rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, April 26, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the grain handling capacity of the Ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert and ask the Senate to consider establishing a Parliamentary committee to ascertain the factors related to increasing the amount going through the elevators on to the ships for our export customers.

He said: Honourable senators, I want to take a few minutes to draw to the attention of senators a rather serious situation that has developed on the West Coast with respect to loading grain on the ships that are there. For your background information, I should tell you that I went to Vancouver about three weeks ago to attend the twenty-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Canada Grains Council.

While we were in Vancouver, the Port Authority took us on about a three-hour boat tour of the harbour. There were 41 ocean-going ships in the harbour waiting to be loaded. Obviously, from wherever our customers are, somebody had ordered those ships into port. Apart from that, and I am not sure of the exact number, I saw about four unoccupied berths where the ships can line up at the grain elevators. Furthermore, honourable senators, although this was late in the afternoon on the weekend, nobody was working there. We were very concerned about that, and looked into it somewhat more closely.

The second point I want to make, honourable senators, is that the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board has studied this situation and has sent a request to the government of Canada to set up an inquiry under the Inquiries Act to look into the matter. The Advisory Committee wants the government to establish the facts respecting why we are unable to meet the commitments that we have made for sales through both the Port of Vancouver and the Port of Prince Rupert.

I am not the only person who is concerned. Indeed, the Canada Grains Council passed a resolution on the Wednesday of that week and forwarded it to the government, asking it also to set up an inquiry of some kind to establish the facts with respect to why there was not full utilization of the Ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert. There were certainly enough sales and, indeed, there was a large number of railway cars filled with Canadian grain either on the side tracks in the harbour or on the various side tracks from Vancouver going back a long, long distance. In fact, a senior officer of the CNR told me that they had full cars of grain on the side tracks in the harbour, and backed up all the way to Edmonton. She did not say that they were completely full, but there were cars there.

I do not know how much information to try to give you here. I have received, because I have asked for them, reports from many different organizations that are intimately involved in the grain business. The Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board is one, the Canada Grain Council is another one. I have a file here full of reports, one from the CPR, another from the CNR, and several others. They are similar, but they are not the same insofar as establishing why we are not going at full speed.

I think you need to know the facts. That is why I draw your attention in this motion, honourable senators, to the issue of the handling capacity at these ports, and that is why I ask the Senate to consider establishing a parliamentary committee to ascertain the means of increasing the amount of grain going through these elevators and on to the ships.

I do not speak for the government; I want to be clear about that. The government could respond by setting up an inquiry either under the Inquiries Act or by way of a royal commission. However, I believe that kind of inquiry would take a much longer time to get at the facts than a Senate committee would, and it would be far more expensive. I cannot remember any inquiry that was set up that did not cost several million dollars. I should not say anything about lawyers today, but they manage to make such things fairly expensive before they are finished.

Besides all of that, I think there is, not a partisan political element but I think there are some human or political differences among some of the people involved about which a committee of the Senate could inquire. Such a committee would probably be a whole lot better equipped to deal with these issues than a royal commission. I hope that honourable senators will give my proposal favourable consideration.

Behind all of these issues there are some very clear reasons why all of these events occurred. For example, last year there were abnormal weather conditions in the United States. You will remember the severe flooding. There were some U.S. forecasts for rail car requirements which proved to be absolutely inaccurate and, consequently, not enough cars were available for lease, as we used to do. Then severe flooding in Mississippi, for example, disrupted barge traffic, and there was an increased demand for more rail cars to the United States. There was another problem with local drought in some feed-producing areas of the United States, increasing the need for rail cars to move feed grain from alternate sources to the deficient areas. All of these events contributed to the demand for a higher level of output.

There have been substantial increases in the Canadian export of grain to the United States. You will know we are having difficulty with some farm organizations, and with some senators from the mid-west in the United States, and so on. How much of it is rhetoric and how much is political partisanship for whatever purposes, they understand that as well as we do. However, the fact is that there are some problems there, and we will be dealing with that situation.

There was another factor that slowed down this process, and that was the West Coast longshoremen's strike which went on from January 29 to February 9. You will remember that, at that time, we dealt with that back-to-work bill in this house.

I just want to lay those things on the table, too, because I do not want people to think the situation is something completely abnormal. In addition to all of this, we had a much longer and colder winter than normal. That is always a problem. It slows down the amount of grain going through the mountains and the various places to be loaded on to the trains, and then into the ships at the coast. Some people have estimated that the cold weather alone resulted in a backlog of at least 1 million tonnes, and that the strike has contributed to a backup of anywhere from 500,000 tonnes to 1 million tonnes.

Honourable senators, we need to know the problem. Let me give an example of the volume of grain "unloads" for one day, April 25, 1994. In three shifts they unloaded 1,039 cars, with an 80-tonne car average. According to the numbers, on that day they unloaded 83,120 tonnes of grain from the rail cars into the terminal elevators. At the same time there were eight vessels loading in Vancouver and Prince Rupert. They took on 240,000 tonnes that week, but another 558,768 tonnes of shipping were waiting to be loaded. We have a backlog of ships waiting with a total capacity of about 1,200,000 tonnes, and new ships are arriving daily.

I do not want to spend a lot of time on all this background but when the port is shut down from Friday afternoon at five o'clock until Monday morning at eight o'clock, two full days, it probably amounts to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 170,000 tonnes that have gone unloaded.

There may be a reason. Perhaps the union has a legitimate reason why they have not responded to the requests for overtime. It may also be that the elevator companies responsible for putting on additional shifts, overtime and so on, have a reason why they are not doing so.

Senator Berntson: Let's find out.

Senator Olson: I agree. The only way to find out is to go out there in a neutral way, not taking one side or the other, and ask them to tell us what they think is the problem. I have dealt in these matters before. Always when you ask this question, for example, of the railways, they will say, "We can't haul any more; we need a few more cars." That has been going on for at least 30 years. The CN fleet has 17,000 cars now. CP has around 14,000 cars, and they rent or lease another 1,000 cars from the United States. Probably another 2,000 cars will be coming off the fertilizer and potash hauls in Saskatchewan, and will be available in June. The Vice-President of CNR, a lady, asked, "What would more cars do for you? You would have more loaded cars sitting on the sidings, that's all." We already have enough cars to fill the yard in Vancouver, and the sidings all the way back to Edmonton. She was not of the opinion that the problem was the shortage of rail cars. Maybe we do need a few thousand more cars. Certainly we do need to find out what is wrong.

If honourable senators agree that the problem is serious enough that we should consider sending a Senate committee out to look at this matter and to establish the facts, we could probably do the whole job in about six or eight weeks, perhaps a little less. We need to have a meeting in Vancouver, Prince Rupert and in Winnipeg, the heart of the grain industry where the Canadian Wheat Board and a lot of other grain agencies are located. I think it would be useful to have meetings in Regina and Calgary or Edmonton.

Senator Fairbairn: Lethbridge.

Senator Olson: We could have one in Lethbridge.

The Hon. the Speaker: I apologize for interrupting the honourable senator, but his time has elapsed. Perhaps he is approaching his conclusion.

Senator Olson: I made up my mind that I would not go over today. I have discussed the matter with Senator Fairbairn from Lethbridge, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and she has indicated to me that she thinks this is something we could usefully do. I have discussed it with the Prime Minister. He believes it is a far better way of establishing and dealing with the facts than a royal commission. He agrees that it will take less time and will be less expensive.

I will talk to the Honourable Ralph Goodale when he gets back from his sales promotion trip to Asia. Perhaps it will take about four weeks to mobilize the committee after the Senate agrees. All of the arrangements will have to be made. We are obliged to advertise the various public hearings of the committee for about 14 days, and then we need a little money to travel and rent some rooms.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There is a big office in Calgary for you.

Senator Olson: We cannot have all the meetings in Calgary, that is the problem.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Ah shucks.

Senator Olson: "Ah shucks" is right. We will have to arrange for translation, which is necessary for all official committees, no matter where they are. I have done some preliminary figuring and such a committee would probably cost something in the order of $250,000.

In any event, I wish to thank honourable senators for giving me some extra time to make my submissions. I hope you will seriously consider the proposal because I think it would be of great service to the people in the grain industry on the coast. We are losing sales. Some of our customers need the wheat now for their food system. China told the Honourable Ralph Goodale that they are getting short, and if we do not fill the ships and send them there, they will have to go somewhere else to get the wheat they need.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I want to speak briefly in support of Senator Olson's proposal to the Senate. We are talking about competition and jobs. Since I am from the West Coast, though born in Manitoba in the same area as Senator Molgat, I feel the issue is a pre-eminent one at this particular time for the economy of Western Canada. As a British Columbian I can tell you that the ports of Tacoma and Seattle are sitting waiting for us to drop the ball. If we take the initiative as senators — and I agree with the proposition that Senator Olson has put forward with regard to holding a Senate hearing as opposed to a royal commission; it is more cost efficient — we can bring to bear the neutrality that is required on this issue.

I certainly do not want to prejudge matters. We should go there in a neutral state of mind so that we can come forward with constructive recommendations. Senator Gustafson and Senator Berntson from the great province of Saskatchewan realize that we have to get that grain moving, because it is a lifeline for some countries. They are our best customers. If we fail to satisfy our customer base, we will eventually lose out in the long haul.

I, too, urge serious consideration of this request, and I look forward to doing whatever has to be done to meet this urgent requirement. Therefore, honourable senators, if I may be so brash, to begin with I would move the adjournment.

On motion of Senator St. Germain, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS

Hon. Eileen Rossiter, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, April 27, 1994 moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries be authorized to examine and report upon the Annual Report of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, tabled in the Senate on March 23, 1993 (Sessional Paper No. 343-906) and other matters relating to the fishing industry; and

That the committee present its final report to the Senate no later than June 29, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, again I have the general concern when we say "other matters relating to the fishing industry" that it is a pretty wide net, if I may use that expression. Perhaps the honourable senator might give us an idea of what other things she may have in mind, because those words could cover virtually anything.

Senator Rossiter: Honourable senators, I am sure that I do not have to explain to the Honourable Senator Molgat the complexity of the issues which are facing the fishery, both on the East Coast and on the West Coast.

We would like to be able to look at the new strategy for the Atlantic groundfish fishery. Recently there have been representations about the individual transferable quotas, which is a problem on both oceans. We do not plan on travelling. The first report was tabled on February 22 for our expenses last year. I do not imagine that we will incur much greater expenses this year. The main expense will be for witnesses.

The members of the committee feel that a broad reference will give them the ability to move without having to return to the Senate. However, we do not anticipate travelling.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as a matter of curiosity, perhaps the honourable senator could explain why we are examining the annual report ending March 31, 1991. Is there not a more recent and relevant report?

Senator Rossiter: Honourable senators, as far as I know, that is the last report that has been tabled. The honourable senator will notice that the date of tabling is 1993, and I do not think another report has been tabled yet. Government reports tend to be a little out of date.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 10, 1994, at 2 p.m.

THE HONOURABLE SOLANGE CHAPUT-ROLLAND

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, today I have the privilege of paying tribute to one of our most respected colleagues, the Honourable Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland, who in a few days from now will reach the fullness of senatorial age.

As the Leader of the Opposition in this House, I want to take this opportunity, first of all, to mention the clear-headed and enlightened loyalty of Solange to the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, which she has represented in the Senate and elsewhere with dignity and determination since her appointment on September 28, 1988.

Speaking on behalf of all members of the political party I have the honour to represent in this precinct, I want to thank her most sincerely for doing so.

We will always remember the enthusiasm and generosity with which Solange supported the previous government's efforts to give Canadians a Constitution that would have reflected the true nature of our country and clarified the relations between our two major levels of government.

On open line shows, in editorial columns, in speeches, and while travelling across this country she came to know and love in all its splendour and diversity, she was tireless in urging us to see everything that unites us as Canadians before exploring everything that could divide us as a country.

This political commitment was not rooted in partisan considerations. It was the logical outcome of a career and a life pervaded by a passion to persuade and by her love of this country.

Both inside and outside this house, Solange often condemned the narrow, partisan mind-set that debases parliamentary proceedings.

Solange's real party is Canada, and her politics are the politics of unity.

When she came to this house, on the recommendation of Premier Bourassa and accepted by Prime Minister Mulroney, Solange had served in the National Assembly as a member of the Liberal Party of Quebec and had generously contributed her time to the 1980 referendum campaign.

A few years earlier she had served diligently with the Pepin-Robarts commission, set up by Prime Minister Trudeau to study the renewal of the Canadian federation. Unfortunately, Mr. Trudeau had only a passing interest in the report of that commission, which he felt obliged to create after the election of a sovereignist government in Quebec.

For less resilient persons, this experience would have produced a general aversion to constitutional matters and maybe some doubts about politics. However, it is in adversity that you recognize strength of spirit. Even after the unilateral patriation of the Constitution by Mr. Trudeau in 1982 and despite understandable frustration, Solange never gave up on her dream to see, one day, Canada achieve its constitutional unity.

Like four other colleagues, Senator Poitras, who has retired, and Senators Bolduc, Beaudoin and Ottenheimer, Solange was appointed to the Senate under provisions which were part of the Meech Lake Accord. The mode of selection of these persons, who had special qualities that made them worthy of this honour, symbolized the hope that, once Meech was ratified, this institution would be vested with a new prestige and a new effectiveness.

Solange never abandoned that hope and when, not long ago, a disgraceful incident occurred in this house that discredited it in the eyes of many Canadians, few senators were as distraught as the senator who is leaving today. It seems to me that her distress was as much due to her personal dignity as to the high regard she had for our responsibilities as parliamentarians. I am sure that all members of this house, including my friends opposite, will acknowledge the deep respect that Solange always showed toward this institution.

Like all of those who have nothing but respect and admiration for Solange's career, I was delighted to learn that the Royal Military College in St-Jean will award her, on Friday, an honourary doctorate in recognition of her dedication to bilingualism and national unity. I am sure all our colleagues will want to congratulate her.

[English]

As she prepares to leave this chamber, Solange continues to be resolutely modern in her outlook on public affairs. She has introduced a new genre into Canadian political literature. As far back as 1963, she published a first exchange of letters, between herself and Gwethalyn Graham, in which she candidly and forcefully expressed her hope for a better understanding between Canadians of different linguistic backgrounds. More recently, another published exchange of letters — this time between herself and our honourable colleague Brenda Robertson — dealt with her experiences in the Senate, but contained many more impassioned passages on the importance and urgency of establishing better relations between our two official linguistic families.

In her own right, Solange has published more than 10 other books, most of which deal with Quebec nationalism and Canadian unity, and she has recently embarked, with equal success, on a new career as a novelist.

Of her remarkable career as a public affairs commentator, author and public figure, I am convinced most Canadians will retain the image of a spunky woman from Quebec who, over a period of more than 40 years, has deployed all her charm, her wit and her convictions to try and bring Canadians together.

Passionately interested in constitutional and linguistic issues, Solange saw these, first and foremost, not as abstract or arcane matters but as the expression of the necessary compromises that we have to make as individuals to enhance our Canadian citizenship.

Today, the Senate bids farewell to a distinguished and committed colleague who contributed much to our deliberations through her personal grace and the strength of her convictions. We also salute a proud Quebecer and a passionate Canadian.

[Translation]

As much as we regret losing such a respected and regarded colleague, I suspect hundreds of people of all ages and all walks of life whom she has honoured with her friendship over the years will be filled with more happiness than sadness at seeing Solange leave her seat in the Senate, as she highly deserves to enjoy to the fullest, and it is high time that she does, the affection and respect that her family and friends will have the chance of showing her more often from now on.

We thank her two children, Suzanne and Claude, as well as their children for their spirit of self-sacrifice in lending us their mother and grandmother.

As for Solange, we wish her health, happiness and success, as I have no doubt she will continue to amaze us for many years to come.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I, on behalf of my honourable colleagues, pay tribute to Solange Chaput-Rolland, to whom we are bidding farewell today.

[English]

I want to say first that even though we sit on opposite sides of this chamber, and even though we may not always approach every issue from the same perspective, I have always respected the commitment of our colleague Senator Chaput-Rolland to the people of Quebec and to the unity of this country. I wish to thank her personally for her generosity and kindness to me while she has served with us in this chamber.

Her contribution to the search for understanding between our two founding linguistic groups, as my colleague Senator Lynch-Staunton has said, spans several decades. Senator Chaput-Rolland began her career in public life in the 1950s when, I think most people would agree, Quebec was slowly awakening, and she was an outspoken voice for change. Senator Lynch-Staunton referred to her as a "spunky woman from Quebec." I should recall that someone else noted at one point that the honourable senator "is known as a woman who wears her heart and her opinions on her sleeve," and I believe that is true in the best sense.

As an award-winning writer, she has expressed for many years the mood and the spirit of her province in her own unique way. Clearly, hers has been a very full and very busy life. In the mid-fifties she founded the monthly opinion publication Points de Vue, which was produced for several years and which fostered debate and discussion. As was mentioned earlier, she published a series of letters with an English co-author called Chers ennemis/Dear Enemies, which explored the differences and the similarities between English and French in this country.

Solange became an observer at the United Nations. She was an editorialist at station CKAC. She is an Officer of the Order of Canada. She received the Dan McArthur Prize for exceptional quality in radio documentary, and she accepted the chair of the Cercle des femmes journalistes.

In 1974, Solange became a commissioner of the National Capital Commission, and two years later was appointed a member of the Pepin-Robarts Task Force on Canadian Unity, where her forthright commitment to the unity of this country was certainly put to excellent use.

She has also served on the Canada Council. She was named Woman of the Year by B'nai Brith, and in 1979 she became a Liberal member of the National Assembly in the province of Quebec. As was noted, during the 1980 referendum in Quebec she was a vocal spokesperson for the "No" side.

Senator Chaput-Rolland never stopped writing, and with a colleague co-authored Monsieur le ministre, one of the most popular television programs in Quebec. She also continued to receive recognition, including an honorary doctorate from Queen's University and the Ordre national du Québec, presented to her by the late René Lévesque. In 1987, she was named one of the 50 most important women in communications by the International Association of Women Writers and Journalists.

Solange has always been an advocate for the rights of women. She has been active in helping to prevent violence against women, particularly elderly women. She has been an advocate in the search for a cure for epilepsy, and so many other causes close to her heart.

In 1988, Solange became a member of this chamber. Yet she has still found the time to continue her writing and her advocacy, as she always will, for the unity of this country. While here, she has truly been a working senator in this chamber and in its committees, and we will miss her.

[Translation]

I cannot speak highly enough of the remarkable achievements of Solange Chaput-Rolland, who has spent her entire life in the service of Canada. I am sure all my colleagues will join me in wishing her a long and happy retirement.

[English]

Having said that, I cannot believe there will ever be the word "retirement" in the vocabulary of our honourable friend. I extend to her all good wishes.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, the Honourable Solange Chaput-Rolland is leaving the Senate this week, after spending almost six years here. I wish to pay tribute to her.

Before I was appointed to the Pepin-Robarts Commission on Canadian Unity in the summer of 1977, I had read a few articles written by our respected colleague and published in magazines and newspapers, and I knew that she already had some books to her credit; but I did not really know her. It is while serving on the Pepin-Robarts commission that I really got to know her.

Our mandate as commissioners lasted 18 months. Bonds of friendship were created among the commissioners: Jean-Luc Pepin, John Robarts, unfortunately no longer with us, Ronald Watts, Richard Cashin, Muriel Kovitz and Ross Marx, as well as the experts who helped us: Léon Dion, John Meisel, Edward McWhinney, David Cameron, Ralph Heintzman and Robert Décary. It has been fifteen years since we wrote our three reports.

A report on constitutional and political terms is still used in our universities. Although our main report "A Future Together" was indeed a joint effort, it is no exaggeration to say that if Solange Chaput-Rolland had not been there, this report would have been different. Our colleague Solange never made a secret of her unshakeable love for Canada and Quebec, for her country and her "patrie" as she wrote so eloquently. She has not changed. She was subsequently elected as the MNA for Prévost in a by-election in 1979 and held her seat until April 1981. She campaigned vigorously for the "No" side in the Quebec referendum of May 1980.

We met again in the Senate in September 1988, nine years later. We were appointed the same day as senators for Quebec, on September 28, 1988, with Roch Bolduc and Jean-Marie Poitras, by Prime Minister Mulroney on recommendation from Premier Bourassa.

The Honourable Solange Chaput-Rolland has a natural talent for communication and put this talent to good use in the course of her career as a journalist and writer. She campaigned personally for many causes connected with equality and personal freedoms. She truly deserves the many awards she has received.

Thanks to her good services, we in the Senate have often enjoyed a greater measure of understanding on the part of the media, which is no mean feat. Solange Chaput-Rolland came to the Senate to defend certain ideas which took shape in the course of endless discussions when we were preparing the Pepin-Robarts report. The spirit of this report is partly reflected in the Meech Lake Accord. Our colleague was tireless in defending Meech Lake.

Solange Chaput-Rolland has had an abiding interest in bilingualism, an interest that never left her, either before or after her arrival in the Senate.

A great friend of the arts, the written media, radio, television and literature, our esteemed colleague is a living example of what the Senate can contribute to Canadian culture. Each of her speeches bears the hallmark of finesse and elegance. We cannot accuse our colleague of failing to do everything she could to add to the public's knowledge and appreciation of the Upper House.

[English]

For Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland, the Senate is probably too partisan. Is partisanship necessary in an elected house? Many will say "Yes." Is it necessary in an appointed chamber? So far, that has been the case for our Senate. In a way, it is too bad.

The Honourable Solange Chaput-Rolland has been, and is still, in love with Canada. More than once she has written books with authors from English-speaking Canada. She is equally at ease in both languages, and she knows English literature. She has a broad vision of what men and women should accomplish together in our society.

[Translation]

Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland has done us a great honour by spending several years in the Senate. Today she is returning to her first love, literature. We wish her the very best in the pursuit of her wonderful career.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, Mrs. Solange Chaput-Rolland is a great Canadian, a great Quebecer and a great feminist. I have daughters and I thank her.

She is a very sentimental person, and this is a great quality. She is a very friendly person. Spring is always in her eyes, and this is why I hope she will alow me to offer her these few flowers as a way of saying goodbye.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, naturally I want to share in the comments on the details of the extraordinary career of our colleague, Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland.

I also want to touch upon another aspect and situate my comments in a specific context.

[English]

Will Rogers is quoted as saying that the only thing the Vice-President of the United States has to do is to get up in the morning and ask, "How is the President?" I have often thought that what a Canadian Prime Minister must ask when he gets up every morning — and I hope always will — is, "How are things going with the United States, and how are they going with Quebec?"

That is only natural. Any country that has tried the noble experiment in majority-minority relations, as this country has in attempting to keep the northern half of the North American continent unique and Canadian, has to have discovered that it will never be easy. We must continue to work at it, as we have done in the past. In the days of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, when people would stand up at the hearings and ask, "Why can't we all speak just one language?" we would ask, "What will that language be?" and in most cases the answer would be English. Of course, from a certain point of view, what we are trying to do is crazy. It is easier to run a country in one language, but easy is not always best.

I thought, and I suppose with characteristic conceit continue to think, that as a member of the Laurendeau-Dunton commission, I made some contribution towards continuing that noble experiment. But my contribution is dwarfed by the contribution of Solange Chaput-Rolland.

I resist hyperbole. We are running out of hyperbole, because even simple things are now "enormous," or "incredible." We have even reached the point where we are using the word "literally" to mean "not literally" in our desparate search for new hyperbole. It is hard to resist hyperbole when describing the immeasurable role played by Senator Chaput-Rolland in that aspect, let alone other aspects, of Canadian life that is at the very heart of our life as a nation, namely, the relationship between the two linguistic groups.

Even my own modest library boasts four of Senator Chaput-Rolland's books: Dear Enemies; My Country, Canada or Quebec?; Regards, 1969; and Face to Face, her correspondence with our — hers and my — dear friend Gertrude Laing, the picture of both of them on the back, looking a bit young — but then, at the time, so did I.

When I first met Solange and we became friends in the 1960s, I know neither of us dreamed that we would both end up in the Senate of Canada. Certainly, I never thought that we would end up in the Senate of Canada, let alone on opposite sides of the aisle. When she was sworn in, I was sitting where Senator Berntson now sits. Solange came down the aisle with her escort after saluting the Speaker, as we all do, and as she turned to go to the Conservative side, requiring her to turn right, in a stage whisper I said, "Wrong turn, Solange. The Liberals are on this side. Last chance to not turn right." However, she did.

In a friendship especially, it is right and kind to forgive. Politicians sometimes say it is all right to forgive but not necessarily to forget. She never had to forgive me for being a Liberal because I was always one. I had trouble forgiving her for becoming a Conservative, but not in keeping faith with our friendship.

Certainly, as of Saturday of this week, her 75th birthday, I will not only forgive my "chère amie," I will also forget our differences.

Hon. Senators: Hear hear!

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I shall not repeat the significant contribution that Solange has made to our country. It has been well stated, in particular by our leader and by the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

However, I want to say a few things. Those of us who have been on the Hill for a while know that, over the years that we serve here, we make a lot of acquaintances. Those acquaintances are not necessarily friends. Among all of the acquaintances I have made on the Hill in the last 10 years, honourable senators, I count myself extremely fortunate in that I found a friend in Senator Chaput-Rolland.

Each one of us has different experiences to relate about Senator Chaput-Rolland. We all know her commitment to her province and to our country. She is a shining example of what citizenship and leadership is all about. I had the interesting experience of survival — I survived living with Solange for three years. It was most interesting.

Solange is a woman who is very talented. She is emotional; indeed, she is passionate. She is passionate about everything that she does. Nothing is done in half-measures. You know precisely where she stands on any issue, at any time, on any day, and never try to say that she said something different, or that she thought something different because she knows precisely what she thinks and what she has said. She is a great communicator. Dear me, I wish there were more like her. If there were, there would be fewer double messages.

In this survival process we had great fun. It was a delight to make a new friend like Senator Chaput-Rolland, especially at our age. We shared a little apartment. I should like to share with honourable senators a couple of my experiences.

My background is totally different from that of Solange's. One day I said to my secretary, after work, "Here, take some money, run down to Canadian Tire and pick up a vacuum cleaner." It seemed to be sort of a routine request, so after work she went down and picked up a vacuum cleaner. She unpacked it and, in order that I would see it when I got back to the apartment, she put it in the middle of the floor. I had told her, "I don't care what it's like, as long as it works well." I have had a lot of experience with vacuum cleaners in my day, and other modes of cleaning, shall we say.

At any rate, when I got back to the apartment that evening, Solange was there. She was sitting in a chair, waiting for me, with a bottle of champagne or something cooling, and she said, "Is that a vacuum cleaner?" I said, "Yes, it is a vacuum cleaner." She said, "I've never used one." I have friends who have never learned how to ride a horse, or who have never learned how to fly an airplane, but I have never known anyone, especially a female, who had never made the acquaintance of a vacuum cleaner.

My three years with her were just delightful. One never knew what to expect. Once, we had a fire alarm at two in the morning. We were on the tenth floor, and the fire escapes were filled with smoke. The blind were leading the blind after a rather pleasant social evening in the apartment with friends. We had to find our way down a smoke-filled stairwell from the tenth floor. Solange is not the most athletic person, especially when attempting to walk down ten flights of stairs at two in the morning.

In any event, we have had a lot of fun. You can tell a great deal about a person by how he or she is greeted and treated in their own community. It was a pure delight for me to walk with Solange down a street in her home community, observing and listening to the expressions of affection and love that the people on the street extended to her. In my humble opinion, that was a reflection of how the people of Quebec, in particular, feel about Solange. She is absolutely loved. She has made her mark. She has made, and will continue to make, a significant contribution. For Solange, this is just a transitional period that she is going through this week. I certainly look forward to many more good times in Saint-Sauveur.

It has been a great privilege to have you as my friend, Solange, knowing that our friendship will continue. Thank you for all the contributions you have made. You have helped broaden my understanding of your province, as well as my own. You have helped me to understand the differences and the commonalities that we share. With great affection, I look forward to your future accomplishments, my dear. I say thank you so very much. You have enriched my life considerably. Your contribution has been immense. Bonne chance!

Hon. Senators: Hear hear!

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators and my dear colleague Senator Chaput-Rolland, as others before me have done, I would simply like to take this opportunity to recall that Senator Chaput-Rolland arrived in the Senate on the heels of the Meech Lake Accord, which made provision for the future appointment of senators on the recommendation of provincial premiers and with the approval of the Prime Minister of Canada.

I think that this was an excellent formula. Short of electing senators, it ensured at least the best possible provincial representation. While Meech Lake may have been doomed, at least the Senate benefitted because this era was marked by the appointment of Senators Beaudoin, Bolduc and Poitras and, of course, Senator Chaput-Rolland.

When Senator Chaput-Rolland first arrived in the Senate in 1988, she was certainly not expecting the difficult times she encountered. A storm was brewing over drug patents and the GST.

I do not think that Senator Chaput-Rolland took an especially partisan approach to her work. However, as others have said, her goal was always to work to resolve the conflicts affecting our country. She came here to serve both Canada and Quebec as best she could.

If I were asked to single out one characteristic that best describes Senator Chaput-Rolland, I would have to say the quality and consistency of her commitment. In all of the causes she espouses, she takes no half measures and makes no compromises.

Honourable senators will recall the debate on the GST and her efforts to exclude books from the GST. You may also recall the debate on the merger of the Science Council and the Canada Council. She always held fast to her convictions and I think she deserves our gratitude. I cannot remember her ever compromising on her principles.

While Solange may be leaving, I can take comfort in the fact that she will continue working for the cause of Canadian unity. During the 1980 referendum, we worked together in the National Assembly. This was a very hectic time and I came to know Solange quite well.

I saw her again during the debates on the Meech Lake and Charlottetown Accords. I sometimes had the impression we were like two pilgrims defending the Charlottetown Accord throughout Quebec.

I am certain she will continue to contribute because of her exceptional written and verbal communications skills. I am sure that, God forbid, if another referendum were to be held, we would find each other again, with the same vigour and the same convictions, defending our country.

Finally, everyone here probably associates Senator Chaput-Rolland with the constitutional question and her skills as a writer. I think she has always cared about important social issues. In the last two years, for example, she has concentrated on seniors not only through her writings but also through her actions. She is already committed to them and so she will remain.

Solange, I want to thank you also for everything you brought to me and to your Senate colleagues. I wish you good health and hope you will be very happy with your children. By the way, I want to tell Claude and Suzanne how much Solange loves them!

Thanks again, and I hope we will see each other again many times.

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, of course, like all of you, I have known Solange for many years. As a member of the National Assembly, I had the privilege of welcoming my young and dynamic fellow colleague, who had just been elected as the member for Prévost. Solange was generous enough to introduce me when I was summoned to the Senate.

I want to remind her of the deep affection that the Quebec people feel for her, as was pointed out earlier. Beyond Solange's innumerable and commendable professional achievements, I think that Quebecers, like all Canadians, are truly fond of her. This shows how important her contribution has been. Since Solange never does things like anyone else, her leaving the Senate is like a solar eclipse! The comparison may seem outrageous, but it is just a way of telling you that after Solange leaves the Senate, she still has a great deal to contribute to Quebec society and Canadian society.

Along with all senators, I want to wish her and her family great enjoyment and success in their future endeavours.

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Honourable senators, I am pleased to rise today to pay tribute to our colleague, the Honourable Solange Chaput-Rolland, for whom I have great respect and esteem.

Solange, your political involvement, your thinking and your courage made you a leader among women in Canada and Quebec. You are a model and an inspiration for many.

Quebec should be very proud to have you among its strongest defenders. I know that you feel strongly about many Quebec issues and that we can always count on your talent and your experience to find solutions for the good of Canadians.

Solange, I do not want to wish you a happy retirement but rather, good luck. Enjoy your later years to the fullest. We eagerly await the publication of your latest novel, Les quatre saisons d'Isabelle.

Solange, best of health and arrivederci!

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, this is one of those rare occasions when I have prepared a statement. However, since I am the last to speak, good friends like Senator Fairbairn, Senator Frith and all the rest have already mentioned just about all that I had written, so I will tell you what I feel.

The Senate is certainly sad today because we are losing a long-standing friend; personally, I have known Solange since the 1960s. Few people here have enjoyed such a long friendship. Madam, you have made your mark on the Senate in the past six years.

Yes, we are losing a colleague today. Next Monday evening in Montreal, this prolific writer will launch a new book, Les quatre saisons d'Isabelle, and you are all welcome to attend.

Senator Frith has listed all the books which I wanted to mention. The Leader of the Government in the Senate has mentioned the great honour received by Senator Chaput-Rolland when she was selected as one of the 50 most important women in the field of communications.

As you know, all of Quebec was glued to the TV to watch Monsieur le ministre. Senator Chaput-Rolland, I have known you as a journalist, a literary critic and a radio commentator at CKAC. I would like to make public a secret which we share.

I will never forget the very favourable article which you were kind enough to write about two old Liberal servants, Gérard-D. Lévesque and myself, in the newspaper Le dimanche matin. This goes back many years, but you knew that, at the time, I was having problems with the caucus, and your article helped me a great deal.

It has been mentioned, Honourable Senator, that you have received the Order of Canada, the Ordre de l'Assemblée nationale, and the Prix liberté Alcan, 1987.

The Senate is losing an excellent advisor and this makes me sad. Senator Chaput-Rolland, you are a real fighter and I want to say for the benefit of those who have not yet read French-language newspapers today that you have an article in La Presse in which you explain why the Senate exists, why you are leaving, and what you may soon be doing.

Honourable senator, I want to wish you not a quiet retirement, but an harmonious departure. If it will help, I am publicly telling you that, from now on, my office door will always be open for you whenever you come to Ottawa, for as long as you wish to use it.

The big winners are those who need you the most in our society: the elderly. As you know, I learned from my father how sensitive people are when they get old and have fewer and fewer fighters to represent them. Our society is entering a new era. It is already a consolation to know that it will be represented by fighters such as Madam Chaput-Rolland.

Honourable senator, if there is anything we can do, please let us know. I will always cherish my memories of you as a friend, advisor and confidante. We have shared so much over the years that I feel you are not really leaving, that you will always be with us.

You belong to that great lineage of Jean Marchand, Maurice Lamontagne, "Father" Lévesque, Gérard Pelletier, Jacques Hébert, Pierre Trudeau, and Jeanne and Maurice Sauvé. I will always remember you as the spark in my life. Someone said earlier that "she's a great Canadian," but first and foremost, and this is something people in this country apparently find hard to understand, you are a great French-Canadian.

Madam, as a French-Canadian, it is my privilege to salute you.

Hon. Maurice Riel: Madam, I do not want this series of tributes to end without having an opportunity to add my own few words, although I was not advised of this occasion.

I simply want to say to my colleagues that all of us in the province of Quebec had the benefit of the political and social thinking of Senator Chaput-Rolland for, I will not say exactly how many, but let us say more than 20 years.

She was very much involved in literature, the arts, journalism, the social aspects of life in our province and our country, and in politics, according to the senators who spoke before me.

Senator Chaput-Rolland's term in the Senate has been a remarkable one. Her experience was very extensive, and Senator Beaudoin recalled her role on the Pepin-Robarts commission. She was an active participant in the political life of her province and here she did everything she could, and even more, to promote Canadian unity and respect for the rights and traditions of Quebec and Canada.

I do not think the senator ever erred, although I did not always share her opinions. When there were differences, it was only because she was so dedicated to the country we have in common and because of her exasperation that the passage of time did not provide any solutions to the problem that interested her most, which was the antagonism between Ottawa and Quebec, often revived by narrow, partisan minds, while representatives on all sides probably lacked flexibility.

Senator Chaput-Rolland tried to promote solutions with stubborn determination, without getting discouraged. Knowing what we do now about the political history of the world, we realize that the dedication of a talented and respected individual adds up and finally becomes a part of the structure the individual had in mind.

When the great night of constitutional peace finally comes to Canada, I think we should consider writing the name of Solange Chaput-Rolland on one of the stones in this structure. She will be seen as a father of Confederation, or if the word "father" offends your feminist ears, perhaps the French word "pèresse" would be a nice alternative.

Congratulations and the best of luck in your future endeavours.

Hon. Solange Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, before thanking you for all these tributes — which have moved me, as you can understand — I have the great honour to table, with leave of the Senate, two French copies of the research paper on the situation of the elderly in Canada, on which my office has been working for the last few years, with the contribution of Robert Robert.

I would like to apologize to my English-speaking colleagues, because the English version of the report will only be available tomorrow. For reasons I cannot quite understand, and contrary to what frequently happens, this time the English version will come in second. I apologize for the delay.

[English]

It is no fault of mine. We worked until the last minute to produce this document, and I am very proud of it.

Your Honour and honourable friends on both sides of the chamber —

— I do not know where to begin to thank you for all the compliments you have paid me and which have moved me. I feel like saying to you: If you like me so much, why do you not keep me here a bit longer! But then that is what life is all about. You cannot deny your age or the traditions of this Senate.

•(1500)

I want to say to you, as honestly as I can, that beyond the quarrels, the partisanship and everything else, what saddens me today is to leave so many friends, friends on both sides of this house. Senator Prud'homme recalled our long-time friendship. I will miss friends on both sides, Senator Pierre De Bané, as we have been friends for years, Royce Frith and Senator Gigantès.

I do not want to bore you with a long speech, but you know very well —

[Translation]

— that when ones leaves the Senate, one leaves with fond memories, memories of our employees and staff members who brought a ray of light into our life. I cannot begin to express the deep appreciation I feel for each one of them, the tenderness and affection — I think I can use that word — they displayed toward me. I want to thank all the employees of — — the Reading Room who always found the right magazine when I could not find it, or Xeroxed a copy of an article for me when I did not know how to do that. I have learned, but I still have trouble.

[English]

[Translation]

I have written everything down so as not to forget anyone. I wish to thank the clerks of the Senate, who were very patient with me when I had a great deal of trouble understanding some of our —

[English]

— rules and regulations, which sometimes seemed to change with each senator. I cannot forget — — the amazing pages, the young men and women who patiently put up with our moods. Their faces may have changed, but they always remained courteous. They make me think of my grandchildren. I want to thank them for all they have done for me.

[Translation]

I do not want to forget the security guards. I could speak at some length about them if I had the time.

[English]

To the messengers whom we sent to and fro to get things I needed, and I would never be there to say thank you, I do so now, with all my heart. Then there are the bus drivers who extended their hands to me to help me get up the "Himalayas," the steps of that silly bus, which I will not miss, but I will miss those who helped me get into it. Sometimes I really felt that I was becoming an alpinist.

[Translation]

Then there are the maintenance workers, the ladies who clean our offices and probably many others whom I am forgetting. For that I apologize. I do not want to keep you too long. You have showered me with so much praise that I feel I should sit down and let you get on with your work.

When a person first arrives in the Senate, the feeling of being alone can be rather frightening.

[English]

I refer to the people who help us, tell us where to go, where to sit, how to do things. I have with me today a young woman by the name of Diane Parent. She is there in the gallery, with the blond hair. Diane has worked with me — not for me — for four years, and it has been an enjoyable and wonderful experience.

[Translation]

She has worked with me on many projects. I am not sure that I would have been able to do so well, like you seem to think I do, without her, and I thank her very much for that.

When my friend Jean-Claude Rivest was appointed to the Senate, for various reasons, Diane had to be transferred to Jean-Claude's office. Incidentally, she is the best gift I ever gave him!

I then was blessed with another gift in the person of Marie-Claude Landry. As you know, these things need to be said. I am well aware this takes time, but we so seldom express our gratitude that given the opportunity, I will not let it go by. Bear with me, you thanked me with such grace! My thanks to Marie-Claude also.

This document you will be receiving is a report entitled "About Aging: A Study."

[English]

It is a document on old people. That is what I will do next week and for the rest of my life. Senator Fairbairn, I remember a phrase that then-Prime-Minister Trudeau used on his retirement, "This is the first day of the rest of my life." It will not be the first day, but perhaps the second day of the rest of my life. I want to look after the old people, because they need us so desperately. I have accepted the presidency of La maison Jeanne Simard in Montreal. That is a refuge for old people who have been beaten. I knew such people existed, but I had never met any. Then I met one gal, 80 years old, who had been beaten by her son-in-law. The only thing I could do was kneel beside her and say —

[Translation]

"Forgive me."

[English]

That is what I want to do. I have a document about this matter, an essay by Robert Robert. He is here today; I can see him there in the gallery. Two years ago I inherited Robert Robert from the office of Senator Arthur Tremblay, so I was assured of the quality of his work. All senators should take the trouble to read Mr. Robert's essay, and I hope that the English-speaking senators will pardon us if they do not receive it today, as it is not our fault.

There is another young woman in the gallery of whom I am quite fond. She is my daughter. We have had a long acquaintance. She has helped me many times, and I hope I have helped her.

Just two further matters before I sit down, and I promise not to keep you too long. First, I say thank you to Senator Gigantès — — for the lovely spring flowers.

[English]

To Senator Brenda Robertson, I would like to say just a little word about the vacuum cleaner. What she did not say amounts to a standing joke between my husband and I. I got a new vacuum cleaner and it had two ends. I put the tube on the wrong end and all the dust came out. My husband said, "For God's sake, do not vacuum." That is the reason why I kept away from it, though I have used it sometimes. Senator Brenda Robertson and I did publish a book together, and it is still selling. What a wonderful feeling. The sadness, again, is to leave all of you, and to leave behind the friendship I have experienced here. There have been the quarrels and the feuds, but we are all still here.

I have two wishes to express before I sit down. I address them to Senator Joyce Fairbairn who is the Leader of the Government. I am very happy, madam, that you have become the leader.

[Translation]

Out of a sense of kinship, of solidarity perhaps, and as a woman, I am very proud of you.

[English]

I address them to my illustrious cousin, John Lynch-Staunton. It was his mother who told me, two years ago, that we were related. He did not know it, nor did I. Now we know. To both senators I say put all that you have into recapturing the respect of the population for this house. We do not deserve all the insults that we receive daily. That does not mean we do not deserve some of them. I am a journalist. I always have been. I know journalists are not liked, but sometimes they exaggerate and sometimes we do. One thing we must do is to keep the Senate alive, well and active.

The second wish that I ask of you, Senator John Lynch-Staunton and of you, Senator Fairbairn, is: Do not permit this Senate, under any conditions, to be abolished. Why? For two reasons. If you have watched television over the past six months, you would have seen, particularly yesterday, the joy of South Africans, singing their happiness for their democracy, and you would have also seen on your television democracies dying in Rwanda and Bosnia-Hercegovina. We have it here. Whatever the cost, I am free to talk. Somebody said — I cannot remember who — that I had voted four times against my government. I am sure that Senator Charbonneau was not very pleased with me, nor was Senator Lowell Murray, but I am still here. I took my responsibility to vote against my own government and was free to do so. As you know, there are not very many places in the world today where a parliamentarian could say that and get away with it, but we can in this house.

Granted, we are not elected; we are selected; but we are not all that bad, and I state emphatically that we must not abolish this house.

My last word is to say how much I have learned.

[Translation]

I have learned so much in the past four, five or even six years. I have learned to put faces on places.

[English]

It is the people leaving the imprint of their personalities on places; that is what a country is all about. It is not only a matter of the Constitution, if you will forgive me for saying so, Senator Beaudoin. It is not only a matter of laws. It is not only quarrels. It is not only dissensions. It is first and essentially the people.

[Translation]

It is men and women, and children, some old, some young, some rich, some less so. They are what makes a country. That is what I have learned through all of you. All the regions you come from, I see and understand better now. It is not as though I did not know this country before I came here. I did.

[English]

I have crisscrossed this country, I do not know how many times, and I can say that nothing makes your country more alive than to see it in the faces of your friends, your colleagues, even your adversaries. That is the reason I ask you and I beg you to keep the Senate functioning.

[Translation]

Keep the Senate going and keep me in your hearts. I love you very much. Thank you.

SENATOR'S STATEMENT

THE HONOURABLE EDWARD M. LAWSON

EXPRESSION OF APOLOGY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, may I seize this opportunity to tender an apology to my colleague, the Honourable Senator Lawson. This flows from a press interview that I recently gave in which I, girded to anger, made remarks which were better left unsaid.

The remarks were indiscreet and certainly not in keeping with the finer traditions of this chamber. By way of reaction, I tender an apology to the Honourable Senator Lawson for my indiscretion in that respect and for any inconvenience I may have caused him.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: I should like to say to the Honourable Senator Hastings that I accept his apology and thank him for it.

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN ON WEST COAST—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The delay in the movement of grain on the West Coast is a serious problem for the area I serve and for all of Canada. Again and again, Senator Olson, Senator Germain and myself have drawn this matter to the attention of honourable senators.

Does the Leader of the Government have anything new to report on the situation with respect to the movement of grain? Is it speeding up in any way? Is it possible that this grain will be moved out during this crop year?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his question. I will request an update on the movement of grain on the West Coast.

As honourable senators know through Senator Olson and others, this situation is a very serious preoccupation and priority at the moment. There have been some hearings in the other place. The Minister of Agriculture has called together representatives of all the parties in this dispute for a meeting in Winnipeg on May 16. The issue is very much alive.

I will endeavour to provide an update on the actual situation at the Port of Vancouver for honourable senators.

HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

INSTALLATION OF TELEPHONE COMMUNICATIONS NETWORK

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I was surprised to hear on the CBC news this morning that a contract for approximately $220 million had been awarded by the Department of Human Resources to an American firm last March. The news report said:

> In an effort to reduce Old Age Security costs, Ottawa will introduce within three years a nationwide automated telephone information network.

It went on to say that, in the future, senior Canadians who want to deal with the department will have to do so through a voice mailbox. Does the Honourable Leader of the Government know anything about this proposal?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to talk to my colleague the Minister of Human Resources Development and find out the background to the report to which the honourable senator has referred.

Senator Nolin: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

When she talks to her colleague, could she also ask him if Canadian firms were at least solicited to determine whether such services could have been provided at the same cost in Canada, instead of by a firm from the United States?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: I will certainly make that inquiry.

TRANSPORT

SEARCH AND RESCUE—REPLACEMENT OF SEA KING HELICOPTER FLEET—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Terry Stratton: Honourable senators, first, I should like to extend my sympathy to the families of the four airmen involved in the recent and highly tragic crash of a Sea King helicopter near Saint John, New Brunswick. Although these aircraft are maintained at a very high standard, one cannot overlook the fact that these machines are very old and getting older. In fact, by the end of this decade, the helicopters we use today will be 40 years old.

Search and rescue is a tough job. In 1992, there were over 8,000 calls for search and rescue help in some of the toughest terrain in the world. I am concerned with sending such aging helicopters out to perform. Even though they may be refurbished, a 40-year-old helicopter is still a 40-year-old helicopter.

The aging Sea Kings were to be replaced by modern EH-101s. However, the deal to purchase these helicopters was scrapped after the Liberal government was elected.

Can we have a commitment from this government that these aircraft will be replaced?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his question. I join with him in extending my sympathy to the families of the service personnel who died in that very sad incident.

The Minister of National Defence has indicated that the whole question of helicopter renewal is under review. Certainly, the contract to purchase the EH-101s was cancelled, and the defence department will be very conscious of future procurements.

At the moment, I think my honourable friend knows that the Department of National Defence has indicated that the Sea King aircraft generally are in safe service. The very tragic incident that occurred is under review, but I will attempt to obtain further information for the honourable senator.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to questions posed by various honourable senators. The first is in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 22, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Cohen regarding the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. The others are in response to questions asked on March 22 by the Honourable Senator Murray regarding the Bank of Canada rate; on March 24 by the Honourable Senator Comeau concerning the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency; on April 19 by the Honourable Senator Robertson regarding the establishment of industry renewal boards; on April 21 by the Honourable Senator Robertson regarding support for vessels during moratorium; and on April 21 by the Honourable Senator Cochrane regarding post-secondary education.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

FUTURE OF AGENCY—OBJECTIVES AND SCOPE OF GOVERNMENT REVIEW

(Response to question raised by Hon. Erminie J. Cohen on March 22, 1994.)

Senator Erminie Cohen raised the question of the future of ACOA and requested, in specific terms, the objectives and scope of the government's review of the Agency.

I would like you to assure Senator Cohen that there has been no government review of the Agency. Like other federal agencies and departments with business support responsibilities, ACOA has had to sustain cuts to its current programming. Notwithstanding these cuts, the government is very pleased with ACOA's accomplishments, will build upon its achievements and will guide it in support of employment creation and the growth of small and medium-sized businesses in Atlantic Canada. Also despite these cuts, the Agency's total budget for fiscal year 1994-95 is $375.6 million.

The government has also demonstrated its faith in the Agency by putting it in charge of implementing the Infrastructure Works Program in the Atlantic region. In total, ACOA will be disbursing $63.4 million from the above $375.6 million for Infrastructure projects in Atlantic Canada.

ACOA is also assuming the leadership of the Canada Business Service Centres in the region. These centres are an important tool for a more coordinated and collaborative approach, as well as for a less burdensome way of doing business with government, one which can be equally beneficial to Atlantic Canadian companies.

Minister Dingwall recently tabled, in Parliament, the first Five-Year Report on the Agency's operations. The report demonstrates that ACOA has been very effective in creating business and employment opportunities in Atlantic Canada, in that the Agency's activity has created 42,000 jobs from 1987 to 1992. This effectiveness clearly illustrates ACOA's success and the government's support of its activities in the region.

Senator Cohen also raised a question with regard to the ACOA Board. As she accurately stated, Minister Dingwall requested a review of the Board's role and mandate and Dr. Donald Savoie agreed to undertake this review. At the December 8, 1993 Board meeting in Moncton, the President of ACOA advised the members that Dr. Savoie would be meeting with some, if not all, of them as part of his review.

The review is now complete and Dr. Savoie's recommendations are being examined as part of the larger, government-wide review of the size and relevance of all federal and advisory agencies, boards and commissions. The future of ACOA is, indeed, assured.

NATIONAL FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA RATE—EFFECT ON INTEREST RATES

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lowell Murray on March 22, 1994)

The recent rise in interest rates has occurred in the context of uncertainty in world financial markets, as the major countries adjust their policies to accord with individual economic circumstances. We cannot insulate ourselves from these world-wide developments. The Bank, prime and mortgage rates in the U.S. and Canada all reflect this general uncertainty. As the Governor of the Bank of Canada has stated:

> And finally, financial markets. We've had these bouts of turbulence before, and we've got through them. And we'll do so again, and I believe that the good economic and monetary fundamentals of our situation should start to show through the market nervousness before very long. (Gordon Thiessen, April 5, 1994)

Canada has a floating exchange rate whose level is determined by market conditions; this level will, in the ordinary course of events, fluctuate. Action by the Bank of Canada promotes orderly exchange rate markets, but is not intended to achieve a particular exchange rate target. Our basic monetary policy stance is geared to holding inflation in the 1 to 3 percent range, and this remains unchanged.

Inflation is now at a 32-year low, consumer and business confidence are up, and jobs are being created. Interest rates and exchange rates ultimately depend upon these economic fundamentals.

To put things in perspective, let me again quote the Governor of the Bank of Canada:

> Despite the recent back-up, current short-term and long-term rates are close to their lowest levels in over 20 years. (Gordon Thiessen, April 5, 1994)

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

METHOD OF AWARDING PROJECTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerald J. Comeau on March 24, 1994)

Applications submitted to ACOA under the Action Program or the Fisheries Alternatives Program are evaluated and approved subject to a delegation of authority which has been in place for some time. This approval process was implemented at the outset of the Agency as a means of improving client service by ensuring that all but the largest projects are evaluated and approved at the local level in the office closest to the applicant.

Larger projects are sent to the ACOA private sector board for review and advice. The Board has not convened in the past few months pending the completion of a review of its structure. In the interim, these larger projects continue to be evaluated by Agency officials with a recommendation submitted for Minister Dingwall's consideration. These larger projects are relatively few in number, however, with 99% of projects in the last six months requiring only the approval of Agency officials at the regional level, as per the delegation of authority.

ESTABLISHMENT OF INDUSTRY RENEWAL BOARDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON BUY-BACK OF QUOTAS AND LICENCES

(Response to question raised by Hon. Brenda M. Robertson on April 19, 1994)

During the next six weeks, the government will consult with provinces and industry to develop an industry renewal process to reduce excess capacity in the groundfish industry.

The government has committed to reduce capacity by 50% in the groundfish sector, as was recommended in the Cashin Task Force Report.

Consultations with industry and the provinces will focus on developing Industry Renewal Boards in all provinces in Atlantic Canada and Quebec. These boards will use tools provided by governments such as early and licence retirement to assist the capacity reduction process. A global federal contribution of $300 million has been set aside for these purposes.

Full details will be announced after consultations have been completed.

FISHERIES

SUPPORT FOR VESSELS DURING MORATORIUM

Given the fiscal situation, and the requirements to reduce industry capacity, there is a limited budget for the post-May 15 adjustment program and proposals like a vessel support program need to be assessed against these factors.

In the February budget, which otherwise focused on deficit reduction, the $1.9 billion funding envelope announced for the Atlantic groundfish crisis was the only significant new spending.

Rather than reducing income support payments to everyone to fund a vessel support program, the government decided it was more important to provide adequate income levels for displaced fishermen, plant workers and their families.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

FINANCING ARRANGEMENTS FOR STUDENT LOANS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to Question raised by Hon. Ethel Cochrane on April 21, 1994)

The federal government contributes almost $8 billion annually for post-secondary education through a number of departments and programs.

Among the largest contributions for post-secondary education are the Established Programs Financing transfers to provinces, support for research through the granting councils and student assistance.

Indeed, on April 15, 1994, the Minister of Human Resources Development announced, a youth employment and learning strategy, containing reforms to the Canada Student Loans Program which will significantly increase assistance for students pursuing post-secondary studies.

Moreover, Mr. Axworthy is examining how to strengthen federal support for Canada's learning systems, including post-secondary education, as part of the social security reform process.

The federal government has not conducted or commissioned any research studies on the effects on universities or colleges of withdrawal of federal funding for post-secondary education.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NATIONAL SPORTS OF CANADA BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham moved the second reading of Bill C-212, to recognize hockey and lacrosse as the national sports of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, in speaking to this bill, I should point out that it all began for me personally on what might be called the bogs and the ponds of Bridgeport and Dominion. It continued into the Minor Hockey Association of Glace Bay, through the then St. Ann's High School, and on to the varsity team at St. Francis Xavier University. My mother told me at the time that if I made the varsity, I could throw away my old CCMs and she would buy me a new pair of Prolites, which were considered by many to be the best skates of the day. I see Senator Robichaud nodding his head. He probably had a pair of Prolites himself when he was a star in New Brunswick.

I earned the skates at St. F.X., third line, fourth man. I retained the sweater and I proudly wore the "X" which, as many know, is a famous logo for the university around the world.

As my sons were growing up, and playing with the atoms, the squirts, the pee wees and the bantams, I often recounted my hockey exploits at St. F.X. As you can imagine, it was pretty heady stuff.

Then one day, when they were beginning to reach the age of reason and could read, they got their hands on a publication by Packy MacFarland, the athletic director at St. F.X., which documented the statistics for every game, no matter what sport, for every varsity team in the history of the university. My sons looked eagerly for the pages which would reveal, in black and white, the number of times I was captain, the number of times I won the scoring championship, the number of goals I scored and the number of assists I had in a particular season. The book was very accurate and, for me, embarrassing in every detail. For example, in 1948-49 the list showed, "Al Graham: One goal, three assists for the entire season." If I remember correctly, honourable senators, that was the season in which the goaltender had four assists. My balloon was punctured; my heroics in tatters!

However, I have persisted, honourable senators. I am still looking for that second goal. On Boxing Day, each year for almost the last decade, there has been a special sporting event in Sydney between two Sydney families. It is the annual Graham-Joseph hockey game in which I still participate. To understand the significance of this event, as both Senators MacDonald and Macdonald would understand, you would have to know that the Josephs are to Sydney what the Sutters are to Viking, Alberta. The Josephs have eight hockey playing sons, among them Fabian, who has played on the last two silver medal Canadian Olympic teams, the last as our captain in Lillehamer.

Over a period of more than 10 years, I broadcasted all of the St. F. X. games: The Maritime "Big Four" and even the Maritime "Big Six."

You might well understand and appreciate that I am unabashedly enthusiastic about supporting Bill C-212. In so doing, I congratulate Nelson Riis, the member from Kamloops in the other place, for his introduction of the bill; and Albina Guarnieri, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Canadian Heritage, for her amendment.

Senator Gigantès: Has Mr. Riis ever played hockey?

Senator Graham: I understand that he does.

The bill, which proclaims hockey as Canada's national winter sport and lacrosse as our national summer sport, was unanimously passed by all parties in the other place and, I might add, in one sitting.

Everyone in this country has his or her special memories of a very special moment in sport.

The Saturday night Hockey Night in Canada introductory words of broadcaster Foster Hewitt still ring in my ears: "Good evening hockey fans in Canada, the United States and Newfoundland, with an extra big hello to the Canadian troops overseas." That was in wartime.

"He shoots, he scores!" a description pioneered and fashioned by Foster, became the accepted and most dynamic and exciting expression used by every hockey broadcaster since the beginning of time. Most memorable of all, of course, was the moment when Paul Henderson fired home the deciding goal in that incredible triumph by the Canadian team over the Soviets back in 1972.

Who could ever forget the much loved and scintillating voice of the late Danny Gallivan with his gargantuan saves, cannonading drives and Savardian spinoramas? At the moment, I have the honour of chairing the Memorial Scholarship Fund set up in Gallivan's name at St. F.X. The list of those involved reads like a Who's Who in hockey, including the Honourable Hartland Molson as Honorary Chair, Brian O'Neill of the National Hockey League, Scotty Morrison, Chairman of the Hockey Hall of Fame, Ronald Corey, President of the Canadiens, Cliff Fletcher, President of the Toronto Maple Leafs, Red Fisher, Sports Editor of the Montreal Gazette, Dick Irvin from Hockey Night in Canada, Al MacNeil of the Calgary Flames, Frank Selke, Vice-Chair, Canadian Special Olypmics, Gilles Tremblay, the play-by-play French language broadcaster for the Canadiens, the inimitable Red Storey, and others.

And that, by the way, is the end of that particular commercial.

The sound of the first slapshot or the first puck hitting the boards, was and is the first shock of psychic electricity that unites hearts and minds in this country. All that irrespective of regions, time zones or ethnic backgrounds, because if there is a visible, passionate and inspirational spirit of our magnificent multiculturalism it is hockey.

My friend Warren Allmand, member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, captured a lot of our hearts when he said in the other place, "I love this game. I love playing it. I love watching it. I love talking about it. Some of my greatest friendships have been formed through hockey."

So, honourable senators, at this time of year thousands upon thousands breathe, live and die for hockey. Our indoor rinks, now I suspect more commonly indoor arenas, are, as Foster Hewitt once put it, "meeting places for youths of all origins, where race, culture and creed are forgotten."

No one has ever questioned the nationality of the Howes, the Richards, the Lemieuxs, the Espositos, Bobby Orr, Al MacInnis or the Great Gretzky. They are just gifted Canadians who have done and are doing their best, and the unifying principle is the sport and the unifying medium is the ice.

One can never forget the avalanche of interest and enthusiasm demonstrated by over 650,000 Canadians who take part in some form of organized hockey. The Canadian Amateur Hockey Association includes in itself a volunteer force of over 100,000 Canadians.

While I was naturally more familiar with minor hockey programs in places throughout Cape Breton and Antigonish, I have become especially interested in the quality of the organizations around Ottawa.

For example, there are two very special six-year-old twin grandchildren by the name of George and Anna Barrett who participate in the Leitrim hockey program; and while their mother is a Graham, the father comes from that well-known Ottawa-Gloucester family, the Barretts, which produced two National Hockey League stars as well as a pretty good goaltender for St. F.X., who happens to be my son-in-law.

I know that I run the risk of becoming too personal in these remarks, but I make reference to little Anna Barrett by way of celebrating the fact that hockey is the fastest growing women's sport today in Canada. In that respect I particularly want to congratulate and recognize our Canadian women's team upon winning their third championship at Lake Placid only a few weeks ago. These athletes are on the cutting edge of a major transition in the sport itself. There is, indeed, a big future out there for young women of courage and determination.

In this legislation, we are asked to support as well the ancient game of lacrosse and to honour it as our national summer sport. In recognizing the widespread love of lacrosse in Canada, we have to reflect on the visible symbols at work in the use of the native wooden lacrosse stick, and the traditional Algonquin communities of the St. Lawrence Valley come to mind. We think of the early Jesuit priests who wrote of the game as they witnessed it in the early 1600s. We are reminded of the earliest lacrosse teams in the 1904 Olympics, and of the legendary Montreal Shamrocks who thrilled depression-worn fans at the Montreal Forum. That same thrill was taking place in Toronto, in British Columbia and in many other parts of this great nation. Honourable senators might even recall that one of our most respected Prime Ministers, Lester Pearson, helped preside over the resurgence of lacrosse as honorary chair of the Canadian Lacrosse Association.

With its ancient roots in this country, lacrosse is now followed avidly in other countries. However, we must remember that it is known and loved as the quintessential Canadian game.

I do not intend to enter the debate as to where the first hockey game was played in Canada. There are those who would point to Windsor, Nova Scotia, to Dartmouth or Halifax, to Montreal, to Kingston, or wherever. The fact remains that the winter and spring of 1994 will go down in history as the season of our greatest hockey achievements, of our greatest hockey triumphs: silver at the Olympics, the World Championship just two days ago, the World Junior Championship a little further back and, as mentioned earlier, the World Women's Championship.

It remained for columnist Doug Fisher to put this into a more intimate perspective for all honourable senators in a column of April 29, just a few days ago. He referred to one James George Alwyn Creighton, a Haligonian who went on to study at McGill University in the early 1870s. He said that student lacrosse players were the nucleus that Creighton got together to play hockey, using a relatively new Montreal Victoria indoor rink. That was back in 1875.

In the next decade, hockey took root in Montreal and spread slowly west to Ottawa and Kingston. I quote again from Fisher's column. He said:

> Creighton had a part in the sudden boom of hockey in Ottawa and the West in the 1890s by getting the sons of Governor General Stanley into skating and then into hockey. Their Rideau Hall team and enthusiasm quickly popularized hockey across Canada.

Fisher goes on to point out that Creighton worked on Parliament Hill for 48 years, and that from 1882 to 1930, he was the Law Clerk of the Senate of Canada.

Honourable senators, at a time when the forces of disunity and division have swept across this country with apparent impunity, we must think back and look back at the first principles of our national identity.

It is time to look back; it is time to think back; it is time to revive our collective memory, to reflect upon our ancestors, upon those who understood that to grasp the diversity of Canada, piece by piece, one had to challenge every mountain, every forest, and every river. Canada is very much an unfinished struggle, and sport is very much a mystical bonding process at work in the very circulatory system of what we are as a people.

Lacrosse and hockey are the great unifying principles of past and present. They truly represent the passion of our people, all of our people, in this beautiful multicultural federation. Bruce Kidd once spoke of an important truth when he called hockey "the great Canadian metaphor." The rink, he once said, is a symbol of this country's vast stretches of water and wilderness, its extremes of climate; the player a symbol of our struggle to civilize such a land.

Participation in the national sports of lacrosse and hockey are symbols of engagement and commitment. Whether one is an athlete, a volunteer or a spectator, these sports anchor people in the very foundations upon which this country has been built.

Therefore, I believe that Bill C-212 appears at a very welcome time. All around us we see the unwelcome forces of intolerance and division. We hear the marauding destroyers of the first principles of our national identity. This bill restores our sense of hope and our confidence in the realities of who we are and what we are. It is a reminder that the forces which bind us together are far stronger than those that threaten to tear us apart.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Phillips, calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 22, 1994.

Hon. Terry Stratton: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak on the budget as presented by the government.

To say that there is deep concern on the part of Canadians is rather an understatement. Here we are, finally recovering from not only a severe worldwide recession but an economic restructuring the likes of which has not been seen since the days of the industrial revolution. Couple this with the uncertainty surrounding the provincial budgets in Quebec and Ontario. Will those budgets be strong enough?

Finally, there is the uncertainty surrounding the future of Quebec in Confederation. Will the separatist Parti Québécois win the upcoming election in that province? Will there be a referendum? Will there be separation? All of these factors are contributing to a feeling of uncertainty amongst those who invest in our country.

Why are we faced with this crisis? Why are we continuing to stagger from financial crisis to political crisis, then back to financial crisis and again to political crisis, repeating the downward spiral ever downward? Is our democracy failing? Are we reverting, or have we, as citizens, reverted to regionalism and individualism? If so, how has our democracy failed our people?

Why have Canadians reverted to individualism that is exemplified by special-interest groups putting forward their individual concerns without regard to those around them? Why have Canadians reverted to regionalism that is exemplified by the BQ in Quebec and the Reform Party in the West?

It is not just a matter of resolving our financial problems; nor is it a matter of resolving the problems in Quebec or the West; nor, indeed, is it a matter of trying to resolve the effects of special-interest groups. It would appear that there are deeper-seated problems that are rooted beneath deficits, separation and special interests. What, then, are these problems? What, then, are the solutions?

When you look at why the Senate exists historically, not only the Canadian Senate but senates in other democracies, it is not just to be a house of sober second thought on legislation passed in the other place. Are we going to allow ourselves to be passed by again and again without raising a fist in anger and saying, "No, no we do not exist just for this."

Thoughtful Canadians and other have expressed, and are expressing, concerns about the role and future of democracy. Just when we have finally achieved democracy in more countries in the world than ever before, we are threatened with its very collapse in those new democracies and some old democracies.

However, before we become too esoteric about all these issues and run off attempting to resolve them, we must look first in our own backyard. Until we can deal credibly with issues that government can control, we cannot honestly expect Canadians to listen to us.

I speak specifically about the deficit and Mr. Martin's budget. In his budget he projects a GDP growth of 3 per cent in 1994-95 while most economists project a GDP growth of 3.7 to 3.8 per cent. As well, the honourable minister projects an inflation rate of 3 per cent, whereas inflation is now under 1 per cent, and, in fact, some sectors of our economy are actually in deflation.

While these projections are modest and deliberately understate the facts, what has not been borne out is his projection on interest rates.

We live next door to our "friendly elephant," who has seen fit to raise interest rates; couple this with the money markets viewing Canada's debt with great trepidation, and, as the last straw, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance stating that their deficit projections will be met. How realistic is this? How long can the government continue to tell us that deficit projections will be met, when every indicator clearly shows that this is not possible? How long can the government continue to believe this, when interest rates in Canada have been ever increasing since the February budget? In fact, Canadian rates have risen substantially more than U.S. rates. Since the February budget, long-term interest rates in Canada have increased by approximately 120 basis points, compared to approximately 80 basis points in the U.S. In addition, short term interest rates in Canada have increased by approximately 200 basis points since the budget, compared to an approximate increase of 60 basis points in the U.S. over the same time period. Clearly Canadian rates have gone up substantially more than U.S. rates. With rates rising, how is it possible for the government to meet its deficit projections? I do not believe that what the government is projecting is realistic.

This increase in rates will probably mean somewhere between $2 billion and $3 billion in added costs. We know that the reserve funds available to cover this cost are only approximately $2.4 billion. Such an increase could use up the entire reserve fund and leave no money for emergencies or other uses. The Liberal government has said that there may be further spending cuts in September, and, yes, this will increase the reserve fund, but by how much we do not know, especially with rates continuing to climb.

What the Liberal government has not said is that there will not be any increase in taxes in future. This concerns me. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance must recognize that in order to have credibility in the eyes of Canadians — to begin a restoration of their faith in government instead of special interest groups — they must begin to restore the belief that what the government says will actually come close to happening.

If these deficit projections are off by any significant margin, above or below, but particularly above, then, I fear, Canadians' loss of faith in this democratic institution, our government, and that it will reinforce their reasons for utilizing special interest groups or for reverting to regionalism.

Wake up, Mr. Chrétien! Wake up, Mr. Martin! You are indeed running out of time and Canada is running out of time.

On motion of Senator Atkins, debate adjourned.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

MOTION TO PROVIDE SITE FOR CANADIAN VIETNAM VETERANS' MEMORIAL—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of February 24, 1994, moved:

> That the Senate urges the Government of Canada to provide an appropriate site for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the aforementioned action.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving this motion today I am urging the Government of Canada to provide an appropriate site for the placement of a Canadian Vietnam veterans' national memorial that would pay deserving tribute to the thousands of young Canadians who served with the United States armed forces when they were engaged in the Vietnam War. Even more important, it would serve to honour the 113 young Canadians who died in that horrible conflict.

Honourable senators, may I call the attention of the Senate to some of our Vietnam veterans who are present in the gallery with their wives or their lady friends.

My motion also asks that a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the aforementioned action.

I rise as well, with a deep sense of disappointment and dismay, to advise this chamber of letters directed to me from the Minister of Canadian Heritage, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for Veterans Affairs. Those letters read in part:

•(1610)

> In this instance, because the Canadian veterans did not officially represent their country in Vietnam, their request for a memorial on Federal lands was turned down.

He added:

> I encourage you to undertake discussions with other governments and organizations in the National Capital Region and I wish you well.

Thank you very much, Mr. Minister, for that brush-off.

Honourable senators, I know that those Canadian Vietnam veterans who sit in the gallery above, many of whom travelled long distances to be here today, some even from the United States, are feeling a sense of remorse, a sense of desperation and disbelief, as they wonder why Canada, their country, without as much as an ounce of regret, can show such a complacent attitude. It is becoming so glaringly evident as disregard for the repeated declarations over the years by past prime ministers who expounded repeatedly on our close relationship with the United States. I quote from one of those expressions of unity in 1925, some 70 years ago:

> Few countries enjoy the bonds of goodwill and friendship that the United States and Canada share. Our common border remains the longest unguarded frontier on earth and our nations have shared triumphs and tragedies throughout history.

As I quoted in the Senate on April 19 of this year:

> It was in this spirit that, in 1925, Canadian Prime Minister MacKenzie King first proposed a memorial to the large number of United States citizens who had enlisted in the Canadian Armed Forces and had lost their lives during World War I. It was owing to the fact that Canada had entered the war long before the United States that many Americans enlisted in Canada to join the fighting in Europe...

Just as many young Canadians enlisted in the United States to join the fighting in Vietnam some 20 years ago.

On June 12, 1925, then U.S. President Calvin Coolidge approved the request, and on Armistice Day 1927, the monument near the Memorial Amphitheatre at Arlington National Cemetery was dedicated, a monument which consists of a bronze sword adorning a 24-foot grey granite cross. The inscription on the cross reaffirms the sentiments expressed by Prime Minister King to Americans who served in the Canadian Armed Forces. Following World War II and the Korean War, similar inscriptions on other faces of the monument were dedicated to the Americans who served in those conflicts.

I can only ask, honourable senators: Where has that sharing of our triumphs and tragedies throughout history gone? How is it that they seem to be forgotten, just as the Canadian Vietnam veterans are being forgotten?

Certainly there is no reference to that sharing of the triumphs and tragedies in Minister Dupuy's letter of May 2. The minister — or his letter writer — chose words not as written in the mandate of the National Capital Commission, but rather words to suit the argument which he wanted to make to justify the decision to turn down the request.

For example, honourable senators, here are some extracts from their mandate not reflected in the minister's letter.

> 1. The mandate of the National Capital Commission is to help "build" pride in Canada and understanding among Canadians.

This was not in the letter.

> 2. The National Capital Commission is responsible for commemorative projects on federal lands in the Capital region with the exception of Parliament Hill which is the responsibility of Government Services.

The minister conveniently left that out of his letter.

> 3. In cases of individuals being considered for commemoration the Minister has discretion where a clear national consensus exists for commemoration.

Why does the minister suggest in his letter that we undertake discussions with other governments in the National Capital Region when he has the discretion?

In addition to the mandatory criteria, proposals for consideration may also be evaluated if the National Capital Commission considers it necessary to have an ad hoc committee of experts on the particular subject under consideration. What is wrong with a Senate committee, whose responsibility, I thought, was to represent minorities?

Most important is the initiative in the NCC mandate that refers to the fact that subjects of international importance may be commemorated if they have had a significant and demonstrable impact upon Canada and the Canadian way of life. Let me answer that question, honourable senators, not only as it refers to the significant impact of the Vietnam war upon Canada and the Canadian way of life, but as well to dispel the myth expressed by many, and even some in this chamber during the debate on March 15. "We in Canada were neutral in that war," and "We in Canada were out of it."

I place on the record the following from The Canadian Encyclopedia which the minister should read, as should all those who think that Canada was neutral and out of it.

> ...500 Canadian firms sold $2.5 billion of war materiel (ammunition, napalm, aircraft engines and explosives) to the Pentagon. Another $10 billion in food, beverages, berets and boots for the troops was exported to the U.S., as well as nickel, copper, lead, brass and oil for shell casings, wiring, plate armour and military transport. In Canada, unemployment fell to record low levels of 3.9%...

Can anyone now believe that?

> ...the gross domestic product rose by 6% yearly, and capital expenditure expanded exponentially in manufacturing and mining as U.S. firms invested more than $3 billion in Canada to offset shrinking domestic capacity as a result of the war.

That is $15 billion. Twenty years ago, we did not know what a billion meant.

> U.S. bomber pilots practised carpet-bombing runs over Suffield, Alberta, and North Battleford, Sask, before their tours of duty in SE Asia. And the results of the only successful peace initiative to Hanoi — that of Canadian diplomat Chester Ronning — would be kept from public knowledge in order not to harm official U.S.-Canadian relations.

The herbicide "Agent Orange" was manufactured in Canada and tested at Canadian Forces Base Gagetown. That was not the only instance of participation by the Canadian government. What is sad about "Agent Orange" is that 20 years or more after the war, people are still dying from being exposed to this ghastly dioxin.

As a matter of fact, honourable senators, I have a constituent in Newfoundland, a Vietnam veteran who is suffering from the terrible effects of this chemical which, I repeat, was manufactured in Canada.

Honourable senators are aware of the response that came forth through petitions which I tabled in the Senate. I referred at times to the support of senators and members of Parliament, even including positive responses from a couple of cabinet ministers. The reaction from the media, both here and in the United States, was encouraging. I wish I had the time to read many of the emotional letters we received. Most worthy of note are three which I shall read in part.

One, from a branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, states:

> We at branch #375 feel that this memorial would be an honourable reminder to all, of the vigorous attempts by our great nation to bring about world peace.

This one is from veteran Karl. M. Ellison:

> My father and I are both former members of the Canadian Armed Forces. It gives us great pride in knowing that certain members of our government still stand up for the rights of those veterans that made the ultimate sacrifice for this country.

This one, honourable senators, reflects our hope for the future. It is from a child, Megan McGraw, of Ohio. It reads:

> I am twelve years old. I have heard about the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' Memorial. All they are asking for is 1/4 acre to dedicate to the Canadian Vietnam Veterans. I don't know why the Canadian Government can't give them this piece of land to recognize their heroic deeds. They didn't have to fight in Vietnam, but they did, and they should be honoured for it.

In 1989, honourable senators, I had the privilege of witnessing a truly emotional event in Niagara Falls, Canada, where Canadian and United States ex-prisoners of war joined together to stage a bilateral ceremony on a bridge connecting our two nations, and at a significant time in our history, the 50th anniversary of the beginning of the Second World War.

It was a ceremony unique in its theme, and one which not only recreated a bond of friendship between two nations but as well solidified a mutual respect — a respect which was reflected in heart-rending exchange of our national flags, and enshrined in appropriate words on a plaque dedicated everlastingly to the occasion, which was placed midway along the bridge between our two countries. Identified on that plaque are the following words:

United we stand
Sharing our love and friendship
Seeking continuous freedom and peace on Earth.

Honourable senators, those ex-prisoners of war, many of whom endured the torture of the enemy in prisoner-of-war camps, just as the Vietnam veterans did, did not have to go to their respective governments in Niagara Falls, New York, or in Niagara Falls, Ontario. They did not even have to go to their national governments in Washington or Ottawa to get permission to place an international plaque. No city, state or federal official asked them which side they fought for; neither were they quoted any rules with which they had to comply. They had the freedom to place and dedicate that plaque because they, through their sacrifice, gave both sides that freedom to govern over half a century ago.

So too should Canada, through the federal government, with some sense of duty and understanding, remember that those young Canadian Vietnam veterans, in volunteering to fight for our neighbours to the south, also fought to preserve freedom and to resolidify the goodwill and friendship that, in the words of Prime Minister Mackenzie King, the United States and Canada share.

Many of the Canadians who served with the United States troops in Vietnam had no obligation to do so. Those veterans joined the United States forces because they believed, as a good neighbour, it was the right thing to do. They upheld the honour of Canada, the Canadian government, and its citizens to the highest order. They fought with honours superbly and bravely. They gave so much and in return have received so little. And now, honourable senators, all they wish to do is to bring their Canadian "brothers" home to where they so rightfully belong.

I move the adoption of my motion.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, it is easy to understand the feelings of the relatives of those Canadians who fought in Vietnam, and those of the Canadians who fought there and survived. However, Canada did not fight in that war. We have memorialized Americans who fought in a war which was ours and later became theirs, but we have never memorialized people who fought in a war in which we did not participate.

The fact that we manufactured "Agent Orange" here I would rather forget. The fact that our industries made money selling weapons in a war in which we were not participating has never before been memorialized. It is not considered to be an act of war. Nations share weapons. Unfortunately, there are nations now arming the opposing factions in Rwanda — civilized nations. Butchery is happening there with weapons made by some of our civilized allies. We cannot equate that with military participation by our country in a war.

Moreover, we must not forget that during the Vietnam war Canada decided to attempt to bring peace, and was a member of the International Control Commission. Canada was not a combatant. That was a war in which the Government of Canada decided not to participate.

If we accept this precedent that we memorialize people who go and fight in a war in which the elected Government of Canada does not participate, where do we stop? How about those Canadians who were fighting in the French Foreign Legion in Vietnam before the French retreated and were replaced by the Americans?

Senator Marshall: Let them ask for it.

Senator Gigantès: How about Québécois Canadians who fought on the side of the papacy during the Risorgimento? The Canadian government was not participating in that; neither was Britain, which was a master in foreign affairs in those days. How about Canadians who fought on the U.S. side in the conquest of the Philippines and of Cuba?

Senator Perrault: In the civil war, too.

Senator Gigantès: And the civil war. Have we memorialized those Canadians? We have memorialized Americans who fought on our side in a war in which America later joined. There is a clear distinction, in my view.

The parallel with World War I and World War II is not one which gives a precedent for what we are being asked to do now. We memorialized Americans who came and joined our forces in a war that we got into first. They fought for Canada. They did not fight for someone else at the time. Both of those were wars in which eventually both Canada and the United States were belligerents and on the same side. That is why we memorialized those people.

The point about Vietnam is precisely that we as a nation decided not to enter that war. That some of our manufacturers made money by selling weapons in that war is not something that we can equate with a decision of the Government of Canada to participate in that war.

Americans have memorialized Canadians who have fought on their side, and there are possibilities to do so right now, and right here. By agreement with the Canadian government, the United States will be given a central and important location on which to build an embassy, which will have lots of land around it, and the United States can honour people who fought on its side in a war in which Canada deliberately did not participate.

There is a principle here as to whom we should memorialize. We have always memorialized only those who fought in wars in which we participated, and when we do that we memorialize people of a different citizenship who fight on our side. We honour them, and we are grateful. However, we have never memorialized Canadians who have gone to fight in wars in which we as a country were not participants.

I find this a most difficult motion. With all regret, I certainly will not vote in favour of it when the time comes. I understand that those who did fight in the war would like to be memorialized here, but the appropriate thing is for the United States to memorialize those who risked their lives for the sake of the United States.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, this motion has been on the Order Paper for some time. Inquiries in the Senate on the same subject have been debated at length. I would like to see the debate continue and the motion adopted today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: I find that there is some uncertainty in my hearing. Will the honourable senators who are in favour of the motion to adjourn please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will the honourable senators against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is with great regret that I rise, because motions for adjournment on motions such as this have been accepted in the past. I do not like to have a vote on a matter such as this, but it seems that we will have to have a standing vote.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in the senators. Unless otherwise ordered by the Whips, this will be a one-hour bell.

Senator Molgat: Might the bell ring for a shorter period of time? Our Whip is not in the house at the moment, but I think he would agree to a shorter bell.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: What do you propose?

Senator Molgat: Fifteen minutes.

Senator Kinsella: It takes more than 15 minutes, honourable senators, for our colleagues who are in the Victoria Building to get here. May I suggest half an hour?

Senator Molgat: In the absence of our Whip, I agree to half an hour.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that this will be a half-hour bell, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, the motion that is before us is a rather unusual one for us to have a vote on, and I think it is clear that it is not debatable. I want to make it clear that I am not debating the motion, but I want to raise a point of order that I cannot raise once the vote starts.

It is unusual for the Senate to refuse a senator's motion to adjourn a debate. It has occurred, but in my time here it has never happened on the first day of debate on a motion. It is true that this motion has been on the Order Paper, but it has not been debated until today.

There is a serious consequence to a vote by which the Senate would refuse a senator adjournment of a debate. It came to me when I realized what we were into here. It is a consequence that I suspect Senator Marshall, being the democrat that he is, would not like. I understand that he has some concerns, which I hope are unfounded, but this is the consequence.

I had to go into my office to get a book of some precedents that I have been collecting over the years concerning the question of the adjournment of a debate. This is a memorandum that Mr. Fortier, an earlier Clerk, gave me at my request back in the late seventies. It is a memo dated in 1969.

> It is usual for a member who wishes to have the floor on a future day to move the adjournment of the debate, and to give him the priority when it is resumed. The house also frequently agrees to adjourn the debate in order to allow an opportunity to a member to continue his speech on a future occasion.

That is when we are in the middle of a speech and we say, "May I adjourn it," and then we continue. It goes on to state:

> But a member must rise in his place when the house resumes the debate, otherwise he will forfeit his privilege.

This is the part that we should consider, and on which perhaps we should ask for a ruling. It states:

> If a member should move the adjournment of debate, and the house should negative that motion, he will have exhausted his right of speaking on the main question. When a debate is adjourned until a future day, a member who has previously spoken on the subject has no right to speak again, unless a new question has been proposed in the shape of an amendment.

That means that Senator Perrault's right to speak, even if he wanted to be heard today, will have been shut off if the Senate refuses his adjournment today.

I did a bit of further research. The same thing applies if someone wants to stand a motion and the Senate refuses, because that is another form of moving adjournment of the debate. A bit of additional research I did at the time, which I am now reminded of, explained the reason for that. The reasoning behind that — and it is implied here — is that the motion to adjourn the debate is considered a part of the speech, and the speech is considered to have opened. Therefore, if it is refused, he has lost his right to speak since he is only entitled to speak once on the motion.

Before we take the vote, if honourable senators would agree, perhaps we could defer that vote in order for the Speaker to consider and rule upon this point, so that we can be sure of the consequence of our vote.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think that Senator Frith's points are extremely well taken. I lived through the practical experience of refusing the adjournment of a debate or asking for the refusal when I was on the other side, and the debate on the particular bill had been going on for four or five days. Frankly, we suspected that the opposition were unduly delaying a decision on the matter. Senator Frith was then Leader of the Opposition. He moved the adjournment and I said "No." He and others will recall that there was quite a discussion, an argument, and great concern about refusing the adjournment of a debate at any time. Fortunately, we came to an agreement concerning when the bill would be disposed of.

However, in this case we are being asked to adjourn the debate on the first day of debate when, theoretically, the chamber is made aware of an issue for the first time. Senator Gigantès spoke in reply to Senator Marshall and raised some new points. Senator Perrault wants to reflect on them. I should like to assume that he would take the first opportunity tomorrow to continue the debate. I think that it is his right, and the right of all senators not to be hastened into a decision.

I understand Senator Marshall's concern — we know his valuable contribution in this chamber on matters relating to veterans. Similarly, we know that this issue has preoccupied him for many years, and he is getting impatient to resolve it and suspects that, by adjourning the debate today, the end of this motion is not yet in sight. I would like to think, honourable senators, that whatever decision we take on this motion we can take it as soon as the debate is over, which would mean — because the issue is so clear cut — one or two days.

I do not want to commit the Senate to a decision, but if we can agree to adjourn the matter today, let us hope that we can pursue it tomorrow, and then on Thursday, perhaps, a decision can be taken. That would be my suggestion.

If the vote is taken, I will not vote against adjourning the debate because that would cause a precedent that we would not want to be reminded of if a similar occasion were ever to occur.

The suggestion that Senator Frith has made, namely that Your Honour should reflect on this matter, or that the chamber, after hearing the arguments, should take a decision on its own, is a reasonable suggestion. Nevertheless, this is a case for reflection before we get too hasty.

Senator Frith: I do not wish to apply undue pressure here because there are ways that we can reflect this situation. If what has gone on has been any reassurance to Senator Marshall who, as described by Senator Lynch-Staunton, might well have thought initially that there was a mini-filibuster going on, and if he is reassured that this is not the case, then the whole matter could be resolved if he decided to withdraw the motion and obtained unanimous consent to do so. That is a possibility.

Another solution — and he might want to reflect on this — would be to have the vote deferred while the Speaker confirms whether or not my interpretation of the result of the vote is correct.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I do not want to disturb the relationship between the two sides nor the operation of the Senate, but I did notify the deputy leader's office this morning that I would be dealing with my motion No. 13.

We have initiated debate on an inquiry of mine, and anyone can speak on it. It is adjourned in Senator Berntson's name. Further, I will not stand in the way of the adjournment of this motion if I can be assured that there will be a vote, or that the motion will be adopted within a reasonable period of time — or, at least, unanimous consent has been given that there will be a finality to this motion, rather than having it adjourned beyond my date of retirement next November. If we receive that consent, then I would be satisfied.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with my colleague Senator Marshall on record as being willing to accommodate the Senate in this respect, speaking for this side I would suggest that the vote not be proceeded with, but that the motion be reached in the normal course of business tomorrow and dealt with at that time.

Senator Frith: That would require unanimous consent, not to proceed with the vote.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with unanimous consent that can be accomplished, if it is the wish of the Senate not to proceed with the vote.

Senator Frith: Incidentally, you can put the motion forward again tomorrow. There is nothing stopping you from doing that. Then, if Senator Marshall gets uneasy, he can refuse the motion to adjourn the debate again.

Senator Molgat: No, no. The motion was by Senator Perrault that the debate be adjourned. That is the motion that is before us and which precipitated the vote. Therefore, if we agree by unanimous consent not to have the vote, then the matter stands adjourned to tomorrow in Senator Perrault's name.

Shall we let our officials deal with the way in which it has to be handled, provided that there is unanimous consent within the Senate not to proceed with the vote?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: First you cancel the vote, then you adjourn the debate.

Senator Frith: The consequence of this debate is that, if Senator Perrault wants to maintain his position, he must rise on it tomorrow.

Senator Perrault: I will be in full flight tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent for the suggestion of Senator Molgat and Senator Berntson, that the Senate not proceed with the vote?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: I have the motion by Senator Perrault, which I will put to the Senate.

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Perrault, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, May 11, 1994, at 1:30 p.m.

THE LATE HONOURABLE EGAN CHAMBERS

TRIBUTES

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in Montreal yesterday a funeral service was held for Egan Chambers, a most distinguished Canadian for whom service to the community and the country was more a privilege than a duty. If three words could sum up his life they would be, "He served well."

He served his country during World War II and was awarded the Military Cross. He served the business community through a successful and respected insurance brokerage firm. He served his country and his community as a member of Parliament and parliamentary secretary. He served his party as its national president. He served the linguistic minority in Quebec as a co-founder of Positive Action, which eventually became Alliance Quebec, and he served all Canadians as a member of an immigration tribunal.

These are but some of the highlights of the contributions of a man who felt he could not give enough of himself to a cause in which he believed. Egan Chambers was never an immediately recognizable name; he preferred it that way. Modest and soft-spoken, he never craved centre stage, finding that the successful completion of whatever task was asked of him was satisfaction enough.

Although he was mainly identified with activities by the anglophone community in Quebec, Egan Chambers was prepared to go wherever his talents were in demand. That is how he came to head a committee responsible for implementing the policy of the Parti Québécois on Quebec's cultural minorities. He would not turn down a task in which he believed, although he did not agree with the politics of those who sought him out.

[English]

Although he had known for some time that his physical deterioration had become irreversible, he carried on his many activities without complaint as long as he could. He was unable to abandon living and working for others until life was ready to abandon him.

I offer deepest sympathy to his wife, Gretta, and their children for their great loss. May they find some consolation in the knowledge that Egan's many contributions to his city, his province and his country will not soon be forgotten.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to add just a word to what has been so well and fully said by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to Mr. Egan Chambers. Yesterday in Montreal at his funeral there were gathered the present national leader of the Conservative Party, Mr. Charest, and two of his predecessors, Mr. Stanfield and Mr. Mulroney. They and others, such as the Honourable Flora MacDonald and I, who had been with Egan Chambers in the affairs of that party for more than 30 years, were there to acknowledge the loss of a most admirable friend and colleague.

The issues that took the attention of Canadians and their political parties during those years were often divisive and emotional. They could bring out the worst as well as the best in us. The best in the Conservative and Canadian traditions was represented and always defended by Egan Chambers. In his political activity he was brave and high principled. In his dealings with others he was always generous of spirit. The Conservative Party, among many other institutions in this country, is in his debt.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would join with my colleagues in remembering the late Egan Chambers. I cannot, as my friends opposite can, claim to have had the longstanding friendship and camaraderie of Egan Chambers, although I first met him many years ago, when I was a young reporter in the Parliamentary Press Gallery and he was a member of Parliament.

Mr. Chambers was a warm and fine gentleman whose entire life, both inside and outside Parliament, but most particularly in his city and his province, epitomized the constant effort to bring two sides together in the national equation.

Honourable senators, I join with you in extending our sympathy and very best wishes to Mr. Chambers' family.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with your permission, I wish to signal to you the presence of two former colleagues in the gallery above the clock on the southern side of the chamber.

[Translation]

I would like to welcome the Honourable Senator Poitras and Madam Poitras.

[English]

I should also like to rejoice that once again we are being visited by Senator Barootes and Madam Barootes.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: You can take the boys out of the Senate, but you cannot take the Senate out of the boys!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

THE DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Michael Kirby, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Wednesday, May 11, 1994

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

Your committee, to which was referred Bill C-2, an Act to amend the Department of National Revenue Act and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof, has examined the said Bill in obedience to its Order of Reference dated Wednesday, April 27, 1994, and now reports the same without amendment.

Attached as an appendix to this report are the observations of your committee on Bill C-2.

Respectfully submitted,

MICHAEL KIRBY
Chairman

(For text of observations, see appendix, p. 442.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kirby, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers. The first relates to a question raised on April 19, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Rossiter regarding the Atlantic Groundfish Program, Change in Benefits. The second relates to a question raised on April 26, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Marshall on the reduction of Canadian Forces' capability.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC GROUNDFISH STRATEGY—CHANGE IN BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to a question raised by the Hon. Eileen Rossiter on April 19, 1994)

The vast majority of people currently receiving NCARP or AGAP benefits will qualify for the new program. As a transitional measure, some 3,000 individuals currently receiving benefits under NCARP/AGAP who do not meet the criteria for the new program will continue to receive income support until December 31, 1994. These are individuals who have only a very marginal attachment to the groundfish fishery.

All individuals eligible for The Atlantic Groundfish Strategy will receive between two and five years of income assistance and adjustment programming. An individual's entitlement is based on previous attachment to the groundfish industry.

The Atlantic Groundfish Strategy is designed to be an adjustment program. Elements of this program include licence and early retirement, self-employment assistance, mobility assistance, portable wage subsidy, training and work experience, all of which in combination will serve to reduce the caseload over the next five years. When individuals leave the program or no longer require assistance will depend on the choices they have made.

The financial breakdown based on $1.9 billion is expected to be about $1.4 billion in Newfoundland; $290 million in Nova Scotia; $90 million in the province of Quebec; $45 million in New Brunswick; and $35 million in PEI.

An estimated allocation of Costs over the five-year period is as follows:

($ Millions)

545	445	345	295	270

REDUCTION OF CANADIAN FORCES' CAPABILITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to a question raised by the Hon. Jack Marshall on April 26, 1994)

The budget announced on February 22 is designed to restore fiscal responsibility. A total of $7 billion in reductions to defence spending are planned over the next five years.

Since 1989, all cuts to the defence budget have been applied to personnel, equipment, and operations and maintenance. At the same time, the Department has continued to maintain infrastructure that clearly exceeded any probable defence need, but could not be taken off the books until key decisions were made.

So, the problem of excess overhead had to be addressed immediately. The time had come for National Defence to go through the kind of basic restructuring that much of the private sector has had to undergo in the past — a restructuring that involves:

- streamlining, consolidating and, where necessary, closing certain facilities;

- reducing the numbers of personnel, in our case, both military and civilian; and

- shifting to a more "bottom-line" style of management of defence resources — which, for the Canadian Forces and the Department means delivering a defence capability at the lowest possible cost to Canadians.

A review of every item in the defence program led to the decision to cut infrastructure, support elements and projected personnel levels immediately in order to meet the assigned budget reductions.

The planned reductions in no way prejudge or pre-empt the outcome of the defence policy review now under way. The new objectives reflect the fact that in the past few years, the Department of National Defence has seen a number of changes — such as withdrawing troops from Europe and changing the way the headquarters is organized.

The Canadian government would not send its military on a mission without adequate equipment and training. Every effort is made to ensure that our troops are sufficiently armed and protected to meet the kind of threat anticipated in their missions. The emphasis on attacking overhead now, as opposed to waiting for the outcome of the Defence Review, is the best way to reduce overall costs while preserving an effective, combat-capable defence force for Canada. As indicated in our Budget statement, the resulting savings will enhance our combat capability and relieve the pressure in meeting peacekeeping commitments.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

VETERANS AFFAIRS

MOTION TO PROVIDE SITE FOR CANADIAN VIETNAM VETERANS' MEMORIAL—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order just to put on the record the sequence of events as a result of Senator Frith's point of order yesterday.

There seems to be some misconception about what was in the Debates of the Senate going back to February 22. On February 22, I tabled a Notice of Inquiry on the Vietnam veterans. I spoke on it two days later. Senator Phillips intervened. He asked some questions and took part in the debate.

On that date, Senator Gigantès adjourned the debate. At that time I rose again to seek leave to introduce a motion. I want to refer to the debate which took place. I said:

> Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the Senate will be adjourning for two weeks, I ask leave to move a motion.
> The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Molgat asked what was in the motion. Senator Corbin asked:

> Has notice of the motion been given?

I rose and read the motion:

> That the Senate urges the Government of Canada to provide an appropriate site for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial, and;
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the aforementioned action.

The honourable speaker pro tempore rose and asked:

> Is leave granted, honourable senators? If not, this item will appear on the Order Paper as notice.

Senator Gigantès then rose and used these words:

> Honourable senators, I do not think this motion is in order until I have had the right to talk. I moved to adjourn the debate so that I could discuss, in this chamber, Senator Marshall's proposal.

Senator Molgat rose and said:

> Honourable senators, the problem is one of procedure. Senator Marshall has proposed an inquiry so that we can discuss the issue. First, we must proceed to discuss it. Then, arising from that, the motion can come forward. To propose the motion now is, in a sense, precluding the inquiry.

Honourable senators, on March 15 Senator Gigantès spoke on my inquiry; Senator Perrault spoke on my inquiry; the Speaker rose and said:

> Honourable senators, if I have no more interventions on this inquiry and no motion to adjourn this debate to another day, then I would have to declare the inquiry debated.

Senator Berntson then rose and agreed to adjourn the debate to allow other senators to enter the debate.

On March 17, I made a three-minute statement under Senators' Statements, answering questions which were asked by the senators whom I mentioned.

On April 19, I made another three-minute statement.

Since March 15, when that took place, there were plenty of opportunities for any senator in the chamber to ask permission from Senator Berntson to be allowed to speak. Senator Berntson would have given permission, as is the habit in this house. Nothing happened for two months. No one entered the debate. Then yesterday, May 10, I spoke on my motion because I had heard from the Minister of Canadian Heritage that he refused to comply with the request of the Vietnam veterans, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State (Veterans). I had notified the Deputy Leader's office that morning that I would move the adoption of the motion.

Senator Perrault's adjournment motion, by the way, was put to the Senate and the "nays" had it. The government side asked for a division, which never took place.

While I agreed to the arrangements that were made, I just want to point out that you cannot withdraw a motion which has already been put and decided. I quote from Beauchesne's Sixth Edition.

> 308. When the Speaker's attention has been called to a breach of order during a division, the division will proceed and the Speaker will deal with the matter when the division is completed.

Therefore, my motion for the adoption was properly put. I only wanted to put that on the record. I go along with the arrangements that were made for future days.

CANADA OIL AND GAS OPERATIONS ACT CANADA PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACT NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Dan Hays moved the third reading of Bill C-6, to amend the Canada Oil and Gas Operations Act, the Canada Petroleum Resources Act and the National Energy Board Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

He said: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Kenny, who is away on committee business, I have agreed to speak to Bill C-6 at third reading, and I am pleased to do so.

The purpose of the bill is to give the National Energy Board the authority to regulate frontier oil and gas activity in areas where there are no federal-provincial accords. The government will retain the responsibility to establish the overall policy framework for frontier petroleum development. The Crown, as resource owner, also maintains the power to grant the legal permission and exclusive rights to companies to explore, develop and produce.

Let me turn to some of the issues raised during committee consideration of Bill C-6. Concern was expressed by some honourable senators about the impact Bill C-6 might have on northern lands and peoples. I want to assure honourable senators that the concerns and interests of northerners were considered in many ways during the development of this legislation.

First, I am sure that we can all agree that the protection of the fragile environment of the North and other frontier areas is crucial. That is why a review of the proposed legislative changes was conducted cooperatively by Natural Resources Canada and the National Energy Board. The review led to the conclusion that the environmental responsibility would be ably and capably handled by the National Energy Board, which has a strong track record in addressing environmental concerns.

Further, wide-ranging consultations with interested parties were held at all stages of the development of this legislation. Input was sought from both provincial and territorial governments, from industry and environmental organizations, as well as from northern native groups. Significant modifications were made to the original proposals in order to accommodate many of their concerns.

Finally, Bill C-6 contains only those amendments associated with the restructuring of existing federal authorities and those that are necessary to improve the workability of the new regulatory system. The transfer of frontier oil and gas responsibilities to the National Energy Board does not stop, or in any way delay, any future transfers of these same authorities to the territorial governments.

Some senators also expressed concern about consistency of regulation over all the frontier areas, including offshore Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. As I mentioned earlier, Bill C-6 has no impact on the existing administrative or legislative regimes offshore Nova Scotia or Newfoundland. Nevertheless, during the consultations leading up to Bill C-6, it was agreed with the East Coast provinces that a longer-term review of the frontier lands management regime would be timely.

As a result, for the past several months Natural Resources Canada officials have been engaged, with their counterparts in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Newfoundland and Nova Scotia energy departments, in conducting such a review. The objective is to improve the competitiveness of the Canadian frontier vis-à-vis other international frontier areas.

In conclusion, honourable senators, Bill C-6 is one step in the ongoing process to help provide industry with a certain and clear set of rules by which to operate in Canada's frontier regions. Just as important is the fact that the quality and integrity of the regulatory process will be maintained. After all, the enormous resources of the frontier are key to Canada's energy future.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

RAILWAY SAFETY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell moved the second reading of Bill C-21, to amend the Railway Safety Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a simple bill. The main purpose of Bill C-21, to amend the Railway Safety Act, is almost surprising. Many of you may suppose that what this bill will do is change something that is already in legislation. However, this bill will create an offence for trespassing on federally regulated railway property. There is a clear purpose for such a piece of legislation. It will reduce accidents and fatalities which are too often the sad consequence of trespassing on tracks. This legislation is necessary, because a similar prohibition in the Railway Act was revoked when the Railway Safety Act was proclaimed in 1989.

The original trespassing provision in the Railway Act was not included in the Railway Safety Act when the latter legislation was proclaimed in January of 1989, because it was felt at that time that the matter could be addressed effectively through subsequent regulations. A review by the Department of Justice has determined that, owing to the nature of the prohibition, the provision should be established as a part of legislation itself and not as a regulation.

This prohibition will give railway companies a strong tool in their battle against trespassing. It is our firm belief that effective, enforceable legislation, in conjunction with public education, can be a real help in reducing trespassing-related accidents on railway lands.

The department participates in Operation Lifesaver, an educational program aimed at raising public awareness about the dangers of trespassing on railway property. I cannot say enough to support this program, which is run by the railways in the communities. They make presentations to school children and community groups to try to get the message out about how quickly a train comes barrelling down the track and how extremely dangerous trespassing is.

As I said a moment ago, seldom does legislation present such a clear purpose. It is a sad fact that trespassing on railway property is one of the most frequent causes of fatalities and injuries related to railway operations, and the incidence of accidents to trespassers is increasing. In fact, last year, for the first time, the number of trespassing fatalities surpassed the number of lives lost at level crossings.

An estimated 100 people are struck by trains each year while trespassing on railway rights of way. Almost half these people are killed and the remainder are seriously injured. Many of these people are habitual trespassers and an unfortunate number of accidents involve young children and students. I am sure you will agree that these are tragic statistics indeed.

The federal government has introduced this bill as a means of reducing trespassing on railway lands. Trespassing commonly occurs near schools, parks, recreation facilities and commercial or residential locations that have high pedestrian traffic. The reasons trespassers give sound hollow following a tragedy. The excuses usually include the fact that it was a shortcut to get to a commercial establishment, or to a school, or to a residential area.

It is also true that many children use railway tracks for play areas. Unfortunately, a railway right of way is a dangerous timesaver and far too often becomes a deadly playground for young children. There is also a considerable problem of homeless people using railway properties as living or resting areas. Some people are also using the railway property for skidooing, skiing and bicycling.

Honourable colleagues, once you see the statistics, it is amazing just how many trespassers make use of railway property with total disregard for their personal safety.

Many people call for increased fencing. The railways do construct a considerable amount of fencing and also install highly visible signage, but that has not been sufficient to discourage trespassers.

Transport Canada has also worked with the railways to improve safety in areas where we know there is a heavy incidence of trespassers. Measures such as increased railway policing, barbed-wire-topped fences and other steps to discourage trespassers have been introduced as a result.

I should point out that the penalty provisions contained in this act are broad enough — up to $5,000 on summary conviction — to create a major deterrent against repeat offenders. There are some people who, despite being old enough to know better, will not change their dangerous ways unless they have the fear of the dollar put before them. They easily ignore the threat of a speeding train, but getting a ticket is another matter.

It is envisaged in this act that the onus for enforcement would rest with the railways, through their police forces, and there would be no additional demand on government resources as a result of this amendment.

I will add here that the amendment will not affect individuals such as native people or prospectors in remote areas, who may need to cross the tracks on a regular basis to reach their traplines or mineral claims. The purpose of the amendment is to enable railway police forces to take action in areas of continual and dangerous trespassing. People who from time to time cross tracks in remote areas are not considered to be a problem, provided that they cross with due regard to their own safety and the safety of railway operations. It is worth noting that a similar provision existed for close to 90 years in the Railway Act with no problem for those people.

To be sure that everyone is clear on this, I understand that representatives from the railways intend to meet with native associations and representatives of various mining, prospecting and forestry associations, as well as geologists, to explain the implications of the new regulation and seek solutions to any problems.

Honourable senators, I should like to point out that this particular piece of legislation was dealt with in the other place in all three stages at the same time. At that time the official opposition and the Reform Party both voiced their support for the safety of our children.

I am hopeful that honourable senators present here today can see why we, too, would like to deal expeditiously with this matter. How can we not afford speedy consideration of a problem that can help us save the lives of Canadians — notably innocent children?

In conclusion, let me emphasize that the federal government is committed to working with the railways to reduce accident fatalities associated with Canada's railway system. This addition to the Railway Safety Act strengthens an important piece of legislation and, in conjunction with public education, should help remedy the problem of trespassing on railway lands.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while there is no desire to deny or delay speedy passage of this important piece of legislation, our spokesman would like to review the remarks of the honourable senator and put our position tomorrow. Consequently, I move the adjournment of the debate.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT SUSPENSION BILL, 1994

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, with certain amendments, presented in the Senate on May 10, 1994.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, was referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee on April 21, 1994.

The purpose of this bill is to suspend for two years the electoral boundaries readjustment process and to stop any revision of the electoral map currently under way. It further provides that the existing electoral boundaries commissions be dismantled.

The committee has held public hearings on April 26 and 28 as well as on May 3 and 5. We have heard several testimonies, including those of the Honourable Herb Gray, the Honourable Moe Sihota from British Columbia and representatives from the Northwest Territories.

This non-partisan electoral boundaries readjustment system has been in place since 1964, and the commissions can be described as quasi-judicial in that they operate at arm's length.

Some expert witnesses have raised doubts about the constitutional validity of Bill C-18 under section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as well as sections 3 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

•(1410)

Section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867 stipulates that the revision of the limits of the electoral boundaries must be done after each decennial census, although Parliament can exercise a certain discretion regarding the timing to proceed. The committee, at least a majority of its members, is of the opinion, however, that this discretion must be exercised within the ten-year period between two decennial censuses. That is mandatory.

If that were not the case, section 51 would be meaningless. When Parliament legislates, it means something. It is a well-rooted and well-known principle of law. Moreover, since 1964, when the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act came into force, a revision has always been done in the years following a decennial census.

If Bill C-18 is passed, it is probable that the election to be held in 1997 or 1998 will be based on the 1981 census data. That is the thrust of the testimony of the Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. Jean-Pierre Kingsley. Even the government has not ruled out this possibility, according to the testimony of Minister Gray on April 26, 1994.

Taking into consideration the fact that there are about 50 ridings that are over the 25-per-cent limit, the committee, at least a majority of its members, is of the opinion that a two-year suspension is unacceptable and is against the spirit and even the letter of section 51 of the Constitution Act of 1867.

Such differences jeopardize the principle of proportional representation and could even violate the relative equality of the right to vote of all Canadian citizens, as underlined by Professors Monroe Eagles and Kent Roach.

In 1991, the Supreme Court of Canada stated, in re provincial electoral boundaries of Saskatchewan, that a margin of 25 per cent from one riding to another is acceptable in a country like ours. However, a margin of more than 25 per cent would be very difficult to justify.

Only exceptional circumstances would allow for margins of more than 25 per cent.

Now there are variances of over 100 per cent in some ridings, such as North York in Toronto — 93,000 inhabitants in 1981 compared to 233,000 today.

The principle of representation by population, which is the basis of our parliamentary democracy, is expressly recognized in section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

The beginning of a four-to five-year term of office is the ideal time for a government and Parliament to redraw electoral boundaries. Otherwise, the election of 1997 or 1998 will be held on the basis of the 1981, not the 1991, census. If Bill C-18 passes, the beginning of the revision period will be postponed at least until May 1996, and, in all likelihood, the next election would then be held on the basis of the old 1981 census. That is what a majority of the committee wants to avoid.

Of course, the Government of Canada and Parliament can choose to amend the redistribution system by law. Of course, they could also choose to amend section 51 to freeze the number of elected members at 300, for example. They could do so by using section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982; this takes a constitutional amendment but it could be done with a federal law.

A few months is enough for the government to decide whether it wants to ask Parliament to amend section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867 or if it wants to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act with ordinary legislation. That is why a majority of the committee recommends reducing the suspension period from 24 months to 6 months. Meanwhile the commissions will continue their work.

The committee proposes three amendments.

[English]

The first amendment replaces clause 2 of the bill with a provision that will allow the existing commissions to complete their reports and submit them to the Chief Electoral Officer at which point the process will be suspended. If the government does not change the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act by February 6, 1995, the boundary redistribution process will simply continue from the point at which it was stopped.

Bill C-18, as passed by the House of Commons, dissolved the commissions immediately. The earliest time that the process would start again would be May of 1996, unless the government introduces new legislation.

The second amendment replaces clause 3 of the bill and will temporarily suspend the existing commissions, reactivating them in February next, if no new legislation is passed by the government and Parliament in the meantime. This clarifies the position of the commissions during the period of the suspension. Bill C-18 would have abolished the commissions immediately with no provisions to save their work to date. The work would be thrown out and any new commissions would duplicate the process.

There may be some necessary modifications to some of the sections owing to the break in the process. That is why the third amendment replaces clause 4 of the bill and ensures that such changes can be accomplished without further legislation.

Bill C-18 provides for brand new commissions and would consider them to have been established in accordance with the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

[Translation]

This explains why, honourable senators, a majority on the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has serious reservations about Bill C-18. Our amendments are aimed at correcting the serious shortcomings contained in this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith: When you say "our amendments," are you referring to a majority of committee members?

Senator Beaudoin: A majority of committee members.

[English]

Senator Frith: I was not trying to make trouble. He did not mean "ours" as "that side"; he meant "ours" as "the members of the committee." I understood.

Honourable senators, I want to move the adjournment of the debate on the committee chairman's report. Certainly anyone else who wants to may speak in the meantime. I mean to proceed tomorrow.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Do I gather, then, that the government is not anxious to move this bill along?

I ask this because closure was imposed in the House of Commons. It was rushed through the committee during a break. Third reading was rushed through. Now there are amendments to be disposed of, and suddenly, to our surprise, we find there is a rather lax attitude. The report is here. Is it no longer a priority of the government?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, of course Senator Lynch-Staunton can gather what he wishes about the government. I am not speaking as a member of the government. I am speaking as a member of the committee who, among others on the committee, supports the government. The chairman of the committee has given a report, in accordance with the rules, dealing with the deliberations in the committee. I have some material I want to get.

It is very difficult to adjourn a debate around here these days. Do I have to give a long explanation of why I want to adjourn the debate? Will everyone else from now on have to make a mini-speech on why they are moving the adjournment of a debate.

If the honourable senator wants specifics, I am waiting to get some material from the examination of Mr. Kingsley in the committee so that I can quote it in my speech. Is that enough reason to adjourn the debate, or do I have to go on?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I have nothing against adjourning the debate; on the contrary. It is just that I think perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could explain to us why there is suddenly a change in priority of the Government of Canada. Only a month ago this was an essential bill which came under what they used to call "the draconian measure of closure," which should never be imposed because it is so undemocratic.

This bill was so essential for the citizens of Canada that it had to get through as hastily as possible. It comes here, and we have cooperated as much as we can to improve it, to make it better and more acceptable. Suddenly their chief spokesman, who I am sure is representing, if not the government at least the caucus, and therefore the general view across the way, suddenly tells us, "Well, I have to reflect on certain things, so let's adjourn it until tomorrow." That means we are to be quite casual about what was, not so long ago, priority government legislation.

Senator Frith: What does "suddenly" mean?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: To answer my own question, "suddenly" means that the Liberal Party is having a convention on the weekend, and they do not want this matter to be raised.

Senator Frith: Is it possible to move the adjournment of a debate in an "unsudden" way? I stood up and moved the adjournment of the debate, which is what one does. What does "suddenly" mean? Is there some "unsudden" way in which one can do that?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I thought it had something to do with a change in the government's position and the embarrassment they would face in front of their own supporters this weekend for bringing forward legislation that is absolutely reprehensible.

I would gladly second Senator Frith's motion to adjourn the debate.

Senator Frith: Nothing that will happen at the convention or in between will have anything to do with the adjournment. The legislation is there.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): We are giving serious thought to the amendments.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. I am informed by more experienced authorities than myself with regard to the rules and regulations, that once a motion has been made, there is no debate. I assume that I interpret it correctly.

I would ask that the motion be put. Senator Frith?

Senator Frith: I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL SPORTS OF CANADA BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, for the second reading of Bill C-212, to recognize hockey and lacrosse as the national sports of Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: It has been moved by the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, that the bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole now.

Senator Olson: That was sudden.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on that motion, it may be the wish of the Senate to proceed to Committee of the Whole now, but I believe that we will probably need to have Committee of the Whole tomorrow on another bill. It might therefore be more sensible to consider this bill at the next meeting of the Committee of the Whole, if that is agreeable. We could then process whatever bills we need to deal with in Committee of the Whole at that time. There might be a series of bills.

Senator Graham: Make it the next sitting, then.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, that this bill be referred to Committee of the Whole at the next sitting. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to Committee of the Whole.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 435)

THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE BILL C-2, AN ACT TO AMEND THE DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE ACT

Bill C-2, An Act to amend the Department of National Revenue Act and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof, was considered by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on 3 May 1994.

The Committee has not amended the bill, but the Committee feels strongly that those who appeared before the Committee, on this matter, raised a number of concerns that warrant serious consideration by the government. Consequently, the Committee has decided to present these views in its report.

The views of the government will be presented first. The views of those who feel that this bill in some way compromises border security will follow.

The Committee as well as the witnesses who appeared, both for and against the bill, recognise that there is no "right" view of what will happen. Both sides agree that with good management, good intentions and an appropriate level of resources, border security will not be weakened, and indeed may be strengthened by this bill. The concern that some, or all of these elements, may not be present has led the Committee to report the concerns of the witnesses clearly to the Senate.

THE CASE PRESENTED BY THE GOVERNMENT

National Revenue and Customs, Excise and Taxation have been two separate departments under the Ministry of National Revenue since 1926. The National Revenue portfolio administers more than 185 acts and regulations, incentives, credits, surtaxes, and international treaties. Its accountabilities as a department are to provide border services and border protection, to facilitate international trade, to assess and collect taxes, duties, levies and other payments on behalf of the Government of Canada, the provincial governments and the territories. The Department also, through tax administration, makes social and economic payments to individuals and the business sector.

This year Revenue Canada will be collecting about $190 billion in revenues from Customs duties, Excise, GST, and other taxes. The revenues taken in represent about 90% of total federal revenues.

In a given year, Canada will welcome at the Canada-U.S. border about 130 million travellers. Revenue Canada processes about 43 million transactions at the border, which represent about $150 billion worth of trade. It has to deal on an annual basis with 1.9 million GST registrants, 900,000 employers, and about 23 million individual taxpayers.

Essentially, Bill C-2 will provide a single administrative structure to execute the Department's responsibilities. It is a very simple bill. It eliminates two deputy ministers, the Deputy Minister of Customs and Excise and the Deputy Minister of Taxation, and replaces them with a single Deputy Minister of National Revenue. Beyond that the legislation will eliminate all the existing legal and administrative barriers which force Revenue Canada to administer its programs through separate administrative structures rather than through an integrated, coordinated approach.

The Minister of National Revenue is responsible for a number of statutes: the Customs Act, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Income Tax Act, and the Special Import Measures Act. Because these various pieces of legislation were enacted at different times, special administrative structures have been established to administer the acts separately. For example, a separate entity deals with SIMA, the Special Import Measures Act. There are separate data bases for each part of the Department. There are separate information technology branches. There is the customs administration which deals with the Canada Customs Act. Separate structures and duplicate common services have developed, over the years, to manage the department.

The administrative consolidation, resulting from this bill, will allow the department to realize economies of scale, avoid duplication and overlap, and ensure that it takes an integrated approach to interaction with businesses, the small corporation, the client or the taxpayer, thereby maximizing the use of district offices in the field. A Canadian citizen who wants to deal with any aspect of his accounts with National Revenue will be able to do so through a single office under C-2. It will provide one-stop shopping for clients.

The only controversial aspect of C-2 is the question of whether consolidation will jeopardize the delivery of Canada-U.S. border services and the protection of Canadian sovereignty at the border.

The government assured the Committee that C-2 in no way diminishes, modifies, or abrogates the minister's responsibilities under the relevant statutes. C-2 is meant to strengthen the performance of these legislative responsibilities, specifically in terms of border services.

Customs will continue to have as its objectives, to ensure a responsible and effective enforcement of our laws at the border and our sovereignty. The facilitation of the movement of people and goods and the provision of services to other government departments -- such as to agriculture, fisheries, environment and health -- at the border will still be a priority. Customs officials will continue to assess and collect duties and taxes on behalf of the federal government and the provinces. C-2 will not change the responsibility of customs officers.

In response to questions, the Deputy Minister of Revenue Canada said that he did not anticipate an increase in the Department's base budget. Revenue Canada has been given additional resources and dollars and FTEs -- full-time equivalents -- or person years to respond to specific new policy initiatives, but it has not been given the resources required to cope with, for instance, workload increases under the existing base program. On the other hand, C-2, he stated, is not meant to reduce staff.

What the department will be doing is moving toward the reduction of personnel and money expenditure at the top executive level and the reallocation of those resources to the front lines.

The Department annually invests about $45 million in training. In support of the training function it has about 350 full-time staff devising and providing training to employees throughout the portfolio. For example, there is a training school for Customs inspectors in Rigaud.

The Committee asked the Deputy Minister what new roles people at the border will be performing that they are not now performing. The Committee was assured that the border service role will largely operate as it does now. The delivery of the program will not be substantially changed. Customs officials will continue to process and handle travellers and to process commercial goods. The integration will be at the top levels, at the headquarters, but at the border itself, the integration will not result in new activities.

There might be some complementary activities that will develop over time but not as a result of consolidation. These activities would result from the department being more client-oriented. Consolidation means that the customs administration will be able to rely on the technological capacity of the whole department. It will be able to deal with an importer not only strictly as an importer, but also as a Canadian corporate citizen. It also means that, in the future, the importer will not have a multiplicity of client accounts with Revenue Canada, but will be able to deal with the department through integrated revenue accounting.

In summary, Bill C-2 is designed to enable the Department to be managed more effectively. But it does not change the number, or the roles and responsibilities, of front-line staff who are employed at border crossing points.

THE VIEWS OF THE CUSTOMS EXCISE UNION DOUANES ACCISE

The Customs Excise Union Douanes Accise has some 11,000 members, employees of the Government of Canada who work for the Department of National Revenue. The union argues that the integration resulting from the amendments proposed in Bill C-2 will compromise national safety and security through a watering down of border protection. This will then lead to an increase in the number of criminals entering our country and an increase in the illegal importation of child pornography, drugs, firearms and other contraband.

The Union's concern is that because the proposed legislation will cause Customs and Excise to be absorbed into the Taxation administration, the daily priorities of Customs inspectors, the union argues, will be overshadowed by those of a taxation-focussed administration.

It is the Union's contention that while they share certain revenue-collection functions with the Taxation Department, these two groups have no extended community of interest. The Union asks if it is wise to erode further the enforcement role of Customs personnel at Canadian borders when smuggling is at an all-time high, when the availability of weapons and the corresponding violence is on the increase in Canada, and when criminals are making their way into Canada.

The Union cites the Ekos Report, a government-funded study conducted as recently as 1992, as confirmation of its contentions. The report cites a critical need for customs employees to be provided with a clear mandate, better working tools and more training. It also calls for more effective interdepartmental communication between Immigration and Canada Customs.

The Union also argues that less border enforcement will place an added burden on municipal and provincial police forces; this in turn places an added financial burden on provincial and municipal governments.

The Union also dealt with its view of the current status of the "anti-smuggling initiative" announced by the Prime Minister on 8 February of this year. In his announcement, the Prime Minister committed $45 million and 350 new full-time equivalent positions, or person years, to combat the massive smuggling operations which are prevalent along Canada-U.S. border. The Union stated that assurance was given that two-thirds of the 350 full-time equivalents or person years, or approximately 233 full-time staff, would be hired with the balance being staffed by various term appointments, ranging from three months to two years.

In spite of the urgency placed on this initiative by the Prime Minister, almost three months have now passed and, the Union says, only approximately 30 of the 233 full time inspectors have been hired across Canada. Instead, a number of transfers have been made, or are being contemplated, from taxation personnel, who, the Union points out have not received the mandatory testing and training to be customs officers.

The Union wants serious consideration to be given to the concept of customs officers being given full peace officer status under the Criminal Code. Their contention is that this is a necessary step to allow for the proper enforcement of existing legislation. At this time customs personnel do not even have the power to stop impaired drivers at the border and are under orders to let them go and notify city police.

The Union also suggested that the role of customs inspectors not be confused nor diluted any further by integrating them with some 40,000 other employees whose primary function is to collect taxes without first quantifying the social and economic repercussions that this integration will have on all Canadians. The Union believes that, under a taxation administration, the priority will be tax collecting. Law enforcement activities will receive less resources.

The Union claims that, under the smuggling initiative, and in the past, in spite of stringent requirements for training, supervision and testing, the department is hiring more and more students -- not only summer students under the COSEP plan but also part-time students throughout the year -- with little training.

One Union member testified: "When I go in to work, I put on a uniform. I have been involved in drug seizures, prohibited weapon seizures, pornography seizures, recovery of runaways, liquor seizures ... One of the things that keeps our officers going is a sense of pride. When you get involved in a gun seizure, a drug seizure, you feel good because you have protected someone, you have helped someone, and the officers get a little bit of, if you want to call it, a high. They feel very good about it. They do not want to lose this. We employees feel that integration will take some of this away."

The Union offered a specific example of problems it foresees. Currently, in St. Catherine's, there is a pilot project called Small Business Registration Number. In a nutshell, it combines different numbers -- import numbers, tax numbers -- into one number. It involves a six-day training. One of the uniformed customs inspectors took the training. The department is trying to teach this officer how to give basic information on income tax, corporate tax, GST, payroll deduction. This is a uniformed customs inspector. The Union feels that this approach waters down their ability to do enforcement, because when an inspector is taken away to stay by a phone or at a counter to provide information, that person is taken away from border responsibilities - to recover firearms, prohibited weapons, etc.

The bill also does away with 10 Customs regions across the country. These are being replaced with six regions which, for the most part, will be directed by Taxation personnel who will administer the service at the border. The basic argument of the union is that this is not administrative consolidation; rather, this is a major structural change in how the Customs service is delivered. What the Union is looking for is some assurances that Customs will not get lost in the Department shuffle of priorities and resources.

TESTIMONY OF:

Mr. Neal Jessop, President,
Canadian Police Association

Mr. Scott Newark, General Counsel,
Canadian Police Association

Ms Priscilla de Villiers, President, CAVEAT

Ms Linda de Belser, President
Child Find Canada Incorporated

These witnesses testified about the security now provided at our border crossings with the United States and questioned whether Bill C-2 will make an already bad situation worse.

Representatives from the Police Association expressed serious concern that the mandate of the customs service might become subordinate to the taxation/revenue functions of the department. They felt that this would place considerable added burden on local police forces and could compromise security at the border.

The President of CAVEAT stated that the concerns of that organisation come from the recommendations of a coroners' jury into the death of Jonathan Yeo. The deputy minister of Revenue Canada, in response to a letter asking for department reaction to the recommendations, made clear that the power of the Customs officer is merely to enforce the Customs Act. The provisions of the Criminal Code cannot be enforced.

In order to illustrate the depth of concern about the need for the enforcement component at borders, the President of CAVEAT, Mrs. de Villiers, described the circumstances of the Jonathan Yeo case.

On 9 August 1991, Nina, Mrs. de Villiers' daughter, disappeared. She had been jogging on the sidewalks around the racquet club to which their family had belonged for ten years. Nine days later her body was discovered in a marsh near Highway 401. She had been shot in the head. Her killer was identified as Jonathan Yeo, a man with a long history of violence against women who had then gone on to rape and kill another young woman. He was arrested in New Brunswick, after an attempted abduction of yet another young woman, and finally committed suicide.

Grave questions were asked about why a man accused of a vicious sexual assault on a stranger, in which he had used two weapons, uttered death threats and held the victim for eight hours, was free on bail with no weapons restriction placed on him.

He had tried to leave the country but had been turned back at the border by a U.S. immigration official who, although it was not his responsibility to do so, took it upon himself to inform the police that a suicidal armed man was being turned back into Canada. The U.S. Customs officer spoke to both Hamilton-Wentworth and Niagara Regional Police. Both felt, erroneously, that there was nothing they could do. They refused to respond. U.S. Inspector O'Hare then phoned Canada Customs, under the impression that they were able to ask to see the gun and could confiscate it. Customs passed the matter on to Canada Immigration, as they believed that Yeo had never left Canada and that they had no right to question him.

The confusion between the two departments as to when Canadian citizens technically leave Canada was not cleared up until a year later in court. The departments had conflicting views of this question.

Canada Immigration believed they had a right to question someone who had been refused entry to the U.S., but because Yeo was a Canadian citizen, he could not be prevented from returning home. Alexander Welsh, the Canadian Immigration officer, conducted a record search and decided that there was no point in talking to the police himself because, "If the police weren't interested, they weren't interested. They get pretty frustrated if you bug them. We don't always get along." He then decided that the customs officers would stay in their booths while he, the immigration officer, went to the car, questioned him as little as possible in order "not to disturb him," and quickly sent him on his way.

The supervisor of the customs officer explained in court that they were concerned because Yeo was unstable and that he might try to shoot somebody. She said that they had no mandate to try to take his gun away from him because he had not left Canada and, 90 minutes later, Nina disappeared.

This episode at the border raised serious questions about public safety. The sequence of events which had led to Nina's death, and the death of Yeo's other victim, was not evident until the coroner's inquest which began on 13 April 1992, and ended four months later.

The coroner's jury presented 137 recommendations to the Chief Coroner after hearing 108 witnesses and examining more than 300 pieces of evidence. Lack of communication both within the individual departments -- that would explain the difference in the mandate as understood by Immigration and Customs -- and as between provincial and federal levels showed a startling lack of accountability.

In a letter of response to the jury recommendations, dated 26 July 1993, the deputy minister, Mr. Pierre Gravelle, stated that the Yeo incident was such a rare occurrence that it did not necessitate changing the protocol of service at the border. Commenting, the President of CAVEAT said: "... I personally became aware of another case very similar to the Yeo incident which was never made public. I brought this to the then-minister of public security Mr. Doug Lewis' attention, but I have not yet received any official response."

CAVEAT went on to express further concerns about border safety. The President of CAVEAT argued that there must be some designated authority that is clearly charged with protecting our borders and that is accountable.

The President of Child Find Canada then expressed similar reservations about Bill C-2. In April of 1991, Child Find Canada became a partner with Project Return. This program put 34 Customs inspectors on full alert for abducted children and runaways. Child Find caseworkers work closely with Customs officers to prevent cross-border abductions. Border alerts are put out immediately upon registration of abduction cases. Pictures of all missing children are placed on hand-held computers at the border so that Customs officers have an up-to-date account of all national and international cases registered.

Customs officers are a vital link in the search process and are trained to spot possible abductions at the borders. Today, Canada Customs has reported the recovery of 72 abductees. Child Find's toll free number is frequently used by Customs officers to check names of suspicious adults and children against our national registration list. The reason for this is that Customs officers do not have access to the databank used by law enforcement officials. It is only through Child Find's on-call caseworkers and its police connections that Child Find is able to get that information to the border when a Customs officer suspects that a child is being abducted. In several cases, these abductions have actually been stopped.

The President of Child Find stated: "I have not heard anything here that indicates that customs will still provide the services that we have already coordinated with Project Return at the border. All I have heard relates to taxation and money. How will we stop the abductions at the border? As early as 22 August 1993, it was U.S. immigration that returned two abducted children to their legal guardians in North York. A month prior a similar occurrence happened in Saskatchewan. It is United States immigration that is doing this for us. It is not the customs office in Canada that is protecting our borders."

RESPONSE OF THE MINISTER

"With respect to the bill itself and whether it will make the situation worse at the border, I have to say flatly that there seems to be no possibility that it could make the situation worse, unless there were associated decisions made which would be, in my view, quite contradictory to the theme and spirit, not only of the bill itself but also some other actions the government has taken."

"Many of the concerns raised today, I think, and I say this with respect, simply do not apply to this bill. This bill is a relatively minor proposal with respect to ministerial reorganization."

"With respect to Child Find, we hope that by having more people at the border, as we are doing, that we will have a more effective process of picking up the kidnapped child. We hope we can improve that, and certainly the assistance provided by Child Find to Canada Customs has been immensely valuable. We could not do what we do without their help."

"...my belief is that Canadian Customs will be a far more important service in the future than it has ever been. We could probably be more successful with respect to the work of picking up kidnapped children, but we cannot do it if we are checking each head of lettuce in each crate as it goes across the border. We will have to change the way we do things. That is what this bill is about. It may not be enough. Perhaps I will be back in a year hence or less than a year hence with other bills. We intend to change the Customs Act and the Excise Act. You will see ... more legislative activity out of this department." The Minister went on to say "...you will probably see more [legislation from the Department] than you have seen in the past ten years."

In regard to the issue of making customs personnel peace officers, the Minister expressed serious reservations based on the psychological, training, cultural and legal implications of such a decision. He stated: "In my view our society does not become safer by arming people where it is not necessary."

Canada is not unique in proceeding along the lines indicated in Bill C-2. Denmark and the Netherlands have already done so and now the United Kingdom is taking steps to consolidate Her Majesty's customs service and inland revenue service.

In the European Community, the deputy minister proceeded to explain, the traditional customs presence as we knew it before in those countries has been dramatically altered because of the open borders. The shift has been to law enforcement activities in which the customs program is now more involved, not only in the detection of drugs at the border but also inland. There may be a similar shift, over time, in Canada.

The deputy minister closed by stating: "I will be very candid with you and very personal. I am not happy with the current state of affairs. I realize full well there are a number of things we need to do which go way beyond the departmental mandate. It is of critical importance that we do a better job at coordinating law enforcement agencies; that we have a clear focal point to talk about public security, to talk about gun smuggling, and so on. This is happening. It is not something that can happen overnight, obviously, but I am truly committed to that."

CONCLUSION

In summary the Committee feels that the witnesses have raised legitimate concerns. Taxation is the largest component of Revenue Canada. Can the customs service maintain a distinct identity with a clear mandate under consolidation?

All participants in the hearings agreed that there is nothing in Bill C-2 that would necessarily impede the enhancement of border safety. Appropriate resources, a strong commitment and a clear mandate are the assurances that Canada's borders will be safe.

Nevertheless, the Committee recommends that the Department:

examine carefully the means of providing better protection against the importation of illegal substances and materials at the border and of maintaining personal security at the border; and also ensure that co-ordination with peace officers, with appropriate jurisdiction, be strengthened;

monitor carefully the impact of consolidation on staff morale and take steps to deal effectively with any problems that may arise; ensure that training is carried out in ways that the services delivered at the border will effectively satisfy the roles of the Department in all respects; and not subordinate the customs function to the revenue/taxation function of the department.

The Committee expresses strong concern about the alleged growing illegal importation of weapons into Canada. It urges that the Senate consider recommending referral of this issue to an appropriate Committee for study.

Finally, the Committee intends to invite the Minister to return in one year to inform the Committee about how consolidation has affected Departmental resources and programs and how the Department has addressed the concerns raised in this report.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE LATE HONOURABLE EDGAR FOURNIER

TRIBUTES

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I have the unpleasant duty to inform this House that one of our former colleagues from my province of New Brunswick, the Honourable Edgar Fournier, has passed away. Senator Fournier died on April 29 last, in Saint-Basile, New Brunswick. Appointed to the Senate in 1962 by the Honourable John Diefenbaker, he retired from the Senate in 1983.

Edgar Fournier had a long career in public life. Elected for the first time to the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly on the Conservative ticket in 1952, Edgar Fournier quickly found his way to cabinet and became Chairman of New Brunswick Power, a position he held until July of 1960.

Edgar Fournier himself felt that his greatest achievement in that capacity had been the construction of the Beechwood power dam. Under his watchful eye, the project was completed one year early and a few million dollars under budget.

After being defeated in the 1960 provincial election, this former teacher and school principal entered federal politics and won a seat in the House of Commons as a result of a by-election in 1961.

Appointed to the Senate the following year, Senator Fournier launched into the business of this place. He took an active interest, among other things, in matters relating to the United Nations. His interests were many and varied, from the art of tattooing, motorcycles and road safety to the state of disrepair of railway service.

Our colleague, the Honourable Jean-Maurice Simard, who unfortunately has been detained today, has known Senator Fournier since 1959. He once described his Acadian friend as a work addict, a man of great rectitude guided by sound principles, who believed that above all else family was the cornerstone of our society.

Father of six, inventor and miniature train and plane buff, Edgar Fournier had a thirst for learning. He never lost touch with the ordinary working man and showed a firm commitment to human rights. New Brunswick and Canada as a whole have lost a great man. I wish to offer our deepest sympathy to his children and grandchildren for their loss.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I, too, would join with Senator Kinsella in paying tribute to the late Edgar Fournier, who passed away at the age of 85 a couple of weeks ago.

I did not enjoy the privilege of working with him, because he had left the year before I joined this chamber. However, I know of the great contributions made by him to the people of the province of New Brunswick, to the Senate, and to the public life of this country.

As Senator Kinsella said, Mr. Fournier served in the New Brunswick legislature and was the chairman of the New Brunswick Hydroelectric Commission. He was also a member of the House of Commons for Madawaska—Restigouche.

Before coming to this chamber in 1962 he had enjoyed a tremendously varied career because of his many skills. He worked as a welder, a metal worker, a garage and snowplough operator, a vocational school teacher, an instructor in aircraft maintenance, and an inventor. He was quoted as saying that he believed that hobbies kept young people out of trouble and old people young. His interests, which included glass blowing, motorcycle riding — even on Parliament Hill, I am told — flying model airplanes, wood carving and oil painting, all exhibited an energy that could not be curtailed.

He was admired for his unique character, both on Parliament Hill and, I am sure, back in his home province. He was respected for his single-minded contribution to the job in this chamber and in the other place.

I join with all of my colleagues on both sides of this house in extending sympathies to his family in memory of a very fine public servant.

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I vividly recall September 22, 1952, almost 42 years ago. This was a memorable day in my life and in the life of the late Senator Fournier. On that day, both of us were elected to the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly. I was 26 years old.

The premier of the day had called an election for September 22. Premier McNair was a Liberal and his administration had been in office for 17 years. Obviously, his team expected to win again, but a young man from Carleton riding by the name of Hugh John Fleming, who was opposition leader at the time, emerged victorious on election day. Edgar Fournier won the riding of Madawaska for the Conservatives, while I was elected as the Liberal member for Kent.

I cannot say that we were close friends, but we always respected each other. Indeed, I respected the late Senator Fournier throughout his career.

He was exceedingly aggressive by nature, but extremely competent in a range of areas. The Leader of the Government in the Senate has just listed his considerable talents in several different disciplines.

Senator Fournier was an unparalleled technician. I recall the years when he virtually oversaw the construction of the Beechwood power station, which at the time was the largest hydroelectric station in New Brunswick. The Premier had appointed him Chairman of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission and as such, he had been put in charge of overseeing the construction of Beechwood. I can tell you that he succeeded in this undertaking and that Beechwood continues today to generate plenty of hydroelectric power.

However, all good things must come to an end, and in 1960, the government had to concede defeat at the hands of a young man who had been elected on the very same day as Edgar Fournier, and that man was yours truly.

I want to tell the Senate today that right after the election of June 27, 1960, I received only one congratulatory telegram from the former government. It was from Edgar Fournier. Even the premier did not see fit to send me congratulations because he was not so pleased with the result and neither were the other ministers. Nevertheless, Edgar Fournier thought that he should send me a congratulatory telegram. I was very pleased.

After he left provincial politics, he was briefly in the House of Commons. One thing I remember very well about Edgar Fournier is that he had a television program in Saint John called It Could Happen to You. He was a technician who handled cars, planes and all that.

Week after week, he would describe how car accidents happened, using miniature cars on a small set. It was so well done that it caught the attention of all TV viewers in the years 1962 to 1965, I am not too sure of the exact dates. It was a program designed and produced by Edgar Fournier, in which he was the principal actor.

Many other things were said about Edgar Fournier. I said that he was not my greatest friend, but he was not my enemy either. We had great respect for each other.

It only remains for me to express my condolences to his children and grandchildren.

UNITED NATIONS

INTERNATIONAL DAY OF THE FAMILY

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I should like to underline the fact that next Sunday, May 15, is the day that the United Nations General Assembly has proclaimed as the International Day of the Family.

The family is an institution that touches all our lives but is most often the one taken for granted. To try to define the typical Canadian family today is next to impossible, as there has been growing diversity in family forms. There are still examples of what one calls the traditional family composed of a married couple and their children; but there are also families composed of common-law couples, families whose parents have remarried and families with a single parent. It looks like sooner or later we will be considering families with same-sex parents. Each family is comprised of a group of people united by certain convictions or common affiliations.

The traditional family has gone through great changes in the last 30 years. Women have joined the workforce in unprecedented numbers. The dual-income family has become predominant, surpassing the traditional one-income family unit. The reality is that many women can no longer afford to stay home and raise their children. Moreover, they also want to achieve their own aspirations.

Thus, the modern family faces many new challenges. Families must find affordable, reliable and high quality child care, which we know is not available to everyone. They must balance their time between work and children. They must also care for elderly family members.

With our baby-boom population aging, the extended family is once again becoming predominant. Because of the rapidly dwindling financial resources of our health care and social systems, many families are providing care for aging relatives. Indeed, contrary to what most people seem to think today, more of the elderly live with their families than in institutions. In fact, 25 per cent of the elderly live with family as compared to 11 per cent who live in institutions. Obviously, this is an extra load on families.

Clearly, with all the changes happening to the family unit it is necessary to highlight its importance. The family is an issue of concern to everyone. If something goes wrong in a family unit, it often has repercussions on society as a whole.

I should therefore like to pay tribute to those families who must cope daily with the many external pressures present in today's society, but yet are able to maintain the integrity of the family unit through their belief in its intrinsic value. To those who are unable to achieve the same goal, I think we have to give more thought as to how we can help them best in order to ensure that our society will be as stable and as productive as possible.

Regarding Sunday, May 15, permit me to encourage everyone here to commemorate this special day by reaching out to family members and letting them know that they are an integral part of our life.

THE LATE HONOURABLE EDGAR FOURNIER

TRIBUTES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thought that Senator Lavoie-Roux was rising to say something about Senator Edgar Fournier. I am sorry that I did not rise quickly enough just now, but I would like to join in the condolences expressed for Senator Fournier.

I had the pleasure of knowing him in this house. I knew him a little differently than most of my colleagues, I am sure. We were in opposite political parties. He was a Conservative and I am a Liberal. At that time, senators shared secretaries. Having a Conservative like him and a Liberal like me share the same secretary was somewhat different from the rather partisan situation today. You know, that system worked very well, without difficulty!

Indeed, this same woman, Ginette Lafrenière, is still my secretary. To give you an idea of the kind of man Edgar Fournier was, she remained very close to him. Until quite recently, she went back to visit him every year and called him on the telephone fairly often. For me, that is the kind of man Edgar Fournier was, very likable and courteous, someone to whom one could really become attached.

I would like to join my colleagues in extending our condolences to the Fournier family.

TRANSPORT

SEARCH AND RESCUE— REPLACEMENT OF SEA KING HELICOPTER FLEET

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, I read with interest an article in the May 6 edition of The Globe and Mail, which reported that a colleague from the other place had apparently had a change of heart regarding the need to replace Canada's Sea King helicopters.

According to the press report, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans was quoted as saying:

> ...there is a need for the government to replace this fleet soon.

The statement certainly surprised me and has caused me to wonder if the Liberal government has changed its position regarding the safety and viability of Canada's search and rescue fleet. As senators will recall, the new government was no sooner sworn into office last fall when the contract for the much-needed helicopter program was cancelled.

The press article has caused me to reflect on how helpful those comments would have been at that time to prompt the new Prime Minister to reconsider his decision. Unfortunately, members of the government, including those from Nova Scotia, were silent on the issue, until now.

Honourable senators, I would not want to suggest that what has prompted one member to finally speak up is the tragic crash last month of a Sea King helicopter, in which both the pilot and co-pilot were killed. It would indeed be unfortunate if it takes such a horrific accident to call people to action.

Perhaps there has been a decision to adopt the same approach as the Premier of Nova Scotia, who admitted that he had deliberately kept quiet, during the election campaign, about the Liberal position on EH-101s, despite his disagreement. As senators will recall, the same premier then made a mad dash to Ottawa to try to convince his federal counterparts not to cancel the contract, recognizing not only the need for this vital and safe equipment for our forces and our fishermen who rely on search and rescue, but also the jobs that would be created in Nova Scotia as a result of the program.

Just as it was with the premier back then, so too is this intervention today too little, too late.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, which deals with the budget of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(g), I move that the report be now adopted.

I am asking for this procedure, honourable senators, in view of the fact that the committee is in full operation. It is expected that the Senate will be away for 10 days, and the committee would appreciate the opportunity to function during the adjournment.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: What was the total budget? We did not hear the numbers.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have not even seen the report, and I do not recall it being read. Do we have a copy of the report in front of us? What are we asked to give leave to adopt?

Senator Olson: How about later this day?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No. I want the reasons why there is such haste for a report that we do not have.

Senator Hastings: I ask honourable senators that it be taken into consideration later this day.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What are we going to take into consideration later this day?

Senator Hastings: The report of the committee.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: But we do not have the report in front of us.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am having a little bit of difficulty. Perhaps Honourable Senator Hastings is suggesting that we distribute copies and come back to this item later.

Senator Hastings: Agreed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, let us agree that the report be distributed. Then Senator Hastings, at the appropriate time, can ask to revert to this item and, if he wants to at that time, ask for leave to proceed with the report today, or we will get to it at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: From the nodding of heads, I take it that that is agreeable. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration later this day.

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Fifth Report of the Senate Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, which deals with the budget of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hastings: I move that the report be distributed immediately, and I ask for permission to revert later this day.

Motion agreed to and report placed on Orders of the Day for consideration later this day.

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, which deals with the public works plan for the Parliamentary Precinct. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate.)

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John B. Stewart, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, May 12, 1994

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

Your committee, to which was referred the Bill C-4, An Act to amend the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, April 28, 1994, examined the said bill and has agreed to report the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN B. STEWART
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this might be a good time for me to discuss with the house the proceedings today and in the next week or so, because we are asking leave to proceed with third reading for a bill.

The reason we are asking for leave is that we expect to have Royal Assent today at five o'clock. I think our practice has been, in the past, that when we have bills that have proceeded through to third reading stage, we normally give leave. I had better get this on the record now that Royal Assent will be at five o'clock today.

Honourable senators, I am basing this on the assumption that we can complete the bills which are before us. We have Bill C-21 for which, I presume, we will have leave today to proceed to third reading. We also have Bill C-212, which yesterday was referred to Committee of the Whole. I hope those bills can be dealt with in Committee of the Whole later this day.

That brings me to the major bill, Bill C-29, the fisheries bill. Following a discussion with my honourable friends opposite, they have agreed to move the bill rapidly through three stages today. As requested by my honourable friends, Ministers Ouellet and Tobin will be present this afternoon for the committee stage of this bill.

On that assumption, we will complete our Order Paper and the bills that are outstanding, with the exception of Bill C-18 which we have agreed will be carried over.

Senator Berntson: Let's do it too!

Senator Molgat: On that basis, I recommend that when we adjourn today, we adjourn to Wednesday, May 25 at two o'clock in the afternoon.

As honourable senators know, the House of Commons is not sitting next week. Therefore, there will be no legislation coming forward. When we meet on May 25, we will have before us Bill C-18, but no new legislation. It would be a great opportunity for committees to schedule work for that week, with the knowledge that they will have more time to devote to witnesses and to their work.

Last week we experimented with having a "committee week" and I thank honourable senators for their cooperation. It was a very successful experiment, and we accomplished a great deal of work during that week. It is something we can keep in mind for the future. The week of May 24 will not be a committee week, but there will be an opportunity for substantial committee work.

We are asking for leave to have third reading today on all three of those bills I just mentioned, because of Royal Assent taking place later. This may mean changing the order of business a little. If possible, I would like to be ready to proceed into Committee of the Whole at 3:00 p.m. or shortly thereafter, when the ministers will be available. To that extent, we may have to move around certain items on the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE
COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, May 12, 1994

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

Your committee, to which was referred Bill C-8, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act (force), has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, April 26, 1994, examined the said bill and has agreed to report the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

GÉRALD-A. BEAUDOIN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-29, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, on the question of leave, the Deputy Leader of the Government has told us that the intention is to proceed through all three stages of this bill today. I wish to ask the sponsor of the bill, and the ministers who will appear, to put on the record some clear evidence as to why we have to proceed with it in all three stages today.

I have never been persuaded that a reason for the Senate to proceed through three stages can be found in the fact that it was so done in the House of Commons. My experience has been quite the contrary, namely, that if a bill goes through the House of Commons in all three stages in one day, that is a good reason to give it a very careful look here. In fact, as a corollary, it could be more persuasive as a reason for speedier passage here to be told in the Senate that a bill took a long time to pass, and that it was given careful study in the House of Commons.

I believe the minister and the sponsor will be able to tell us that there is a good reason to do so. I only wish to register that we should always regard a request to pass all three stages of a bill at one sitting, especially in the Senate, as an exception; in fact, a rarity.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I hope the ministers will convince us of the urgency of the bill this afternoon. If there is a commitment on this side to proceed with the bill through all three stages, so be it, but it is not a practice we should make a habit of following. The ministers will need to be very persuasive.

Senator Frith: I think it is important for us to have something on the record, explaining the exception.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, perhaps I might make an observation. I have gone through the bill and I have listened to the ministers in the other place. As a Newfoundlander, I can assure you that this bill covers our needs, and it is definitely the case that the quicker we get it passed, the better.

Would it be in order for me to take a moment to explain one little thing, or shall I wait and speak later?

An Hon. Senator: Later.

Senator Petten: Very well.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I want Senator Petten to speak now.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I want to make it clear that it is not just because the House of Commons passed the bill in all three stages in one day that I am proposing the same here. I am doing so because I am convinced that this is an urgent matter. However, I agree with the comments by Senator Frith and Senator Lynch-Staunton. We are not simply here to rubber-stamp legislation. We should certainly give these matters careful thought. However, every now and then, as we have seen, for example, with bills on back-to-work legislation and so on, these emergencies arise.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: I must say I fully support the position taken by Senator Frith. I realize that when, on occasion, it may be in the national interest to pass back-to-work legislation, we must act expeditiously. However, I have the impression that in the other place they are making a habit of asking us to push bills through because of some emergency; or so they say.

Recently, we passed three bills, and I still believe we could have examined them more thoroughly, especially the legislation on the fixed link with Prince Edward Island and the bill to create new territories in the Northwest Territories. I think that acting on such short notice is a very bad habit for us as senators.

[English]

Your Honour, there is written over the door to your chamber, "Order excludes haste and precipitation." That is a phrase that should motivate senators whenever we are asked to pass legislation quickly.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I must speak on this point. I want to tell my colleagues that I, personally, am not insisting that this bill be passed by this house now because the House of Commons put it through quickly. I am happy that they did so, because the quicker it is passed here in Ottawa, the sooner we will stop the exploitation of small fish on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

QUESTION PERIOD

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

GRANTS TO PROJECTS IN NEW BRUNSWICK— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. During the month of April and the first week in May, Liberal MPs in New Brunswick announced grants from Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency to five different projects. Since the ACOA advisory board in New Brunswick was not aware of these grants and was not consulted, would the minister explain what the federal government's position is with respect to the role and responsibility of the respective boards? Can the leader advise us as to who made the decision for the granting of these funds?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Cohen for her question. I am not personally aware of the announcements to which the honourable senator has referred. I shall seek information from the minister in charge of ACOA, and respond as quickly as I can.

PRECINCTS OF PARLIAMENT

PROPOSED RENOVATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government about the flurry of apprehended construction here on Parliament Hill — construction that may be necessary to assure safety; construction that may be desirable to serve vanity, and construction that may fuel turf wars between the landlords and tenants who seek to occupy it.

Earlier questions, all of them unanswered, have pursued the building of 18 fine new office suites for senators in the East Block, as have questions relating to a so-called temporary meeting room in the Victoria Building where a nicely equipped meeting room already stands idle most days of the week, questions about an impregnable vault to be fancied up as a workplace, and questions about a post office with address unknown.

Sheds for the workmen have been built, Johnnies are on the spot, Senate parking spaces have been eliminated, bans on pedestrian traffic have been issued, and money has been spent, although that money has not been accounted for in this chamber.

Senator Olson: Is this just a preamble to your question?

Senator Doyle: Contracts or agreements for future uses have not been seen. The people in charge have continued their noisy silence.

My question, like all the questions that have gone before, has to do with permissions pushed through in a time of recession, commitment of money when boards of economy are matching wage freezes with every kind of operational penny-saving.

Senator Olson: Any question yet?

Senator Doyle: My question relates in particular to the new Centre Block committee room which will, we are told, serve the Senate until the Commons has need of it. I ask the minister if we can hope to have full information on the Senate's involvement in a nonfunded Public Works strategy, developed in 1991-92 but never brought to the attention of this chamber or debated by its members?

A quick glimpse at the sixth report submitted today by the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee is helpful and appreciated, but it deals with anterooms and designs for the distant future. It bows to the vision of Public Works and says nothing about the state of the budget.

Can we not have done with the conceptual and get down to what all of this is going to cost and what spaces and facilities developed will be securely established for the use of the Senate, and then approve or deny what is being done in our name?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the simple answer to Senator Doyle's question is "yes." I have been pulling together information. Senator Doyle's questions are not easy and they are not short. I am in the process of pulling details together. I will add the detail of today to the list. I am hopeful that I will have an answer for Senator Doyle very soon.

INCOME TAX ACT

FEDERAL COURT OF APPEAL—DECISION TO STRIKE DOWN CHILD SUPPORT PROVISIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. Recently the Federal Court of Appeal struck down provisions of the Income Tax Act which required divorced custodial parents who receive child support payments from their ex-spouses to pay income tax on those payments.

Will the government appeal this ruling of Justice James Hugessen or will it allow this decision to stand? If so, who will pay the income tax on the moneys involved?

I appreciate that you cannot answer in full detail, but if I could have some idea of the government's intention in this regard it would be very helpful.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Johnson for her question. As she knows, this is a very complex area, in some ways made more so by the court ruling that came out a few days ago.

My colleagues the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Finance are reviewing that ruling very carefully. There is no decision at the moment on the question of appeal. As my friend will know, there is a period within which the government has to make that decision.

Given the nature of this issue and the impact it has on so many lives across this country, and most particularly on the lives of children, great care is being taken in these deliberations. I will be pleased to convey the message just as soon as I have it.

TRANSPORT

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, further to the statement made by Senator Comeau during Senators' Statements in regard to the Sea King helicopters that air crew currently have to fly, in view of the most recent mishap, and in view of the decision of the military to support the acquisition of new helicopters, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform honourable senators what is being done to replace these archaic pieces of equipment, which I, as a commercial pilot, believe are endangering the lives of our military personnel?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Thank you, Senator St. Germain, for the question. As I said in answer to your colleague a couple of days ago, we all feel great sadness because of the very recent crash of a Sea King. It is a tragic situation and everyone in this house believes that.

With respect to the helicopter itself, I will repeat to him remarks that were made by the Minister of National Defence elsewhere. The accident is under review. We do not have the results of that review yet. Nonetheless, he is assured by the military that these helicopters are well maintained, otherwise they would not be in use.

It is true, and the government has never denied it, that there will have to be some replacement at some point of these Sea King helicopters. They are judged airworthy now. As my friend will know, that judgment is extended to the year 2000.

My friend the Minister of National Defence is very conscious of all the elements involved in this issue. I reiterate, the Sea Kings would not be in use unless they were airworthy and well maintained.

Senator St. Germain: I have heard and I have read what the Minister of National Defence has said. The question of airworthiness of 40-year-old machines is rather debatable.

In view of the fact that the government made a commitment in its Red Book to scrap the EH-101s, which would have given us a tremendous lead in technology and various other spin-offs, would the government reconsider the possibility of obtaining this excellent aircraft which was approved by the military and others?

Senator Fairbairn: I will, of course, pass Senator St. Germain's question on to my colleague. The decision on the EH-101s was taken with a great deal of thought, a great deal of concern and a great deal of seriousness. As I said, the Minister of National Defence has been quite clear that, obviously, other options will be considered for the future. I will be glad to ask him the specific question and I will let my friend know his answer.

HANDLING OF GRAIN ON WEST COAST—EFFECT OF FAILURE TO MEET COMMITMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, the question I will ask today is getting to be repetitious, but because of the very serious nature of the grain handling situation on the West Coast, I think it deserves some special consideration.

What in fact is happening on the West Coast? Just recently the Minister of Agriculture, upon returning from China, indicated clearly that the Chinese are very concerned about our ability to complete the orders. There is demand for Canadian grain, and this kind of congestion holding up the situation does not augur well for the future of the grain industry or for the economy of the country.

Has the Honourable Leader of the Government anything to report? I want to stress the urgency of a report in that regard.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Gustafson for his question. I do not think there is anyone more concerned about this issue than the Minister of Agriculture, whom you know well. I was speaking to him again this morning about this issue. I am mindful of the detail you were seeking the other day as to the exact statistical situation at the Port of Vancouver and I am trying to get that precise information.

The Minister of Agriculture indeed has returned from a trip in the Far East, and he has come back more invigorated than ever to put some order into this situation. It is for that reason that he will meet in Winnipeg, on May 16, with the major players in the whole situation of grain transportation across Western Canada and at the port. At that time he will have a very frank, on-the-table discussion, not just of what the problem is, but of how the devil it is going to be solved, and solved quickly, for the benefit of the farmers in Western Canada.

Senator Gustafson: Honourable senators, Senator Olson has brought to the attention of the House the fact that his investigation showed that the grain handlers were not moving the grain with any speed, to say the least.

The question is very direct. Has there been any improvement in the way the grain has been handled? How many boats are now being stalled and paying demurrage? Is there anything to report to the house today about this?

Senator Fairbairn: As I said earlier, Senator, I cannot give you numbers. I believe there is an improvement at the Port of Vancouver. There is also an indication, from the testimony that was placed before the committee in the other place, of a considerable improvement and of strengthening of will among the various parties to come to a satisfactory conclusion.

In recent days, Senator Olson has been in nearly constant contact with the ministers involved and will be watching very closely the results of the deliberations in Winnipeg next week. Then we will review the situation vis-à-vis activity on the part of this house. It is clear to all of the ministers concerned that this is a very broad question. However, there is also a narrow part of it that is causing enormous risk for this country right now. It is for that narrow part of the question that we hope to have some advice and ideas flowing from that meeting next week.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have five delayed answers to questions. I hope my honourable friends opposite note how quickly the answers are coming forward. I recall some difficulties in the past.

I have a response relating to a question raised by the Honourable Mira Spivak on March 17 regarding the Sagkeeng First Nation, effect of pulp mill pollution. The others are in response to questions asked on March 21 from the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer regarding Canada-China relations, representations on human rights abuses; on April 20 by the Honourable Senator Gustafson regarding delay in grain shipment from the prairies; on April 26 by the Honourable Senator John Lynch-Staunton regarding conflict of interest lobbying; and on April 26 by the Honourable Senator Spivak regarding the International Joint Commission recommendations on toxicity reduction in Great Lakes, guidelines for detection apparatus.

SAGKEENG FIRST NATION—EFFECT OF PULP MILL POLLUTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Mira Spivak on March 17, 1994)

Environment Canada and Manitoba Environment have launched a joint investigation into the spill of the pesticide, Busan 52, into the Winnipeg River at Abitibi-Price Inc.'s Pine Falls pulp and paper mill. The investigation will take a minimum of a few months to be completed before any decisions can be reached on possible charges to be laid.

The federal investigation is looking into the possible violation of both the Pulp and Paper Effluents Regulations for failure to report the spill immediately, and the general provisions of the Fisheries Act, for deposit of a deleterious substance into a body of water frequented by fish. The Manitoba government also has mandatory requirements for spill reporting under its Dangerous Goods Handling and Transportation Act.

The Minister of Environment has advised the members of the House of Commons that she will report back on this issue as soon as we have a final conclusion.

CANADA-CHINA RELATIONS

REPRESENTATIONS ON HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES— GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer on March 21, 1994)

This government's approach to China and human rights can only be understood in the context of our overall bilateral relationship.

We think that isolating China is both impossible and inappropriate. It has a quarter of the world's population, is a permanent member of the Security Council, is a rapidly ascendant international trading and economic power, and a nuclear weapons state with the world's largest standing army. Engagement, therefore, is the cornerstone of our policy towards China. This government wants to engage the Chinese leadership and people in a constructive dialogue that will provide an opportunity for real influence on human rights and other critical issues, such as non-proliferation, regional security, and the environment.

It is our intention to raise our concerns about human rights in meetings with senior Chinese leaders, as the Prime Minister did in his recent meeting with Vice Premier Zou Jiahua. Moreover, we have been among the most active of Western countries in developing a constructive dialogue with the PRC on this question. We have undertaken and are currently developing a number of cooperative projects to assist the PRC in reforming its legal and judicial structures.

At the same time, we intend to maximize our commercial and economic links to China, which is our fifth largest trading partner; this government is not going to apologize for creating jobs for Canadians. Trade and human rights are not two mutually exclusive policy choices. It supports the process of economic reform in the PRC, and a China, modernizing and opening up to the outside world, can only be good for its people — both economically and politically.

Our approach with respect to China is consistent with the Government's general approach to human rights. Our ultimate aim is not to punish offending governments, and certainly not their innocent citizens, but to influence governments to respect their peoples' rights under international law.

DELAY IN GRAIN SHIPMENT FROM PRAIRIES— GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson on April 20, 1994)

The fundamental problem with regard to grain movement during the current crop year has been insufficient rail car capacity relative to demand.

The car shortage is the result of a number of factors including: a late harvest last fall, unforeseen changes in grain markets which have resulted in longer car cycle times, harsh winter weather on the Prairies, labour-management disputes at the west coast ports, backlog of cars awaiting unloading at ports, and a shortage of grain cars on the U.S. lease market as a result of flooding in the U.S. last summer.

The car shortage is continental, i.e. similar problems are being experienced in the U.S.

Given the extent of the car shortage problem, there are no easy short-term solutions.

The government has been working closely with all the partners involved, including the Grain Transportation Agency, the railways and the grain industry, to attempt to optimize utilization of the car fleet while at the same time trying to balance the conflicting needs of various grain shippers.

A number of initiatives to expedite grain movements are being actively encouraged with limited success so far:

- weekend loading at country elevators
- weekend unloading at ports
- expanded pooling of grains at the ports
- the use of private cars for commercial grain movements
- the use of open-tapped, tarpaulin-covered, cars (weather-dependent)

In addition, the GTA has placed a relative priority on allocating cars to Canadian port destinations which have the best car cycles.

The railways' grain fleet has increased from about 21,500 cars at the beginning of October to about 27,300. Both railways have indicated that they will be adding more cars in the coming weeks and at that time it is anticipated that cars will no longer be a limiting factor.

Steps are underway to minimize the risk of recurrence next crop year. These steps include improved demand forecasting procedures and a study of car capacity supply and demand.

In particular, the Minister of Agriculture has called a meeting of grain industry officials for May 16, 1994 in Winnipeg, to discuss grain marketing and transportation issues. The Minister recognizes the need to sit down with key industry people and look at what kind of grain marketing system is wanted in the future.

Information on demurrage costs and lost sales is confidential to the industry and is not collected on a routine basis.

CONFLICT OF INTERESTS

LOBBYING, INFLUENCE PEDDLING AND SELLING ACCESS

(Response to question raised by Hon. John Lynch-Staunton on April 26, 1994)

In June 1993, the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs made a number of recommendations on changes to the Lobbyists Registration Act. The committee recommended more timely and comprehensive information disclosure by all lobbyists, as well as changes to improve the Act's administration and enforcement. The Standing Committee did not recommend that lobbying be prohibited.

In the Speech from the Throne of January 18, 1994, the government stated that legislation will be tabled to increase the transparency of the relations between lobbyists and the government.

The government will soon be tabling amendments to the Lobbyists Registration Act to address the Standing Committee's recommendations. The government is committed to ensuring that all lobbyists be required to substantially increase the amount of information they disclose on their activities. The public has a right to know who is attempting to influence government decisions.

It should also be recognized that everyone has a right to make his or her views known to the government. Ministers, members and the government work on behalf of the Canadian people, and the Canadian people are entitled to access to decision-makers without benefit of lobbyists.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—RECOMMENDATIONS ON TOXICITY REDUCTION IN GREAT LAKES—GUIDELINES FOR DETECTION APPARATUS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Techniques used to measure low concentrations of toxic chemicals in the environment vary greatly depending upon both the nature of the target substance and the medium (water, tissue, soil) in which it is being measured. Typically, a chemical analytical procedure involves a process to concentrate the contaminant and isolate it from the host medium, a process to separate the concentrated contaminant from other material that might interfere with the measurement and a process to reliably identify it and measure its concentration.

For a wide range of contaminants, particularly such contaminants as pesticides, PCB and dioxins, mass spectrometry is a powerful tool often employed in that third and final step. It provides reliable identification and measurement, frequently at extremely low levels of detection (less than parts per billion). The process is somewhat analogous to fingerprinting. The limits of detection, however, are affected by all steps in the analytical procedure as well as by the actual selection of the mass spectrometer. These instruments vary in their measurement capability depending both on the type of equipment used and on the target contaminant itself (i.e. how a particular material reacts to a specific instrument). The results obtained using mass spectrometry will likely be corroborated using alternative equipment, also available to the Government, as an additional measure of certainty. It should be noted that there are many substances for which alternative techniques may be preferable.

A current example of high resolution mass spectrometry in this type of application is the Reference Method for the Determination of Polychlorinated Dibenzo-para-dioxins (PCDDs) and Polychlorinated Dibenzofurans (PCDFs) in Pulp and Paper Mill Effluents. This technique reliably measures 2,3,7,8-TCDD (dioxin) at a limit of quantitation of 15 ppq (well below 1 part per trillion).

It is likely the substances targeted for virtual elimination will indeed be amenable to mass spectrometric measurement. However, should some substances not be suitable for this technique, the Government laboratories are equipped with testing capability for virtually all materials likely to be considered. The Government is also capable of carrying out biological measurements confirming elimination of toxicity.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Department of National Revenue Act and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

RAILWAY SAFETY ACT

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lewis, for the second reading of Bill C-21, to amend the Railway Safety Act.

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, I rise today to second the remarks of my colleague, Senator Bonnell concerning Bill C-21, to amend the Railway Safety Act.

We recognize that this piece of legislation is an important amendment to the Railway Safety Act that will help reduce injuries to approximately 100 people each year who are struck by trains because they have trespassed on railway rights-of-way. The tragic fact about this statistic is that many of the deaths and injuries that occur involve young children. Unfortunately, many people make use of the railway property with too little concern for their own safety. Continuing efforts to educate young Canadians about the dangers involved with trespassing, and to improve barriers to access on railway lands have not been enough to reduce trespassing nor the unfortunate number of accidents that occur.

This amendment to the Railway Safety Act will provide the authorities involved with the necessary tools to help reduce and prevent the incidents of trespassing on federally-regulated railway property.

Honourable senators, it is also important to note that this amendment is not intended to penalize those individuals such as native people who may need to cross railway rights of way to tend to their traplines, or individuals trying to access mineral claims and need to cross tracks on a regular basis. This amendment is needed to help the railways minimize trespassing on their property and will result in fewer accidents, deaths and injuries. This legislation is clearly in the interest of public safety and, as such, we support the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Molgat, bill referred to Committee of the Whole.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. William J. Petten moved the second reading of Bill C-29, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

He said: Honourable senators, before I start my speech I would ask the Clerk if he could have the Pages distribute the maps that I have left on the Table, in order that honourable senators can follow my few remarks.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Can we have the map appended to today's Debates of the Senate?

Senator Petten: Yes.

(For map, see appendix, p. 480)

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I stand before this house today at a time of great crisis in the fishery on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. It is a time of crisis for fishermen, for plant workers, for their families and for their communities. The crisis in the lives of so many is occurring because there is a crisis in the resource itself.

We do not know whether it was the Basques 600 years ago or explorer John Cabot 500 years ago who discovered what seemed to be limitless riches of cod and flounder on the Grand Banks. We do know that, for centuries, generation after generation of fishermen have made their living from this important world food source.

Now, all that is threatened. At no time in our history have these resources been so imperilled and the future of our people so uncertain.

It would be difficult to overstate how bad things are with the resource. There have been local failures in the fisheries throughout our history, but never before has the very existence of the resource been threatened. Today we confront that grim question: Will the resource survive?

Environmental conditions seem to be pushing down these fish stocks. There are fewer younger fish. They are growing more slowly. They are taking longer to mature. More are dying of natural causes. That is what is happening today, but it is only part of the reason that we face this crisis in the resource.

Beginning in the mid-1980s, there was massive destructive overfishing of cod and flounder on the Nose and the Tail of the Grand Banks, outside Canada's 200-mile zone.

The fishery in this area is regulated by the international organization known as NAFO, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization. NAFO sets total allowable catches based on scientific advice. These are then divided into national quotas for NAFO member countries.

Canada fished within its quotas, as did fleets from most other countries. We did what we thought was right, though now we know we fished too much.

The European community at the time showed no such restraint. They were not satisfied to fish their NAFO quotas. They wanted more. They set quotas for themselves far higher than those set by NAFO, and they failed to control catches by their vessels.

This heavy overfishing of cod and flounder began in the mid-1980s, severely depleting these resources. It was then in the early 1990s that nature dealt those badly weakened stocks a heavy blow.

We cannot command nature. We can only obey her. If we do not, then we face a terrible consequence: the commercial extinction of the once massive fish stocks. That could happen to northern cod. It could happen to the Southern Grand Banks, 3NO cod, which you can see on your maps, and it can happen to the flounder stocks on the Grand Banks.

Canada has stopped fishing these stocks inside our 200-mile limit zone. Following Canada's lead, NAFO closed the fishery outside 200 miles for the same stocks. To protect straddling stocks, all vessels must comply with these conservation measures. Canadian vessels are doing so inside 200 miles. By and large, nations from NAFO member countries are doing so outside 200 miles. However, vessels flying flags of convenience are not. Overfishing by these vessels outside 200 miles is continuing. The threat it poses to straddling stocks is serious.

A good example is 3NO cod. It has been heavily overfished since the mid-1980s. The stock is at the lowest level ever recorded. There are almost no mature fish left. There are significant numbers only of juvenile fish. If these juveniles are allowed to grow to maturity, the stock can survive and rebuild, but if these juveniles are caught before they mature, there will be no new fish in the future.

In light of this, are any vessels still fishing for cod and flounder on the Grand Banks? Unfortunately, the answer is yes. In some cases, it is a single foreign vessel whose captain does not understand or care. In other cases, whole fleets are fishing these threatened straddling stocks outside 200 miles. They are the pirate fleets. They operate under flags of convenience or sometimes no flag at all. They break all the rules. International conservation decisions mean nothing to them. They want to fish anything they can, any way they can, whatever the consequences.

These fleets now catch almost entirely juveniles. Why? Because there are almost no mature fish left to be caught and because there is almost nothing left of this once abundant resource except stray schools of juveniles. If these are caught, what then? The destruction of the resource will be complete.

The moral question, "Should this be stopped?" has a simple answer: "Yes, it must be stopped." The pragmatic question, "How should this be stopped?" has a more complex answer. When we consider the pragmatic question of how to stop this, we must be guided by the moral imperative that it must be stopped. That is the context of the legislation. Viewed in isolation from this context, one might wonder why Canada is now considering action outside 200 miles to end foreign overfishing. However, viewed within this context, one can only wonder why Canada has not been willing to take these actions earlier.

Until now, Canada's policy has been like a stool with only two legs. The first is our own conservation efforts. The second is international cooperation. However, a stool with only two legs keeps falling over. We now propose to add a third leg. We now propose to give the Government of Canada the means to act outside 200 miles to protect straddling stocks where this is necessary.

The legislation clearly states:

> ...to enable Canada to take urgent action necessary to prevent further destruction of those stocks and to permit their rebuilding, while continuing to seek effective international solutions...

The legislation would allow the government to prescribe the straddling stocks to be protected, the conservation measures to be enforced, and the classes of vessels against which enforcement action would be taken by Canada.

Lest anybody be in doubt, and no one should, let me affirm once again the three fundamental commitments by the Government of Canada: First, Canada is committed to the rule of international law. Second, Canada's goal remains to have effective international controls over high seas fishing. Third, the Government of Canada will use the powers under this legislation only where other means to protect straddling stocks have failed. This third commitment is no less strong than the first two. We will use the powers under this legislation where we have to.

I see no conflict between these three commitments. Instead, I see them as mutually reinforcing. Canada is compelled to act now out of necessity. If we delay further, it may be too late. The great fisheries resources of the Grand Banks could be lost, perhaps for a generation, perhaps forever. That would completely contradict all that is being done internationally to protect these resources. For example, it would completely undermine the conservation commitments recently made by NAFO members.

This legislation, as the purpose clause indicates, is an interim national measure to deal with an emergency pending development of a permanent international measure to effectively control high seas fisheries. The intention is to establish a broad power to act outside 200 miles, but to use it sparingly. The first target of the legislation would be stateless vessels, that is, vessels that have been deregistered by one country and have not re-registered in another country. As we speak, these vessels are wreaking destruction on straddling stocks of cod and flounder outside the 200-mile limit. If we approve this legislation, it will be used without delay to arrest these stateless vessels.

As well, intensive diplomatic efforts are underway to get flag-of-convenience countries to withdraw or deregister vessels flying their flags. If, despite this, vessels flying a flag of convenience continued to fish outside 200 miles, then appropriate warnings would be given. If the vessels still continued to fish, they would be arrested.

Timing is important. The fishery for 3NO cod and Grand Banks flounder stocks is largely a summer fishery. If we act quickly, we can stop it this year. If we do not, the massive destruction will continue for yet another season.

Can we afford to stand by and watch these fleets returning home, laden again with millions upon millions of juvenile cod and flounder? I say no. I believe this house will say no. I believe the people of Canada will say no. We must act now to end the wanton destruction by these flag-of-convenience fleets. This legislation is a concrete expression of the government's commitment to end overfishing by agreement where possible, for example, the NAFO moratoria on cod and flounder stocks, and to end it by action outside 200 miles where necessary.

Foreign overfishing is not a problem that can be solved by timid souls. It requires clarity of mind, constancy of purpose and a steady hand on the tiller. All these we have in the Prime Minister. He set the course on this issue. He has the support of cabinet and caucus. I believe he has the support of provincial governments. Most important, I believe he has the support of the Canadian people.

I appeal to my colleagues on both sides of the house to give unanimous support to this legislation. Let the world see that we are united in this great endeavour. Give the government the tools with this legislation. Then, judge us on how well we do the job.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Honourable Senator Petten.

Senator Frith questioned the government's request to deal with this bill in an extraordinary way. I note on a fast reading of the bill that clause 5 refers to urgency. Has the honourable senator, representing Newfoundland as he does so well, satisfied himself, and therefore can he assure the Senate, that there is a real and present danger, a crisis in the fishery, a real emergency to justify the extraordinary need to proceed with this legislation without delay?

Senator Petten: I thank the honourable senator for his question.

I want to give one example, that of the Kristina Logos, which was towed into St. John's from 228 miles offshore. She had been deregistered by her flag-of-convenience country and had reverted to Canadian registry.

The day before yesterday, I was talking to one of the Department of Fisheries officials who had gone into the hold of that ship and had opened a box there. When he opened the box, it contained fish that were the size of your hand. The official thought that perhaps that was the cullage, that the rest would not be like that. However, every box he opened contained fish of that size.

I believe, and I am subject to correction on this, that on the deck of that ship there was a liner they had neglected to get rid of quickly enough that went inside the trawl. Normally, the thing is about six to eight inches in diameter. This one was about three inches in diameter.

There are some 30,000 people in Newfoundland and 3,000 to 4,000 in the rest of Atlantic Canada on assistance now. There is no way this situation can go on forever; it has to taper off. I have never seen anything as bad in my lifetime. I was about to say my short lifetime, but I am getting to be one of the old fellows around here. I am old enough to remember the depression of the 1930s. I pray to God we never see that again. The fishery is worse now than it ever was in those days.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, Senator Petten has made a most eloquent plea to the house for the speedy passage of this bill. He has told us, as I understand him, that it is intended to apply only to the Nose and Tail of the Bank. When I look at the map which he has provided, I notice that in fishing zone 3N there is a large area of relatively shallow water. Are there no fish stocks there that need the protection to be afforded by this measure? If there are such stocks, why is it the intention of the government, given the importance and urgency of the matter, that the terms of the bill should not apply to that body?

To help honourable senators, let me say that the proposed new section 6(b)(1) refers to an area beyond and adjacent to Canada's fishing waters. I checked in the dictionary and discovered, as I suspected, that "adjacent" does not necessarily mean touching. Consequently, the bill could refer to that area of relatively shallow water in zone 3N. Apparently, then, it is the intention that the bill not refer to that area. Thus I ask, am I correct in that assumption? If I am, why is that the case?

Senator Petten: I thank the honourable senator for his question which I shall attempt to answer. My understanding of the bill is that we are going after the straddling stocks inside and outside 3NO. We will go after the flag-of-convenience ships. We hope we do not have to go too far. We hope to get one or two, and that the rest will go away.

In terms of an answer to the honourable senator's question about the other areas, I should like to wait until the ministers arrive with their legal advisors.

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, unfortunately, we have not been provided with a copy of the bill yet. Thus, I will have to rely on Senator Petten's briefing with regard to it.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, yesterday, I myself brought copies of the bill to the pages to be distributed on that side of the house. I distributed them to this side of the house myself.

Senator Berntson: We have them.

Senator Comeau: A copy simply has not reached me yet. I will rely on my colleague to provide an answer to my question.

As I understand it, the bill is to provide for going after ships which do not have any flags, or ships that have flags of convenience. As I understand it, generally speaking, some of the European NAFO countries have traditionally set their own quotas for these areas. They do not rely on Canadian management information, but rather on their own information. Traditionally, their quotas have been set extremely high; so high, in fact, that they are absolutely meaningless.

What happens to the NAFO countries, especially Portugal and Spain, which traditionally have disregarded completely any kind of conservation measure for these areas to which this legislation will apply? In other words, will these countries continue chasing the fish, which is destroying whatever fish there are left? In other words, are we creating a paper tiger?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not want to interfere with the questions at all. I want to point out that, at the request of my honourable friends, we have two ministers who are presently sitting in the gallery and who would be in a position to answer all of these questions in Committee of the Whole. I suggest that may be a better way of getting the answers.

Hon. John Buchanan: Your Honour —

Senator Frith: And honourable senators.

Senator Buchanan: It is good of you, Senator Frith, to remind me of that, but after 24 years of doing it the other way, it is difficult to remember.

Honourable senators, I have a few words to say about this bill. First, I am 100 per cent in support of it. It is long overdue. A bill of this nature should have been passed long ago.

I have always been in favour of a bill of this nature because, as the fishermen on the Atlantic Coast would say, small fish cannot become big fish if they are caught before they can become big fish. That is what is happening. Smaller mesh nets are being used. Smaller fish are being caught, and we do not know how many are being caught.

Before the other countries joined NAFO, we in Nova Scotia were just as upset as the people in Newfoundland at these vessels just beyond the 200-mile limit fishing on the Nose and Tail of the Grand Banks and in other areas, fishing with smaller nets. You can imagine the anger of our fishermen in Newfoundland and parts of Nova Scotia when they see vessels fishing out there while they, themselves, are, if you will pardon the pun, caught by the moratorium. They cannot fish, yet foreign vessels are fishing.

We can only hope the countries who joined NAFO do not fish just outside the 200-mile limit. They are also under the moratorium. However, we want to focus on those vessels flying flags of convenience, who are immorally, wrongly, and almost illegally catching what is rightfully ours on the East Coast of Canada. Therefore, I have no difficulty with this bill.

Honourable senators, let us pass this bill and have our new frigates out of Halifax arrest the offending vessels, tow them in and fine them.

A few years ago, American vessels were fishing on our side of the Grand Banks, catching the very lucrative scallops in that area. Those vessels were out there at will until Canada decided to arrest them, bring them into Halifax, and fine them. Under the international treaty, the Americans could arrest the same vessels if they rushed back over the international line.

As we speak, a vessel in Halifax harbour is under arrest. The owners will be fined $135,000 to $150,000. That is a deterrent, honourable senators, because the number of vessels fishing on our side of the Grand Banks has appreciably decreased. The operators of those vessels know that when they are towed into Halifax harbour, they will be fined. If they do not pay the fine, their vessels will be sold to pay the fine.

Honourable senators, the same thing should happen with vessels flying flags of convenience and fishing off Newfoundland and the Nose and Tail of the Grand Banks. There will be very few, if any, repercussions, because the countries involved know that these vessels are just flying flags of convenience. They will not be embarrassed on the world scene by having vessels with flags of convenience breaking the international law of the NAFO. They are doing something that is totally wrong, immoral and a tragedy!

Senator Grafstein: I take it, honourable senator, that you agree with Senator Petten that this is a crisis which justifies this extraordinary procedure in terms of the legislation today?

Senator Buchanan: Absolutely. This is a crisis; it is a tragedy.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I know our time should not be wasted in idle talk, but I must say that it is past midnight for this fishery.

Honourable senators, I am sure we are all anxious to see and hear the ministers answering the questions posed by my colleagues. However, I should like to take a few seconds to say how proud I am that the new Minister of Fisheries has taken this action, and how proud I am to be a member of the Senate, with its willingness and desire to have this legislation passed today.

Senator Buchanan: Hear, hear!

Senator Thériault: However, I wish to say to the minister that, while foreign vessels have caused a good measure of the depletion of our fish stocks, they should not take all the blame. For those of us involved in the fishing industry when the 200-mile limit was imposed — it was imposed by Canada and it was a good thing — we lost our cool. We Canadians caused overfishing. The Department of Fisheries was not there all the time to ensure that Canadians were not destroying the fishery. I say to the Canadian people, to the Senate and to the ministers, that fishermen have known for years that with the new technology they can catch the last darned fish on the bottom of the ocean!

I agree, honourable senators, that we should drive those foreign vessels out. However, when the fish return, we must ensure that we do not find governments at the provincial and federal level pouring money into buying new ships and building new plants. No fish stock can stand that kind of overfishing.

The only fisheries in good shape on the East Coast are the inshore fisheries that have been well managed — namely, the lobster and the crab fisheries.

Honourable senators, when it is time to go fishing again, I hope the Department of Fisheries will take a look at the whole system of granting enterprise quotas. These quotas may have looked all right 10 years ago, but they are not right. They are simply not right. Stocks must be managed some other way. If we use a quota system, some of the bigger companies and richer fishermen will find ways to buy those quotas. They will buy ships equipped with the latest in technology, and it will take only five years to deplete the stocks once again. Human greed is to blame, whether the problem is with fishing, farming or selling bonds and stocks.

Honourable senators, I am proud that the new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is taking this action.

To those who wondered why we should pass this bill in one day, I say to them that, if it is passed today, comes into force tomorrow, and the next day one ship is arrested, loaded with those little fish, it will result in a saving of millions and millions of dollars for the fishermen of the East Coast over the next few years.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Eileen Rossiter: Honourable senators, we on this side of the chamber welcome the measures announced in Bill C-29 to protect the important fish stocks on the high seas that straddle the 200-mile limit. However, when we examine the legislation, we find that these very necessary legislative matters and the regulations thereunder are a natural progression of the measures and actions taken by the former Progressive Conservative government towards addressing the grave problems within Canada's fisheries.

Honourable senators, under the previous government, we developed one of the most advanced fisheries surveillance systems in the world by adding new technologies and new equipment, plus increased surface and air patrols, which resulted in improved monitoring of both foreign and Canadian fishing activity. As well, we brought in tough penalties under the Fisheries Act, which means that this country has one of the strictest penalty regimes of any major fishing nation.

Plans were in place to equip this country with 43 new EH-101 helicopters. These would have been better able to meet the demands of extreme weather conditions in Atlantic Canada.

Canada, as well as the other member countries of NAFO, approved of additional surveillance and control measures for fishing outside the 200-mile zone in September of 1993.

Honourable senators, we support this legislation, and we are glad this action is being taken at this time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I want to say a few words on this bill to emphasize the crisis which exists and, to borrow some words from the title of a recent committee report, I would emphasize that "It's Almost Too Late".

In 1987, the Fisheries Committee of the Senate heard from Mr. Ron Bulmer of the Fisheries Council of Canada, which at that time represented some 182 corporate entities in the fisheries, with a membership that included seven provincial organizations. It is one of the most responsible fisheries groups in Canada. Mr. Bulmer said this to the committee, but nobody listened:

> This problem of overfishing has reached that kind of priority level where the government and other ministers must support the Minister of Fisheries. Let's get this problem broadly aired, let us make the senior members of government external affairs, finance and the Prime Minister himself absolutely aware of it, and let us get it on the list of objectives so that every time they are meeting with France, Brussels, South Korea or even Washington, fish is not a nonissue in those discussions.

He went on to say later:

> Unless foreign overfishing of the stock is significantly reduced and the stock is re-built to its full capability the aspirations of long-term and sustained prosperity envisioned when Canada gained management control over the northern cod stock will remain unfulfilled.

That was seven years ago. Another warning:

> ...the magnitude of overfishing of these stocks outside Canada's jurisdiction is alarming and increasing. The ability of the Spanish and Portuguese fleets to continue to fish these stocks at levels that are totally uneconomic for the Canadian fleet is highly discouraging regarding the long-term prospects for these stocks.

Mr. Bulmer went on to say, though nobody was listening —

Senator Stewart: The committee listened.

Senator Marshall: The committee listened, but the government did not respond for 13 months after we tabled our report and made 41 recommendations.

Mr. Bulmer said:

> Overfishing by foreign fleets of Canada's straddling stock has reached the point where their long-term viability to the Canadian fishing industry is in jeopardy. The current approach is not working. The Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) is proving itself to be ineffective as a mechanism to adequately protect Canada's interests. NAFO participants such as Spain and Portugal and non-NAFO fleets from South Korea, Mexico and the United States of America are overfishing important cod and flatfish stocks by 110,000 to 130,000 tonnes...

That was in 1987. I remind the Senate again, seven years ago, and we had just reduced the stocks for Canadian fishermen at that time by 120,000 tonnes.

Mr. Bulmer went on to say:

> There is obviously a strong incentive for these fleets to continue to escalate their fishing efforts outside the Canadian zone. If uncontrolled, this activity by the foreign fleets will threaten the livelihoods of fishermen and plant workers dependent on these fish stocks. In view of the magnitude of the problem, the Fisheries Council of Canada calls on the direct participation of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to develop with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans a concerted action plan to eliminate the foreign overfishing of those stocks which are vital to the Canadian industry and to many fishing communities in Atlantic Canada. In addition, the Government of Canada should now embark on a long-term strategy to enable Canada to gain functional jurisdiction on the Nose and Tail of the Grand Banks.

I will soon finish, but I have been waiting seven years to say this.

> Let me say I agree with you that this is an issue that is actually more serious than the Canada-France issue which you have been looking at over the last couple of weeks.

He showed us a list and a photograph taken out beyond the 200-mile limit.

> Gentlemen, this list alone comprises 164 trawlers which intend to come to our coast this winter, spring and summer, for fishing activities. So I put that in the context of the approximately 20 vessels you have been talking about...

There is more. He went on and on. I think that is enough to emphasize the crisis that existed, and yet Parliament did not listen back in 1987 when Senator Stewart and Senator Thériault and the Senate Fisheries Committee warned everybody about the crisis. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans took 13 months to respond to the report.

Honourable senators, I am sure everybody realizes that I support the passing of this bill in the Senate. The quicker the better, so we can get back the respect of the fishermen of Newfoundland and the Atlantic region.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Petten, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Petten, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole. It is your pleasure to adopt this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would remind you that Bill C-212, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole yesterday, is also awaiting consideration by that committee, as is Bill C-21. Perhaps these three bills could be dealt with contemporaneously.

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider Bill C-29, to amend to Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on Bill C-29, the Honourable Earl A. Hastings in the Chair.

Pursuant to rule 21 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable André Ouellet, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the Honourable Brian Tobin, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans were escorted to seats in the Senate Chamber.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, we are pleased to have with us here today the two ministers who have carried this bill forward. I am sure they would be delighted to entertain your questions.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole is considering Bill C-29, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. Shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I would like to say how pleased we are to see not one but two ministers of the new government with us. I cannot recall when we had a double header here. It certainly stresses the importance of the issue. We do appreciate your coming to answer some questions.

I want to congratulate Minister Tobin for the eloquence of his address yesterday in the House. I did not hear him but I had the opportunity to read his speech this morning. Seldom have I read a speech on an issue where it is evident that the convictions of the speaker are so strongly felt.

It certainly impressed on me not only how important the issue is, but how strongly the minister and his and our colleagues from the Atlantic provinces feel about this issue, and I congratulate him in outlining the purpose of this bill with such great eloquence.

I do have some questions, Minister Tobin. My colleague, Senator Beaudoin will be asking Minister Ouellet a few questions.

The Honourable Brian Tobin, Minister of Fisheries and Oceans: I wonder if I might ask the honourable senator if I could make a small point of order at this stage. My colleague Mr. Ouellet has another engagement to which he is committed. If it is satisfactory, perhaps questions could be asked of him first in order that he may accommodate his other commitment.

Senator Beaudoin: Mr. Minister, I have no problem with the principle of the bill. I have already voted on second reading. As a jurist I am a little concerned about the reputation of our country in the international field.

I have read that some jurists have stated that, strictly speaking, Canada may be making something that is beyond law; but, of course, some other jurists will say that, yes, we are in a crisis, and I agree that we are in a crisis. So they are applying to a certain extent the doctrine of emergency outside the territory of Canada, and even over the 200-mile limit.

Do you have any assurance from your legal experts that this is not unprecedented, that we may have good reasons to do it?

[Translation]

Honourable André Ouellet, Minister of Foreign Affairs: I remind honourable senators that Canada took a similar approach in the 1970s with respect to the Arctic, so there is a precedent. I also recall that on a number of occasions, other countries have passed similar laws to protect what they considered to be the national interest.

Our bill, which contains provisions that enable us to take action, has a solid legal basis. As you know, to protect the integrity of this legislation, we registered a reservation with the International Court of Justice, explaining that this reservation would of course be temporary and would apply only during such time as we felt was necessary to take retaliatory action against those engaged in overfishing.

We have every reason to believe that the legislation gives Canada the right to take action against these pirate vessels and that other countries will not challenge Canada's right to act.

Senator Beaudoin: Do you see this as a necessary, temporary, extraordinary measure, to deal with an emergency?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes. We think that overfishing is a very serious threat to certain fish species and that unless we intervene quickly, across the board, we will not be able to save these species.

We have said from the outset, and Canada's representatives abroad in our various embassies have explained to our European partners and other parties, that this measure is directed first of all toward vessels that are unflagged or that operate under so-called flags of convenience, and these are the people who act like irresponsible pirates and must be removed from the Nose and Tail of the Grand Banks.

Senator Beaudoin: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

[English]

Senator St. Germain: We will be asking the armed forces to enforce this particular law. In Minister Ouellet's statement he stated that we are dealing with fishing pirates. Are we dealing only with them? Minister Ouellet made reference to other countries that will contest this law that we are enforcing. Can the minister assure us that he has spoken to other countries that have traditionally fished in this area and they are prepared to abide by this legislation? Will enforcement put our law enforcement agencies, whether it is the armed forces or the Coast Guard, in an untenable position? The law enforcement agencies could not be put in a worse position than having a law before them that is unenforceable.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Chairman, I will respond to the question posed by the senator. However, I should like to take a moment to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his courtesy and consideration in allowing Minister Ouellet to respond first and to keep his other appointment. I thank you as well, senator, for your kind and generous remarks with respect to the speech that I gave yesterday in the House of Commons. I certainly appreciate your generosity.

Senator, the question you are asking is: Will other countries abide by the authority that Canada has given to itself domestically to act beyond 200 miles? The answer to the question is that Canada is giving itself a broad-ranging authority, or extending its authority beyond 200 miles, expressly for the purpose of conservation. We always said that as a nation we would attempt to resolve the problem of foreign overfishing by agreement, wherever agreement was possible, and would only act by unilateral action where unilateral action was the only remaining alternative.

With respect to the nations of the world, let us come to the question of NAFO, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization. The nations of the world that belong to a fisheries management organization include the European union, the Japanese, the Russians, and the Cubans. All those nations, as well as Canada, are members of a multilateral fisheries management organization. We sit. We meet. We share science. We undertake research jointly. We share data back and forth. We jointly and collectively set quotas. We set individual sharing of the quotas for individual nations, and we set conservation rules. Each of us is responsible for ensuring that our fleets within our nation states abide by the quotas, and abide by the rules that have been established jointly by NAFO member states.

If there are examples, and there have been, of NAFO member vessels not abiding by the rules, it is up to the individual member country to bring its vessels back into compliance. We have the means to achieve compliance within a negotiated agreement and within a multilateral organization. It does not always work perfectly. Sometimes it works less perfectly than Canada would like, but there is an organization there. We say to our NAFO partners, when we find that vessels from the member states are not complying totally, "Please bring those vessels into compliance." We can deal with those nations, and theoretically, there it is.

How do we deal with vessels that do not belong to NAFO, vessels that fly flags of countries they have never seen, vessels that fly flags of countries that neither the vessel nor the crew have ever visited? It is a flag of convenience. We began a policy under the previous government of trying to strip away those flags of convenience from those vessels. We discovered that, as quickly as we stripped a flag of convenience away, another flag from yet another country was issued.

Where we have been successful in stripping flags, we have even seen vessels that are literally without registration anywhere in the world and without a flag — stateless vessels — that have targeted endangered species on the Nose and Tail of the Grand Banks, vessels that are in every sense of the words not only pirates in nature but orphans in their orientation. How do you make an agreement with people who belong to no organization, who change flags at their convenience and some of whom fly no flag? There is no way to deal. We can repeatedly, as we have done — all of us in this Parliament in both chambers on both sides — warn that they should leave or action will be taken. Our warnings have yielded no results.

Therefore, to conclude with the second part of your question, how do we enforce? The Kristina Logos was such a vessel as those I just described. It carried a Panamanian flag and had dual registry, both Canadian and Panamanian. That vessel had never seen Panama or never visited Panama. It had a Portuguese crew. It was a flag-of-convenience vessel. It was a pirate. It followed no fishing plan and belonged to no organization. It had one motive: profit. It had one set of rules: maximize the profit. How did we enforce? We took two coast guard vessels, a fisheries patrol vessel, two RCMP specially trained SWAT teams, and specially trained fisheries officers. We had radar technology aboard the provincial airways and we tracked it, surrounded it and invited ourselves aboard.

Against that kind of well-trained, professional, competent, calm enforcement activity, I think that most vessels will do what the Kristina Logos did — that is, accede to our request for boarding and calmly allow themselves to be taken into harbour in St. John's or Halifax. Enforcement is possible with the proper, well-trained personnel.

Senator St. Germain: Mr. Chairman, through you to the minister, did you say that NAFO has been apprised of what we are doing, and, if so, have they concurred with this legislation, or is this urgent piece of legislation being driven by our end, without having received approval from the NAFO countries?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, I am glad you asked the question. Neither the Parliament nor the Government of Canada have asked permission of other nations to enact such a piece of legislation. It would not be our intention to ask permission of every nation. If the litmus test to determine our fate with respect to the future of these resources, not only for ourselves but for the world, was to have all nations of the world concur in this action, I am afraid this action would never happen. We have not asked anybody for permission, and we do not propose to ask anybody for permission, because we know that that would lead to continued inaction.

Let me say this to you, senator. We finished the second of three sessions of the United Nations conference on high seas fishing this past spring. The third session begins in August. We have made substantial progress at the high seas conference, begun in 1992. The conference is there because the world recognizes that increasingly, with the technology available, we can destroy the resources of the sea.

Those of us who come from Atlantic Canada or the Pacific Coast have always thought of the ocean and the resources of the ocean as being impossible to defeat, to put down or to exhaust. We have discovered that we can exhaust resources. We have wiped out fish stocks. Let us be honest, 2J3KL cod, otherwise known as northern cod, is near commercial extinction, a resource that fed commercially North America and all of Europe. A great, inexhaustible resource is now nearly dead. There has been a 99 per cent reduction in the spawning biomass of northern cod since 1989. So is it dead? We will try to bring it back, but I do not know whether we can bring it back or, if we can, whether it will be any time soon.

We achieved a moratorium in Brussels with our NAFO partners on 3NO cod on February 17, because there has been a massive reduction in that spawning biomass as well, of close to 80 per cent. There is enough left to rebuild it if we let the small fish grow, mature and reproduce. Therefore on February 17 we achieved a moratorium. On February 28, 11 days later, the Kristina Logos was fishing 3NO cod, a stock that the civilized world had agreed ought to be put under moratorium, a stock that the civilized world had agreed was endangered. Those are the stocks that pirate vessels target. If we withdraw the effort of Canadians, withdraw the efforts of our partners at NAFO and those who believe in conservation, we leave those endangered stocks to easy prey, to those who would move in like some scavenger of the sea and take them.

Our choice is to continue to talk through the UN and elsewhere until we achieve an international, UN-sponsored solution to this problem. Perhaps by that time we will have a solution but no resource. We have a choice between waiting for that solution, or moving now to protect what is left of the resource. That is all we are proposing. This is not an extension of jurisdiction. It is, I hope, one nation saying no to —

Senator Frith: Criminals.

Mr. Tobin: The senator is encouraging me to call it criminal activity, and saying no to the depletion and perhaps the loss forever of an important resource to the whole world.

Senator St. Germain: I admire you for your courage, and I wish you well.

The Chairman: Before I call on Senator Kinsella, I would remind honourable senators of rule 84, that when the Senate is put into Committee of the Whole, every senator shall sit in the place assigned to that senator.

Senator Kinsella: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the Minister of Foreign Affairs, but perhaps the Minister of Fisheries can answer. Simply, has the Government of Canada received any representations, either at our missions abroad, particularly those missions in countries which provide flags of convenience, or our nearest neighbour, the United States of America, on this legislation?

Mr. Tobin: I can answer the senator by saying that there have already been some expressions by a variety of ambassadors, who have indicated that they want to know more about the legislation. They have been seeking reassurance. They hope that the legislation we have proposed will not be a precedent for other nations with perhaps less lofty ambitions or motives to try to emulate, perhaps for less admirable reasons. Those kinds of expressions have been made. I had lunch yesterday with the American ambassador and I can honestly report to you that this piece of legislation was not the subject of dinner conversation. We talked about it briefly. I think the United States, like many other nations, wants an assurance that Canada will behave in a responsible fashion. It obviously has some concerns about whether other nations with less lofty motives would use such legislation for different purposes.

I believe, senator, that I would not be leading anyone astray by saying that many nations will register a concern in principle, but will also register, publicly, a great deal of understanding and compassion for the position in which Canada and Canadians find themselves, particularly those who live in the Atlantic provinces. I believe that how we conduct ourselves will ultimately determine whether there is acceptance or acquiescence for what we have done.

I will cite one short illustration: In 1970, Canada passed the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act. That act was passed after Canada had registered, exactly as we did on Tuesday, a reservation to the International Court of Justice. At that time there was much speculation, senators will recall, that the United States would have great difficulty with this legislation, that it would prevent the free passage of its vessels, that there could be conflict, and so on. Canada said that the sole purpose of that act was to protect a fragile environment, an arctic environment. We were concerned about the passage of supertankers.

Likewise today, we want to pass a bill, the purpose of which is to protect a fragile environment, the Nose and Tail of the Grand Banks, the spawning grounds of the once great cod resources of the Atlantic, the last remaining fragile stocks. Those stocks are not subject to the traffic of oil tankers, but are subject to the illicit traffic of predators of the sea, pirate vessels.

Our purpose is the same, and I expect that the world will acquiesce once it sees that our purpose is the same, I hope in the same way.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Minister, I have a few questions to help me appreciate what we will be doing shortly.

Much of the success of this legislation will depend on the regulations which will flow from it. There seems to be a contradiction in your statement of yesterday with regard to how these regulations are being prepared, and where they will go before they are confirmed. You first said:

> We would publish the regulations within a week, and I can tell you we will be enforcing them very soon afterward.

Then, when the House went into Committee of the Whole, you sort of backed off a bit and said:

> When those regulations are published, they will be made public and will be available for the scrutiny of the member and all members of the fisheries standing committee.

Can you indicate the route that these regulations will take before they become official?

Mr. Tobin: I think it will take us a few weeks in total to have regulations in place; that is, to be able to actually take enforcement actions. I think we can move fairly quickly. It will take in the neighbourhood of a week to complete the drafting of regulations. The regulations will be obviously considered by cabinet, or an appropriate cabinet committee, and then made public so that you, senator, and all other interested parties can examine and comment on them.

It is probably safer for me to suggest that it will take two or three weeks to have regulations published and in place to give direction to the appropriate enforcement officials.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There will therefore be appropriate time for any senatorial committee interested in this particular issue to examine them and, if they need improvement, to suggest amendments.

Mr. Tobin: Absolutely. As you know, this bill is fairly powerful. It is a wide-ranging bill. It is quite a strong piece of enabling legislation. Therefore, how we use it is important. We would make strategic or tactical decisions about what we ought to do. We have indicated quite strongly that our interest is in stateless and flag-of-convenience vessels. That is the primary problem, and the regulations would be drafted to reflect that strategic goal.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What percentage of the overall commercial catches are made in international waters, compared to the percentage caught within the 200-mile limits of whatever countries those waters happen to be near, or owned by?

Mr. Tobin: Today, within waters of interest to Canada, adjacent Canadian waters, the cod fishery is, for all intents and purposes, completely closed within our own 200 miles. There is a small cod quota of about 13,000 metric tonnes off the Scotia shelf in the area of 4X. That is the only directed cod fishery left in the entire Atlantic. There are 14 moratoria in place for groundfish within our own 200-mile limit. Therefore, to answer your question, the ground fishery, and specifically the cod fishery, is virtually shut down. All of our own effort is tied up. There are some small by-catches of cod, incidental to catches of redfish, for example. These range from 3 per cent to a maximum of 5 per cent of the by-catch.

Therefore, the only substantial directed cod fishery, where vessels are actually targeting on cod, occurs outside of 200 miles. Specifically, the Flemish Cap, area 3M, has a substantial fishery. Regrettably, much of this fish, which is outside of the NAFO regulatory zone, is small fish as well. It is a matter of concern to Canada from a conservation point of view. We have expressed that concern within the context of NAFO.

The only other cod fishery outside 200 miles is conducted as a directed fishery exclusively by pirate vessels — or stateless and flag-of-convenience vessels. I keep using the word "pirate." In my mind the two words are interchangeable. They direct on endangered species.

Senator, there are four flatfish moratoria amongst the straddling stocks in the area of the Nose and Tail that cross over the 200-mile line. There is a 3NO cod moratorium. All of these stocks under moratorium are being targeted by these pirate vessels.

You ask how much of this illegal fishery for cod is carried on by these pirate vessels. The fact is that, with the exception of 4X cod inside the 200-mile limit, all of the directed cod fishery is being carried on by pirate vessels.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Actually, my question referred to overall commercial fishing, but since the main preoccupation is cod, I will get to that another time.

Mr. Tobin: I apologize, senator.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, no. The question was not out of order, but was not too relevant to what we are talking about.

However, what is relevant is a statement which we have seen elsewhere, and which you raised in your presentation, that is, the national phenomenon of colder water temperatures. Has anyone been able to evaluate the impact on codstocks or the slower maturing process which this has occasioned? I know it is not measurable in a precise sense, but it certainly is a national phenomenon which is having a double-whammy impact on top of the pirates and other predators. Can you expand on that a bit?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, we know from observation that wherever waters are warmer, fish tend to mature and grow more quickly, and therefore reproduce at an earlier age. That is an observation which has been made all over the world. We have also been able to observe that the natural mortality rate of all fish and marine life seems higher where temperatures are exceedingly cold.

We frankly do not know enough about the cold water temperatures now affecting cod and other species off Canada's East Coast. We have 65-year record low water temperatures off the East Coast. We have a change in the salt content in the water because of the additional amounts of fresh water flowing, through the Labrador current and elsewhere, into the ocean. We speculate that these cold temperatures have increased mortality greatly, and have driven stocks into deeper waters offshore.

A couple of interesting phenomena have occurred. Look on this map at the areas 2J, 2H and 3K. Not long ago, Canada had quite a buoyant, vibrant turbot fishery — some people called it Greenland halibut fishery — within the 200-mile zone. Over the last number of years, as colder water temperatures have been recorded, our catch of Greenland turbot has dropped off quite dramatically. In fact, in recent years we have not been able to catch the quota made available by successive ministers of Fisheries. Meanwhile, offshore, out on what we call the slope of the continental shelf, where the water gets much deeper, there has been a new and quite expanded fishery by the Europeans and others for Greenland halibut. For example, six or seven years ago the catch of Greenland halibut on the slope of the Grand Banks was about 5,000 metric tonnes. Last year, it was 45,000 metric tonnes. There was a massive increase in the catch of that stock.

We speculate, although we do not have the scientific evidence to be certain, that the cold water temperatures have driven that stock offshore. It is — and this is unusual — warmer in deeper water than it is in the thermal layer represented by the waters on the Grand Banks itself. We speculate that the stock has gone into warmer waters as a means of self-preservation. That stock, therefore, has become susceptible to a foreign offshore fishery.

The problem for Canada with respect to that particular stock is that it is not regulated by NAFO. When the stock was mostly within our waters, we did not regulate it because it was to our advantage not to regulate it. Now that the stock has moved offshore, where the catch is primarily foreign, it is equally not to our advantage to regulate it because we are regulating it at a time when our share has declined.

Very soon we must make a decision. We will have to decide whether to play a waiting game to see if the stock is coming back inside 200 miles, or whether the survival of the stock is more important than trying to increase Canada's share. I tend to believe that preserving the stock for humanity is more important than waiting to see whether or not Canada can get a larger share.

There have been some water temperature and ecological changes, all of which we do not understand, which have had a terrible effect on fish stocks. We will have to put together some directed and focused research through the universities of Atlantic Canada, through a continuation of the work of the open network, which we funded for $3 million this year, and through the establishment of a chair on fisheries conservation and management at Memorial University, Newfoundland so that we can better understand what these ecological impacts are, and what the effects are as far as fish stocks are concerned.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: My final question relates to policing. When a NAFO member's ship goes out, is there anyone on board as an inspector to see that the proper equipment is used, that the size of the nets are what they are meant to be, and that the size of the catch is what it is supposed to be. Or is the captain on his own, and is it only when he comes back to port that his boat is checked?

Mr. Tobin: No. Under NAFO rules, NAFO member states — in this case the European union — keep an enforcement vessel available. There is a vessel out of Germany that has been made available by the Europeans in the offshore to do enforcement work. We, as well, have enforcement vessels. We are entitled to board, visit and inspect each other's vessels — that is, NAFO member states — and we do that.

Since January of this year Canada has issued a total of 23 citations against NAFO vessels. These are citations indicating that NAFO vessels have been in violation of NAFO rules. There were a wide variety of citations. The ones that you would be most interested in, given your line of questioning, deal with improper gear and mesh size, and the catching and keeping of small fish — that is, directing the fishery at small fish.

The citations we issue are sent to NAFO headquarters in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. NAFO keeps its headquarters in Canada in Dartmouth. The information is then passed on to each of the member states and the enforcement action is taken. The responsibility for fulfilling that enforcement action — that is, fines, penalties, and so on — rests with the member state. In the Department of Fisheries and Oceans we follow up on the citations to ensure that the citation and enforcement that is required under NAFO rules occurs.

It is my belief that in NAFO we have to look at strengthening the penalties for citations as they are issued to ensure that we truly have a strong deterrent. We are inspecting and issuing citations, and penalties are being undertaken. Yesterday one of my officials told me that, since January, we have five confirmations of actual court cases or regulatory action put into place. We want to see that action strengthened.

However, NAFO is not out there in the soup, in the dark, in the fog, or on its own unvisited, unregulated, fishing away. As part of the provisions of NAFO, we must enforce our own vessels. A case in point is Canada arresting a vessel a few weeks ago from Nova Scotia. It was a tuna boat. We arrested it 300 miles out, not because it was in violation of NAFO rules but because it was in violation of ICCAT rules, the international body dedicated to the conservation of tuna, because it was improperly fishing. We went 300 miles to arrest one of our own.

In this legislation we are asking others to observe a standard that is no more stringent than the standard that we have imposed upon ourselves.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That was a vessel that was given a permit by Bermuda to fish within the border, is that correct?

Mr. Tobin: The vessel was given a permit by Bermuda to fish; it was not given a permit by Canada to fish.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes.

Mr. Tobin: I am glad you raised this point, because Canada can hold its head high. Approximately four or five of our boats that went to Bermuda got a permit from the Bermuda government to fish. But Bermuda is not a member of ICCAT, and Bermuda does not have an ICCAT quota or respect ICCAT's principles or conservation rules. Bermuda was offering our people a free lift into an unregulated fishery.

Canada says that if a Canadian vessel goes anywhere in the world and takes tuna, we will deduct every pound of tuna that vessel takes from our own quota. Every pound those vessels took offshore was a pound stolen from the fishermen in Canada who are playing by the rules. That is why we went 300 miles to arrest that ship. That is something we have never done before, but is something we will not hesitate to do more of to protect our own reputation and good name in the area of conservation.

I repeat: We have gone beyond 200 miles to arrest Canadian vessels. We have put 14 moratoria in place in Atlantic Canada. We are a party to five multilateral moratoria with NAFO dealing with straddling stocks. We have closed down an industry in Atlantic Canada. We have laid off 30,000 people, fishermen and plant workers. We have even gone as far as closing the food fishery. Technology as basic as that technology found in biblical times — that is, a simple hook and line — has been denied to the people of Atlantic Canada. To go and cash catch a fish for food — that form of fishing — has been closed down also. There is no more we in Canada can do. Nothing else exists. There is no more that we can do for conservation and there is nothing less that others should do to preserve these stocks.

Senator Prud'homme: It is a pleasure to see you here, Mr. Minister. Our colleagues in the House of Commons had the privilege of doing what we are doing today, which is to examine this bill very carefully. However, upon reading yesterday's Hansard, I noticed that the debate in the House of Commons covered less than 10 pages, and yet they passed the bill. Thank goodness for the Senate!

I want to thank you for coming here personally to explain the substance of this bill. Those who are interested in the issues will have an opportunity to read the Hansard of the other place, which may not be very satisfying or even very understandable. I hope that in order to fully understand this legislation, they will also read today's Debates of the Senate.

I must say I was somewhat sceptical about expediting second reading of this bill. I am circumspect, as usual. I was rather hesitant to accelerate the process without knowing the exact substance of the bill and what exactly we were voting on.

[English]

Thank God the Senate exists to give us a chance, not only to see how brilliant you can be when you decide that you are willing to share your knowledge, but also to demonstrate your ability to understand this problem.

Most of what I wanted to ask you has already been touched upon by my colleagues. I hope others will ask questions to complete the debate.

You made reference to a document that was kindly offered to us by Senator Petten, namely the map. If you take a look at that map, and in particular at the hammer that we see to the left, in the area known as 3Ps, there is no indication what that area is. One of my colleagues asked me what it was. When I went to enlarge that part, I realized it was Saint Pierre and Miquelon. This is the French territory of Saint Pierre and Miquelon. Was I right in my explanation to my colleague?

Mr. Tobin: Absolutely.

Senator Prud'homme: Saint Pierre and Miquelon and the extension?

Mr. Tobin: That is the sovereign territory of France.

Senator Prud'homme: Good. That is clear.

Second, as you know, I try to predict problems that could arise before they do arise. Canada is a very good friend, as am I, of the Government of France, not this government necessarily, because it changed, but more so the people of France. Is there anything in this bill that in any way, shape or form could pit Canada against France again on this coast?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, I will answer that question by saying no, I do not anticipate that Canada and France would be in any kind of conflict as a consequence of this bill. I think that because of the settlement of the borders or zones between us some years ago, we have a very good relationship.

As you know, the Prime Minister of France recently named a minister to undertake direct discussions with Canada, not only on fish matters but on matters outside the fishery, such as economic matters, tourism, shared services, hospital services, economic joint ventures, and so on. Canada likewise, at the time of the visit of the Prime Minister to France, named a Canadian minister to undertake these negotiations. I would submit, therefore, that our relationship in this regard has never been better, and we hope to keep it that way.

Senator Prud'homme: Finally, with this bill we will have the possibility of chase and pursuit, I think is the expression in English, outside of this zone. One of the zones is very close to 3Ps, which is the French territory. What regulations do you forecast if any of these ships that we would like to chase and pursue were to go into this zone? I imagine that will require the collaboration of the Government of France. For senators who like international law, there would be cooperation needed there. It is always feasible that a ship could escape and get into French waters.

Mr. Tobin: Senator, I want to assure you that we would definitely respect the boundaries that are there. These are French waters. We do not intend to enter them, or chase people into them. If you look at the map, you will see that the Nose and Tail are quite a ways away, quite far out. We are concerned about the Nose and Tail. That is the pink or red area. It is quite far away. If any boat can turn around and get back into that French zone, then I would invite them to enjoy the hospitality of Saint Pierre and Miquelon for as long as possible, because as soon as they come back out, you will see we will have them surrounded.

Senator Prud'homme: Supplementary to that, I suppose it would be advisable to at least inform the Government of France of our intentions, ask for their cooperation, and not leave them stuck with undesirable people who may be flying under a flag of convenience.

Mr. Tobin: We will ask for the cooperation of the Government of France, and we will assure them of our respect for their territorial waters. In fact, Minister Ouellet himself will be in France in a few weeks and will meet with senior government officials, and he will specifically meet with the minister who has been assigned responsibility to negotiate with Canada, improving our relationship insofar as Saint Pierre and Miquelon is concerned. I know that Minister Ouellet intends to give these assurances while he is in France.

Senator Prud'homme: You do agree that it would be better to forecast something that may never take place, and to have a plan to deal with it, rather than to wait and be faced with some event and not have a plan of action?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, if you look at the map, you will see how close Saint Pierre and Miquelon are to the south coast of Newfoundland. I want to assure you that every bit of the tragedy, every bit of the sense of dislocation, every bit of the sense of having lost raison d'être, every bit of the sense of the loss of a way of life that visits Newfoundland also visits in as powerful a manner the people of Saint Pierre and Miquelon. I suspect, Senator, that if this chamber can, in its wisdom, in its judgment, move this bill through and give it the force of law, the applause in Newfoundland will be matched only by the applause in Saint Pierre and Miquelon.

Senator Jessiman: Mr. Minister, my name is Duncan Jessiman. I am a new senator from Manitoba, but I am on the fisheries committee. I am a lawyer. I just have a few questions.

Does any other country in the world have similar legislation?

Mr. Tobin: I am told Argentina, Chile and Peru have a similar type of legislation. I do not know if it has been actually ratified. Excuse me.

All three countries have passed legislation — this is the reason for my uncertainty — which is similarly to protect straddling stocks or stocks adjacent to the country. Again, I think all three countries have a similar problem, that is, a coastline or continental shelf that extends beyond 200 miles, and all three have some sort of predatory fishing activity.

The difference is that with the legislation that has been passed in these three countries, there has been no consequent follow-up action to actually put regulations in place, and no enforcement action taken.

Senator Jessiman: It has never been interpreted by a court?

Mr. Tobin: No, I do not think it has been interpreted by a court.

Senator Jessiman: Thank you. Did you say earlier, sir, that you did have an international firm give you an opinion that they thought it was legal?

Mr. Tobin: No.

Senator Jessiman: You do not have that?

Mr. Tobin: No.

Senator Jessiman: You did say that you are making substantial progress at the United Nations and with the members of NAFO. You also said that you have not asked anyone's permission, and that you are not about to do so. I am not sure you have even informed the members of NAFO or the people you are working with. Have you heard anything from any of the others to indicate that they know it is coming? Have you heard anything from our friends, is what I am asking?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, I want to assure you that I personally informed the Fisheries Commissioner of NAFO months ago. There is nobody today in the world who can be surprised by this action. We have forecast it publicly, and we have communicated it privately. The Prime Minister has personally communicated it to the President of the EC, has personally communicated it to the Prime Minister of Great Britain, has personally communicated it to the President of France, and to other world leaders. There can be no one today who is surprised at this action. Perhaps the only surprise might be that we have done what we said we would do, but there can be no surprise that the government has gone forward.

Senator Jessiman: Has there been any response from any of the other countries?

Mr. Tobin: There has been the kind of response that I have described. I could convey some conversations in confidence that I have had, but I do not think it would be proper for me to convey conversations that were held in confidence.

In none of my one-on-one conversations with senior officials of other nations, I did not register any sense of alarm. What I certainly received were words of advice, a desire for caution, a desire that Canada use carefully and wisely the power it would assign to itself, and that the purpose of the measure, if it were to occur, if it had to occur, be for conservation. Certainly, those kinds of expressions have been given to me. I can honestly tell you, senator, I have not had one conversation that I could describe as alarm or great surprise.

Senator Jessiman: Are you not concerned that your relationship with the members of NAFO will be hurt by this measure?

Mr. Tobin: I think it is how Canada conducts itself that will determine whether or not our relations with NAFO will be affected. We intend to conduct ourselves in a responsible and reasonable way. Canada wants to go beyond its clear jurisdiction to preserve frail fish stocks. That is all. There is no other purpose or reason. Some nations have gone beyond their own borders to restore governments and to conduct all kinds of other activities. I think that it is on Canada's record that we ought to be judged. We are a peaceful country. We are not expansionist. We have never been imperialistic in any way. We have never sought to police the planet.

Our only purpose in acting, after years of exhausting every other means, is to protect the stock that is near extinction. That is the only thing we shall do; that and nothing more.

Senator Phillips: Mr. Minister, in replying to the Leader of the Opposition you referred to the decrease in water temperature as having a possible adverse effect on cod reproduction. I am interested to learn if the department has been tracking the dumping of toxic wastes into the ocean. New York dumps its garbage at sea. Satellite photographs show that that garbage has reached areas such as 4W and possibly even 4V. In New York, it is quite illegal to dump toxic substances at sea.

Are any studies being carried out to find out if these substances are affecting cod reproduction?

Mr. Tobin: I thank you for the question, senator. I personally believe that this is one area to which we have to pay greater attention. It is my personal conviction that we have not paid enough attention to this problem.

On an ongoing and constant basis, we are examining the contents of the water. We are examining and tracking toxic waste. We are checking the water for the level and the variety of chemicals that are obviously toxic to sea life.

I can tell you, senator, that some years ago, both in this place and the other one, we debated a bill under the auspices of the Canada Shipping Act and Transport Canada that increased rather dramatically the fines for this type of activity. Frankly, fines levied five to six years ago were so small that dumping would be almost an acceptable cost of doing business. Those fines have been increased dramatically, up to $1 million per incidence.

The trouble is that we have not had enough convictions. I think we have to develop a better capacity amongst ourselves, the American Coast Guard and the American government to bring about enforcement in regard to that type of dumping activity. Only through enforcement, court action and very stiff penalties will we discourage that activity. As long as it is cheaper to dump at sea, people will continue to do it as a means of disposal. It is regrettable.

Senator Phillips: Will we continue, then, to have discussions with the Americans on that subject?

Mr. Tobin: Yes, we will.

Senator Phillips: You mentioned, Mr. Minister, area 2J and the increased Greenland halibut catch off the continental shelf there. I was surprised to learn that the increase was as extensive as it is. Will these vessels which are moved from the Tail and Nose of the Grand Banks move up to start fishing off area 2J?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, areas 2J, 3K, 2H and so on are pretty well a wasteland in terms of fish resources. There is not a lot being caught there. We did have a pretty good halibut fishery. We certainly had quite a large northern cod fishery off that part of the coast in area 2J3KL.

The halibut stock to which you refer has moved off into the area designated as the Nose and into the slope of the bank where the continental shelf begins to drop off into deeper water. That is where those fish seem now to be congregating. For Canadian fishermen, it means that the fish which were once abundant inside the line — and here I am speculating, and scientists will say that they are speculating because the evidence is not conclusive — appear to have moved off into deeper water where the temperatures are warmer than is the case inside. However, there is already a huge directed fishery on that halibut stock. We are concerned about it. We think the fishing effort is too large. The stock cannot sustain that kind of directed effort.

We have raised with NAFO, and I have raised with the European fisheries commissioner, the question of the health of Greenland halibut or turbot. We have raised the possibility of regulating this unregulated fishery to ensure that we do not beat it down, as has already occurred with northern cod and other flatfish stocks.

Senator Phillips: My concern, Mr. Minister, is that these power vessels will move into this unregulated fishery and deplete it, too. I am glad to hear that you are keeping an eye on that.

I must say in closing that I, too, am very pleased with the legislation and the rapid manner in which it is moving forward.

Mr. Tobin: Senator, thank you.

Senator Comeau: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to congratulate the minister in taking this very important step forward. I note that you are in very good company, Mr. Minister, because a previous minister in another life, who is, as a matter of fact, the Speaker in the Senate right now, was the one who implemented the 200-mile limit back in the mid-1960s. You are following in very good footsteps, Mr. Minister. You might want his seat later on in the future.

I want to ask a question, Mr. Minister, concerning the setting of quotas by the European Community. Do I understand that the states of Portugal and Spain, which traditionally have been the most reluctant to accept NAFO quotas, now readily accept quotas that are in keeping with what we believe are sound management quotas?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, first I should like to respond to your initial comment, and then directly to your question. The Parliament of Canada, and I mean both this place and the other, has produced ministers of fisheries. We are talking about the Speaker who, after all, is the most neutral and objective person in the place. You will forgive me if I say that the senator who now occupies the Speaker's Chair in this chamber retains, for good reason, the affection of the fishermen and industry of Atlantic Canada, and retains the title "the best fisheries minister we ever had" because of the outstanding job he did as Minister of Fisheries.

I can tell you that my first job in coming to Parliament was as Parliamentary Secretary to the then Minister of Fisheries. My instincts in this regard were all learnt at the feet of the Speaker of the Senate. It was only in latter years, when I was disassociated from him, that I got into trouble and became a bit of a scallywag as a "Ratpacker." Had I stayed with him, I would have avoided that phase of my life.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You would have made a great senator at the time.

Mr. Tobin: Your specific question is about Spain and Portugal, Senator. There is an important distinction to be made here. Spain and Portugal, indeed, live within NAFO quotas. Spain and Portugal participate fully as NAFO member states.

Having said that, it is true that some individual vessels, primarily from Portugal, become reflagged. They go to Panama, Honduras or Sierra Leone and obtain a flag of convenience in order to continue to fish without any regulation. However,we in this country must be careful not to say that because a Portuguese vessel reflags, Portugal is a villain.

Portugal is no more a villain than we can say that because a Canadian tuna boat fishes outside the rules, Canada is a villain. We cannot say that Canada is a villain just because the Kristina Logos had Canadian registry; that Canada somehow was breaking rules. A Canadian registered vessel was breaking the rules.

It is true that a disproportionate number of those vessels which all of us today have described as "pirate vessels" have come from Portugal because they have been displaced as a result of the conservation measures of NAFO, but this is not a reflection upon Portugal or its participation in the NAFO rules.

Senator Comeau: Right I rephrase, then.

Mr. Tobin: I am not lecturing you, senator. I say this for the benefit of us all.

Senator Comeau: Are quotas now set, not by Portugal for its own fishing fleet, nor by Spain for its own fishing fleet, but by NAFO for their fishing fleets?

Mr. Tobin: That is correct, senator. The quotas are set by NAFO.

It used to be — so that we are all very frank with each other — that in the mid-1980s, even when NAFO set a quota for the European Union, the European Union would use what is called the "objection procedure" and unilaterally set its own quotas, and set them far higher than the NAFO quotas. The European Union at that time, in my mind, was fishing in a manner totally inconsistent with sound conservation principles. That is what the European Union did in the mid-eighties. That is not the case today, although it is still the case that some individual vessels reflag out of the European fleet and fish in a manner we want to put a stop to with this legislation.

Senator Grafstein: Again, I wish to congratulate the minister for this extraordinary piece of legislation.

The minister has appropriately acknowledged that due to the crisis in the fishery, there is an extraordinary scope to this legislation. Under the "Tobin doctrine," if I can call it that, there are very broad emergency police powers. The minister has indicated the government intends to limit the exercise of these broad powers to the present evil or the present danger; that is, those foreign vessels he has defined as pirate vessels.

Would the minister assure the Senate that in the event the government intends to go beyond the present evil, and that the reasonable evil expands, he will give Parliament an opportunity to at least scrutinize the expansion of such regulations so that Parliament can come to a determination as to whether or not the exercise of powers beyond the present intention is appropriate?

Mr. Tobin: I want to give the senator the assurance that the regulations will always be made public in time for sufficient public comment. I am always available to come and answer questions before senators and before the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries or whatever the Senate deems appropriate.

Senator Grafstein: I appreciate that.

Senator Stewart: I have several questions relating to the interpretation of the bill.

When the bill passes, section 6 of the act will authorize the Governor in Council to make regulations:

> (b.1) prescribing as a straddling stock, for the purposes of section 5.2, any stock of fish that occurs both within Canadian fisheries waters and in an area beyond and adjacent to Canadian fisheries waters;

Then we go back to the new section 5.2, which would read:

> 5.2 No person, being aboard a foreign fishing vessel of a prescribed class, shall, in the NAFO Regulatory Area, fish or prepare to fish for a straddling stock in contravention of any of the prescribed conservation and management measures.

I have two questions. Do the words "beyond and adjacent to Canadian fisheries waters" — include the Flemish Cap in 3M? If it is not included, why is it not included? Is the urgency that applies in the case of the Nose and the Tail of the Grand Banks not relevant to 3M? Is it within the NAFO regulatory area?

Mr. Tobin: The answer to the last question is: Yes, 3M is within the NAFO regulatory area, although not all of the stocks fished there are regulated stocks. The stocks are regulated on a stock-by-stock basis. An example, of course, is Greenland halibut, which I talked about already, which is not regulated.

Why is 3M not included? Because we have said that we would enact this legislation to deal with the problem of fragile straddling stocks and, in particular, the stocks that are utilized by Canada inside the 200-mile zone, and stocks utilized by other nations outside the 200-mile zone.

The scientific evidence we have to this point in time is that we have separate stocks at the Flemish Cap. They are not stocks adjacent to Canada's exclusive 200-mile economic zone or 200-mile agreement. Therefore, consistent with the spirit of saying that this is not a territorial grab by Canada but merely a measure to protect endangered species, we have not included the Flemish Cap.

Senator Stewart: For greater certainty, let me go back.

The dictionary says that the word "adjacent" does not necessarily mean "next to." Therefore, based on the meaning of the word "adjacent," the Flemish Cap would be "adjacent to." Perhaps the answer is —

Mr. Tobin: Most of us Newfoundlanders think that Ireland is pretty adjacent, too.

Senator Stewart: There you are. This could be a far-reaching measure.

Are you saying there are no stocks on the Grand Banks which straddle the Flemish Cap?

Mr. Tobin: I would not want to make an absolute comment. I am saying that the state of the science and the knowledge we have so far and the general consensus in the industry is that the answer to that question is yes, the stocks at the Flemish Cap are separate stocks. That is what we are told.

Senator Stewart: If in a year from now you discover there is a straddling stock, then this bill will allow you to apply its terms to the Flemish Cap?

Mr. Tobin: Theoretically —

Senator Stewart: That is what happens in the real world.

Mr. Tobin: Let us be careful. Theoretically, to take that argument to its extreme — which I know the senator would not want to do — we could decide that the stocks have migrated to Greenland, Iceland, continental Europe, and we could certainly expand the areas.

Canada would be expected — and the senator could expect, given that his advice would always be sought both in this place and other places —

Senator Stewart: That is not reassuring.

Mr. Tobin: — to act in a responsible and reasonable manner.

Senator Stewart: Let us stay with the same text. It says "prescribing any class of foreign fishing vessel..." In this context, what does the word "class" mean? Is it length? So many meters? What are we talking about?

Mr. Tobin: It is all of the characteristics that would define a fishing vessel. It could be length, width and technology aboard that vessel. It could be any class of fishing vessel — a vessel actually harvesting the resources of the sea. Because we cannot anticipate what kind of factory freezer trawler or what other kind of technology may be displaced elsewhere in the world and may find its way to the Nose and Tail, we have left the description broad enough that regulations could be made to apply to any class.

Senator Stewart: Therefore what the bill is saying is that "No person, being aboard a foreign fishing vessel...shall" because you can define at will the meaning of "prescribed class."

Mr. Tobin: Senator, that is correct. It is a very broad power. It gives me the opportunity to say to those — and there have been some — who say this bill is not sufficiently strong or sufficiently broad that it is indeed a strong bill. You are pointing out, better than I have — in fact, I have been accused of underselling the bill — that we have given ourselves a very substantial authority.

Senator Stewart: Now I want to go to clause 4 of the bill which will replace section 7 of the act. There we read:

> 7. A protection officer may
> (a) for the purpose of ensuring compliance with this act and the regulations, board and inspect any fishing vessel found in Canadian fisheries waters or the NAFO Regulatory Area...

Why "any" fishing vessel? Why not say "any of the prescribed class"?

Mr. Tobin: Because, Senator, again, we have left the bill, the enabling legislation, the amendment to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, sufficiently broad that regulations may be made at the direction of cabinet, depending upon the nature of the problem, to allow us to have our enforcement officers take an enforcement action against any vessel, period, no exceptions, which, in a consistent and irresponsible fashion, is targeting endangered fish species. Therefore you are correct again. This is a very broad power.

Senator Stewart: We are told that the enactment of the measure is urgent. Why are the regulations not ready?

Mr. Tobin: The regulations, senator, should be ready, I would hope, within a matter of days.

Senator Stewart: Will the minister undertake to have his colleague, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, table the regulations as soon as they are ready to be gazetted?

Mr. Tobin: Yes.

Senator Stewart: Why will the act not come into effect upon Royal Assent? Why the delay?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, I have to tell you that I have not been known to be too cautious and shy about granting this authority on an urgent basis. If the senator can suggest how it can come into effect upon receiving Royal Assent —

Senator Stewart: That is the normal practice, but this bill provides that it not come into effect immediately.

Mr. Tobin: — this minister would certainly accept that improvement to the process which is recommended by members of the Senate with great joy. I see that one of my colleagues is clearing his throat. I do not know if that is strategic or medicinal.

Senator Stewart: That is impossible because your bill says that this act shall come into force "on a day to be fixed by order of the Governor in Council." If we were to agree to strike out that clause, it would have to go back to the House of Commons.

Therefore I want to know. That clause was not put in there accidentally. Why will the act not come into force upon Royal Assent?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, the bill will have the full effect that is required, and will give the Government of Canada the means it requires to act upon the proclamation of regulations and the study of regulations. Frankly, senator, I must tell you that, because my experience and knowledge is less than yours, I cannot answer technically the question you are asking. I can tell you there is no plot. I have not even actually thought about the matter until you raised it just now.

Senator Stewart: I am sure someone thought about it.

Mr. Tobin: I am sure it is an important point.

Senator Stewart: I do not accept a dismissal like that, Mr. Minister. It is your bill. It is an important point. The clause is important. It was put in there for a specific purpose by someone who knew what he or she was doing. Why?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, I can assure you I am not attempting to dismiss you. I am merely pointing out that this minister does not have the senator's expertise with respect to this particular question.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps his colleague at some future date, if there is an explanation, could let us know. I am curious to know just what the reason is.

Mr. Tobin: I promise to report back, senator.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are having identical questions on Bill C-18, so you are just having the same problems as we are. It must be the same author.

The Chairman: Order. Ten minutes have elapsed.

Senator Stewart: I beg your pardon? I have one more question.

The Chairman: Is there unanimous consent for Senator Stewart to ask one more question?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stewart: This is a question that every senator who has been around here for a while will expect me to ask. Where is the appropriation clause in this bill?

Mr. Tobin: Where is the appropriation clause in this bill? I am pleased to report to you, senator, that there is no appropriation clause — and I know this deep down in my heart and soul, because the official just told me — because we are planning to use existing resources.

Senator Stewart: Then tell us why, when the bill was introduced in the House of Commons, a Royal Recommendation accompanied the bill? It says, "The Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue," and so on. If there is no appropriation, why the Royal Recommendation?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, I do not know.

Senator Stewart: That is, I suspect, an honest answer. To get that from a minister of the Crown is really shocking. Thank you very much.

Senator Marshall: I hesitate in what I am about to say after listening to Senator Stewart.

I have no questions. I just wanted senators to know that Mr. Tobin now represents the district which I represented as a member of Parliament back in — well, a long time ago. I think I taught him well. I commend him for Bill C-29. I know it will direct the effort that we want for the people of the Atlantic region and the future of the fisheries.

Mr. Tobin: Thank you, senator.

Senator Nolin: Everybody asked the good questions which I was ready to ask about Royal Assent and all of that. Let's have the judge come in now.

Senator Thériault: I do want to say how pleased I am to have you with us, Mr. Minister of Fisheries, showing every senator in this chamber how determined you are to be the Minister of Fisheries for the fishermen.

I have one question. I do not know whether it has been asked. On your map, you have the Nose and Tail of the Banks coloured in red. Further out, you have 3M. Is there any reason to think that you will have to go outside that red zone?

Mr. Tobin: Senator, that is the one question Senator Stewart asked to which I did give an answer.

Senator Thériault: You did give him an answer?

Mr. Tobin: Yes, and I would be glad to answer it again. The area outside the zone is the Flemish Cap.

Senator Thériault: I did not know what the Flemish Cap was. That is all right. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I want to add that, as far as I am concerned as a Maritimer, this is a great piece of legislation. We could say it is ten years late, or two years late, or two months late; at least it is here now. I do want to commend the minister for bringing it forward and making it an urgent matter.

However, I want to at least remind the minister that, once again, we should not get carried away and think that the foreigners are the only culprits in what has happened to our fishery. As I said earlier, when those fish start to come back, the department will have to be very careful in granting licences to individuals and to companies. You have to take another look at quotas, the way they are allocated, when they are allocated, where they are allocated and to whom they are allocated. It is time, once again, that the Department of Fisheries, from the minister on down, become more concerned about the fisherpeople, as you call them, in Newfoundland. No one in this country has been hurt as much as those fishermen in some coastal communities that I have had the great pleasure to visit on a couple of occasions with the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries.

I am sure you were around in 1987, 1988 and 1989, Mr. Minister, when fishermen were telling us what was about to happen. They told us, we put it in our report, and no one acted on it. Now you are acting. Congratulations. Do not give up, and for goodness sake, do not leave the impression that the foreigners are the only culprits.

Mr. Tobin: Senator, I could not agree with you more. I have been in several meetings with fisherman in the last week. I should like to make a few comments because it tells all of us something about attitudes and how attitudes change. I have been at a great many meetings with fisherman. I always remind fishermen when they ask for more enforcement that unless the attitude of our own fishermen change with respect to those fisheries that are still open, unless fishermen say that it is unacceptable for their colleagues, for them, and for their friends to break the rules, we can never hire enough enforcement people to stop overfishing.

I am fond of standing up and saying, "There is not a person in the room, not one, who has not broken the rules." I have done that repeatedly in Newfoundland. I have done in it your province, Senator, of New Brunswick. I have done it Nova Scotia, P.E.I. and Quebec. Never once have I been challenged when I make that statement because, as you have said, senator, we have all, broken the rules. We played with a different ethic, with a different attitude in a different time, and we have now come to understand, to our great pain and regret, that if we continue on we can destroy these resources.

The difference, senator, is that we have stopped fishing for two years. We have tied up our fleets. We are paying the price for our sins and the sins of others. We are giving back to the sea the little resource that is left. However, even as we tie up, others are not, and that is the purpose of this bill.

Senator Thériault: Mr. Chairman, I also wish to say to the minister, do not let Treasury Board tell you that story too strongly because what you have said is completely true and fishermen have to comply. Do not forget that if everyone obeyed the rules on the highway, there would be no need for police. Do not give up on all your policing forces. You need fisheries officers to remind the fishermen of what you say.

Senator Andreychuk: I would like to ask two questions and build on Senator Thériault's comment. In my previous life, I heard officials from our government talk about where the fish had gone, what the stocks are like, and repeatedly there was confusion from the scientific community and certainly differences of opinion from NAFO scientists and Canadian scientists. It seems to me that we built our agendas based on what we believed to be the facts about the fish, and continually we found out that the facts were not correct.

I still have not heard from you just where the cod have gone. Are they deeper in the water? Are they depleted? We do not seem to have the answers. It seems to me that you should be paying more attention to that analysis, rather than talking about only enforcement and, therefore, as soon as the cod are back we can return to a quota system. I tend to question whether we need a quota system, or is there a different way of managing the stock.

I would like to hear what the scientific analysis is today about the cod.

Mr. Tobin: The cod, senator, have not disappeared, gone away, or relocated to another zone; the cod have been overfished. The capacity of the stock, what little is left, the spawning biomass that is left to rebuild itself, has been beaten down by the fact that, in addition to overfishing, we now have the ecological problem of cold water temperatures. The cod are not showing up anywhere else in this part of the world. We have overfished the cod spawning biomass, and that is biological evidence based on long established rules for testing. The spawning biomass has declined by 99 per cent, as I said, for 2J3KL cod.

When I first became minister, I received reports based on test fisheries by our own research people, our scientists, indicating a fisheries research vessel had done a tow in an area where we traditionally had a fishery, and it would show five kilograms or seven kilograms of fish in the net. I would call the Assistant Deputy Minister of Science and ask, "What type of net was it? How large a boat was it? Surely it must have been a small test net." He would say, "No, no, minister this is a huge fishing vessel, research vessel with a regular-sized net that can hold 50,000 pounds of fish, but when we towed the net in a traditional zone we got 15 pounds of fish."

That story has been repeated over and over. We now do test fisheries and have trouble getting fish, period. We were towing a regulation size mesh so the smaller fish could go through the mesh. There are only a handful of fish big enough to be of commercial value. There are no fish.

Along the northeast coast of Newfoundland are 300 communities that have been around for 500 years and had depending upon the fishery. The cycle of the stock has been up and down over those 500 years, as is the nature of any of the resources of the sea, or any resources of the land over those 500 years, but never have fish totally disappeared. One can go to communities on the northeast coast where the skippers, the 75 or 80 year olds in good health and vigour, go out and jig for a few cod of their own, perhaps after 50 years of engaging in the commercial fishery, and they will tell you that when they go to their favourite spots where they have caught fish with fixed gear for 50, 60 years of their lives, they cannot find a single cod. There is not a cod.

It is true that we need to understand more, and that we need better science and more coherent science. However, the problem here is not one that arises out of not knowing where the fish have gone. The problem is we know there are very few fish left, that the large fish have all been caught and we are down to juveniles, small fish. If they do not survive to mature and reproduce, those fish are gone. It is not complicated.

I give you every assurance that it is not a question of our having misplaced them, having not found them, or that they have moved. We really have overfished them.

Senator Andreychuk: My plea is that in future, management take into account a more coordinated approach with other countries as to what is happening in all of the waters around the world, as part of the management of that ecosystem.

Mr. Tobin: I want to give you the assurance that today there is no difference on the stocks that we have talked about — and remember we have put five multilateral moratoria in place; there is no difference in the Canadian science and the NAFO science. In fact, NAFO science is a compilation of the work of Canadian, Russian and other research vessels. In Brussels in February, when we achieved a moratorium on 3NO cod, the science that was considered by NAFO was a combination of test surveys by both Canadian and Russian vessels, so we are now working together.

Senator Andreychuk: You have stated that this bill is coming in as a practical measure, one that you believe is necessary at this time. You might agree that it is questionable in international law, and that it may be disputed from that position.

We will be sending Canadian law enforcement officers into international waters and you are stating that you are targeting pirates, those who will perhaps behave in an uncivilized manner. What assurance and what protections will you give our law enforcement agency personnel in international waters so that we can maximize the security of these officials and their families?

Mr. Tobin: We will have all the experts from all the respective agencies give us their best advice on the proper course of action on how these enforcement actions should be pursued, rather than attempt to establish a system the other way round, where politicians, governments and officials are telling enforcement people how to do their job. We have been assured by officials from my own department, fisheries enforcement individuals, that when the Kristina Logos was boarded it was boarded by fisheries enforcement officers who, contrary to the stereotype of the fisheries enforcement officer, were highly skilled and trained very much in the mode of the RCMP or very much in the mode of special forces and military people.

We have as well a special squad from the RCMP, and I have been told by the Solicitor General that they are ready, willing and able to participate. As well, we have the reassurance of the Department of National Defence that they are prepared to participate.

It is my sense that all these enforcement agencies have the confidence that they can do the job in a professional, efficient and responsible fashion. I believe they have the desire to do this job on behalf of Canada. It is our hope that the fact that we have given ourselves such an ability in law will be enough that most vessels will cease such action. After all, they are fishing vessels. They are like gold miners; it is risk capital outside any set of rules and they are grabbing the resource and selling it. It is my hope that once they see that we have expressed our will in this incredible fashion — speedy passage of this legislation through the House of Commons, speedy passage perhaps through this chamber today, all-party support at a time when there are more parties in Parliament than ever before; now that we have demonstrated through the Kristina Logos incident that we can make these arrests on the high seas — a ship flying the Panamanian flag crewed from Portugal — the more pragmatic types will determine that now is the time to leave. The free, unregulated, unrestricted predation of that resource is over. It is my hope we will not have to make many arrests.

Senator Andreychuk: I hope that in your thinking you will remember that you are talking of situations of hot pursuit and that sanity sometimes does not prevail in those situations, and I hope you will give careful thought to our law enforcement officers. For the first time they will be in international waters in what I believe is a questionable, international, legal environment. I would hope those officers and people we send will have every considerable protection.

Mr. Tobin: Let me give you even greater assurance. It is our intention not to sneak up in the dead of night and collar everyone we can collar. To the contrary, it is our intention to state publicly, clearly, loudly and often, first, that we have the authority given by Parliament today, second, that we have the will and means to use that authority and, third, that we will ask those who are in violation of any sane or sensible conservation regime to leave. It would be our intention to say that publicly and clearly now, to say it a week before we intend to take enforcement action, to say it the day of the enforcement action.

Any vessel that is willing to leave can leave. Any vessel that persists after all those steps have been taken and those warnings given will be arrested, seized and prosecuted to the full extent of the law.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, two or three times this afternoon there has been reference to the map. May I have unanimous consent to append the map to today's proceedings?

Senator Petten: It was appended during second reading.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clauses 3 to 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Honourable senators on your behalf, I should like to express our appreciation to the minister for his attendance this afternoon, for his assistance in the consideration of his bill and, probably more important, for his frankness and honesty in responding to our questions in the quest for information.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank each and every senator for facilitating this bill today, particularly the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition, the Speaker and you, Mr. Chairman. I want to thank you, because I think it is truly an indication to people in a part of this country, who sometimes believe that we have lost track of their trials, that, indeed, we have not; who sometimes think that we have lost the will to act on their behalf, that, indeed, we have not; and it is an indication to all Canadians who think that we sometimes in the pursuit of partisan advantage have lost the capacity to unite that, indeed, we have not.

May I say a special word to Senator Petten.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Senator Petten is a long-time servant of the people of Canada and a long-time member of this distinguished place, in which I am becoming increasingly more comfortable; it looks better all the time. He is a great son of Newfoundland and Labrador and a great Canadian. I want to thank him for his work on behalf of the people of Canada with respect to this bill.

The Chairman: Finally, honourable senators, I want to thank the unsung heros of such hearings, the staff that accompanied the minister.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the minister for his very kind words and, in turn, I should hope that he has now seen firsthand, as a minister of the Crown, the great value the Senate plays in the parliamentary process of this country. No doubt he will want to relay his impressions to his colleagues and all his friends in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Tobin: I hope one day to come back and participate with all of you in that great service.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is very nice on this side, sir.

FOURTH REPORT ADOPTED

Leave having been given to revert to Presentation of Reports from Standing or Special Committees:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(g), I move that the report be adopted now.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask Senator Hastings, as Chairman, two questions. First, what portion of the total budget for this committee and the other committee, which is discussed in the fifth report, are we being called upon to pay?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, in the usual tradition of joint committees of the Senate and House of Commons, we are called upon to pay one-third of the total budget of the joint committees.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The last paragraph says that the committee recommends that the Senate request Supplementary Estimates. As I recall, our total committee budget is about $800,000 or $900,000. If we do not get those Supplementary Estimates, we will be in a very difficult situation.

Can we not be a little more forceful? Can we not make this dependent on Supplementary Estimates? I just do not want to feel that we are committed here without having some knowledge or some assurance that Supplementary Estimates are forthcoming. I know that in the past we have always received them, but that was under an old government. Now we are under a new government for which austerity and other restrictive measures have become a passion. Hopefully, we will not be subjected to them also.

Senator Hastings: The Leader of the Opposition is quite correct. The budget for the committees is $800,000, I think. If this was not the subject of a further request, we would have little left for committee work within the Senate.

Your committee is recommending that Supplementary Estimates be sought to cover these joint committees because we did not consider them at the time of the Estimates, and if we do not receive Supplementary Estimates we would simply not have enough funds to operate our committees. I do not know how we could make it any more forceful than recommending that we seek further Supplementary Estimates for this amount.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I want to ask the honourable senator about the $150,000 in the fourth and fifth reports that deal with contract agreements. Specifically, were these contract agreements put out to tender? If not, what was the process for the signing of these so-called contract agreements and what are they for? What do they cover?

Senator Hastings: I do not think the contract agreements have been executed as yet. I think they are for staff and assistants for the committees.

Senator Oliver: What was the process by which they were tendered?

Senator Hastings: I do not think they have been let out to tender as yet.

Senator Oliver: That is not a complete answer, but perhaps I can come back to it at a later date. With leave of the Senate I will come back. I wish to pursue this matter at a later date.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do you wish to adjourn the debate, Senator Oliver?

Senator Oliver: No, I do not.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

FIFTH REPORT ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(g), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: With the same reservations.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Hébert: I move that all remaining orders stand.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Do I understand Senator Hébert is moving that all further orders stand, including the debate on Bill C-18?

Senator Hébert: Yes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I had understood Senator Frith was to speak to it today, after obtaining some material he wanted based on Mr. Kingsley's testimony before the committee. Has anyone checked to see whether or not he is ready? Perhaps he should be alerted. We would like to proceed with Bill C-18 and hear what he has to say.

Senator Hébert: I think that he is looking for the material.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Do you think his search has taken him to the policy convention that the Liberal Party is having this weekend?

Senator Hébert: It would be a good place to find some good material.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I must say, honourable senators, without repeating what I said yesterday, that this situation makes the puzzle even greater. We have a piece of legislation to which the government gave great urgency, to the extent of imposing closure on it, a procedure that they found reprehensible when the former government employed it. Suddenly, they find that it is no longer urgent to proceed with it, to the point that we will not be seeing it again for another ten days.

I hope that I am not breaking the rules, but I should like an explanation as to why Senator Hébert made the motion he has made.

The reason the bill was brought in and expedited with such haste over on the other side was to save money. That was the main reason given at the time. The money to be saved was the money which is being spent by the commissions that are presently completing their hearings. The last one is to complete its hearing on the June 10. The process of the commissions is continuing, and the savings which were implied will no longer be there when this bill comes back.

What has happened? Why does the government not want to proceed with a bill which was so essential?

Senator Thériault: We went up 10 per cent in the polls.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I see. It is because of the opinion polls.

Senator Olson: It is getting close to six o'clock.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Your timing is perfect. I admire the other side for its astuteness so far as the politics of this issue are concerned. However, I think those who follow the proceedings of the government closely will be extremely disappointed in seeing how the government is approaching a piece of legislation which at one time it found so essential and today dismisses as being irrelevant.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: On this point, honourable senators, the honourable senator was speaking of senators on this side and that side, and I want to indicate that, although I sit on this side, I do not agree with the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are on the other side too.

Senator Prud'homme: I do not agree, because I think these ten days will provide a good time for reflection. You know how I feel on the bill. I am not backing off.

The Senate has put forward amendments. They are not Conservative amendments. They are amendments of a committee of this chamber, and I agree with these amendments. They will be referred in due time.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: After the weekend.

Senator Prud'homme: I believe the Senate has a role to play, and maybe during these ten days it would be very worthwhile for the government to reflect. They know how determined this side is. Now I can say "this side" because I do not think anyone here will contradict me. I think these ten days will be very useful for the government to come forward with a proposal having in mind the interests of British Columbia. We should reflect more and see if we cannot come to terms. The role of the Senate will be enhanced. We will have fulfilled our function.

This will be the first time in 40 years that I will be missing a convention, but I will be following it closely, and I know that they will debate the issue of redistribution. I know some honourable senators will be present listening, and they may offer their contribution to help come to terms with a very difficult situation.

I therefore say to the Whip that I am not unhappy at all that they take their time. When we come back, we may not have to put the amendment on the other side. We will listen to the speech of the Prime Minister of the country.

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: I should like to remind the Honourable Leader of the Opposition that consistency in politics consists of the art of being consistently inconsistent, as Winston Churchill is reputed to have said.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I think it is more a lack of conviction which is coming out, not inconsistency.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, could we dispose of this item? Is it agreed that the remaining items on the Order Paper stand?

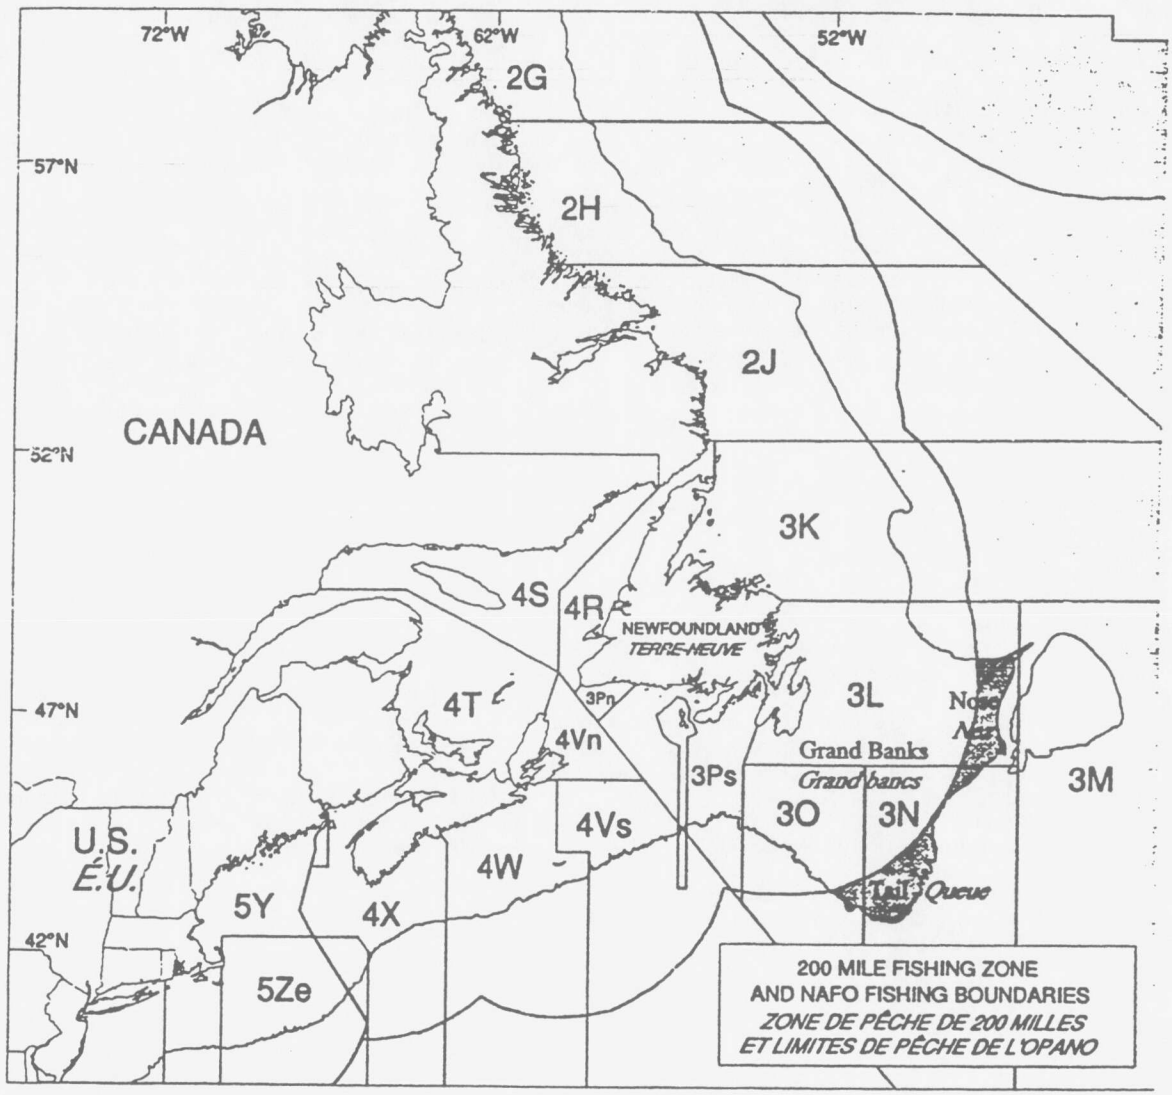
Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, May 25, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?



Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, May 25, 1994, at 2:00 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

SPORT

MEMORIAL CUP CHAMPIONS—CONGRATULATIONS TO KAMLOOPS BLAZERS HOCKEY TEAM

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I am pleased to rise today to congratulate the Kamloops Blazers junior hockey team, who won the seventy-sixth Memorial Cup tournament in Laval, Quebec, this past Sunday.

We in Kamloops are very proud of our Blazers. They have been outstanding achievers and great ambassadors for our city.

The Blazers won the cup in 1992 and came close in 1993; 1994 was supposed to be a year of rebuilding because of the number of younger players on the team.

The Blazers have captured four league championships and two cups in the past ten seasons. They have never had a losing season and never finished lower than third in their division. They have placed first eight times. Honourable senators, I have been trying not to brag; I am just putting a few facts on the record, but, if it sounds like bragging, then so be it.

To Don Hay, the coach, who has to make up his mind whether he will be a firefighter or a coach; to all of the Blazers; to Bob Brown, our super general manager for the past eight seasons and all of his team: Thank you, and best of luck in the future.

The seventy-seventh Memorial Cup national junior hockey tournament will be held in Kamloops in 1995. Come and see us. We will be good hosts. We do not need to win again, but do not count us out!

STANLEY CUP

PARTICIPATION OF NEW JERSEY DEVILS IN THE PLAY-OFFS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, as a Quebec senator, I do hope that the New Jersey Devils will beat the New York Rangers since the Devils' coach is Jacques Lemaire, one of the most famous former Habs. At least, in Quebec, we will have somebody to cheer for during the Stanley Cup finals.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADA'S ROLE IN WORLD WAR II

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in January 1993 the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs tabled a report which criticized the contents of a three-part CBC documentary entitled The Valour and the Horror. The committee concluded that the series, which examined Canada's role in the Second World War, was riddled with inaccuracies, biased perceptions, and suffered from a critical lack of balance. The assessment was based on the testimony of some of Canada's most prominent military historians, not to mention respected veterans with firsthand knowledge of the events in question.

The committee recommended that video cassettes of The Valour and the Horror display a disclaimer stating that the series was a docu-drama only partly based on fact. That was sent to thousands and thousands of school children.

Last week, The Toronto Star published a front-page article claiming that the third volume of the official history of the Royal Canadian Air Force, The Crucible of War, effectively supported the conclusions reached in the second episode of The Valour and the Horror. The filmmakers argued in this segment that the bomber offensive deliberately set out to annihilate the German civilian population and that the strategy was ultimately a dismal failure contributing little to Allied victory and leaving a moral stain on the Allied cause.

Honourable senators, I should like to make two points about this latest development. I will make one today and the second one tomorrow owing to time constraints.

First, as the Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, I stand by the committee's report on The Valour and the Horror. While I respect the views of our official military historians, comparing their work with a popular, some might say sensational, film series is not unlike comparing apples and oranges.

Might I remind honourable senators that Dr. Stephen Harris, one of the authors of The Crucible of War, admitted before the Senate subcommittee that there were major errors in the film. Mr. Ben Greenhous, another of the authors, has also been openly critical of The Valour and the Horror's research techniques and its characterization of wartime figures.

Other military historians have been no less critical of the series. Dr. William Carter, a noted author on Canada's contribution to the bomber offensive, labelled the series a:

> ...substandard work. The context was not set; there were many inaccuracies and sweeping generalizations; ...information was offered with no evidence to back it up, and there were major errors of comprehension.

Martin Middlebrook, probably the greatest authority on the bomber offensive, informed the subcommittee that it:

> ...was a gross distortion of the very complex subject which was Bomber Command's war over a period of six years.

Even the CBC ombudsman admitted that the film was seriously flawed.

Honourable senators, I will continue tomorrow, since my three minutes are up.

STANLEY CUP

BEST WISHES TO VANCOUVER CANUCKS IN NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE CHAMPIONSHIP

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I imagine that I can speak for most Canadians, probably even Senator Keith Davey, when I wish the Vancouver Canucks good fortune as they represent Canada in the Stanley Cup.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

PRIVATE BILL

GENERAL SECURITY INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA— INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Gérald-A Beaudoin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I wish to present an interim report on Bill S-3, an Act to authorize General Security Insurance Company of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec.

[English]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I just want to raise a point with regard to the rules, which in this respect are fairly clear, although they are not contained in our own rule book. However, in Bourinot it is clear that, when a bill has been referred to a select committee and the committee wishes to make a special report and submit minutes of evidence, it is necessary to obtain permission from the house to that effect in cases where no such power is given in the original order of reference. In this case there was no power in the order of reference. Simply, the bill was referred. So this is a special request. I have no objection to its proceeding, but I just want to make the point so that we do not establish a precedent in our rules that this can be done without the permission of the Senate.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the following report:

Wednesday, May 25, 1994

> The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs had the honour to present its
> FOURTH REPORT
> Your committee, to which was referred Bill S-3, An Act to authorize General Security Insurance Company of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, February 24, 1994, examined the said bill and now makes the following interim report:
> After considering Bill S-3, and having been informed that this is the seventh time since 1980 that the Senate has been asked to pass a bill authorizing an insurance company governed by the Insurance Companies Act (formerly the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act) to be continued under provincial jurisdiction, the committee wishes to express its reservations regarding this type of private legislation.
> As stated in the preamble to Bill S-3, "there is no existing statutory authority to enable an insurance company governed by the laws of Canada to be continued under the laws of a province."

The committee was advised that it is this lack of authority in federal statute law that has made it necessary, in the case of Bill S-3 and in all of the previous cases, for federally incorporated insurance companies to petition Parliament when they wish to be transferred from federal to provincial jurisdiction.

The committee feels that the approval of such transfers should be the responsibility of the executive branch of government and that it should not be necessary for Parliament to become involved in what is essentially an administrative matter.

Your committee therefore recommends that the Insurance Companies Act be amended accordingly and that all future applications for private legislation of this kind be deferred until Parliament has been given an opportunity to consider such an amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

GÉRALD-A. BEAUDOIN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be considered?

On motion of Senator Beaudoin, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

GENERAL SECURITY INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Wednesday, May 25, 1994

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs had the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Your committee, to which was referred Bill S-3, An Act to authorize General Security Insurance Company of Canada to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, February 24, 1994, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

GÉRALD-A. BEAUDOIN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

•(1410)

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, why are we giving this bill special treatment under the rules? I do not understand why we are doing that. Is Royal Assent scheduled for this evening? Is there some reason why we are proceeding with the bill now instead of at the next sitting? If so, the reason should be on the record.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, there is no special reason, and I move that we proceed with the bill at the next sitting.

On motion of Senator Beaudoin, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this may be an appropriate time to discuss with you the likely course of the Senate's sittings. I have had discussions with my honourable friends opposite and we have come to an agreement to have final disposition of Bill C-18 today. The bells will ring at four o'clock and there will be a vote at 4:30 p.m. to dispose of all matters concerning Bill C-18. Once Bill C-18 has been dealt with, and since there is no further legislation pending from the other place, there would be no point in our sitting tomorrow.

However, there is a house order that Bill C-17, the budget implementation bill will receive third and final reading next Tuesday at 5:15 p.m. Therefore there is no particular reason for the Senate to sit at two o'clock on Tuesday next, May 31. We would be better advised to return at 8 p.m. on that day. I hope this arrangement will suit honourable senators.

Therefore, if our work on Bill C-18, the electoral boundaries bill, is completed by 4:30 p.m. today, we can then proceed with the remaining business on the Order Paper. When that is concluded, I propose that the Senate adjourn until Tuesday next, May 31, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of clarification as to how the vote will unfold this afternoon. I understand that the bells will commence ringing at 4:00 p.m., and at 4:30 p.m. all votes will be held dealing with Bill C-18, including anticipated or unanticipated amendments that might be advanced by senators on either side.

Will the Deputy Leader of the Government inquire of the other place when we might expect the flow of work beyond what he has already put before us? If we are anticipating a late June adjournment, then I think it would facilitate everyone's planning if we knew when legislation was coming. We could get the research done and complete the debate so that we are not dealing with controversial issues at the eleventh hour.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I will try to obtain the information as quickly as I can. I have had a discussion with my honourable friend. At the moment, I cannot give him any indication of precisely what bills we will get or when we will get them. As soon as I obtain the information, I will make the Senate aware of it. I will give the information directly to my honourable friend, even if we are not sitting, so that he and his colleagues will know. I expect that by next Monday I will have a clear picture of what will be done.

It is my understanding that we will dispose of Bill C-18 in all its facets this afternoon. At the moment, we are dealing with the report of the committee. If the debate carries on until four o'clock, then we will deal with just that. If there are any amendments, then we can deal with them as well as the main motion at 4:30 p.m.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, if we are to dispose of Bill C-18, maybe we could reach an agreement, without necessarily asking leave from the Senate.

We could agree on the sharing of time among the senators who wish to take part in the debate. Time is flying by and, since we want to be done by 4:30 this afternoon, the allotted time should not be used up by two or three senators. Maybe it would be a good thing to allow those who want to speak to share the allotted time without necessarily sticking to the Rules of the Senate, which would significantly limit the participation of honourable senators.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senator, I understand your question and your point of view. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to proceeding now with the debate on this bill and deferring the Question Period to later this afternoon. However, that decision is not mine to make. We need leave from the Senate. I so move. If it is the pleasure of the honourable senators opposite, we could proceed with the debate on Bill C-18 right away and come back later to the Order Paper.

[English]

Honourable senators, are there any objections to proceeding to Bill C-18 immediately and suspending the balance of the Order Paper? When we finish with Bill C-18, we will come back to the rest of the items on the Order Paper. This will ensure that we have more time for debate. If it is agreed, can we then proceed to Bill C-18?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, is Senator Molgat saying that we will continue with government business today, even though Bill C-18 is to be dealt with now? I ask because I am interested in a particular motion on the Order Paper.

Senator Molgat: Yes, my proposal is that we suspend the balance of the Order Paper at this point and go to Bill C-18. We have an understanding that the vote will take place at 4:30 p.m. After the vote, we will return to the Order Paper at exactly the point where we are now and then proceed with the balance of today's business.

Senator Berntson: Honourable senators, in the event that the debate on Bill C-18 concludes prior to the four o'clock bell, will we be able to go back to the items of business on the Order Paper at that time?

Senator Molgat: Absolutely. Because honourable senators have been advised that the vote will be at 4:30 p.m., I do not think we should change the time of the vote. I think we have to stick to that. If the debate is concluded before that time, then we will come back to the Order Paper and then break for the vote.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, in view of the proposed change in our schedule, may I have leave to proceed to Notices of Motions?

My intention is to ask permission for the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide to meet at 3:15 this afternoon, even though the Senate may still be sitting. Members of the committee will return to the chamber by 4:20 p.m. in order to vote. This will enable us to hear from one of the witnesses, who is already present and waiting to be heard.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, under the circumstances — that is, if there is a witness waiting to be heard who has been called for that purpose by the committee — I would agree to grant leave.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59 (1)(a), I move:

> That the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide have power to sit at three fifteen o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT SUSPENSION BILL, 1994

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grimard, for the adoption of the second report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (Bill C-18, with amendments), presented in the Senate on May 10, 1994.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate on this order, and I yield now to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to begin my remarks today on report stage of Bill C-18 by outlining why the government introduced this legislation in the first place.

The Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act was passed by the government of the late Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson in 1964. However, the electoral boundary readjustment process has had only minor technical changes since that time. As honourable colleagues know, today's bill is not unprecedented. With legislation similar to Bill C-18, the electoral boundaries readjustment process was suspended following the 1971, 1981 and 1991 census.

In June of 1992, Bill C-67 was passed with the unanimous consent of all parties in the House of Commons. That bill suspended the electoral boundaries readjustment process for one year in order to give the government and Parliament time to consider the relevant recommendations of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing, otherwise known as the Lortie commission. The original proposal of the previous government had been to suspend the act for two years. However, the New Democratic Party objected to that period, so an amendment was passed limiting the suspension of the process to only one year. The Special House Committee on Electoral Reform studying the findings of the Lortie commission issued a report on electoral matters which formed the basis of Bill C-114, relating primarily to voting for non-residents and other administrative matters. That legislation came into force on June 25, 1993. However, that committee did not deal with the electoral boundaries readjustment process contained in the act.

As Senator Lewis explained in his speech of April 19, the suspension of the readjustment process under Bill C-67 was not extended, and on September 2, 1993, eleven electoral boundaries commissions were created: one for each province and one for the Northwest Territories. As honourable senators know, the electoral boundaries in the Yukon do not change.

Each commission has three members. One is selected by the Chief Justice of the province and the other two by the Speaker of the House of Commons.

This was probably one of Mr. Speaker Fraser's last official acts, coming as it did on the eve of the general election which was called later that month. In any event, the commissions were established and, while most Canadians were focusing on the upcoming election, the commissioners quietly and privately went about their work and, in March of this year, made public their proposals for new electoral boundaries. Some of the proposals were controversial and not just for members of Parliament but for communities.

However, the problems with the adjustment process itself, problems which were recognized by the previous government, the previous Parliament, still exist. As my colleague, the house leader in the other place, has said, the beginning of a new Parliament is the most opportune time to undertake a review of these issues. That is why the government has asked the House of Commons Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs to study all aspects of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to report back no later than December 16, 1994.

The committee is being asked to consider the general operation of the act over the past 30 years, including such issues as whether there should be a continual increase in the number of members of Parliament after each census; the method of selecting members of the boundary commissions; a review of the proceedings of the commissions, and whether they ought to continuously suggest alterations to the boundaries of all existing electoral districts; and a review of the involvement of the public and members of Parliament in the work of the commissions.

Under new procedures presented by the government and approved by the House, that committee will, in effect, be authorized to frame legislation to implement its proposals and to do so as quickly as possible. Under the current procedure, provincial and territorial electoral boundaries commissions publish their initial proposals without public input, and these sometimes come as a surprise to those most directly affected: the constituents of a given riding.

There are also concerns that some commissions are not always particularly forthcoming about the reasons for their proposals, thus making it very difficult for anybody wanting to make objections or wanting to present alternative proposals. In addition, the criteria used by the commissions are not standardized, and the approach they take to readjustment differs, sometimes considerably, from province to province.

As Mr. Gray explained before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, when the independent process was originally created, there was a single individual, the representation commissioner, at that time Nelson Castonguay, who served on all of the commissions and thereby helped ensure a certain level of consistency.

Without Bill C-18 to suspend the process, electoral boundary commissions will continue the expensive and sometimes time-consuming series of hearings to discuss the boundary changes they themselves are proposing. Newfoundland has not yet started its public hearings. As of yesterday, being Tuesday, only three provinces, New Brunswick, Quebec, and Saskatchewan, as well as the Northwest Territories, had completed their public hearings. I believe that the Province of Manitoba concludes its hearings today.

The objective of the government is to step back from the current process and ensure an open consultation, with public hearings, with a view to creating a renewed process that is democratic, impartial, and fair to everyone. The purpose of Bill C-18, therefore, is straightforward; it is to suspend the current redistribution process in order to give Parliament and the government an opportunity to examine all the issues surrounding electoral boundaries, including the size of the House of Commons, and to bring forward proposals for reform.

As the Honourable Herb Gray explained while before our Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee:

> There is no point in having the commissions continue their work if the process is going to be changed.

Mr. Gray also made it clear, during his second appearance before the committee, that the 24-month suspension period was:

> ...an outside limit within which the government will have an opportunity, in fact, the ability, to carry out its intention to legislate to update the process.

That legislation will flow from the House of Commons committee which was struck immediately after Bill C-18 received third reading in the other place. The speed with which that committee was established only emphasizes the government's determination to move quickly.

As Mr. Gray explained to our Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee:

> We wanted to anticipate the kind of concern being expressed that all we want to do is delay things. Therefore, we felt we should show our intention of getting on with the matter by introducing the motion in the House of Commons at the first opportunity. That first opportunity came after the bill had received the support of the House of Commons.

Although the reporting date of that committee is December 16, it is the government's hope that the committee will conclude its work and bring forward proposals for legislation well before that date. Indeed, it is more than the government's hope, it is the government's intention that that occur.

The pace of the committee has been accelerated. There have been meetings already between representatives of the official parties in the other place, with a view to holding public hearings early in the summer adjournment.

The government's intention is to proceed quickly with this examination and with subsequent legislation so that a new régime would be in place in time for an election held at the end of the government's normal mandate.

The main concern, honourable senators, about Bill C-18 is that the review, combined with the maximum limit of the 24-month suspension of the current redistribution process, may result in the next election being fought on 1981 census boundaries. If this occurred, Ontario and British Columbia would not receive the additional seats in the House of Commons to which they are currently entitled under the 1991 census.

Mr. Gray reiterated at the committee that the 24 months was an outside limit and that it was the goal to move before that limit.

The government has carefully listened to the representations made on this point by senators, by members of the House of Commons, by witnesses before our committee, by concerned citizens, and by delegates to the Biennial Convention of the Liberal Party of Canada.

In the course of that convention, which was held earlier this month, a priority resolution was put forward by the delegation from British Columbia, and it was adopted unanimously.

Senator Fairbairn: That resolution begins by taking notice of the many criticisms heard about the current redistribution process. It claims that:

> ...the reports produced by the Commission on Electoral Redistribution were badly flawed, created under inadequate supervision and without public input.

The resolution goes on to support Bill C-18, but says:

•(1440)

> Be it further resolved that notwithstanding the above, the 36th General Election be contested on boundaries which have been drawn using the 1991 census, thereby reflecting the demographic changes which have taken place in Canada since 1981, and particularly provide for fair representation for British Columbia.

Everyone at that convention recognized that British Columbia, like every other province and territory, including the province of Ontario, must have its fair share of elected representatives in Parliament.

Senator Carney: With the exception of the House of Commons.

Senator Fairbairn: In his closing remarks at the convention, the Prime Minister said to the delegates:

> You had a very clear resolution on the problem of redistribution.

At various times at the convention, the Prime Minister also reiterated that his goal was that British Columbia and Ontario would have the representation they are entitled to in the House of Commons at the next election. For instance, during a media scrum when he was asked whether British Columbia would get its extra seats before the election, Mr. Chrétien replied:

> It's the goal we've got.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Thank God you had a policy convention. You should have one every month.

Senator Frith: They are upset over there. They got what they wanted, but they don't want to get what they wanted. In other words, they are now telling us, "Please do not give us what we want."

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the government is prepared to do whatever is required to meet this goal, including revisiting the provisions of Bill C-18. However, that reconsideration must be taken in context with the process that has been started in the House of Commons. Unfortunately, the amendments which have been proposed by my friends in the opposition essentially ignore that process.

I want to make it clear that while the government is sympathetic to the expressed principle underlying the opposition amendments, it does not believe it is realistic to expect that those amendments will achieve their professed goal within the current parliamentary timetable, and I have already conveyed that message to the Leader of the Opposition.

In a press release dated May 5, 1994, which is the day that Senator Murray moved his amendments in the committee, we were told, and I quote:

> The purpose of the amendments is to ensure that there are new boundaries in place for the next federal election.

We have no difficulty with that statement, but it is a question of timing.

The suggestion provided by the Conservatives themselves, in a chart which accompanied their press release, is May, 1996. That is when the new boundaries would be in place if the amendments proposed by the opposition are adopted. I must confess that I am puzzled by this schedule, given even the most recent history of how successive majority governments have carried out their mandates.

The 1984 general election was held on September 4, which was four years and seven months into that government's mandate. The 1988 election was held on November 21, which was four years and two months into the government's mandate. Finally, the October 25, 1993 general election was four years and eleven months into the government's mandate.

Honourable senators, during the last 35 years, all majority governments have had a life-span of at least four years and two months. This is the history and the practice which the amendments of the opposition pass over lightly.

As I have explained, Bill C-18 provides that the current electoral boundaries commissions would be disbanded while the redistribution process was suspended. The opposition's amendments would have the commissions continue with their hearings and their other work until the middle of September, at which time they would present their reports to the Chief Electoral Officer.

In 1974, in 1986, and in 1992, when governments suspended the redistribution process, there was a full suspension of the commissions. There really is no precedent that I know of for what is now being proposed by the opposition. The opposition is telling us to suspend the process, but while it is suspended, work continues, because all must be ready for an election perhaps two and a half years into this government's mandate.

The story becomes somewhat confusing when we examine what would next happen under those proposed amendments. After the commissions reported to the Chief Electoral Officer in mid-September, they would then take a break until February 6, 1995, at which point they would be poised to continue their work.

Contradictory messages have been sent, at least initially, by the opposition on this portion of their amendments. One of the first public pronouncements was contained in a press release which I referred to earlier which said:

> If the new legislation is not introduced when the House returns on February 6, 1995, and assurance is given that the new boundaries will be in effect for the next election, the process will pick up where it left off.

That is not what the actual amendment says. Part 2 of the first amendment reads:

> If no other provision is made in respect of subsection 20(2) and sections 21 to 28 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act before the 6th day of February, 1995, that subsection and those sections cease to be suspended and are in force subject to this act.

That amendment requires that a change be made to the act in order to prevent the suspension from being lifted on February 6, 1995. It is not enough to simply introduce a proposed change to the act, as that press release claimed.

Senator Beaudoin, when he spoke in the Senate on May 11, made it clear that legislation would have to be introduced and passed. He said:

> If the government does not change the Electoral Boundaries Act by February 6, 1995, the boundary redistribution process will simply continue from the point at which it was stopped.

In the committee on May 5, Senator Murray said that the commissions would be reactivated:

> ...in February, if no new legislation had been passed by the government in the meantime.

There is a significant difference between introducing legislation and having it passed by both chambers of Parliament, and I suppose Bill C-18 is proof of that. It is at this point that we have serious difficulty, and must then ask how reasonable or realistic the demands of these amendments are.

We know that there is a committee in the other place that is looking at the whole question of redistribution with a view to bringing forward proposals for legislation no later than December 16 of this year. December 16, honourable senators, is also the last day before the Christmas/New Year break. The House of Commons is then scheduled to return on February 6.

Though we are an independent chamber, and proud of it, we do not act in a vacuum. We are one of the two chambers that make up our Parliament, and the amendments of the opposition do not in this case, in practical terms, reflect this relationship or this reality. They do not reflect either the committee reference which was passed in the House of Commons or the sitting schedule which exists in the other place. Instead of reflecting this reality, the opposition has brought forward a proposal that calls for boundaries to be in place when the government calls a general election, perhaps two and a half years into the mandate.

The amendments offer a different impression than opposition spokespersons gave at the committee hearings. For instance, on April 26, in an exchange with the Honourable Herb Gray, Senator Murray asked whether it was possible "to have an impartial distribution completed in time for the next election, say in 1997 or 1998." In the committee on May 5, Senator Lynch-Staunton also referred to a four- or five-year mandate. He spoke of the next election being "held in the ordinary lapse of time, which would bring it to the end of 1997 or the end of 1998, maximum."

The opposition amendments we have before us are calculated on the basis of an election only two and a half years into the government's mandate, the spring of 1996. One has to ask whether that is an ordinary lapse of time for a government which did receive a solid majority in October last year. I agree with Senator Lynch-Staunton that the normal practice falls within the four- to five-year period. The amendments we have before us would ensure that the election would be fought on the 1991 census boundaries, but those boundaries would almost certainly be the ones drawn in the current redistribution process.

It is a process that we on this side and many others believe requires review and reform, but in pursuing that reform how can the House of Commons, the Senate and the government possibly meet the requirements these amendments would impose on any new process? These amendments would seem directed not just at ensuring that the next election will be fought on the 1991 census but also that it will be fought on the boundaries which have been set under the current process, which itself is now being reviewed.

Honourable senators, given what I have said about the timetable, these amendments do not provide a reasonable opportunity for Parliament to examine, to put forward and legislate proposals for reform of the redistribution system, which is the very essence of Bill C-18. The amendments would be valid only if the normal mandate of a majority government were two and a half years, and we know that that is not the case.

There is one other matter I wish to bring to my colleagues' attention and that is the timing provisions that will be under review by the House committee. Those provisions have not received the attention they deserve.

We all know that it takes approximately two and a half years to complete a redistribution process following a national census. When Mr. Kingsley, the Chief Electoral Officer, appeared before the committee, Senator Frith asked whether or not that process could be shortened, and the answer was that some changes were certainly feasible. Mr. Kingsley explained that the commissions could be established within 30 days, instead of the 60 days currently provided for in the act. The commissions could complete their reports and table them in the House of Commons in nine months instead of 12 months. Finally, the new boundaries could come into force six months after proclamation, instead of one year.

If these changes were made the entire redistribution process could be completed in 20 months, instead of the current 30 months. However, such changes, honourable senators, require legislation to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act; they cannot be made unilaterally by the Chief Electoral Officer.

In the course of its work the House of Commons committee examining the process will be looking very carefully at these time periods. If they could be shortened in the manner described by Mr. Kingsley, then electoral boundaries in all future elections would be more likely to conform to the most recent census results.

In summary, honourable senators, I wish to make clear that the government is prepared to embark upon a democratic and impartial process. It is prepared to revisit the provisions of Bill C-18 here in the Senate and in the House of Commons. The government has followed carefully the debate in both places. It is cognizant of the evidence that was presented to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs — and they were good hearings. It has listened also to the message that was delivered by the delegates to the recent convention of the Liberal Party of Canada.

This government has told Canadians that it wants to receive their views and that it is prepared to act on those views. To give comfort to those who are concerned with the 24-month suspension, the government is prepared to amend the legislation to ensure that the next regular election will be held on new 1991 census boundaries.

Senator Perrault: That is good news.

Senator Fairbairn: It is prepared to do so immediately. It is prepared to change the provision for a 24-month suspension of the current process to 13 months, and that would provide an outside limit of the end of 1997, a mandate of four years and two months.

As I said earlier, all majority governments in the past 35 years have had a life span of at least four years and two months. As far as I am aware, there has never been a majority government that has gone to the electorate in less than three years in this country, which is what the amendments of the opposition would suggest.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It can be done; you could call an election.

Senator Fairbairn: The change the government is proposing is transparent and it is reflective of the wishes of Canadians. It also provides a genuine opportunity for the House of Commons committee and Parliament to bring forward and pass legislation for reform of the electoral boundaries redistribution process.

The change would fulfill the conditions publicly set out in our committee by Senators Lynch-Staunton and Murray. On May 5, Senator Murray said:

> I would 'tilt' in favour of introducing as much certainty as we possibly can into this bill to ensure that an impartial redistribution based on the 1991 census is conducted and completed in time for a general election in 1997 or 1998.

Our proposal meets this condition. It would ensure that new boundaries would be in place for an election at the end of the government's traditional mandate, the end of 1997 and into 1998. I emphasize the phrase "traditional mandate" because all senators will know that no Prime Minister can set aside the Royal Prerogative to call an early election in the face of an extraordinary occurrence or a national emergency.

In committee, Senator Lynch-Staunton also seemed to recognize this distinction when he said that the government could not provide guarantees on matters within the parliamentary process. I quote:

> My question, if I may, is not the guarantee; it is the intention of the government to have this done. Not to guarantee; of course they cannot. But can they say, "This is our wish and this is what we want to happen."?

I would respond to him that yes, we can say we wish this to happen. The government is prepared to take the necessary action to provide the assurances which have been sought by senators and by members of the public, either here or in the other place.

I know from my honourable friend opposite that the opposition feels strongly about this bill. It feels very strongly about its amendments and wishes to proceed with them. This is not the first time that a majority Senate opposition has put forward amendments to change a piece of government legislation. However, as I have indicated here today, the government is prepared to respond positively to the objectives which have been brought forward in this house.

It is in that spirit, honourable senators, that I move:

> That the report be not now adopted, but that it be amended by striking out amendments 1, 2, and 3, and substituting the following:
> Page 1, clause 2: Strike out line 9 and substitute the following: "until thirteen months after the day on"

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, had we not agreed to have votes on this issue at 4:30 p.m., I would be more than justified in asking for an adjournment of the debate, because Senator Fairbairn has brought in some eloquent arguments, perhaps not all convincing, but certainly indicative of some relaxation of the rigidity shown by her colleague, the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons. However, we will have an opportunity to discuss her presentation and some of the points she made in greater detail on another occasion. Meanwhile, I will allow myself to make some corrections on the comparisons she made between Bill C-67 and the current bill.

Honourable senators, it must be appreciated that in Bill C-67, we never abolished the commissions — we suspended them. That is an essential element of difference between the two bills.

The committee which will review the act has been asked also to review the composition of the commissions. In our case, we suspended the commissions for a given time, for a given reason, and then proposed that they should carry on their work. In this case, to assure the impartiality of the process, we do not want the existing commissions abolished until we know what type of format will be put into place for the redistribution process.

The other difference is that Bill C-67 had all-party support. In this case, the opposition in the House of Commons was such that the Liberal government had to impose closure. As well, Bill C-67 did not affect redistribution for the 1993 election because the process is such that, even if it had not been suspended, it still would not have been in place for the 1993 election.

The other point I wish to pick up on — there are many others, but I do not have time to go into them — is the issue of the 24 months. The minister said at committee — and this notion has been picked up by the Leader of the Government in the Senate — that the 24-month period is the outside limit. However, that is not what the bill says. The explanatory note is very specific. It says:

> This enactment suspends the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act for twenty-four months...

It does not say "up to 24 months" or "perhaps it could be up to 24 months" or "perhaps it could be less." It says "24 months" If the intent of the government, at the time it introduced the bill, was to say that 24 months is the outside limit, it should have said that at that time. The government is only backing off now because of pressure — strangely enough, and typical of the Liberal party, not pressure from interested Conservative senators, not pressure from the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia, not pressure from the Premier of Ontario, but pressure from their own supporters at a Liberal convention over a particular weekend. Otherwise, they would not have gone so far as to bring forward this amendment.

Senator Frith: Very strange for Conservatives to do that, I guess.

Senator Gigantès: They listen to their own people.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You listen to your own people, but sometimes you might listen to the Canadian people. Do not confuse the two, which is one of the big mistakes you make.

Senator Frith: We are listening to your concerns.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Although the Conservative position on this bill has been made clear on more than one occasion, and at the risk of repeating much of what has been said before, I still want to emphasize a number of arguments which have led us to take the position we have.

When the vote on second reading was called, more than one of my caucus colleagues were anxious to vote against the bill then and there to indicate how strongly they felt about Bill C-18. However, they agreed not to do so in order to give the government a chance to reply to our objections, to indicate at least some appreciation of them — since by that time similar protests were being raised by many quarters across the country — and to hear these objections and analyze them at the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The minister responsible appeared twice before that committee, and each time remained rigid in his sponsorship of Bill C-18. Even when reminded that the sole objective of the Conservative senators was to make certain that the next federal election would be fought on electoral boundaries set impartially, and based on the most recent census, Mr. Gray replied:

> I cannot say that we exclude the possibility that the next election will be held on the current boundaries rather than the new ones.

Now we hear today from Senator Fairbairn that perhaps that rigidity has been relaxed a bit, but her amendment does not guarantee it.

Mr. Gray's frankness may be refreshing, but his lack of concern is deplorable. It simply gives credibility to what was repeatedly reported to have motivated this bill: pressure from Liberal members of Parliament who, once elected, saw their constituencies as personal fiefdoms not to be tampered with.

A national radio audience heard this confirmed on the CBC program, The World at Six on May 5 when the member for Don Valley North said:

> I worked 20 years to get here. Within two months, I lost my seat, which is not fair.

The true purpose, honourable senators, of Bill C-18 could never be better summed up than in those few words.

The Legislative Assembly of British Columbia, in a rare demonstration of unanimity, on April 21, with 52 members present out of 73 — there being 2 vacancies — condemned Bill C-18 and called upon "the Senate to reject this unfair legislation." When the Prime Minister was asked on May 10 at his press conference if he had concerns over this development, he expressed surprise at British Columbia's protest of the bill, since, he said, redistribution would add four seats to Ontario but only two to B.C. In effect, the Prime Minister said with a straight face, British Columbia would actually be disadvantaged by redistribution. I would like to think this was a desperate argument in favour of Bill C-18 rather than a confused understanding of the meaning of "representation by population," but I fear I am being somewhat generous in my interpretation.

When Bill C-18 was first introduced in the House of Commons, it was said that a two-year suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act was necessary "to allow for a fundamental review of all aspects of the process." The argument was repeated when the Minister of Justice moved to refer the issue to the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs. This was on the morning of April 19, even before the Senate had received a message asking for concurrence in the bill. So much for the government's argument that suspension of the act, whether it is for two years or one year, is essential before a parliamentary review of it can get under way. As for the lack of courtesy shown the Senate by the government, the less said, the better.

Senator Frith has argued that there is no constitutional obligation to have a redistribution in place following the latest census and prior to the next one. He quotes from section 51, where it states that redistributions will take place "in such manner, and at such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides." Section 51 also states that the readjustments will be made "on the completion of each decennial census."

Professor Andrew Sancton of the University of Western Ontario gave the committee a brief history of redistribution since Confederation that goes a long way in challenging Senator Frith's laissez-faire interpretation of section 51:

> The first redistribution of federal electoral districts in Canadian history occurred immediately prior to the federal election of 1872...Until the 1940s redistribution was always accomplished in time for the first election one year after the decennial census. The 1945 election was fought on boundaries based on the 1931 census...the seats were, however, redistributed in time for the 1949 election.

Now is not the time to go into the reasons for the delay at that time. However, I raise it because Parliament in 1943 did not act unilaterally. It did not invoke the "from time to time" argument. It sought approval for the delay through an amendment to the British North America Act, which was confirmed by the British Parliament the same year. Just contrast that careful understanding of and respect for the intent of section 51 with its casual dismissal today by supporters of Bill C-18.

Since the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act was passed in 1964, it has been impossible to have an adjustment as quickly as before, since the new, vastly improved, procedures take up to 30 months before they can come into force. Nonetheless, in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s at least one election was held based on the previous decennial census.

While constitutional arguments can only be resolved by the courts, the narrow interpretation given to section 51 does not stand up to how it was actually applied since the beginning, and to how the authority to delay redistribution 50 years ago was sought. The least that can be said is that Bill C-18 dangerously circumvents the spirit of section 51, if nothing else.

At the committee Senator Frith also advanced the argument:

> ...to the extent the house wants to deal with something that directly affected my right to sit as a senator — as this bill directly affects the process that leads to their sitting as members — I would say that is perfectly within their jurisdiction to do it, just as it is ours to deal with this one, but I hope they will tilt it a bit our way... I am going to tilt in favour of the House of Commons, which is most directly affected by the bill...

Section 51 gives Parliament the responsibility of establishing procedures for redistribution, not just the House of Commons. Canada's electoral system and its implementation are admired around the world, to the point where specialists from Elections Canada are frequently asked to advise countries seeking guidance in the introduction and adoption of a basic democratic right. In addition, Canadians are invited to act as advisors and monitors during elections themselves.

In the last little while Senator Prud'homme has been to the Ukraine, and Senator Cools and Senator Oliver have been to South Africa. If others can show such confidence in our colleagues, at least we should be able to demonstrate the same respect for their abilities here and not be hesitant to make use of them in defining legislation of the type before us.

As for Senator Frith's argument, whether or not it was his intention, it suggests a return to the situation which existed before 1964 when members in the majority in the House of Commons had no hesitation in establishing boundaries based on political considerations.

The House of Commons does not belong to its members any more than the Senate of Canada belongs to us. Every Canadian has a direct stake in the electoral process, and if there is to be a tilt in any direction let it be in that of the voters and not in that of partisan interests.

The three amendments which are part of the report of the committee allow a temporary suspension of the process, give ample time for the House of Commons parliamentary committee to propose improved or even new legislation regarding electoral boundaries, and in any case assure that the electoral boundaries will be designed impartially, based on the 1991 census, and be in force prior to the time when the next federal election would normally be held.

The act now contemplates that December 1995 will be when the order comes into force. Bill C-18 would delay this to December 1998. Bill C-18 as amended by the opposition would bring the date back to May 1996. The next federal election would normally be due on or after October 1997, while Senator Fairbairn's amendment would extend the delay to December 1997.

It is not a question of "because the past has shown that a majority government's term averages four years and two months." The point is that as expeditiously, as fairly, and as impartially as possible there has to be a process in place, uninterrupted, that allows the new boundaries to apply to the next federal election. It is too facile to say, "We are not going to have an election until 1997 or 1998, so give us a year to suspend the act." No government can guarantee when the next election will be held under our system. The Constitution allows it a life span of up to five years. That is the only guarantee that we have — that we have to put up with a government and tolerate it for up to five years. However, no government can make the claim that, because over the years the average for a majority government has been four years and a bit, therefore, the next election will be held in four years and a bit. It could be held in three years. It could be held next year.

We all know that there are things going on in this country which, if allowed to develop, could quite rightly convince this government that a federal election should be held as early as 1996. It could be that the process that we are putting into place would not allow the boundaries to be ready for that election. However, that is not the point. The point is that the process that is in place now, we are agreed, should be interrupted for the minimum period necessary. If the Government of Canada is sincere and really believes that the next election, as normally held, should be held under new boundaries, it should, like senators on this side, the Conservative side, support the amendments that we have presented.

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, Senator Buchanan has reminded me that there is a saying in politics and elsewhere that "when you are ahead you should quit." Canadians are ahead by the government's ungracious capitulation on Bill C-18. However, there is the public record and there are some facts that should be placed on the record before calling it quits.

We understand the position being put forward by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, because the game plan of the Liberal government is to show that Liberal legislation is to be amended by Liberal senators in response to Liberal delegates to a Liberal convention. That is the game plan. However, it will not wash, because this capitulation on Bill C-18 is in response to efforts by the Conservative majority in the Senate listening to Canadians who are outraged by the government's action to devalue their votes.

The Leader of the Government stated earlier in her speech that the aim of this legislation was to renew a process and to renew it in a way that was democratic, impartial and fair. However, the problem is that it was perceived widely to be undemocratic, gerrymandering and unfair.

Senator Lynch-Staunton pointed out that, despite the quotations presented today in debate, the minister responsible for this legislation appeared twice before the committee headed by Senator Beaudoin and had the opportunity to say that this new process the Liberals were presenting would be in place before the election. Twice he appeared, and twice he refused to make that commitment. That is the quotation that counts.

I want to remind honourable senators that Bill C-18 is a matter of grave concern for many British Columbians. As Senator Lynch-Staunton has pointed out, every elected MLA present in the house, every elected MP — except the six Liberal MPs — opposed this bill. That is an extraordinary vote of non-confidence in this legislation. The province of B.C. sent one of its ministers, its former Minister of Constitutional Affairs and present Minister of the Environment, Moe Sihota, here to Ottawa to appear before a Senate committee to ask us to reject the bill. Given the fact that the government of the day in B.C. wishes to abolish the Senate, this move by that government to take that extraordinary step to appear before us shows the level of concern. Why? Because it was perceived as unfair and unjust. Passed under closure in the other place, Bill C-18 could deprive British Columbians of their proper representation in Parliament by delaying the addition of two MPs until some time in the twenty-first century. This is not acceptable to Canadians in Canada's fastest-growing province.

As amended by Senator Beaudoin's committee, the bill would ensure that there are new boundaries in place for the next election, as far as it is possible to determine. The process that would flow from our proposed amendments has been well outlined by Senator Lynch-Staunton.

There are three reasons why the bill should be returned to the other place as amended. First, for Confederation itself. This has not been said in this place much today, but we face very difficult times in this country. Now is not the time to cultivate resentment, frustration and distrust. We have a pending referendum in Quebec which could dissolve Canada as we know it. That threat has led to counterthreats from western premiers. That situation has not been particularly helpful. I agree with those who suggest that this is not the time to add fuel to separatist fires in the country, but in its present form Bill C-18 is a further threat by creating fears and anger in our Pacific province; a province which, you will recall, as does Senator Gerry St. Germain, rejected the Charlottetown Accord by the highest margin in the country.

The second reason for rejecting this bill is the role of Parliament itself. We do have two Houses of Parliament. The Senate committee under Senator Beaudoin conducted itself with restraint and commendable attention to the proper exercise of Senate powers. The amendments do not intrude on the ability of elected MPs to act as they wish, provided that they do not intrude on the constitutional rights of Canadians, or the rights of regions in Canada to be represented fairly. That is an important contribution to our parliamentary record and is set carefully on previous precedents.

There were precedents for the Senate to reject redistribution bills in 1889 and 1900. The work of Senator Beaudoin's committee and the contribution of senators such as Lowell Murray is in the highest tradition of the Senate. By acting respectfully, the Senate has gained a new measure of respect from many Canadians. I should like to thank all our senators for their support on this issue.

Thirdly, supporting the amendments shows that the Senate can be responsive to the will of enlightened and empowered citizens who have taken the trouble to make their views known to senators. Senator St. Germain and I have received many letters — our current tabulation is more than 150 phone calls on the Senate answering service, and around 143 letters with addresses attached — from all over the province. I should like to make mention of some of the letters on this list for the record, so that these people can receive some recognition.

I should like the record to show that these are not fanatic freakouts, as some have suggested. These are people who are very concerned. I have told you previously of some of their feelings. To give you a sample of some of the emotion in British Columbia, I have a letter from Campbell River urging us to oppose this bill saying that "Bill C-18 is a travesty. I implore you, as a British Columbia representative in Canada's house of sober second thought, to block passage of Bill C-18. Contesting the next federal election on the basis of the 1981 census is ludicrous. The efforts of the federal government to hold up the electoral boundaries process across the nation is gerrymandering at its worst."

I am reading these letters to show how people perceive this bill, which went through the House under closure, and in light of what Senator Fairbairn has stated with regard to the government's intentions.

There is another letter from MacKenzie, in northern B.C., which states that "British Columbia needs these seats to maintain its representation by population in the House of Commons. Please defeat Bill C-18 when it is debated and voted on in the Senate. British Columbia needs you to stand with us and help us in our fight to stop this injustice to our province."

Those are emotional words. When people feel that their Parliament is acting in a way that they feel is unjust, it undermines Parliament itself.

Here is a letter that will appeal to all senators. It is from Creston, B.C., and states that "In all honesty, I have not been impressed with the performance of the Senate as of late but here is an opportunity to transcend party lines and do what is required of them, namely to prevent passage of Bill C-18. What else can I say, senators? Do your stuff."

Here is a letter from North Vancouver. It states that "Whatever party B.C. senators belong to, this should be a non-partisan issue. Your duty lies with voting in the interests of B.C. That is what you are there for."

I have another letter from Pender Island in the Gulf Islands that states, "This is a request that you do all in your power to see that Bill C-18 is defeated in the Senate in its present form. It is absolutely inexcusable that the redistribution of seats to B.C. should be delayed until after the next election. Bill C-18 is nothing more than a political ploy to strengthen the hand of the governing party in the next election and it should not be allowed to pass."

I want to point out to colleagues that I am taking out a lot of the partisan material. In support of that — and I know that Senator Perrault will appreciate this letter — here is a letter from White Rock, deep in Reform Party territory. It states, "I cannot believe I am thanking you, of all people" — referring to me personally. It goes on to state, "Was I wrong about you? Were you always Pat the protector? Thank you."

Here is another letter from Prince George. It asks, "What possible necessity can there be for the suspension of this readjustment other than the attempt of the Liberal government to deprive British Columbians of their fair share of representation in the House of Commons? We in B.C. view this as a cynical attempt by the Chrétien government to assure themselves of another majority in the next election."

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: It is a shame to say things like that.

Senator Carney: The writer goes on to state that "it could go on forever continually flying in the face of all democratic procedures." If you wish to say "shameful," I will give you this writer's address in Prince George and you can explain it him personally.

There are a number of other letters.

Senator Perrault: Let's keep this non-political.

Senator Carney: You can say that to the letter writer yourself. There is another letter here from Surrey, one of several which I will not read into the record but, unfortunately, it ties the issue of the representation in B.C. to the issue of Quebec. Many of the letters and many of the phone calls that Senator St. Germain and I have received have linked the fact that this is a malicious attempt by the federal government to ensure that Quebec keeps the 25 per cent representation of Parliament, regardless of the growth in the population in B.C.. This is an argument that we hear quite a bit. It is one that I know is not true, and no reasonable person would support, but it does not help the national debate when you have that point of view being repeatedly expressed.

There are many letters from Victoria. This exercise is being carried out on a non-partisan basis. I am sure that Senator Ray Perrault and Senator Jack Austin also received many letters.

This letter states that, "I urge our B.C. senators to kill the bill when it comes before the Senate. Before that, I suggest they discuss the subject with senators from across Canada and convince them that the MPs have made an unlawful and sleazy mistake which can be corrected if the Senate acts, as I hope they will." It is amazing the support that the Senate has received through this effort of the Conservative majority.

A man and wife wrote from Chilliwack to say how upset they are that the federal Liberal government is set to ram through legislation that will deprive British Columbia of fair — there is that word again, "fair" — and equitable representation in the House of Commons.

The letter repeats the argument saying they are writing to me to let me know how very upset they are about this. They ask that the Senate not allow the Liberals to misuse their power and position to take away the rights of people in B.C.

There is another letter from a Canadian citizen and resident of Victoria, B.C., who is appalled at the attempt of the federal government to deprive British Columbia of fair and equitable representation in the House of Commons.

Senator Perrault: It is not true at all. You are citing fallacious letters. You go on radio interviews and you think that epitomizes all —

Senator Carney: The senator makes a good point. I am prepared to listen to these people. I am prepared to listen to Canadians who took the trouble to write, something that the government was not prepared to do.

Senator Perrault: No wonder that the polls show that the Conservative Party has now only 1 per cent support in British Columbia, senator.

Senator Carney: If you are so upset, Senator Perrault, why not read your letters of support for Bill C-18?

Senator Perrault: Will you listen to that tirade?

Senator Carney: People who write us in the Senate have the right to have their views read into the record. Do you not agree, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Thériault: Why did you not read the letters you got on the GST debate?

Senator Carney: I have another letter here from Richmond, and none of these people voted Conservatively. They are not writing their MP. They are writing to their senators.

This writer says that, on the radio, he heard the member of Parliament for Quadra shouting down Senator St. Germain. Apparently the member felt that, because the redistribution scheme is not perfect, we therefore cannot have any redistribution of seats. The writer then asked that someone please kick the member from Quadra in the shins and advise him of this writer's old school motto, "Manners maketh the man."

I am not making these letters up. These are letters from concerned people.

Another letter from West Vancouver says that the writers are extremely upset that Bill C-18 has been rammed through the House of Commons but, because of the constitutional existence of their Senate, they are trusting that they still have the opportunity to have saner heads turn down Bill C-18 in its present form. I am sure that many of you who are senior senators in this place will appreciate this support for the Senate.

There are many "Kill Bill C-18" cards. I know Senator St. Germain has received many.

Another letter from Victoria requests that I and my colleagues in the Senate take a sober second look at the legislation, and that we accept our grave responsibility to ensure that the laws and rules by which governments govern are upheld.

There is another letter from Vancouver that declares it to be about time for B.C. to get its fair share of federal voting power and to stop being hog-swoggled by the federal government.

I could continue to read these letters. I think I have given you a fair measure of the emotion and the power and the concern of the people in British Columbia.

I will read from one more letter, this one from Saltspring Island in the Gulf Islands where I reside. This writer requests that the Senate use its established powers in Canada's interests. Recognizing that this country may some day choose to change the Senate, the Senate is presently a body well defined with specific duties, one of which is to represent the regions. This writer states that he feels, for the first time in his life, that Confederation means that or nothing, that all regions must be represented without the federal government leaning over too far for one region or another. He feels the bill should be killed or at least changed to give B.C. its additional seats.

I think I have given you enough reason as to why we are showing these concerns. Senators in this house on either side do not ask to amend legislation voted by elected members of Parliament without good and sufficient reason. I know that, in my case, since every elected British Columbia MLA, and every elected British Columbia MP, except for the six Liberal B.C. members, oppose this legislation, it is my duty as a member of the second chamber to oppose it, too.

I urge you to support the Conservative amendments and return this bill to the House of Commons for further consideration.

Senator Frith: You do not intend to vote for the committee's amendments, senator?

Senator Carney: As I have said, I urge support for the bill as amended.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Carney may be charged under the Cruelty to Animals Act. She has been flogging a dead horse for thirty minutes. She talks in terms of: "We shall not tolerate a return to the 1981 census."

No one here is suggesting that. The parties in this chamber and the parties in the House of Commons, none of them —

Senator Carney: Point of order.

Senator Perrault: Let me make my point after your long, tedious report.

Some Hon. Senators: Order! Order!

Senator Carney: The point of order is, Senator Perrault, that since you never once attended the committee meetings, you have no idea what was said there!

Senator Perrault: That is not a point of order. That is another one of your spurious Tory delaying tactics. There are some of us in the House of Commons and in the Senate who would rather work patiently and effectively for reform behind the scenes instead of running to every open-line show in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Perrault: The reason you have all of these misguided letters is that you have spent most of your time on the open-line shows in Vancouver spreading false propaganda to the people about the government's intentions. Those are the facts. Those are the facts.

In reality, the parties in this chamber, the parties in the House of Commons, all subscribe to the view that there must be representation based on the latest population information. That is a commitment given again today by Senator Fairbairn. Why, then, does the senator continue to read letters saying, "We do not want redistribution on the basis of the 1981 census?" when such a premise is truly false?

Senator Carney: That is what the minister said.

Senator Perrault: Listen to these words. I thought that it was an eloquent speech by the Leader of the Government in the Senate — a speech that some of us hoped might have been responded to with greater understanding, with a greater spirit of cooperation.

Some of the senators opposite talk in terms of working effectively on a non-partisan basis. Now we see where some of them really stand. They appear to be unwilling to support a very constructive amendment proposed by the Leader of the Government in the Senate when we should all be working as parliamentarians to ensure that every region of Canada, despite its location, be given representation based on population. We agree on that.

Senator Carney: We agree.

Senator Perrault: The only question before us is how do we do it as quickly as possible and as effectively as possible. Senator Carney has indicated that there is a great torrent of support in British Columbia for the Conservative Party and the position they have taken. However, the latest public opinion polls indicate that the Conservative Party in British Columbia now have 1 per cent of the support and that the Liberals have 48 per cent of the support. I think that perhaps Senator Carney and her associates may have a credibility problem in our province.

These are some of the facts which should be remembered.

Senator Carney: Facts? Liberal facts. They change from day to day.

Senator Perrault: I want to read a resolution which came out of our party's most recent, very active venture into democracy, our convention.

> Be it further resolved that, notwithstanding the above, the 36th General Election be contested on boundaries which have been drawn using the 1991 census, thereby reflecting the demographic changes which have taken place in Canada since 1981, and particularly provide for fair representation for British Columbia.

That resolution was passed with overwhelming support. It was not even a matter of disagreement. Why, then, is the senator attempting to stir up this storm of dissent? We have had enough of this nonsense of east against west, Ontario against British Columbia, even in the recent hockey play-offs, for heaven's sake! One misguided newspaper held a silly "Why I hate Toronto" contest. "Why I love Canada" is more important than all of that claptrap. It is puerile drivel, stirring up the people of the Okanagan and other areas of British Columbia by saying "Those Liberals down there, they are trying to take seats from you in the House of Commons." You know that that is not true. It was never the intention of the government to deprive any section of Canada of its fair representation.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Perrault: The Prime Minister has said repeatedly that our goal is to ensure that there is fair representation for all regions. There will be a reapportionment of seats.

It should be remembered that Mr. Gray told our committee, and I quote him, that he wanted to anticipate the kind of concern being expressed, and all we wanted to do is delay things:

> Therefore, we felt we should show our intention of getting on with the matter by introducing the motion in the House of Commons at the first opportunity.

That first opportunity came after the bill had received the support of the House of Commons. There was never anything said by Mr. Gray to suggest that seats would be taken away, or seats denied to any part of the country.

I suppose it is better politics for some people, or so they believe, to whip up some sort of crisis involving Ontario, B.C. and the rest of the country. That is not the way we will save Canada.

Senator Carney: Bill C-18 certainly won't save Canada.

Senator Perrault: I suggest to the opposition that I do not doubt their sincerity when they say there should be redistribution based on the new population figures. We agree on that point. I am not criticizing them for it. However, they are now misusing this whole campaign.

The members of the majority party in this house, the Loyal Opposition, should be reminded that while their amendments have some merit, they are flawed. The statement made by the government today is that the intention and commitment is to bring in those measures necessary to provide the fairest possible system and the earliest possible redistribution.

In this process of considering the options available to us, I do not think they can be considered effectively if there is to be a lot of partisan emotion here. We should work together to make sure that the best possible reapportionment of seats is accomplished. Let us not concern ourselves with the initiators of these concepts. The philosophy of "Don't confuse us with the facts because our minds are made up," is just not good enough in the context of this parliamentary reform process.

Senator Carney's speech was almost a form of ungracious capitulation. In her own secret heart, I believe she knows that the government's response and its proposals have merit. She should be willing to accept the word of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but still we hear about the great flow of letters that she has received, some of which she has read to us today.

Senator Carney: You are against hearing from the people?

Senator Perrault: I want to send this message to the people of our province particularly. There was never any intention to deprive British Columbia of its fair representation. That will never be done by this government, and I hope by no other government in Canada.

The initiatives which were announced today by the Leader of the Government in the Senate are totally constructive. They are worthy of the support of us all. We should get behind these proposals and give them our full support, send the amendments back to the House of Commons and see what they do with them.

Hon. Jack Austin: I thank Senator Prud'Homme for allowing me to precede him. I have undertaken to speak very briefly and, I hope, to the point.

Honourable senators, I believe we in the Senate are seeking the opportunity to make this a more significant legislative chamber than perhaps some of us have thought it to be in the recent past. We have here an offer by the government to introduce amendments which can be approved here and sent to the House of Commons for their approval. This is a gesture that, in my time in the Senate, is without recallable precedent.

The Leader of the Government has said, and I believe she has spoken correctly, that the government has accepted the principle of the opposition amendments. There is a difference about mechanics, and reasonable members of this chamber can differ about mechanics. The government will, in the other chamber, offer a similar form of mechanics to that offered by the government in this chamber.

I would suggest that this chamber advance its own cause and not play to as partisan a theme as perhaps some seek to play. I suggest we advance our own cause by accepting the government's amendments.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I realize that more honourable senators wish to speak in this debate.

I believe we have here an example of the best the Senate has to offer Canada.

[English]

We should not be afraid to trumpet across Canada what we are doing here and what we are about to do. I am on record from many months ago for having said that in a harmonious country, all parts of the country should feel as if they are part of the country. From the beginning, we knew that one of the best parts, as far as I am concerned, British Columbia, felt extremely unhappy, and rightly so.

Long before this debate started in the Senate, I went to see all of my friends, because I have worked on redistribution matters for 30 years. I alerted them to the sensitivity of trying to come forward with something we do not like.

It is obvious that any time you are a new member of Parliament, you are extremely disturbed when you see the first new map. You panic. I did the same. I repeated that in committee. However, I would prefer the law to take its course.

What would be the effect if my friend the Prime Minister of Canada, the Leader of the Government, my friend John Chrétien, was to listen to my call, a public call and a private call, to let the bill die in the House of Commons? We will vote for certain amendments today, and we will reject certain amendments today, but in the best interests of Canada, he should let the bill die in the House of Commons when we return it in one form or another. It will be in the best interests of Canada. What would be the consequences if he was to let it die? Well, the consequences will be very simple. We know that until at least the year 2008, there will be 301 members of the House of Commons, no more and no less. No provinces will feel threatened.

Mr. Milliken's committee is about to look into reducing or increasing or freezing. What would be the net effect? The net effect is that B.C. will fend for itself perfectly well. Ontario and Alberta, rightly so. Under the new formula, Saskatchewan is bound to lose up to four seats. Manitoba under the new formula would be bound to lose up to three seats. Quebec could lose up to three seats. In a formula put forward many years ago by the very astute Senator MacEachen, a new formula that was invented by him, the net effect was to give one more seat to Nova Scotia. If this new committee does anything, that seat in Nova Scotia will disappear.

What are the consequences? Instead of having only parts of Canada unhappy, you will have everybody unhappy.

Why not let the law take its course? Until the year 2008, you will have 301 members. During that time, we will have had a chance to look at all the new constitutional possibilities. We know that Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and P.E.I. are protected by the Senate, so therefore they will never have less members than they have senators. We know that.

When we invented the grandfather clause in order not to reduce members, we were unfair to British Columbia and Ontario. When my country is under attack, I have no hesitation in defending it. Publicly, for the first time, I say that I blame the official opposition in the House of Commons for not having done its duty by opposing this bill.

These people always talk about René Lévesque. Some only met him the night before he died. They claim to be les héritiers. I knew him since 1955, and I repeat here publicly that I was a candidate and I gave him my seat in 1960 at the request of Jean Lesage. I know he would be unhappy to see les héritiers, because René Lévesque was always proud to stand up for any kind of political reform, not only for the kind of bill we are talking about, but for economic reform in the sense of limiting expenses and so on. There was a good formula.

The Bloc has not performed its Constitutional duty to oppose this bill when it was before the House of Commons. They have played games. Those are perhaps strong words for a guy like me, but honourable senators will likely hear a hell of a lot more. As I said, if Canada is under attack I will stand up for my country. At the moment, this is my little way of standing up for Canada. I feel Jean Chrétien is a big man and that he can make everybody understand that there is nothing wrong in not backing off.

I know politicians will say, "We must make him back off so we can gain some points." Canada is under attack, and it is not the time to be trying to make points. That is my basic approach at the moment. I say that this bill is not fair. I would like to vote for the amendment which I just saw, but it eliminates the possibility of retaining the commissions that are already doing their work. I do not think the commission in Newfoundland has done its duty. They should not have pre-judged what we would do. They should have continued with their duties and not suspended their work. I do not understand how they could suspend their work. Until there is a new law, the law of Canada applies, and it says that you must do your duty as the commission for Newfoundland. Why they would suspend their work, I do not know.

Why was permission given in Prince Edward Island, after one presentation, to await the outcome of Bill C-18? That is not the way to run a country. These commissioners were appointed, and they should have followed through with their duty. They are completing their work now.

The Prime Minister is the only person who can make sense of that debate. Were he to say, "I will listen to you", he would be even more popular in British Columbia. I can imagine Jean, whom I have known since university, going to British Columbia and saying, "I have listened to you and I know what you want."

I hope my friends here will not make political points by saying that they will back off. If we do not, we will have proven that the Senate, in a difficult time, can play a great role on behalf of all Canadians and on behalf of all regions of Canada.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I will be brief like one of my colleagues from British Columbia, Senator Austin. Late in March, I brought this issue before the Senate in what I believe was the first question on the matter put to the government leader. It is something that is of great concern to me, and logically, as so deftly put by Senator Carney, to a lot of British Columbians. What we have here, as stated in the host of letters and notes that I have received, is a perception of gerrymandering. In the Senate committee Senator Bosa said that, in his view, there was a perception that there is a sinister aspect to this bill. Those were his words, honourable senators. That is reinforced by my statements to the effect that there is a possibility or an intent of gerrymandering.

Peter Milliken, chairman of the committee which will study new legislation on boundaries, said that there was a revolt among MPs over the proposed changes, particularly in Atlantic Canada and Southern Ontario, as quoted in The Vancouver Sun, in March of 1994. Another member of Parliament in the House of Commons said that people were looking at how they were affected personally. That is where the pressure came from: Their personal kingdoms were being eroded and in some cases obliterated. As Senator Prud'homme has stated, when they saw the map, they panicked; especially the new members. Both these members of Parliament were from the Liberal Caucus.

If anybody has had experience as a caucus chairman in the House of Commons, I have, as I was there from 1984 well into 1988. I know the pressures and I know the reactions and frustrations. We all know what has happened in Ontario with the Liberal Party taking 98 of 99 seats, and there is a great deal of disappointment in the Liberal caucus in the House of Commons. Most of us have aspired to be cabinet ministers at one time or another. As a result, we have this sequence of events and this sequence of statements.

To be fair, the government, as Senator Austin has pointed out, is trying to come up with their amendment to deal with the matter. In spite of that amendment, I cannot see that the Canadian people have the guarantees necessary. I see no guarantee. During the Senate committee hearings when Minister Gray was questioned as to whether or not we would be able to expedite the matter, he pointed out clearly that, regardless of what happened, he could not guarantee, given the 24-month delay in Bill C-18, that we would be able to proceed with redistribution in time for the next election. I do not believe that the provision of 11 months provides that guarantee.

Therefore, in the spirit of those comments, I recommend that the amendments put forward by the official opposition in the Senate be seen as the appropriate amendments, despite what the government side has put forward today. I do not believe those guarantees are there. Those guarantees have been requested. Senator Carney, who has done an excellent job on this piece of legislation — contrary to what Senator Perrault has said about cruelty to animals — has grabbed the bull by the horns and has run with the issue. Believe me, she is not flogging a dead horse. She has taken the issue, she has run with it and she has done a remarkable job.

Honourable senators, I do not want to read into the record the letters I have received and the litany of information sent to me by fax and telephone, because to a vast degree it is repetitious. I said I would be concise and precise.

We speak of divisiveness, we speak of Confederation and we speak of the things that are important in uniting and holding us together as a country. Western alienation, my friends, is one of the greatest challenges we face as politicians who sit in the centre of this nation. Western alienation has never been more deep-rooted, more aggressive and meaner. Therefore I ask each one of you, when making your considerations, let us do it in the spirit of guaranteeing British Columbia and the Ontario regions their rightful positions in our democracy, their rightful positions in Confederation by going ahead with the amendments brought forward by Senator Beaudoin and his committee.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator St. Germain: Yes, sir.

Senator Stewart: The honourable senator, if I heard him correctly, said that Mr. Gray told the committee that he could not guarantee that the next election would take place on constituencies drawn as a consequence of the 1991 census.

Senator Carney: We were there.

Senator Stewart: Earlier today, Senator Lynch-Staunton said almost the same thing, that is, that given the prerogative of the Crown to dissolve Parliament and thus to bring on an election, we cannot say just when the next election will be. Is that what Mr. Gray was talking about? Was he anticipating what Senator Lynch-Staunton said here today, or was he saying something else? If Senator St. Germain thinks that Mr. Gray was talking about something else, what does Senator St. Germain think that "something else" was?

Senator Carney: Read the record.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, if I may respond, I do not know what Minister Gray was thinking. All I do know is that under normal circumstances, and we were speaking in the context of normal circumstances, he could not assure us that we would go to the next election on redistribution.

•(1600)

Senator Frith: Could anyone?

Senator Thériault: But your amendments would not provide that guarantee either.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If I may be permitted a supplementary comment, not only would the minister not give a guarantee, which is understandable, he would not even give his intention of trying to reach that date in redistribution. That is what we were trying to get him to say. Could he at least try?

Hon. Peter Bosa: I recall correctly what Minister Gray said at that meeting. He said he could not guarantee what the commissions would do or when they would submit their report. He could not speak for them. He had to await the committee's report to see whether an election could have been held under the 1991 census.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Senator Bosa obviously did not listen to what Senator Fairbairn said. She has already told us what the committee will say.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Excuse me, honourable senators, but Mr. Gray agreed that, unless subsequent legislation were to overtake Bill C-18, Bill C-18 would have the effect of putting off a redistribution for another 17 months or more; in other words, an election as late as the fall of 1998 would have to be fought under the 1981 boundaries. He agreed that, unless other legislation overtook Bill C-18, that would be the effect of Bill C-18.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I simply cannot understand the resistance of my honourable friends across the way to the amendment proposed by my colleague the Leader of the Government.

Senator St. Germain says there is no guarantee. Well, you have a minister of the Crown speaking for the government in the Senate who says it is the intention of the government to have the next regular election — held in the normal, regular terms — on new boundaries. What more assurance can you expect? To back that up, honourable senators, what does Senator Fairbairn propose? She proposes an amendment to shorten the period. The present bill says 24 months, and she reduces that to ensure there will be time to do the necessary work so that the election can be held under new boundaries. Our objective was fair representation, and to ensure that the next regular election would be held on the new boundaries of the 1991 census.

Now, the Prime Minister — and Senator Lynch-Staunton has agreed — cannot say that any election held from now on will be held on new boundaries. That is impossible. However, the minister has just said that any regular election in the normal mandate will be on new boundaries. We are proposing an amendment to make this feasible.

Senator Murray: Will you permit a question on that point?

Senator Molgat: Certainly.

Senator Murray: Would you agree that the difference between the opposition amendments and the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Government today is the difference between having a redistribution ready in the spring of 1996, in the case of the opposition amendments, and having one ready in December of 1997, in the case of the government amendments?

Senator Molgat: You cannot have a guarantee. The proposals in your amendments are simply too tight. Senator Fairbairn has told you that the calendar of the House of Commons is such that they will adjourn on December 16 of this year. They will reconvene on February 6. The timings proposed in your amendments are simply impractical. That is the problem.

We do not disagree with the intention of your amendments. The government has listened. This is a situation where the government has been prepared to listen to the public of Canada, prepared to follow objectives, prepared to present amendments in this place, and the opposition is prepared to be the dog in the manger. Unless you get precisely what you want, right to the letter, nothing to do with the principle of the bill, you will oppose it. Well, that is your choice, but this government has shown it is prepared to listen and prepared to make changes; yet, you are prepared to refuse these changes.

Senator Frith: Ring the bells!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Austin, P.C., that the report be not now adopted but that it be amended by striking out amendments 1, 2 and 3, and substituting the following:

> Page 1, clause 2: Strike out line 9 and substitute the following: "until thirteen months after the day on"

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: According to the agreement, the Senate will now be in recess until 4:30 p.m.

Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grimard, that this report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lewis, that this bill, as amended, be read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, not having seen any senators leave or enter, and seeing no weakening on the other side — that is, no one has seen the error of their ways — after two tries, could we agree to have the same vote apply to this motion as to the previous one?

That is, it would be recorded, then, with the same names as a regular vote, if that is agreeable.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN VIETNAM VETERANS' MEMORIAL— PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table petitions with 1,264 names showing support for the Canadian Vietnam veterans' national memorial.

Included in these names are John B. Finlay from Oxford and Russell MacLellan from Cape Breton—The Sydneys, two very staunch and wise Liberal members of Parliament.

QUESTION PERIOD

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REVIEW OF REFUGEE STATUS CLAIMANTS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, my question is for the government leader in the Senate and has to do with the announcement by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration of a new review of cases of all refugee status claimants who, since February 1, 1993, have been turned down by the Immigration and Refugee Board. We are talking about more than 10,000 people.

Review officers, including an unknown number of highly paid new recruits, will be trained in applying a broader application of the department's review criteria which will now include violations of fundamental human rights.

The Canadian Council for Refugees, the minister tells us, has been asked to assist the Government of Canada in this review by choosing NGOs, that is non-government agencies, that would help identify previously rejected claimants who might benefit from a further review under the broader interpretation of the refugee criteria.

The government leader will be aware that these policy decisions spring from a report prepared for the minister by two immigration advocates who, after a ten-week study, submitted a draft report in March and a final report in April. That report, with all of its complaints and political broadsides, was released for public consumption and consideration on Friday, May 13. After six days in which neither of the Houses of Parliament was sitting, the new policy was announced.

My question to the minister is why was so little time — really no time at all — allowed for public consideration of a range of changes in controversial immigration matters between release of the relevant report and announcement of government policy on the eve of a holiday weekend?

In the little Red Book, the Prime Minister speaks of "time to reflect, time to consult, and time to listen to Canadians."

Six days? Is that what he meant?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Thank you for your question, Senator Doyle. I do not have an answer to the detail that you have presented. I will seek to get it from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO MIDDLE EAST— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the minister in reference to events in the Middle East which mean a great deal to Canada and indeed to the whole international community.

I refer to developments stemming from that wonderful meeting on the White House lawn last September that brought about movements in the Middle East which some of us would not have dreamed possible a year ago.

The particular reference is to the problems facing the new Gaza and Jericho, where tremendous economic needs are evident to make those communities viable. Can the minister tell the house whether our country is assisting in this measure, and, perhaps at another time, can she give us some indication of the types of assistance and the nature of its transferral?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Thank you, Senator Macquarrie. Again, I will seek to have that information for you next week.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED VISIT OF CHAIRMAN ARAFAT OF PALESTINE— REQUIREMENT FOR MINISTERIAL PERMIT— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. As you know, the Right Honourable Prime Minister and the Minister of Foreign Affairs have invited Chairman Arafat of Palestine.

Is it true that one of the difficulties in his accepting the invitation is the fact that, at this time, the government has not changed the rule and Mr. Arafat, although he is now received around the world, could only come into Canada by a permit from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration? If that is so, I would suggest that he will not show up in Canada.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will certainly pass that question on to the appropriate minister, Senator Prud'homme, and get an answer back to you.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

GRAINS—BREAKDOWN IN TRADE RELATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, my question is on our trade situation with the U.S. with regard to durum wheat and grains in general. It seems to me, and this is just an observation, that every time we get a Liberal government trade relations with the United States start to break down.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Frith: We refuse to be a branch land, that's all.

Senator Gustafson: Just observe a bit. The present government has completely endorsed the free trade agreement brought forward by the Mulroney government. The question I have concerns the direction the Minister of Agriculture has been taking when in other countries, even Brazil. He has been making the point that Canada has been too highly subsidizing the grain trade, when we know that our farmers are getting $2.40 a bushel. I delivered grain last week at that price. The Americans, of course, with their subsidy program, are getting somewhere around $5 Canadian per bushel. This is out of order.

•(1650)

My question is: Can the Minister tell us what is the legal position of the Canadian exporters as regards the free trade agreement, and is the Government of Canada putting it forward to the Americans?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Gustafson, I want to review the last part of your question in order to give you a legal answer, which I do not have at the present time. However, I will follow up on some of the statements that you have made.

I think it is well understood that the Americans have taken a very confrontational stand toward our grain trade and the Canadian Wheat Board. The attitude that we are experiencing right now is certainly not something that we have invented.

We have a bizarre situation, which has been reflected in comments in this house in past weeks, in which the Minister of Trade was in Washington having discussions with his counterpart, Mr. Kantor, in an effort to come to some kind of a bilateral agreement on these important issues that will preclude the sort of activity that the Americans have been threatening to take under the GATT and through their own international trade commission. Those discussions have been going on both at an official level and now at the ministerial level.

At the same time, the Minister of Agriculture of the United States, quite improperly in my view, has been travelling around South America and Mexico and, in effect, urging those and other countries to come forward and oppose the Canadian Wheat Board and our trade with them. I find it incongruous, when we are dealing with our closest trading partner and friend, to have these activities going on.

For your information and the information of the house, I should like to quote comments today from Mr. James Blanchard, the United States Ambassador to Canada, when he was asked what are Mike Espy's intentions in view of his comments in Argentina, Brazil and Mexico. The answer from Mr. Blanchard, U.S. Ambassador to Canada, is:

> I don't think he had authority from the President. And I don't agree with him. But you know ... and so I don't fault Roy MacLaren for being frustrated, and I hope his speech will be reported in the United States and not just here. And maybe help us resolve this bottleneck of disputes. But I don't have any evidence to suggest that whatever's going on in Brazil is something the President authorized or supports, or is even aware of.

This was said publicly, here in Ottawa, today.

Senator Gustafson: My next question, honourable senators, is whether the Prime Minister of Canada has taken up the matter with the President? We know how serious this problem is. There have been voices from across the land. I have followed this matter very carefully. We had U.S. senators saying they should turn the missiles on Canada, and that has backfired in Canada.

The minister seems to be acting on his own. We hear the millers saying they want our grain. On the other hand, on American phone-in shows, we hear farmers coming on and saying, "We'll take their fertilizer to grow more grain, but we won't take their grain."

The questions are, what have we done about this situation under the free trade agreement, and is the Prime Minister willing to take this matter up with the President of the United States? We do hear other voices from across the border that seem to be at times even stronger than the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Fairbairn: The senator will perhaps remember that the Prime Minister took up these issues directly with the President of the United States some weeks ago following the breakdown in discussions in Marakesh. The Prime Minister and President Clinton had a conversation, and the upshot of it was that the ministers and officials on both sides were urged to use this 90-day period of time that exists under the threat of a GATT challenge to come to a bilateral agreement that would be of benefit to both countries.

Those have been the signals that have been sent out from the leadership of the United States and of Canada. As our ministers have indicated privately and publicly in the last few days, they are prepared to work very hard for a constructive understanding and agreement on these continuing dispute issues on grain with the United States.

Suffice it to say, Senator Gustafson, that it is not the Canadian Wheat Board that is at the heart of this dispute. Rather, it is the Export Enhancement Program of the United States that is at the heart of it; there is no doubt about that.

Our ministers are prepared to do the very best they can to seek an agreement. In talking to some colleagues such as Senator Stanbury and Senator Hays who were in Santa Fe recently with the Canada U.S. Parliamentary Delegation, great support was given to our legislators from American legislators. They were saying, "We understand your position, and we support it." I guess we say to them, "Tell your President, but especially, by God, tell your Minister of Agriculture."

There is a political situation in the United States that goes back to the Congressional debates on NAFTA, when there were commitments made to bring in some of those votes in order to get that particular bill through the Congress. At this point in time, we are hearing extreme voices on the one hand, but on the other hand we hear voices such as that of Ambassador Blanchard, who certainly has the ear of the President, and is a very significant personage representing the American administration, saying, "We want an agreement, and we want to get along." That is the underlying motivation of the Canadian government in these discussions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISPOSITION OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can the Minister advise this house if the reports I read in the press are accurate. The minister, Mr. Massé, has supposedly advised the other place as to negotiations between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of Quebec to resolve the problem created by the budget decision relating to the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean.

Can the Minister advise this house as to what the minister of the other place advised that House, and be specific on the point of whether or not there are any negotiations on the table in this connection, and whether the Government of Canada intends to maintain a significant military presence as part of the package that the Government of Canada is bringing to the table in those negotiations?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret that I cannot be specific. I spoke to Mr. Massé this morning, and he confirmed to me that he has had, as you know, a number of discussions with the Quebec government. He told me that there is a meeting of minds on general elements of an agreement vis-à-vis the collège militaire. The negotiations are continuing and the agreement is not yet finalized.

At this point in time, the ministers on both sides are not publicly declaring the specifics of their discussions, in order to have full flexibility in coming to a mutually desirable agreement. That agreement is expected within the next few weeks, and I will be glad to report as more elements become clear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate explain the situation to her Prime Minister and to Mr. Massé? When explaining the reasons for its decision to close the Collège militaire de St-Jean, the governement said that it was confident it would be able to convince the Government of Ontario and Mr. Rae to invest substantial amounts in improving the bicultural and bilingual environment in Kingston. Today, there are Franco-Ontarians who are considering an appeal to the UN because of a lack of services in French in Ontario. To me, this is an indication that the Government of Ontario cannot even meet the responsibilities it already has according to existing provincial legislation. Considering the statements by the Franco-Ontarians, would you agree that the government is being rather unrealistic, at a time when Francophone Ontarians cannot even obtain services in their own language?

Mr. Chrétien says he is confident that in the case of Kingston, the Ontario government will spend considerable amounts in order to attract Acadians, francophones and even the country's anglophones, who want to receive their officer training in Kingston in the language of their choice.

I think this is a pipe dream. Could the Minister tell us whether she is prepared to transmit my comments to her government?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn : Honourable senators, I shall certainly transmit the honourable senator's message to the government, as I always do.

I should also like to reiterate what was said some time ago when this issue first was raised, that there is every expectation that the college in Kingston, in very short order, will be providing a fully bilingual atmosphere and program for students who will be attending that institution. I am not personally familiar with any communication on the matter vis-à-vis Premier Rae, but I shall transmit the honourable senator's comments and questions and return with a response.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: My second question is on the same subject. There are rumours in the navy that facilities for military training will be set up very shortly in Lévis or Quebec City, for future francophone navy officers.

This sounds like a half-baked proposal that is supposed to placate francophone officers. Rumour has it that there will be some compensation for the navy, and that it will be a French training facility in Quebec. Is this rumour based on a genuine and serious proposal by the government to train naval officers in Quebec, or is it just another example of Liberal gossip?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Simard, I am not aware of those rumours. I shall see whether there is any substance to them and report back to you.

YOUTH

EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, Human Resources Minister Axworthy recently announced the first phase in the Youth Service Corps Program. He said that this program will involve as many as 17,500 young people over the next three years. The minister also noted that about 400,000 young Canadians between 18 and 24 years of age are unemployed.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what the government is doing to create jobs for the remainder of those 400,000 young people? In particular, can she tell us what new job initiatives are being offered for youth in Atlantic Canada, where we have the highest rate of unemployment?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend has mentioned the recent policy announcements made by the Minister for Human Resources Development relating to not only the projects for the Youth Services Corps — a few of which have been announced but more will be announced throughout Canada in the fall — but also the substantial increase in the SEED money that is going out this summer for youth employment.

I know from working with the minister that the circumstances of young people in the workforce in this country today are probably one of the strongest motivating forces he has in making the efforts he is now making in that regard, and in reviewing our social programs with a view to bringing together the greatest elements of assistance in relation to training, apprenticeship, job search, counselling and support that can possibly be accomplished for the young people of this country.

This is particularly true in Atlantic Canada. I have said before that of the programs attached to the Atlantic groundfish strategy, those two programs will benefit young people. I cannot give the honourable senator numbers, but I can tell her in terms of one aspect of assisting people in Atlantic Canada, including young people, that we have programs through our federal-provincial literacy agreements that are being very helpful to young people.

I was in New Brunswick just last week at a celebration of the development of Premier McKenna's Canadian Academic Services Program through its 311 training facilities.

I am mindful of your previous questions. I will attempt to find a breakdown of the numbers. They are simply not available at this time, but as soon as they are I will transmit them to you.

Senator Cochrane: A breakdown would be very helpful.

The projects that Mr. Axworthy has announced under the Youth Services Corps are for a duration of six to nine months. Could the Leader of the Government tell us what plans are in place to provide jobs for these youths after this six- to nine-month period has ended?

Senator Fairbairn: I will attempt to get specific comments for you, senator. These short-term efforts are multipurpose. They will help with training. They will help make job contacts for young people. There is a small sum of money to assist them in furthering their education or lending a hand in setting up employment initiatives.

Over the last weekend, I noticed a number of stories in this country about young people not waiting for the job market, but using innovative ideas of their own to set up small businesses. The experience attained during those months of Youth Service Corps will enable young people to take initiatives on their own.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer, and it is to a question asked on April 26, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Cochrane with regard to the Student Summer Employment Program. It may give some details to the question Senator Cochrane asked a moment ago.

YOUTH

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Funding for the Summer Employment/Experience Development (SEED) Component of the Challenge Program has been increased by $20 million, an increase of almost 23 per cent from last year. SEED will provide funding for the creation of some 60,000 jobs for the youth of Canada this summer.

It is expected that, through SEED, approximately 5,600 jobs will be created this summer for youth in Newfoundland and Labrador.

This government is also embarking on several other significant initiatives to improve the school-to-work transition and to introduce new approaches to the education and training systems.

These initiatives include the Youth Internship Program, reforms to the Canada Student Loans Program, learning initiatives, Youth Service Canada and the stay-in-school initiative.

Under Youth Service Canada, 17,500 youths will gain relevant work experience over a three-year period, which will enable them to become successfully integrated into the labour market.

And, through the Youth Internship Program, 60,000 youths will receive training opportunities over three years.

Unfortunately, the estimated breakdown of participants by province under these new youth initiatives is not yet available.

MERCHANT NAVY VETERANS—STATUS OF BENEFIT CLAIMS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 26 on the Order Paper — by Senator Marshall.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Senate urges the Government of Canada to provide an appropriate site for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the aforementioned action. — (Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, there is no doubt whatsoever that this initiative by Senator Marshall is well motivated and has the support of many people in Canada sympathetic to the cause for which these Canadians fought.

The Vietnam War saw incredible suffering on the part of all of the combatants, including some 40,000 Canadian volunteers who served in that conflict. Of these Canadians, 113 died in action, and their names are on the Vietnam War Memorial in Washington, D.C.

The war itself, of course, was controversial. Many Canadians did not support the American initiative in Vietnam, nor the Australian initiative, because, as honourable senators are aware, Australian troops were also actively engaged in combat.

We saw our role as peacemakers. Before the trouble began, and during the course of the war, many Canadian initiatives were undertaken to bring that terrible conflict to a peaceful conclusion and to establish a stable peace.

Some month ago, a former United States marine named Rick Gidner, who lives in White Lake, Michigan, joined with two others to form the Michigan Association of Concerned Veterans, which wants to donate a monument it is building to honour Canadian veterans of the Vietnam war. His partners are Farmington Hills resident Ed Johnson of the 9th Infantry and engineer Chris Reynolds, who lives, as well, in Michigan. These three American veterans fought side by side with Canadians whom they felt were very badly treated after the war when they were denied, for many, many years, the kind of benefits enjoyed by American veterans. That situation has been virtually corrected now, but Canadian veterans who suffered and died in Vietnam were never able to claim veterans' benefits until very recently.

Ed Johnson, Chris Reynolds and others felt badly about this situation, so they raised $100,000 out of their own pockets to build a monument. They said, "We fought with these Canadians, they were wonderful people, and they fought on the same basis as did we." There have been donations of materials to make the monument possible.

It is understandable that those who served and suffered in the crucible of a terrible war want to see their Canadian comrades who died remembered and those who served honoured.

As I said, Canada's role in the Vietnam war involved mediating and peacekeeping. We sought to be the honest broker. We sought to play a constructive and peacemaking role rather than a role as military combatants. The Vietnam war was never endorsed or supported by the Government of Canada, the Parliament of Canada, or by a majority of Canadians. We sought a peaceful settlement of the conflict. We showed friendship to the United States during the Vietnam war by assisting that country to extricate itself from Vietnam. Throughout the conflict we remained good friends but never became military allies.

Indeed, many talented United States young people, some of them Vietnam dissidents, came to Canada from the United States in those difficult wartime years. Many became Canadian citizens and are now making an outstanding contribution to this nation. I suppose that most of us know a Canadian with that kind of background.

As well, as I noted at the outset, there were the 40,000 Canadians who made the personal decision to volunteer for the United States military services. Should they be remembered? Of course they should, but let us keep in mind that, unlike the first and second world wars, the United States and Canada were never military allies in Vietnam. We were never in military conflict with the government of the people of North Vietnam.

It is in the context of these facts that we are considering Senator Marshall's resolution. The resolution seeks to have a site designated in Ottawa for the placement of the monument which honours those Canadians who enlisted in U.S. forces and served in Vietnam.

Recognition of the Canadian contribution to the United States Armed Forces has not come easily. This is further to the detail that I gave you earlier. Until 1988, Canadian veterans of that haunting and terrible conflict were denied basic veterans' benefits made available to American veterans. It was only after a long and tough campaign, lobbying in Washington and here in Canada, that these Canadians received their benefits and entitlements. The campaign for equal rights for Canadian veterans was tough and difficult, but happily an agreement involving the U.S. and the Canadian governments was put in place in 1988. Today there is near equality in benefits involving both the United States and Canadian veterans of Vietnam.

Where should this monument be placed and what are the alternatives? As far as the monument is concerned, we know now that it is not within the power and mandate of the National Capital Commission to donate land for this purpose. The mandate of the NCC is to help create a capital which represents Canada and those ideas, events and principles which have built this country. The NCC has developed criteria consistent with its mandate by which to evaluate proposals for memorials on federal lands in Canada's capital. There is a real technical impediment to establishing the monument on NCC lands.

One requirement is that individuals or groups to be commemorated must have been "active in Canada or on behalf of the nation." The request for an NCC site, then, does not meet the established criteria.

What are the alternatives? The most obvious answer lies in the proposal that a corner of the new grounds surrounding the United States Embassy in Ottawa be set aside to honour Canadian veterans of Vietnam. It would be more than appropriate for that to be done. I understand that the grounds will be very spacious, and that there are a number of ideal sites for such a monument.

There are other veterans from Canada who fought in the wars of the United States who have never been given the kind of official monument sought so vigorously by Senator Marshall. Perhaps we should have honoured them, too. A great many Canadians were stirred by Lincoln's emancipation proclamation. They joined the Union Forces in the American Civil War. I had an ancestor who enlisted in Buffalo, New York, and who fought for the northern armies. One of his brothers never came back after having been stirred by Lincoln's emancipation proclamation. There are no monuments in Canada for those contributions.

The resolution before us should not be a source of contention. However, it should be recognized that it is not within the mandate of the National Capital Commission to provide land for monuments of this kind. Let us approach our friends in the United States. We have this new agreement between Canada and the United States. Let us extend it to a matter such as this, and ask our friends at the U.S. Embassy to provide space on embassy grounds on Sussex Drive for a Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial. This would be an appropriate action which would be greatly appreciated by thousands of Canadians.

Alternatively, let us keep in mind that situated along the 49th parallel from coast to coast are a number of international parks which celebrate the friendship which has existed between Canada and the United States down through the years. I have in mind, for example, a beautiful park in my own province, a park which some of you may have visited. It consists of several hundred acres. There is a monument in the middle bearing the stone-carved words: "Children of a Common Mother," which notes the fact that, in many ways, our two countries share a common heritage. School children, both Canadian and American, celebrate once a year the fact that we have the longest — and I suppose it is almost trite to say it — undefended border in the entire world.

Would it not be appropriate for a monument of this kind to be placed squarely on the 49th parallel, perhaps slightly on the U.S. side to meet that technical regulation that we have in our tradition? I suggest that it be located in the Peace Arch Park along the 49th parallel near White Rock, British Columbia. This park celebrates the long-standing, good relations we have with our friends to the south.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, stemming from the remarks that I have made, I move that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "that" in the first paragraph, and that the following be substituted:

> The Senate respectfully asks the American Embassy to provide space on its grounds on Sussex Drive for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans National Memorial or, alternatively, that the Senate make representations at the appropriate levels to secure a site for the monument on the U.S. side of one of the Peace Parks located along the 49th Parallel.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Jack Marshall: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators —

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The Honourable Senator Marshall has moved the adjournment of the debate. If the Honourable Senator Gigantès wishes to speak, he should ask the Honourable Senator Marshall to adjourn the debate after he has finished his remarks.

Hon. Royce Frith: I take it that Senator Marshall is adjourning the debate on the amendment, which does not have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, on May 10 there was a disposition to resolve this matter one way or the other. At that time Senator Frith suggested that I could adjourn the debate. I accommodated everyone. The matter was to be dealt with again in a couple of days. That was 15 days ago. I accommodated Senator Perrault on goodwill. The Senate did not convene last week, and the matter was put over until today. At the end of today, the Senate will adjourn until next Tuesday. On Tuesday, there will be something else. We will soon go into our summer adjournment and nothing will be done about this situation until September.

I am not suspicious of the tactics, honourable senators. What I am asking for is being put in the same state of limbo as the striking of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, a situation that has been going on since January of this year. That subcommittee has not yet been struck.

However, within two minutes of Senator Marchand getting to his feet, there was an order of reference taking away the responsibility of aboriginal veterans from our subcommittee and giving it to the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples. Theirs is a problem we have been dealing with for the past 10 years in the Subcommitee on Veterans Affairs.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall, calling the attention of the Senate to the progress in the planning by the Government of Canada for the 50th anniversary of D-day.—(Honourable Senator Molgat)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, although the hour is late, the subject is important. I should like to say a few words at this time on this matter.

First, I wish to compliment Senator Marshall for having raised this matter on June 23 last year. He was absolutely right in doing so because, as far as I know, no action was being taken at that time. I think it was Senator Marshall's proposal that caused some activity within the department, and the group called Canada Remembers was established.

I do not want to make the matter a partisan one. However, I think the real action only started after the election, when the group was formed and work began. Since then, a great deal has been done. A good program has been established under the name Canada Remembers. I believe most honourable senators will have received some material from that group.

A great many activities will take place throughout Canada to commemorate this important event in Canadian history. There will be a major activity here in Ottawa on June 6. In my own City of Winnipeg there is a very active committee at work. Two regiments from that city, the Royal Winnipeg Rifles, my own regiment, and the Fort Garry Horse, had troops who took part in the D-day exercise. It is rather unusual to have two regiments from one city. I think it is the only place in Canada where that occurred. However, there is a Winnipeg committee planning a three-day series of activities and ceremonies. Throughout Canada there will be recognition of this important event.

Similarly, in Europe, the Canadian participation will be important. Both the Governor General and the Prime Minister will be present in Normandy in the period June 5 to 7. On Sunday, June 5, the Governor General will be participating with our group in commemoration at a monument established by my own regiment at Courseulles-sur-mer. Later that day the Governor General and the Prime Minister will be at Omaha Beach at an international ceremony.

The main Canadian activity that day will be at the Canadian War Cemetery at Bény-sur-mer, where a large number of young Canadians are buried. There will be proper recognition by the Canadian government and by highly placed individuals within our Canadian Parliament.

On June 6, the Prime Minister will be in Courseulles-sur-mer and will make a D-day address on that morning, again near the monument of my own regiment, not for partisan reasons but because it happens that that monument, in the form of a crusader's sword shaped like a cross, is a fitting place to commemorate.

Canada, in all these events, has not been a war-like country. We served because we believed in peace, democracy and freedom. The young Canadians who served overseas were all there as volunteers. Unlike most other countries, we did not have conscription. The Canadians who went to serve, went willingly. Unfortunately, we lost a great number, many of whom were very young people. There will be fitting recognition of the part that Canada played in the Second World War.

One regret that I have is that there has not been established in Europe, certainly not on the Continent, any monument or memorial in the same manner as was done after the First World War when the Vimy Memorial was established. Anyone who has seen the Vimy Memorial can only stand in awe at the sight, and in recognition of what happened at that time and the participation of Canada. Unfortunately, after the Second World War no such action was taken. There is no Canadian memorial in continental Europe, to my knowledge. There are a number of individual regimental monuments and plaques, but no single Canadian memorial. This is an error. We should have had that recognition.

A few years ago a group in Caen, led by the Mayor of the City of Caen who is also, by the way, a senator, decided to establish Le Mémorial in Caen. They approached the three main governments involved in the D-day landings: the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada. I want to remind honourable senators that Caen was liberated by Canadians. Unfortunately, the Canadian government chose not to participate in the Caen Memorial. The result is that if one goes to the Caen Memorial today, although it is completely within the Canadian sector in Normandy, it commemorates the French, American or British troops, but there is very little Canadian input.

Fortunately, two years ago, a group was formed called the Battle of Normandy Foundation and, working with the Canadian War Museum, a temporary exhibit was set up. It was to be there for a year in Le Mémorial. That exhibit is excellent, but it is a temporary exhibit. We were able to convince the war museum to leave that temporary exhibit at least for this year so that Canadians who will be over there — and they will be over there in very large numbers during the period of early June — will be able to see at Le Mémorial some Canadian input.

The Battle of Normandy Foundation, of which board of directors my colleague and friend Senator Marshall is a member as I am, has been continuing its efforts to achieve more Canadian involvement. We are now involved in a fund-raising campaign, hoping to raise $1 million to be used for various purposes. One of those purposes is to have at Caen a memorial garden to Canadian participation.

We know, because Le Mémorial has again made the offer to the three countries, that the Americans are proceeding to build a garden. I understand that there will be a wall, similar to the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, which will have the names of servicemen inscribed on it. The British are proceeding with a memorial garden. Canadians cannot afford not to have a garden there in the very city that was liberated by volunteer Canadians. We are making an appeal to Canadians to support us in this fund-raising campaign so that we can establish this memorial garden.

In addition, we are proposing scholarships for students attending the University of Caen and courses at what is known as the Abbaye D'Ardennes. The Abbaye D'Ardennes is very near to the city of Caen. It was the headquarters of General Kurt Meyer and it is the location where many Canadians were murdered. Subsequently, General Meyer was charged and sentenced to death. That sentence was later commuted. He spent some time in Dorchester Penitentiary in New Brunswick, and eventually returned to Germany.

The Abbaye D'Ardennes is where many soldiers were murdered. Those soldiers were mainly from the North Shore New Brunswick Regiment. In honour of these young men, the proposal is to have a series of bursaries, not to study war, but to study how we stay out of war; to study peace in the hope of establishing structures that will guarantee peace forever, if that is a possibility. In this way, the Battle of Normandy Foundation is attempting to increase Canadian participation and the recognition of what Canada did in the Second World War.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 31, 1994, at 8:00 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADA'S ROLE IN WORLD WAR II

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise to continue the statement which I began on May 25. In doing so, I wish to make the second of two points having to do with the third volume of the official history of the RCAF, The Crucible of War.

My second point is this: While The Crucible of War produces evidence which might support some of the conclusions in The Valour and the Horror, it also provides important context which is sadly missing from the television series. Journalistic reports have ignored this point.

For example, while questioning the extent to which the bomber offensive affected German war production, the official historians also point out that area bombing created a second front in the skies over Germany, the significance of which cannot be overstated. The human and material resources committed to the air defence of Germany were desperately needed by Hitler in other theatres of war. Indeed, had they been available, they might have had a critical impact on the fighting in the Soviet Union, Normandy and northwest Europe in 1944-45.

Furthermore, The Crucible of War explains that Bomber Command played a decisive role in the Normandy invasion of 1944, and launched a highly successful offensive against German synthetic oil plants later that fall. Nowhere in The Valour and the Horror are such achievements noted.

As to the question of whether Allied air forces deliberately targeted German civilians, might I remind honourable senators that this was total war, and at no point did morality enter into Germany's conduct of the war. As the report of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs made clear, Bomber Command was the only offensive weapon we had in the darkest days of the conflict, and those innocent civilians, as The Valour and the Horror labels them, were part of the German war machine.

In short, the official history notwithstanding, in the eyes of most military historians and veterans, The Valour and the Horror remains a disgraceful production which presents a distorted and inaccurate picture of Canadians in the Second World War. It is merely a shame that with the approach of the 50th anniversary of D-day, this whole debate must once again rear its ugly head.

With June 6 just around the corner, our attention should be focused on the enormous sacrifices our veterans made for Canada and the Allied cause 50 years ago. They served with courage and skill, which, in the end, is all that really matters.

ROLE OF COMMANDERS AND POLITICIANS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, there goes Senator Marshall again. There was no criticism of the heroism of Canadian fighting men in either The Valour and the Horror or in the history to which the Honourable Senator Marshall refers. Their bravery and their sacrifices were recognized fully. The criticism levelled by both the television series and this history is against the leaders who were taking such decisions.

Whenever I listen to Senator Marshall, the message I get is this: We must not re-examine what happened. There are two points to be considered here. We honour those who fought and sacrificed themselves for their country, but if we are ever to have good defence policies and a good selection of commanders, then we should be able to look at what those commanders did and what the politicians did and say, "It was a mistake. The Maginot Line was a mistake. Butcher Haig was a mistake. Bomber Harris did not take good enough care of his men."

I had no objection to the bombing of Germany into the Stone Age. I was engaged in the business of killing as many Germans as possible. I have no regrets about it, and I do not think any of our fighting men should have any regrets about it.

However, if we cannot examine whether we killed the enemy effectively, efficiently and with the least possible loss of our people, then we are not doing our job. Senator Marshall simply wants us to stand in adoration in front of commanders and politicians who made mistakes.

READMITTANCE INTO COMMONWEALTH

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I rise to draw the attention of this chamber to a rather happy occurrence in the history of the affairs of humankind. We all recall the situation created by the racist regime in South Africa which caused its withdrawal from the Commonwealth. Today the Secretary General of the Commonwealth, Mr. Anyaoku, announced the imminent rejoining of the Commonwealth by the new racist-free, democratic South Africa.

That is an event which is welcomed by all members of the Parliament of Canada, not only by senators in this chamber but also by our colleagues in the other place. We are also pleased that two of our colleagues, the Honourable Senator Cools and the Honourable Senator Oliver, participated as observers in the historic election in that country.

Today I felt that it was appropriate that that imminent return to the Commonwealth of the great country of South Africa not go unnoticed by this chamber.

ATLANTIC CANADA

TOURISM—SOURCE OF EMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, from time to time I hear the Government of Canada stating that they should like to increase employment — not unemployment, but employment. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senate which perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could carry back to her colleagues in the Government of Canada. I should like to suggest that the government look into improving employment in Atlantic Canada by improving tourism.

Atlantic Canada, for those who are not familiar with it, is probably one of the most beautiful parts of the world, with the Cape Breton Highlands, the beaches of Prince Edward Island, the historical chambers of Confederation, and all the other tourist attractions that we have.

Senator Corbin: Yes, and the Saint John River Valley.

Senator Marshall: And the west coast of Newfoundland!

Senator Bonnell: Yes, and Anne of Green Gables, and all those other tourist attractions.

I have talked to some of the members of the Diet in Japan who are coming to Canada more and more to see Banff, the aurora borealis, Niagara Falls and Anne of Green Gables. They tell me that you almost have to be a millionaire in Japan to make the trip over here to see the setting of Anne of Green Gables in Prince Edward Island. First, a Japanese tourist must fly to Vancouver, then to Toronto, then to Halifax, and then take a trip over on a Dash-8 aircraft to Prince Edward Island in order to see that tourist attraction. It cost them thousands of dollars to do that.

In Canada we should be offering package tours, so that tourists can come direct to Eastern Canada aboard a 747, for example, full of Japanese people and Asians. They can spend two days golfing, two days deep-sea fishing and two days looking at the seals. They can then visit the Cape Breton Highlands and some of our historical sites. The following Friday night, another 747 could fly in, take those people back and return with some new visitors.

The greatest source of employment in Atlantic Canada is tourism. Many young people find jobs in the summer in that field so that they are able to return to university in the fall. In my opinion, tourism should be promoted. The government should be asking our embassies abroad to promote tourism to Canada. Tourism is a great money builder and an income saver. This is something we should be doing more of in Canada. Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could ensure that my suggestion is taken up with the proper ministers, so that Atlantic Canada can benefit from an influx of tourists who would enjoy seeing Cape Breton Highlands, Halifax, Nova Scotia, St. John's, the Reversing Falls, Magnetic Hill, and all the beautiful things we have in that area.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I must point out to the honourable senator that his time has expired.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, may I suggest that Senator Bonnell take his suggestion to his caucus. If he is reluctant to do so, perhaps I might be invited to his caucus, so that I can make the same representation to his colleagues.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I know this is not the time for debate, but I would point out to my honourable friend that the caucus does not make the decisions in this country. That is the preserve of the government.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the great responsibility of filling in for, but not replacing, the Honourable Senator Molgat. Senator Molgat has gone off to Europe as the Honorary Colonel of the "Little Black Devils." That is apparently the affectionate name for the Royal Winnipeg Rifles. He will be participating in the D-day celebrations. We wish him well.

With cooperation from my friends opposite and forbearance from my friends on this side, I will try to do the job.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 1, 1994, at one thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

My friend the Leader of the Opposition and I have discussed this matter, and I believe he has some comments he wishes to make.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to suggest to the Senate that perhaps we are taking it for granted now that Wednesday afternoons will be short sitting days, as some committees are starting to schedule, as much as possible, their meetings as of 3:00 p.m. on Wednesdays.

The purpose of having a short Wednesday is to accommodate committees that have a full schedule, particularly a legislative schedule, in order to allow them to meet without having to ask for leave when the Senate is sitting. Now it looks as if the tail is wagging the dog. Already three committees have scheduled meetings tomorrow from 3:00 p.m. on, without knowing first that the full chamber would give approval to a 1:30 to 3:00 p.m. sitting. I think that is being somewhat presumptuous.

I urge the government to remember that we are now in the final stages of this session. We only have a maximum of three to four weeks left. Perhaps this should be the last week in which we should automatically have a short sitting on Wednesday.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I do not disagree with my honourable friend. However, his suggestion would make it difficult for chairmen of committees to know when they can schedule witnesses and when they cannot. At one time there was the suggestion that, if we were to continue to have a short sitting on Wednesday afternoons, perhaps we should meet on Monday night so that the chamber could have its regular amount of time.

The problem, as has been pointed out, is one of certainty. It is difficult for the chairmen. Perhaps we should try, at least by Monday of each week, to decide whether or not we intend to have a shorter Wednesday. It may well be that for the rest of this term we should not work on that basis.

Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition and I could have further discussion about the matter. We might take it up with some of the committee chairmen to see what might work, and we will try to arrange matters in the best interests of all.

Motion agreed to.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

REMOVAL OF EXEMPTION FOR TOBACCO—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the following petition from 250 medical practitioners and other concerned Canadians asking for the removal of the exemption for tobacco from the Hazardous Products Act.

The Petition of the undersigned, residents of Canada,

Humbly Sheweth:

That research conducted by Health Canada shows that the number of people who smoke, particularly teenagers, increases as the cost of cigarettes goes down; and

That the increase in the price of cigarettes through taxation had a far greater impact than educational programmes or social marketing advertisements on smokers' decisions to quit; and

That tobacco products are clearly linked to many forms of cancer, heart disease, stroke, emphysema, chronic bronchitis and many other illnesses; and

That tobacco products contain over 4,000 chemicals of which at least 43 cause cancer in humans; and

That the use of tobacco products is directly responsible for the premature death of some 38,000 Canadians annually; and

That tobacco can therefore rightly be termed a hazardous product.

Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray that your Honourable House may be pleased to remove the exemption for tobacco under the Hazardous Products Act.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

QUESTION PERIOD

INDIAN AFFAIRS

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS ON OKA—ROLE OF CHIEF FEDERAL NEGOTIATOR

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, last November the Government of Canada dismissed the then negotiator in the Kanesatake conflict in Oka, and explained the decision by saying that Mr. Bernard Roy's mandate had come to an end on October 31, that it was not being renewed, and that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development would now take over the negotiations.

In a press release dated May 25, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced the appointment of the Honourable Michel Robert as the chief federal negotiator for Kanesatake. The Honourable Michel Robert is to take over the exact mandate that was taken away from Mr. Roy in November, and which was to be carried on by officials of the department.

My question to the minister is this: Can she explain to us what role Mr. Robert plays in the Department of Indian Affairs to support the contention that the department is carrying on with negotiations?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senator Lynch-Staunton noted, Michel Robert has been named a negotiator by the government. Events have occurred in recent days in Kanesatake that affect the area near Oka. It is obviously a matter of concern that these events be settled, and settled peacefully. Mr. Robert has been asked to take on this assignment. I am sure he will conduct his negotiations in a very responsible way.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: My question was: Who is Michel Robert? Is he an official of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, since we were told in November that the department would take over the negotiations?

Perhaps I could help the minister by pointing out that one of the qualifications of Michel Robert, which again goes against all the principles outlined in the Red Book, is, among other things, that he was president of the Liberal Party of Canada from 1986 to 1990.

Senator Kinsella: Patronage!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: My colleagues and I have nothing against naming a former president of the Liberal Party of Canada to negotiate for the Government of Canada in any case whatsoever. We do have an objection, however, to this sanctimonious attitude that what we did in similar circumstances was bad, and what this Liberal government does in exactly the same circumstance is good.

Senator Simard: After only five months!

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would simply say that Mr. Robert is the chief federal negotiator, as noted by Senator Lynch-Staunton. Whatever the gentleman's political affiliation may be, he is well recognized in Quebec and in this country as a very fine lawyer and a man who has had considerable experience in dealing with these kinds of situations. I am sure he will do a very fine job.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We have nothing against the qualifications of Michel Robert. He is an outstanding lawyer and no doubt will do a fine job. However Bernard Roy is also an outstanding lawyer, was already doing a fine job, and was dismissed because of his association with the previous government. Michel Robert is being hired because of his association with the current government. In my book, there is a double standard being applied here.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, by way of supplementary, I share the opinion of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition on the outstanding qualifications of Mr. Roy.

I wish to ask the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate if Michel Robert is the same Michel Robert who was my classmate, and was also appointed by Prime Minister Mulroney to sit as a member of the Security Intelligence Review Committee?

Senator Fairbairn: I would have to check, Senator Prud'homme, but I believe that that is the case.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, the Parliamentary Committee on Official Languages established that there were too few English-speaking soldiers who were bilingual in the Canadian Armed Forces. We had, in Canada, a very efficient institution in terms of linguistic duality, namely the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean. However, the government has decided to sink it and to rebuild it in Kingston, one piece at a time.

I would like to know if the Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware that the Quebec government has turned down the offer made by Mr. Massé, which included $4 million from the federal government.

Second, could she table in the Senate, the capital expenditures planned for Kingston?

Third, can she tell us how many professors from St-Jean have agreed to move to Kingston with their family?

In conclusion, I would like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to provide us with the cost of a decision which is not only bad in all respects, but which will harm the linguistic duality of Canada.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Rivest, I cannot tell you the amount. I will certainly check with my colleagues.

With respect to the Royal Military College at St-Jean, I have nothing further to report than I did last week. The negotiations are continuing between the Government of Quebec and Mr. Massé. As soon as they are concluded, he will report.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary, if I may.

On Sunday, May 29, La Presse published a front-page article on the closure of the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean, which the government announced in its last budget. We read in this article that the city council is blocking the construction of a French-language high school in Kingston.

As the government and the Prime Minister have told us, Kingston had been ruled fit to receive the only bilingual military training institution in Canada. The Prime Minister has indicated that he had invited Premier Rae of Ontario to muster the bone and sinew of the city to make Kingston truly favourable to biculturalism in every respect.

In the May 29 article, we are told that the students of École Marie-Rivier have been attending classes for the past seven years in cramped, temporary structures without sanitation facilities and that the City of Kingston recently passed a special bylaw to block the construction project, in spite of the facts that the Catholic school board of that region had already been issued a construction permit and had invested $4.2 million in the project.

I can understand why my colleague Senator Rivest asked his question, because so far the government has given us no evidence that it will save a single penny, quite the contrary.

We were told that this budgetary decision was primarily based on the savings which would result from it. Therefore, it cannot be a matter of cost.

Kingston, as the same article in La Presse also tells us, is not the place to have the only military college in Canada for cadets. Can we hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will, along with her colleagues, convince the government and the Prime Minister that this decision is a bad one in every respect? Can we hope that this decision will be reversed and that military training will be provided in French to officer cadets, in Quebec, in a French environment, in Kingston, perhaps in a bilingual but predominantly English environment, and also in Western Canada?

Does the government need any more evidence that it made a mistake regarding this issue?

• (2040)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Simard for his question. I am not knowledgeable of all the factors he brought to my attention about the school in Kingston. I will certainly look into them. A number of factors may well have come into play that had nothing to do with the language issue.

As to the burden of his main question, I can only repeat what I have said to him before; these decisions, taken at the time of the budget, were taken for substantial reasons and with great regret. At the moment, the ministers of the federal government and the Quebec government are working very closely together to try to produce a result that will be beneficial and acceptable to both parties, as well as to the people of St-Jean.

Senator Simard: The Leader of the Government in the Senate is always telling us about these negotiations that are supposed to be going on. My colleague just told us that, for all practical purposes, these negotiations have stalled.

Our information is also to the effect that, as a basis for these negotiations, the federal government could at least let the Government of Quebec provide some language training in St-Jean, as we know very well, but never military training for cadets. We have trouble with a provincial government giving military training in any event.

To begin with, this argument, this suspense, this imbroglio, is based on nonsense, on a false premise, and on the possibility of an agreement with Quebec being dangled in front of us. I tell you that this is a distorted argument to begin with and that there is no hope of seeing the Royal Military College in St-Jean provide military training in future, either for francophones or for anglophones.

The government leader in the Senate has just told us that she does not know all the details of this decision, this insult to Kingston francophones. The report points out that the Kingston city council gave in to English-speaking taxpayers who considered it unjustifiable for the province to subsidize the construction of such a facility to meet the needs of five per cent of the Kingston population. If Mr. Chrétien wants to convince Ontario and the Kingston authorities that Kingston is the right place, he has his work cut out for him. I think it would be better for the government to reconsider its decision and really save money.

My information is that the federal government offered $5 million, and some even say $10 million, to Quebec. Where will savings come from then? We know we will need $20 million or $25 million in capital alone for the new facilities in Kingston, in addition to teachers' transfers and so on.

Please, Madam Minister, do something generous and enlightened by persuading your government to reverse this bad decision.

NATIONAL FINANCE

DEFICIT REDUCTION PLAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question for the government leader in the Senate has to do with the financial health of this nation. The Alberta government is moving on its own deficit reduction plan, and I believe it is doing a credible job, as does the investment community in the world. However, investors are looking to the situation in our country, as evidenced by a steadily increasing bank rate, rising 28 basis points to 6.59 per cent today, and they are really nervous. Ontario has seen its credit rating revised, and we do not know where the federal government stands on the federal deficit.

What kind of plan does the government have, if it has a plan, to deal with this issue?

Senator Thériault: That sounds like The Globe and Mail.

Senator St. Germain: Thank you very much, senator. I did not think I wrote that well.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not want to get drawn into a discussion on comparisons with provincial governments. However, I might encourage my friend Senator St. Germain to have a conversation with my other friend, Senator Ghitter, about some of the activities in Alberta. Senator Ghitter has a very enlightened view on the situation in our mutual province.

On the question of the government's plan, that plan was clearly laid out in the February budget. The government is serious about its deficit reduction. It is serious about the measures that were brought forward in that budget.

The honourable senator mentions the bank rate. The government is very conscious of the fluctuations in the bank rate over the last several weeks. There is a volatile market out there. There is also in Canada a situation that adds to the instability of the market because of what is going on with some spokespersons from the province of Quebec. There is no question that that situation is having a very unsettling effect on international monetary markets. This situation is certainly not of anyone's making or of anyone's choosing: it is a fact of life.

One of the factors that has become apparent during the recent weeks of instability is the underlying and growing strength of the Canadian economy. The recovery that has been in place for the last few months has gathered strength noticeably. Over 115,000 jobs have been added to the economy, to the good fortune of Canadians. Business and consumer confidence is up. Retail sales have risen by 3.2 per cent in the first quarter. Corporate profits are up by about 40 per cent, and revenues are running stronger than has been the case for some time.

Our inflation rate has remained very low and steady. As we face these disturbing situations, we are doing so with considerable strength in the Canadian economy, and with the promise of the programs we have been bringing forward of job creation and greater opportunity for Canadians right across the country.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate speaks of the problems created by certain individuals. Those individuals and those problems were there at budget time. I am speaking of the IMF's concern that three per cent of the GDP, for a level of deficit, is not acceptable.

In Western Canada small business people are asking questions. This is the government that stated that it could be trusted; that there would be no more patronage. The Leader of the Opposition just cited a blatant case of this.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate speaks of job creation. How much did it cost us? These jobs are not being created by small business based on straight investment, based on confidence in the Canadian dollar or the economy. Investors are nervous. Is it possible for the government leader to deliver a message here that will create a level of confidence amongst small business; a confidence that is currently being eroded by this tremendous uncertainty in interest rates?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, there is a growing confidence within this country about the the governing of the country and the state of its institutions. I think all honourable senators will be pleased to know that the latest survey of the United Nations has Canada back on top as the greatest country in the world in which to live.

Senator St. Germain: That was in 1992 with the Conservative government.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): There is not much talk about Liberal achievements. You are just reading our program and our accomplishments. It must be embarrassing — no government legislation; no government achievements.

Senator Fairbairn: It is very true that the IMF would like to see the Canadian deficit program be more pronounced than it is. It is certainly the responsibility of the Government of Canada to produce a balance in its economic plan that will bring down the deficit in a serious and meaningful way and, at the same time, enable our economy to continue to grow and small business to produce jobs. As we move into the legislative plan in the weeks ahead, honourable senators will see provisions that will have very direct effects on the ability of small businesses to produce jobs for Canadians.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You forgot about free trade. That is all that's left.

NATIONAL FORUM ON HEALTH

CONFUSION AND DELAY WITHIN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government and concerns the Forum on Health that was promised in the Red Book during the election campaign. However, I want to make it clear to the Leader of the Government that I do not intend to make health a partisan issue.

There is, unfortunately, an increasing amount of confusion about this health forum. The issue is one that concerns all Canadians, and I find it hard to understand the delay and the confusion about the terms of reference. This is an urgent matter, a matter that should be discussed as soon as possible.

I would also like to remind the government that it is not starting from scratch. In recent years, most, if not all, provincial governments have conducted in-depth studies of all aspects of health care, including the economic and social dimensions of health problems. We now see a kind of confusion that is rather disturbing. At this point I would like to refer to the Red Book.

[English]

The Red Book stated:

> A Liberal government will establish a National Forum on Health, chaired by the Prime Minister, bringing together for public discussion the major partners and parties involved with the health of Canadians.

Are the provinces not considered major partners? Why were they not invited to participate in the forum? Does the leader find it appropriate for the government to be acting unilaterally on a matter of provincial responsibility? What is happening on the promised National Forum on Health?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there has been considerable discussion with the provinces on the question of the National Forum on Health. Indeed, only last week at their meeting in Gimli, Manitoba, the western provincial premiers were very interested in being part of this forum and also having one of their own participate as a member.

The federal government is committed to working with the provinces on the whole question of health. There is no usurping of jurisdiction. The provinces are our first partners in this undertaking. The National Forum on Health is on track and will be announced very shortly. There has been a commitment, a very personal commitment, on the part of the Prime Minister in this regard, and I think it will turn out to be a very useful and important exercise for all Canadians and will build on information and background that, as my honourable friend has pointed out, does exist in the system. This is an effort to get outside of the system, put the issues before the people of Canada and have them involved in these very important discussions that are critical to their futures.

[Translation]

Senator Lavoie-Roux: All the better if the western ministers are in agreement. They suggested that one of them act as co-chairman instead of Mrs. Marleau. It seems that, at the beginning, it was to be Mrs. Marleau. I wonder if she is being pushed aside.

Senator Thériault: Could this be a political comment, Senator Lavoie-Roux?

Senator Lavoie-Roux: It is a comment. It reflects a different opinion from what we heard from the Quebec and Ontario health ministers, who considered the government's attitude appalling. However, you are saying that it will be corrected.

My supplementary question, honourable senators, deals with an article published in The Toronto Star of May 28.

[English]

The article points out that Health Minister Marleau has incorporated many provincial suggestions in the terms of reference of the forum. We have heard often about these terms of reference. Are they ready? If they are, can this chamber obtain copies of them? Can these terms of reference be made a little less mysterious?

The article also reveals that the forum will have a four-year mandate and a budget of $12 million.

I have two questions to ask of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Do we have four years to act in the health field? We know that several provinces have taken some liberties with the Canada Health Act and that the Minister of Health, in a manner of speaking, has had to punish them. With the health system in such a serious condition, I do not think we can take four years to examine the situation.

I should like to remind the Leader of the Government that six months have elapsed already since her party took office. I know they were not about to deal with this matter in the first days of taking office. However, will this matter go over until the next mandate?

Will the measure really cost $12 million? After all, history has taught us that when all is said and done, the cost is often more than what is estimated. We do not have money to waste. There have been so many studies that have already cost Canadians a great deal of money.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will try to get as much clarification as I can for the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux. I should point out that the purpose of the National Forum on Health is to examine, in the longer term, the health issues and the health system in this country. In no way is it usurping the responsibility of the federal-provincial ministerial government-to-government body on health. That body is a most important one. It will continue, as it has in the past, to make key decisions on health care in Canada. The forum should not be seen as usurping or interfering with that function.

I have not read the article to which the honourable senator refers, but I will try to get the clarifications she seeks.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, my second question was not in reference to usurping the role of federal-provincial jurisdiction. My question was why this forum is to have a four-year mandate, which would push the government outside its present mandate. Four years is too long when everyone is trying, in some fashion or other, to change things some of which, in certain cases, should not be changed. If we do not act more diligently, sooner or later we will jeopardize our health system. I think the deadline should be much shorter than four years.

FUTURE OF BILL C-18

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question to the minister will be quite brief. What does the government intend to do with Bill C-18, which was amended in the Senate last week?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I did not catch the first part of the honourable senator's question.

Senator Nolin: What are the government's plans with respect to Bill C-18, which was amended last week?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, Bill C-18 is back in the arms of the House of Commons, as the honourable senator knows. Its future will unfold there. Undoubtedly, it will be returned to us at some point. As soon as our colleagues in the other place have studied it and the amendments, they will respond and return it to us.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

MOTION TO URGE GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE SITE FOR CANADIAN VIETNAM VETERANS' MEMORIAL ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Senate urges the Government of Canada to provide an appropriate site for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the aforementioned action,

> And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "that" in the first paragraph and substituting the following:
> That the Senate respectfully ask the American Embassy to provide space on its grounds on Sussex Drive for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial or alternatively, that the Senate make representations at the appropriate levels to secure a site for the monument on the U.S. side of one of the Peace Parks located along the 49th Parallel.—(Honourable Senator Marshall)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise to address the amendment introduced in the chamber by Senator Perrault on May 25 to my motion No. 13, which states:

> That the Senate urges the Government of Canada to provide an appropriate site for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the aforementioned action.

Honourable senators, before I speak to the actual amendment, let me react to some of Senator Perrault's comments. Let me deal first with his assessment of Canada's role in the Vietnam War. He stated:

> We saw our role as peacemakers...
> ...mediating and peacekeeping...
> We sought to play a ... peace making role rather than a role as military combatants.

I remind honourable senators of the following description of Canada's role from The Canadian Encyclopedia, which states:

> Canadian delegates to the Truce Commission engaged in espionage for the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency and aided the covert introduction of American arms and personnel into South Vietnam, while they spotted for U.S. bombers over North Vietnam.
> Canadian Commissioners shielded the U.S. chemical defoliant program from public inquiry, parlayed American threats of expanded war to Hanoi and penned reports legitimizing both the rupture of the Geneva Agreement and the United States air war over North Vietnam.
> Ottawa would later assert that these actions were necessary to counterbalance the activities of the Eastern Bloc countries with whom they shared membership on the Truce Commissions.

That is not peacekeeping, honourable senators, nor is it peacemaking, as Senator Perrault suggests. It is not bringing that terrible conflict to a successful conclusion, as he has also suggested. It is not peacemaking or peacekeeping when we review these staggering statistics: approximately 1.7 million dead; 3 million wounded and maimed; 7 million tonnes of bombs dropped, many manufactured and supplied by Canada; 75 million litres of herbicide dropped; 10,000 helicopters and war planes lost; 56,000 soldiers killed, including over 113 Canadians with estimates of over 400; and 303,000 wounded, many of them Canadians.

The senator also indicated that the Vietnam War was never endorsed by the Government of Canada, the Parliament of Canada, or even by a majority of Canadians. I remind him again of what he conveniently does not mention, with a quotation from The Canadian Encyclopedia:

> Cabinet papers, confidential stenographic minutes of the Truce Commissions, as well as top secret American government cables revealed Canada to be a willing ally of U.S. counterinsurgency efforts.

That is endorsement, honourable senators.

Here are a few more quickies for honourable senators to contemplate, and Senator Perrault in particular when he said that "Canada was never in military conflict with the government of the people of North Vietnam." In reply to that I can say this: First, Canadian Commissioners shielded the U.S. chemical defoliant program from public inquiry. Second, Canadian aid during the war went only to South Vietnam, and Ottawa stopped the shipments of ecumenical medical relief to civilian victims of the war in North Vietnam.

What about the testing of Agent Orange for use in Vietnam at Canadian Forces Base Gagetown, honourable senators? What about the U.S. bomber pilots who practiced carpet-bombing runs over Suffield, Alberta and North Battleford, Saskatchewan before commencing their tours of duty in Southeast Asia?

I will repeat what I said on one of my other interventions: 500 firms sold $2.5 billion worth of war material to the Pentagon. Another $10 billion in food, berets and boots for the troops was exported to the U.S., as well as nickel, copper, lead, brass and oil for shell casings, wiring, plate armour and military transport.

In Canada, unemployment fell to a record low level of 3.9 per cent, the gross domestic product rose by six per cent yearly, and capital expenditure increased in manufacturing and mining as United States firms invested more than $3 billion in Canada to offset shrinking domestic capacity as a result of the war.

As I recall, when I gave this information previously, Senator Gigantès retorted, "Business is business."

Senator Gigantès: I did?

Senator Marshall: Turning to Senator Perrault's conception of the mandate of the National Capital Commission, he conveniently followed the same path as the Minister of Heritage by selectively changing the context of the wording of the criteria as contained in a document entitled: "Commemorations in the Capital."

For example, here is what Senator Perrault said:

> As far as the monument is concerned, we know now that it is not within the power and mandate of the National Capital Commission to donate land for this purpose...

That is dead wrong, honourable senators. The document says that, "the NCC is responsible for commemorative projects on Federal lands in the National Capital Region with the exception of Parliament Hill which is the responsibility of government services." Honourable senators, I am sure that means Public Works Canada or Canadian Heritage. Further, it states clearly that "the Commission does not initiate commemorations." In other words, its contribution to the projects is the site and the time of the staff. All other costs are the responsibility of the sponsoring organization, in this case the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' Coalition.

The National Capital Commission works with the sponsors at all stages of the project as follows. First, on the development of the design criteria. The design is already developed, honourable senators. Second, they are responsible for the selection of the design. That is already completed. Third, they are also responsible for the construction of the monument, which is also completed. Finally, they are responsible for the unveiling, which could be ready at a date to be determined. Canadians would be proud of the ceremony, which would show a respect and understanding among Canadians.

Here are a number of other factors which the senator camouflages:

> Subjects of international importance may be commemorated if they have had a significant and demonstrable impact upon Canada and the Canadian way of life.

The Vietnam war had a significant and demonstrable impact upon Canada and the Canadian way of life.

> In the case of individuals or organizations, they must be directly associated with ideas or beliefs of national significance.

Certainly, the Vietnam war had national significance.

> Evidence must be provided of the sponsoring group's financial commitment to the project including the cost of perpetual care.

Honourable senators, the Canadian Vietnam veterans have made this commitment.

Honourable senators, all the veterans are asking from the government is a site on a small piece of land to locate the gift to Canada of a memorial to pay tribute to some 40,000 young Canadians who went to war with our neighbouring United States forces and the 113 of them who died on the battlefield, in the same manner as the Canadian government gave a gift of a memorial to America to pay tribute to those young American youths who crossed the border and fought for Canada in past wars.

I repeat, honourable senators, all they are asking is a small piece of land in this vast region of Ottawa to locate the national Canadian Vietnam veterans' memorial. As a matter of fact, as reported in the local press a few days ago, there is an uproar from local Liberal MPs about the NCC wanting to sell 1,500 acres of land in the National Capital Commission area; a responsibility which they find surplus to their needs.

Honourable senators, I now wish to address the amendment introduced by Senator Perrault which states:

> That the Senate respectfully asks the American Embassy to provide space on its grounds on Sussex Drive for the Canadian Vietnam veterans memorial or alternatively that the Senate make representations to the appropriate levels to secure a site for the monument on the U.S. side of one of the Peace Parks located on the 49th parallel.

I wish to comment on that alternative suggested by Senator Perrault. First of all, he finds the answer in the proposal that a corner of the new grounds surrounding the new U.S. Embassy in Ottawa should be set aside. There were guffaws from the other side at that suggestion. However, he feels that this would be more appropriate.

Again, Senator Perrault conveniently forgets, or is being facetious when he makes such a suggestion, that the memorial is a gift from the United States to Canada for the sacrifices of Canadians in the Vietnam war. The gift is from the United States to Canada. Senator Perrault as well should know that the United States government has a policy not to place monuments on embassy grounds for security reasons. Surely he is not serious in making light of the wishes of Canadians to visit a memorial dedicated to Canadians, in order to pay their respects, when the entry to those very grounds would be restricted?

Surely Senator Perrault knows from his conversation with Lee Hitchins, the President of the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' Coalition, that such an offer will not be considered under any circumstances. Mr. Hitchins told Senator Perrault, in those exact words, that there was no question of that.

Surely Senator Perrault's inflammatory suggestion to even propose publicly to locate a memorial on the 49th parallel, slightly on the U.S. side, is an insult to those men and women who have worked tirelessly to see this memorial become a reality. I can tell Senator Perrault that his suggestion has already caused anger and dismay among not only the Vietnam veterans, but also the families of those who died.

It should be made clear that there is a Vietnam memorial in Quebec to those Canadians of that province who served and died with the United States forces. Nobody there said, "Not on our soil." Only in this chamber do they say that.

It is also obvious that Senator Perrault's amendment is not only wrong in substance, it is wrong in form as well. I quote from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Sixth Edition, page 207-8, citation 698(9):

> An amendment may not be proposed to insert words at the commencement of a clause with a view to proposing an alternative scheme to that contained in the clause...

His proposal is foreign to my scheme.

My motion, honourable senators, is to urge the Government of Canada to place the memorial in the capital area in Canada. Senator Perrault's motion is to ask the United States to locate the memorial in another country, which motion is completely foreign to the original motion.

Honourable senators, I respectfully suggest that the debate on the amendment be closed and the question put.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is the Senate ready for the question in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I shall read the original motion and the amendment.

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

> That the Senate urges the Government of Canada to provide an appropriate site for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the aforementioned action.

It is further moved in amendment by the Honourable Senator Perrault, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa:

> That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "that" in the first paragraph and substituting the following:
> > The Senate respectfully asks the American Embassy to provide space on its grounds on Sussex Drive for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial; or, alternatively, that the Senate make representations to the appropriate levels to secure a site for the monument on the U.S. side of one of the Peace Parks located along the 49th Parallel.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, may I ask a question?

If I am out of order, please rule immediately, Your Honour, because we usually do not speak on the vote.

I do not wish to speak on the motion. I just want to make a suggestion, if it would be the mood of the Senate to consent, to take that vote as its first Order of the Day tomorrow. I am sure that many honourable senators were not aware that there might be a vote tonight. Even though they were present here tonight, many senators have now left for other events, and they might like to take part in this vote.

However, if my suggestion is not agreeable, I do not want to make this into a debate.

An Hon. Senator: Why not adjourn the debate?

Senator Prud'homme: I would like to adjourn the debate but the motion in amendment has already been put to a vote.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In answer to Senator Prud'homme, the Chair asked whether the Senate was ready for the question, and I was in the process of putting the question.

If there is agreement, then the matter can be postponed. The most sensible way would be for someone to move the adjournment of the debate, or else for there to be agreement that the vote will be taken tomorrow. If there is agreement, then I am in your hands.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at the invitation of His Honour, and because I am aware of the absence of a number of senators who have concerns and interest in this motion, it would be wise to adjourn the debate to give us an opportunity to have a larger attendance, and to give those senators an opportunity to participate.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Why not defer the matter so that we can be sure there will be a vote?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my understanding of the suggestion of Senator Prud'homme was that the vote be deferred, not that the debate be adjourned.

Senator Prud'homme: That was exactly my suggestion. Honourable senators, to be very clear, I know that nobody rose. I do not want my friend Senator Marshall to be unduly upset. I would understand that.

No senators rose to take the floor; therefore, unless I am wrong — and please do indicate to me if I am — it is my understanding that one got up to ask for a vote because nobody else wished to have the floor, and nobody else asked to adjourn the debate. As far as I am concerned, on the amendment put forward by our friend Senator Perrault, there is no more debate.

• (2130)

I am suggesting that the vote not take place tonight. I think Senator Phillips understands much better than I do. I will reach his level of understanding someday. Senator Phillips understood me very well. My intention is just to ask to postpone the vote until tomorrow, as first Order of the Day; not the debate, but the vote on the amendment. Then we would go back to the main motion.

I am in the hands of my colleagues in the Senate tonight. Only if you say so can the vote be postponed. Otherwise, we will vote.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, on May 10, Senator Perrault rose and adjourned the debate. I challenged that motion at that time. There was an accommodation made after about an hour and we reverted, and we ignored the procedures and rules of the Senate. We accommodated Senator Perrault. He said he would be in full flight the next day, which was May 11.

This is now May 31, and again an adjournment has been requested. When is the matter to be resolved? There has been repeated debate. When will it end?

Senator Prud'homme: Tomorrow.

Senator Marshall: Tomorrow? I heard that on May 10, 21 days ago. Senator Prud'homme is wondering why there was silence. The silence must have been there because there was agreement that the Chair go ahead with the vote. Here we are again.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I can try to be helpful. Is there agreement that the vote be put tomorrow? If there is not, then I believe I have no choice but to put the vote now. I am in the Senate's hands.

Senator Stanbury: I believe, honourable senators, that there is agreement that the vote be deferred.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): What agreement? Why tomorrow? I think Senator Marshall's point is extremely well taken. We have had this matter before us now for three weeks. I remember taking part in the debate when Senator Marshall moved the adjournment of the debate. I said no, that we should give Senator Perrault a chance to speak, and he said that he would speak the following day. He did not. The following day, nothing happened. He did finally move the amendment. He happens not to be here to discuss his amendment or to wind up the discussion, but what more is there to add? We have had debate from Senator Perrault on the amendment. We have had Senator Marshall's reply. Does anybody here wish to speak? If not, let us get on with the vote.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If there is no leave, which means unanimous consent, I shall put the question. Am I correct in interpreting the will of the Senate that there is not unanimous consent? Then I shall have to continue and put the question.

Having read the main motion, I shall now put the motion in amendment. The motion in amendment by the Honourable Senator Perrault, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, is that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "that" in the first paragraph and substituting the following:

> The Senate respectfully asks the American embassy to provide space on its grounds —

An Hon. Senator: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Those in favour of the motion in amendment will please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Those opposed to the motion will please say "nay."

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Senator Stanbury: On division.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: We now resume debate on the main motion. Is the house ready for the question on the main motion?

Senator Prud'Homme: I want to make sure that there was no vote. You said that in your opinion the "nays" had it. I was about to ask for a roll call, but I will abstain.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is the Senate ready for the question on the main motion?

Senator Prud'homme: I move the adjournment of the debate because I would like to speak on the main motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Prud'homme, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, that the debate on this motion be adjourned. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: All those in favour of the motion to adjourn the debate please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: All those opposed to the motion to adjourn the debate please say "nay."

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, such a debate is very embarrassing.

We all know how devoted Senator Marshall is to this cause. I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to him for everything he has done, not only in the Senate, but in the House of Commons, and as a veteran. The comments I may make on his motion are not a reflection of the respect I have for our honourable colleague.

I moved the adjournment of the debate on the motion to be able to take part in it. I have no notes with me tonight — I do have a book, though — but I will try from memory to tell the honourable senators why we should not vote in favour of this motion.

I have always thought that only wars in which the Canadian government had officially been involved could lead to the kind of honour Senator Marshall would like to bestow on those Canadians who fought in Vietnam alongside the Americans.

[English]

Before I arrived in Parliament, I was already involved as a student president. In some places, because I was very opinionated, my time in university was terminated, and I had to go to other universities. I was extremely active. One of my major activities was to be involved in the question of the Vietnam war and what would be the best policy, for Canada as a country, towards the American deserters and draft dodgers. It is a very old story in the Liberal Party of the day, and a very long story.

With your permission, I have a quote I would read you. I was surprised by this, and I cannot say I was happily surprised, because when people kill others, they should not rejoice. They do their duty when their country calls upon them to do their duty. It has always been my strong conviction that a Canadian cannot go and fight under the flag of another country. I never make an exception to this unless the Canadian government and the Canadian people so decide.

On the debate that took place on the Vietnam war, there is a book called The New Exile — American War Deserters in Canada. That book was published in 1972. A guard on the Hill here who is very involved in military matters pointed out to me one day that his son had given him a book on the Vietnam war, and that my name was in it. I could read many pages, but I will read just a portion which says:

> In reality, even before the Washington Post article appeared, Trudeau had indicated privately to a young Liberal Party M.P. from Montreal, Marcel Prud'homme, that he wouldn't be against Parliament bringing pressure to bear against the immigration department's recent antideserter policies. Trudeau apparently preferred to have nothing to do with it himself, however, though he was once reported to have said he would step in if Parliament did not. Prud'homme had awaited just such a signal from his party leader (the Prime Minister), and thereupon brought together twenty-five Liberal M.P.s who met with Minister MacEachen and urged him to change his policy. He admitted to the anomaly in the law which allowed draft dodgers citizenship and not deserters, and promised a review and a clear statement of government policy.

They go on to say that I was involved with American deserters coming to Montreal. It was very strange because after I had finished and won, the NDP took the credit. I did not worry, because I had done the same in many other fights on other hot issues. When it goes well, there is always someone to take the credit. What is important is to do what you feel should be done.

Here we are in 1994, agonizing over the meaning of Canadian citizenship. There is a lot of meaning to it. As a Canadian, should I involve myself in a war declared by someone else without the consent of my government? If I open the door with regard to the indirect support, it is logical to say that not only will I honour tonight Canadians who fought under the American flag, and so accept that they should have a monument, but that they should be extended all the benefits that we reserve for our Canadian military. You cannot honour someone halfway.

It is not the piece of land that is important, it is the meaning. Of course we have land. We are not being mean to the Canadians who fought in the Vietnam war. However, Canada did not accept to participate in that war.

You all know where I stood on the war recently declared in the Middle East. I opposed Canada's participation. I said so to a delegation from Kuwait last week, among whom I have close friends. I told them why. If Canadians died in that war, we should definitely honour them, because Canadians participated, debated the issue and decided Canada would be part of a big team. However, on the question of the Vietnam war, we were not participants.

I could speak for hours on the debate that took place then in the national Liberal Caucus. I have all my notes from the past 30 years of every national caucus and Quebec caucus that I attended. I chaired many such caucus meetings as a servant of the party. Honourable senators know that I have often called myself a servant of the party because when they needed someone, I was there. When I felt they did not need me any more, I would withdraw. As chairman of the national caucus, I know these debates took place.

However, I do not want to go over that debate tonight. I have too much respect for these young Canadians who fought. It is a great country that allows that to happen. Many countries might have taken their citizenship away. If you are caught fighting anywhere — in Vietnam, the Balkans or the Middle East — and word gets around that you are Canadian, it reflects immediately on the reputation of Canada. No one can argue to the contrary.

In the name of brevity, I will not pursue the debate. I was glad to inform Senator Marshall of what happened recently while I was in Kiev, Ukraine. A great debate was taking place in France about kicking Canadians out of hotels. I contacted my many senator friends in the French Senate and told them about the situation before it became known. They sent me a letter, and they told me that if I wanted, I could make it public. I gave my friend Senator Marshall a copy for his files, knowing how involved he is in such matters.

French representatives thanked me for alerting them from Kiev. They immediately called the Minister of Foreign Affairs of France before the issue became too hot. That was during my friend Senator Bosa's trip to France as head of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. I am getting off topic.

I conclude by saying that if the majority of senators in their wisdom believe that I am wrong in calling upon them to reflect a little more, I should hope that at least you will join Senator Marshall and say that since we have honoured Canadians who fought with Americans in the Vietnam War, we should take our responsibility further and give them a small piece of land in Canada. We have to be logical. The next step is that these Canadian Vietnam war veterans should be recognized as veterans of Canada, with all the benefits reserved and preserved for Canadians participating in wars declared by Canada. That is my strongest point that I would like to share with you.

I repeat again that I hope that Senator Marshall, who one day will be acclaimed by all of us as the grand gentleman of veterans in Canada — because he has done so much — will not feel in any way, shape or form that, should the Senate vote against his motion, it diminishes his efforts in this regard. To me, he is an example of what senators should be. We should all be a supporter of some cause. He has chosen veterans affairs. No one can challenge Senator Marshall as the champion of veterans. Every single one of us should be the champion of a cause in Canada, so that Canadians will realize what the Senate is all about.

Honourable senators, I thank you for allowing me to participate in this debate, but if there is a roll call, I will sadly vote against the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

> That the Senate urges the Government of Canada to provide an appropriate site for the Canadian Vietnam Veterans' National Memorial; and
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons requesting that House to unite with the Senate in the aforementioned action.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

An Hon. Senator: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

HEALTH

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Di Nino, calling the attention of the Senate to the impact of the Government of Canada's changes to tobacco taxes.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, on February 8, 1994, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien announced the four-point Government Action Plan on Smuggling. Senator Di Nino targeted one part of this action plan in his statement to the Senate on April 19, 1994. He spent considerable time berating the government for the immediate action of reducing consumer taxes on tobacco. However, he neglected to mention the three additional points that are the essential long-term endeavours underlying this plan. An enforcement crackdown, special action on tobacco manufacturers and the most intensive anti-smoking campaign in Canadian history are ongoing at this very moment.

Senator Di Nino was right to point out, although he did so only peripherally, that Canada is the first country with a significant tobacco growing and manufacturing industry to make a comprehensive approach to the problems connected with tobacco use. Federal efforts to reduce tobacco use in Canada are recognized and envied around the world.

This approach was begun in the late 1960s under a Liberal government. The House of Commons committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, chaired by Gaston Isabelle, looked at tobacco and cigarette smoking and noted that it was clearly contrary to the public interest for the use of a harmful product to be actively promoted. The committee called for a unique solution to this unique health and social problem. By the early 1990s, the comprehensive approach, including legislation, taxation, incentives to tobacco growers to cease production and health education and information, was credited with the continuous overall decline in smoking prevalence among both men and women.

Federal legislation supported by all parties included: The Tobacco Products Control Act, providing authority for banning all tobacco advertising, for restricting promotional activities by tobacco manufacturers, and for more explicit health warnings on tobacco product packages; the Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act, raising the minimum purchasing age to 18 years, imposing fines for selling tobacco to minors, and restricting placement of vending machines; and the Non-smokers' Health Act, providing a smoke-free environment in all work places and certain aircraft under federal jurisdiction.

Production of tobacco was, and is, influenced by the Tobacco Diversification Plan, a program of the federal Department of Agriculture established in the late 1980s to assist farmers in ceasing tobacco production and to develop alternative crops for tobacco lands.

In the fiscal year of 1993-94, approximately $3 million was divided between the Health Promotion Directorate and the Health Protection Directorate of Health Canada. The Health Promotion Directorate budget for tobacco activities was approximately $1.3 million, allocated as $500,000 for research, $500,000 for programs, and $800,000 for public awareness.

The Health Protection Directorate had a budget for tobacco activities of approximately $1.7 million in 1993-94, with the largest portion allocated to surveys, corrective action and education, while the rest went to research and evaluation.

There is no doubt that the multi-pronged approach of the national strategy to reduce tobacco use contributed to the decline in smoking rates that was evident from 1965. By 1990, rates of smoking for persons 15 years of age and older had dropped from over 60 per cent to 31 per cent for men, and from 38 to 28 per cent for women.

What this comprehensive approach had not accounted for was the increase in smuggled cigarettes. Controls on the distribution, sale and consumption of cigarettes became useless when cheap, contraband cigarettes were readily available to Canadians. This was when the Action Plan on Smuggling in its four-part strategy, including enforcement, consumer tax reduction, export tax and health promotion surtax and anti-smoking campaign, became essential.

Cigarette smuggling was not a new issue, waiting only for action by this current government. The previous government attempted to address it by increasing the resources available for enforcement. In 1991, RCMP resources were increased for establishments at Cornwall, Ontario, and Valleyfield, Quebec, while in April 1992, an additional 52 positions and $8.2 million were allocated throughout Canada to illegal tobacco distribution locations. In June of 1993, another 70 officers were added to the RCMP anti-smuggling units. Similarly, Canada Customs stepped up its efforts.

What the previous government recognized near the end of its term was what this government faced on taking office. The contraband tobacco trade had become deep-rooted and far-reaching. Illegal tobacco accounted for almost 40 per cent of the $12.4-billion Canadian tobacco market. Organized crime controlled up to 95 per cent of the contraband tobacco entering the country. Smuggling, with its attendant increase in crime and violence, was spreading quickly from Quebec and some Atlantic provinces to Ontario and Western Canada.

Added to the criminal aspect was the recognition that smuggling was undermining the government's health objectives. As the supply of smuggled tobacco became more widely available, the average price of the contraband cigarettes became lower. Ready access by young people to cheap cigarettes was becoming a reality, and was contrary to all existing policies and legislation.

What could be done? This government recognized that increased enforcement was only one part of an effective crackdown on the organized criminal element behind the smuggling. Measures aimed at tobacco manufacturers and smokers were also vital. Canadian tobacco exports illegally reimported into the country represented about 80 per cent of the illegal market. To counter this, the government reimposed an excise tax on Canadian tobacco exports.

Because of concern that tobacco manufacturers not only contribute to the smuggling problem but might even profit from the federal tobacco tax reduction, a three-year health promotion surtax was imposed on manufacturing companies' profits. The revenues generated by this surtax are to be used to fund measures to reduce smoking. This campaign, funded by the health promotion surtax on tobacco manufacturing profits, provides a substantial boost to ongoing efforts to reduce smoking.

Senator Di Nino mentioned the initiatives taken by the previous government without talking about specifics. Perhaps the following comparison of figures will be useful. In 1985, the federal government launched a $1.5-million anti-smoking campaign aimed at youth. In 1994, the most intensive anti-smoking campaign in Canadian history, called the federal Tobacco Demand Reduction Strategy, allocated $185 million over three years. Ten years later, the problem is still a serious one but the commitment of resources is finally matching the need.

A preliminary outline suggests that while the largest proportion will be spent on broad-based initiatives in the community and using the mass media, significant amounts will be targeted toward youth, women, and groups viewed as "hard to reach." The issue of plain packaging was also raised by Prime Minister Chrétien in February, and a month later the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health was asked to conduct an inquiry into whether plain packaging would reduce tobacco consumption.

Many of the major national health organizations were instrumental in putting the tragic connection between tobacco use and health on the political agenda. Groups such as the Canadian Cancer Society, the Canadian Council on Smoking and Health, the Canadian Lung Association, the Canadian Medical Association, and Physicians for a Smoke-Free Canada are among those who presented evidence on the potential effectiveness of plain packaging of tobacco products to the House of Commons Health Committee. While the outcome of this inquiry will not be known until mid-June, the support of all parties for efforts to reduce tobacco consumption in Canada has again been demonstrated in this parliamentary forum.

A 1994 estimate by a Health Canada official put the direct costs to the health care system of tobacco use at about $3 billion a year. The indirect costs were estimated at about $15.9 billion annually. With 20 per cent of the deaths in Canada attributed to tobacco use, it is the leading cause of preventable death. Overall, tobacco use ranks as Canada's number one public health problem, one that requires the multi-pronged action plan outlined by this government in February. The efforts already taking place are evidence of the recognition of the magnitude of the problem and the commitment to reducing it.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I am submitting an appendix to my notes which summarizes the strategy of the initiatives that will be employed to reduce tobacco demand. The summary is extracted from the "Briefing Book for Health Canada," a presentation made to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health on April 8, 1994.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Would the honourable senator answer a couple of quick questions?

First, would he tell us what happened to this wonderful advertising campaign which was instituted by the Minister of Health several months ago? Is he familiar with that?

Senator Bosa: I am not familiar in detail, but if the honourable gentleman has read the media in the last two days, he will have seen how the $185 million have been disposed of; some in advertising and some in other areas.

Senator Di Nino: If they disposed of it the way they disposed of the last millions of dollars, which had to be pulled out because they were an insult and a joke to all those who saw them, I hope that —

Senator Bosa: Would you start from the beginning, please?

Senator Di Nino: I hope that this $185 million, or whatever portion of it, will be used in a better way than the previous money, since you had to cancel those particular ads.

Second, does the honourable senator have statistics on the use of cigarettes since the program instituted by his government went into effect?

Senator Bosa: I do not have those statistics at hand, but I would be very pleased to provide them to the honourable gentleman.

Senator Di Nino: It would be revealing if the honourable senator could provide them to the Senate. He may find that the use of tobacco has not gone down since that particular program was instituted.

Senator Bosa: That would not be surprising, honourable senators, because previously cigarettes were imported illegally and they escaped the statistics which Statistics Canada computes. If there is a perceived increase in cigarette smoking now, it is due to the fact that cigarettes smoked now go through the regular channels rather than being smuggled into Canada.

Senator Di Nino: I look forward to the honourable senator's report to us when he comes up with the actual statistics.

On motion of Senator Spivak, debate adjourned.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

NINETY-FIRST CONFERENCE, PARIS, FRANCE

Hon. Peter Bosa rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 10, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Ninety-First Inter-Parliamentary Conference, held at Paris, France, from March 19 to 26, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, on May 10 last it was my privilege to present the report of the Ninety-first Interparliamentary Congress held in Paris from March 19 to 26. Senator Andreychuk and I attended this conference along with five members of the other place; Ms Paddy Torsney, Messrs. Maurice Dumas, Joe McGuire, Patrick O'Brien, and Dr. Bernard Patry.

Before speaking about the deliberations of the conference, I would like to mention a few points about our host country. Bilateral relations between France and Canada may be described as productive and friendly. In recent years, our relations have been cultivated by a series of visits by respective heads of state and government. Our two countries cooperate closely in international organizations such as the United Nations, the G-7, the Conference on Cooperation and Security in Europe, the European Bank of Reconstruction and Development and la Francophonie, within the framework of international conferences.

Fishing is one area of concern between our two countries. An initial agreement was concluded in 1972 to manage relations with regard to fishing. On the outstanding question of delimiting the exclusive economic zone, a tribunal instituted under a 1989 agreement handed down a ruling in June 1992 under which Canada was given jurisdiction over most of the disputed zone.

Following this ruling, our two countries began discussions in an attempt to reach an agreement on fishing quotas for the French ships in the Canadian zone. However, no agreement was reached and, in October of 1992, we unilaterally set what we felt were equitable and reasonable fishing quotas for France. Last June, French Prime Minister Balladur wrote to then Prime Minister Mulroney, asking him to appoint a Canadian minister to undertake expanded discussions regarding fishing and economic cooperation between Saint-Pierre-et-Miquelon and the adjoining Canadian provinces with the French Minister of Overseas Department and territories, Mr. Dominique Perben. Prime Minister Chrétien replied this past January, appointing the Secretary of State for Parliamentary Affairs, the Honourable Fernand Robichaud. We hope for a satisfactory outcome to these negotiations.

The value of bilateral trade in 1992 between France and Canada was nearly $4.5 billion. Canada's main exports to France are, in order of importance, aeronautical construction products, paper pulp, non-ferrous metals, electronic equipment, papers and cardboard, and iron ore. In order of value, French exports to Canada are aeronautical and construction products, wines and beverages, passenger vehicles, chemicals, printing and publishing products, and industrial equipment. The cumulative value of French investment in Canada increased considerably through the 1980s to 1991, from $1.3 billion to $4 billion, placing France third among Canada's sources of investment.

I turn now to the conference itself. At the outset, I would like to pay tribute to the Canadian Ambassador, Mr. Benoit Bouchard, and his colleagues for their assistance and support during the conference. Shortly after our arrival in Paris, Mr. Bouchard and other staff members provided a comprehensive and informative briefing on France. In addition, Mr. Jean Bourassa attended our regular morning briefing sessions.

The first topic on the agenda of our conference was "Prevention of Conflicts, Maintenance and Consolidation of Peace: Role and Means of the United Nations and Regional Organizations." Our colleague Senator Andreychuk and Mr. O'Brien spoke on behalf of Canada in the plenary debate and represented Canada at the meetings of the committee that examined this subject and prepared a draft resolution.

The second topic on the agenda was "Waste Management for a Healthy Environment." Two of our colleagues, Dr. Patry and Ms Torsney, represented Canada in the plenary debate.

A drafting committee of nine countries, including Canada, was selected to prepare a draft resolution. Ms Torsney represented our delegation.

At each conference there is an opportunity to vote on a supplementary item to be included on the agenda, and it is here that the Canadian delegation did some of its most significant work. The Canadian IPU Group had proposed as an item the subject:

> The importance of adhering to the obligations specified in the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (known as the NPT)

Recent international events have highlighted the need for restraint and effective controls on weapons of mass destruction. This treaty seeks to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons to non-nuclear states, while facilitating access to nuclear technology for peaceful purposes. It also commits parties to pursue negotiations toward ending the nuclear arms race and achieving nuclear and general disarmament.

This treaty is the basis of the world's non-proliferation system. Global attention was focused on this treaty when the Democratic People's Republic of Korea withdrew from the NPT and was subsequently found in non-compliance with its safeguard obligations.

The NPT is the basic guarantee of the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons. The establishment of safeguards and export control regimes serves to reassure the world community of the peaceful nature of national nuclear programs. This treaty also provides for the transfer of nuclear materials and technologies for peaceful purposes to many states that would otherwise not receive such benefits. Moreover, progress has been achieved in the reduction of the nuclear arsenals of nuclear weapon states, but these benefits and the promise of further progress would be put to risk if the persistence of the NPT were not guaranteed.

At the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty Review Conference in 1995, a decision must be taken to extend the treaty. However, the preliminary negotiations on the extension of the treaty have been characterized by sterile bloc formation and increasing levels of mistrust. The Canadian group felt that the Inter-Parliamentary Union would be remiss if it failed to make a contribution to the important debate on its extension. Topics for the supplementary item should be timely, relevant and opportune. We were gratified that our fellow delegates supported this view and voted 1,010 to 76, with 189 abstentions, to have this item as the supplementary item.

Mr. McGuire and I attended the meetings of the committee and worked on the drafting committee, which included delegates from Brazil, Chile, Estonia, France, Germany, Iran, New Zealand, North Korea, Portugal and Sudan. It was not an easy task, and we spent two days working until the early evening to come up with a text. Regrettably, the Iranian and North Korean delegates did not support the draft resolution which called for the indefinite extension of the NPT, a position which was the bottom line for the Canadian group. Having heard the arguments of other delegates at the committee meeting, the two delegations agreed to adopt the resolution without a vote.

We believe that the debate and subsequent study of the extension of the NPT brought this subject to the attention of legislators from over 110 countries. Clearly, the government negotiators were experiencing difficulties in the preparations for the upcoming conference. We believe that our intervention at the parliamentary level will have a positive input in the negotiation process.

At the Paris conference, there was also a debate on "the general political, economic and social situation in the world." I used this opportunity to speak again about the importance of the indefinite extension of the NPT. Our first vice-president, Mr. Dumas, spoke about the plight of the poor throughout the world.

I would also like to mention the report of the IPU committee on the Human Rights of Parliamentarians. As you are aware, the Canadian group has been very active in the work of this committee. Our colleague Senator Neiman, who was instrumental in its establishment, was a member of that committee for a number of years.

During the Paris conference, the violation of the rights of 125 members or former members of parliament in 10 countries was brought to the attention of the delegates. The 125 cases were made up as follows: one from Bulgaria, five from Colombia, five from Haiti, one from Honduras, one from Indonesia, 81 from Myanmar, formerly Burma, one from Senegal, three from Togo, 23 from Turkey and one from Uzbekistan. Supporting actions by legislatures play an important role in securing positive developments. It is my intention to ask the executive committee of the Canadian IPU group to meet with the ambassadors of some of these countries to seek their assistance in resolving these cases. In fact, we have already made arrangements to meet with the ambassadors of Turkey and Bulgaria in the next couple of weeks.

The Inter-Parliamentary Union was founded in 1889 by two men: an Englishman, William Cremer, a Liberal Member of Parliament, and a Frenchman, Frédéric Passy, an apostle of peace and a member of the Chamber of Deputies. Throughout our conference we were reminded of the vision of these two men. In relations between states, Mr. Passy had believed in the possibility of putting an end to the religion of force, and of enabling the religion of law to prevail. That was what led him to create and organize the Inter-Parliamentary Union. At the inaugural ceremony, our President, Sir Michael Marshall, reminded us of the wise words of Frédéric Passy, when he said: "Future humanity will be formed from the bringing together and not the suppression of nations now divided."

Honourable colleagues, I can assure you that delegates at the Ninety-first Inter-Parliamentary Conference continued to work vigorously to fulfil the dream of Frédéric Passy.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, June 1, 1994, at 1:30 p.m.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS ON OKA—APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF FEDERAL NEGOTIATOR

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, I rise today to address an issue raised yesterday evening by my colleague the Leader of the Opposition. It goes to the heart of the whole issue of respect for Parliament and the political process.

I do not for a moment question the right of any government to appoint individuals who support the policies, agendas and direction of the government. What I find extremely troubling is the hypocrisy and double standards to which we are subjected. This is exactly the kind of attitude which feeds public cynicism about politics and politicians.

I draw to your attention the case raised last night regarding Bernard Roy, who was relieved of his responsibilities last November with regard to negotiations with the Kanesatake Mohawks at Oka, Quebec. On November 19, 1993, in a report of The Ottawa Citizen, the department stated:

> Mr. Roy was terminated because his contract officially expired on October 31 and the Department will now take over negotiations.

On May 25, 1994, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced the appointment of the Honourable Michel Robert as chief federal negotiator for Kanesatake — not a departmental employee, I might add.

The Honourable Michel Robert is a very prominent Liberal, having held the position of president of the Liberal Party of Canada from 1986 to 1990. He was an appointee of the Trudeau government on the Macdonald Royal Commission. As my colleague Senator Prud'homme pointed out last night, he was appointed by the Mulroney government as a member of the Security Intelligence Review Committee after consultations with the then Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Chrétien.

I repeat, I do not for a moment question the government's right to appoint. What I find appalling is the duplicity of it all. A Liberal appointee is worthy and competent; a Tory appointee is something else.

In her response yesterday, the Government Leader in the Senate described Mr. Robert as:

> ...well recognized in Quebec and in this country as a very fine lawyer and a man who has had considerable experience in dealing with these kinds of situations.

Just for the record, these same qualities also describe Mr. Bernard Roy.

TRANSPORT

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday, June 2, 1994, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit at five o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday, June 7, 1994, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Corbin: What's the rush?

Senator Oliver: Tomorrow is Thursday, and I am asking permission for something to take place on the following Tuesday. We will not be sitting on Friday or Monday, in all likelihood.

Senator Corbin: Why the rush, all of a sudden?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Oliver is giving notice of a motion for debate tomorrow. He is just putting it on the Order Paper. There is no rush.

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has asked me to apologize to the house for her absence this afternoon. She will be here later today, but my honourable friend opposite has agreed that we will not have Question Period on this short Wednesday afternoon.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

NATIONAL LIBRARY ACT

Hon. Pierre De Bané moved the second reading of Bill C-26, to amend the National Library Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity today to speak to the proposed amendments to the National Library Act. These amendments will enhance the effectiveness of legal deposit provisions for the collection and preservation of publications that are part of our Canadian heritage.

[English]

There are problems with the existing legislation which must be addressed. Bill C-26, to amend the National Library Act, addresses those problems.

I should like to begin by explaining very briefly what "legal deposit" is and how it works. Essentially it is the legal obligation requiring publishers to deposit copies of all their newly released publications with the National Library of Canada. The purpose of legal deposits is to facilitate the development of a comprehensive collection of our published heritage.

Under the legal deposit provisions of the National Library Act publishers in Canada are required to deposit, without charge, two copies of each of their new publications with the National Library. The National Library places, as a safety measure, one copy in a preservation collection to be safeguarded for future generations. The second copy goes into a service collection where it can be used by scholars, researchers, government and the public at large, either on site at the National Library or through the Inter-Libraries Lending Network that connects libraries across the country.

However, the act contains a provision whereby publishers need deposit only one copy if the retail value of the publication exceeds $50. This provision, which has not been changed since 1969, has created a problem.

In 1969, very few new publications sold for more than $50. This means that the National Library received two copies of practically all new publications. However, in recent years, the publishing market has changed considerably, and today, many publications cost more than $50. As a result, the number of cases in which the Library receives only one copy is increasing steadily.

[English]

The National Library still needs two copies of each publication to properly fulfil its dual mandate of preservation and service. Therefore, the library has been obliged to purchase second copies that are exempted under the legal deposit provisions. The cost of purchasing these copies is escalating rapidly. Over the last few years the annual cost has risen to more than $700,000, and it is expected to climb to $1 million within the next five years.

The National Library cannot keep up with the increased costs. In fact, since 1991-92 the library has had to limit its spending on second copies to about $450,000 annually, due to budgetary restraints.

Once the proposed amendments to the National Library Act and the revised regulations come into force, the National Library's expenditures on second copies will be reduced to $350,000. The National Library plans to use the savings of $100,000 for the purchase of second copies of titles missed during the last few years. Therefore, the library will be in a much better position to fulfil its dual mandate of preservation and service.

[Translation]

The amendments being proposed would eliminate completely from the act the exemption for second copies based on the retail value. Book deposit regulations which are made pursuant to the act would introduce new and more limited exemption criteria that would still permit the deposit of just one copy, but only in instances where the deposit of the second copy would be a significant financial burden for the publisher.

[English]

The book deposit regulations are being revised and will be ready for implementation when the revised bill is proclaimed. The regulations will specify instances where only one copy of a publication is required for deposit. For example, the regulations would permit publishers of limited edition publications, such as livres d'artistes, to deposit only one copy with the National Library.

The penalty provisions of the act must be changed because they are outdated, ineffective and serve no useful purpose. The maximum fine of $150 in the current act has not been an effective deterrent for noncomplying publishers because often the value of the publications is significantly greater than the maximum fine of $150. Bill C-26 proposes the removal of the specific fine of $150 for noncompliance, as is stipulated in the current act, and replacing it with a provision stating that noncompliance is an offence punishable on summary conviction, rather than continue to build into the act a precise sum that needs to be updated periodically.

[Translation]

The courts would be able to determine the appropriate penalty and to impose a more substantial fine, if warranted. The act would, however, explicitly exclude the possibility of imprisonment being imposed as a punishment or in the case of failure to pay a fine.

[English]

I should like to point out that noncompliance with legal deposit is already a criminal offence punishable on summary conviction. The specific reference to a maximum penalty is being deleted in order to permit the imposition of a fine up to a maximum imposed under the Criminal Code. Therefore, it will be up to the courts to determine the appropriate fine, which could range from $150 to $2,000 for individuals and from $150 to $25,000 for corporations.

In order to ensure the deposit of federal government publications with the National Library of Canada, an amendment to the act is being proposed that would specify an obligation on the part of federal departments and agencies to deposit with the National Library all federal government publications. Every Member of Parliament has daily experience with the number of publications that are generated by government departments and agencies.

By the way, I must point out that this bill on legal deposit was the subject of consultations with publishers, of course, and, among others, with the Quebec government, which, if I am not mistaken, is the only provincial government with its own legal deposit provisions, so that Quebec publishers must send four copies to Quebec's national library and two more to the National Library of Canada.

[English]

Although the deposit of federal government publications is currently provided for through administrative policy, there is no clear legislative authority for the policy. English- and French-language publishers' associations were consulted regarding the proposed changes to the National Library Act. Consultations with English- and French-language publishers representing key sectors of the publishing industry, such as major trade publishers, textbook publishers, magazine publishers, small presses, specialist publishers, microform publishers and publishers of livres d'artistes, indicate that the proposed amendments, together with the regulations, would not impose any significant financial burden on publishers.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I see that my colleague, Senator Beaulieu, is listening to me with, in my opinion, unjustified scepticism.

During the consultation process, we paid particular attention to Quebec publishers since this province administers its own legal deposit. Quebec publishers are therefore required to send copies of their books to Quebec's national library and the National Library of Canada. The Quebec publishers who were consulted understand and support the proposed amendments.

I would even say to those of my colleagues who are authors that it is surely an honour to see their books deposited at Quebec's national library and the National Library of Canada.

Quebec's Department of Culture and national library were also consulted and expressed their agreement with the proposed amendments.

The discussions held with publishing industry representatives suggest that the proposed amendments will not translate into major expenditures for publishers.

[English]

The proposed amendments will make the legal deposit provisions in the act much more effective as an instrument to support the mandate of the National Library, a cultural institution that represents our collective memory. They will enable the library to carry out its primary responsibilities of collecting, preserving and providing access to Canada's published heritage more effectively and economically. Bill C-26 will ensure the comprehensive collections of our published heritage to support the research and information needs of Canadians today as well as in the future — a collection that is an invaluable source of information on Canada's culture and our national identity.

I support Bill C-26 and I ask my fellow senators to support it as well. It will ensure that the National Library of Canada, which has the mandate to preserve for future generations and historians the collective memory of this country, will have a complete collection of all published documents.

As my colleagues know, there is also another institution called the National Archives. The National Archives is more interested in papers, correspondence and letters. I am sure that, looking to the statesmen and stateswomen in this chamber, many of them would one day like to transmit to the archives their papers so that, when historians in future generations are looking at their documents, they will be able to pass an impartial judgment both on their wisdom and on the era in which each of the senators has played a very important role.

Honourable senators, I gather from the positive reaction of various senators that they will submit their documents to the National Archives. I hope that they will. I am thinking of Senator Rivest, for example, who has written countless memos. I hope that he will turn over all these papers he wrote in the past. It will certainly be interesting reading for future generations.

For all these reasons, I ask you, honourable senators, to support Bill C-26, which will enable us to ensure the preservation of all documents published in Canada.

[English]

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, running a national library is difficult and expensive, and, I might say, an immensely rewarding undertaking, which, fortunately for all of us, attracts the most dedicated of public servants. The information highway is an old familiar road to librarians. A single paragraph from "Orientations: A Planning Framework for the 1990s" will serve here as a reminder of how the men and women of the National Library see the task we have given them.

> The Canadiana collections of the National Library and other repositories across the country represent an enormously rich resource for the study of Canada and its heritage. To exploit the value of that resource to its full potential we must actively promote its use and develop a portfolio of services that will support the research needs of writers, scholars, creative artists and the public at large. On one level, the promotional effort entails sponsorship of exhibits and cultural events that highlight the variety and wealth of our published heritage and celebrate the creative talents of our writers and musicians.

That is not to say that running such a library at a time such as this is an easy task or without its measure of disappointments. As Marianne Scott, our National Librarian, says:

> The key as we adapt to change in the current restrictive economic climate is to understand ourselves and to communicate the role and value of the librarian in our evolving information society.

Under Bill C-26, the National Library Act will be amended to help reduce the institution's cost of acquisitions. Under the law as it stands, publishers in Canada are required to deposit with the National Library, without charge, two copies of each new publication, except when the retail value exceeds $50. In such cases one copy will suffice. That exemption is to be ended. Regardless of value, two books are to be submitted. The savings to be realized will probably exceed $500,000 per year.

Nevertheless, the burden to publishers will be very low in a day when review and promotional copies are scattered with what might pass for abandon. The National Library's imposition of two copies seems slight indeed when it is realized that one copy will be kept as part of the national treasure for future generations and one will be available to scholars, researchers and the public at large.

A final word: The law as it stands provides a fine of $150 for noncompliance with the deposit provisions of the act. In the future, the maximum fines will be $2,000 for individuals and $25,000 for corporations.

I should mention here that work on these changes to the National Library Act began during the tenure of the previous government. Only one aspect of the bill, as it is presented today, should give pause to real library buffs on either side of this chamber, and that is the removal of incarceration as a punishment for not complying with the act or paying a fine. Believe me, people go to jail every day for lesser offences.

Hon. John B. Stewart: If I am not looking at the wrong document, this bill, if it receives Royal Assent, would come into effect only after proclamation. We had another example recently where such a clause was included in a bill. I raise the question now so that we can get an answer at the committee stage.

I wonder if the government would undertake to explain why in this case the bill will not come into effect upon Royal Assent. I am sure that there is some important reason. However, given the urgency of the bill as suggested by its sponsor and by Senator Doyle, we want to ensure that not a moment elapses before the bill goes into effect.

Senator De Bané: Honourable senators, we will certainly answer Senator Stewart's question. However, I can tell him right now that regulations will be needed to specify circumstances under which publishers will not be required to deposit two copies. Of course, the drafting of such regulations will have to be preceded by extensive consultations with publishers.

I will try to find that explanation for you, honourable senator, to give you an overall view of the situation.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator De Bané, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H.A. Olson moved the second reading of Bill C-17, to amend certain statutes to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 22, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, I want to say a few words about Bill C-17, and I advise senators that I have shortened my remarks considerably because it is a Wednesday, when we are limited to an hour and a half. I see some senators are applauding, and that is good. I just wanted you to know that I have a whole lot more that I could say.

I welcome this opportunity to encourage the chamber to join me in supporting this important piece of legislation. When passed, this bill will implement key aspects of the February budget: a plan for action in three core areas on behalf of all Canadians in every region.

It is a plan to spur job creation and economic growth. That is one reason, for example, that Bill C-17 revamps unemployment insurance entitlements. These savings will allow us to reduce the payroll taxes identified by business, especially small business, as a major barrier to new employment.

It is a plan to get the deficit down and to set the foundations for a balanced budget, because we have to stop mortgaging our children's future and pushing taxes eternally higher. This bill is a critical step in meeting this goal by restraining parliamentary and public service salaries and reducing business subsidies for transportation and energy.

Let me emphasize that the fiscal action we are taking will not jeopardize the work that must be done to make the economy stronger and to create opportunity. Losing jobs is no way to pay off debts, either for individuals or for a nation.

It is also a budget plan to reform social security so it can boost economic opportunity while ensuring that we can sustain the cost of Canada's social safety net. Here again, Bill C-17 plays a vital role. It does so not only through the action on unemployment insurance, but by providing the provinces with two years of certainty on federal transfers under the Canada Assistance Program. This will help create the stable window of opportunity and cooperative environment that will allow the two levels of government to work together on this critical task.

Each of these action areas is an essential foundation for our country's future. To ignore one puts them all at risk.

Before focusing on the specific measures in Bill C-17, I want to step beyond the narrow details to put it in a little larger context, particularly the context of deficit reduction. The fundamental fact is that with the February budget we have taken unparalleled action to meet the fiscal challenge. Measures in the budget will result in gross savings of $3.7 billion in this fiscal year; that will rise to $13.6 billion in 1996-97. Over the three-year period, gross savings totalled $28.6 billion.

• (1410)

As this legislation demonstrates, action to spur job creation, economic growth and labour adjustment is a fundamental part of that deficit reduction strategy. Even with such investments as the reduction in the UI premiums, net savings in the budget total $20.4 billion over three years. They deliver $5 worth of spending cuts for every $1 in revenue increase action. These spending cuts are the most significant, I am told, of any budget in the past 10 or 12 years.

However, such measures are not a conclusion. They are a foundation. The deficit ratio of 3 per cent of GDP by 1996-97 is exactly what we have always said it was: an interim target. The results of the major program review launched in February, which should identify further opportunities for savings, will be included in the 1995 budget.

I should like to say a word about unemployment insurance. We are living in challenging times with many upheavals to our economic and social programs. That is why the government is committed to ensuring that our social security system is brought up to date so that it can meet the needs of Canadians now and in the future. The unemployment insurance system is a fundamental part of that system. In introducing changes to UI, we carefully weighed the needs of business, the unemployed, working Canadians and of the government's fiscal situation. The result, I think, is contained in this bill.

In making these changes we have two goals in mind: First to provide a concrete incentive to the private sector to create jobs, and second, to begin to deal in a fair way with the serious problem of dependency that the UI system has created for many Canadians.

Payroll taxes are recognized as a significant barrier to job creation. To ease this burden we will roll back the UI premium rate for 1995-96 to $3. As a result, by the end of 1996 the government expects that there will be 40,000 more jobs in the economy than would be the case if premiums were allowed to rise to $3.30. That is the level otherwise required in 1995 under existing legislation if we take no action.

The rollback must be done in a way that supports deficit reduction. That is why this legislation proposes measures to reduce UI expenditures by $725 million in 1994-95 and by $2.4 billion annually thereafter. An integral part of the changes to the UI system is also to establish a stronger link between work history and UI benefits.

A third change we propose to the UI system is to provide greater benefits to Canadians with modest incomes who support children, an aged parent or other dependents. Under the current rules people who claim unemployment receive a benefit rate of 57 per cent, no matter what their circumstances.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Which you voted against at the time. I remember that.

Senator Olson: I do not remember that, but I will take your word for it.

Under the proposed changes there will be a two-part benefit rate — 60 per cent allowed for low-income people with dependents and 55 per cent for all others.

Senator Doody: Are you afraid to use the term "means test"?

Senator Olson: There are several ways one can construct a speech and certain phrases one can use. I understand Senator Doody is effective in using certain types of phrases, and he is welcome to them.

Senator Doody: I know you have a different script.

Senator Olson: I have a different set of phrases. By the way, I am not totally responsible for the authoring of this speech, though I checked it very carefully with the experts.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Particularly since a lot of it sounds like Conservative rhetoric.

Senator Olson: If that is so, I presume the bill will be passed by the Conservative caucus, and that the committee meetings will go rather quickly. I am glad to hear that Senator Lynch-Staunton is of that opinion, but I should still like to explain the rest of it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am looking forward to the minister explaining our policy.

Senator Olson: With fewer UI dollars to go around, we believe that it is only equitable to ensure that those dollars go out to those whose need is greatest. We estimate that the two-tier structure will improve benefits for 15 per cent of the claimants, or about 250,000 Canadians and their families.

The issue of unemployment insurance leads directly to another important element of this legislation. The budget announced the launch of an extensive process of social security reform. Given the Canadian context, this will involve the federal government, the 10 provinces and the two territories. Our common goal must be to renew and revitalize Canada's social security system over the next two years. To help create a positive, cooperative climate for this challenging task, the federal government is providing a two-year period of predictability and modest growth in social security transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan and under Established Programs Financing, commonly referred to as EPF. This means that in 1994-95 there will be no new restraint measures applied to either CAP or EPF transfers.

The legislation before us today, however, will place a ceiling on subsequent CAP transfers to each province and, as a result, they will not exceed 1994-95 levels. This ceiling will remain in place in 1995-96 pending social security reform, which we hope will take place in 1996-97.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Like the GST reform; hide it.

Senator Olson: They used to call these kinds of comments red herrings; they drag them across your path to get you off the track.

Senator Doody: There is no herring left.

Senator Phillips: And you are not on track.

Senator Olson: Established Programs Financing is not affected by this legislation. However, existing restraint will be maintained. EPF will grow in line with population in 1994-95, and then at GNP minus three percentage points for subsequent years.

Turning now to wage freezes, I have focused on two areas —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Which you voted against, by the way.

Senator Olson: I have focused on two areas where Bill C-17 involves fiscal restraint in the broad national arena. However, this legislation appropriately includes an important measure of fiscal discipline within the government itself.

Honourable senators will be sorry if they do not listen, because it is extremely important to understand the entire package.

Senator Doody: I will wait for the movie.

Senator Olson: Bill C-17 sets out to extend the public service wage freeze currently in effect for a further two years. It also suspends pay increment increases for a two-year period —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Which we never did.

Senator Olson: — and enables payments to be made to full-time employees of the Department of National Defence under a civilian reduction program. The total compensation cost to the government, including the military and the RCMP, amounts to some $19 billion. Any measure to control the deficit must therefore take these costs into account.

Freezing salaries will contribute $1.5 billion in savings over three years. Also, let us not forget that the measures outlined in Bill C-17 affect ourselves as members of Parliament, the Governor General and federally appointed judges, just to name a number of the others.

I should also emphasize that this freeze is not indefinite. Let me add that the government has made a commitment to shorten the freeze if sufficient savings can be found. In essence, if efficiency savings can be found beyond those needed to meet reduced departmental budget targets, the extra amount will be used to shorten the freeze. An efficiency review is now under way.

Another action area included in this legislation is subsidies under the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and the Western Grain Transportation Act.

I think some brief background is appropriate here.

Under the first two acts, government payments defray part of the cost of certain freight shipments in the four Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé region of Quebec. Payments to the railways under the third act help reduce the transportation costs paid by western grain producers.

Our February budget proposed to reduce these subsidies by five per cent. This legislation takes that action. As well, it implements the ten per cent reduction announced by the previous government for 1995-96 and subsequent years — a reduction not yet implemented in legislation.

Honourable senators, this saving is in keeping with the overall reduction being made in most federal grants and contributions. It is important to remember that during the pre-budget consultations a constantly repeated suggestion was to reduce subsidies to business. This measure honours that advice. The five per cent cut to these subsidies announced in the February budget will save in the order of $40 million annually.

Turning to another subject, honourable senators, this bill also confirms a reduction in the transfers under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. These transfers return to the provincial governments most of the federal business income tax paid by privately owned utilities.

In 1990, the federal budget established a ceiling on PUITTA transfers. Then, in 1992, a 10 per cent reduction was imposed for 1993-94 and for 1994-95. This legislation confirms last year's budget announcement, which extended both of these measures beyond 1994-95.

Finally, honourable senators, this bill implements a measure to provide some additional flexibility to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We propose to give the CBC authority to borrow up to $25 million, subject — and this is important — to case-by-case approval by the Minister of Finance.

As well, the granting of this borrowing authority will be reviewed in two-years' time. The borrowing authority will allow the corporation to operate more efficiently. It will give the CBC the flexibility to take advantage of investment opportunities that promise a healthy return. It also supports the government's pledge to provide this important national institution with a more stable funding environment.

One of the main reasons for this measure is that, from time to time, speedy action is required to take advantage of certain opportunities, and that is why this measure is limited to $25 million.

Senator Phillips: The McKenna brothers are coming back; is that what you are saying?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as you can see, this legislation is a key part of this government's agenda for getting Canadians back to work. This is legislation to ensure that our budget goals will be translated into real performance. It draws directly on the advice we received from across the country. It focuses on the total economic and social picture before us and addresses the challenges we face.

In summary, this legislation represents action: action for job creation and economic renewal; action for deficit reduction and debt control; and action to revitalize and sustain a social safety net of which Canadians can be proud. By taking this action, this bill — as is the case with our budget — builds a solid foundation for success, one based on frugality, on fairness, and on a clear focus on the future.

With this in mind, honourable senators, I urge all members of this chamber to support this bill and to help us pass it before June 15 or 16, when some of the clauses in the bill come into effect. We trust that you will see the wisdom of this legislation and will support it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Maz could not have said it better.

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, Bill C-17 will put into law several restraint measures from February's budget. I will speak of those measures that concern Atlantic Canada.

Let me point out first, however, a simple fact about Atlantic Canada. We have incomes that are well below the national average and unemployment levels that exceed the national average. This means we are faced not only with a smaller tax base, but with a greater need for a social safety net. The result is higher tax rates than those faced by other Canadians.

Our provincial governments simply do not have the room to raise taxes. Ours is a fragile economy, one that cannot afford sudden changes in federal policy. Yet no region of Canada was more devastated by the recent budget than Atlantic Canada.

The budget closes defence facilities at Cornwallis, Mill Cove, Shelburne, Chatham and Moncton. It scales back the facilities at Gander and Shearwater. The result will be the loss of more than 3,000 jobs.

This bill will let the government offer employees incentives to leave DND, but will do little to help others in those communities. Consider, for example, the base at Chatham, New Brunswick. Closing that base will cost the community 10 per cent of its income and 21 per cent of the local tax base. Those on the government side may recall an election promise to consult before closing bases and to help with base conversions. Today the cry on the other side is "No more Summersides."

The budget reduced tax credits that encouraged investment in Atlantic Canada, a measure that will soon be part of a bill to amend the Income Tax Act. Freight subsidies and ACOA funding are to be reduced by a further five per cent because of the budget. Bill C-17 will deal with freight subsidy cuts from previous budgets.

Honourable senators, the distance between Atlantic Canada and the major markets of central Canada is far. Freight subsidies are a matter of survival. They make it possible for many manufacturers, and those they employ, to operate in the region. The subsidy reduces by about 25 per cent the cost of shipping goods as far west as Quebec City.

Transportation assistance, in various forms, dates back to Confederation. When we joined with Upper and Lower Canada to form this great nation, we were promised that our businesses would have access to the market of the entire country and not just to the region. In fact, it was Ontario's desire for access to maritime markets that led to Confederation in the first place. That led the central government to build railways and highways to connect the country; and, in 1927, with the passage of the Maritime Freight Rate Assistance Act, it led to the current subsidy.

A few months ago the federal transport minister, Mr. Young, suggested that the subsidies be scrapped and the money redirected to building the Atlantic portion of the Trans-Canada Highway. Honourable senators, that could mean disaster. Consider, for example, the case of a small New Brunswick manufacturer called Petrofab. Removing that subsidy would add $50,000 to their operating costs. They could not compete. It is quite likely that 15 good, full-time jobs would be lost and the company would fold. Another example is the Lantic Sugar Refinery, which provides work for 300 people in Saint John. Eighty per cent of their sales are in central Canada. Their major competitor, Redpath, has its refinery in Toronto and does not face Lantic's transportation costs.

Lantic's manager, John Wheatley, put it this way in an interview with the Telegrap-Journal on May 14:

> If we saw changes to the freight rate assistance program, it would jeopardize the long-term future of this refinery. We would certainly find it more difficult to compete in our major market.

Honourable senators, I would just make a small observation. These subsidies involve transport on land in both Atlantic Canada and the West. The most recent cuts were announced by a Finance Minister who is also in the transportation business, but on water and primarily in Central Canada. I am not alleging that the minister acted out of a conflict of interest, but I am a little suspicious.

In case the budget measures lead to higher welfare costs, Ottawa has served notice that it will no longer pay half the cost of the Canada Assistance Plan after this year. This bill makes that freeze in transfer payments law. We are told that even larger cuts will be made in the future.

Honourable senators may recall an election promise to provide long-term, stable funding arrangements for transfer payments; however, the government will not tell the provinces what the level of transfers will be for health care, education and social assistance beyond 1996. How can the provinces plan? They can only sit back and guess the results of Ottawa's unilateral overhaul of the social security system.

Without federal transfers, the tax burden in Atlantic Canada would be worse than it is already. For example, about 40 per cent of the New Brunswick government's revenues come from Ottawa. I would like to see the day when we do not need that 40 per cent, but that day is not today, and it will not be next year.

I should like to make another observation. Under the Canada Assistance Plan, Ottawa will contribute $300 million this year toward child care. Freezing CAP means freezing those child care contributions. However, the government says it will bring in a child care program if the economy grows by three per cent. Is it not a bit of a shell game to take money away from one program that helps to fund child care and repackage it as another?

With reduced federal transfers, an increased social services load and the highest taxes in the land, it will be hard for the Atlantic provinces to find money for any new cost-shared program. The good news is that there will be a child care program; the bad news is that the federal government is making it hard for the provinces to pay for it.

Finally, the government has chosen to reduce unemployment insurance in a way that asks Atlantic Canada to contribute more than its fair share. Workers in areas of very high employment must work a minimum of 12 weeks, instead of 10, to collect benefits after Bill C-17 becomes law. This will affect anyone who lives in an area where the unemployment rate is above 15 per cent, a condition which describes much of Newfoundland, Cape Breton and northern New Brunswick.

As well, the regional component of the benefits structure will be seriously watered down. For example, the unemployment rate in Saint John, New Brunswick is 12.9 per cent. Under the current rules, someone losing their job after 26 weeks of work qualifies for 46 weeks of benefits. After Bill C-17 becomes law, that same person will only qualify for 31 weeks of benefits. The impact of these two measures will be harder on Atlantic Canada than on any other region in the country.

About 8 per cent of Canadians live in Atlantic Canada. However, of the $2.4 billion to be saved by the UI cuts, $630 million of that amount, or more than one-quarter, will come from Atlantic Canada. When this bill is before committee, I hope that someone from the government can tell us why it chose to structure these measures in such a disproportionate way. Why were these cuts not more regionally balanced?

More important than the dollar impact is the human impact. Yes, there is a need to reform unemployment insurance. Yes, there is a need to reform the whole safety net. However, in the absence of jobs, in the absence of a comprehensive reform of social programs, the only alternative for many is welfare.

What is the difference between UI and welfare? You must work in order to get UI. For many able-bodied people, being put on welfare so that they can feed, clothe and house their families is the same as taking away their dignity.

The Honourable Ann Breault, Minister of Income Assistance in the New Brunswick government, said this of the changes:

> We are willing to make the needed changes to our own income support policies, and sensed that we had a plan and an agreement at the federal level to proceed with an overall fundamental reform of income security programs.
> We did not expect, however, a reduction of over 20 per cent of UI funding...prior to completion of the process...
> The impact of this cut...will obviously result in many of our unemployed workers turning to social assistance for the income needed to support their families.

The New Brunswick Legislative Assembly has passed a motion opposing these unilateral changes.

Perhaps someone from the government side can also explain why the government is proceeding with its review of social programs in such a piecemeal fashion. The government justifies these measures by saying that it will allow for a reduction in UI premiums. Workers now pay premiums of $3.07 for every $100 of insurable earnings. Employers pay 1.4 times that amount. The government says that the changes in Bill C-17 will prevent an increase in the premium rate to $3.30. The premium rate for 1995 is rolled back to the 1993 level of $3 per $100 of earnings. The government tells us that rolling back UI premium rates will create jobs. If rolling back premiums will create jobs, could the government tell us how many jobs were lost because of its decision to increase premiums for 1994?

My husband and I operate a retail establishment back home. We see unemployment insurance from three distinct angles. The first is the premiums we pay. They take away, of course, from our bottom line, so I welcome the lower premiums. However, if provincial taxes go up to pay for more welfare, then you will not have done us any favours. The second is that we know firsthand that there are indeed a few people who would rather collect UI than work, and some who lack the basic skills to run a cash register. We sometimes find this when we need to hire. This points to a need to reform the system. The third perspective is that of sales. If our customers do not have money, they cannot buy from our racks, and if they are uncertain as to how they will pay their rent next week, next month, or even next year, our fitting rooms will be empty.

The government wants to try more efficient and less costly ways of administering UI, and I applaud the initiative. Bill C-17 will allow pilot projects that try new approaches to administering UI. These would change the way employers and employees report to unemployment insurance and the way benefits are delivered. For example, Ottawa might try having claimants phone in their work reports, and deposit their cheques directly in the bank. Measures to reduce operating costs are, of course, welcome.

However, the savings must not lead to other problems. Will any of these changes affect the way the government now detects fraud? For example, are uncashed cheques not a tip-off that someone may be working or vacationing outside the country? Could you tell if someone phoned in their work report from Florida?

This section will override every other section of the act. However, there are no limits on pilot project spending and no limits on how many employees or employers could be involved in a pilot project. Anything can be done as long as it improves service to the public, regardless of what the act now says; yet "service to the public" is not defined.

Could the government set up slush funds in select ridings, using the provisions of this bill that allow projects which will improve service to the public? Why are there no limits on total pilot project spending? Why are there no limits on the number of employers and employees who will be part of pilot projects?

Honourable senators, I have several questions about this bill which I trust the government will answer in committee. However, I have one question which I do not expect to have answered: Where are the voices of the 31 Atlantic Liberal members of the other place? Why have MPs who were so willing to fight for their region in the past suddenly fallen silent?

[Translation]

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, it is well and good for the Minister of Finance to say that he is cutting back and restricting public spending, but meanwhile, government spending keeps increasing, and this year is no exception. The government is expected to spend about $164 billion in 1994-95.

The minister warned us that these spending cuts would hurt, but government spending is increasing!

[English]

Obviously, all sorts of distinctions are drawn between statutory expenditures and discretionary expenditures, between program spending and spending relative to servicing the debt. That is fine, except that spending still rises. No matter what the reason is, governments in Canada live above their means.

The problem is structural; that is to say that even in good economic times we overspend public funds, as we did from 1984 to 1989. Financial sectors, where they know how to count, have taken note. We are now paying the price for our lack of budgetary discipline.

Obviously there are all kinds of good reasons to justify the present rate of public expenditures. We cannot touch transfers to individuals, because pensions are sacred. We cannot strangle the provinces, because health and education are sacred. We cannot trample on the native people. Farmers are living through dark days, so we must help them. Companies are having a hard time surviving, so we must help them. Every social group has its reason to be exempt. However, when all is said and done, we are in the red and have been for some time. The moment of truth is not coming soon; it is here.

Everyone knows that with the statutory programs absorbing 70 per cent of our budget we cannot hope to solve the budgetary impasse without touching entitlements, or what the Americans call entitlements.

[Translation]

The minister claims he has taken a very close look at government spending. I have a few points the minister may wish to consider.

He may wish to consider:

Why ministers travel to speaking engagements all over North America on chartered jets, the excuse being that commercial airlines are unsatisfactory. In 1994!

Why some deputy ministers have their offices redecorated and drive around in the latest model luxury car.

Why the government is represented by several ministers at a single-theme conference, as was the case in Detroit. Five or six ministers to represent us! In C.D. Howe's time, people knew who spoke for the government on Canada's economic development.

Why Canadian taxpayers spent $97,000 to get the President of the Liberal Party appointed as head of the OECD, a statistics agency with headquarters in Paris. I fail to see why a politician should be appointed to head this agency.

Why retired federal officials, both civilian and military, are allowed to do similar work, under contract.

Why CIDA subsidizes African bursary students at our universities without bothering to find out whether they go back to their own countries to work.

Why CIDA maintains various development programs for poor countries in Southeast Asia, for instance, where the level of economic growth is among the highest in the world.

Why the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean is being closed, while here in Ottawa, we still have two centres for public service management development — Touraine and the Canadian Centre for Management Development — where senior executives retired from the Public Service work on contract.

Why we receive in our Senate offices all kinds of documents printed on fine glossy paper, in both languages, from numerous government organizations. These documents come from everywhere; it looks like a competition with the Royal Bank.

Why we do not manage to agree with provinces willing to put an end to the shameful duplicating in the field of manpower training and placement. Yet, an agreement in principle had been signed between, for example, Quebec and Ottawa on this issue! We do not know what happened to it.

Why we prevent private suppliers from competing for a wide variety of technical services which the public service monopolizes, with no way of knowing its relative efficiency, since there is no competition.

Why we introduce telecommunication tools at an incredible rate throughout government organizations, regardless of actual needs. The situation has reached the point where only a handful of senators do not have cellular phones. Just about every civil servant has one!

Why our administrative procedures include so many legal provisions that there are now as many lawyers as refugees in Canada.

Why we make income tax returns more complicated every time there is a tax reform, to the point where an army of accountants have to defend taxpayers, instead of providing technical assistance to businesses which are experiencing problems.

Why while the government was deregulating industries such as energy, transport and communications, the budgets of some regulating agencies were increasing.

Why we keep a considerable number of soldiers in Yugoslavia, as if 350 million Europeans were not enough to maintain peace on that continent. Can you imagine a French or Italian army corps going to Latin America to maintain peace there.

Why there are also three federal agencies to help the film industry: CBC, NFB and Telefilm Canada. I have a great deal of respect for the artistic world, but does the minister not agree that there are too many bureaucratic structures? I did not mention the expenses incurred by the Department of Canadian Heritage regarding issues related to the film industry.

Why we have not yet thought about introducing a certification system for parallel provincial agencies to help the National Archives or the National Library.

Why we did not think of merging the federal agency responsible for safety in fields of federal jurisdiction, such as transport, with provincial occupational safety and health organizations.

Why we did not rethink the organization of our 111 missions abroad. At the rate new UN members are accepted, it might not be a bad idea to review the organization of our services abroad, for example in Scandinavia, in Brussels, where we have three ambassadors, and in Africa.

Why we did not implement the Lortie report on lab research conducted in the departments, nor the SECOR report on CIDA's funds.

Why we did not abolish programs, which are too numerous, and instead resort to the easy solution of saying that there are too many employees. Do we realize that these people are there to implement those programs, whether they are useful or not?

[English]

The Auditor General's criticism on the absence of independent program evaluation in the departments has become a dead letter.

By the way, where is the cost-benefit analysis that demonstrated that helicopter contracts and the management contract for Pearson airport should be rescinded?

I had already warned our government of 1988 to 1993 that there were certain worrisome tendencies that merited an in-depth examination or we would find ourselves in serious difficulty. That still applies, and I will repeat a few here, as a reminder to the present government.

In the area of foreign affairs, for example, and this also applies to the armed forces, the system of job classification is one that is qualified as "a career plan" for the civil servants. In contrast, the rest of the public service uses a classification system that groups certain specific jobs into classes and categories. I have nothing against the use of a system that is said to be a career plan, but organization by level calls for central control of the numbers that have been quantified by level in order to ensure that the situation does not develop in which there are more chiefs than subordinates. That is precisely what has happened in External Affairs and in the armed forces with respect to the officer levels.

The freezing of salaries is being replaced with an addition of numbers in the superior classes, to such an extent that the amount paid in salaries does not diminish in relation to the other entries of public expenses.

At Indian Affairs we have built over the years a paternalistic system that perpetuates dependence, and native peoples are right to demand profound changes.

In the field of agriculture, the signing of the GATT accord should defuse the trade wars between North America and Europe and bring about changes here in our system of subsidies.

I understand that the government must facilitate the transition, but it must also keep the focus on those who will be most affected.

Moreover, I would warn the new Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification against the temptation to use, once again, funds from Ottawa to divert federalism from its original and healthy conception, which shared powers between the federal government and the provinces based on certain functional and cultural criteria.

I want to underline that human resources is a sphere which is linked to education, to health, to immigration and to professional orientation, mostly provincial matters, and that Quebec, for one, claims, and rightly so, to be better able to serve its citizens locally in the fields linked to its very soul.

The Minister of Finance, in social matters, has sensed that the iron is hot and has put off all major decisions until later.

The Minister of Human Resources Development is preparing for great reforms in transfer payments. All of this would strike me as being more reassuring if the financing of the federation itself was studied in conjunction with the roles of each government so as not to catch the provinces in a stranglehold that they would not accept.

Finally, I should like to underline for the government that certain social programs financed in part by Ottawa, such as education, health, and culture, channel expenses disproportionately to families whose revenue is in the top 30 per cent; it is to 60 per cent in the case of cultural expenditures, to 45 per cent in the case of education, and to 38 per cent in the case of health. It has reached the stage where the redistribution that was envisioned at the start is subjected to a perverse effect, as the sociologists say.

There is a second worrisome tendency: federal expenditures diminish for public infrastructure but grow for entitlements. As David Perry mentioned recently, we wanted the American level of taxation and the European level of public services, but it seems, in his view, that we will have the American level of service and the European level of taxation.

[Translation]

To conclude, honourable senators, I ask the Minister of Finance to go back to the drawing board and to prepare, for the fall, a budget review taking into account the statistics published by his department, the data that came out of the symposium on the debt and the deficit held in April 1993 by the Auditor General, as well as the article which appeared in the February 14, 1994 issue of The Globe and Mail, showing that real per capita expenditures have not stopped increasing since 1965, and that it is getting urgent to reverse that trend.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Phillips, calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 22, 1994. — (Honourable Senator Kinsella)

Hon. Fernand Roberge: Honourable senators, I am speaking today for the first time in this august chamber with all the humility and respect I have for this great institution which, regrettably, is not afforded the respect it deserves.

It is up to us to change this perception.

Honourable senators also deserve a great deal of respect. All one has to do is glance at their résumés to appreciate the extent of their achievements.

If only we could make Canadians aware of these accomplishments, of the breadth and quality of the talent in the Senate, perhaps then the public's perception of this institution would be altered dramatically.

Having said that, I would like to comment on the Liberal government's budget brought down by the Minister of Finance, Paul Martin, on February 22, 1994.

Some of the measures contained in the budget are particularly ill-suited to the situation they are supposed to resolve. They are illogical in their simplicity and inconsistent with other measures the Liberals have since taken, measures which defy the spirit of this document which purports to be a serious financial statement.

Because of the measures it contains, and also because of those it surprisingly does not, the Liberal government's budget openly betrays the public's trust in its leaders. I would even venture to say that it fuels the sense of dissatisfaction with our politicians which unquestionably is prevalent in Canada.

This budget fails to offer even the faintest glimmer of hope to the unemployed, be they residents of Quebec, Alberta or Newfoundland. Instead, it calls for tax increases totalling $33.4 billion over three years. We were expecting a budget that would create jobs and we were bitterly disappointed.

[English]

This budget attacked Canadians from all walks of life, especially those in Atlantic Canada where five military bases were closed and two other defence institutions reduced. However, there is more. In spite of declining fish stocks and the closing of fish processing plants, the Liberals have made things even harder for Atlantic Canadians, who now must work longer to get fewer unemployment insurance benefits.

Honourable senators, I ask you, where is the logic in this measure? What does the future now hold for all fishermen and plant workers affected by the federal budget?

Paul Martin also cut special investment tax credits for Atlantic Canadians, and slashed the budget of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency by $16 million. In fact, none of Canada's regions is exempt from the finance minister's knife. Both the Federal Office for Regional Development in Quebec and the Western Diversification Office have to contend with budget cuts. However, these cuts, combined with the changes in UI eligibility, will hurt more deeply in Atlantic Canada than anywhere else.

[Translation]

Furthermore, regardless of their province of residence, seniors had a very nasty surprise when they read about the budget in the newspapers. They learned that the age credit would be reduced for seniors earning over $26,000, which for some means a tax increase of $950.

Nevertheless, honourable senators, the Liberals' famous Red Book did not call for higher income taxes for seniors. Why did Paul Martin dip into the pockets of those who built Canada?

For other taxpayers, Paul Martin's budget provides a tax increase of $30 to $50 for employees whose employer offers a life insurance plan. What a bargain!

The Minister of Finance also abolished the $100,000 exemption for capital gains made after budget day, but only for small unincorporated businesses. Incorporated companies are still entitled to the exemption. Why the double standard?

Abolishing the exemption is even more unexpected in that, during the last election campaign, the Liberals let it be known that they would not touch it in the near future. To a question on the capital gains tax from the Canadian Organization of Small Business, they answered:

> A Liberal government does not intend to change the capital gains tax for now.

So what happened between October and February?

Honourable senators, I believe that small-business people were misled by the Liberal Party, in more ways than one.

[English]

In fact, the Liberal Party, which repeated over and over in its famous Red Book that it would encourage private sector growth, is being grossly unfair to small businesses and independent workers. The budget lowers to 50 per cent from 80 per cent the limit on business meals and entertainment deductions. Do the Liberals realize how many jobs will be put at risk in the food services sector? During the election, the Tourism Industry Association of Canada asked the Liberals a direct question about this tax measure. Their answer did not say a word about cutting it. Surely, plans to that effect were already in the works.

Small businesses are not the only ones to feel short-changed by the February budget. Have honourable senators spoken to the federal public servants who put their trust in the Liberals because they vehemently opposed almost all of the measures the preceding government took as part of its spending-cuts program? As soon as they could, the Liberals changed their policy and extended the public service wage freeze. The government will also extend bargaining agreements for an additional two years. It seems Paul Martin has forgotten his party's policy set out in a document called, "The Liberal Approach to the Public Service" wherein it is stated:

> A Liberal government will be committed to the process of collective bargaining.

In the face of such betrayal, the Public Service Alliance of Canada is threatening to go before the United Nations International Labour Organization to get the government to backtrack. I tell honourable senators that if I were a public servant today, I would feel very much like I had been betrayed by my friends and allies.

Where are the Liberal members of Parliament in the National Capital Region who were always so vocal in their opposition to the PC government's measures, including the public servants' wage freeze? They fought long and hard against this measure. Where are they expressing their outrage today? They are nowhere to be seen.

[Translation]

Contrary to rumours circulated before the budget was tabled, Paul Martin thought it prudent, thankfully, not to touch registered retirement savings plans. Now this is one decision that I fully support. However, there is a fly in the ointment: The Minister of Finance is awaiting the results of a study on RRSP contribution rates. I fear that the minister's next budget might yet have some unpleasant surprise in store for us in that respect.

I have noticed, as you no doubt did, that Jean Chrétien's finance minister's budget not only brings no hope in terms of employment, but it feeds and increases the deficit.

There are no medium-term forecasts on measures contemplated to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of the gross domestic product, as promised in the famous Red Book the Prime Minister brandished every chance he had last fall, a target which will translate into much too high a deficit still.

By the way, the C.D. Howe Institute advised that the only way the government could reach the 3 per cent of GDP target it has set for itself is by reducing the deficit by another $7.2 billion. One of the institute's economists stated in a study published this morning that the measures the government has announced to reduce the federal deficit are likely to fail.

For that reason and others, I think this budget shows all Canadians how short-sighted this Liberal government is and how it lacks singleness of purpose and vision. For example, it has promised one study after another, in conjunction with consultations, reviews and more consultations. However, that did not stop it from cutting UI funding before its comprehensive plan to reform social programs was even officially initiated and ministers of the federal and provincial governments had met to discuss the matter.

The reform promised by the Liberals in that area certainly has got off to a bad start, not to mention that the federal-provincial meeting cancelled at the last minute in April will probably not be held for several more weeks. Meanwhile, unemployed Canadians receive less money and wait desperately for the jobs promised by the Liberals in the last election campaign. I dare hope that they did not make empty promises.

Talking about promises, the Liberals also undertook to consult the people before closing military bases. However, they went back on their word and announced in the budget the following changes to the defence infrastructure: 4 bases, 4 stations and 13 units will be closed; 5 bases and 2 stations will be reduced; 2 bases will be merged with others; and 3 planned facilities will be cancelled. All this, let me remind you, while waiting for the Canadian defence policy review that was commissioned by the minister and whose findings will be released only in the fall. Are they not putting the cart before the horse?

The Liberals are in a hurry. In their haste to close the military college in St-Jean, which is famous for the quality of its teaching and has been a Quebec tradition since 1952, the Liberals forgot to check whether the students of the college in St-Jean will enjoy the same advantages in Kingston, where they want to consolidate the language training given to Canadian Forces officers. Kingston is a very nice city but it is far from offering the same opportunity to live in French as St-Jean did.

Do not forget the eagerness with which the Liberals cancelled the program to buy EH-101 helicopters as soon as they took office. On April 27, two members of the military died in the crash of a Sea King helicopter, which is the type that was considered obsolete by the Conservative government, and two others are in critical condition after this accident.

The defence minister, who took great pleasure in throwing the EH-101 helicopter project overboard at a cost of up to $1 billion in cancellation fees, admitted that this crash demonstrates the need to replace DND's old helicopters. Minister David Collenette said:

> There is no doubt that the Sea Kings will have to be replaced.

That, honourable senators, clearly shows a lack of foresight and a thoughtlessness that have already cost hundreds of millions of dollars, as well as hundreds of jobs that Canadians were eagerly awaiting.

[English]

I am sure you will agree that one of Canada's most urgent problems is its public debt and colossal deficit. In light of such problems, why did Paul Martin use the word "debt" only once in his entire budget speech? He only used it once, honourable senators, and that was in reference to what Canadians said in the pre-budget conferences.

• (1500)

Ignoring the problems of Canada's debt will not make it go away. Quite the contrary. No country can live beyond its means indefinitely. Why did Paul Martin fail to propose a national debt management plan that could be developed and implemented jointly with the provinces, which are experiencing the same serious debt problems as the federal government. The former Conservative government was aware that, as a country, we would succeed in eliminating our deficits and debts only if we worked together and agreed on the facts, the plans, and on the way to proceed to implement those plans.

The national debt management plan proposed by the Conservatives is based on four cornerstones. I want to explain that concept because the deficit and the debt are such serious problems that they go beyond partisan politics.

[Translation]

First of all, we need a consensus on taxation, spending, borrowing and deficit levels. Steps must be taken to prevent tax relief provided by one level of government from being neutralized by measures introduced by another government. There must also be a concerted effort to get rid of waste and duplication, both within individual governments and between various levels of government. Finally, we must carefully consider the services provided by various governments, the public's expectations and what level of government is best suited to providing these services.

Those are some of the principles the Minister of Finance could have usefully included in a national debt management plan which we would have welcomed wholeheartedly. The provinces must feel very isolated in their respective struggles to fight the deficit, at a time when the central government is making them shoulder an increasing share of the debt.

The February budget does not contain much that is good for the provinces, on the contrary. Mr. Martin announced a reduction of $1.5 billion in transfer payments for health, education and social welfare, effective in 1996. Ironically, all this preceded the government's much-touted reform of social programs. Mr. Martin indicated recently that the next budget would contain even more cuts in transfer payments. This would seem to contradict the Liberals' promise of more stable long-term funding plans for the provinces.

As the Minister of Finance, Mr. Martin should be looking for effective ways to reduce the debt.

I was therefore surprised when I read in an article in Le Droit on April 16 that the president of Petro-Canada, the oil company with the best financial results in 1993, had been unsuccessful in convincing the Liberal government that it was time to sell the 170 million shares in Petro-Canada which the federal government still has today. The sale of these shares could have brought in roughly $2.4 billion, money which Paul Martin could have used to reduce the deficit and, indirectly, the debt. However, judging from the article, the suggestion of the chief executive officer went unheeded.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senator, I should point out that your time has expired. Is there leave to allow Senator Roberge to conclude his speech?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Roberge: Thank you, Your Honour. In the interim, the stock market collapsed, along with crude oil prices. Such a transaction would now be impossible.

The Liberal government tabled a budget that was faithful to its centralizing principles, a budget which, rather than restore confidence, puts fear into investors and creates instability on the markets.

Abroad, as our colleague the Honourable Senator Beaulieu pointed out, the prestigious German Deutsche Bank has recommended to its investors to steer clear of Canadian share issues because of the country's degree of indebtedness. Here at home, the provincial governments live in fear of federal intrusion into their fields of jurisdiction.

The federal government has demonstrated its inflexibility with respect to manpower training by rekindling the tension between Ottawa and the provinces and by letting the mandarins govern instead of firmly taking hold of the reins itself. When will Mr. Martin start taking concrete steps to put Canada back on the road to prosperity? If the Liberals truly believed last November that the deficit would total $45 billion, why did they not freeze discretionary spending as soon as they took power?

The government of Brian Mulroney did not hesitate to take this kind of action, and did so twice in fact. Substantial savings were realized. Moreover, his government passed the Expenditure Control Act, setting down in legislation provisions to reduce expenditures. Now the Liberal government says it wants to repeal this legislation. In other words, the government should no longer be under any obligation to tighten its belt. Say goodbye to restraint and austerity!

In conclusion, honourable senators, the Liberal government's budget has convinced me that the worst is yet to come. I have no doubt that the financial statement scheduled to be delivered this fall will contain nothing in the way of good news and that ordinary Canadians could once again be facing the prospect of paying for the excesses of a government party well known for its expensive tastes and habits.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN HANDLING CAPACITY OF PORTS OF VANCOUVER AND PRINCE RUPERT—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the grain handling capacity of the Ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert, and asking the Senate to consider establishing a Parliamentary committee to ascertain the factors related to increasing the amount going through the elevators onto the ships for our export customers.—(Honourable Senator St. Germain)

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I asked Senator St. Germain earlier in the day if he would yield to me on this matter, because it is fairly important that I give a report to the Senate today.

• (1510)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I should point out that if the honourable senator speaks now, it is my understanding that his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Olson: Yes. I think that is agreed. I can put down another inquiry if and when it becomes useful to do so.

Honourable senators, on April 28 I brought forward an inquiry and gave notice to the Senate that there was a very serious grain handling problem on the West Coast. I advised that I would be returning later with a motion to set up a special committee to enquire into this problem.

I want to report to the Senate that there has been a very significant improvement in that situation during the past four weeks. There are a number of reasons for this. For example, the House of Commons committees on Transport and Agriculture set up two subcommittees, which met and called in a number of the major stakeholders in the whole grain industry from all across the prairies and from the Port of Vancouver. They invited me to participate in those hearings as if I were a member of the committee, which I appreciated. I can tell you that there were a lot of explanations given for some of the bottlenecks that they found. However, the process seemed to be helpful.

In addition to that, and of equal importance, the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Goodale, called a meeting in Winnipeg to which he invited all of the senior officers of the stakeholders, the railways, the grain companies, the port, the terminal operators, the shippers, and so on, and he asked these people to give their view of where the bottlenecks are. At the time, there were over 40 ships waiting in the harbour to be loaded with wheat. I have to say that the participants at that meeting responded by taking on certain tasks, and they are to report to the Minister of Agriculture, I believe, later this week. In any event, if it is not this week, it is very soon.

It is clear that if the bottlenecks are not identified and resolved by the end of the crop year, which is July 31, we will take another look at this situation to see if there is something that the government or Parliament ought to be doing about it. I hope quite frankly that they are resolved, and I have some reason for optimism that that will be the case.

I do want to keep this short, but I have one other thing to say, and it is important. I know the grain handlers' union has taken a lot of criticism because they were not working from Friday afternoon at five o'clock until eight o'clock on Monday morning. Discussions we had lead me to believe that that criticism was a little unfair.

The grain handlers union, led by their leader, Mr. Henry Kancs, gave an undertaking at the hearings we had in Ottawa that they would offer to work 24 hours a day, seven days a week, if they could work out some kind of arrangement. There is a limit for overtime under the Canada Labour Act, and there is the problem that costs go up, and the terminal elevators objected to that.

I can tell you that Mr. Kancs went to Vancouver. In about four days he was back in Ottawa. He phoned me immediately, as I believe he phoned a whole lot of other people, and he showed me the agreement that was signed between the terminal operators and his union. They will solve the overtime problem, both the cost factor and the limitations on it, by sharing it amongst all of the workers instead of having it pile up on some. That was a tremendous improvement.

I want to tell you that he is also willing to share the jobs. In other words, they would have the men who are working on the so-called shop floor be certified to do four different jobs, not just one. It will save an enormous amount of time if there are people who can do four different jobs and therefore create a steady flow of grain through the port.

There is much more that I could talk about, but I want to say that there has been tremendous improvement. I want to give credit to everybody who was involved, including the terminal operators, the railroads, the grain companies, and the unions. The situation has improved. I am told there were one or two days when the number of ships waiting was down to 10 from 40. It should be known that the grain is going through at near-record levels now. That is what we set out to try to do, and I think we have succeeded.

If the Senate agrees, and I hope it will, we would suggest leaving this matter in abeyance, at least until after the end of the crop year. Obviously, if there is not a long-term improvement, we can pick it up again. In the meantime, the situation is working itself out, and I think we should leave it at that and just keep an eye on it.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): With the indulgence of the chamber, may I just express my thanks to Senator Olson, Senator Gustafson and Senator St. Germain for the interest they have taken in this issue and for the fact they were as vocal about it as they were. I believe it certainly prompted some of the action that has taken place to ease the situation. On behalf of all of us, we appreciate that.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with your permission, I would ask that all remaining orders stand.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honour senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

NEW BRUNSWICK

REOPENING OF SAINT JOHN'S IMPERIAL THEATRE

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, I rise today to pay special tribute to a remarkable landmark and an achievement in my home city, Saint John, New Brunswick.

Last Tuesday evening, May 24, the official opening of the Imperial Theatre took place. The theatre is an architectural masterpiece and was designated that day as an historic site by the Lieutenant-Governor.

This opening represents a triumph for the people of greater Saint John. It is a story of the community that thought it could, and did. It is a unique and exciting story of grass roots support for a cultural project, a project of the people, whose diligence and vision were instrumental in restoring the Imperial Theatre to its original splendour. It is a story of dedication and perseverance. The history of the Imperial Theatre reveals a priceless record of the city, the province and the country.

In 1913, Saint John was on a prestigious theatrical circuit which included London, New York and Boston, and hosted such theatre greats as Gracie Fields, John Philip Sousa, Ethel Barrymore and Walter Pidgeon.

Within its walls, Canadian Forces being sent off to both the First and Second World Wars listened to inspirational messages just prior to departure.

Mackenzie King spoke from the Imperial's stage.

The theatre was billed as "the finest in Eastern Canada" when it first opened in September of 1913, and it regained that distinction upon its grand reopening on May 24, 1994, some 81 years later.

The story of the people's project began in 1982, when a group of volunteers who were determined to give Saint John a performing arts centre sparked a public appeal, and the response was overwhelming.

The theatre was purchased from a church group for $1 million with only $1 as a down payment and the promise to raise the remaining $999,999 in one year. The amount was raised in one year, when three-quarters of Saint John's population contributed services and money through auctions, benefit concerts, book sales, prize raffles, and donations from groups, corporations and private donors.

Since that heady year of fundraising, the reconstruction of the Imperial Theatre has gone through many ups and downs. The reconstruction took 11 more years to come to fruition, as the amount of money needed to properly restore the theatre was far above the original projection.

Much credit must go to the tri-level committee of Gerald Merrithew, former Conservative MP for Saint John, Premier Frank McKenna and Elsie Wayne, former mayor, for their understanding, foresight and commitment to the success of the theatre.

What is happening at the Imperial is an inspiration to theatres across the country. If any honourable senators from across the country would like to visit this impressive theatre, let me assure them they need not show a New Brunswick birth certificate to gain entry. The Imperial Theatre welcomes one and all. We are open for business!

CHINA—FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF TIANANMEN SQUARE MASSACRE

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, tomorrow, June 3, marks the fifth anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre. I rise today with great sadness to speak on this dark day in our history.

Senator Bonnell: It is not our history.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is part of the history of the world.

Senator Di Nino: It is the history of us human beings.

I rise with sadness for that dark time in our history when many students, children, men and women lost their lives as the Chinese army shot its way into the square and trampled many innocent people under the weight of their tanks.

Were those protesters engaging in violent acts against the state and against the wellbeing of the Chinese people? No, they were not. Rather, they were demonstrating peacefully for the democratic principles that we in Canada consider essential to our way of life. For those brave demonstrators, many of whom lost their lives, it represented the only real possession they had: their hopes and their dreams; the hopes and dreams of a life free of oppression and a life in which people are able to choose their own destiny; freedom from the control found at the end of a gun; and the freedom to speak their minds without the risk of imprisonment or worse.

Like many in this chamber, I am saddened at the thought of people such as Ms Ding, who lost her 17-year-old son on that fateful night of June 3, 1989, and who now risks her own life to help others who had their loved ones taken from them on that same dark night.

However, my sadness is not exclusively related to the past. I am also deeply disappointed at the Chrétien government's position on the broader issue of human rights abuses in China. This government chooses to view China as one billion potential consumers and the human rights issue has been all but ignored.

Amnesty International voiced its concern over this government's position on China by stating, as reported in The Globe and Mail on June 1, 1994:

> ...in a stampede to take advantage of trade opportunities, Mr. Chrétien and other Canadian politicians are guilty of wilful public neglect of Canada's commitment to the protection of international human rights.

Many senators have heard and are aware of my views regarding China's aggression against the people of Tibet.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I am sorry to interrupt the honourable senator, but I must point out that his three minutes have expired.

Is there leave, honourable senators, to allow the honourable senator to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Di Nino: Thank you, honourable senators.

I have gone so far as to accuse publicly the government of China of cultural genocide. China's leaders have thumbed their noses continually at criticism of their position on human rights, environmental issues and their preoccupation with nuclear power for other than peaceful purposes. Many questions have been raised about China's disposal of nuclear waste. Environmental devastation and degradation taking place in China and Tibet pose a real threat to the entire planet, and, as reported in The Toronto Star of June 1, 1994, China is about to explode another hydrogen bomb at its Lop Nor test site.

It is in the context of human rights abuses, environmental degradation and China's misguided and uncontrolled nuclear policies that I question why this government chooses to ignore the facts and instead seems to focus its energy only on trade.

Of serious concern to me is the message that this government is sending to the courageous and selfless defenders of basic rights and freedoms everywhere. Amnesty International, as reported in The Globe and Mail article of June 1 to which I referred earlier, suggests that:

> Canada's public silence about human-rights violations is interpreted by the Chinese government as recognition that they were justified in crushing the democratic opposition in 1989.

On the question of whether we should trade with China, I agree with those who state that Canada can have some influence on the Chinese government by being a partner rather than by being absent from China's affairs.

• (1410)

However, the Chrétien government wrongfully identifies the Chinese situation as two mutually exclusive choices, one being open trade and the other being a hard line in support of human rights. I choose to view these two choices as interdependent and in Canada's national interest. As countries embark on volatile trade agreements with China, they must use human rights issues as an element of any trade agreement.

Honourable senators, the Chrétien government is wrong in deviating from Canada's long-standing policy of understanding, compassion and support for all those who reach out to us.

As we all remember —

Senator Frith: Did the previous government not —

Senator Di Nino: — the events that unfolded —

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please. Order!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This is a statement, not a debate.

Senator Di Nino: I was given permission to finish. I have only three seconds left.

An Hon. Senator: We know you are ashamed of yourselves.

An Hon. Senator: And you should be ashamed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please. Order!

Senator Di Nino: As we remember the events that unfolded in Tiananmen Square on the infamous night of June 3, 1989, let us not forget Canada's long-standing role in upholding rights and freedoms throughout the world.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Olson, did you have a statement?

Hon. H.A. Olson: No, I want to comment on Senator Di Nino's comments.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I cannot hear you, honourable senator. Order, please, honourable senators.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will not make a statement. The Honourable Senator Di Nino is entitled to his opinion on these matters. However, in case silence means acceptance, I want to tell him that I completely reject all of his interpretations of the Prime Minister's motives and actions.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Read Ouellet's statement. It is all in there.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please!

CANADA'S HISTORIC LEADERSHIP ROLE

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, I too have listened to the Prime Minister of this country and our Minister of External Affairs. I have the same concern as my honourable colleague Senator Di Nino, and I want to express it to you today.

An Hon. Senator: Order! Order!

An Hon. Senator: Make your statement and save the speech.

Senator Ghitter: I will endeavour to do so if I have an opportunity to speak over the chorus of "boo"s and probably embarrassment of some of the members on the other side.

Senator Frith: And on your side.

Senator Ghitter: On my side as well. It is time we graduated.

Senator Frith: As long as we are clear about that.

An Hon. Senator: Order!

Senator Ghitter: I rise today, if I may, to express to my fellow senators my deep concern over the deteriorating commitment of governments, both federal and provincial in this land, to assist those who are deprived of basic rights and freedoms that are so dear to all Canadians. Some 50 years —

Hon. H.A. Olson: That is not true.

Senator Ghitter: May I finish?

Senator Olson: That is simply not true.

Senator Ghitter: Is this being taken from my time, Your Honour? I see that it is.

Some 50 years ago, Canadian men and women died on the beaches of France to preserve our fundamental freedoms and those of many others in the world. Canada came of age on the beaches of Normandy, and since that date has enjoyed an enviable record in this world for its recognized leadership in assisting nations and individuals facing oppression, war and intolerant governments.

Canadian governments have repeatedly spoken for Canadians in their opposition to the deprivation of human rights wherever it has occurred throughout the world. Canada has led by example. We have linked foreign aid to improvement in human rights. We have linked our trade policies to changes in human rights. We have demonstrated that Canada is prepared to do more than just talk about the things we believe in. We have displayed our national conscience in the international arena and, by so doing, we have made a proud difference in this world.

When the apartheid regime of South Africa first learned that Canada would impose trade sanctions on that nation, they stated that they were not concerned. Today we are able to participate in that nation's truly national democratic election. That would not have happened had it not been for Canadian leadership and the leadership of other nations in exposing the atrocities of apartheid.

Canada has sent its soldiers to other lands in peace-keeping efforts that have brought us an international reputation as a compassionate, tolerant and concerned society.

Recently we seemed to have lost our zeal, our concern and our compassion for those who do not enjoy the freedoms that we regard to be an entitlement of all citizens of the world. In the NAFTA agreement, there is no reference to human rights even though Mexico is continually being cited for extraordinary human rights abuses to its citizens.

Now a timorous Canadian government seems to be taking the attitude that it is more important to sell wheat, tobacco, tractors and pizza to China than to face up to them and bring them to task for the atrocities that they commit daily upon their citizenry.

How complacent we have now become. How forgetful of history our government seems to be. How regrettable it is that our Prime Minister and our Minister of External Affairs stand before the world of public opinion and say that trade is one thing and human rights is another and will not bring any relationship between the two.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please!

Senator Frith: Hypocrisy, part two.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please!

Senator Ghitter: May I have leave to finish, please?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please!

Senator Ghitter: Does that mean I have the unanimous consent of my colleagues?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): You can continue next week.

Senator Ghitter: I will be happy to continue next week.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There is no shame over there.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I interrupted the honourable senator, as the rules require, to point out that his three minutes had expired. If the honourable senator has leave, he may continue.

Senator Olson: No, he does not have leave.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The honourable senator does not have leave.

CANADA-CHINA RELATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I too wish to make a statement on the subject of human rights and Canada's policy with respect to China. The concept that has been offered by Senator Di Nino and Senator Ghitter, that Canada is turning away from its commitment to advance the cause of human rights in the world, is not a correct one. Canada's commitment to human rights remains as it always has been under this government and under previous governments.

We are a Liberal democracy. We govern ourselves according to a system of values, and those values are on show for the world to see. When we meet with countries — China is only one, and there are many others — whose concept of human rights we do not agree with, we meet with them standing absolutely firmly on our values as a country. We cannot reform the world by pressing our values as a precondition to any form of relationship.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): What happened in South Africa? Why are you picking on Haiti, then?

Senator Austin: There is an old saying, that if you meet a person and you begin the relationship by establishing with that person those topics on which you disagree and you make your disapproval clear and patent, then the chance of ever developing a coherent and positive relationship with that person is unlikely.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Would you say that we failed in South Africa? Unbelievable.

Senator Austin: If you meet someone and you put forward those issues on which you can agree and can develop a working relationship, then respect and trust will develop, and an exchange of values can also develop towards a very long-term and stable relationship.

The question of values and what our values are is not in issue. We are trading with China. We are trading with Saudi Arabia. We are trading with a substantial number of countries that do not have liberal democratic values. We do that because, as the countries of the world get to know one another better, it becomes a better world. Trade is one of the main routes of communication, and exchange of real interests creates an interest in us, and that is why in Western Europe and North America we have created successful societies, and why the liberal democracies have been successful societies.

I spend a good deal of time in China, and I can tell you that the distribution of economic power in China that is going on today is a major advance in China's political evolution. I cannot tell you how it will advance, where it will advance, or when it will advance, but I can tell you it is an advance.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I interrupt the honourable senator to point out that his time has expired. Is there leave to continue?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Ask Senator Olson.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I understand there is leave.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, if I may add one sentence, Canada's opportunities to advance human rights with China will be included in the development of our overall relationship, cultural, political, and economic.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Dollar for dollar.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please! If honourable senators are standing under Senators' Statements, I must point out that the 15 minutes which the Rules of the Senate provide for Senators' Statements have expired. If there is leave, then obviously one can continue beyond the 15 minutes. Is there leave?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: My understanding is that there is not leave.

• (1420)

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I am not standing for Senators' Statements. I am standing to ask His Honour to give a ruling for the benefit of this house on whether statements are what we thought they were or are a recipe or a catalyst for debate?

We have had a very interesting exchange here today. I take no part at this stage in what has gone on. However, I would ask His Honour to inform the house, in his own time, whether or not statements can be used as a forum for heckling and as a forum for debate.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, on the point of order which has been raised by Senator MacDonald, I would draw to Your Honour's attention rule 22(4), which says:

> Matters raised during this period shall not be subject to debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if I may deal with the matter raised by Senator MacDonald, all I will do is read the standing order. That is all I will do now, and perhaps that is all that is required. Rule 22(4) reads as follows:

> When "Senators' Statements" has been called, senators may, without notice, raise matters they consider need to be brought to the urgent attention of the Senate. In particular, Senators' Statements should relate to matters which are of public consequence and for which the rules and practices of the Senate provide no immediate means of bringing the matters to the attention of the Senate. In making such statements, a senator shall not anticipate consideration of any Order of the Day and shall be bound by the usual rules governing the propriety of debate. Matters raised during this period shall not be subject to debate.

I think that the quotation of that section of the standing order addresses the point of order which Senator MacDonald raised.

Senator Frith: Which was out of order at this stage.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Also, as has just been stated, points of order arising from, or which would occur to one during, the period of Senators' Statements should be raised only after Question Period.

There are really two points. First, points of order which might occur to a senator during statements by senators should be made after Question Period. Second, I think the standing order is quite explicit with respect to what is in order and what is not. Perhaps we can leave it there.

Hon. Royce Frith: It seems to me, honourable senators, that it will just not be practical to enforce that rule during Senators' Statements, if senators use Senators' Statements to attack each other. It will only provoke debate, if I use Senators' Statements to attack the opposition, or if opposition members during Senators' Statements raise questions attacking the government. I am not suggesting that there is any reason why they should not be attacked, but that is not the place for it. It is unrealistic to think that, if I stand up under Senators' Statements and attack the Conservative Party, some senator is not going to react to it and that it will not lead to debate.

Just to be clear, when we speak under Senators' Statements, we should try not to do so in a particularly provocative way, because there is no way that that will not provoke debate.

For example, you can ask these questions of the government. That is what Question Period is there for.

An Hon. Senator: Naturally, we have never heard you do it at all.

Senator Frith: Of course I do it. That is the reason I am saying it. Of course I do that. I am just the kind who is likely to use Senators' Statements in a provocative way, and, if I do, I expect you will react, and then we are into a debate. I am simply saying that we can have these kinds of exchanges and should have these exchanges, but they must be made under other headings. That is all.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, on the same point of order —

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order! Honourable senators, our procedure has been somewhat stretched, but certainly any additional point of order will have to come at the appropriate time. We are now on Tabling of Documents.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO REGULATIONS TABLED

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the pleasure to table in both official languages, the amendments to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Regulations which were published in the Canada Gazette on May 31, 1994, regarding fishing by stateless and flag-of-convenience vessels on the Nose and Tail of the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. This is pursuant to an undertaking given by the Minister of Fisheries, the Honourable Brian Tobin, to my colleague Senator Stewart, when he appeared before us during Committee of the Whole on the bill.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): If it is appropriate, I would ask a question of the minister on that. When the Minister of Fisheries was here before the Committee of the Whole, he was asked about the regulations. I asked him:

> There will therefore be appropriate time for any senatorial committee interested in this particular issue to examine them the regulations, that is —

> and, if they need improvements, to suggest amendments?

And the minister replied, "Absolutely." Now we find that they are published, they are gazetted and they are in force. I just want to draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government that there was a commitment made by the Minister of Fisheries to bring these regulations before the committee. Now we see that we have been ignored again.

THE SENATE

DISTRIBUTION OF DEBATES AND MINUTES TO MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question arises out of some extraordinarily disdainful comments made in the House of Commons on Tuesday, May 31, by Mr. Peter Milliken, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, and therefore, he was reproducing, I assume, the thinking of the minister there.

Mr. Milliken was deploring the fact that when Bill C-18 was returned to the House of Commons, for some reason, the Votes and Proceedings there did not reproduce the amendments and, therefore, he could not understand why the amendments were not in written form in the House of Commons publications. He stated that he had tried to get copies of the amendments from our own publications here in the Senate. I think that those senators who have not seen his extraordinary statements will certainly be as startled by them as I was when I read them.

He stated:

> The Senate amendments are not printed in any other House documentation and I do not know whether Your Honour has ever tried to get minutes of the Senate. I have tried to subscribe for the five or six years I have been in this place, and I cannot get them delivered on a regular basis.
> They are very difficult to obtain and I could send a staff member to the distribution office to get a copy but that seems needless trouble every day. That is what I am expected now to do; at least that is the only way I seem to be able to obtain the minutes of the Senate.

The point of this is not so much the lack of understanding of how to get copies of Senate documentation. It is that he also prefaced his remarks by stating:

> I suggest that while many may regard the proceedings in the Senate as irrelevant and unimportant, in this particular case they have some importance...

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate arrange for the name of her caucus colleague to be added to the distribution list of our proceedings, or at least pass on her copy to him in order that he and any of his like-minded colleagues are made aware that our proceedings are both relevant and important.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for drawing those comments to my attention. I will definitely see that Mr. Milliken is on all of the distribution lists of the Senate, and I am sure he would find the speeches that are made in this place and the questions asked to be informative, relevant and to the point.

I should also say to my honourable friend that I know Mr. Milliken, and I know that he has respect for this place. I do not know whether the words on the page reflect the manner in which he spoke. I will speak to him and assure him that he will receive material. I will also convey my honourable friend's question and comments to him.

I would assure my honourable friend that I do know that Mr. Milliken holds this place and the people in it in high regard.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could also draw to Mr. Milliken's attention another unfortunate comment he made during the same presentation, and this is a direct quotation:

I know there are many members

This is speaking of members of the House of Commons —

> who feel it inappropriate for the Senate to make changes to Commons bills, but the fact is that it does happen from time to time and we do have to tolerate this inconvenience.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame, shame!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Perhaps we are supposed to feel apologetic for "inconveniencing them" as we attempt to improve legislation.

My question to the leader — as she reminds him of the respect he has shown to this house, by her definition — is, does she agree with the Parliamentary Secretary's pompous remarks, particularly as she herself moved an amendment to Bill C-18?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, we had a most important debate in this house and it is an important issue. The Senate obviously has the right to move amendments to legislation. I thought the interventions on this issue were informative. I thought the amendments on both sides, depending on one's point of view, were compelling, and I will certainly reinforce this with Mr. Milliken when I next see him.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, in the eyes of most Canadians, this government has failed to provide any credible deficit projections or economic plan, and a 200-basis-point hike in the long-term interest rates since February 25 is proof of that.

The government's own budget plan indicates that a 100-basis-point hike in interest rates, one per cent, will add about $1.7 billion to this year's deficit. Honourable senators, a quick mathematical calculation will indicate that the government is out by some $2 billion.

Last Tuesday, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in response to a similar question I posed, referred to the issue of Quebec. I do not disagree with the unsettling effect of this situation. However, the government, specifically the Minister of Finance, cannot continuously use this as an excuse for inaction. Investors, both democratic and international, also look at a country's balance sheets, and they do not like what they see.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate please ask her cabinet colleague the Minister of Finance to address the uncertainty regarding the deficit targets by formally outlining a revised and accurate strategy, and to do so prior to the summer recess, for the sake of small business and others in this country?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his question. He will not be surprised if I tell him that I do not totally agree with his assessment of the situation.

The Minister of Finance has said, time and again, that one of the most important underlying tasks that this government and this country has is to get the deficit and debt in order. That is his goal. He began with a budget in February and made it clear that it was the first of a two-part effort, the second being the budget that will be introduced next February. He is holding tight and the Prime Minister is holding tight to the three-per-cent GDP deficit reduction in three years. That is short term. Obviously, the goal for the longer term, and as soon as it can possibly be achieved, is the absolute elimination of the deficit.

My honourable friend would indicate that the government has been inactive in promoting the second part of its agenda, which is the companion to the deficit reduction, and that is the pursuit of economic growth. The government has pursued this vigorously in recent months with the National Infrastructure Program, the incentives for employment and learning for youth, the Adjustment and Job Creation Program in the Atlantic fishery, and the rollback of UI premium rates that is contained in a piece of legislation now before this house. We are undertaking a social policy review to try to bring the social programs in this country together in the most effective way that will not only help the security of Canadians, but will give them every possible incentive to get back to work.

I believe, honourable senators, that this goal of the government will be reached. I have visited some infrastructure programs in this country. Canadians are already getting back to work in useful jobs.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, I believe I am making progress. The Leader of the Government says she does not totally agree with me, but obviously she is in partial agreement, so we may be making some headway as we proceed on this very important initiative.

The government leader again referred to 3 per cent of GDP as the level for deficit reduction, which we know the IMF has questioned. When I ask for an official fiscal update from the Minister of Finance prior to the summer break, I hope that I am not asking for the impossible for the honourable members of this chamber. My understanding is that in the budget the minister promised an update in the fall. Surely internal updates are provided for ministers from time to time, as they were prior to October of 1993, outlining the government's fiscal position.

Senator Thériault: We never heard of them.

Senator St. Germain: Interest rates and inflation were so low that you did not need them.

Having said that, have there been any internal fiscal updates since the budget? If so, could the minister share them with the members of this Senate?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will be very pleased to pass my friend's comments on to the Minister of Finance. I have tried periodically in answers to questions to indicate to my friend the improvements that have been occurring on a regular basis in our economy over the last weeks, and indeed even days.

I think that he is aware of the creation of 115,000 jobs since February, which is almost, I believe, a record. He is aware of the improvement in manufacturing shipments and in retail sales. Consumer spending is up and exports are healthy.

I am sure we all take some pleasure from the fact that all of the indicators, which had been virtually stuck or declining for so long, are now moving forward. We have a positive movement in our economy. The Minister of Finance is firmly holding the course on his fiscal plans.

The record speaks for itself, but I would be pleased to pass on my honourable friend's additional comments to him.

AMOUNT OF DEFICIT FOR 1993-94—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government concerning the deficit numbers. Perhaps, Senator St. Germain, although it is not my place, I can explain why the government is not answering your question. Frankly, they do not know. I say that because the Minister of Finance seemed to have no trouble last fall saying, "The sky is falling in. Our deficit for this year is going to be $45 billion rather than the $35 billion predicted by the previous government and the Minister of Finance, Mr. Mazankowski."

The government had no trouble estimating that the deficit would be $45 billion. Knowing that a Liberal is a Liberal is a Liberal, I, frankly, did not believe that. In committee in March and April, I continued to ask what the revenues of the government were. They did not know, and to this day they have not answered that question. I am talking about the revenue numbers from 1993-94. They do not know the revenue numbers.

The Fiscal Monitor has said that perhaps the deficit will be down in March of 1994. The deficit declined in the period from April 1993 to March 1994. The federal 1994 budget will possibly be below it and the final results will be published later. However, it is not clear whether it will be below the $45 billion that they have said it will be or below the $35 billion that Mr. Mazankowski predicted.

What will the deficit be for 1993-94?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer that, but I think we can all take some pleasure from the fact that, because of increased revenues during that period, it looks as though the deficit figures will be less than had been anticipated. I cannot feel particularly gloomy about that.

With regard to the padding, as my honourable friend calls it, I think we all know that there were items in that period of time that led the Department of Finance and the minister to draw certain conclusions from the figures. The Minister of Finance, as you know, has not yet conceded, and will not until all the figures are in, what the numbers will be. However, the movement that we have seen to date indicates that there were improvements in the revenue position of this country, and I think that is very gratifying.

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, none of us, especially on this side, take any pleasure whatsoever from the fact that interest rates have gone up and the dollar has dropped. Notice that they had no trouble in the fall of last year predicting that the deficit would be $45 billion. Now it is June of 1994 and they do not know what the deficit was from 1993 to 1994.

I believe that the deficit was overestimated deliberately so that they could make their budget of February 1994 look lower, because they did not have the courage to address the questions that were affecting the country.

Will the Minister of Finance apologize to the Canadian people, if the deficit is $35 billion, which I predict it will be, for what has happened to the dollar, to interests rates and to the Canadian economy?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance has absolutely nothing to apologize for. He has set us on a course in this country that is putting Canadians back to work, that is helping young people find their way in this economy and in the job market. He has nothing to apologize for.

He will be extremely proud for the country, not for himself, if the deficit figures come in better than predicted. He did it honestly. He did not pad. He did not invent. He has nothing to apologize for. Frankly, I think the Minister of Finance of Canada could use a little bit of support at this time for the efforts he is making to put Canadians back to work.

THE SENATE

PROPOSAL FOR DEBATE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE—REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Earlier today, there was a highly interesting exchange of views from both sides of this chamber on human rights. I am sure that many other senators would have liked to participate in that exchange.

At the moment, two major committees of Parliament are meeting. One is the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Canada's Defence Policy; the other is the Special Joint Committee on Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy. In view of the fact that sometime in September these committees will publish their respective reports, will the Leader of the Government consider taking the initiative to allow a full debate this September on both these issues, with special emphasis on foreign affairs? The focus could be subdivided into categories including CIDA, external aid in terms of foreign and international affairs, and the most important question of human rights.

I am glad that Senator Ghitter will start the ball rolling on Wednesday. I will be happy to participate in that debate.

When we look around this chamber we see an extraordinarily large pool of expertise on both these issues. It would be sad if our views were not communicated publicly. Not only will people who are interested in these two matters be glad to read what we have to say, but the government may want to take into consideration what is said before it publishes a white paper on these two issues.

Will the Leader of the Government give us a commitment in this regard before the end of June?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Prud'homme for his question. I must say, one of the great things about the Senate is the freedom, collectively or individually, to use this place as a forum for debate on these issues.

I am sure that when the reports to which the honourable senator refers are available, there will be ample opportunity in this place for full debate so that the views of senators may be made known. I, too, look around this chamber and see colleagues from both sides who have enormous experience in these areas. I am sure there will be ample opportunity for debate at that time, or at any time, as Senator Ghitter proved today.

CHINA

HUMAN RIGHTS AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, as we heard earlier in the proceedings today, Amnesty International and other international and domestic NGOs have raised questions concerning China's human rights record. Amnesty International reported recently about the human rights abuses in China since the Tiananmen Square massacre. These abuses include unfair trials, administrative detention without charge or trial of government opponents, and the torture and ill-treatment of prisoners.

Why is the Government of Canada "delinking" our traditional human rights position from our commercial relations with that country?

Further, I should like to ask a second question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Did the Prime Minister raise the matter of the human rights performance of the Chinese government when he met in China with Mr. Wu Bangguo, the senior member of the Communist Party's powerful politburo, on Monday, May 31? What specifically was the Government of Canada's message to Mr. Wu Bangguo at that time?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am pleased to respond to Senator Kinsella's question. It is not a question of "delinking," as the honourable senator says. Nor is it a question of Canada stepping aside from its traditional position on human rights.

The Prime Minister has made very clear what is the government's policy. I cannot specifically say whether he conveyed his views to this particular gentleman, although I will ask him directly. However, the Prime Minister did say in the House of Commons this week:

> Mr. Speaker, this government's policy has always been clear: we deplore regimes that do not respect people's freedoms.
> We have told the Chinese government this at every opportunity.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs has also made a similar statement.

As honourable senators probably know, Canada sponsored a resolution condemning China's human rights record at this year's March session of the UN's Commission on Human Rights. That was a public and necessary declaration of this country's point of view.

There is another side to this matter. We do not assist in the cause of human rights when we isolate a country like China, or any other country for that matter.

Senator Lynch-Staunton Tell us about Haiti? What about South Africa and its failure? Let's hear about that.

Senator Fairbairn: There is no question that we are engaging with the Chinese in economic pursuits and in trade. We will continue to do that. At the same time, the Prime Minister has made it clear to the Chinese and to the world that we will not support or tolerate the abuse of human rights, no matter where it occurs in the world. Isolation is not the way to impress on that nation the good values that we in this country support.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And Haiti has no role to play. Let's keep that embargo going.

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED STUDY OF ATLANTIC CANADA FREIGHT RATES— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I wish to raise a question about government practices and consultation. We have heard about plans that the government has made to look at the proposition of burying very deeply in the total price of goods a harmonized provincial and federal sales tax.

Much to my regret, we have news that the Department of Transport is about to embark on a closed-door internal study with respect to the Atlantic Canada freight rate subsidy programs. Honourable senators will be aware that this is in some contrast to the open consultative process which was followed by the previous government. We understand that this study is not simply a continuation of a previous study, something which has been discussed widely with the stakeholders in Atlantic Canada, but that the entire program is under review.

Will the Leader of the Government take time to find an opportunity to speak to her colleague the Minister of Transport, or to the President of the Treasury Board, about the practice of doing things behind closed doors?

If we are to suffer further cut-backs in a program that is already generations old and so deeply entrenched in our infrastructure, and if we are to discuss it privately, then I suggest this chamber should call upon the other chamber most forcefully to start acting openly so that stakeholders are aware of what is going on. In this way, they can plan from one year to the next. They will then know where they stand with respect to this very important subsidy program for Atlantic Canadians.

• (1510)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my friend for his question. I recognize the importance of that program, and I will certainly take his questions and follow them up with my colleagues.

VETERANS APPEAL BOARD

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: My question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and has to do with the Order in Council listing that was released yesterday, June 1. It is with specific regard to Order in Council Number 820, the appointment of one Patricia Landers of Saint John, New Brunswick as an additional member of the Veterans Appeal Board, effective June 1, 1994. This is a GIC 4 position with a salary range of $73,400 to $86,400.

Is this the same Patricia Landers who was the candidate for the Liberal Party of Canada against Elsie Wayne in Saint John, New Brunswick in October, 1993; who is the spouse of former Liberal Member of Parliament Mike Landers, who sat in the House of Commons from 1974 to 1979 and from 1980 to 1984, and who was appointed by Prime Minister Turner to a full-time position on the Canadian Transport Commission on the very day he called the 1984 election, July 9? Is this the same Patricia Landers?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: She does not fit the Red Book criteria, so it cannot be the same.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator LeBreton for her question. She certainly has been able to outline the outstanding qualifications of Ms Landers. I should advise the honourable senator that this is the same Patricia Landers who is a member of the Saint John City Council, one of the most prominent spokespeople in that community, particularly on environmental matters and the health of that beautiful city. She is an extremely accomplished, experienced and knowledgeable woman, and I think she will do as fine a job in her additional responsibility as she has in the past.

Senator LeBreton: As a supplementary —

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please. I point out that the 30 minutes alloted to Question Period has expired.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Aw, shucks. Let's give leave.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If there is leave, we may continue.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Keep it going.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Do you have a supplementary question, Senator LeBreton?

Senator LeBreton: I have a very brief supplementary.

The Red Book promises to ensure that necessary appointments are made on the basis of competence. I point out that Ms Landers has been appointed as an additional member of the board.

Despite all of Ms Landers' other accomplishments that you cite, has the government assured itself that Ms Landers meets the standard of competency required to deal with veterans pension issues?

Senator Fairbairn: I have no doubt that Ms Landers will deal with this particular subject with the same competence and zeal that she has applied to the other assignments she has fulfilled for her province, for her city of Saint John, and, indeed, for this country.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: To the tune of 80,000 green ones a year.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 15, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Finlay MacDonald regarding Synfuels project, termination of the Special Investment Tax Credit; a response to a question raised in the Senate on April 19, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Mira Spivak regarding the Saint Lawrence Vision 2000; a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 10, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Terry Stratton regarding the replacement of Sea King helicopters; and a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 12, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Erminie J. Cohen regarding the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

ATLANTIC CANADA

DEPENDENCE ON SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT—REINSTATEMENT OF SPECIAL INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to Question raised by Hon. Finlay MacDonald on March 15, 1994)

A uniform Investment Tax Credit of 5% was introduced in 1975 to stimulate business investment. It was a credit that was deducted from federal taxes otherwise payable. Over the years, the rate was increased, but not uniformly. In 1980, a Special Investment Tax Credit was introduced for certain "designated" areas of the country. It was more generous, but applied only to certain business activities.

There were numerous disagreements about which business activities qualified for the credit, as well as numerous concerns that the boundaries of the eligible regions did not accurately reflect economic and geographic realities. In some cases, urban centres wholly within the boundaries of an eligible region did not qualify for the credit.

The government's decision to terminate the Special Investment Tax Credit will encourage businesses to place more emphasis on sound business practice when making their investment decisions.

The question of whether the grandfathering rules announced in the 1994 Budget should be modified so as to include projects such as the proposed Synfuels facility is being addressed by the Minister of Finance. His officials have already met with the project sponsors, as well as the sponsors of certain other projects that will be affected by the Budget announcements. The Minister of Finance will continue to be both fair and reasonable to all of the projects that were affected and if the Minister of Finance decides to make modifications they will be announced shortly.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ST. LAWRENCE VISION 2000—REDUCTION OF POLLUTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Mira Spivak on April 19, 1994)

The federal government, in cooperation with the governments of Quebec and Ontario, will do its part in cleaning up the Saint Lawrence River and the Great Lakes, through the Saint Lawrence Vision 2000 and Great Lakes 2000 programs. The job will take time, and it will require the assistance not only of the aforementioned governments, but also of municipalities, the private sector and local residents. The task is so complex that it will not be finished by the year 2000, although it will be well advanced. The $250 million will be gradually invested in clean-up plans. That is why the federal government has chosen an approach based on precise objectives, so as to measure its actions and follow their progress on-site.

With regard to toxics, the long-term goal of Saint Lawrence Vision 2000 is to reduce toxic liquid wastes and to virtually eliminate wastes of persistent and bioaccumulated toxic substances. That objective will not be achieved during the course of the initiative, but the program is an important step. The precise goal will be to reduce by 90 per cent, or to the greatest possible extent, waste toxic liquids from 56 of the most polluting factories.

The long-term goal of Great Lakes 2000 is to virtually eliminate the use and, generation, and, the release into the Great Lakes ecosystem of the persistent bioaccumulative toxic substances identified by the International Joint Commission (IJC) and binational agreement for priority action. Again, that objective will not be achieved by the year 2000, but substantial progress will have been made.

The detailed objectives, targets and schedules for action under Great Lakes 2000 will be released on the occasion of the signing of the Canada-Ontario Agreement respecting the Great Lakes ecosystem.

The government is preparing its formal response to the IJC's 7th Biennial Report, and will consider all its recommendations, including the "reverse onus of proof standard."

As part of the government's commitment to preventing pollution before it is created, the New Substances Notification Regulations were promulgated on April 6, 1994. They will ensure that no new substance is manufactured in or imported into Canada on a commercial scale before an assessment has been done to determine the potential risk of the substance to the environment or human health, as required by the Canadian Environmental Protection Act (CEPA). Under the new regulations, industry will submit the required information, which will be assessed by Environment Canada and the Department of Health to determine potential effects on the environment or human health.

With respect to air pollution, no serious study has yet been made on the atmospheric deposit of toxic substances into the Saint Lawrence. That is why Vision 2000 will make it a priority to determine the proportion of airborne chemical contamination for 18 organic substances and seven metallic substances.

TRANSPORT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Terry Stratton on May 10, 1994)

The Canadian Forces' equipment requirement is one of the many issues being examined during the course of the current review of defence policy. Our defence policy will be right for Canada in the 1990s and into the next century.

The Sea Kings will remain airworthy and continue to provide search and rescue services at sea as well as to support UN and other contingency operations as required, up to the year 2000. Until the outcome of the defence policy review is known, decisions on additional major defence equipment acquisitions are on hold.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

GRANTS TO PROJECT IN NEW BRUNSWICK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Erminie J. Cohen on May 12, 1994)

The Minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has the ultimate authority to approve project funding. In the past, the ACOA Advisory Board has been asked by the Minister to provide advice on projects over $1 million in eligible costs. The projects announced in April and the first week of May did not exceed $1 million in eligible costs.

Minister Dingwall has reviewed the role of the ACOA Board, as part of the government-wide review of the size and relevance of all federal and advisory agencies, boards and commissions and an announcement is forthcoming on its future role and responsibilities.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps I might ask the Acting Deputy Leader of the Government if we can expect all outstanding delayed answers before the anticipated summer break?

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Senate): We will do our best.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The session only goes back three months. Since you have no legislation, you could at least give us some answers.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1994

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Olson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart, for the second reading of Bill C-17, an Act to amend certain statutes to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 22, 1994.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the sponsor of Bill C-17 delivered a better budget speech than the Minister of Finance. Fortunately for Canadians, no one believes either speech. It is my hope that the next time Senator Olson introduces a bill, he will prepare his own introduction. It might be a bit longer, a bit more windy, but it will at least contain a few facts and a bit of information on the bill. The speech yesterday certainly did not.

It is interesting to read the remarks of the cabinet ministers who spoke on Bill C-17 in the other place. They carefully avoided the contents of Bill C-17. It is very obvious that the Grits are ashamed of Bill C-17, and well they should be.

The President of the Treasury Board spent his time trying to justify the government's treatment of public servants. How quickly attitudes change, and how quickly Grits break their promises. During the election campaign, the Grits, with the cooperation of Mr. Bean, successfully convinced the public service that any restraint placed on the public service by the previous government would be removed. The Red Book committed the Liberal Party to collective bargaining. In fact, the Grit organizers in the Ottawa area organized a street dance for the public service on election night.

Shortly after assuming office, this government introduced a wage freeze that will be in effect for six years. To show further respect for public servants, the Grits eliminated the pay increments. This is supposed to put everyone in the same boat for the next two years. Honourable senators, that boat is already leaking, and it may not be afloat in two years' time. Presumably when Bill C-17 receives Royal Assent, the Grit organizers will again organize a street dance for the public service. I am really looking forward to seeing Mr. Daryl Bean and Sheila Copps trip the light fantastic on one of our downtown streets to celebrate the passing of Bill C-17.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: She will resign, though. She said she would resign if the GST fails.

Senator Phillips: We only have a few more months before she resigns. That is one consolation.

The CBC is being allowed to borrow $25 million annually. The sponsor of the bill said this was for wise investments. Does anyone really believe that there is a senior executive in the CBC capable of making a wise investment? This organization, which complains it is always short of funds, recently organized a dinner in Toronto. They flew in individuals from all over the world to have dinner and an evening in Toronto at taxpayers' expense.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: A wise decision.

Senator Phillips: I rather expect the $25 million will be used to pay for extended vacations and bonuses for senior employees.

Those who in the past have raked millions from the CBC are already lining up to claim their share of the $25 million. Of course the first in line are the McKenna brothers, followed very closely by Pierre Berton.

I ask, honourable senators, what control will Parliament have over the expenditure of this $25 million? It will be an expenditure; it will not be an investment. After a few years, we will find out that the CBC has a huge deficit.

• (1520)

Then the question arises: Who pays the interest on the deficit? That is really a needless question. We all know the answer: It will be the taxpayers because the interest will be put into the CBC operating budget.

The Minister of Finance, in his brief, mentioned new unemployment insurance changes and the removal of the premiums; premiums which the Minister of Finance increased in January of this year and now plans to remove in May 1995, and then he states that this removal will create 40,000 jobs.

I will give an example of a firm employing 100 employees which would save $30,000. This would give them $30,000 to hire a new employee. However, he neglected to point out that the federal government will take a share of that $30,000 saving, and so will the province. The firm will be lucky if they end up with a saving of $20,000.

In Atlantic Canada, in our small towns and villages, we consider anyone employing ten people to be a major source of employment in that village. Ten employees would give a reduction of $3,000. After the federal and provincial governments have dipped into that amount, the individual will have approximately $2,000 left. The number of new jobs created by this measure will not overburden the CEIC.

I ask, how many jobs would this measure create in Charlottetown, Chatham, Truro, or Come-By-Chance, Newfoundland? My prediction, honourable senators, is zero. In speaking on the inquiry respecting the budget, I asked: Why not remove the increased premiums now and create the 40,000 jobs when they are really needed? Yesterday, Senator Cohen, in her excellent remarks, asked a similar question. The answer is obvious, honourable senators. The Minister of Finance does not believe his own propaganda.

In my remarks on the budget, I stated that the purpose of the increased number of weeks required to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits was in order to eliminate many people, especially those in Atlantic Canada, from the unemployment insurance rolls.

Recently, the finance department issued figures on the first three months of 1994 on the unemployment insurance fund. In the first three months of this year, payments from the fund decreased by ten per cent. More money was paid into the unemployment insurance fund than was paid out to recipients. There was an $800-million surplus in three months. Yet Bill C-17 removes $5.5 billion from the unemployed. Surely someone over there must have a conscience. Stats Canada reports that the number of recipients of unemployment insurance benefits has decreased by 11.2 per cent, yet unemployment remains at the same level.

London, Ontario had a drop of 28 per cent in its recipients. Toronto, Montreal, St. John's, Newfoundland, all the cities surveyed by Stats Canada had a drop of 13 per cent. Canada had 1.6 million people unemployed during this period. Those receiving benefits dropped from 70 per cent to 58 per cent of the 1.6 million unemployed.

The reasons for fewer unemployed people receiving benefits were listed as increasing long-term unemployment, which means that more unemployed persons have exhausted their benefits. The number of those not eligible for benefits increased. This was particularly evident among the young people aged 18 to 24 years.

The budget inflicted a longer qualifying period for this group and other groups. As a further insult, the benefit was reduced from 35 weeks to possibly as low as 26 weeks. Small wonder, honourable senators, that the Grits are so reluctant, so unwilling to discuss the contents of Bill C-17.

In my closing remarks on the budget inquiry, I ask the Liberal members of the House of Commons and the Grit senators from Atlantic Canada to speak out against this severe blow to the Atlantic region. They are still silent, as Senator Cohen reminded us yesterday. The only hope these people have is to turn to welfare. The Minister of Finance and his Grit colleagues did not forget to block this avenue of hope. The Canada Assistance Plan has been frozen, which will ensure further hardship to those hard hit by the proposals in Bill C-17.

When this bill is referred to the Senate committee, I hope members of that committee and, indeed, the entire Senate will think twice about the unfair treatment meted out to Atlantic Canada. Eight per cent of the population assumed a quarter of the cut-backs in Bill C-17; $630 million out of the Atlantic economy this year is a severe blow to our fragile economy.

As a member of this chamber for a number of years, I have listened to Liberal colleagues say they would not abandon the unemployed, the weak, the aged, and those on welfare. I ask honourable senators, where are those people today? We have not heard from one of them. Can someone from that side not rise and advocate fair treatment for Atlantic Canada? Where are my honourable friends Senator Bonnell, Senator Thériault, Senator Corbin? You were eloquent on this subject a few years ago and I am sure you could be today, Senator Thériault. Will you not rise and take part in the debate, and urge the others to do the same?

Honourable senators, in closing, I ask you to give this bill not only second thought, but give it third thought, fourth thought, and ask your colleagues on the other side to join you in condemning Bill C-17.

I would point out to honourable senators that I think I finished within my allotted 15 minutes, which is unusual, I admit.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Olson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

INCOME TAX ACT
INCOME TAX APPLICATION RULES
CANADA PENSION PLAN
CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT
EXCISE TAX ACT
UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Hon. L. Norbert Thériault moved the second reading of Bill C-27, to amend the Income Tax Act, the Income Tax Application Rules, the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Business Corporations Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related Acts.

He said: Honourable senators, let me say at the outset that Bill C-27 does not deal with one specific issue or topic. Rather, it is legislation that brings together a number of unrelated measures, most of them technical in nature, under the umbrella of this bill in order for them to be passed into law.

In essence, Bill C-27 is a piece of parliamentary housekeeping, which is not in the least contentious, and it therefore warrants speedy and unchallenged passage. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues opposite to treat this bill in a fair-minded way because most of the components of Bill C-27 are holdovers from when the previous government was in office.

Essentially, Bill C-27 fine-tunes the Income Tax Act. It proposes a number of mostly technical amendments to the Income Tax Act which, as I just indicated, were left over from the previous government.

There is one item that was not part of the earlier package of changes. The draft legislation relating to scientific research and experimental development, or SR&ED, expenditures was announced by the Minister of Finance in the February 1994 budget.

The other measures were part of a package of technical amendments to the Income Tax Act which were released in August 1993 but never introduced in the House. They never got past the draft legislation stage because the 1993 election intervened. However, the Minister of Finance announced last December that we would proceed with this legislation. The proposed tax changes in Bill C-27 are changes that would be routinely made regardless of the government of the day.

Naturally, a tax system like Canada's needs to be technically refined on an ongoing basis in order to keep up with changes going on in the world. For a growing, competitive economy, our tax system must operate as smoothly as possible — and it must be responsive to the changing needs of Canadians and governments.

Public consultation — a priority of our government — often has a direct impact on changes to the tax system. Amendments are usually released in draft form first in order to stimulate public discussion. Changes are made based on the feedback received from the public.

The amendments before us today were no different. Many were revised after being put out into the public domain as a result of public feedback. Many changes to our tax system take effect the same day they are announced, as happens with so many budget measures. This occurs particularly with measures that relieve a certain situation, or modify an irregularity in existing tax law. So it is with Bill C-27.

I urge my honourable colleagues to remember that several of the changes have been in effect ever since they were announced, and it would be inappropriate and unfair not to enact them permanently into law. Honourable senators, most of these provisions are technical in nature, and Canadians have already adjusted to their being in effect.

I should also like to emphasize that none of these provisions are designed to generate new revenues, although a few will protect revenues generated by previous measures.

Honourable senators, having outlined, by way of these introductory remarks, the reasons why this bill should be passed quickly, let me turn now to the specific measures contained in Bill C-27.

Bill C-27 has both some relieving and some modifying tax measures. To begin with, many of the amendments relate to retirement income plans, and I include in this RRSPs and certain pension plans. For example, Bill C-27 ensures that the taxpayer's RRSP limit reflects in a fairer way the taxpayer's retirement savings under certain types of unregistered pension plans, such as foreign pension plans. Also, the list of qualified investments for RRSPs and RIFFs, or register retirement income funds, and deferred profit sharing plans is expanded under Bill C-27, as is the tax exemption for RRSPs and RIFFs on business income from qualified investments.

Bill C-27 also modifies the rules for RRSPs on death. It used to be that the date of death determined the ability of a deceased person's legal representative to pay an RRSP premium for the benefit of a surviving spouse. This payment can now be made up to 60 days after the end of the year of death.

Honourable senators, Bill C-27 simplifies the existing rules with respect to the income tax treatment of automobile operating cost benefits. There is now a formula for determining the operating expense benefits for employees with automobiles provided by employers.

Bill C-27 also clarifies the rules governing the acquisition of the depreciable property where consideration for the property includes a trade-in. The cost attributed to the trade-in cannot be higher than the fair market value of that property.

Many of the amendments in Bill C-27 provide various forms of tax relief warranted by specific situations. One, for example, which changes the nonresident withholding tax rules on securities lending arrangements, will help maintain the liquidity of Canadian securities markets. It will also improve the ability of our own securities dealers and financial institutions to take part in such transactions from Canada. Honourable senators, what Bill C-27 does is exempt certain interest payments made under short-term securities lending arrangements from nonresident withholding tax.

Bill C-27 also deals with the loss of source of income. The interest on money borrowed to earn business or certain types of investment income, in cases where the property financed by the borrowing has either been sold at a loss or become valueless, is now deductible.

As well, the residence rule for individuals or companies moving into or out of Canada are improved through this bill. It used to be that a Canadian company operating elsewhere could never again be considered a "Canadian corporation" for tax purposes, even if it moved back to Canada. Bill C-27 rectifies the situation. Its overall effect is that Canada will now recognize only income or losses earned in Canada, or attributable to the time that the taxpayer resided here.

Another measure in Bill C-27 eliminates a tax avoidance technique — commonly called a "cross-border purchase butterfly" — which is used by Canadian corporations with non-resident shareholders to avoid paying tax when their assets are sold. This technique converts a corporate distribution normally subject to a withholding tax into a capital gain, which is often sheltered from Canadian tax by a treaty exemption. It is not the government's intention to allow our tax laws to be used to provide special breaks for structuring corporate asset sales in this way.

Next, since the end of 1992, life insurance companies have been paying a special capital tax designed to ensure that they pay their fair share of taxes. Bill C-27 enshrines this provision in law. I might add that this measure was designed in consultation with the life insurance industry.

Finally, for income tax purposes, calcium chloride and diamonds will now be treated as minerals, thereby providing those producers with access to income tax incentives for mining.

Honourable senators, another item included in Bill C-27 is draft legislation requiring companies to identify their scientific research and experimental development expenditures as such on their tax returns in order to qualify for the investment tax credit. This is the one item in Bill C-27 that stems from the February 1994 budget. The reason it is included here is that it needs and deserves to be passed expeditiously.

The SR&ED incentives were originally designed to encourage new research and development; not to be used by companies who wanted to have their past tax calculations adjusted. The number of requests to adjust SR&ED claims for previous tax years has increased significantly in the last four years. This amendment rectifies this problem by requiring companies that want to claim these incentives to identify their SR&ED expenses as such within a reasonable time. In addition, there is a special transitional rule for expenses incurred in a taxation year ending before the February budget. I am told that the reasonable time is one year.

In these few minutes, I have provided my honourable colleagues with a summary of Bill C-27. I have also provided some reasons why this bill should be passed quickly, and unchallenged. Honourable senators, there is nothing contentious in this bill, and I hope that my colleagues from the other side will agree to proceed with it immediately.

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, I am pleased to respond to this bill. This bill, like so many bills we have seen of late, has its origin with the former government. It is technical in nature and its purpose is to correct and clarify income tax law.

I am advised that these bills are before us on a routine and yearly basis. Most of the provisions of Bill C-27 were tabled in draft form by the Honourable Gilles Loiselle in August 1993 and by the Honourable Don Mazankowski in December 1992. Indeed, the only part of this bill with any connection to the current government is the new rule that imposes a deadline for investment tax credit claims.

In some cases, such as employee car benefits, there will be simpler tax rules. In other cases, Bill C-27 closes loopholes. An example of this mentioned by Senator Thériault is the technique called the "cross-border butterfly." These butterflies are used by companies with nonresident shareholders to convert taxable income into nontaxable capital gains.

Many tax measures are made more flexible by this bill, an example being those for eligible RRSP investments. In total, this bill makes technical changes to no less than 138 clauses of the Income Tax Act.

Honourable senators, aside from the deadline for claiming investment tax credits, income tax measures from the recent budget are not part of this bill, but will be part of a separate bill. Having acknowledged that, I would just make a brief comment on the tax changes announced in the February budget.

Taxes in this country are at the limit. Until Mr. Martin's budget there had been no tax increases since 1991, and, indeed, the February 1992 budget even cut taxes. It appears, however, that this government does not think that taxes are at the limit. The February 1994 budget hikes taxes by $3.4 billion over three years.

We have heard the Minister of Finance say that there will be another round of spending cuts. I would like to hear him say that there will not be another round of tax hikes.

During the campaign Mr. Martin stated "I am saying this country cannot afford any new taxes." That quote was in the Financial Post of September 30, 1993. It would be nice to hear him repeat those remarks as minister.

In the Red Book was a promise that the House of Commons Finance Committee would look at ways to make the tax system fairer. There was not one word in the Red Book about cuts in investment tax credits, about higher taxes for senior citizens, about higher taxes for workers on their company life insurance plan, or about the elimination of the capital gains exception.

It now appears that the government's solution to the GST will be to bury it in the price — GST under another name, hidden and presented to the taxpayer wrapped in a big Liberal red bow! Obviously, a hidden tax will make it easier for the Liberal government to increase the tax rate.

Honourable senators, imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. Much of what we have seen from the Liberal government to date simply carried forward the Progressive Conservative agenda. Sometimes, as in the case of NAFTA, they have simply seen the light and abandoned their campaign promises.

Four out of every five measures in the Throne Speech were taken from the agenda of the previous government. Sometimes they borrowed from our agenda outright. In other cases, they just changed the wrapping.

Just a handful of examples includes: Lobbyists legislation, parliamentary reform, the information highway, training for small business managers, cutting interprovincial trade barriers, expanding Pacific Rim trade, literacy, environmental assessment, self-government and reducing duplication and overlapping.

In the case of so-called new legislation, most of the bills we have seen so far have had their origins in the PC government, and some of those bills are direct copies of our legislation. These include: Bill C-6, which is our former Bill C-35, dealing with the power of the government to make regulations for the offshore; Bill C-7, which is our former Bill C-85, dealing with designer drugs; Bill C-9, which made law tax changes from the December 1992 Economic Statement and the April 1993 budget, was introduced in the last Parliament as Bill C-136.

Some of those bills reflect decisions we took but for which legislation had not been introduced. These include Bill C-2, the reorganization of Revenue Canada; Bill C-8, the protection of coastal fisheries; Bill C-13, GST improvements; Bill C-15, the reorganization of the income tax statute; Bill C-16, Indian lands claims settlements; Bill C-26, new acquisition rules for the National Library; and Bill C-27, this bill, which makes technical changes to tax law.

Honourable senators, for the reasons outlined above, and because I supported these measures previously, I support them now and I recommend passage of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Thériault bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Phillips, calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 22, 1994.

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I would have liked this speech to be my first but legislative circumstances led me to deliver an earlier speech on Bill C-13. I must tell you that I do not regret the speech I made about a month ago.

Honourable senators, since the dawn of Confederation, several generations of new senators, men and women from all backgrounds and regions of Canada, have come to this forum to express their convictions and their hopes and to explain their conception of the public good.

However, there is a voice which has rarely been heard here: It is the voice of our young people, of those who tomorrow will lead Canada's destiny and who will soon want to fulfil their potential in the society our generation is now defining. In 1991, Canadians under 18 years of age accounted for 25 per cent of the population, or more than 6,800,000 people.

I think it is all the more urgent and important that we look at our young people's situation since those who have been elected to pave their way and who are responsible for ensuring their welfare and increasing their chances of success in the future, that is, the members of the current parliamentary majority, seem unable or unwilling to tackle this problem.

Like many other Canadians, I fail to understand why, for example, the government did not even see fit, in the budget statement before us today or in the Throne Speech, to announce how it intends to participate in the International Year of the Family.

The objectives of this international year are as follows:

> To underline the importance of the family, to promote awareness of its functions and the problems it encounters ... and to focus attention on the rights and responsibilities of each member of the family.

It is hard to believe that these very modest objectives are beyond the government's capacities.

A little over three years ago, Canada's role in and Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's personal commitment to child welfare were recognized by the international community and by the United Nations in particular. The UN made Canada co-chair of the Summit on Children held at the UN headquarters in October 1990.

The 71 national leaders who participated in this summit ratified a declaration based on 10 great principles covering various areas, such as the supply of drinking water, birth control and the implementation of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

An action plan was also approved, stating specific objectives, as well as a series of measures to improve the plight of children throughout the world, including the control of diseases affecting children and fighting malnutrition, as well as the causes of infant mortality.

Canada signed this UN convention in December 1991 and, by the end of August 1993, 146 member countries had followed its example. This may be the kind of leadership that Canada deserves.

In May 1992, the Canadian government of the day implemented a $2.6 billion program called "Brighter Futures" to help the more than one million Canadian children exposed to poverty, unsanitary conditions, negligence and violence. In order to harmonize the tax measures designed to help low-income families with children, the Conservative government grouped these measures in a single program and increased family benefits by $400 million annually, or more than $2.1 billion over five years. As you all know, 82 per cent of these families are female single-parent families with one or several children.

In June 1993, the former Conservative government also passed Bill C-126, to improve protection for women and children against physical violence, sexual abuse and harassment. In November 1992, that government announced the creation of five research centres on family violence, and in August 1991 it set up the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women.

In February 1991, the government approved the implementation, over a four-year period, of specific measures to fight violence against women, with a budget of $136 million. During its first mandate, the former government also launched a special program against family violence, allocating $40 million for that purpose, including $22 million for housing only.

After hearing this list of decisions, which were often made in difficult financial circumstances by the former government, what is the new government waiting for to announce how it intends to support UN efforts regarding children and families? When will it tell us what it intends to do to help Canadian families in difficulty?

I do not deny that, lately, this government has made a few announcements, but in the absence of any significant action by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Health, or the Minister of Human Resources Development regarding the International Year of the Family, or the problems confronting Canadian children, we can only conclude that this government has not yet developed any coherent family policy. Even the Red Book, which contains the Liberal election promises and which the Prime Minister kept quoting all the time, does not offer much specific information of interest to young Canadians.

Mention was made of a Youth Service Corps on which the government would spend $100 million per year. However, the details of this program were so vague that one had to wonder if this was nothing but a veiled attempt to resurrect the Katimavik program, the cancellation of which caused so much grief to one of our colleagues.

Here is what the Red Book had to say about this program:

> ...the corps will give our young people a renewed sense of hope through the opportunity to engage in social and environmental services in their own communities and across the country.

It goes on to say that this program

> ...will offer Canadians under 25 a wide range of experiences that support personal growth, education and career development, community involvement, intergenerational cooperation and practical environmental awareness.

In the January 16 Throne Speech, this program was suddenly touted as a means to create employment for young people, since the government claimed that it would, and I quote:

> ...create a Youth Service Corps to begin putting young Canadians back to work.

However, in the February 22 budget, the literary flourishes are very much in evidence once again. The Minister of Finance stated that this program was launched, and I quote:

> ...to give young Canadians meaningful work experience and to develop their personal skills.

Last April 15, the Minister of Human Resources attempted to put a concrete spin on these nebulous commitments by announcing with a flourish a series of timid measures to occupy the time of several thousand young people. In truth, he was unable to present to our youth and to those concerned about their future a comprehensive, coherent strategy.

Moreover, as was noted in a recent edition of The Globe and Mail, 70 per cent of the sums promised by the minister, the source of which still remains a mystery, will not be spent on job creation, but for the most part, on post-secondary education.

Will this program have an effect on youth unemployment? Young Canadians are the hardest hit by this problem.

Furthermore, the program does not take into account two important facts: first, youth unemployment in visible minority groups and the various native communities is higher than the national average, and second, the unemployment rate is particularly high among young people in Atlantic Canada and Central Canada.

Impatient to give the impression it was fulfilling its election promises, the government acted so hastily and haphazardly that it only managed to alarm the very people who should have been its partners in this endeavour but ended up not even being consulted.

The Government of Quebec for one, was so outraged by the offhanded attitude of the minister that it decided against attending a social affairs ministers' meeting. Apparently, this member of the Chrétien cabinet did not realize he was infringing upon the exclusive provincial jurisdiction over education.

Other provinces have also expressed serious concerns about the minister's intentions and policies. As we know, in the end, this federal-provincial conference, one of the very few initiated by this government, had to be postponed indefinitely.

The last thing our children — these 6,800,000 Canadians, or 25 per cent of our total population, who may unfortunately be considered less important because they do not have the right to vote yet — need right now is to bear the brunt of a constitutional squabble between Ottawa and the provinces, something they do not understand anyway. This is nonetheless the absurd situation in which Jean Chrétien's Liberal government has put itself a mere seven months into its mandate. The same minister is supposed to conduct the social programs reform. That is promising!

This minister went to show off in a high school by announcing his generous gifts, but came home contrite, having even been rebuffed by youth associations in Quebec. With his intransigence and arrogance, the minister has already compromised any possibility of agreement with Quebec on the key issue of manpower training. He has just shown, beyond any doubt, that he lacks the sensitivity and vision needed to reach agreement with the provinces. Needless to say, in the present political environment in Quebec, the minister's attitude could have serious consequences for the future of the whole country.

If he had searched through his records, the same minister could have used the agreement in principle reached in August 1993 between the previous Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec.

However, like the restoration Bourbons, the federal Liberals returned from opposition, having learned nothing and forgotten everything.

What's bred in the bone will come out in the flesh.

Quebecers have already passed a harsh judgment on this blind centralizing form of federalism that destroys ambition. What they rejected in 1984 is no more acceptable ten years later, and Mr. Chrétien's government is setting all Canadians up for some heavy going if it does not change course as soon as possible. Even though it today announces some very timid and ill-considered initiatives to prepare young people for the labour market, we cannot overlook the fact that Liberal governments imposed a cruel and unfair burden on our youth: our debt which is growing exponentially, like a monster feeding on its young. Greek mythology even gave a name to this monster, the Titan Kronos.

Generation X must today lower its expectations and live with the anxiety of not being able to achieve its ambitions because, for nearly 20 years, governments led by former Prime Minister Trudeau managed the nation's finances carelessly and irresponsibly. This Prime Minister is in fact the one who begot the monster, like Uranus who fathered the famous Titan Kronos.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I must advise Senator Nolin that his time has expired. He needs permission from the Senate to continue. Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Nolin: Thank you, honourable senators. The best is still to come!

Before 1984, for every dollar of tax revenues it collected, the government of the day spent $1.23 on programs. For 15 years, program spending in Ottawa increased at a rate of 14 per cent per year. When the Liberals left office in 1984, 32 cents of every dollar in revenues went to service the debt — one of the worst records in the industrialized world.

Speaking of "worst," let me draw our attention to the most recent study by the Fraser Institute on the indebtedness of countries. The Globe and Mail stated in its May 12 edition that Canada is a Third World debtor. That is frightening. Yet when the Progressive Conservative government set out to restore the fiscal sanity of our public finances, the Liberal opposition tried to block its efforts at every turn. However, in eight very short years, by reducing program spending to an annual average of 4 per cent and initiating a series of strong spending control initiatives, the former government managed to bring down the deficit as a percentage of the gross domestic product by more than 40 per cent.

[Translation]

In June 1993, almost at the end of this short eight-year period, for each dollar of revenue, 97 cents went for purposes other than the service of the debt.

[English]

Recently, a respected columnist, John Geddes, from The Financial Post, passed a rather pessimistic judgment on the government's stated resolve to cut spending and to tackle the problem of our national debt. He wrote that:

> So far, the message is disjointed. The government has announced a bewildering array of program reviews, some clearly aimed at saving money, others with no clear spending targets. Neither Finance Minister Martin nor Prime Minister Jean Chrétien has been able to knit the strands into a single compelling vision. Any attempt to bring the picture into focus must start with Human Resources Minister Axworthy.

That, it is now obvious, is by no means reassuring.

[Translation]

We cannot accept that our young people should pay for past thoughtlessness and the present confusion of the Liberals. Belatedly and timidly the Liberals recognize that the deficit and the debt are a major problem, but they seem incapable of taking the strong measures required. Yet, the Minister of Finance seemed to be on the right track when he called his provincial counterparts to a meeting last December. Were we going to see the implementation of a concerted national program to fight the Titan Kronos?

I would like to remind you that the Honourable Jean Charest defended this approach during his bid for the leadership of our party last spring. After the budget of February 22, and especially after hearing the chorus of provincial finance ministers, I lost the illusions I had in December.

Today, 1.7 million young Quebecers 17 and under, who have never had the opportunity to elect a government, have to assume individually the equivalent of a $25,000 debt. For the 6.8 million underage and non-voting Canadians, this debt amounts to an average of $23,000. The growing monster keeps on devouring its offspring. For Quebec children like mine — I have three — the debt totals $41 billion and, for this whole generation of young Canadians, it amounts to over $170 billion.

Have you ever tried to explain to your young children what one billion is, or what it means to have a $20,000 debt? I have. You would be surprised to hear what kind of response you get when you try to explain such a situation. The least these young people could have expected from a new government was that it did not get bogged down in sterile and costly confrontations with the provinces.

While the government is messing up, the situation of children and young people in Canada and abroad is worsening. According to Statistics Canada, children from low-income families will remain one of the most economically disadvantaged groups in Canadian society. Potential long-term problems are obvious.

These children will not have the opportunity to fulfil their potential to the same extent as other children, will not be as healthy or educated, and therefore will not use their full potential for the good of society. It is noted that children are more likely than other Canadians to live in low-income households.

According to a UNICEF report published in September 1993, for example, the number of school drop-outs and adolescent suicides is up. It has also been demonstrated that, in the last 20 years, parents have been spending less and less time with their children. The increase in the divorce rate and in the number of children abandoned will influence the futures of more and more young people.

In Canada, the child poverty rate has risen by two per cent between 1980 and 1990. In 1992, over 1,260,000 children under 18 lived in low-income families. Much of the problem lies with the inadequate support they receive from all levels of government. Real income from government programs for children has gone down. Financial support per child fell from $913 in 1978 to $751 in 1989.

As UNICEF and the World Health Organization have stated time and time again, many of the problems among the worst ones facing young people around the world can be resolved. These past few years, Canada has resolutely and positively contributed to such initiatives. The government is under a moral obligation to support and sustain these efforts.

I wish to congratulate the current Minister of Justice on his statement about a national child molesters registry. I make this comment in spite of the partisan overtone of his remarks.

The Minister of Human Resources Development is currently reviewing all Canadian social programs, including those dealing with the well-being of our children, my children! The details of the proposed reforms have not yet been submitted to the Cabinet.

Recent remarks by the Minister of Human Resources Development certainly do not prompt us to trust him blindly.

Honourable senators, I have delivered a speech that I consider somewhat partisan. I am not about to go back on everything I said about the efforts and achievements of the previous government. After writing this speech and reading it over — I have been waiting for a few days to give it, thus giving me time to ponder over it — I got the impression that we go nowhere with partisan speeches.

I discussed this matter with our colleague Senator Thériault.

Senator Thériault: You have my undivided attention now.

Senator Nolin: I am pleased to hear it.

To my mind, I am not merely making partisan speeches or trying to highlight certain illogical decisions made by certain governments, regardless of who they may be. That would not be very productive.

In my presentation, I spoke about the financial matters which affect the financial legacy that we will leave to our children. However, there is an even more serious problem threatening our Canadian society. What kind of future and what kind of country will we be passing on to the next generation, which still cannot express itself democratically?

Setting aside partisanship, we have to recognize that we are in the throes of a major conflict. However, having admitted this, we must not come to the conclusion that the outcome will be negative. I believe that we must maintain a positive frame of mind. The mere fact that a conflict does exist shows that our goals and needs have evolved. This conflict is not new, it is merely a latent conflict.

Since the last election, from seeing the performance of the Leader of the Official Opposition in the House of Commons, I fear that this conflict, which I try to see as healthy and leading to a promising future for our country, will degenerate. I am telling you all this because I feel that our house has a role to play in solving the conflict. I will add the following proviso. If we continue to act in a more or less partisan way every sitting day, we cannot claim to play a serious role in solving this conflict.

I have been here for almost a year now, and except for the first six months when I was involved in considerably more partisan activities, I have trouble seeing how the Senate can participate with all the required credibility in solving such a serious problem. I think that too much partisanship in the Senate hurts this credibility. That is what I discovered on coming here. We are sort of in a culture of shame. Why should I be ashamed of being a senator, a senator appointed by my government? The trouble is, our attitude seems to reflect a willingness to accept this situation, and I think this is something that must be changed.

In concluding, I have two brief questions. Can the Senate play a role in resolving this conflict? I think it can, but it will require a different approach. I think we will have to be more creative, more stimulating and more original in the way we look at how we should serve Canadians.

Does it make sense to use our independence to serve Canadians? Again, the answer is yes, it does. I raised these questions, although I think it is clear where my loyalties lie. I have always been partisan, and I think I always will be.

When I arrived in the Senate almost a year ago, after examining the proceedings and reading about the role of this institution, I felt — and I had a discussion about this with Senator Thériault — maybe I was somewhat naive, that because this institution was not accountable to the voters, as we do not need to be elected — we can make the decisions we believe are right, in the interests of Canadians. We can set aside our political or partisan affiliations without having to go to the people to ask for their approval.

This independence, if we use it wisely, may be crucial to resolving the conflict facing Canada today.

I have discussed this with several colleagues. Others who will read or hear this appeal and who, like me, are interested in finding ways to take part in resolving this conflict — well, you have my telephone number! I will always be available, less partisan and with a greater respect for the future of our country.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, debate adjourned.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Andreychuk, calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing a standing Senate committee on human rights. — (Honourable Senator Hébert)

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, on this matter, I spoke to Senator Hébert, who took the adjournment of this debate, and asked him if I could speak to it. He indicated that if I spoke to him before I did so, I could. He is not here today, but I wish to speak now to this matter.

Honourable senators, I rise today to address two matters which I think are inter-related. First, I wish to speak in support of Senator Andreychuk's notice of inquiry of February 10, 1994, calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing a standing Senate committee on human rights. Second, I wish to offer my thoughts on a restructuring of the standing committee system so that it may accomplish more effectively and efficiently the tasks given to it by this chamber.

The protection of human rights, the study of human rights, and the protection and promotion of minority interests is a natural field of endeavour for this chamber. The Senate was designed to protect regional or sectoral interests in its distribution of seats, both among the provinces and particularly, as they are designated, in Quebec. The property qualification and method of selection of senators were also aimed at protecting minority interests.

The Senate was established to protect against abuse by the popular majority as demonstrated in the House of Commons. It is therefore a logical extension of this role that the Senate concentrate on human rights issues which deal primarily with equality of opportunity, discrimination and racism practised at the hands of the majority against the minority in society.

This country was founded on the rule of law and the Christian ethic of dignity of the individual. We as Canadians inherited a long line of statutes which proclaim the rights of the minority or rights of the people against the oppressor. The Magna Carta of 1215, The British Bill of Rights of 1689, the Quebec Act of 1774, the Constitution Act, 1867, and the Constitution Act, 1982 all declare the rights of various individuals and groups of individuals which are to be held inviolate.

The preamble to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms proclaims Canada as founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law. This confirms and acknowledges a way of life in Canada which upholds the rights of minorities and the due process of law. Therefore the placing of the security of human rights within the Senate is consistent with the continuation of the original objectives proposed by the Fathers of Confederation in 1867 when the Senate was created by British statute.

The modern origins of the idea that the Senate should have a human rights committee came with the Report of the Lamontagne-Goldenberg committee in November 1980. In its "Report on Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution," this subcommittee of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee of the Senate listed a number of functions for the new Senate which it proposed. Two of those functions were a "representation of minorities function" and "the human rights function."

The former dealt with protection of minorities and, in particular, linguistic minorities, while the latter stressed the novelty of the subject of human rights and that this subject will be of increasing importance whether or not a revised constitution includes an entrenched charter of rights. This section of the report concluded with the statement that the Senate should have a specified procedure for dealing efficiently with these two issues.

In an article entitled "Senate Reform" written in 1987, the late senator and constitutional authority Eugene Forsey commented favourably on the Lamontagne report's recommendation regarding the Senate and human rights. He stated:

> The new Standing Committee on Human Rights might be of special importance if the House of Commons passed a bill curtailing those rights, by virtue of section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the "notwithstanding" section, which enables Parliament to override, for a renewable period of five years, section 2 (fundamental freedoms) and 7 to 15 (legal rights and equality rights) of the Charter.

I agree with Senator Forsey, and I believe the time is right for the Senate to act in this regard. Human rights are under seige, both internationally and within our own borders. While the multicultural genocide being practised in many areas of the world, in places such as Yugoslavia and Tibet, is well known, we also have problems within Canada.

Until very recently, the concept of multiculturalism was accepted as one of the cornerstones of Canadian life. The only questions were the speed of delivery or the type of support that various cultural groups would receive. Now the whole issue as to whether Canada should become a melting pot like the United States is before us.

I am deeply concerned by this movement. My Canada is a Canada which former Justice Thomas Berger describes in his book Fragile Freedoms as being a country where:

> The constitution has always recognized we are a plural, not a monolithic nation. This is one of the first Canadian traditions. Refugees from every race, people of all faiths, and persons seeking political asylum have all found their place in Canadian life. It is our good fortune not to be of one common descent, not to speak one language only. We are not cursed with a triumphant ideology; we are not given to mindless patriotism.

In Alberta, the government is considering disbanding the Human Rights Commission or, alternatively, relegating it to the status of a toothless tribunal. Our own Senator Ghitter appeared before the review panel in Alberta recently and pleaded passionately for the Human Rights Commission to be increased in stature and independence — not disbanded.

I believe the Senate is uniquely placed within the Canadian constitution to protect minority interests. The tenure of senators isolates them from the whims of public pressure to curtail minority rights, and at this time, this chamber contains a large number of senators who are interested in the area of human rights and have experience in defending the rights of minorities.

What would a standing Senate committee on human rights do? I believe its tasks would be divided between looking at the protection of minorities, both nationally and internationally. I submit that questions of human rights and dissent in Canada are linked to questions of human rights and dissent around the world. I would therefore urge such a committee to look beyond Canadian borders in its work.

Therefore, the mandate of such a committee could be, domestically, to review Charter court decisions to determine their effect on minority rights and recommend changes in statutes where appropriate; to review the work of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, its annual report and the proposal of legislation through the use of Senate bills to implement changes to the Canadian Human Rights Act suggested by the commission; to review the work of the Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development, giving this centre a place to report to the Parliament of Canada on its work; to undertake investigative studies into human rights abuses within Canada, and report recommendations for action to the Senate.

Internationally, the committee could study and report ways for the Government of Canada to deal with human rights abuses internationally. Such studies could reveal the nature of abuses and recommend methods by which international pressure could be brought to bear on countries where abuse is taking place. Studies of international human rights would, it is hoped, influence Canada's foreign policy, perhaps placing renewed emphasis on social and economic rights in our foreign policy.

The committee could also study whether there should be a linkage between foreign aid and human rights abuses, and review the responses made to the various United Nation's committees by the Canadian government in relation to the implementation of the numerous international human rights treaties and conventions to which Canada is a signatory.

These tasks are much too great and too important to be taken on piecemeal by an existing Senate committee. I believe that it is now time for the Senate of Canada to illustrate that, both domestically and abroad, it stands for what is right and decent in human beings, and to this end should establish a standing Senate committee on human rights.

Honourable senators, I am aware that such a recommendation becomes a catalyst for a complete review of the Senate standing committee system. We have often heard the complaint that there are too many committees, and I agree with this sentiment. When I spoke in this chamber on February 10, 1994 I suggested to the Honourable Leader of the Government opposite the establishment of a special committee to look at all issues involving Senate renewal, including restructuring the committee system. Such a committee would report before the summer recess. I still believe that this is the proper method to achieve change, but I will also add my suggestions for change to the system.

The first item of business for such a review of the Senate committee system is, I submit, to get back to basics and analyze the purpose of a Senate committee system. Once we have determined the purposes of the system, then it becomes easier to determine the deficiencies in the present system and recommend solutions.

I submit that Senate committees have the following purposes, perhaps not necessarily in this order: scrutiny of legislation through pre-study and committee hearings when the legislation is before the committee, having been passed by the House of Commons; policy influencing through investigative studies; holding the government to be fiscally accountable; and protection or advancement of regional interests.

In order to address all of these purposes, the Senate committee system should contain fewer committees, perhaps with fewer members, so that some measure of specialization among senators in particular subject areas could be achieved.

While I do not want to get mired in a discussion of which committees should be merged or amalgamated or should disappear, I have a few suggestions to make. Perhaps it would be appropriate for Fisheries to be combined with Forestry and Agriculture; National Finance with Banking; Legal and Constitutional Affairs with Aboriginal Peoples; or perhaps it would be more appropriate to refashion Legal and Constitutional Affairs into two new committees, one on Justice and Legal Affairs, and the other on Federal-Provincial and Constitutional Affairs. This is similar to a suggestion advanced some years ago by Senator Bosa.

As we all realize, these are a number of combinations of subject-matters and committees which we could discuss and which I submit should be addressed by a special committee on renewal.

The bottom line for me is that a new standing committee on human rights should emerge out of the whole process. The establishment of such a committee is consistent with the original purpose of the Senate, is consistent with Canada's policies of promoting peace, human rights, and democracy internationally and is consistent with the need for protection and advancement of minorities here at home.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, for Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

SOUTH AFRICA

FIRST DEMOCRATIC ELECTIONS—INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon Donald H. Oliver rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 10, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to his participation as a United Nations observer at last month's first democratic elections in South Africa.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise this afternoon to speak about my recent experiences as a United Nations observer in last month's general election in South Africa.

Why speak about this election? What made this election any different from hundreds of other elections held around the world each year? I will tell you what made it different. We all realize that, as long as history is written about our world and the triumph of democracy, this election in South Africa will be a major focal point. It is different because millions of black people stood for hours in lines stretched as far as the eye could see, hour after hour, with little or nothing to eat or drink, in order to have an opportunity to mark their ballots. These Africans had faith in a process which they barely understood; faith that, in the end, the will of the people — democracy — would prevail.

Their faith was rewarded — a black man, a former political prisoner is now President, leading his own black people's party.

It was also an important election from the point of view of Canadians. The end of discrimination against the black people of South Africa has been a part of our foreign policy since the days of John Diefenbaker in the 1950s. Mr. Diefenbaker, because he was from a minority group, always felt allegiance to the blacks of South Africa.

It was in the mid-1980s, when apartheid was at its zenith, that Canada's role in support of black South Africans became critical on the world stage. Who can forget former Prime Minister Brian Mulroney standing up to Margaret Thatcher and insisting that the Commonwealth stick together in imposing sanctions and a trade boycott on South Africa in order to bring down the apartheid regime.

It was of great interest for me to be in South Africa as an observer because of my long association with electoral law in Canada. I have been fortunate to be a legal advisor to my party in election law through six general elections, and for years I was an advisor to the then Chief Electoral Officer, Jean-Marc Hamel.

What I should like to do today is to speak about the United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa, about how it was organized and what it was designed to do, and to tell you a little about the real South Africa as I saw it for the first time in my life, the South Africa of the black townships, the homelands. I will give you my impressions of the election, but most of all my impressions of the black voters of South Africa. I will conclude with my thoughts on the future of South Africa: the challenge faced by President Nelson Mandela's government in its first term in office.

The United Nations Observer Mission in South Africa actually began in September of 1992 as the UN Security Council authorized Secretary-General Boutros Boutros Ghali to send a mission to help South Africa, in coordination with the National Peace Accord, to reduce the level of violence in their country and promote progress towards democracy.

Early this year, in January, the Secretary-General reported that the mandate of UNOMSA would be expanded to have two operational arms: a peace promotion division and an electoral division. The peace promotion division carried on the mandate of the UN much as before, but concentrating as well on freedom of expression and movement during the electoral campaign. The new arm of the UN, the electoral division, became responsible for ensuring, as best it could through monitoring, that the election was free and fair.

In order to do this it was given the following tasks: observing the actions of the Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) and its organs in all aspects and stages of the electoral process, verifying their compatibility with the conduct of a free and fair election under the IEC and Electoral Acts; observing the extent of freedom of organization, assembly and expression during the electoral campaign and ascertaining the adequacy of the measures taken to ensure that political parties and alliances enjoy those freedoms without hindrance or intimidation; monitoring the compliance of the security forces with requirements of the relevant laws and decisions of the Transitional Executive Council; verifying the satisfactory implementation of the dispositions of the Independent Media Commission and the Independent Broadcasting Acts; verifying that qualified voters were not denied the identification documents or temporary voter's cards that enabled them to exercise their right to vote; and so on.

The observation by the electoral division of the UN Mission of the administration and conduct of the election concentrated on several points, including the issuing of identity documents to persons entitled to vote and the preparation by the IEC for the election at its central headquarters.

Some 1,800 people observed in South Africa under this expanded mandate of the UN during the election. In addition, over 3,000 international observers were in the country and their work was coordinated by the UN; 180 of those observers were Canadians.

Approximately 21,000,000 people were eligible to vote throughout South Africa in the election. The country was divided into 374 electoral districts with 7,000 voting stations. Mr. Ron Gould, in his briefing session, told us that we should have had about 9,000 voting stations, that 7,000 were really not enough.

The electoral system in South Africa is based upon proportional representation with parties putting up a national list and local lists. Each elector in the April election cast two separate ballots, one for the national election and one for the provincial election. Of the 400 seats in Parliament, half are elected from the national list and the rest from the local.

In proportional representation jurisdictions, there is a perception — a feeling — among the people that their individual votes really count, because the more the party gets, the more members it elects, unlike our first-past-the-post system, where we vote for individual candidates and our vote seems insignificant when the winning candidate has a large plurality.

Before I get into the details of what I did, saw and felt during the three-day election period, I believe it is important that I lay out for you the South Africa that I visited. It is a country of contrasts, a country of contradictions.

It is a country of stunning physical beauty and charm and a land of great mineral resources and great wealth. However, the proceeds from the exploitation of the resources are basically only shared among whites. There is a wide, wide gulf between the wages and standard of living of white society living in South Africa's most modern cities, while blacks live in the outlying townships or homelands where there are few facilities, no paved roads, and running water. Few are educated.

South Africa has one of the highest rates of child labour in the world. There are 60,000 children between the ages of 8 and 14 working as farm labourers. There are over 2 million black pupils without school spaces while there are 307,000 empty spaces in white schools. The unemployment rate for blacks is over 50 per cent in several provinces.

The health system is characterized by the same racism as the education system. Virtually five times as much money is spent on the health care of whites as on blacks, and the discrepancies in quality of life and benefits provided as between whites and blacks just goes on and on.

After three days of security briefings in Johannesburg, I was deployed to the North West Province. That covers about five per cent of South Africa's land mass and contains approximately 1.8 million people, or 4.8 per cent of the total South African population. The mainstay of the economy in this part of South Africa is mining — gold, platinum and uranium. This mining activity represents virtually 30 per cent of the total mining production of South Africa; in other words, it is a wealthy province. The second largest industry in the North West Province is agriculture. Two of the main problems in this province are poverty and poor health care. TB is rampant.

The North West province was divided into four large areas. In total, we had 28 electoral districts, 779 voting stations and over 1.7 million potential voters. The voting procedures were slightly different than what we are used to in Canada. The polls were due to open at 7:00 a.m. and close at 7:00 p.m. There was no general list of eligible electors. An elector could vote anywhere in South Africa that they wished.

There were two election officials at the door of the voting station. Voters were requested to show voter identification documents. Once inside the centre, the voter would place both hands under the ultraviolet light scanner, and if the voter's hands did not show traces of the invisible ink used to mark a voter's hand after he or she has voted, then the voter would go to the document check table in order to have the voter identification documents inspected and approved.

Once the documents were approved, then the voter would proceed to the ink-marking table, where their fingers would be brushed with invisible ink. This procedure would then be tested to make sure that the marking had taken effect, and the voter would then go to the ballot paper issue table, receive a ballot, and then take it to the ballot booth, marking it and placing it in the ballot box.

Our job as observers, as you might guess, was to observe this whole procedure and report any incidents that could make the election either not free or unfair. We were to determine if the necessary staff were at the polling station; whether the polling stations were ready for the voters; whether the voting procedure ran smoothly; where there were delays; whether anyone was discouraged from voting, et cetera. We had been briefed. We knew what our responsibilities were, but no one could prepare us for the experience we were to undergo in the next three days of voting.

Honourable senators, communities in the North West region are remote, and the roads dirty and dusty. Few are paved. There were few road signs, inadequate maps, no electrical power and no telephones. Life is tough there. The people I met are some of the poorest people in the country.

The part of North West Province to which I was deployed consisted of 99.9 per cent blacks in the townships, but they are not poor in spirit. They make the most of the little they have. There were no washers or dryers for washing cloths; no dishwashers for dishes; no lights for reading; no power for watching TV or listening to a radio, so when it got dark at the polling stations around 5:30 or 5:45 p.m., in the absence of a portable generator that worked, you were left to candlelight. Thousands of South Africans voted in the dark, by candlelight.

Apartheid has ghettoized the black people of South Africa. They have laboured in mines for low wages and with poor working conditions, or they worked on the white-owned farms. I asked one teenage girl, lined up and getting ready to vote, what she did. She told me she was self-employed. I questioned her. She explained she worked on a white farm in the cornfields. She worked from 8:00 a.m. to 4:30, six days a week, with half an hour off for lunch! Her daily pay: 18 Rand, or $8.00. At the end of the day, the white landlord farmer gave her two ears of corn to take home.

Honourable senators, the voters moved me most of all in my South African experience. North West Province was electric with excitement and anticipation. After decades and decades of the pain of apartheid, true democracy had a chance to take over.

We — I had a partner from Bratislava — had five voting stations to observe on the first ordinary polling day. When we arrived at 6:50 a.m. on the first morning for voting in the ordinary poll, we were staggered by the interminable line of first-time black electors patiently lined up to exercise their democratic right. You could see smiles of satisfaction when they finally emerged from the voting station.

Honourable senators, Nelson Mandela assumed the status of saint — a god; a saviour —

Hon. Royce Frith: Excuse me, senator. Just so we can get the picture — which is very interesting — how were you identified? Did you wear something?

Senator Oliver: I had on a blue United Nations hat with a blue United Nations jacket. We had a car with a driver, and a United Nations flag.

Nelson Mandela assumed the status of saint — a god; a saviour; a divine being who could pull blacks out of the morass of apartheid.

In one station where I was an observer, one very elderly gentleman was standing in the polling booth almost 20 seconds after having received his ballot. Their polling stations were very much like ours. There was a little booth, and you could see people's legs underneath. You could see that this man was not moving. He was a man of about 85 years of age. Nothing was happening. It was painfully obvious that he was having a problem. He was embarrassed. He could not read or write.

Under the law for this election, the presiding officer had the right to go to such a person and ask them if they would like assistance in casting their vote. She did this. She asked him, "Would you like some assistance?" and he nodded his head "yes." The appropriate monitors or observers were then called over, and the elector was asked in their presence to express his voting preference. After a short lull, a soft, quiet little voice uttered, "Mandela, Mandela." An "X" was placed by "ANC Mandela" and the ballot paper folded and returned to the elector for deposit in the box. A broad smile of personal satisfaction covered the voter's face. It was thanksgiving for a job well and truly done.

Honourable senators, this was democracy in action. This was grassroots politics. This was politics of conviction and strength. This is what perseverance was all about. This was a graphic demonstration of the healing power of the vote. Now black Africans have a chance to be free! Now their vote is equal to the vote of the white man. Colour is no longer a factor in political power! By the positive act of voting, there seemed to come a realization that their situation was about to change.

However, in spite of this excitement, administratively and logistically, many things went wrong. Voting stations were not supposed to be more than 4 kilometres apart. That was theory. Some were more than 14! Voting did not start on time because the ballot papers had not arrived. Some of the other problems were that there was no power to run the UV machines to mark their hands and do the test; there was no seal to properly close the ballot box; there were no pencils to mark the ballots with. These problems went on and on.

In one of the security briefings we had in Klerksdorf and Rustenburg in the North West Province, we were told there was no real fear of mugging on the street or other petty crimes. But instead, because the area was rich in ore and mineral wealth, such as gold, diamond and uranium mines — all owned and white controlled — the biggest fear, particularly of the security forces, was that explosives used in mining operations might be used to attempt to sabotage the electoral process. We were warned, for instance, that white extremists might plant bombs at polling stations in the black townships to attempt to deter blacks from voting! In fact, there were such racial incidents not too far from where we were stationed. A black American journalist was badly beaten by white extremists at Rustenburg, our headquarters for United Nations Observations in the Monipole region! A bomb was found and fortunately diffused near a polling station a few kilometres from where I was! To put this in perspective geographically, Rustenburg is an historical platinum town situated approximately 130 kilometres from Johannesburg and Pretoria.

Because the United Nations has been strong in its condemnation of the National Party of President de Klerk, it was not considered to be a neutral party in these elections. Therefore, as United Nations observers, we were not to participate directly in the electoral process; we were only to observe. We had a questionnaire to complete each day to help the UN make the ultimate determination whether the elections were free and fair. My partner and I found no evidence of duress, coercion, oppression, undue influence, threats, intimidation or blatant attempts to influence the way electors voted, or to deter them from voting as they wished.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senator, I must point out that your time has expired. With leave, the honourable senator, might continue.

Senator Frith: Senator Oliver, do you wish to finish today or continue at another time?

• (1650)

Senator Oliver: Honourable senators, I believe that I can finish in five or six minutes.

That was the test as to whether it was free. The next question was: Was it fair?

How can it be said to be fair when a 90-year-old man or woman was left standing in scorching heat for 12 hours waiting for ballot boxes, ballot papers, pencils to mark with, when in several of the white areas these problems did not occur. It is not my contention that the election should be voided, but it did not strike us as being fair. It was almost as if the racism that so characterized apartheid was going to be with the black Africans right up until the close of voting.

The election was one of those remarkable events in history, when one can truly say that what is good and right in our world won out over everything else. Black people spoke through their ballots. They spoke with conviction and strength. They spoke to end a regime found to be intolerable by most of the civilized countries of the world, and they were successful: good did triumph over evil.

Now, what about the future of South Africa. It will be important for Nelson Mandela to reach out to his opponents to solidify his role and to ensure that all will come together in a common cause. He has certainly done this with the way he has formed his cabinet.

He must also make it clear to the international monetary community that he intends to be an exacting steward of the country's resources and monetary policy. Initially, he has done this by retaining Mr. Derek Keys as the finance minister. In his last two years as finance minister Mr. Keys has proved to be a tough fiscal disciplinarian. He has halted the rise in government spending and reined in the budget deficit. The other major economic post he has given to its incumbent, Mr. Chris Stals, who will stay on as Governor of the Reserve Bank, or central bank, when his term ends in July.

Perhaps even more than showing sound financial discipline, Mr. Mandela must reach out to blacks all over South Africa in order to diminish the huge expectations that they have for this administration. He must explain to them that the years of doing without and of being considered to be lesser beings have ended, but that it will take time to realize the tangible benefits.

This is a job which I submit Mr. Mandela is equal to. He realizes that not all white-run industry is necessarily bad by definition and will work with both leaders of industry and the people of South Africa to start the process which will bring about tangible benefits for all.

What are these benefits that are so desperately needed? The list is long. Housing seems to be at the top of every list, followed closely by spending on power and water and education, training, telecommunications and transportation. This will be good for South Africa and it will be good for Canada, as these are areas where our industries have expertise.

These needs cannot be denied: six million people are unemployed, nine million are without technical skills, 10 million have no access to running water, 23 million have no electricity and because of the struggle for equality virtually a whole generation of blacks are totally uneducated.

This renewal program will take years to accomplish, but it is achievable. Statements have already been made that taxes will not be raised and industries will not be nationalized. Projects will be funded either through budget reallocation or through the international bond market.

I am optimistic. Having been given this great opportunity to be recognized as equal, to end apartheid forever, black South Africans will follow the leadership they trust as they move into the twenty-first century.

Honourable senators, perhaps I may be permitted a closing personal note. It has been said by many who were in South Africa that events seemed to be directed by some form of divine intervention. Perhaps the most talked about demonstration of this theory was the work of a Kenyan professor, Washington Okumu, who helped broker the deal that brought Zulu leader Mangosuthu Buthelezi into the election in support of the process. There is a story about engine problems on a plane that allowed Professor Okumu and Mr. Buthelezi to meet one more time — the last time, when the deal for his support was sealed. Without that support, the support of the Zulu people, Mr. Mandela's road would indeed have been much more difficult than it already is.

I believe democracy has triumphed in South Africa, and it is now time for the nations of the world to recognize this and begin to help with the building that is so vitally necessary to aid the black South Africans. I hope that the present Canadian government will support this building process, just as the previous government worked hard to do so, and, in fact, was a world leader in rejecting apartheid and supporting the black people of South Africa.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

CANADA REMEMBERS

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, 50 years ago today, Canadians awakened to the news that the long-awaited second front in Europe had become a reality. On that day, newspapers across this land spoke of our successes. "West Wall Breached," proclaimed the front page of The Globe and Mail of Wednesday, June 7, 1944.

Today we reflect, not only on what was won 50 years ago, but also on what was lost and what must be remembered. By the time Canadians learned of the D-day landings, more than 359 of their family, friends and neighbours lay dead on the beaches and in the fields of Normandy. More than 700 lay wounded. However, the 15,000 Canadian troops who landed on Juno Beach on Tuesday, June 6, 1944 accomplished what they had set out to do: They established a beachhead and, with our allies, went on to win the Battle of Normandy, which led to the end of a devastating war.

Those who stormed the defences at Juno Beach had volunteered from every part of this country; from our cities, from our towns, from our farms, from our aboriginal lands. There were Canadians old and new, many from other countries with different cultures, languages, religions and traditions. In Normandy they came together as one people with but one purpose: the liberation of Europe and peace and security at home. As it was put so eloquently yesterday by our Prime Minister:

> In death they were not anglophones or francophones, not from the west or the east, not Christians or Jews, not aboriginal peoples or immigrants. They were Canadians.

Their units, which made up the Third Canadian Division and the Second Armoured Brigade, reflect that diversity and now occupy an honoured place in our nation's history. For the record of this house, I would like to name those units: Highland Light Infantry of Canada; North Nova Scotia Highlanders; Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry Highlanders; the Queens's Own Rifles of Canada; Régiment de la Chaudière; North Shore (New Brunswick) Regiment; the Royal Winnipeg Rifles; the Regina Rifle Regiment; the 1st Battalion Canadian Scottish Regiment; the 6th Armoured Regiment (1st Hussars); the 10th Armoured Regiment (Fort Garry Horse); the 27th Armoured Regiment (Sherbrooke Fusiliers) and the Cameron Highlanders of Ottawa.

Then, of course, there was the 1st Canadian Parachute Battalion which, in the early morning hours of June 6, landed behind enemy lines to secure the eastern flank of the invasion.

It is not only in Canada that we pay tribute to those regiments and battalions and to those who served in them. On both sides of the English Channel, Canada is being singled out with particular affection, respect, and gratitude. On Friday last, in a ceremony attended by Queen Elizabeth and our Prime Minister, a monument was unveiled in the heart of London, in Green Park, dedicated to the memory of Canadians who fought and died in two world wars. On Saturday last, the citizens of Gosport paid tribute to Canadian soldiers who, 50 years ago, set off to sea from their port in England to destiny in Normandy. Yesterday, in a moving speech in Courseulles-sur-Mer, Mr. Chrétien spoke of how a young nation had come of age through the events of D-day, and how the legacy of that day must be a Canada united from sea to sea to sea.

Three of our Senate colleagues are now in Europe participating in celebrations being held to commemorate those historic landings. Earlier today my deputy leader, Senator Molgat, who is the Honorary Colonel of the Royal Winnipeg Rifles — sometimes known as the Little Black Devils — was at a commemoration ceremony at Bretteville-sur-Laize cemetery where 2,872 Canadian soldiers lie buried.

Senators Gigantès and Marshall are in Caen, where they will be joined by Senator Molgat, Mr. Chrétien and countless others to remember the sacrifices made by our soldiers as they fought their way off Juno Beach. For Senator Marshall, who is a D-day veteran himself, this must be a very special time indeed.

Honourable senators, our colleagues are but a few of the thousands of Canadians — veterans, their families and friends — who have assembled in Britain and France over the past several days. As they attend the various services, they represent every Canadian, just as so many of them did once before when they left our shores more than 50 years ago. Their recollections are poignant, sombre, and proud. Through the power of television, we have heard it in their voices as they shared their stories. We have seen it in their eyes as they listened and stared with tears across those beaches and out to sea, under the same grey skies that hung over their efforts five decades ago.

Honourable senators, it is impossible to pay adequate tribute to the courage and patriotism of those young Canadians who fought for the values of freedom and tolerance which have made Canada the strong and independent nation it is today; those same values which have made the name Canada synonymous with peacekeeping all around the world.

Our strongest tribute to the memory of those young soldiers, airmen, paratroopers and sailors must be the continuing education of young Canadians about their history, the history of our country and its defenders, and how the D-day forces fought and died to keep it free. Our young Canadians must know also of the strength and commitment of all of those who supported those efforts here at home, and their anguish and hope as they waited for news. Those stories, honourable senators, must be repeated, savoured and honoured with pride and deep gratitude year after year, generation after generation, because it is only through the knowledge and understanding of the efforts and sacrifices of the past that we can ensure the protection of the future of a Canada that is united and free.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, is it not extraordinary that Canada, this most peaceful of nations, finds that some of the most glorious pages of its history were written during some of war's most horrible moments. At Vimy where, as Desmond Morton wrote, those who survived the winter "lived like moles, underground and in darkness." On April 9, 1917, the Canadians — relentlessly trained on a mock-up of the ridge itself, drilled almost to exhaustion and backed by 1,000 artillery pieces — suddenly attacked on a six-and-a-half-kilometre front. They did what British and French soldiers had not been able to do: They chased the beaten enemy off the ridge, suffering in the process 10,602 casualties, 3,598 of whom died.

"This magnificent victory," says The Canadian Encyclopedia created "a sense of achievement and national pride that gave Canadians a great feeling of self-confidence." "Vimy," it is often repeated, "is where Canada grew up." Even sermons have been based on this theme. How astonishing that a staid and peaceable people should gain not only international fame but esteem among themselves because of the brutal acts of war.

Then there is Operation Jubilee, the now seldom used designation for the 1942 Dieppe Raid. The operation by itself was a tragic failure, but what of the lessons learned? Thousands of lives would be saved down the line because of 5,000 extraordinarily brave Canadians, 800 of whom were killed, 1,200 wounded and 2,000 taken prisoner. Two Victoria Crosses were awarded for this Canadian tragedy written in blood.

One could go on: the Battle of the Atlantic; the exploits of Bomber Command, which alone cost 10,000 Canadian lives; the bravery of the Merchant Marine. Each of these, with other equally eloquent chapters, deserve much more than a fleeting reference, but they at least must be mentioned, since they all kept hope alive in the face of terrible odds until Operation Overlord.

At the end of the first day of Operation Overlord, General Crerar sent a telegram to Prime Minister Mackenzie King: "As Canadians," he wrote "we inherit military characteristics which were feared by the enemy in the last Great War. They will be still more feared before this war terminates."

Operation Overlord was, by far, the greatest military operation in history. It frightened even the people who staged it. After six days, 326,000 people had landed in Normandy; 54,000 vehicles had been transported across the choppy channel. After a month, someone counted the King's men and women in the invading force and found they were equally divided — British and Canadian.

Easy going? Historian Morton writes: "At Verrières Ridge the Black Watch, a Montreal militia regiment, had only 15 survivors from a long, hopeless assault:" "I guess," one of them explained, "that's what they expected from the Black Watch." The whole operation cost 1,965 men.

In August, Winston Churchill summed up the bloody campaign from Caen to Falaise: "Without the great sacrifices made by the Anglo-Canadian armies in brutal, slugging battle, the spectacular advances made elsewhere by the Allied forces could never have been made."

There is in the British Prime Minister's War Memoirs a description of the Germans' desperate release of their first flying bombs, exactly a week after the beginning of Overlord. Churchill makes this harsh and handsome tribute: "As I said in Parliament, the people at home could feel they were sharing the perils of their soldiers." In three weeks the doodlebugs, as they were called, essentially indiscriminate in their nature, purpose and effect, killed 2,724 people, almost all of them Londoners. However, no battle plans were changed to relieve the new civilian distress, nor was any change asked in the British capital.

As we watched and read and listened over the last few days to the great events of half a century ago, what Canadian did not feel an emotional tug at being reminded of the magnificent sacrifices made by fellow citizens?

[Translation]

Every Canadian of a certain age has vivid memories of a close relative, a family friend, or a neighbour who answered the call to defend some fundamental values, far from home, in countries which, for the most part, were only names which they had read in their geography books. Those people were always convinced that only victory on foreign soil could guarantee the survival of the same fundamental values in Canada.

[English]

What all these men and women had in common — these soldiers, sailors and airmen — was that they went to liberate from a tyrant countries thousands of kilometres away, ensuring that their own country would continue as the free and peaceful one they knew and had left. Their shoulder patches had but one word: Canada. Their loyalty was but to one country: Canada. The strength that they showed in battle they drew upon again in peacetime to build a better country for all of us: Canada. And they did!

Canada has been described as a noble dream — a dream which some claim has failed. They are wrong. In war, Canadians have never hesitated to do more than their share, as they continue to do today in many corners of the world. They were and are extensions of what Canadians have always been — believers in that noble dream. We cannot, and must not, let them down.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I will not try to emulate the very eloquent comments made by Senator Fairbairn and Senator Lynch-Staunton, but since we are commemorating the 50th anniversary of the landing of Canadian troops in Normandy, I want to pay tribute to my fellow companions who, during that campaign, displayed the courage and the determination which eventually led us to victory and freedom.

[English]

Unfortunately, we had to bury many of our close friends, but I know that their sacrifice has not been in vain. May I say that I was proud to serve with them and that I cherish their memory.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, by way of a preliminary remark, I suspect some of you might realize that this is my last week in the Senate before my retirement. However, I would ask all of you to withhold, please, the blasphemy and libel of a so-called tribute until the end of this week, when I will still be here, good health allowing.

I am impressed by the statements of the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition and Senator Charbonneau about our rememberance of D-day. It is fitting and proper that Canada and its Allies should now commemorate, and I emphasize the word "commemorate," the massive landings in Normandy 50 years ago.

This is not a glorification of war but, rather, a cogent reminder that the human condition is such that force must be used when evil exploits the frailties of the human condition. Certainly, that was the case both before and climaxing on D-day.

Turning for a moment to Canada's contribution in that great event, it is too often forgotten by our Allies that close to one-third of all the military forces in the initial assault were Canadians. The other two-thirds were made up of Americans and British. The magnitude of Canada's contribution is unbelievable, when we consider that at that time we had a population of under 20 million people and that everyone who went over there went as a volunteer. Infantry, armoured regiments, artillery and paratroops were all components of Canada's contribution to the war effort.

In the air, Canadians had 48 RCAF squadrons. That is an astounding number! In the navy armada at Normandy there were 64 Canadian warships and countless small landing and other craft, including some little cockleshells made of plywood that were called motor torpedo boats or gunboats. That event was undoubtedly the greatest concentration of national effort in our entire Canadian history. It was equal to that of the United States and of Great Britain on the initial tough assault.

In retrospect, it staggers the imagination of what the Canadian will can accomplish. We cannot express too deeply our pride in those who did not return, in our wounded, and in those who were lucky enough to return. When one looks back on this event, we must realize how great is the potential of this nation and its people. My God, we must look forward to a future that is unimaginably promising and a united, free and democratic country, the most favoured place on earth!

On that awful day we all wore, as has been mentioned, our Canada flashes, which joined us in a true sense of commonality as Canadians. President Eisenhower, speaking before the embarkation, said:

> You are about to embark upon the Great Crusade, toward which we have striven these many months. The eyes of the world are upon you. The hopes and prayers of liberty-loving people everywhere march with you. In company with our brave Allies and brothers-in-arms on other Fronts, you will bring about the destruction of the German war machine, the elimination of Nazi tyranny over the oppressed peoples of Europe, and security for ourselves in a free world.
> Good luck, and let us all beseech the blessing of the Almighty God upon this great and noble undertaking.

And, please be advised that we were scared.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, as Deputy Chairman of the Veterans Affairs Committee, I wish to inform you that my chairman, Senator Jack Marshall, who is a veteran of D-day, is now in France. It is therefore apropos that I should say a few words.

I was sitting in a divinity school in Halifax 50 years ago yesterday, trying to get an education, while Senator Jack Marshall was on the beaches of Normandy. Thank God I left the divinity school to enter the field of medicine instead.

On that day in 1944, Canada took part in one of the most extraordinary military operations of all time: the Allies' great amphibious assault on German-occupied France. It was an event of tremendous importance to our country. It was the day that Canada and her allies gambled all to defeat Hitler and win the war. It was the day that Canada, once and for all, assured itself a place as a player on the international stage. It was the day that more than one thousand brave Canadians were wounded or killed in the name of freedom and peace.

What happened on D-day and how was Canada involved? Most Canadians today have only a vague idea of the answers to those questions, but for those who took part in the great enterprise and for those who waited anxiously at home for the news, it was a day they will never forget.

On the morning of June 6, 1944, an incredible armada of gigantic proportions crossed the English Channel and reached the shores of Normandy. Seven thousand Canadian, British and American vessels, carrying more than 150,000 soldiers and accompanied by more than 8,000 Allied aircraft, were prepared to attack. Their goal was to break through the German Atlantic Wall, as the fortifications of the coast of Normandy were known, and establish a beachhead from which they could carry the torch of freedom to the occupied countries of France, Belgium and Holland and Northwest Europe.

Their job was danger itself. Hitler's Fortress Europe was heavily defended and his troops were seasoned and well equipped. The Allies had quickly to gain the upper hand or they would be driven back into the sea. Success was crucial. Without a threshold on the Western Front, the Allies could not pursue the war to a satisfactory conclusion.

June 6, 1944, then marks the beginning of the end of the Second World War. Every part of Operation Neptune, as the assault phase of the undertaking was known, was meticulously planned. Nothing was left to chance. The troops had trained for over a year and special equipment had been developed to ensure the operation's success. There would be no repeat of Dieppe.

All three of Canada's service forces took part in D-day. Thirty-seven squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force attacked the Germans' beach defences and inland positions. Ten thousand members of the Royal Canadian Navy ferried troops and supplies across the English Channel and shelled coastal targets. Four hundred and fifty Canadian paratroopers landed behind enemy lines to knock out strategic targets in advance of the main attack. Fifteen thousand soldiers of the Canadian army stormed the coast of Normandy on what was known as Juno Beach.

Imagine what our troops faced as they disembarked. The crossing had been difficult and many were seasick. They were greeted in their landing craft by enemy artillery and machine guns. They were laden with equipment. Some were dropped off in water that was over their heads. To reach the other side of the beaches, they had to run a murderous obstacle course of barbed wire, mines, booby traps, machine guns and hand grenades.

Words cannot describe the scene that day, the fighting was so furious and intense. Death and destruction were everywhere. However, by day's end, all of our units had reached their objectives. D-day was a success; but it came at a price. One thousand and seventy-four Canadians were wounded in that first day in Normandy. Of those, 359 either died on the battlefield or died later.

D-day cast a long shadow across the households of our nation and there were more casualties to come. The summer of 1944 was hot and deadly for the Canadians as they fought their way across Normandy. Thousands more of our men were killed or wounded before our Allies liberated Paris at the end of August and before our forces could free the people of Belgium and Holland. It was a dark time in world history, but the men and women who made up our forces, and the millions of Canadians who backed them up at home, believed they had no choice but to fight for the freedom and dignity of others.

Fifty years later we pay tribute to the courage of those brave Canadians who made victory their own on that long day in June. This year, on the anniversary of D-day, Canadians everywhere are being asked to pause and remember this important event which had such an impact on our nation. Events at the local, national, and international level are commemorating D-day. A special ongoing program led by Veterans Affairs Canada, known as "Canada Remembers," further reminds Canadians of her veterans' contribution to this country's tremendous war effort.

I hope you will join with me in honouring the gallant men who died that day, fighting for freedom for us all. They died believing in the justice of our cause. They gave their lives that others might live in peace. Theirs was the ultimate selfless act. Let us remember them.

Perhaps, honourable senators, when the last speaker has spoken, we could all stand for two minutes of silence to remember those great veterans who served.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I will try to accommodate everyone who wishes to speak. I assume that the house is agreed that we should give leave to extend Senators' Statements for those who wish to pay homage. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, it is indeed an honour for me to join with others today to pay tribute to our Canadian veterans.

During the past few days we have watched with pride the tributes being made to the thousands of Canadian men and women who risked their lives during the Second World War to ensure that the generations to follow would live in peace. Some of these brave soldiers made the ultimate sacrifice. Yesterday, we commemorated the fiftieth anniversary of one of the greatest victories of the war, which took place on the beaches of Normandy on June 6, 1944, known as D-day. Although D-day did not mark the end of the war, it was a decisive victory for the Allied forces in their battle to break the German stronghold and liberate Europe.

• (1440)

Canada played a key role in the nearly 200,000-strong Allied force. Thousands of Canadian soldiers stormed Juno Beach and began the assault on the supposedly impregnable German Atlantic wall. There were the Nova Scotia Highlanders, the Regina Regiment, the First Canadian Parachute Battalion. Senator Fairbairn named many others, so I will not name them all. They all participated in the full frontal assault on the Germans.

Yesterday, during a remembrance ceremony here in Ottawa, I had the honour of speaking to Gunner George Comeau, no relation of mine but a good friend and a gentleman from my community of Clare, Nova Scotia. He landed on Juno Beach on the morning of June 6, 1944. Mr. Comeau was a member of the 12th Field Regiment, Third Canadian Division, and he related to me how proud he was to have served Canada. He is now particularly touched by the gratitude that has been expressed by Canadians in these past few days, especially by the younger generation.

Although the casualties were fewer than officials had predicted at that time, we must never forget that 359 Canadian men lost their lives on that fateful day 50 years ago. To those who survived the battle, you have helped to keep the memory of your comrades alive and to ensure that future generations recognize how precious our freedom is. Lest we forget.

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, I am sure most of you remember your 21st birthday. I can tell you I remember mine. My 21st birthday fell on June 5, 1944. At that particular time, we were ordered to stay in barracks in Portsmouth, ready to move in our small MTBs, as Senator Lang mentioned. He was with one of the two Canadian flotillas of motor torpedo boats known as the 65th Flotilla, consisting of the larger torpedo boats with four torpedoes. I was in the 29th Flotilla made up of eight smaller torpedo boats with two torpedoes in each. That day, June 5, was the day we were to move out. Eisenhower decided that the action would be postponed for a day, and it was. Thank God he did, because our boats were small. How well I remember my 21st birthday.

I want to make just a few preliminary remarks prior to talking about my comrades on that day. I think we were all fortunate that the Germans had not yet invented the doodlebug, which was known as the V1. It was terrible. It was terrifying. However, it was not half so terrifying as the V2, because, with the V1, at least you could hear it coming, and if you could not get out of the way, you knew you were about to get it. With the V2, there was simply an explosion, and whatever was close by was finished. You should have seen the Solent with all those ships ready to go across. If they had had many more V1s and V2s, we may not have had a successful D-day.

My second remark has to do with what Senator Lang said in respect of one-third of the initial assault being Canadian. That is interesting. I want to tell you about a person who spent a lot of time with the Winnipeg Free Press, Brigadier Dick Malone. The authorities were intending to announce that first day that an assault had taken place by the Americans and the British. After some complaints from Malone, they said the Americans, the British and some colonies of the British. Malone was a very powerful person, I must say, because he was dealing with Eisenhower, and I think he threatened to go to Prime Minister Churchill. They finally included the word "Canada," and well they should have.

I do not want to bore you with long stories of what we did, but I will just tell you briefly. We moved out from Portsmouth. There were eight boats, and we went in teams of four. We would go over there for three days at a time, and we lived on the beachhead. We did that for about six weeks, or a little less. Then we moved to the beachhead, and the eight boats lived on the beachhead for about two months. I am familiar with places in France such as Arromanches, where we actually tied up, and Bayeux, which is a small town in France that was not touched. The Germans actually moved right past Bayeux and went to Caen. I was there the day following the taking of Caen by the Canadian soldiers.

There are two incidents I will tell you about. First, I wanted to have a German helmet. Someone said, "Well, there is one just down the river. Go and pick it up." I went down the river, but I did not pick it up. As you can imagine, there was someone in that helmet.

The other incident was on the day following the taking of Caen. I was just there as a spectator. We came along, and the army people said, "Boy, are we glad you are here." We asked why, and they said, "Those big shells coming from our battleships, the British battleships, one has not exploded and we want you to take the detonator out." We told them they had the wrong guys. Those are my two experiences there.

Within the period of roughly eight weeks, we lost three of our eight boats. We did not lose all the men, but we lost a number of them. We lost two good friends of mine, and I will just mention their names. There are others, but there was a Lieutenant David Killam, DSC, and a Lieutenant Hunt. David was from Vancouver. Their boat blew up. David was heard talking in the water, but he was never seen again.

Fortunately, from my point of view, I left the flotilla in about December of 1944. Unfortunately, through a tragic accident, all the boats blew up, including our own, and a great number of people were killed.

As with Senator Charbonneau, I was proud to serve with the others, and I do cherish the memory.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I intended to make a somewhat longer speech than you are now about to hear, because I had thought for a few minutes that the navy might not be well represented here today. However, it is more than well served by both Senator Lang and Senator Jessiman in their comments to us today. They can give you far more personal and vivid accounts of what actually occurred in the navy than I ever could.

I was one of the numerous WRNS, or "Wrens" who fought the Battle of the Rideau Canal for four years. However, as I happened to be in the Directorate of Officer Personnel, I had a very good idea of what was happening as the plans for D-day went forward.

I might say that Senator Lang's wife, Frances, who is up in the gallery today, used to be upstairs from me at naval service headquarters, in some secret room, planning all sorts of things that I was not supposed to know anything about down in my department. However, we could infer from the kinds of signals we were getting and the requirements we needed for officers that the plans were going ahead very quickly. There were requirements for approximately 16 of the Bangor minesweepers that patrolled the Canadian shores. They had to be completely refitted and rearmed.

• (1450)

All the surviving corvettes that could make it were sent back to Canada for refitting. The men were posted to England to secret places for special training. The minesweepers had a very difficult job. They had to clear the lanes in the English Channel. We followed the secret and top secret signals to see how they were surviving during those days.

To me, it was a magnificent and exciting time to be part of the service.

I cannot help but mention that Lieutenant David Killam was a very close friend of mine from Mount Allison University. He was from Vancouver, but spent a year at Mount A. when I was there. As Senator Jessiman said, his MTB blew up in July of 1944. I remember that because I lost two other good friends that same month. The signals came across our desks as the casualties came in. About two months later, when I was going home to Winnipeg on leave, I sat beside a sailor who had been one of David's crew in his MTB that day. He told me that as he was going down in the water David leaned over, grabbed him, and threw him over a piece of floating debris, and then David himself went down. It was as a result of that incident that he received his DSC.

I will not recount any more stories. You heard the important events from Senator Lang, Senator Jessiman and others who really took part.

I will refer briefly to Joe Schull's book, The Far Distant Ships, which is the official account of the naval service during World War II. He was at headquarters with me for some years. To give you an idea of what happened in the merchant and naval services during the war, I will quote some of the statistics he cites, which are still quite amazing.

He said:

> Canadian ships, alone or in company with other ships and planes, sank a total of twenty-seven U-boats during the war. They sank, captured or destroyed forty-two enemy surface ships. The statistics of battle are not unfavourable...but they are dwarfed by the main achievement. During 2,060 days of war, 25,343 merchant ship voyages carried 181,643,180 tons of cargo from North American ports to the United Kingdom under Canadian escort. Over the bridge which the navy helped to build and maintain some 90,000 tons of war supplies passed daily toward the battlefields of Europe.

Of course, all that was accomplished with many losses of corvettes, frigates, small boats and many brave merchant seamen. In fact, around the world we lost 1,797 Canadian naval men at sea; three hundred and nineteen were wounded, and 95 became prisoners of war.

The pictures in our minds of those days and of those men are becoming blurred, even to us who lived through them. To our children they are almost unreal, and to our grandchildren they certainly are.

We honour those who lie in graves in foreign countries and beneath the boundless ocean, as well as those who came home to die of their wounds or to continue to live with their memories. We can do so by reminding young Canadians and new Canadians that they are living here in peace and liberty today because of the people they never knew who were prepared to sacrifice their lives for those who would come after them. They could not have known how diverse we would become, but they would want to know that we are unified, as they were, in love of and pride in our country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I feel somewhat humble. I thought my years as a merchant mariner placed upon me somewhat the obligation of paying some tribute to them. I do rise, nevertheless, to join with those who have paid tribute. I listened with interest to the humour of Senator Lang and Senator Jessiman. I was particularly moved when Senator Lang said to us very clearly: "Remember that we were scared." A young soldier was scared in Bosnia a couple of days ago, with resulting tragedy.

Honourable senators, like all of you, I was quite moved by the tributes that were paid by a broad range of people over the weekend, and particularly yesterday, with regard to the events surrounding the invasion of occupied France some 50 years ago.

It was just a year ago that Senator Perrault and I stood together in Liverpool, the eastern terminus, as Senator Neiman said, of all that movement of troops, materiel, food and everything else that sustained that great European campaign from 1939 to 1945. We stood there to pay tribute to merchant mariners and the sailors from the Allied nations who protected the convoys that sailed from here and other parts of the world. We remember their sacrifices as we remember the sacrifices of our parents. I remember the "West Novies." I have relatives buried in Italy as a result of that campaign; they died just weeks ahead of the events of 50 years ago.

Honourable senators, as we listen to the memories of some of those 14,000 men and women who landed and took part in Normandy, in Operation Overlord, we are reminded of the tremendous personal human sacrifice that was made for us. We lost 359 men that day, and another 700 or more were injured. Their acts of courage in the face of incredible danger is testimony to their dedication to the fight for freedom. Canadians on Juno Beach faced intense fighting but soldiered on, finally taking their beachhead, which eventually, as we know, lead to a massive move inland.

• (1500)

The war did not end on the beaches of Normandy. There was a lot of fighting ahead, a lot of Canadian lives to be lost and a lot of Allied sacrifices to be made. This victory surely was instrumental in that successful campaign. Along with the British, American and other Allied forces, the Canadians successfully reached the great Atlantic wall, and the Allies were back in Europe being welcomed by a grateful civilian population. The 11 months of fighting that followed saw Canadian forces continue to play a very full and vital role.

So it was that yesterday, my colleagues, 50 years later, we remembered and paid homage to those men who walked into the battle in the name of freedom, and came out victorious on their Longest Day. If over the past few days Canadians have learned anything, may it be that those who fought, and particularly those who died for us, should not just be in our thoughts every few years. Our freedom should be a constant reminder of their bravery and of the sacrifices they made. They are truly our heroes and their place in history must never be forgotten, just as now those serving in Bosnia-Hercegovina, Rwanda and elsewhere in the world must always be in our thoughts and, above all, in our prayers.

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, I was either very lucky or very unlucky not to be a part of the invasion. I suppose it depends on how strongly you believe in King Henry V's speech at Agincourt about being there on Saint Crispin's Day. However, flying with the RAF Transport Command did have its moments.

Over the past couple of days, I found it most rewarding to watch the coverage on CBC, both the French and English stations, and on CTV. They did a splendid job of portraying the unbelievably difficult task that the people at that time had to face. At one point the commentator was interviewing a group of young people. He asked the young people whether they felt that they could do the same. He pointed out that the beach had not been stormed by a bunch of grey-haired, slow-moving, bemedalled people but by young people around the ages of 20 and 21.

I do not know how each of them responded but I do have this feeling: Recently I have had the opportunity to meet with a lot of officers and men of our Armed Forces through the work of the National Defence Committee. These people represent every high ideal that was present 50 years ago. I think these people could be the core around which the present generation might rally. They would become symbols, and they would be able to shape the new generation, as much as we sometimes disparage them, into the same type of people that we have been applauding this afternoon.

I do not despair of the young generation. I think they need leadership, and that the Armed Forces we have now are every bit as capable, dedicated and brave as the people who were at Normandy 50 years ago.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, what you have already said today was said so well that I certainly do not intend to repeat it.

There are, however, two points I would like to make, and the first one concerns what was said by our Prime Minister yesterday. I would like to read his comments into the record, and I quote:

> They did not die as anglophones or francophones, as easterners or westerners, as Catholics or Protestants.

He also called on Canadians:

> ...to promote the values of tolerance, understanding and generosity...

I think these words should be an inspiration to us all, especially to us as senators. I insist on seeing us as the keepers of a tradition that is fast disappearing in Canada.

We have heard a few examples in what was said by Senator Lang, Senator Jessiman, and those who are not with us today, Senators Marshall and Molgat. These people represent part of the history of our country.

What inspired me, and this is my second point, were the comments of Senator Fairbairn.

[English]

She spoke about young Canadians. If we believe in Canada, we must have a knowledge of the history of Canada. Who will teach not only our young Canadians but millions of new Canadians who have just come to the country, unaware, most likely, and I say that respectfully, of the history of this country, of our nuance, of our differences?

Today, I should like to pay tribute and homage to the media. It is not customary but I want to do it. They have done an extraordinarily dignified job of reporting a part of our history.

[Translation]

I want to pay a special tribute to the CBC. I know it is unusual to pay tribute to a corporation whose mission, after all, includes teaching us about our history.

[English]

In 1964, I was a member of the committee studying the arts and encouragement to the arts, including the CBC during the famous events surrounding the program, This Hour Has Seven Days. I regularly attended the committee hearings. I remember saying that the CBC has a duty to Canada, both in French and English, and they must not fail us. It is to teach the history of Canada. They have a mission. I will say on this particular issue that no one in what I call French Canada — because it exists — will deny the remarkable job that the media has done.

[Translation]

The CBC covered the celebration in a dignified manner. Their reports were forceful and very moving. I am sure my honourable colleagues will want to join me in thanking this public corporation, as I intend to send a copy of these very simple comments to the CBC.

[English]

I want to tell the CBC that they have a greater duty from this time forward, starting today, when every Canadian is extremely moved, when we are about to enter into — I will not exaggerate and call it "dramatic times" — but difficult times in our history in Canada. For example, the CBC has a duty to explain the contribution of the Ukrainians who arrived in Western Canada to open up the land — all parts of that history.

• (1510)

As a French Canadian whose ancestors came here in the 1600s, I also have a duty to understand that before my ancestors came to this land, people already occupied this great land. I see some of them here in the Senate. We must understand the history of Canada. They are a part of the history of Canada.

Honourable senators, Canadians should respect each other!

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to thank everyone who participated in this excellent tribute this afternoon. Some spoke from a personal standpoint, some from the standpoint of history, but all talked about the significance to our country, of this great event and about the courage with which Canadians went into that event.

Honourable senators, I would just add my own personal experience. I was not on the beaches of Normandy on D-day of 1944. I was in a special officers' training centre at Sussex, New Brunswick, on that particular day. Just a few weeks before we moved into that centre in May, a large group of Canadian officers, freshly trained, left for Europe as Canloan officers to fill the decimated ranks of the officers in the British army. Those officers were among the troops who went ashore at Normandy on June 6, 1944. Within two weeks, we were advised that 90 per cent of them had died.

I finished up the war as a one-pip wonder — a second lieutenant for those who are uninitiated — training a company of Canadian soldiers in the use of American weapons at a camp on Gwadkin Lake near Deep River. We were just about to leave for Fort Benning, Georgia, when the Pacific war was over.

Therefore I was safely discharged and was a civilian law student by September of 1945. Many of my friends were not so fortunate: Alex Strang, who played coronet duets with me in the Sunday school orchestra in Exeter, Ontario; Ralph Delbridge, the 100-yard sprint star of our high school in Exeter; Ralph Notman, my next door neighbour as we moved to St. Catharines; Bob Watt, my closest friend in the boys' bible class at Knox Presbyterian Church in St. Catharines; and Stuart Preston, a co-founder of the OWL Club, a little informal group of friends at high school. This is just the beginning of a list which all of us have, a list of close personal friends who died either on D-day or just shortly before or shortly after that cataclysmic event.

Our children and our grandchildren can hardly be expected to react to our recollections of D-day and of the Second World War as we do. They have not lost their dearest friends in a battle for democracy and for the relative peace of the world. Let us hope that the continuing examples of brutality that they see in the world, these 50 years later, will ensure that they will never attempt to resolve the failures of political and diplomatic negotiations with violence and bloodshed.

Perhaps, honourable senators, we might do as Senator Bonnell suggested and rise for two minutes of silence.

The Senate rose in silent tribute.

Senator Stanbury: Thank you, honourable senators.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 8, 1994, at one thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, there are several committees meeting tomorrow, and one may be a little concerned following last week's discussion about the three o'clock meetings of our committees. Therefore, I thought it might be wise to put on the record the minutes of a meeting of Senate committee chairmen which took place approximately one year ago, at which it was agreed:

> (i) the Senate meet on Monday evenings, when necessary and with as much notice as possible;
> (ii) the Senate meet on Wednesday afternoons at 1:30 p.m. for the following items of business only. Senators' Statements, Routine Proceedings, Question Period and urgent government business.
> (iii) at approximately 3 p.m. on Wednesday afternoons, a maximum of four Senate committees only meet, followed at 5 p.m. by another four committee meetings.

In other words, committee chairmen are entitled to some certainty as to their meetings on Wednesday. It was agreed earlier that we would operate in that fashion and, if we needed more time in the Senate, then we would meet on Monday evenings; but, if we do that, we will try to give everyone a good deal of notice.

Those comments are perhaps necessary in view of this motion.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this might be a good time to raise a couple of questions and perhaps review the record as it relates to government business this session.

We all know the value of Senators' Statements, Question Period and committee work. However, based on the work that is before us, some honourable senators might wonder what we are doing here this week. Approximately two weeks ago I asked my counterpart, Senator Molgat, if he could enlighten us as to the flow of business from the other place, and, to his credit, he attempted to do so. He sent me a note with a list of legislation that the government would like to get through this session. There were 33 pieces of legislation on that list and both he and I agreed that at best it was an optimistic wish list. As of May 26, the date this letter was received, 14 pieces of legislation had not been introduced in the other place.

We have attempted to accommodate the government in every way imaginable in terms of getting the business of Parliament done in this session. The problem is the business of Parliament has not been getting to this house. It is somewhat frustrating. We have people here in large numbers ready to do the work of Parliament. We do not like to come here and spin our wheels. We will be here in large numbers when work is to be done.

As the Honourable Senator Stanbury correctly pointed out, there is committee work to be done from time to time, but not prior to the work of the other place arriving here.

I also understand that the House of Commons is planning to adjourn on June 23. If even a small part of this list is to get through Parliament by that anticipated adjournment date, we have a right to expect that it be delivered to this house in order that we can give it ample debate, send it to committee, hear from witnesses and deal with the business of Parliament.

Senator Murray: There is always pre-study of course.

Senator Berntson: We would be happy to hear anything members opposite might have to say about pre-study.

My comments are not meant to be threatening. All I am saying is that we have a job to do. That job is to ensure that the debate on these pieces of legislation in this house does take place and that the work on behalf of Canadians and Parliament is done. No one should expect us to play dead on June 23.

We raised this issue one week ago. We raised it two weeks ago. We raised it four weeks ago. We urged members opposite at that time to see what could be done to get the work flowing. We do not want an eleventh hour logjam. That would not be fair to anyone.

Without meaning to sound threatening in any way, shape or form, because that is not my intention, I simply ask: Where is the work? We would like to get at it.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I have been here for more than 26 years, and I have heard the same discussion in every one of those 26 years. That does not mean that I am putting the argument down. The opposition is not the only group which is frustrated by this situation. Continuous efforts are being made to find some way of overcoming it.

I inherited the list that Senator Molgat gave to the Honourable Senator Berntson. We have been attempting to follow up on it. Things have not moved through. Promises have been made to us which have simply no possibility of being fulfilled.

Senator Berntson: Maybe we can lend you Harvie Andre.

Senator Stanbury: Harvie Andre did not do any better at all.

Senator Doody: He did it more loudly.

Senator Frith: He did it more nastily.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I will not make any further comments. My head is full of possible comments.

I am advised that the House leaders in the other place are meeting this afternoon, and we should have some definite answers as to what we are expected to do. I have also made it very plain to members of the other place that we have to know what is on the short list, what is absolutely needed and what can be put over, or some portion of it, until we return in the fall. I do anticipate being able to give honourable senators more information within the next day or two.

Senator Berntson: Is the Honourable Senator Stanbury suggesting that no matter what the status of business is on June 23 we will be adjourning for the summer recess?

Senator Stanbury: No. If we are lucky, we will have a short list of bills which the government feels it really must have before we break. Then with respect to the remainder of the list of 33 bills that we have been discussing, if they have moved along in the House, hopefully there will be an understanding that those bills will not be finalized until we return in the fall.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a) I move:

> That for the purposes of the examination of Bill C-17, An Act to amend certain statutes to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 22, 1994, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit at four o'clock today, Tuesday, June 7, 1994, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 12, 1994, by the Honourable Senator St. Germain regarding the replacement of the Sea King Helicopter Fleet; a response to a question raised in the Senate on May 25, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie regarding economic assistance to the Middle East; and a response to a question asked in the Senate on May 25, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Prud'homme regarding the proposed visit of Chairman Arafat of Palestine.

TRANSPORT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerry St. Germain on May 12, 1994)

> Significant cuts in defence spending were announced in the most recent budget. About one-half of the $7-billion reduction called for in the budget will be achieved through the cancellation of the EH-101 helicopter project. The $5.8 billion which had been originally budgeted for the EH-101 over the 13-year life of the project has been removed. The Department will still have to find money for replacement helicopters should the requirement be confirmed in the defence policy review.

It is the government's responsibility to ensure that taxpayers' money is spent in the most sensible way, especially in times of fiscal restraint. In its acquisition strategy, the Department of National Defence will emphasize the purchase of equipment "off the shelf," the use of commercial standard technologies, and unless absolutely necessary, the avoidance of military modifications.

The EH-101 would not have been available to the Canadian Forces before the end of this decade. The Labradors and Sea Kings will remain airworthy, without modification, and will continue to provide Search and Rescue services at sea, as well as to support UN and other contingency operations as required, up to the year 2000.

The department will rely to a greater extent on the existing capacity of the private sector to meet the Canadian Forces in-service equipment support needs. Notwithstanding the decrease in capital equipment procurement announced in the recent budget, there may well be greater opportunities for the private sector to participate in the provision of services to the department, providing the business case can be made.

In determining which reductions would be implemented, the government was mindful of the importance of maintaining a balance of regional economic benefits. The essential determinant was that these difficult decisions made military and economic sense.

The reductions of the budget will have an impact on National Defence's capital equipment program in the short term. The long-term capital spending plans will be shaped by the results of the defence policy review. Until the outcome of the defence policy review is known, decisions on additional major defence equipment acquisitions are on hold.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO MIDDLE EAST— GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Heath Macquarrie on May 25, 1994)

In line with its active role in the Middle East Peace Process, Canada responded quickly to the historic signing of the Declaration of Principles between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) on September 13, 1993.

At the international Donors Conference held in Washington October 1, 1993, Canada pledged $55 million over five years in support of the Israeli-PLO accord. Canada also agreed to front-end load as much of this assistance as possible to respond to urgent needs. This pledge includes ongoing as well as new assistance. We are currently considering a request from the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations to accelerate the process of transferring these funds.

1. Ongoing Assistance

At the time of the accord, Canada was already providing on average $9.0 million per year to the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza.

The major part of this assistance, about $5.5 million per year, is channelled through the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA). The other half of Canada's grant to UNRWA ($ to be 11 million in 1994/95) supports Palestinian refugees in Jordan, Lebanon and Syria. Other ongoing activities include:

i) cooperation programs between Canadian and Palestinian institutions and non-governmental organizations ($ 1.5 million per year);

ii) a Fund for local community development projects, administered by the Embassy in Tel Aviv ($1.0 million per year);

iii) support through two regional programs that support the Middle East Peace Process ($750,000 per year);

iv) support provided through other multilateral organizations ($250,000 per year).

2. New programs

Since the signing of the accord, Canada has undertaken a number of new initiatives geared to improve daily living conditions and to build-up the capacity of Palestinian institutions.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Honourable André Ouellet, will soon be providing detailed information on Canada's assistance to the Palestinians.

In the meantime, among the projects already undertaken are:

– a $500,000 project that funded additional community development projects immediately after the accord;

– a $500,000 project, implemented by UNICEF, for youth centres;

– a $620,000 program, through the Canadian Public Health Association, to establish a Palestinian Public Health Association;

– a $1.2 million grant to assist in the relocation of Palestinian refugees to Gaza;

– a $1.0 million project to support Palestinian authorities in dealing with key issues of water policy and programming;

– a $1.0 million grant the Hoslt Peace Fund, a World Bank administered fund designed to meet start-up costs, including salaries, of various Palestinian administration services.

Other activities will help build Palestinian self-government, encourage democratization and the development of civil society, and improve natural resource management.

(Response to question raised by Hon. Marcel Prud'homme on May 25, 1994)

To date, visa officials have not received an application from Mr. Arafat to visit Canada. Once his application is received, then the appropriate visa/permit can be considered. Until an application is received, the question of the immigration document he would be issued remains a hypothetical one.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology (Budget — Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs), presented in the Senate on June 2, 1994.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide (Budget), presented in the Senate on June 2, 1994.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of Senator Neiman. Does this budget amount come within the regular budgetary allocation for Senate committees?

Senator Prud'homme: No.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am asking Senator Neiman if the $800,000 which is in our budget for the current fiscal year to cover committee expenses includes the amount which is set out in this report.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I believe it does. I was not told anything to the contrary. Perhaps Senator Bosa knows, since he is Chairman of the Subcommittee on Budgets. I assume it was in the regular allocation of funds.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, there will be a shortage of approximately $150,000. We may have to go to Treasury Board to borrow the balance of the funds necessary to complete this study.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If I understood Senator Bosa correctly, there is already a shortage of $150,000, assuming all the budgets that have been approved by Internal Economy are approved here in the Senate. We have also accepted an expenditure of $450,000 for our share of the two joint committees, one on foreign policy and one on national defence policy. That brings the total up to almost $700,000.

Will we respect the budget? Do we have a guarantee from Treasury Board? Or shall we just keep our fingers crossed?

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, perhaps I did not express myself clearly. We believe that of the almost $800,000 that is needed to complete the study on euthanasia, we might be short about $150,000. This is after some of the surpluses that we have in different committees are rearranged.

I am new to this position as Chairman of the Subcommittee on Budgets. However, I understand that if we are short of funds for this particular study we can get the money from Treasury Board.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, the point I will make, and the one on which I will end, after which I will be exhausted and will not bring it up again, is that I think it is essential that when we do form joint committees or go into an item which is not provided for in the budget, we at least know ahead of time for how much we are committing ourselves. Now we have no choice. The Euthanasia Committee is doing an excellent job. Had we known the budget figures before the committee started its study, then at least we would not have to have had this discussion today.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Olson, that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION OF LUTHERAN CONGREGATIONS— REPORT ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the seventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (Bill S-5 to incorporate the Canadian Association of Lutheran Congregations, with amendments), presented in the Senate on June 2, 1994.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-5, an act to incorporate the Canadian Association of Lutheran Congregations, was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on April 28, 1994. The committee studied the said bill and reported it with three amendments on June 2, 1994. Those amendments were proposed by Senator Olson, the sponsor of the bill, who, if I am correct, will speak later on this subject.

• (1540)

The purpose of the bill is to incorporate the Association of Lutheran Churches. We are not concerned here with a corporation sole.

The amendments proposed improve the bill. Let me briefly explain those three amendments.

The first amendment concerns the list of current members stated in clause 17(2) of the bill. It is a practical impossibility for the national church to have an up-to-date list of all its members because, as the witness has said, "Theoretically, any Sunday morning we could have two new members and then, in the middle of the week, a funeral for someone." That is why section 17 (2) has been redrafted. It now states:

> The corporation shall prepare and maintain adequate accounting records, as well as a current list of > a) its member congregations,
> b) its associate members,
> c) the members of the board of elders and board of trustees, and a record of the decisions of the board of elders and board of trustees.
> This information will be available to all members of the church.

The purpose of the second amendment is to delete clause 16(2), which stipulates that the name of the members of the board of trustees shall be notified to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. There are two reasons for this amendment. First, the information is already required to be filed with Revenue Canada. This could be a duplication if clause 16(2) is not deleted. Second, it involves, according to one of the witnesses, "a philosophical question": whether or not the church is required to report this information. In any event, that information must be reported to Revenue Canada in order that the church keep its charitable status.

The third amendment relates to clause 21. Instead of having an annual meeting, it is proposed that a biannual meeting be held. It is proposed that section 158 of the Canada Corporations Act not apply to the bill.

Honourable senators, that is the substance of the amendments proposed by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs concerning Bill S-5.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Beaudoin gave an excellent explanation of the reasons behind the three amendments that were made. I am almost tempted to ask that third reading be given now.

Senator Berntson: We would have nothing to do tomorrow, then.

Senator Olson: It is the usual practice of this honourable house that when a bill comes back from any committee — and I am not saying that it is mandatory — third reading is asked for at the next sitting so that any member who may have any interest in those amendments may at least look at them.

I wish to thank Senator Beaudoin for an excellent explanation.

On motion of Senator Olson, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Budget — Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration), presented in the Senate on June 2, 1994.

Hon. Peter Bosa, for Senator Hastings, moved that the report be adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT AND THE NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT — REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs (Budget — Study International Exchanges) presented in the Senate on June 2, 1994.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I move that the report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, having attended all these meetings, I wish to draw to the attention of the Senate the remarkable presentation made by the chairman in explaining the budget. Those who would like to know more should get in touch with the members of the subcommittee and the committee. The explanations were of a most concise, precise and interesting nature. I certainly would not hold up the budget.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE BUDGET

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Phillips, calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 22, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Atkins).

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Spivak has asked to speak on this inquiry, and that is fine as far as I am concerned.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, a number of senators on this side of the house have made admirable responses to the inquiry that Senator Phillips presented. It is not my intention to go into the budget in detail. I merely want to make some comments on one particular aspect, namely the lessons that can be learned from abroad, and from other places in "greening" a budget.

In introducing his budget last year, British Prime Minister John Major referred to his budget as "the greenest budget ever." What Prime Minister Major was reflecting is the realization that has become increasingly common in Europe. The framing of budget policy is usually carried out with very careful attention to the likely impact of the budget on the economy — that is, such things as international money markets, exchange rates, job creation, levels of inflation, and other economic indicators.

These effects of budget policy are closely watched by business commentators, interest groups, opposition parties, economists, the media and even the average person. However, budget policies, on the other hand, are not usually framed with the environment in mind, even though a government's budget policies will have more of an impact on the environment than anything else the government may do.

For example, extensive subsidies to resource industries are common to all governments, which greatly accelerates the rates at which our forests, minerals and fish stocks are depleted. In the same way, all governments have historically subsidized and underpriced oil, gas, coal and other fossil fuels, a practice followed in the name of economic development, but a practice which also leads to excessive energy consumption, reduced gains in energy efficiency, higher levels of CO_2 in the atmosphere, and slow progress in the development of less harmful energy alternatives.

The question is whether in the future, if Europe is an indication, Canadians can be expected to take a harder look at their budget policies and ask whether they are good for the environment or bad for the environment? If the current mix of tax and subsidy policies is not working for the environment and sustainable resource use, what changes are required?

One very important step in this direction was promised in the recent federal budget. I welcome the commitment to strike a task force whose mandate is to identify budget policies that act as barriers and disincentives to sound environmental management. I would hope that the task force will examine closely the lessons from Europe and elsewhere. There are now more and more international precedents in the "greening" of government budgets.

The experience of Sweden is not the only example, but it is one of the more interesting. Sweden's tax system is currently undergoing a major overhaul. Income tax is being reduced, with the money to pay for the cuts coming from a broader tax base, which now includes energy and environmental taxes. New carbon dioxide and sulphur taxes have been introduced, for example. These changes will transfer almost $3 billion a year from taxes on earned incomes to various types of energy and environmental taxes.

These are ideas that are rooted in the late 1960s. According to the thinking that developed at that time, consumption of fresh air and clean water is comparable to the consumption of housing, clothing and books. The question was how practicable pricing systems could be found for these environmental resources which had been regarded as free goods.

In simple terms, the argument was that people would be more careful with the environment if they themselves felt the cost which emissions or exploitation of a particular natural resource represented. The cost which a deteriorating environment entailed for the community as a whole would be transferred into cost to firms in the form of charges or taxes. It would no longer be possible to pollute for free.

Questions of environmental taxes and charges have been discussed for quite some time, but only relatively recently have economic instruments become a force to be reckoned with in environmental policy. Until the early 1980s, the very few economic instruments in use were still experimental and limited in scope. Governments relied heavily on legislation and regulation, and the economic approach had little place in environmental policies.

A distinct shift took place during the first half of the 1980s and has since gathered pace. An OECD report published in 1989 identified some 150 instances of various economic instruments in 14 countries of which 80 were pollution charges and taxes. Things have moved on considerably since then, and numerous countries, especially in Scandinavia, have introduced new economic instruments.

Between 1987 and early 1993, the number of economic instruments increased by 50 per cent. The most significant growth has been in energy and air pollution taxes, which are becoming increasingly "green": carbon taxes in Denmark, Finland, Norway, Sweden, and the Netherlands; sulphur taxes in France, Norway and Sweden.

Heavier taxation on leaded petrol in numerous countries has done much to encourage wider use of lead-free fuel. Many other polluting products, such as pesticides, fertilizers, packaging, oil wastes and so on, have been taxed. Hence the emergence, still tentative but genuine, of a pattern of "green" public finance and budgeting policies, which, if taken to its logical conclusion, implies real tax reform, as in Sweden.

Some of the best examples warranting attention for Canada in the years ahead lie in the following area: new taxation policies that tackle air pollution problems, such as acid rain and ozone depletion, and reforms to subsidy programs that encourage environmental stewardship in the agricultural sector.

Since the late 1960s, when the concept of acid rain first gained public attention, the problems of air pollution have come more sharply into focus as their visible toll has mounted. From the dead and dying trees in Germany's Black Forest to the depleted red spruce stands on the Eastern U.S. seaboard, the effects of air pollutants have become abundantly clear.

The evidence that air pollutants do not respect political boundaries has stimulated a serious response in recent years among industrialized nations. This response notwithstanding, most scientific projections indicate that air pollution effects will get much worse before they get better, particularly in view of development patterns in developing regions in Central Europe.

Large-scale forest decline is probably the most alarming manifestation of the effects of acid rain. The rapid decline of European forests since the 1970s is the most dramatic example to date. According to one recent analysis, about 75 per cent of Europe's commercial forests have suffered.

In Germany, forest surveys indicate that over half of all trees had suffered some defoliation damage by 1989, though the rate of forest decline there shows signs of lessening. In many parts of Central Europe and the Baltic Republics, damage is even more serious and the rate of decline seems to be increasing.

Forest die-back of such dimensions has substantial economic costs. A 1990 study put the cost of pollution damage to European forests at roughly $30 billion a year, equal to the revenues of Germany's steel industry, three times as much as Europe's current financial commitment to air pollution abatement. Forest decline is also evident in North America, although not yet on the scale found in Europe.

Given the widening scope of the air pollution problem, it became increasingly clear that there had to be a coordinated multinational response to pollution abatement. It is not surprising that the European Community became the first to act, since, there, the trans-boundary effects of pollution were most apparent.

In 1979, 35 nations from Central and Western Europe and North America signed a convention on long-range transboundary air pollution. This has become a fairly effective mechanism for reducing regional emissions. As a result, substantial declines in SO_2 emissions have already been realized in the industrial world, especially in Europe, where overall SO_2 emissions have fallen more than 20 per cent from 1980 to 1989.

In several countries where the political momentum for pollution abatement is particularly strong, much greater reductions have been made. For instance, Germany, whose concern over forest decline runs deep, reduced sulphur dioxide emissions by 53 per cent from 1980 to 1989.

Going even further in solving the problems of air pollution will continue to require a mix of technical improvements and policy initiatives. On the technical side, coal washing, switching to a lower sulphur fuel, and the application of pollution reduction technologies, such as stack "scrubbers," have achieved impressive results.

In terms of public policy, policy-makers in industrialized countries have turned in recent years to the marketplace by providing economic incentives that reward polluters for developing and deploying cost-effective abatement schemes.

Perhaps the simplest application of this principle is the pollution tax, under which emitters are taxed per unit of pollutant discharged. France became the first nation to impose a direct pollution tax in May 1990, when a tax on SO_2 emissions was established. A more comprehensive statute that places new taxes and charges on CO_2 and nitrogen oxide or NO_x emissions, in addition to SO_2, came into effect in Sweden.

The Swedish nitrogen oxide charge is a leading example of how an economic instrument can be used to reduce pollution without distorting the competitiveness of the industry. Since January 1991, in Sweden, a charge has been levied on actual nitrogen oxide emissions from large combustion plants for energy reduction. Smaller combustion plants are not liable, because of the high cost of continuously measuring the emissions. Most of the liable combustion plants are found in energy production, that is, heating and power plants.

The pulp and paper industry, the chemical industry and the metal industry also have combustion plants for energy production. Waste incineration plants producing energy are also liable for the charge for nitrogen oxide in Sweden. The charge is not a tax. All revenues from the charge are distributed back to the plants — but in proportion to the plants' energy production. In other words, "clean" plants will earn money from the system, while "dirty" ones will have to pay.

• (1600)

The refund system was necessary in order to achieve a fair system. The competition between small — that is, non-liable — and large — that is, liable — combustion plants would have been distorted if the charge was not refunded back to the liable plants. The fact that the charge is refunded and therefore only has an environmental purpose, not a revenue raising purpose, has facilitated acceptance of the charge. There is no doubt that it is a successful instrument for reducing nitrogen oxide emissions.

Many companies started reducing nitrogen oxide as soon as the parliamentary decision was taken in 1990 in order to have as low emissions as possible when the charge came into force in January, 1992, and so the expected reduction in 1992 of 35 per cent for 1995 was fully reached.

The Swedish refundable tax on acid rain is, in many respects, a close cousin of the idea of transferable emission discharge permits or credits. In these kinds of schemes, an overall emissions cap is set within a region, and permits are required for all emissions. If a facility reduces emissions further or more quickly than required, it earns emissions credits that can be applied to future emissions or sold to others. The owners of other facilities can then opt to purchase these credits to cover their emissions, or take abatement measures themselves with whatever technology they choose.

The United States was the first to adopt this flexible approach when it updated its air pollution laws in 1990. A similar system has been discussed in Europe as well, although the multitude of different jurisdictions there would present administration difficulties.

Before leaving the subject of air pollution, let me give one last example: the United States tax on CFCs. As part of the U.S. plan to implement the Montreal Protocols under the Vienna Convention, in 1989 Congress enacted a $4.3-billion excise tax on ozone-depleting chemicals, ODCs. The tax has been a major success in reducing CFC production. Although the Environmental Protection Agency issued regulations capping the total emission of CFCs, chemical producers have been induced by the tax to produce lower amounts of CFCs than allowed by the caps in every year since the tax was enacted. The tax has twice been raised and is a significant source of revenue. The most striking effect of the tax has been to encourage technological development. Most of the major producers of ODCs are now, by their own account, producing replacement chemicals which are less expensive, more effective, and more environmentally benign than those they replaced.

It is true that this is an example of the kind of tax often resisted by business, but the example is nonetheless instructive. It was the United States which first realized that CFC production was dangerously unsustainable. The result is that American firms have prospered in the quest for an ozone-friendly generation of chemicals. With the spur of increased taxation and the opportunity of new markets, they led the way in research and patents for ozone-friendly refrigerants and solvents, and in profits. Their dominant market share of the new product lines, established early, guarantees continued profitability.

To turn to the subject of agricultural subsidy reforms, Jim McNeill was Secretary General of the Brundtland Commission and principal author of their final report. According to his research, reforms to agricultural support programs are essential if better environmental management is to be achieved in the farming sector. I quote from the report:

> Take agriculture, for example. Agricultural subsidies provide one of the best examples of unwittingly destructive policies.

That can be interpreted to mean government budget policies.

> Virtually the entire food cycle in North America, Western Europe and Japan attracts huge direct or indirect subsidies. These subsidies encourage farmers to occupy marginal lands and to clear forests and woodlands. They induce farmers to use excessive amounts of pesticides and fertilizers and to waste underground and surface waters in irrigation.
> According to the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) and other sources, the farm-subsidy structure now costs Western governments in excess of $300 billion a year. What conservation programs can compete with that?

With the conclusion of the recent GATT negotiations, many existing agricultural subsidy programs will have to be scaled back or reformed, which offers an opportunity to "green" these programs and put environmental stewardship up front as one of their primary goals.

Over the past ten years, limited steps have been taken in these directions. For example, in 1985, the European Community approved a directive for funding management agreements to protect environmentally sensitive areas. The ESA designation which has been used in the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, France and the Netherlands, permits agricultural ministries to pay farmers to retain traditional agricultural practices in order to maintain biologically important habitats and traditional landscaping. The United Kingdom has identified ESAs where farmers can be paid to maintain or improve the environment by, for example, deferring hay making, using less fertilizer, or leaving their fields unploughed.

One of the most ambitious land retirement programs established to date is the Conservation Reserve Program in the United States which was created by the Food Security Act of 1985. The program pays farmers to idle highly erodible land for ten years. About 14 million hectares were enroled as of 1991. U.S. farm programs also link eligibility for federal benefits to compliance with conservation programs.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I regret to have to interrupt, but the honourable senator's allotted speaking time has expired. She would be allowed to continue if there were unanimous consent.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Spivak: Thank you, honourable senators.

For highly erodible croplands not covered by the CRP, farmers must implement an approved conservation plan by 1995 or lose eligibility for nearly all federal program benefits. Other provisions of the 1985 law deny eligibility for farm program payments to any farmers who plough previously uncultivated highly erodible land or drain wetlands for cultivation. The effectiveness of these programs is greatest in periods of low commodity prices when farmers rely most on government benefits.

Other governments have taken steps to subsidize protection of environmentally fragile lands. The U.K. Countryside Commission provides premiums to farmers who implement environmentally preferred management practices on set-aside lands. In almost all German townships, farmers can receive payments to protect native plants and animals by leaving some meadows uncropped, and avoiding the application of certain fertilizers and pesticides on grasslands and on the edges of fields. Most such programs are managed by the state level "Lander" governments. Sweden and some other European countries provide investment aid to farmers who upgrade manure storage facilities. Portugal, as part of its program to reduce soil erosion, offers subsidy and loans to farmers for reforestation and establishment of permanent pastures.

Some European governments subsidize the conversion to organic farming, both as a means to alleviate environmental problems and as a way to reduce agricultural surpluses. The rationale for the subsidies is that, during the transition to organic farming, farmers must usually make some capital investment, yet they are unable to charge premium prices for their produce until it is certifiably organic, which usually takes two to five years. Yields may also decline, especially in the first few years.

To help farmers get through this transition period, countries such as Austria, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Norway, Sweden and some cantons in Switzerland offer conversion subsidies, usually for three years. The Swedish subsidy program seems to have made a difference in farmers' decisions. One thousand farmers signed up when state aid was available in 1989, but only 85 farmers started converting without the aid the following year.

As these examples illustrate, the "greening" of government budgets offers some very important insights into the relationship between budget making and the environment, and some enormous new possibilities for improved resource and environmental management. A government's taxation subsidy policies offer important new instruments as governments search for the means to achieve sustainable development and environment-friendly economic progress.

The recently announced task force in the budget statement should be urged to think boldly in its work. It should be guided by the simple principle of "subsidize the goods and tax the bads." This principle would create the proper framework for realigning economic progress along more sustainable and environmentally friendly lines.

This principle sounds deceptively simple, and, of course, to follow the principle is easier said than done. Moving from principle to practice will present its full share of problems and adjustments, since it will involve in many cases a full-scale reversal of the way we do things. As Lester Brown, President of World Watch, has said:

> Collectively, governments spend tens of billions of dollars a year supporting environmentally unsound economic practices. Subsidized irrigation services, biased utility regulation, and below-cost timber sales are but a sampling of the numerous public programs that result in wasteful resource use and environmental damage. Often just where taxes are justified to reduce a harmful activity, a public subsidy instead promotes it.

We can, however, if we take full measure here in Canada of what we can learn from abroad, overcome these difficulties. They are not insurmountable and they should not be an excuse for inaction.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I rise today to join the budget debate, and I do so as a spokesperson from Atlantic Canada. One of our main functions as senators is to represent the regions from which we are appointed, and I believe this budget has a negative impact on the Atlantic provinces.

No, I shall not speak about the disproportionate share of military base closures that Atlantic Canada has had to endure. The economy of this area is not tied to one or two military bases, and one of the wonderful characteristics of the people of this area of Canada is their ability to adapt. We have adapted to change since the sailing ship went out of existence, and we can certainly adapt to the closure of bases, as difficult as that may be.

I should like to speak this afternoon about the fact that there is nothing in the budget to aid the entrepreneurial sector of the economy. Business, manufacturing, industry: These are the engines that drive our economy in Atlantic Canada, and I can find little in this budget that would give business any degree of confidence to invest in Canada or, in particular, in my part of Canada.

Honourable senators, you should know that in the east, as well as having been blessed at one time with enormous natural resources of fish stocks, minerals and forests, we as a people have also developed and maintained an entrepreneurial spirit which is second to none anywhere in this country. I suppose this love of establishing businesses and industries grew out of the fact that Canada, long before it was Canada, began to be settled in the east, and the east had to be self-sufficient and self-sustaining. That meant that it had to have its own indigenous business, manufacturing and industrial class. This group was involved in making items both for domestic consumption and for sale abroad, because, do not forget, it was we in Atlantic Canada who were capitalizing on trade opportunities with the world long before trade became an issue in Upper and Lower Canada.

The entrepreneurial class in Eastern Canada is legendary. Lord Beaverbrook, Max Aiken, with his love of newspapers and media, became recognized internationally because of his holdings. Such a list would of course include K.C. Irving and many of the offshoots of his petroleum empire. More recently, you have the Ganong chocolate manufacturing plant in New Brunswick and of course the McCain frozen food empire which now supplies the globe.

It has been this spirit, this drive to do business with the world, to take on the world, that has sustained the economy of the Atlantic region throughout the years, because, as you know, the resource industries, agriculture, mining and fish, are cyclical in nature, depending sometimes on the weather and sometimes on the vagaries of world markets for success, whereas the entrepreneurial class, those who are part of it, will tell you that their success is directly related to the amount of energy and hard work invested and the intelligent decisions that are made to overcome the competition.

This entrepreneurial spirit is still alive in Atlantic Canada and is starting to emerge from the world-wide recession we have endured. This group has taken advantage of the trade opportunities that were put in place through the Free Trade Agreement with the United States, and with the NAFTA agreement negotiated by the previous Progressive Conservative government and now so heavily endorsed by members opposite.

For example, according to the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, Newfoundland's newsprint mills have recovered by being remarkably versatile in switching sales between North American and European markets, depending on where the demand lies. Sales to other markets, such as Latin America, have also increased.

While Prince Edward Island's economy still rests on exportation of lobsters and potatoes, in 1993 a full 15 per cent of its exports were manufactured goods, such as eyeglass frames, medical diagnostic kits, kitchen pots and fish vaccines. This is new for Prince Edward Island, and with this diversification the economy is strengthened.

We are fortunate in Nova Scotia to have a growing diversified export base, which will help to alleviate the problems in the fish and lumbering industries. Nova Scotia exports such end products as tires, cars, electronic and navigation equipment and aerospace devices. Since 1992 these exports have totalled more than a quarter of the exports of Nova Scotia and are now approaching one third of the total.

Although New Brunswick exports more than the other three Atlantic provinces, only 3 per cent of exports are manufactured end products. Exports still rely heavily on markets for the products of the resource-based economy.

As Bob Doherty, Senior Policy Coordinator of the Nova Scotia Economic Renewal Agency, said recently at the Atlantic Trade and Export Forum held in Halifax:

> Although many traditional markets may be in decline we have seen some success in both lumber and fish. More value added manufacturing is being done to traditional products. The people that are being successful are going after new markets aggressively; they are thinking about new niches and new products.
> One of the things that trade deals like the GATT and NAFTA are about is a greater capability to have export protectionist problems solved. There are now mechanisms to deal with these problems that were not there before the FTA. So there are more opportunities to trade and more opportunities to have road blocks solved when you run into them.

However, honourable senators, although this recovery based on trade is very fragile, it is on the verge of taking off. The Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has recently published an inventory of major opportunities in Atlantic Canada, and the list is impressive. What impresses is that when you strip away the government projects like the fixed link there are many small private expansion projects that are scheduled to take off this year or next. But the question is, will they? Will more projects join them? These are the critical questions, because, I submit, there was nothing present in the February budget that would give industry the confidence necessary to invest or reinvest in areas that would stimulate the economy and create jobs from these new companies.

After inflating the deficit figure and creating alarm in the investment and industrial community, the finance minister did nothing to reduce the deficit in this budget, nothing in terms of real spending cuts that could bring back confidence to our economy. In fact the recent estimates show an overall increase of more than $3 billion in government spending.

I realize that the budget speech by the Minister of Finance stressed help for small businesses and the need to create jobs. However, anything productive that may come from these statements must await the conclusion of reviews and task forces.

There was little immediate action. There are studies on social problems and the GST; a task force to work with banks and small business on the subject of lending money; studies on how to successfully export goods, and another task force to study the removal of regulations that may have a negative impact on the growth of small businesses. Lots of talk, little action. The promises in the famous "Red Book" remain just that, promises.

There is no coherent plan in the budget for the economy, no coherent plan that business can look to with confidence, no plan that says, "This is the way we will go from here to there, from the beginnings of a recovery to a full scale recovery." There is no coherent plan that would give business the confidence to say that it is going to invest in Canada.

The fact that there was not a word about manufacturing in the budget led Steven Van Houten, President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, to comment as follows:

> The budget measures don't add up to a coherent plan that will help manufacturing grow, modernize and reinvent itself for the 21st century.

Until this government realizes that sustained economic growth depends on a healthy and dynamic manufacturing industry, our chances of economic recovery are very slim. The previous government put in place trading agreements that will be of benefit to business and industry for many years to come. It is up to the present government to build on these initiatives to fulfil the promises of the Red Book. The government must recognize that only business can create sustainable employment. Business generates the investments that lead to innovation and economic growth.

This first budget of this Liberal administration fails to address these fundamental economic truths. It is a disappointment for Canadians and it is a disappointment especially for us in Atlantic Canada.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, debate adjourned.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE THE FUTURE OF AGRICULTURE IN CANADA

Hon. Dan Hays, pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 2, 1994, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized to examine the future of agriculture in Canada and report upon the following:
> a) evaluate present agri-food objectives and modify them for the year 2000 and beyond using, among others, the criteria of fairness, sustainability and sustainable development, competitiveness and efficiency;
> b) examine the agri-food sector's role in rural life and in the Canadian economy;
> c) involve producers, processors, consumers and other interested parties in developing a long-term national strategy for agriculture; and
> d) identify the components that together constitute an overall farm policy that will take the agri-food sector into the next century.
>
> That the committee have power to act jointly with the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri-food of the House of Commons when considering the above order of reference; and
> That the committee present its report no later than March 31, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to speak in support of this motion today, asking the Senate for a reference to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for a rather ambitious study.

I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that Canadian agriculture is at a crossroads. The signposts at the crossroads are the North American Free Trade Agreement, which is a trilateral agreement succeeding the bilateral agreement with the United States. The NAFTA may expand to other Latin American countries with the proposed accession of Chile and Ecuador.

Another signpost is the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which is to be ratified by the Parliament of Canada before January 1. It will probably be ratified by the Congress of the United States before that same date; if not, no later than July 1. There is no indication that this will not happen, although there are problems in the United States that may result in what is called "other than a clean GATT."

Another signpost is that, during the last 10 years, Canadian agriculture — particularly that sector concerned with cereals and oilseeds — has experienced a rather difficult time. In other words, it has been an unprofitable business for most of the people engaged in the production of those commodities, and these farmers have been surviving, for the most part, on off-farm income.

Another signpost is the change in the Government of Canada and the notice of the new government that it intends to replace the current safety net program, namely GRIP — which evolved from the previous government's Growing Together initiatives — with a farm income support program, and that levels of support will be less than those we experienced under the previous government.

Another signpost on this crossroads is that Canada, under the GATT, has given notice that it intends to continue to practise supply management, which came into effect in 1965 for the dairy industry and 1972 for the feather industries, notwithstanding that the philosophical approach of the GATT and the actual agreement runs counter to that particular system of supporting agriculture.

Another crossroad is that the beef industry has seen the abandonment of national tripartite stabilization as a means of stabilizing the up and down prices in that cyclical commodity. In fact, the pork industry will follow suit on July 2 of that year, abandoning national tripartite stabilization for pork. All in all, we face a very uncertain, difficult, and trying time.

Senator Spivak gave a very interesting speech on the budget and quoted Mr. Jim McNeill as saying that agricultural programs have been unwittingly destructive of the environment, an issue that does come up, and also quantifying the costs of agricultural support at some $300 billion per annum on a developed world basis. That is probably a little higher than it actually is in these times, but nonetheless it tends to highlight the reality of agriculture, which is that it has been heavily supported. That heavy support has not always metamorphosed into an effective and efficient means of supporting the people we want to support, namely, farmers. We usually characterize those farmers we are targeting for support as family farmers or people on family farms.

Therefore, honourable senators, the motion before you asks for an opportunity on the part of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to do a broad policy field study on what should be happening in Canadian agriculture at this time. However, we will not be conducting this study in isolation. Other countries — the United States, notably — are in precisely the same position as we are, having signed the GATT and made similar commitments on environmental issues. They have a similar propensity to support agriculture, but in a less enlightened way than we do. That tends to give rise to bilateral concerns, such as those involving pork exports from Canada to the United States and the export of cereal grains — in particular, durum wheat and barley — to the United States. American politicians have given notice that we can expect more problems in those sectors where high volumes of Canadian products are exported to the United States. We should be looking at some of the real reasons as to why these areas are having problems. That is one of the things that the committee, in its work, will be able to do.

Honourable senators, setting out on a journey of any kind, particularly the beginning of a study such as this, is always interesting because you do not know exactly where you will end up. The language of the reference is to the effect that we would like to evaluate our present policies and hear testimony from departmental witnesses, academics, producer groups, individual farmers and people living in rural areas as to what they think should be the future direction of Canadian agricultural policy. I believe that the Senate committee is ideally suited, given its membership, to carry out such a study.

I point out, honourable senators, that the intention of the committee is not to do this study alone, but to do so in conjunction with the House of Commons Subcommittee on Agriculture and Agri-food; not as a joint committee of the two Houses but rather as two committees sitting together to hear a common body of evidence, and to hopefully come up with a joint report on what it is that we feel, together, should be done by way of the future direction of Canadian agriculture. If not, it is open for us to draft separate reports. If we are unable to get along, I suppose we may find ourselves holding separate hearings, although that is not the intention at the beginning of this study.

In the end, honourable senators, it is long-term strategy with which we must concern ourselves. To use the Gross Revenue Insurance Program as an example, it has a life of something less than 10 years, around 6 or 7 years. Through that life, it represented a minor and not a major variation on the traditional approach to supporting Canadian agriculture.

At this time, given the agreements and signposts I have referred to, we must make dramatic changes in the way we address the problems we face. A book that has prompted a lot of thinking on the development of agricultural policy is entitled Sacred Cows and Hot Potatoes — Agrarian Myths in Agricultural Policy. In its conclusion, it sums up something that we should have in mind as we proceed with this study. It admonishes those who wish to reform agriculture.

I would ask honourable senators to bear in mind that this is an American text with American references that I will not change for purposes of this speech, but will read them as they are. I wish to state at the outset that I believe they apply equally to the development of Canadian agricultural policy. The admonition is to:

> Develop specific programs to address rural development needs. While many of these needs are more appropriately the concern of state and local governments, the federal government has a role in providing services to rural areas. Rural development can be farm policy if it broadens opportunities for small scale farmers.

The policies must:

> Recognize that farm size, location, and economic circumstances influence who gains and who loses from federal agricultural programs. If benefits continue, they must be directed to particular classes of farms if they are to achieve any meaningful social or economic goals.

They must:

> Insist that farm program benefits, if they continue, no longer be tied to production. By linking program outlays with production, policies inflate land prices and make U.S. agriculture less competitive in international markets. Furthermore, production-linked benefits tend to encourage more environmental damage than would otherwise occur.

I hark back to Senator Spivak's speech.

They should:

> Recognize that an uncertain macroeconomic environment will play a major role in determining farm income, but that these uncertainties cannot be addressed through specific agricultural policies.

They must:

> Recognize the need for institutions that can help farmers manage risk in a way that does not influence land prices or production.

They must:

> Recognize that there are conflicting objectives in existing agricultural programs that attempt to address environmental concerns. New programs must be goal directed, not means directed.

And, finally, they must:

> Determine food programs for the hungry and disadvantaged on the basis of need, not on the basis of farm program goals.

There are many quotes that I could bring to the chamber that signal to all of us that there is a group of people who represent the full spectrum of taxpayers and consumers, and who, through commodity prices or taxes, pay to fund the development of programs and their subsequent administration and payouts under those programs. They will want to be involved in the policies that we develop to support Canadian agriculture.

That being the case, the hearings that the committee proposes to have will be broadened beyond simple producer groups to include representative groups of consumers and taxpayers, because failure to do so will simply leave us with a continuation of the focus that producers themselves tend to become wrapped up in, and thereby tend to lose sight of the importance of general support for programs.

Honourable senators, I hope I have given you a sense of what it is that the committee proposes and that it is sufficient for you to make a decision or ask me questions on what it is that we propose to do. The terms of reference are very broad and they speak for themselves. We are, as I observed earlier, attempting to do this in conjunction with the Standing Committee of the House of Commons dealing with agriculture, and have had discussions with them on this matter. We may wish to have representative groups from the committee do some work in the communities affected by agricultural policy, in terms of their economic sustainability and the continuance of infrastructure that allows people to still live in rural areas.

We also have a special interest in how the United States will respond to the same challenges that we face. If it responds in a vastly different manner, that may tend to aggravate the trade problems that we presently have in the bilateral relationship, and it will be even more aggravated in the trilateral relationship if Mexico becomes involved. Hopefully, through meeting with our counterparts in the United States, either here or there, we will be able to discover what it is they have in mind, determine what we should have in mind, and come up with some solutions that are sufficiently synergistic or compatible that we will not run into the aggravating situation that we face now in some commodity sectors.

Honourable senators, I would be happy to answer any questions at the present time in the chamber, in the committee, or privately, and will consider any suggestions offered. I urge you to support this request for this reference to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I am interested in this proposed reference because of the work of the Foreign Affairs Committee. That committee has been authorized to study the implementation of the NAFTA as well as "any other related trade developments." If this motion carries, there would be something of an overlap, but certainly the overlap is not so great as to affect the viability of the study now proposed.

I am interested in hearing Senator Hays make reference to taking advantage of what the Americans are thinking may be the answers to their version of the agriculture problem. In addition, I urge the Agriculture Committee, if it goes ahead, to look into the Mexican situation where, given the nature of the rural economy, agribusiness may have serious economic, social and political implications.

How does the Senate committee propose to solve the problem of shared expenses with the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri-food of the House of Commons? What is proposed is a major study to deal with a major problem, so I assume that the expenses will be high. Will those costs be shared jointly? If so, what will be the split? I ask this because of the questions raised by Senator Lynch-Staunton earlier today about the availability of money to meet the expenses of committees of this house.

Senator Hays: I thank the honourable senator for his question. I will attempt to deal with the issues raised. The study of the Agriculture and Forestry Committee would have a narrower focus than the Foreign Affairs Committee in that we would not include some of the difficult problems such as softwood lumber, steel and anti-dumping, although anti-dumping is as relevant to agricultural commodities as it is to any commodity. Ours would be a more narrow focus and, I think, compatible and perhaps helpful to the Foreign Affairs Committee in terms of the evidence that we might hear and share with the committee through our report.

In terms of the suggestion that perhaps having the same programs as the U.S. to deal with the same problems is not necessarily compatible with or sympathetic to Canadian sovereignty in terms of our own solution to our own problems, I point out that our own problems will require our own solutions. That is because our resource sector and our climate is different, and because we have a different method of governance which will lead us, necessarily, to a different solution.

The truth of the matter is that in the supply managed sector, for instance, the United States has supply managed commodities under the heading "Marketing Orders." They will use tarification to protect them. For precisely how long they will do that, I do not know. The challenge there is that the philosophy of the GATT is to use tarification to phase them out, something which is totally inconsistent with their continuation over the long term. If they are to be continued over the long term, which is what the Government of Canada says it intends, then what is the justification in the next GATT round, or World Trade Organization negotiation, to distinguish them from other areas where tarification applies for purposes of phasing out those forms of protection and having comparative advantage take over?

We are most interested to see how the United States will respond to a problem which is the same as ours. If the general philosophy, which seems to be driven by what I call "big agriculture," is to eliminate borders or to drive the means by which we produce these primary agricultural commodities, then we have a clash. Of course, they process and distribute most of these commodities on an integrated basis.

Today, in a news report which I heard on the radio, the OECD has stated that job creation would be well served by lower minimum wages, by less regulation of labour markets and by freeing up employers to hire whomever they want at whatever they can get them at. That is a return, Senator Stewart, to a 19th century approach. I submit that a lot of the 19th century problems will accompany that approach.

Another study that this committee is working on is farm health and safety. Farming is one of the most dangerous and risky operations. More people, many of whom are children, are killed or maimed in this sector than in any other industrial sector. This is because it is a sector under financial stress, and because we have recognized freedom of labour. We do not have workers' compensation in many jurisdictions and we produce things with the cheapest possible labour. This is something we have to look at most carefully. It is of as much interest to the United States and the Mexico as it is to us.

The Chiapas situation, in which the Zapatistas actually shoot and kill one another over this issue, is something else that highlights the risk of going too far in that direction.

In terms of the expenses issue, we have not reached any conclusion. What comes first is to get our reference in place. We will then go for our budget. The idea of the two committees hearing evidence at the same time is really to save money. That was prompted by the fact that we share a common research support group in the Library of Parliament, although we may wish to have a budget item for supplementary research. However, we may not be able to come up with a common report.

I, too, heard the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate express concern about having used up our budget for committees. Honestly, I do not have an answer for him, other than to say that this is important work. The fact that we come to the budget table late should not put us in any worse position than those who went to the table early.

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I rise in support of the request made by the Honourable Senator Hays.

I do not want to belabour this matter today. However, I do not think there are too many issues in our country that are more important than what we have seen in agriculture. I am speaking now about some of the deterioration which has taken place.

In 1970, a barrel of oil sold for $1. At the same time, a bushel of wheat sold for $1. Today, you can deliver to my home town of Macoun a bushel of wheat for which you will receive something in the order of $2.40. I read today in The Globe and Mail that a barrel of oil is priced at $18.

I realize there is a risk that the general public will say, "The farmers have their hands out again." However, the problem is that our strength in North America, especially in Canada, has lain in having a strong agricultural community. That community is deteriorating. There are a lot of young farmers who are hanging on and who are sinking. They are in big trouble. I will not belabour the point. Honourable senators are well aware of the numbers, just as I am.

However, I do want to say this. We ask the question: Why the Senate? I understand there was some opposition from one of the parties with regard to the Senate becoming involved. I also understand that that problem was overcome in a positive way. I think there is some expertise in the Senate. In that regard, I think of the Honourable Senators Olson, Berntson, Hays, St. Germain, Spivak, and many others who have an interest in this matter, and who can make a contribution that will not be that costly.

The witnesses are to appear before the House of Commons Standing Committee. Why not have members of our committee sit in with members of the Commons committee to hear these witnesses? I hope we can write a joint report. If that is not possible, then we will write an independent report.

I appeal for this measure on the basis of its importance. There are few subjects in Canada today that are more important, given the GATT and the whole new approach to the global economy. I understand that the Americans are to cut their export enhancement program by 50 per cent next year. That will impact one way or another on us, recognizing that they are our second largest buyer today.

I was pleased to read in the newspaper today what Mr. Kantor said. He said that the U.S. does $6 billion to $8 billion in trade with Canada. We are the two largest trading nations in the world. He said that we can certainly overcome a little problem on the grain situation. I was very pleased to read his comments.

I urge honourable senators to support this motion. From an economics point of view, it makes good sense to carry out this study jointly. I am sure that members on our side of the house, as well as those on the government side, will give the committee this opportunity to do the best possible job that can be done.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, June 8, 1994, at 1:30 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE SENATE

ROLE OF THE OPPOSITION

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I think the Leader of the Conservative Party may have been misquoted in an article that might have escaped his attention. It was an article that appeared in The Edmonton Journal. The last paragraph of the story, which was dealing with the electoral boundaries legislation, states as follows:

> Basking in the new-found relevance was Tory Leader Jean Charest, who proudly pointed to his senators' constructive approach, unlike the Liberal senators a few years ago who blew whistles and kazoos to protest the GST legislation.

That was attributed to the Leader of the Conservative Party, a party which Senator Lynch-Staunton leads here. Senator Lynch-Staunton was present at the time and, therefore, he can inform Mr. Charest, in case Mr. Charest was not misquoted. Senator Lynch-Staunton knows that the behaviour which some thought outrageous, and that he describes, was not to protest the GST legislation but to protest the outrageous action of then Speaker Charbonneau — unprecedented anywhere in the parliamentary world — in holding a vote in the absence of the locked-out opposition senators. Knowing Senator Lynch-Staunton's passion for accuracy, I am sure he will want to correct his leader.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I wish to return us to the mood of yesterday when we commemorated the fiftieth anniversary of D-day. In that vein, I wish to draw attention to the YMCA.

The YMCA is recognized for its role in leadership training. On Monday, June 6, 1994, Young Men's Christian Associations the world over, including the 64 in Canada, marked 150 years of service to countless people and communities

It was on June 6, 1844 that 12 young Englishmen, led by George Williams, formalized their Bible study meetings into the first YMCA. Since then, YMCAs have become active in 114 countries. They have given birth to the "holistic" approach to people's development. Equal emphasis continues to be placed on the simultaneous nurturing of the spiritual, mental, physical and social aspects of every being. This YMCA fundamental is projected in many ways, including the three bars making up its world renowned symbol, the red triangle.

Through their collective history, YMCAs have also originated "second chances," learning opportunities, recreational camping, basketball, and the partnership approach to international development. I should note that it was Canadian James Naismith who as a physical director studying at the YMCA Training School in Springfield, Massachusetts, created basketball.

Beginning in 1851, YMCAs in Canada have played a major part in the following activities: promoting lifelong learning by introducing night school to this country, and by later participating in the creation of three universities — Concordia, Carleton and York, and by offering a range of community-based educational programs today; advancing physical fitness and healthy well-being among Canadians; developing quality child care, becoming the country's largest not-for-profit provider; setting professional standards for the operation of community service organizations; and an activity that is often overlooked in Canada, that is, providing services to Canadian troops in the Fenian Raids, the Boer War, the Great War and the Second World War; bringing relief to prisoners of war, and news to their families during the two world wars; offering social and recreational services to railroad and industrial workers; initiating international development projects; and in calling attention to the changing social conditions affecting Canadian youth, and actively responding to them.

YMCAs in Canada have also helped extend the reach in this country of such organizations as the World University Service of Canada, the Canadian Council of Churches, Boy Scouts and the Royal Life Saving Society.

The 64 YMCAs in Canada, serving hundreds of communities in all provinces, are operated by 24,000 volunteers and 3,000 full-time staff members. They serve 700,000 members and participate through YMCA health, fitness and recreation programs; offering 36,000 children and their families YMCA child care; and countless numbers of participants in YMCA camping, self-employment, employment preparation and training, job research and placement, literacy and English-language training, immigrant settlement, international development aid and education, and short-term housing.

For 150 years, YMCAs have helped to cast light on some of the behaviours, customs and attitudes that have blocked people's development. At the same time, they have brought light to those seeking release, redress, or a sense of real being and belonging. In fact, the YMCA has led in identifying and attempting to solve issues as they relate particularly to families and young people.

I ask honourable senators to join me in this chamber and throughout Canadian communities in celebrating this anniversary.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

CABLE SERVICE TO FRENCH-SPEAKING COMMUNITIES

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, in the speech that I am about to deliver, I would like to embrace the position of the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes du Canada in the wake of the decision by the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission to grant to the CBC, the state broadcasting service, a license to operate the Réseau de l'information, a French all-news channel.

> The proposed delivery mode for the CBC's new RDI channel is a major affront to this country's francophone and Acadian communities.
> It is a scandalous decision, a serious oversight on the part of the CRTC in terms of its mandate.

In the words of Mrs. Lanteigne, the President of the Federation:

> How can the CRTC justify awarding a license to the CBC when it had submitted a truncated proposal which did not even live up to its national mandate, as set out in the Broadcasting Act?

Mrs. Lanteigne further believes — and I share her views — that:

> This constitutes an infringement of our rights.

In the wake of this decision, if the Governor in Council does not move to give favourable consideration to the appeal of their federation...

> The francophone and Acadian communities face the prospect of never having access to the channel, considering that the service delivery mode advocated by the CBC involves carrying the signal to basic cable services in francophone markets and to optional services in English markets. The fact is that virtually all francophone and Acadian communities are located in English markets.
> In other words, the CBC is relying on cable companies to act in good faith and carry the service in English markets. In the past, no guarantee that this would be the case has ever been given.
> The federation's fears are all the more justified in that the Canadian Cable Television Association, in its access policy which was recently endorsed by this same CRTC, merely invites cable companies to carry French-language television services in English markets when circumstances so warrant.

In Mrs. Lanteigne's opinion, which I and the vast majority of Acadians whom I represent in this house share —

> — this action is tantamount to the complete abdication by the CRTC of its authority over the Canadian cable industry.
> That is why, when it appeared before the CRTC last March, the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes du Canada urged the commission to compel cable companies to carry the signal across Canada, basing their arguments specifically on the provisions of the Broadcasting Act.
> The CBC's mandate and its responsibilities toward our communities are quite explicit. If the CRTC is incapable of complying with the Broadcasting Act, I suggest that other bodies could do so in its place.

I spoke of appealing this decision before the Governor in Council and I urge the Minister of Heritage, the Honourable Mr. Dupuy, to firmly support the position of the federation and its request that cable companies be required to carry this service outside Quebec. If that were the case, the CBC and the CRTC would be complying with the mandates entrusted to them by the Parliament of Canada.

PUBLIC SERVICE HEALTH CARE PLAN

DISPARITY IN NURSING CARE COVERAGE

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise this afternoon on a matter that is of somewhat parochial interest, but it affects so many of you that I thought it should be made public, out of concern for every one of you. My case is closed, so I do this in what I think is purely the public interest.

There is a very serious defect in the Public Service Health Care Plan under which all of us are covered, as are thousands of public servants, judges, members of the armed forces — countless numbers, in my imagination. This plan provides for coverage for expenses incurred for services of a "nurse" in a patient's private residence.

The fault in the plan is in its definition of "nurse." I quote from the brochure, which I am sure you have all seen but probably never read:

> Nurse — means a registered nurse, registered nursing assistant, licensed practical nurse and certified nursing assistant who is listed on the appropriate provincial registry and, in the absence of such registry, a nurse with comparable qualifications as determined by the Administrator.

The administrator is actually the insurance company, the underwriter.

Today in many provinces, including Ontario, there is another category known as the certified health care aide. In Ontario, they must follow a nine-month education and training program. Expenses incurred in respect of these people are not covered under our plan.

Here is the background. Today, because of financial constraints, hospitals are discharging patients much faster than heretofore. Today, for the same reason, governments are putting a priority on home care services rather than on in-hospital services, and that can be easily understood. Today, there is an acute shortage of nursing personnel as defined under the plan.

Let me quickly outline the mechanics in retrospect. When you are being discharged, the surgeon may tell you that you will require home nursing care. You will select a nursing agency. The hospital and the agency, without your having any intervention at all unless forewarned, will determine the level of care you are to receive.

As this plan now stands, you should at that point insist on the highest level of nursing care available, at three times the cost, in order to maintain your coverage. This to me is so counterproductive as to be almost farcical. It may cost, as I said, three times as much as a health care aide in Ontario, and even they are very expensive personnel.

I am raising this matter because of the extent of the people covered under this government plan. There are literally thousands of public servants, judges of all the courts, members of Parliament of both Houses, Canadian Armed Forces personnel, and I could go on and on. It certainly is the largest health care plan in Canada.

Its ultimate effect, as it now stands, is completely unrealistic and infinitely more costly, because members may not be aware beforehand of the traps they might fall into. I am sure that many thousands of claims have been rejected in the past, and I suspect that the administration is afraid that opening it up to deal with this problem will produce a floodgate of reapplications.

Honourable senators, I say this with reticence, but my enquiries, which can be conducted by a senator rather more easily than by a member of the public or the public service, lead me to believe that this whole plan is in financial danger and may even go broke without the intervention of the Treasury Board.

• (1350)

Honourable senators, under the circumstances I have raised this matter in the hope that some other senator or senators may deem it of sufficient importance to, at some point, make it the subject of an inquiry and refer it to a committee to look at the structure, the viability of this plan. Mr. Audcent, the Assistant Law Clerk, will be instructed by me to make my file, which he has been handling, available to anyone who is interested. My claim is closed but I did not want to leave with this sword of Damocles hanging over the heads of thousands and thousands of public servants across this country.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I do not wish to engage in debate on the subject, though I do wish to thank the Honourable Senator Lang for bringing this matter to our attention. I should like to assure him that the Standing Committee on Internal Committee, Budgets and Administration will be seized of this subject, and perhaps will undertake an inquiry by way of a task force of that committee, post haste.

QUESTION PERIOD

CHINA

HUMAN RIGHTS AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in a speech on May 31, the Minister of Foreign Affairs formally confirmed what some of his other colleagues, in particular the Prime Minister and the Minister of International Trade, had been saying for some time, that Canada will no longer advance the cause of human rights in any country where export prospects might be jeopardized as a result. Mr. Ouellet, in his pathetically convoluted attempt at justifying the Liberal government's abandonment of a fundamental principle which guided Canadian governments in the past, particularly those of Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Mulroney —

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: — particularly those of Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Mulroney, not to mention Mr. Clark —

Senator Frith: He wants to milk it for all he can get!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Ouellet went so far as to endorse the Premier of Ontario's statement confirming his party's similar abandonment. This is what Mr. Rae said, which is endorsed fully in a speech by Mr. Ouellet:

> We will not advance the cause of human rights one whit by pulling away from extensive commercial, cultural, educational ties.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is the following: How can a government, which justifies its legislative inactivity by a need to consult, consult, consult and study, study, study, abandon such a basic moral obligation without even a minimum of public consultation or study?

Senator Olson: That is a convolution!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The answer will be.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have engaged in this discussion more than once in the past few days.

My friend Senator Lynch-Staunton read from the text, he is saying, of remarks made by the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Perhaps it would be helpful to the house if I could place on the record comments made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on June 1.

I do not have a copy of Mr. Ouellet's speech, but I would say that those two gentlemen would be very much on the same wavelength.

I will quote the Prime Minister from the House of Commons Debates of June 1, 1994, at page 4698:

> Mr. Speaker, this government's policy has always been clear: we deplore regimes that do not respect people's freedom.
> We have told the Chinese government this at every opportunity. However, there is no international boycott of China. All countries in the world do business with China. We believe that the best way to open that society is to open it to the world. After trading extensively with Western countries, the Chinese themselves will recognize that Western values for the protection of human rights are the best. That is the best way to proceed, because if China is completely isolated and cut off, there will be more and more abuse.
> We believe that the method used by this government of condemning them for what they do but continuing to do business with them, as all countries in the world do, and to offer them North American, Canadian or European technology is the best way to bring those people to accept Western values. Completely isolating them is not the way to do it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am sure that the Chinese have been terrified by this little slap on the wrist.

Senator Thériault: No, they are terrified of you!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: May I remind the Leader of the Government in the Senate and her colleagues that Canada took the initiative in the late 1950s, under the leadership of Mr. Diefenbaker, that eventually led to South Africa's complete abandonment of apartheid.

Senator Olson: Come again! Do you think we were born yesterday!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Is the Leader of the Government suggesting that economic sanctions —

Senator MacEachen: Tory icon!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I do not want to engage in a debate with a Liberal icon.

Is the Leader of the Government suggesting that the international community, led by Canada, had no impact on this welcome development in South Africa?

Senator Olson: That is not the point!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You do not like to be reminded, do you?

Senator Fairbairn: You are going back a little bit before my time.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Oh, ancient history. Their election was held last month.

Senator Fairbairn: It was an election that all of us in this country hailed, as did our two Senate representatives who were there in South Africa.

The Canadian position on South Africa has been well known over the decades. The Canadian position on China has been well known over the decades —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Until last week.

Senator Fairbairn: — and those who lead this country have done a considerable amount to bring that enormous country, with its potential, into the community of nations. That is precisely what the Prime Minister of Canada is intent on doing now.

Senator Stewart: The Diefenbaker government traded with China.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Can we assume, then, that the government is at least being consistent in its new policy by supporting increased sanctions against Haiti, since we have no trade with Haiti? Is this what the government's policy is on human rights — enforce sanctions and increase the embargo on pathetic, poor countries like Haiti, but ignore what is going on in the rest of the world when there is a dollar to be made?

Senator Fairbairn: That is not the position of the Canadian government, and I think my friend knows that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, I do not. Tell us about Haiti.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the government has something to hide regarding the closure of the military college at St-Jean.

We have asked several questions. In response, the minister quoted from the Red Book, et cetera. The ministers continue to contradict one another when we present them with figures supporting our arguments. My question is quite straightforward. Does the government have something to hide on this issue?

Senator Thériault: Why do you not ask Lucien Bouchard?

Senator Simard: Perhaps Senator Thériault would give me a chance to complete my question? It should concern him as a representative in this chamber of the Acadian community, of all francophones outside Quebec, and of English-speaking maritimers who benefited from the presence of a military training institution in a French-speaking environment in St-Jean, Quebec!

To explain the meaning of my question, Madam Minister, last week before the Senate Committee on National Finance, Minister Massé told us that 17 per cent of French-speaking officers now in the armed forces went to the college in St-Jean. We set him straight by pointing out that, in fact, 82 per cent of francophone officers went to St-Jean.

A few days later in the House of Commons, Sheila Copps repeated the figures her colleague had quoted two days earlier. On the same issue, the Deputy Prime Minister stated in the House of Commons that it would not cost a penny more in Kingston after the college in St-Jean closes.

Minister Marcel Massé added that he had looked into the repair work and that it had been planned well before the closure of the college in St-Jean was announced.

This inconsistency was denounced by Brigadier General Mack, who indicated that another $19 million, at least, will have to be spent on the construction of a new wing to accommodate the officer cadets from St-Jean.

I give the minister a chance — — to level with the people of Canada and tell us if the government is really hiding something.

[English]

• (1410)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): The government is not attempting to hide anything on the question of the military college in St-Jean. Indeed, the Senate committee probably had very fulsome discussions with more than one minister on this subject while they were, quite properly, studying the Estimates. My friend has quoted a number of different people and a number of different figures. I would be pleased to look at the text of what he has said, and determine whether I can enlighten him further.

Senator Simard: I am pleased to hear the commitment of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The 82-per-cent figure I quoted has been verified by people in St-Jean and other places. We have given at least two ministers the opportunity to say that those figures are wrong. I certainly welcome the undertaking of the minister in this house. She will discover that our figures are right, and I hope that she will inform her three colleagues of that fact, Mr. Collenette being the third.

I have a second question on the same topic. A few days after Bill C-18 went back to the House of Commons, Mr. Gray, the Leader of the Government in the other place, was quoted as saying:

> We have given the matter further thought. We have listened to public comment. We are a government that is ready to listen.

This is most encouraging. That brings me back to the closing of the Collège militaire in St-Jean. We know that the government has changed its mind on at least three other major decisions. It has changed its mind on the decision affecting the size and cost of operating ministers' offices — they are intending to beef that up in the next few months. We know that the government changed its mind on NAFTA. It made a few statements which I call "opération maquillage." It has changed its mind, and Canadians certainly know that the deal the government finally endorsed and signed was the same deal negotiated by the previous government.

It seems that, after a few months, this government can change its mind when it sees the light. I hope it sees the light on the issue of the Collège militaire in St-Jean.

We know that the government has changed its mind on at least two other issues. On the GST, it is talking about doing away with the tax on books. We know that the Liberal majority on the committee of the House of Commons recommended that this tax be hidden. The future so-called GST will still be there, but it will be hidden.

Will the government change its mind on the closing of the Collège militaire? Will you, Madam Minister, stop quoting the Red Book and inform the world of what is about to take place in St-Jean? The rest of Canada is very much concerned about this closure.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as I have said on a number of occasions to my honourable friend, with some sadness, there were strong reasons for the government's decisions on defence spending cuts in the budget. I cannot give him the undertaking he seeks. However, I can try to obtain for him some of the other information he has requested today.

With regard to some of the other things he has mentioned in his question, the senator seems to know a lot more than do I. The GST committee has not yet reported, and I do not know what will be in that report. In addition, if our offices are being beefed up, it is news to me.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before I recognize the next questioner, since I see there are a large number of senators who want to ask questions, may I ask senators to try to keep their preliminary comments very brief.

CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN— REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Last week, the minister promised to report to me and to honourable senators on the financial commitments and expenditures involved in the federal government's decision to close the Royal Military College at St-Jean.

Is the minister about to transmit this information to the Senate?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Rivest, I am on the verge of supplying that information to the best of my ability.

TRANSPORT

SEARCH AND RESCUE—REPLACEMENT OF SEA KING HELICOPTER FLEET—DOCUMENTS TABLED.

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable senators, my question is a follow-up to the statements made last week by my colleague Senator Comeau regarding the Sea King helicopters. A May 26 article, followed by numerous editorials, quoted a former Sea King helicopter pilot who was stationed in Dartmouth as saying that the helicopters:

> ...are too old to fly safely and must be replaced...
> "The Sea King is not a perfectly reliable aircraft, and I don't know why anyone would say it is..."

That quote is from a former pilot with 3,000 hours flying time. He said that critical engine systems in the helicopters resist tune-ups as well and cited instrument and radar problems.

He said the government must:

> ...look in a direction to get something else, whether it's interim or permanent. It's got to be one of them.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate use her influence in cabinet to urge the government to reconsider its decision to cancel the helicopter program, or put in place, as quickly as possible, a program which will ensure the safety of our helicopter pilots?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, without conceding to my honourable friend the validity of the statements that have been made, I am certainly aware of that article. I am also aware of the rigorous assessments that are done within the Department of the National Defence as well. I will use my —

Senator MacEachen: Great influence.

Senator Fairbairn: — proximity to my colleagues in the cabinet to put forward my honourable friend's comments, and I will return to him with the response.

Senator Buchanan: Honourable senators, over the years I have agreed on many occasions with the distinguished senator from Cape Breton, Senator MacEachen, and I do again today. I think it is much more than just the minister's proximity. I think she could use her very great influence in discussing this with her cabinet colleagues.

I should like to table both of these documents. One is the statements made by the former Sea King helicopter pilot who was also involved in an engine fire in a Sea King. I remember it very well. It forced an emergency landing in Musquodoboit Harbour on the eastern shore of Nova Scotia. He also mentioned other problems with the engines and instruments that were very common when he flew the Sea Kings. That was not yesterday; it was approximately four or five years ago. He also mentioned the reluctance of present Sea King pilots to discuss the matter publicly, and I suppose he is stating that he will be their spokesman.

• (1420)

I would like to table both of those documents so that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will see that it is not just me who is making these statements but a very experienced helicopter pilot with 3,000 hours experience.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted to table these documents?

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we grant leave, and it is my intention to grant leave, I would like to remind the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues that it was they who instituted the rule for a time limit on Question Period. I remember that Senator Murray made a considerable point of the importance of that rule during his regime.

Senator Murray: I have not changed my mind.

Senator Stanbury: I wish to remind honourable senators that the request for leave every day is eroding what my friends opposite regarded as a very important rule.

Senator Berntson: No one is asking for an extension; it is only to table a document.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. Honourable senators, I have asked if there is leave for Senator Buchanan to table those documents?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Documents tabled.

SEARCH AND RESCUE—REPLACEMENT OF SEA KING HELICOPTER FLEET—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Leader of the Government for the written response to my question posed on May 12 which concerned the EH-101 helicopter project.

Military officers and personnel cannot speak out publicly about equipment, nor on various aspects of their duties. In the spirit of that restriction, the response that I received stated that considerations were being made for "off-the-shelf" purchases and the use of private sector helicopters.

In light of the recent legislation that Minister Tobin and Minister Ouellet brought to the Senate with respect to arrests and supervision of the fishery outside the 200-mile limit, can the Leader of the Government inform honourable senators whether negotiations are ongoing for purchases of off-the-shelf equipment, or whether there are negotiations under way with private sector helicopter firms with an eye to the safety of our military personnel, who unfortunately cannot defend themselves in the public forum?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to talk to my colleague the Minister of National Defence when he returns, and provide a response to my friend.

RELIABILITY OF LABRADOR HELICOPTERS ON SEARCH AND RESCUE MISSIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, perhaps I may ask a short supplementary question.

The comments that have been made here, and the questions asked, are equally applicable to the situation of the Labrador helicopters that are used in the search and rescue area. They are a matter of major concern on the East Coast and, I suspect, also on the West Coast.

Can the Leader of the Government provide us with a status report as to how the government feels with respect to the reliability of this equipment? I think the opinion of the government is a great deal more optimistic than the people who rely on these helicopters. However, in any event, I would appreciate that type of information.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I would be pleased to follow that up for my friend.

CHINA

HUMAN RIGHTS AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I wish to return to the dossier raised by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to our foreign policy, and particularly our foreign policy affecting human rights and our relations with China.

If there is to be no de-linking of our policy on human rights and foreign policy, and no lessening of our desire to promote human rights in those countries with which we trade, but rather a quiet type of diplomacy is to be pursued, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us as to whether foreign officers engaged in relations with a particular country will be trained to recognize human rights issues, and be able to articulate the human rights issues with which we are concerned?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I would certainly be pleased to pass on the comments of my honourable friend to the ministers involved.

Senator Kinsella: Would the minister also enquire whether the trade officials in the International Trade Department will also receive such training? Will a sophisticated protocol be developed such that foreign officers or trade officers, throughout their dealings, will be required to report the contacts that they make through their foreign or trade work and the opportunities presented to advance human rights issues; further, whether such opportunities and reportings would be measurable in terms of the career progress of the foreign or trade officer; all of this so that we would have some measure of control if quiet diplomacy were to be the approach used?

Senator Fairbairn: I would be pleased to pass on my friend's comments. Since he speaks of quiet diplomacy, I wish to underline the fact that the Prime Minister has stated his views very clearly on the question of human rights, not only in the statement that I read earlier, but on many other occasions inside and outside of Parliament.

With respect to China, I think I mentioned a couple of days ago that, at the United Nations in March, the Government of Canada sponsored a resolution condemning the human rights record of China. Canada's view on those issues is known in other countries and outside the government and, I have no doubt, within the government.

As to the more specific questions, I will be pleased to pass them on.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

CANADA STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM—IMPACT ON FEDERAL FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, the government has introduced legislation to enable pilot projects to be set up for income-contingent student loans. Increased student loan funding will result in a decrease in federal funding to the provinces for post-secondary education. That, in turn, will result in tuition fee increases, with estimates as high as $12,000 per year. Does the government have any estimate as to what the impact of such a drastic change would be on enrolments in post-secondary institutions, especially in poorer provinces where there is a very high youth unemployment rate?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government has introduced in the House of Commons amendments to the Canada Student Loans Act. As well, the Minister of Human Resources Development is about to launch a wide-ranging review of all those issues under the umbrella of social policy. This will go on in a very public manner for many months before any conclusions are drawn by the government.

• (1430)

I am sure that in the months ahead there will be ample opportunity to discuss the question of student loans and related issues.

As far as specific estimates are concerned, I will follow the matter up for my honourable friend.

NATIONAL ROUND TABLE ON THE ENVIRONMENT AND THE ECONOMY

NONREPRESENTATION OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, my question is, of course, for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Some time ago, I warned her that I would ask her the following question.

Following the proclamation of Bill C-72, which officially created the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy, some 25 or 30 members were appointed to that Round Table. Much to my chagrin, I discovered that the province of New Brunswick was not represented at that Round Table. If I am not mistaken, the same is true for Saskatchewan, while Nova Scotia may have one representative. However, Ontario is represented by eight or nine people, Quebec by five or six, and Prince Edward Island by two. The Yukon and Northwest Territories are also represented, but not New Brunswick.

To me this is unacceptable, since we are talking about a National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy. I do not know if anyone in particular must be blamed for this oversight, but I think that the situation should be corrected as soon as possible.

I cannot believe that the government cannot find competent people in the province of New Brunswick to make a positive contribution to this Round Table, whose role is to advise the Prime Minister on environmental and economic issues.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Corbin's point is well taken. I will take it up with my colleagues and provide him with a response.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, my question is prompted by the series of questions asked today concerning human rights. I was heartened to hear in the statement made today by the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the apparent trend toward power politics is not the case, but that quiet diplomacy is to be pursued. However, quiet diplomacy is not well scrutinized. Therefore, I reinforce what Senator Kinsella said about the need for protocols so that our message is uniform.

Perhaps I misunderstood what the Leader of the Government said and she can clarify her remarks for me. I was disappointed to hear her say that we will exercise our authority, which I suppose means our power, where we believe our values can be imprinted. One of Canada's fundamental values was our human rights in conjunction with the wishes of other countries through the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, certain covenants, and so on. It was not our will that we were imposing on China, but a collective safeguard in terms of security and peace for the entire world. In my opinion, talking about our common values is even more frightening than saying that we will only impose our power.

Will the Leader of the Government undertake either to clarify the Prime Minister's statement which she read or seek clarification from the Prime Minister that we are not imposing our values and our culture on others, but, rather, that it is an international standard to which we should all adhere?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Andreychuk for her question. I did not intend to give the impression that the Prime Minister of Canada would be imposing values on any country. I believe he was trying to make the point — and I will seek further clarification in this regard — that by having open relations, trade and exchanges with China we will be in a better position, not just to deal with human rights there, but to bring China into the international community of nations, than we would be if we were to take a narrow view and refuse to deal with China. The fundamental premise of the government's policy is one of openness as opposed to one of exclusion.

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret to inform honourable senators that the time allotted for Question Period has expired. If Senator Ghitter is here tomorrow, I promise that he will be first on the list.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

MERCHANT NAVY VETERAN AND CIVILIAN WAR-RELATED BENEFITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the second reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Merchant Navy Veteran and Civilian War-related Benefits Act. — (Honourable Senator Berntson)

Hon. Arthur Eric Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my intervention will be brief. I do not intend to add a great deal to the substance of the debate. Rather, it is a procedural intervention which I wish to make at this time.

This is the fourteenth day that this item has been on the Order Paper without any action having been taken. It is my understanding that Senator Marshall and Senator Molgat have been discussing some resolution to the final disposition of this bill. I understand that neither one of them is back from the D-day exercises in Europe. Therefore, my purpose today is to breathe new life into the matter.

I understand Senator Marshall at least will be back next week. I do not know when Senator Molgat will be back. Procedurally, I think my intervention accommodates them, in that I have invited my colleague Senator Kinsella to adjourn the debate on this motion.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

CANADIAN ASSOCIATION OF LUTHERAN CONGREGATIONS—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. H.A. Olson moved the third reading of Bill S-5, to incorporate the Canadian Association of Lutheran Congregations.

He said: Honourable senators, unfortunately, in moving third reading of this bill, I have to advise the Senate that I have received a communication from the Law Clerk of the Senate advising me that there is a technical error in the bill which must be dealt with first. This error was only discovered today. Therefore, I feel obliged to move a technical amendment to the bill.

The purpose of the amendment is to correct a technical error in the French version of the preamble. I think it would be better if I were to give this to the Clerk at the Table to read carefully and slowly so that honourable senators can follow it rather than to have me stumble through the French. I want it to be very precise.

Senator Doody: You are mellowing.

Senator Olson: I am almost amazed at that myself.

In the French version, as it now reads, lines 1 to 4 on page 2 are set out in the form of a lettered paragraph referring to what the petitioners have stated in their petition. The wording contained in these lines should be, instead, in the form of an independent paragraph to the preamble, as it is in the English version.

• (1440)

As such, the words would then become a Parliamentary statement as to why it is expedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

Perhaps you could all read that and then you will know precisely what it is in French.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Senator Olson, seconded by Senator Grafstein, that Bill S-5 be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows in the French version:

> By striking out lines 1 to 4 on page 2 and substituting the following:

[Translation]

> And whereas the petitioners, acting on behalf of the national church body so established, have by their petition prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners;

[English]

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that the bill, as amended, be now read the third time?

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Phillips, calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget Statement made by the Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 22, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Stanbury).

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate on this matter so that anyone else who wished to speak could do so. If there is no other person desiring to speak, I suggest we take the issue as debated.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we will have some more speakers on this particular inquiry. Either it can stand or I can move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this inquiry stand?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry stands.

QUEBEC NATIONALISM

INHERENT CONTRADICTIONS—INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 10, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the contradictions of Quebec nationalism.

He said: Honourable senators, Canadians have become intrigued, almost mesmerized, by the contradictions of Quebec nationalism. If some Quebecers can live with ambiguity, all Quebec nationalists simply revel in contradiction. Indeed, Quebec nationalists could be called connoisseurs of contradiction.

Some observers calculate that the majority of voters in Quebec have shrewdly used the artfulness of contradiction to democratically lever their minority status for greater economic power within Confederation. All to the good. Yet the majority of Quebec voters have rarely pushed contradiction to an extreme. Hence, a strong federalist vote in Ottawa was usually married to a strong nationalist vote in the province of Quebec. A workable balance, democratic restraint, was exhibited.

Meanwhile, other Canadians who subsidize contradiction were bemused bystanders until the recent economic downturn. When economic growth was generally on the rise, Canadians outside Quebec readily shared their economic largesse for the sake of unity. When, however, provinces such as my province, the province of Ontario, suffer traumatic economic devaluation, that lonely Ontario taxpayer, that singularly forgotten Canadian, begins to measure ever so closely the level and the allocation of his diminishing tax resources.

Dreary economics has transformed contradiction into an explosive economic issue and a political issue within and without the province of Quebec. Worse, "Let's pretend sovereignty," "Let's pretend nationalism" — promoted by Quebec nationalists — the nationalism of contradiction, the constant piling-on of even innocent, endless contradictions, can accidentally trigger endless counterrevolution, with all the irrational economic devastation and mindless economic fall-out any counterrevolution always visits on the innocent citizen.

Of course, the dialectics of contradiction are not new either to Quebec or to politics. Karl Marx, from his solitary perch in the London Library, often drew startlingly inaccurate conclusions from his reading of the history of economic conditions. You will recall that Marx's major postulate held that inherent contradictions of capitalism, when pushed to extremes, would implode ultimately to be replaced by communism. "Progress," Marx taught, was the responsibility of the vanguards, the leadership elites, the organizing party of the masses, and "progress," communist "progress," would accelerate those contradictions until the shaky foundations of capitalism cracked and crumbled.

Marx predicted the capitalist state and its followers would "wither away" to be supplanted by new men, a new vanguard, a new collectivized entity, a communist state. Marx needed his version of history for affirmation. History, Marx predicted, was on the side of his definition, his version of "progress."

However, Marx was wrong. It now seems that Marx misread history and the human condition. The collectivism of communism expired, suffocated by its own inherent contradictions, trapped by its internal postulates, and communist "progress" disintegrated, expired, a victim of its own history.

Never daunted, Marxists and nationalists alike love the dialectic of contradictions; love to push liberal, political ideas to extremes; love to tug at those carefully nurtured, fragile, liberal bonds, bonds of consensus that tie political organisms until they stretch and reach the breaking point.

This exercise of exaggerated contradictions, this perpetual polemic by Quebec nationalists, has at least two horrific, transparent side effects.

• (1450)

First, contradictions confuse the young. Yes, youth can live with ambiguity. However, they cannot hope to maximize their potential and mobility on career paths obstructed by contradictions. Second, and even more significant, contradictions mutilate choice and amputate truth in a free society. Limitation on choice and caricatures of open debate inexorably restrict liberty, corrupt democracy, and curtail civil society.

In the province of Quebec we encounter monopoly "media-ists" and a one-eyed intelligentsia dedicated to the glory, the grandeur, and the panoply of nationalist contradictions. This is not a new phenomenon. Echoes of monopoly ideologies still haunt us. In a France weakened after World War II, the left was divided between liberals and Marxists, both seeking a better world, both seeking "progress." Sartre, Beauvoir, Merleau-Ponty, Mounier and others turned a blind eye to the dark side of Marxism and the excesses of collectivism. They too revelled in blind contradiction. They too rationalized trade-off between their vision of "progress" and liberty. Restrictions on choice and liberty, they preached, were for "the greater good," for the majority, for "the better society," for "progress."

As a matter of course, they too castigated and alienated those few liberal intellectuals who stood for an open society, a pluralistic society, such as Francois Mauriac or Albert Camus or Raymond Aron. To isolate, to vilify, to stigmatize, even to threaten alternate voices, is the standard technique practised by a one-eyed intelligentsia.

Marxists simply refused to calculate the costs to civil society for their collectivist vision of the future. Even after they were shown to be demons of self-deception, naturally their fellow travellers continued to mimic the same party line, strangely detached from any and all self-criticism.

As time passes, honourable senators, the liberalism and the pluralism so elegantly probed by Camus has survived and flourished, while the collectivist Marxist destiny personified by Sartre has ebbed and become discredited. So too we observe the death throes of nationalism as a spent force in South Africa, and witness daily the horrors of nationalism in extremis in the Balkans. Some have eyes yet cannot see.

The heart of the problem for me, honourable senators, lies buried deep within the essence of contradiction. The nationalist "project" promoted by Quebec nationalists seems riddled with contradiction. To compile or to outline even a partial list of contradictions recently espoused by Quebec nationalists is a novel and enlightening, if demanding, experience. Here is only a short, if subjective, list:

- Passports will remain Canadian, but Quebec nationalists will decide who resides within Quebec.
- Currency will remain the Canadian dollar, and Quebec nationalists agree that they will be entitled to no voice in the Bank of Canada that would determine the direction and the texture of the dollar in their "new" economy.
- Quebec nationalists demand "a right of self-determination" for their majority in Quebec, yet deny that same so-called "right" to aboriginals in the north lands and elsewhere, or to the islands of minorities living in the heartland of Quebec, or the minorities on Montreal Island.
- The boundaries of Canada will be unilaterally set by Quebec nationalists, even without Canadian concurrence.
- Quebec nationalists welcome "free trade" agreements with the United States and Mexico while rationalizing existing trade barriers within Canada.
- Quebec nationalists alone will divide federal assets and liabilities within Quebec without reference to the federal government.
- The Canadian Criminal Code will continue to be enforced by Quebec nationalists for aberrant criminal conduct.
- Quebec nationalists will continue to draw pensions from the Government of Canada, even though they will cease to pay Canadian taxes or be subject to clawback.
- Quebec nationalists promote policies to entice population growth by rewards for procreation, while the majority of the Quebec population continues to enjoy the lowest birth rates in North America and amongst the lowest in the Western World.
- Quebec nationalist leaders in the Quebec labour movement practice nationalist divisions at home while promoting "solidarity" with the working classes abroad.
- Quebec nationalists promise fairness in language, job opportunity, and education, but only after the minorities in Quebec have taken a leap of faith, entrusting the Quebec nationalists' "sovereign" power.
- Quebec nationalists promise higher "open" education, yet French is mandatory at all levels.
- Quebec nationalists predict economic growth while virtually all economists predict an economic downturn, a flight of capital and people, a downsizing of established Quebec business and Quebec financial institutions, and a threat to the normal growth otherwise anticipated by Quebec pensioners.
- Quebec nationalists promise better economic growth without calculating that, even under the most equitable terms, the per capita debt of Quebec will be among the highest, if not the highest, in the Western World.
- Quebec nationalists proclaim survival of French in North America as their raison d'être, yet they would destroy even the narrow bridges of bilingualism constructed so laboriously and carefully across this continent.
- Quebec nationalists mock constitutional bilingualism, then seek to imitate its policies beyond Quebec without economic or legal rationale.
- Quebec nationalists argue that duplication of federal and Quebec bureaucrats is uneconomic, then promise all federal civil servants guaranteed jobs in an integrated Quebec public service.
- Quebec nationalists oppose any intrusion by the federal government into any overlapping provincial jurisdiction yet demand the right to invade clear federal jurisdiction, such as telecommunications.
- Quebec nationalists promise more support for French culture, for Quebec artists while promising to cut off the federal source of funding.
- Quebec nationalist leaders jostle for equal treatment from France as Frenchmen refer to Quebec nationalists as their "little cousins," while those same Quebec nationalists refuse equality of citizenship under the Canadian Constitution for their compatriots.
- Nationalist supporters of Quebec nationalists in France share a penchant for contradiction with Quebec nationalists. Visit tiny Place du Quebec on the crowded Left Bank in Paris and meditate on how France, so driven by grandiose symbolism, considers Quebec.
- Finally, senators, finally, that cabochon of contradictions: Quebec nationalists deny the legitimacy of the Canadian Constitution, yet invoke that same Constitution as the source of their "rights."

Contradiction piled on contradiction confuse and mystify. Before this crescendo of contradictions descends from comedy to farce, may one ask some delicate questions? Is this pile of contradictions a ploy, a compost, for a different agenda?

Does darkness lurk at the heart of the nationalist project? Are contradictions invoked by Quebec nationalists to camouflage the very weakness of nationalism, nationalism as an organizing idea? Is their real goal a power grab by a tiny Quebec nationalist elite rather than the survival of French language and French culture, which demonstrably and clearly has flourished under a nourishing federalist haven?

Honourable senators, is there an even deeper fear and loathing, a fear and envy that French culture and language can survive and, yes, thrive, across this continent, initially propelled by the federal government and now by strong, vibrant, autonomous, spontaneous citizen and community groups across the continent, thrive without government or narrow leadership, enriching the lives of Canadians in every part of Canada, making the nationalist "mission," the nationalist "project," redundant and superfluous, overtaken by the federalist "project"?

Does the nationalist nightmare contain a "frisson of fear" that their nationalist flock will not behave as lambs and follow their leaders, and would rather trade their promised tribal blanket for a Canadian coat of many colours?

• (1500)

Again, Albert Camus struck the deepest chord that shakes the nationalist footings of ideology when he wrote words to this effect — justice without love would itself be unjust.

Historians agree that nationalism can be sustained for a cycle, but always and only at a very high cost. That cost is rarely measured by nationalists. Historians agree that most nationalists must rely on romantic history, synthetic grievances, warped economic facts, uncertain projections of the future, and finally, most unfairly, a bent notion of justice.

History reminds us that there is no easy way to set a framework for justice when the transcendental empowerment of collectivity can only be exacted at the cost of minority and individual rights. Therefore, at the very core of the organizing idea of Quebec nationalism lies injustice or "temporary" inconvenience, as acknowledged by one Quebec nationalist leader.

Nationalism, not unlike Marxism, is, at its centre, a procedural philosophy lacking jurisprudence, and thus has no way of setting itself a framework of justice or any other transcendent goal. Or, to paraphrase Voltaire, faith in nationalism consists of believing what reason will not, cannot, believe!

Nationalist "truth," like Marxist "truth," is not right or wrong so much as it is "a product of process". Nationalism must be a slave to some sort of romance history for its existence — an "alibi" view of history. Only from a so-called "historic mission" planted in an arid field of ancient grievances, even if long since dissolved, can nationalism hope to be legitimized. Nationalist agendas are always gambles for an uncertain future and always justified in the so-called name of "deeper" human needs. Therefore, historians observe that nationalism, like Marxism, is a blind leap of faith, a wager never based on the best available calculation, never based on the best intelligence, compatible with only one rear-view vision of history, and usually an outdated history, since the ills of history exacted on language or culture or education or religion have long since been corrected.

Honourable senators, in response to this abuse of history, this revision of history, Albert Camus noted that "the responsibility towards history dispenses one's responsibility toward human beings." So Quebec nationalists and their fellow travellers excuse "temporary" intolerance for the sake of their "duty to their ancestors" and their history. Some "duty"!

Nationalism is an easy target for criticism due to this compulsion for contradiction. The imperative of contradiction is inseparable from message and method. The method, honourable senators, becomes the message.

Unfortunately, nationalists cannot help themselves. They become addicts. All nationalists are tempted by excess. Perhaps, honourable senators, the hottest place in Hades is reserved for the nationalists' fellow travellers in Ottawa and Quebec. Beware of fellow travellers who reek with intellectual ambiguity. Fellow travellers choose to remain in the wings, out of the spotlights, and then only slide out of the shadows with the mood shifts of their audience. Fellow travellers mask their true colours and cue from offstage, prompting the nationalist actors to further excesses. Fellow travellers refuse to curb the nationalist appetite — they merely detach and distance themselves from criticism of contradiction. Excuses are given to feed the nationalist dragon just a little more — to appease the nationalist appetite as if nationalism were the only idea, the only hope, the only menu for "linguistic or cultural survival," as if the inflation of the nationalist idea were the only way to exploit the potential of those who devoutly and sincerely desire a francophone voice, a francophone culture, and a francophone space in the North American sea.

Honourable senators, surely Canadians have slowly and carefully built a better way in the world, the federal way, that is recognized and emulated around the globe. Ultimately, will the contradictions of Quebec nationalism not self-destruct as surely as all those fallen ideologies which, in this century, have projected collectivity ahead of equality?

Czelaw Milosz — that Nobel writer — witness to the 20th century consequences of contradiction, concludes that "one should use all one's power of intelligence to overcome contradiction."

Canadians desire and Canadians share more creative values, a unique hybrid culture, colourful voices and the same civil ambitions. Look and listen — pay attention to the hockey rinks and playing fields across our continent; the stages and the studios; the television screens and the bookshelves; the farms and the condos; liquor stores and restaurant menus; the armed forces and the hospitals; our federal institutions here and aboard; the universities and community colleges; our secondary schools and the day care centres; the words on T-shirts and the baseball caps; the plains and the sidewalks; the lakes and the seas; the trains and the planes; the bistros and the beer stores. Watch carefully as Canadians recreate themselves on their visits abroad to the islands and beaches below our borders. Am I blind? Am I alone? I do not see or hear two solitudes!

Honourable senators, we share much more than our differences. Listen again to those crafty nationalist leaders and their fellow travellers as they fashion exaggerated differences, as they prepare stakes of contradiction to drive into the heart of the Canadian soul. Watch our youth. Look. Listen. Learn. Canadians are more confident in themselves, their society, their future than these artists of malediction and contradiction, these nationalist leaders.

Canadian identity, honourable senators, is richer and stronger than the nationalists or their apologists admit because each part of Canada has contributed such a vibrant, sharing, civil society, distinctly and startlingly different from neighbour states to the south, the east or the west.

One staunch Quebec nationalist student, I was told by his federalist compatriot, hitchhiking through Europe, always proudly carries his Canadian passport and the Maple Leaf stitched on the back of his knapsack and wears a Canadian pin. A staunch Quebec nationalist student! When his federalist friend confronted him with this contradiction, the Quebec nationalist student acknowledged that he always travels with the Canadian flag because, in his previous trips around the world, he found that people admire and trust Canadians everywhere. This has allowed him easy entry to meet more people, and always guaranteed him a car ride. Even after the Quebec nationalists take over sovereign power in Quebec, he intends to carry the Canadian flag and his Canadian passport for utility, if not pride.

Honourable senators, Oh Canada! O Canada!

Senators, I am as grateful for your indulgence as I am indebted to the writings of de Toqueville, Paine, Camus, Milosz, Weil, Braudel, Pascal, Judt, Naipaul, Kedourie, Berlin, Trudeau, Popper, Hobshawn and those others whose elegance of words, whose clarity of thought, always persuasive, can be digested, never matched or emulated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps Senator Grafstein would permit a question. Many come to mind.

Listening to the senator's diatribe reminded me a bit of the Nixon report — a blanket condemnation of a school of thought without any reference to any particular individual or group of people. Who are these Quebec nationalists the honourable senator talked about who are out to ruin my society? Perhaps we might have his definition, please.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I will answer the honourable senator's comments. I would hope that my speech might invite other senators to comment on this issue. If other senators wish to comment, either shortly or at length, I will make a concluding comment at the end of the inquiry. I hope to deal with any other questions at that time.

Senator Murray: Is a nationalist and a separatist the same thing?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: So that we can appreciate this presentation better when we come to debate it, the question from Senator Murray was: In the honourable senator's mind, does he see a nationalist and a separatist as being one and the same?

Senator Grafstein: Nationalism and separatism are on the one side; pluralism and liberalism are on the other.

• (1510)

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then is the honourable senator saying that it is wrong to be a Quebec nationalist in Canada, but it is all right to be a Canadian nationalist abroad?

Senator Grafstein: I have made this distinction before in response to Senator Murray. For me, there is a difference between a Canadian nationalist and a Canadian patriot.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The Deputy Prime Minister's echo.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I must admit that I found Senator Grafstein's speech very disturbing.

I am not all that familiar with procedures in the Senate. Perhaps His Honour might give me direction in this regard. If I want to comment on this speech after reading it, because I want to read it first, when could I do that?

The Hon. the Speaker: You can adjourn the debate, Senator Nolin.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: If Senator Nolin will allow me, before he proceeds?

I would have moved to adjourn this debate, but I understand my colleague who spoke before me intends to do so.

After listening to this speech, I think it is probably better to adjourn the debate. Often, in the heat of anger, we tend to overreact.

I think Canada may be proud of having this complete freedom of expression, the freedom, in my opinion, to vent one's anger on an entire people and, at this very dramatic moment in our history, to misunderstand totally what is happening in Quebec.

Honourable senators, this is a day we will remember because of the speech we just heard. Everywhere in Quebec, people will take a long hard look at the implications of what was said.

Senator Hébert: You have got it all wrong!

Senator Prud'homme: Well, join the debate!

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, I will not be as hard —

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Do you want the debate to be adjourned?

Senator Nolin: I certainly do!

I think we should read the speech before attempting to make any comments at all. I realize that Senator Grafstein may have trouble understanding how Quebecers have evolved within Canada.

Personally, I am very proud to be a Quebecer. I consider myself a nationalist, but I also consider myself a Canadian. I am very grateful to Canada for letting me be part of this country while maintaining my pride as a Quebecer.

Senator Prud'homme: Hear, hear!

Senator Nolin: However, I intend to read the text of the honourable senator's speech, and I therefore move for the adjournment of this debate.

On motion of Senator Nolin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 9, 1994

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE DANIEL A. LANG

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable colleagues, I rise to pay tribute today to Senator Dan Lang, one of our longest serving members, as he prepares to retire after 30 years in this place.

As honourable colleagues will know, His Honour the Speaker was kind enough to host a farewell reception for Senator Lang and our other departed colleague, Doug Everett, earlier this week in his chambers, which gave us all a good opportunity to reminisce.

As we all know, one's arrival in the Senate can be a very strange and unsettling experience. Suddenly, you are thrust into a very different world. It takes some time to recognize and understand the customs and traditions of this place.

The other night, Senator Lang himself noted that when he accepted the call from the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson on Valentine's Day, February 14, 1964, it changed his life and the lives of all of those close to him. After all these years, with their challenges and their concerns, would he do it again? His answer was, "Absolutely."

His presence here each day this week indicates to me his affection for this place, and his reluctance to leave it and those who work in it. On a personal note, I want to thank Senator Lang for all the encouragement and advice he gave to me as a new and learning senator over the last few years.

For anyone who has followed his career, there is no question that Dan Lang is one of our independent thinkers. In all of his public life he has not hesitated to speak his mind and to say what he felt. This led, in the early eighties, to his departure from the Liberal caucus on the issue of the Constitution. Since then, he has sat as an independent, which he remains to this day.

Throughout the years, Senator Lang brought the strength of his convictions to bear on his work in the Senate and in its committees. He spoke out on many issues which crossed the whole spectrum of government policy and government activities. Honourable senators will know that his strongest association over the years was with the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, particularly during the heyday of that committee when Senator Salter Hayden ran it with a very firm and stern, but effective, hand.

Senator Lang did a great deal of work on the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. He was also involved in a number of other committees in this place; National Defence, Science Policy, Foreign Affairs, Transport and Communications, the Constitution, Energy and Natural Resources, and the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline.

He also had a distinguished career in the law, in municipal politics and in the military. Colleagues will remember that earlier this week Senator Lang spoke about the D-day landing. His remarks came not from the history books but from his own personal participation in the Normandy invasion.

Perhaps I will carry with me, Senator Lang, your final comments in which you said you were scared. It takes courage to admit when you are scared. I admire you tremendously for sharing that moment with us.

When Senator Lang first came here in 1964, that was a very exciting time to be involved in politics. He had already been steeped in the inner workings of the Liberal Party as a main organizer for Ontario in the late 1950s and early 1960s. He worked with a team, sort of a secret team called Cell 13, to rebuild the party in the province of Ontario. Some of his fellow plotters and cohorts from those early days are in this chamber today, such as Senator Keith Davey, Senator Royce Frith, and my acting deputy leader, Senator Dick Stanbury. I believe Senator Grafstein, as a small boy, was somehow connected to this august group as well.

After the Diefenbaker sweep of 1958, the work of this group was central to the renewal which led to the Ontario contribution to the election of the Pearson government in 1963. I want to share with all of my colleagues an anecdote which I did mention the other night. In the course of his election duties, Senator Lang had to make many judgments about people and about events, many decisions about the suitability of candidates, and how campaigns should be run, and so on. I am told that, in all those years, there was really only one instance when his ability to predict the potential success of a candidate was something less than perfect.

It seems that Senator Lang was, to use his own words, "progging around" the various ridings in Ontario, leading up to the 1962 campaign. He returned to party headquarters in Toronto to tell all concerned that he had been in Windsor, where there was this farmer wanting to be a Liberal candidate who did not have a hope of getting elected, and did not belong in Parliament, anyway.

Honourable colleagues, the farmer, it turns out, was Eugene Whalen, who ran and won in that election, and went on to become one of our most colourful ministers of agriculture. I do not know whether, in the end, Senator Lang took credit for that victory.

Nonetheless, the confidence of Prime Minister Pearson led Senator Lang to this place where he, in his words, has found intellectual stimulation and shared commitment to this country. The Senate has always benefited from strong voices, partisan and independent. Senator Lang has been both. Here we will remember your contribution to your province of Ontario, indeed to your city of Toronto, and to the people of Canada.

As you leave today, Dan, you carry with you our thanks, and our warmest wishes for the days ahead with Frances and all of your family, who are so affectionately supportive of you.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while the retirement of colleagues is always cause for regret, it at least allows us to reflect for a few moments on the abilities and experiences that they have brought to this place, not only to the Senate's benefit in particular but to that of the parliamentary process as a whole.

Senator Lang's main political activity, as Senator Fairbairn has pointed out, was in the rebuilding of his party's fortunes in Ontario following the election results of 1957 and 1958. In 1958, the Liberal Party's representation in the House had never been lower. The party itself was in disarray across the country. Senator Lang and others — of whom at least three and a half are here today — wasted no time in expending all their energies in turning the Liberal Party's fortunes around. His personal dedication and commitment had much to do with the improved results in Ontario during subsequent federal elections.

Therefore, he will not be surprised, I hope, if I should call him soon, after he has officially retired, for guidance and advice as the Conservative Party begins its own rebuilding efforts.

• (1410)

As loyal a Liberal as Senator Lang was and is, he never hesitated to take strong positions in opposition to Liberal government policies. Such was the case in 1969 over the issue of Canada's role in NATO, the imposition of the War Measures Act, the treatment of the business community, the monarchy question and the patriation of the BNA Act.

It was inevitable that such disenchantment should decide him in 1982 to declare himself an independent, thereby allowing him to give his views free from party allegiance, such as in the 1988 free trade debate. Who knows, were he to be with us for little longer, where this political evolution eventually would have taken him!

Senator Lang, in his maiden speech 30 years ago, deplored the general lack of understanding of the role of the Senate and its major responsibilities under the Constitution. He welcomed persons with a political background to this chamber, for, as he put it then:

> Pride in one's party, pride in aspiring to be a politician, and pride in one's representatives here and in the other place are all essential ingredients to pride in one's country. I suggest that it is only enlightened national self-interest to recognize and promote what is worthy in politics, to encourage and extend involvement of all people in politics, and thus strengthen our body politic at all levels of government — federal, provincial and municipal.

The author of these words has given them validity throughout his public career, which has always been motivated by pride in being privileged to be part of politics as it should be understood.

As he leaves us, may he accept our appreciation and thanks and all best wishes for many years of retirement from this place, which will not soon forget his 30 years as one of its most distinguished members.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, having been identified as at least part, and probably the half — I can say that, but you cannot — of the Cell 13 group, I want to say a word about this important occasion. Cell 13, which was a name invented I think by Gordon Dryden, was a code to identify an essentially ad hoc group for meetings. The context for it, as was mentioned, was the Diefenbaker landslide. Dan and I often thought that we, as lawyers, were picked by Keith Davey as the first members of this group, and Dick Stanbury shortly after, since we often said in those days that in Toronto, and in Ontario generally, you needed a search warrant to find a Liberal. The main test of all our activities was that they had to be worthwhile, interesting, and fun, and we did have fun.

Mr. Pearson, in my recollection, did not exactly pick us. Rather, we picked him. That was the unifying force for the group. Our objective was to make Mr. Pearson prime minister. At times both he and Walter Gordon might have wondered if they should hand over all the organizational activity that they did hand over to us. I became president of the party, and Keith Davey became president of Toronto and Yorks, as it was then called. Dan provided the steady hand on political decisions, and also, as treasurer, on financial decisions.

That was a long time ago. As honourable senators can understand, it is hard to know what to say and what not to say on an occasion such as this because there is such a large accumulation of memories. I was touched by Dan's conviction that he would do it all again, an excellent summary of reflections on his experience here. I am glad he said yes.

Davey Steuart used to tell the story about knowing in advance that he was to be appointed to the Senate, and therefore that he would be getting the phone call from the Prime Minister. When the call came, he picked up the phone and, without even saying hello, said, "The answer is yes."

You may remember that Chubby Power was glad that he had said yes. I am told by Doug Abbott's son, Tony Abbott, that Chubby Power once said to Doug Abbott, who was appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada at about the same time that Chubby Power came to the Senate, "Doug, you made a mistake going to the Supreme Court. You should have come to the Senate. It is a wonderful place." He said, "Doug, the sweetest sound in Canadian politics is heard on the morning after your party has lost a general election when someone says to you the words, 'Good morning, senator'."

Senator St. Germain: I will vouch for that.

Senator Frith: We senators, I am sure, are glad that on that February day in 1964 Dan said yes. The Canadian people should be glad that he said yes, and the country as a whole should be glad that he said yes.

I commenced my remarks with a story about Cell 13 and I will close with another. One of the things we had fun with was a fictitious organization we called "Politicians Anonymous." The idea was to have some help for other people like ourselves who were addicted to politics. We tried to figure out what the symptoms of political addiction were, and decided that you could tell when people were politically addicted by the fact that they just had to have a meeting. A smoker has to have a smoke; a drinker has to have a drink, but the political addict just has to have a meeting. The organization has to have a phone number that you could phone if you woke up in the middle of the night and simply had to have a meeting. We would send someone with an agenda!

Dan, we no longer have an 800 number, but if you wake up in the middle of the night and you just have to have a meeting, the present number is 613-995-1984.

• (1420)

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak today. I did not realize what was happening.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: That has not inhibited you on other occasions.

Senator MacDonald: It comes as no surprise when you look at the Order Paper.

Honourable senators, it is very difficult, as members of a Parliament who believe in responsible government, to reconcile the pressures of caucus and party discipline with senatorial responsibilities.

In spite of Mr. Milliken's statement of last week, to which our leader has referred, that the House of Commons must, every once in a while, put up with the inconvenience of having an amendment placed before it by the Senate, it is understandable that, when in opposition, you will put amendments and then be satisfied that your work is done. At times, in opposition, you may even defeat a bill. However, when you are in government and you help the opposition of the day to defeat a bill, you sometimes feel afterwards a sense of loneliness, indeed, heresy — I am referring to Bill C-93.

I went home that night taking no joy. I received a call from Senator Lang, who was not feeling too well himself at that time. As a matter of fact, he was just hoping to get through some days before one of his children was married. What he said to me at that particular time fortified everything I believe in in this chamber.

Honourable senators, I hope to have the courage to do what Senator Lang has done and, as they say in Alcoholics Anonymous, the knowledge to know the difference.

I think of you with great fondness, senator.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I will be brief. I spoke to Dan last evening and said most of what I wanted to say.

Going back to Cell 13, I want to underline on this occasion that there were two people, who are gone now, who played significant roles in my life and yours. I refer, first of all, to David Anderson, who was our hair shirt. We had to have a hair shirt. Many senators on both sides of the house will know David and remember him with affection and understanding. Lang and Anderson was the name of the team for a long number of years.

Honourable senators, I would be remiss if I did not say just a word or two about the late, marvellous Judy LaMarsh, who meant so much to so many of us. She was an integral part of Cell 13. She was one of the leaders.

Dan, she had great affection and understanding for you and, thankfully, you understood her.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, of course you realize I simply must take this opportunity to offer my best wishes to Senator Lang. Last Tuesday, when we paid tribute to Senator Lang, one of our independent senators — a group that is steadily shrinking in size — I was sorry I did not get a chance to tell him everything I wanted to say.

[English]

I was elected February 10, 1964, to serve with a great and honourable gentleman, Lester B. Pearson. You, Senator Lang, came to the Senate on February 14. I was sworn into the House of Commons on February 18. You walked into this magnificent institution of this Parliament four days before I was sworn in.

I never miss an occasion to say good things about Mr. Pearson. I have a great affinity for him, which is to take nothing away from those leaders who came before him or after him. I must note, however, that those of us who served with Mr. Pearson are a diminishing group. Senators Hastings, Davey, Thompson, Stanbury and Petten remain. I have profited from the experience of these honourable senators. I remember that I was a favourite speaker for Senator Davey, travelling anywhere he would ask me to go, as well as Senator Hastings in Alberta and others. That is in the old days, when I was in the House of Commons.

• (1430)

Your memory, sir, regarding Mr. Pearson is very good. I remember that in 1958 Mary MacDonald, a great lady who should have sat in the Senate, asked me to accompany Mrs. Pearson to the leadership convention at which Mr. Pearson was chosen leader. I was a youth delegate in favour of Mr. Pearson from the province of Quebec where the majority, of course, was for Mr. Martin.

I learned so much from you, sir. It is strange what a difference a day can make in the Senate. You are a great Canadian and a great Ontarian. Yesterday, I must say I went through a sad moment listening to the speech of a colleague from Toronto, a speech to which I will respond on another occasion. However, you, sir, understand exactly what Canada is all about. I do not say understood — you understand the role of les Canadiens-français within Canada.

We have shared so much in discussions over the years. It was great for me to think that there were so many Canadians like you in this chamber. Some may disagree when I say that. However, I will always, until the end of my days here, say openly exactly what should be said. You understand not only the part that Quebec played in the history of our country; you understand the difference between narrow nationalism and pride.

Sir, I will regret your departure. I say to your family that they must be very proud to have a dad like you. To Frances, to your four children, John, David and your marvellous twins Nancy and Janet, I say, "Your father has served Canada well. He will still inspire."

I hope, sir, that you will not hesitate when I call and say, "It's Marcel. I wish to share with you certain views. Would you kindly help me out in my reflections?" I have no hesitation to say that in public.

I wish you well. My wish is that others in this chamber join in understanding exactly what you stood for in the past, and that they will stand next to you in your understanding of what Canada was, what Canada is and what Canada can be. That is my inspiration.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the previous speakers.

When I was appointed to the Senate, Senator Lang was one of the first to try to steer me in the right direction — no easy job, I can assure you. For many years we shared a secretary. It says a lot for Dan's patience that, whenever he was looking for Shirley, she was usually working for me.

In our lifetime, we have many acquaintances but few friends. I count Dan Lang in the latter category. To you, Frances and your family, I wish you all the best.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I, too, should like to pay tribute to Senator Dan Lang. So much has already been said by our leaders and our other colleagues in recalling the highlights of my friend Dan Lang's career in the Senate that it is difficult to find something fresh to add. As a matter of fact, there were so many personal tributes paid to Dan during the reception for him and Doug Everett the other night, and again today in this chamber, that it makes it difficult to find anything fresh to say about our political and personal relationship.

With apologies for some repetition, I must say that in 1957 the defeat of the St. Laurent government destroyed the infrastructure of the Liberal Party. Almost all of those who had taken responsibility for the organization of the party disappeared overnight.

Fortunately, the movement of young people into suburbia in the major centres all across Canada had encouraged many of the post-war youth to participate in the political system. As a result, in almost all the major centres, there were young people who suddenly had the responsibility for the Liberal Party thrust upon them. They had Mike Pearson as their hero and John Diefenbaker as their nemesis. They were highly motivated and thoroughly enjoyed the activities into which they plunged.

In Ontario, the principal actors initially were Keith Davey, Dan Lang, Royce Frith and the late David Anderson. When Walter Gordon became the link between Mr. Pearson and that group and took Keith Davey to Ottawa with him as National Director of the party, I succeeded Keith as President of the Toronto and Yorks Liberal Association and was invited to join their illustrious group.

Dan Lang was the senior member of the group and a source of great wisdom. We met regularly and effectively and were extremely successful in changing the political colour of Ontario from blue to red.

Many vignettes have been recounted, not only in that marvellous book, The Rainmaker, but also by our colleagues here and in other political forums. It is not my intention to repeat those stories here. My purpose today is simply to say that without Dan Lang, who was the first of the group to be elevated to the Senate by Prime Minister Pearson, we would have had neither the fund-raising capability nor the plain ordinary common sense that led to our very considerable success.

Senator Lang, may I pay tribute to you, to your wife Frances and to your lovely family for all the talent and effort you have put forward on behalf of the Senate, the Liberal Party of Canada and the people of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators —

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lang: This is a very difficult occasion for me. I guess all of you will have to face this sooner or later. I thought that tomorrow we might see in the Debates of the Senate the heading "Tributes" changed to "Roasts."

No matter how misguided the compliments I have received this afternoon have been, I deeply appreciate them. One thing that is obvious is that these remarks strip away the years from me and reveal starkly my political roots. They are roots that I would not forfeit for anything.

Being part of the Senate has been a unique experience. I have probably learned more about Canadians and my parliamentary colleagues than I would have done perhaps on a more remunerative basis in the confines of Bay Street.

I wish to relate to honourable senators one incident, which I think is rather touching. Mike Pearson had a great sense of humour. When he called me on the telephone on that fateful day, he said, "Dan, I want you to realize that I am really doing this for the sake of your wife Frances." I did not realize until then that Mike Pearson had known my wife's mother in Salonika during World War I, where she was the head nurse in a tent hospital and Mike Pearson was an underage medical orderly, which was the only way that he could get into the armed forces or the action, because he was under 18 years of age. I remember my mother-in-law coming up to Pearson at the Empire Club, after he had made a speech, and he looked right at her and said, "My God, it's Sister Cecil!"

Now, I do not know whether my wife would still think that my appointment to this chamber was anything for her sake.

In a short reminiscence, when I came here I was tremendously impressed with the credentials of the incumbents of this chamber. I was possibly one of the youngest members, although I know Senator Orville Phillips was younger by about three months, and I think Senator Bélisle was a little younger. In any event, the members here were giants. They were intellectually, morally and spiritually Canadian. There were people such as Senator Ross Macdonald, who was then the Speaker, John Connolly, who was the Leader of the Government in the Senate, characters such as Chubby Power, who was the Minister of Air in World War II, that rascally old fellow Wally McCutcheon, who was an absolute gem of a mathematician, and my dear friend Hartland Molson. I could go on and on.

I shared an office with D'Arcy Leonard up in a corner. We always shared offices in those days and we shared secretaries. We were very abstemiously economical. In that office was Senator Bishop, who attended very rarely. He had been the editor of an Ottawa newspaper at one time and he had a picture on the wall, which was just above where I sat — a picture of himself with Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Although I was then impressed with the competence of my colleagues, I was even more impressed by their seniority, their age. I thought they all must be octogenarians or nonagenarians. Today, I can say that I am the oldest member, in years, of this chamber, except for my dear and old friend "Sir John M. Macdonald."

When I came here, there resonated a famous remark by the late Senator Gratton O'Leary to the effect that an appointment or being summoned to this place was like drawing a royal flush. After 30 years of the abuse that we have been subjected to from the House of Commons and from the media, I wonder how many of us might feel that that was the case today.

Please, honourable senators, let us not forget: The Senate remains one of the most important components of our parliamentary system. In the political climate of Canada today, its role could become even more important. Keep up the good work. Believe me, this institution would have disappeared years ago but for its effectiveness, and the recognition of its importance by the majority of the people in our country. Believe in this institution, honourable senators; believe in yourselves, and God bless you all.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, given the importance of Canada's two official language communities, and coming as I do from the province of New Brunswick, where we have given constitutional recognition to our anglophone and francophone communities, I am very disconcerted by the ping-pong match being played by the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec over the future of the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean-sur-Richelieu.

In the national interest, the Government of Canada should be creative and forward-looking in securing the future of this college, which has served all the people of Canada extremely well.

There is significant evidence to lead one to believe that this bad decision to close the Collège militaire was taken at the last moment, without any program evaluation or consultation with the communities affected. The government's decision to close the Collège militaire is premature, and a moratorium on the proposed closure should be ordered by the Prime Minister, in order to allow for a proper study of the future role of the Collège militaire within the context of the national defence review currently under way.

QUESTION PERIOD

NOVA SCOTIA

PROPOSED PEACE-KEEPING TRAINING CENTRE— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate will recall that the Prime Minister broke a promise to the people of Southwestern Nova Scotia regarding the establishment of a peace-keeping training centre in Cornwallis, Nova Scotia.

It would now appear that a second promise is being broken. After refusing to dialogue with the Cornwallis committee, the government imposed on us an economic development authority and a base infrastructure task force and now refuses to provide any further guidance or information.

We have heard a great deal about how the Prime Minister prides himself on keeping his promises. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate remind the Prime Minister of his broken promise and urge him to get involved personally to restore some measure of integrity to his good name?

• (1500)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to take Senator Comeau's question to the Prime Minister, and to other ministers who might be involved in that issue.

Senator Comeau: I wrote to the Prime Minister recently and received an assistant's reply that the matter would be passed on to the Minister of National Defence. The Minister of National Defence was not the one who broke the promise. It was, in fact, the Prime Minister. I want to ensure that the Leader of the Government in the Senate speaks to the Prime Minister himself, if she would.

Senator Fairbairn: I will make sure he gets the message.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN

Senator Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators. On April 27 last, the Minister of National Defence stated the following during an appearance before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance:

> The additional incremental cost — and I stress the words "additional incremental cost" — per student resulting from consolidation at Kingston will be by far outweighed by the savings.

On June 6, the Deputy Prime Minister stated the following in the House of Commons:

> It will not cost a penny more to transfer the students...

I repeat, not a penny more

> ...now at CMR to Kingston.

I assume the Deputy Prime Minister was referring to the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean.

All I can say to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is that there appears to be some confusion which is being fuelled — unwittingly, I trust — by her government's ministers.

On two occasions, Senator Rivest has asked for details about the cost of reorganizing the facilities at the college in St-Jean, further to the announcement in the February 28 budget. My question is related to those of Senator Rivest, and since the report of the Senate Finance Committee is imminent, it would be nice to have any questions about costs answered before the report is tabled.

My question is this: What are the costs associated with the relocation to Kingston? Perhaps the honourable senator already has this information in hand.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Nolin, I do have Senator Rivest's questions in mind, and I have forwarded them to the appropriate department. I have asked for as full an explanation as I can get, and I will try to hurry that along as much as I can.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, in order for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to have a constructive conversation with the Minister of Defence, I remind her of the two following statements.

On March 2, Brigadier General Michel Matte, who is the commander of the military college in Kingston, was quoted in Le Canada français, a daily newspaper published in St-Jean, Quebec, as saying:

> Even before the closing of the CMR and of the Royal Roads Military College was announced, Kingston already planned to spend $31 million to renovate its facilities.

The commander goes on to say:

> The commander has indicated that another wing may be built to accommodate the new officer cadets.

The cost of the construction project would then rise to $50 million. That was the first statement.

The second statement was made on June 6, the same day the Deputy Prime Minister made her statement in the House of Commons.

Minister Massé also said this in the House:

> According to National Defence officials ... was being upgraded, but that the work had been approved by the previous government.

Kingston now accommodates 700 students and operates at maximum capacity. How can we reconcile all the statements I quoted, including that of the brigadier general, who even put an amount on the table? It will cost at least $50 million to build an extra wing in Kingston.

May I remind the leader that, at the time of the budget statement and in committee, Minister Collenette told us the decision was probably, as she has pointed out many times, a difficult one, but that it was made to save money.

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate know that the Kingston reorganization expenditures, apart from the expenditures already authorized by the previous government, will cost at least $50 million?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: I thank Senator Nolin for specifying those quotations for me. I will take the Hansard record of his question, add it to the pile and see whether we can get an overall statement.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: On the subject of getting something for practically nothing, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate also consider the offer made by her colleague Minister Massé to the Government of Quebec with a view to the future use of the facilities of the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean? If my information is correct, and I have every reason to believe that it is, the Government of Quebec was offered financial assistance totalling $4 million.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in the course of her financial exercise, take this additional information into consideration — I am sure she is aware of it — and try to reconcile it with a statement by her colleague the Minister of the Environment? The minister said the federal government would not spend one cent to dismantle the Collège militaire de St-Jean, probably one of the most remarkable institutions in Canada dedicated to promoting and defending the Canadian duality, and put it back together elsewhere in Canada, bit by bit, thus causing a setback for French-language training for English-speaking officers, since it will take years for the Royal Military College in Kingston to be up to par, all of which will immeasurably undermine the Canadian duality her government is supposed to promote.

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Yes sir, I believe that amount is already on the list.

CROW'S NEST PASS

ELIMINATION OF CROW RATE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, an article in The Financial Post today is entitled "Confusion reigns on rail subsidy." The Minister of Transport has indicated that, by July 1995, the traditional Crow's Nest Pass rate will be eliminated. The Minister of Agriculture has indicated that he is very surprised by this announcement.

Who speaks for the government on this very important situation, the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Transport, Mr. Doug Young?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Thank you, Senator Gustafson, for your question. As I understand it, that reported statement by the Minister of Transport was really with reference to the fact that this program should more properly be administered by the Department of Agriculture and Agri-Food, at this point in its development, than by the Department of Transport. That is basically what is meant by that statement; that he is trying to transfer the responsibility for the WGTA and the negotiations that will surround it to the Minister of Agriculture.

• (1510)

As you know, the Minister of Agriculture has indicated that he is indeed now engaged with a number of groups, including farm organizations and others — the "today" word is "stakeholders" in the grain transportation issue. He hopes for a very intensive and productive discussion on what the future of the WGTA will be over the next many months. That is the situation as it stands now.

Senator Gustafson: Honourable senators, it goes without saying that this mix-up certainly has the farm community confused, because there has been a lot of discussion over the years about the traditional Crow rate, and whether the payment thereof should be made to the railroads or to the farmers.

My question is: Does this mean that the government is launching a major policy change which will direct the payment to the farmers instead of to the railroads?

Senator Fairbairn: No. I should tell my honourable friend that no decision whatsoever has been taken on that issue. There is a great deal of talking to be done, as he would know, before a decision is made on the future outcome of what has been in the past a very difficult and controversial issue.

The signal should not be confusing. The signal should be that it is the desire of the Minister of Transport to have these negotiations, these discussions, carried ahead by the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food.

Senator Gustafson: I have a further supplementary, if I might be permitted, honourable senators?

As you know, the Crow rate debate was the longest debate in the House of Commons — other than the Sailors debate of 1918 — which I took part in —

Senator Fairbairn: You took part in the Sailors debate?

Senator Berntson: In 1918?

Senator Gustafson: — there were long evenings in the House of Commons on the Crow debate. I have always been somewhat skeptical that perhaps the best long-term view would be just to phase it out, and nobody gets paid.

My question is: Does the government believe that the grain industry will not be severely hampered if neither the railroads nor the farmers are paid, and it becomes impossible to get the grain out of Western Canada to the international marketplace? I have had some feeling for a long time that the bureaucratic direction, regardless of the government in Ottawa, was to just phase out such special rates in the long term.

I would hope that the government would take special consideration of this situation, because there is a very serious problem, and I would like to hear the comments from the minister on that.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Gustafson, in a previous incarnation, I too remember that debate, which was not only long, it was perhaps one of the most vivid in recent memory in the House of Commons. It is a divisive issue, as you know. However, I can tell you that the current Minister of Agriculture is a very hands-on minister. He will be taking personal interest in the direction of this debate and this file, with a view to finding the very best possible solution in the interests of Western Canada.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Perhaps the reporting is wrong on this issue and, if so, the minister can tell us that that is the case. In any event, the instability and the uncertainty that such a change will cause in the farming community is totally unacceptable, honourable senators, in view of the fact that Minister Young has said that new international trade obligations in the $15 per tonne transportation subsidy will no longer be paid to Canada's two national railroads.

The honourable minister has put forth the point that Minister Young was trying to move the responsibility over to agriculture. In any event, this news report clearly enunciates that there will be no further subsidy. That will change the entire context of the farming community in Western Canada.

Can the minister tell us definitely whether this was a misquote, and if not, has Douglas Young, the Minister of Transport, taken a decision without cabinet approval?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I cannot comment on the exact words of the news report. What I do know, having spoken to the ministers today, is that there should be no confusion. The Minister of Transport is indicating that the administration of this act should more properly be carried out by the Minister of Agriculture.

It is clear to all of us that there must be changes as a result of NAFTA and GATT, and these consultations will start this summer. They will be undertaken throughout the industry and will involve all of the people who are affected by whatever changes are necessary. The consultations will be driven by the Minister of Agriculture and, as I said to my honourable friend, he will have the very best interests of Western Canada at heart.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST- JEAN—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could provide us with an update, if such there is, on the negotiations between Minister Massé and his interlocutors in Quebec City on the future of the Collège militaire.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Yes I can, honourable senators. As far as Mr. Massé is concerned, the federal government has not yet had a formal response to its proposition, regardless of the media reports today. The negotiations are continuing. He believes that there are good grounds for a mutually beneficial solution, and when such a solution is reached, it will be announced.

Senator Kinsella: I thank the honourable Leader of the Government for her report. Further to questions asked either by Senator Nolin or Senator Rivest, to which the leader said she would have some data looked at —

Senator Fairbairn: Do you have some further questions?

Senator Kinsella: Yes. Perhaps the leader could also have her people look at our question on the same subject, raised on April 21, when she undertook to ask the officials in the various departments for an explanation of the figures.

The figures that we have been hearing and seeing on this file are very confusing. If the decision is being taken to close a predominantly francophone military college, many of us feel that that is a very serious decision, and we have a hard time understanding how the same environment can be replicated. I know the minister will realize that these questions are being asked in good faith.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, I do appreciate that, Senator Kinsella. As I say, I am putting the heat on to get as comprehensive an answer as I can.

CLOSURE OF MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN— RELATED ADDITIONAL COSTS

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: In their questions, honourable senators, Senator Nolin in particular, have tried to get the government to specify the additional capital costs that will result from the closure of the Royal Military College at St-Jean, if it is be shut down.

Honourable senators, I will make my preambles extremely short this afternoon, but I have six questions. They can be considered individually or as a whole.

My first question deals with present and future operational costs associated with this move that no one wants but the Liberal government.

Officer cadets, and those from New Brunswick and Quebec in particular, attend St-Jean for their qualifying year. Because of differences between the education systems in New Brunswick and Quebec among other things, several officer cadets cannot be admitted to first year at Kingston, but they can be in the qualifying year level at St-Jean. This was confirmed to us by Minister Collenette when we pointed out to him that there had been no studies and the cost of this qualifying year was unknown. The minister undertook at the time to examine how and where this qualifying year could be offered after the closure of the college in St-Jean.

Would the Leader of the Government ask Minister Collenette to provide us with this information as well as the costs that will be associated with this qualifying year in the future, whether it is offered in Kingston, Montreal or Ottawa?

My other questions relate to the bilingual status of the Royal Military College in Kingston. Minister Collenette committed to making Kingston into a showcase of bilingualism while admitting that in spite of several years of effort — and Mr. Collenette said so himself — the military college in Kingston was not totally bilingual. Later in the same meeting, Minister Collenette told us he would make sure that the Royal Military College in Kingston would become more bilingual because it was not bilingual enough, as it were.

My questions are as follows: How much money does the minister intend to spend to make RMC fully bilingual?

Second, how many additional bilingual professors will have to be hired to handle the increased number of officer cadets? How much will it cost?

Third, since the officer cadets will be in an English environment outside the walls of RMC, will we not face two problems? The first is that only the francophones will become bilingual and the anglophones will have no opportunity to be immersed in the French culture.

Fourth, Prime Minister Chrétien already promised in the House several weeks ago that a French school would be built in Kingston. My question is this: How much will it cost? Even though the Ontario government rejected the possibility of making Kingston a bilingual territory, how much will it cost if the Rae government changes its mind?

My last question is the following: The government invested a lot in bilingualism in Kingston in the 1970s, after the report of the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism was published. How much will have to be invested to really succeed this time?

Based on my questions, I think that in the final analysis the government's economic argument does not stand up, if all those things have to be done. There will be no savings at all, and substantial capital and operating costs will be incurred.

The leader has five questions in the last batch and an initial question concerning the preparatory year. I know that we must leave soon. We were reasonable on Tuesday; we did not ask any questions because there were other items on the agenda. I hope that our asking many questions will not be held against us. The reason we have many questions and have to repeat them is that we have had no answers from the government.

Can we hope that in the coming days, on the weekend, the ministers will meet and exchange information that they have gathered here and there? We can arrange a meeting for the Liberal ministers. Once they have the answers and have checked their figures, we should be informed in this house so that Canadians can also be informed.

• (1520)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Simard, I have taken notes, and I will look at the "blues" in an effort to cover all of the questions you have asked. Again, the questions get more numerous. They certainly are —

Senator Simard: They are very serious questions.

Senator Fairbairn: I was about to say they are very legitimate questions. I will do my very best to get the answers to as many as I can, I hope all of them, in a coordinated and cogent way.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

THE ESTIMATES, 1994-95

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented in the Senate on June 8, 1994.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, Supplementary Estimates (A), 1994-95 consist entirely of proposed funding in the amount of $373.2 million for the Atlantic Groundfish Strategy, now known as TAGS. It is unfortunate that they must apply these "alphabet soup" labels to some of these programs. In the future, if you want to know what the Atlantic Groundfish Strategy is, you will have to look up TAGS.

This is a program of the Department of Human Resources Development. This department is assuming, from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, the ongoing responsibility for providing income assistance to East Coast fishermen and plant workers unemployed as a direct consequence of the closures of the major northern cod and other groundfish fisheries. Authority to pay benefits under the predecessor Northern Cod Adjustment and Recovery Program and the Atlantic Groundfish Adjustment Program of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans expired on May 15 of this year.

As your committee's report indicates, Supplementary Estimates (A) are the first Supplementary Estimates of the 1994-95 fiscal year. I suspect that they will not be the last. The $373.2 million requested is all budgetary expenditure, and all of it must be voted because there is no statutory component. The largest part of the request is for the employment and insurance program of the Department of Human Resources.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, honourable senators. I apologize for interrupting Senator Doody, but I must confess it was getting a bit difficult to hear him at this distance.

Senator Doody: I appreciate the fact that the contents of this report are probably not of great interest to many members of the chamber, but I can assure the Senate that they are of life and death interest to Atlantic Canada.

The largest part of the request is for the Employment and Insurance Program of the Department of Human Resources Development, and while there is $17.6 million for additional operating and capital expenses of the department, the bulk of it, $347.2 million, is for grants and contributions. Of this, $199.6 million, or 57 per cent, is grants to individuals affected by the groundfish crises for transitional and longer term income assistance. This assistance will be available for a minimum of two, and a maximum of five years; five years being the duration of the proposed $1.9-billion strategy announced in the February 1994 budget. It is designed to support individuals and their families on a transitional basis, and thereafter to facilitate their participation in the labour market adjustment programming that the government is hoping will result in a roughly 50-per-cent reduction in the number of persons dependent on the Atlantic fishery, as recommended by the Cashin report — a 50-per-cent reduction in the number of persons involved in the fishery.

The weekly benefit rates for this income assistance are being reduced by about 6 per cent from those of the predecessor programs, and the eligibility criteria have been improved to ensure that benefits are paid only to persons with an historical attachment to the groundfish fishery.

The $147.6 million in contributions will be paid, as the Supplementary Estimates indicate, to provincial and municipal governments and various organizations and individuals to deliver the labour market adjustment programming that government has determined is required. As your committee report indicates, there are several types of programs, ranging from educational upgrading and literacy training to university courses and assistance for those wishing to start their own businesses.

A substantial bonus is available to individuals who find work outside the fishery, as an incentive to people to end their reliance on government assistance. As well, a portable wage subsidy payable to employers is designed to place unemployed groundfish workers in so-called nontraditional sectors of the fishery that have not been affected by the groundfish crisis.

Finally, mobility assistance will be provided to participants willing to relocate to other areas to find work, while generous pre-retirement benefits can be paid to groundfish plant workers who may be too old to change careers. The latter include both those currently aged 55 to 64 and participants who will reach the age of 55 during the period of their entitlement to benefits under the Atlantic Groundfish Strategy.

Honourable senators, members of your committee expressed appropriate concerns about the size of these adjustment programs and the likelihood that they will deal successfully with the enormous problems faced by the individuals and families who depend on the East Coast fishery. It is a question of providing meaningful incentives that have some hope of encouraging people to end their dependence on the fishery and government assistance, while demonstrating sufficient compassion and humanitarian concern for their plight.

Many of these people and their ancestors have been living in small fishing communities for 400 years or more. Their social structure is built around the fishery, and almost all of them own their homes outright. When the limit of Canada's territorial waters was extended to 200 miles, they were encouraged by the federal government and Newfoundland government, of which I was a part, to take out huge loans on new boats and equipment. We thought the salvation of the Newfoundland economic problems was at hand. We saw the panacea there.

Unfortunately, it did not work out that way. The scientific estimates of biomass, of the total harvestable yield was vastly overestimated. The scientists are still uncertain as to what is going on out there. There is only one certainty, and that is that the groundfish have disappeared.

As a result of this government mismanagement, these people now face crippling debt loads, and they are not allowed to fish. Of the 1,300 communities in Newfoundland affected by the groundfish crisis, at least 800 are totally and solely dependent on groundfish for their livelihood.

This in no way is intended to underplay the impact of the crisis on the other Atlantic provinces or that part of Quebec, the Gaspé Region and so on, that is involved. Unfortunately, however, Newfoundland is dependent by 80 per cent on the groundfish fishery. In other parts of Atlantic Canada and Quebec, the dependency is as low as 30 per cent, for example in Prince Edward Island. Therefore the problem is magnified in Newfoundland.

The resources requested in these Supplementary Estimates are for labour adjustment only. They do not include any provision for compensating individuals for their boats, equipment or homes, nor do I know of any such compensation programs which are in the process of being put in place. The extent to which any compensation can be provided will have to be determined by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, which is responsible for restructuring the industry, and by the governments of the four Atlantic provinces and Quebec. Additionally, federal responsibility for longer term industrial and community development in this region falls within the mandates of the federal regional development agencies, the Federal Office of Regional Development of Quebec and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. I wish all these governments and their agencies well in trying to resolve an absolutely horrendous crisis.

I commend these Supplementary Estimates to your attention, honourable senators.

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: If I may, honourable senators, I would like to apologize to you on behalf of my colleague Senator Robichaud and myself.

We were quite actively involved in our conversation and it slipped my mind that my friend Senator Doody always has interesting and serious things to say. He has always been a good senator who has always taken the interests of the Atlantic region to heart. I apologize to him.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I want to congratulate Senator Doody and his committee on their excellent report on such an important matter. The report, coupled with his intervention, explains the importance of this program and also its detail, with one exception. I am curious about the $6.6 billion for the Corporate Services Program. The other two headings are Employment Insurance Program and Social Development and Education Program. They are almost self-explanatory. At least one knows to what it is they relate, and the report explains them quite fully. I could not find anything in the report about the Corporate Services Program amount, except at the top of page 2, where it says that the corporate services component is for operating and capital expenditures.

Senator Doody: The honourable senator is absolutely right; there is little in the report to cover that particular vote. As you have probably suspected, it is the cost of delivering these programs. It is a huge amount of money and it has to be looked after from the management point of view. Of that $6.6 million, I am told the accommodation costs are $3.7 million. I am not quite clear what the term "accommodation costs" means. There is an expenditure for systems development of $1.1 million. There is a program evaluation cost of $600,000. There is financial control and an audit cost of $400,000, and there is the communications and legal side cost of $800,000, which gives a total of $6.6 million.

Senator Frith: Will a private or public agency be engaged in the delivery?

Senator Doody: My understanding is that it is the Human Resources Department of government. They had to set up controls, obviously, to satisfy the Auditor General.

Senator Frith: These are public authorities. It was the word "corporate" that caught my attention, as to whether or not it is public or private.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 14, 1994 at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

VETERANS AFFAIRS

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF D-DAY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I had the great honour of being with Senator Marshall, "Mr. Veteran" himself, at the ceremonies to commemorate the landing in Normandy. Senator Molgat was also in attendance in his capacity as Honorary Colonel of the Royal Winnipeg Rifles. He did us great honour in the way he behaved, in the comments that he made and in terms of the response that those comments drew from the French.

The reason for my speaking is to thank the people of France for the great affection and welcome which they showed us at every venue, even those who had lost their houses during the fight our troops made to freedom.

At the end of it all, I was asked by a child why had we gone over to fight for them. I replied, "Because liberty is indivisible and because we could not have been free if you were not free."

[Translation]

We could not have been free if they had not been.

THE SENATE

EXPRESSION OF THANKS

Hon. Jean Noël Desmarais: Honourable senators, to be called to the Senate is a rare and rather extraordinary privilege. Along with it goes the incomparable opportunity to serve one's country and fellow citizens. In my case, we will have to see what will come of it.

I also want to congratulate the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau and the Right Honourable John Turner on a few inspired appointments.

I thank all the senators for their warm welcome when I first came here, last June. I especially want to thank the Honourable Guy Charbonneau for his kindness and his encouragement. The Honourable Lowell Murray, John Lynch-Staunton and Bill Kelly have all been very nice to me.

Not only did the Honourable James Kelleher sponsor and welcome me, but he generously shared his office with me for nearly three weeks.

Finally, it was a great honour to be sworn in in the company of the Honourable Erminie Cohen.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let me explain this breach of the important principle of notice, under the rules. Remember Groucho Marx's saying, "Those are my principles; if you don't like them, I have others"?

I am suggesting only one day's notice, but I do not make the mistake of saying that this is not a controversial bill, though it seems to me to be. It is a very short private member's bill from the other side. I had understood that there was to be no government legislation dealt with tomorrow, which is a short day in any event. I might give at least my sponsor's speech tomorrow, and then we could adjourn the matter, if necessary, or, depending on what the reaction would be, deal with at least one stage of the bill tomorrow. I might then propose that it be referred to Committee of the Whole for study, rather than to a standing committee. However, that is all to come.

Honourable senators, that is the reason why I am asking for leave for one day. It is not a matter of life and death. There is no big urgency this week. However, although two bills have now been put over to the next sitting, I have been advised by the Leader of the Government in the Senate that they will not be proceeding with those two bills tomorrow. I cannot imagine this matter taking more than 15 minutes on my side.

Hon. C. William Doody: What is the bill?

Senator Frith: The bill deals with the Auditor General's reports, and I can practically give my whole speech right now.

Senator Doody: Sorry I asked. Forget it.

Senator Frith: To give you an idea of how brief the intervention is, it can be contained in one sentence. The bill proposes that the Auditor General, rather than being limited to one annual report, can make four reports: an annual one and three interim ones.

Senator Doody: That was a good speech.

Senator Frith: Stay tuned. I will tell you all about it tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Frith, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next, June 15, 1994.

QUESTION PERIOD

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MILITARY INTERVENTION IN HAITI AND IN BURMA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, a report in The New York Times yesterday said, and I quote:

> A majority of Western Hemisphere countries have quietly told United States officials that they are prepared to support military intervention in Haiti if sanctions fail to oust its military rulers...

Since the Reverend Jean-Bertrand Aristide was ousted in September 1991, by the repressive regime now in place, Canada has played a leading role in attempts to have him returned to the office to which he was elected. In the last few days, Canada has agreed to tighten already tough sanctions imposed by the UN Security Council last month, including the suspension of commercial flights between the two countries.

My question to the Leader of the Government is the following: Having gone this far, is Canada one of the majority of Western Hemisphere countries prepared to support military intervention in Haiti, should all other policies to ensure the return of Father Aristide fail?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I can say quite candidly to my honourable friend: Not to my knowledge. We have applied a policy of sanctions against Haiti, as my honourable friend has mentioned. There has been action, immediately initiated, I believe, by the airline itself, to cease flights into the area. We have been attempting to get Canadians out of the area. We have not, to my knowledge, gone beyond sanctions.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: As a supplementary, honourable senators, since Canada is without hesitation in supporting sanctions against Haiti, it is appropriate to point out that the government is completely ignoring a similar situation elsewhere in the world. In 1990 the National League for Democracy in Burma won 80 per cent of the seats, but they have never been able to form a government, because of a repressive military regime, as is the case in Haiti. The head of the party, Dr. Sein Win, is in exile and has been refused entry to his country, as Father Aristide has been refused entry to his. Canada does not deny a possible military involvement in Haiti, but Canada does nothing in terms of sanctions or even comment when it comes to a similar situation in Burma.

• (1420)

In The Gazette on Saturday, Rodney Moore, a Foreign Affairs Department spokesman, said, "Canada doesn't support an embargo on Burma." He said, "Economic and trade sanctions would not be effective in helping the Burmese people."

My question is: What is the reason for Canada's exhibiting such interest in the domestic affairs of one country while neglecting a strikingly similar situation in another, other than the fact that Burma borders on China, while Port-au-Prince is over 10,000 kilometres from Beijing?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I shall seek further information for myself and pass on to the Leader of the Opposition any information I can obtain on the situation in Burma.

I remind the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition, though, that in the case of Haiti it is not a bilateral situation. In terms of sanctions in Haiti, Canada is responding to a call from the democratically elected government, as well as the Organization of American States and the United Nations, all of which collectively support sanctions against that country. The purpose of those sanctions has been to try to restore the democratically elected government of Aristide to Haiti.

As far as Burma is concerned, I shall seek information, which I will pass on to my honourable friend.

Senator Olson: We are not policemen of the world.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN— REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has she obtained answers to my series of questions posed last Thursday and in previous days with regard to the closure of the military college at St-Jean? The total number of questions is approximately 12, and other colleagues have asked similar questions.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can tell Senator Simard that I have been working assiduously on getting answers to his questions as well as to the questions of his colleagues. In fact, this morning I met with officials from the Department of National Defence, who have been taking this matter seriously, to get the factual information that has been requested.

I am endeavouring to get the information together so that I will be able to present it in a collective way to all of those who have been interested in this issue. I should hope that I will be in a position to do that this week. The people who were discussing the matter with me this morning said that they would be more than pleased to offer the same kind of briefing to the members of the opposition.

Senator Berntson: We just want the facts.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, before I ask my next question on the same subject, may I suggest that the Leader of the Government in the Senate read the sixth report of the National Finance Committee presented earlier this afternoon. I make this suggestion because this report contains valuable information that might enlighten the leader and the government, and perhaps cause them to revisit or change that decision. This information has come from several witnesses, government ministers, among others. There are commitments from Minister Collenette, one in particular on behalf of the President of the Privy Council, verifying some figures they had mentioned, but that were disputed by other witnesses.

• (1430)

Second, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate consider accompanying a delegation of senators from both sides of this chamber who, sometime this week, might go to the Military College at St-Jean to see for themselves what is going on, and what measures this government is taking to present us with a fait accompli? Depending on the information obtained during the trip, perhaps the government would change its decision.

Third, would the minister accompany her colleagues from both sides of the chamber with a view to revisiting that decision?

Senator Fairbairn: I would be delighted to travel with my colleagues on the other side of the chamber almost anywhere, Senator Simard, but I am not sure I can do that this week. As I have said to you before, quite honestly, changing the decision is not something I can promise.

Honourable senators, I will certainly read the sixth report. I must underline the fact that the people I have been personally speaking with and who came to meet with me today are making a very sincere and honourable effort to put facts together in an effort to answer the questions raised by a number of senators opposite. Rather than do this piecemeal, I will try to put it all together so that there will be a full answer. These individuals, again, have said they would be pleased to have the same briefing and discussion with friends opposite as they did with me.

NATIONAL FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK RATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Today the Bank of Canada again raised the bank rate to 6.42 per cent from 6.26 per cent. If Senator Olson had not been as shy as he has been lately, he would have asked this question. I will ask the question on his behalf and on behalf of other colleagues and all Canadians, who want to know if this latest rise in the Bank of Canada rate could trigger an increase by the banks in their prime rates, as they did earlier this week for their one to five year mortgage rates?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Simard, I would not wish to comment in any way on your last question. I would point out, however, that the economic indicators, as members opposite will know, have been extremely encouraging and positive, particularly in most recent days. Our employment figures are up by 171,000 since February. Consumer spending is up. The growth of the economy in the first quarter has been a very strong 4.2 per cent. The fundamentals of our economy remain, and there are no inflationary pressures. Our course is still clear from the budget. We have very positive signs of growth in the Canadian economy. All members in the chamber can take comfort from those indicators.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate did not answer my question. She went on to give us great figures on economic indicators.

The government has been quick to jump in and explain this so-called "surge" in economic activity. The government has seen fit to flatter itself. It has thrown up a smoke screen by saying that such a surge was due to early income tax reimbursements. That is not a great indicator or a great reason to rejoice, madam minister, because we all know that next month and thereafter, there will be fewer income tax reimbursements.

As a matter of fact, many economists say that this latest surge in purchases by Canadians will be of very short duration. These economists predict that we will be lucky to see a zero increase in terms of internal economic growth by September.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I did not speak about income tax returns. Someone else may have. I spoke of the 171,000 jobs that have been created through the infrastructure program and the strength of the economy. The strength of the economy enables small business — the engine of job creation — to perform.

I should mention that a good proportion of those new jobs are full-time jobs for women, which is a very important advance in economic growth.

Honourable senators, I do not think these numbers constitute a smokescreen. They do constitute evidence that we have a strengthening economy. In terms of the exchange rate, there has been a very volatile internationally market over the last few months. It has been up and down. It is up today, as my friend has drawn to my attention. These swings relate to a combination of factors. There is political uncertainty in the minds of people outside of Canada as to what is going on in this country. That has an effect on the markets, there is no doubt about it.

CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN—RELATED EXPENDITURES—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if she plans to provide the Senate with the figures I have requested concerning the costs associated with closing the Royal Military College in St-Jean. What are the expenses incurred so far, as well as those that are contemplated, to destroy one of Canada's finest monuments to linguistic duality? Can these figures be expected to be provided by the end of this week?

[English]

• (1440)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Rivest, I hope to be addressing your question in the collection of answers that is being compiled. I checked today, as I do practically daily, with my colleague Mr. Massé to see how things are going. He indicated to me that the negotiations are still continuing with his colleague in the Quebec government.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

THIRD READING

Hon. H. A. Olson moved the third reading of Bill C-17, to amend certain statutes to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 22, 1994.

Hon. C. William Doody: Explain.

Senator Olson: Senator Doody is calling for an explanation. I can give him that, but it will be a repetition of the very thorough examination of this bill in the Committee on National Finance, of which he is the chairman. I am sure he does not want me to bore him with a lot of repetitious detail about this bill. It has had a close examination and is now presented for third reading.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I will say just a word or two on this bill. I did not expect Senator Olson to offer us a boring dissertation. He rarely, if ever, does that. Some of his dissertations are rather lengthy, but rarely are they boring.

There are one or two items in Bill C-17 that should be pointed out, particularly in terms of its application to the Atlantic provinces.

The 5-per-cent cap on CAP, which had been applied to the three "have" provinces, to use the Canadian expression, that is, Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia, will now be applied to all the other provinces. No matter what increases in social assistance payments are encountered by the Atlantic provinces, and my province in particular, federal government contributions to CAP will now be capped at 5 per cent. The responsibility for picking up social assistance payments over and above the cap I have just mentioned will fall on the provincial government entirely.

The unemployment insurance schedule is also affected by this bill. When it comes into effect there will be established a two-tier benefit rate; enhanced income protection at 60 per cent for claimants with low earnings and dependents, and a basic benefit rate at 55 per cent. I have no quarrel with that, but it decreases the rate of employees' premiums to 3 per cent of insurable earnings for 1995 and not more than that percentage for 1996.

The part that really irks me is that a new benefit entitlement schedule strengthens the link with work history. That means that people who have not been fortunate enough to find employment in the past will not get the benefit of unemployment insurance in the future, because they have to establish a work history. In those places where jobs have been difficult to find, unemployment insurance will be more difficult to obtain.

Also, the minimum entrance requirement is increased from 10 weeks of work to 12 weeks. That, once again, will increase the pressure on social insurance payments, because these people will be entitled to less unemployment insurance. They will have to find jobs for a longer period of time in order to qualify. Both of these things are very difficult to do in Atlantic Canada and in Newfoundland.

Once again there will be more pressure on social assistance and the "have not" provinces will have to dig down into their non-existent treasuries to try to make up the shortfall, because obviously the need for assistance of people who have no income will not decrease simply by changing the regulations in Ottawa.

There is also, of course, the extension of the two-year freeze of public service salaries. I can recall the cries of outrage from my friends opposite when the previous government introduced the public service freeze, but now, with hardly a blink of an eye or even a lengthy explanation or an apology, it is extended for another two years.

There is a rather curious clause in this bill that allows the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to borrow up to $25 million in the public market place. The members of your committee asked for explanations of that. The budget of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is well over $1 billion, most of it from taxpayers' money. It is difficult to understand why the CBC would need special permission to borrow $25 million. Senator Tkachuk was particularly interested in this and asked the representatives of CBC and others who were there to explain it in detail. I, for one, did not hear a satisfactory explanation. I look forward to reading the transcript of the committee meeting to see if I missed something in the discussion. It does seem rather curious.

This bill also makes permanent the 10-per-cent reduction in payments to railway companies under the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act. We have had traditionally a 10-per-cent subsidy in effect for Atlantic freight rate assistance. This was put on temporary hold by the previous administration. It has now been decreed that that will be a permanent decrease. Also, the Western Grain Transportation Act has been decreased to 10 per cent from 15 per cent for crop years beginning after August 1 of 1994. That, tied in with the rather frightening pronouncements of the Minister of Transport, Mr. Young, over the past few days, will certainly give all of us in Atlantic Canada cause for concern.

I just wanted to make these few comments for the record, honourable senators, so that the public will not think this is simply an innocuous bill that affects very little. It affects a great deal, particularly in Atlantic Canada.

• (1450)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have one or two explanations for Senator Doody. It was made clear in the speech I made at second reading that this bill was brought in to deal with budgetary matters by a highly responsible government that is taking the budget and the deficit seriously, and intends to get it under control.

There are a number of items in Bill C-17 that are not particularly popular, and Senator Doody has mentioned a few of them. However, Senator Doody knows as well as I do that the deficit is very large. In fact, when we looked carefully at the books after the election, the deficit was some $10 or $11 billion higher than was previously projected.

This government takes seriously its responsibility to deal with that deficit. As mentioned a few minutes ago, there is some indication in the international financial field that we need to get it under control and have it managed properly.

There was an explanation given in my speech, and by the witnesses who appeared before the committee, for the $25 million that Bill C-17 authorizes for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am surprised that Senator Doody does not remember those explanations.

Senator MacDonald: Neither can I, senator. Perhaps they could be repeated.

Senator Olson: If honourable senators wish me to explain them a third time, I suppose I could do so.

Everyone knows that the CBC budget has been cut two or three times, and there are times when it is appropriate —

Senator Berntson: And the way to control the deficit is to give the CBC $25 million?

Senator Olson: No, that is not the reason. The fact is that there are times when it is appropriate for the CBC to acquire some capital funds, and for it to be most effective those funds are required in a short period of time. Honourable senators opposite will know that only Parliament has the authority to increase the overall budget of the CBC. In this case, the CBC will have the authority to borrow up to $25 million, with the approval of the Minister of Finance, for those issues that arise from time to time. It is not $25 million every year; it is a total of $25 million, and it always requires the approval of the Minister of Finance. I think there were specific examples of what that money could be used for in the future.

Senator Berntson: Would you tell us a little bit about the future of the Crow benefit?

Senator Olson: Senator Berntson will know, of course, that —

Senator Berntson: It has been blown away.

Senator Olson: It is difficult to make a speech in this chamber today.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is something about that side of the house.

Senator Olson: Senator Berntson will know that, with respect to that benefit, the approximately $650 million, or whatever the amount happens to be in any given year, is a very large expense, and because of the deficit problem the government indicated that there will be a reduction in this amount. As a matter of fact, the government that he chooses to support reduced it by 10 per cent the previous year.

Senator Berntson: Mr. Young wants to reduce it by 100 per cent.

Senator Olson: That is not correct. If you want to talk about someone else's speech, go ahead, but we are talking about Bill C-17 which will give effect to a decision that was made by the previous government to reduce the WGTA payments by 10 per cent, and then there is an additional 5 per cent for this year, so in total the reduction is 15 per cent. The base for the 15 per cent was $720 million dollars. Therefore, 15 per cent will amount to a reduction of $72 million, plus $36 million, for a total of $108 million.

This is not a particularly pleasant thing to do. However, this government is a responsible government, and it will do the things that are necessary. We are well aware that there is some pain — if that is the correct word — that must be endured by people all across the country in order to bring down the deficit.

There is some resistance to the reduction in the maritime freight rates in that part of Canada. There is some resistance to the WGTA in Western Canada. I do not think there is any doubt about that. If a government is doing these things in a responsible manner, that is what happens.

Honourable senators, those are some of the details of Bill C-17. I am not sure whether any other questions were directed to me. It seems to me that I have answered the important ones.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Spoken like a true Conservative.

Senator Olson: I should expect that senators opposite would like me to stop talking and sit down, in order that they may have an opportunity to vote for this bill, if it is in line with Conservative philosophy.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We showed compassion when we cut. You do not. You use a sledgehammer.

Senator Olson: One has to use something, whatever it might be called, a sledgehammer or anything else. However, we know that whatever was done when the Conservatives were in office, the deficit kept going up to $46 billion, more or less. This is a responsible action to reduce the deficit, and we hope that that will be the consequence.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lewis, that this bill be read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1994-95

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-39, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us today is Appropriation Bill No. 2, 1994-1995. It provides for the release of the balance of the Main Estimates for 1994-95, amounting to some $35 billion, and the total of the amounts set out in Supplementary Estimates (A) for 1994-95 amounting to $373.2 million.

The Main Estimates were tabled in the Senate on February 24, 1994 and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on February 24, 1994. These Estimates were discussed in committee with the President of Treasury Board on April 20, 1994, and with his officials on April 21, 1994.

• (1500)

Supplementary Estimates (A) were tabled in the Senate on May 31, 1994, and discussed in committee with officials of both the Treasury Board and the Department of Human Resources Development on June 2, 1994.

The Main Estimates tabled to date, amounting to some $160.9 billion, provide for $48.7 billion in voted authority of which $48.5 billion is budgetary and $.2 billion is non-budgetary, and $112.4 billion statutory expenditures of which $112.2 billion is budgetary and $.2 billion is non-budgetary.

Should honourable senators require additional information, I would be pleased to try to provide it.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

The committee report on the Main Estimates is currently before the chamber, having been tabled this afternoon. I think it is traditional that the committee report be dealt with before we finish with the appropriation bill. I will speak tomorrow on the committee report, after which we can deal with the supply bill. I do not see any problems.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT SUSPENSION BILL, 1994

COMMONS AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government) moved:

That the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Commons to its amendment 1 to the Bill C-18, an Act to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

She said: Honourable senators, the motion I have just introduced is reflective of what I hope will be a continuing positive relationship between the two chambers of Parliament and between the Senate and the government.

With Bill C-18, important amendments were made in the Senate to a government bill. Indeed, there had been a real effort on this side of the house to forge a compromise within this chamber, but the majority chose to pursue its own amendments, as it has every right to do. Those amendments were considered in a thoughtful and reasoned manner by the members of the other place, as well as by the government. For its part, the government has considered the Senate amendments proposed by the opposition without rancour or without questioning the Senate's legitimacy.

The message that we have received from the House of Commons indicates that what was proposed here is acceptable to that chamber and to the government. However, I think the message does more than merely indicate an acceptance of certain amendments; it also indicates an acceptance of the Senate as a legislative body with an important role to play in the parliamentary process.

During the election campaign, through the Red Book, which my friend Senator Lynch-Staunton reminds me of almost daily —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I read it every night.

Senator Frith: It's good for your soul, John.

Senator Fairbairn: — and through public statements by Mr. Chrétien, the Liberal Party promised to work to restore the confidence of Canadians in government and parliamentary institutions in this country. It also promised to welcome the views of Canadians during the policy and legislative process and to act upon those views. The motion which I have introduced is in keeping with those commitments. The government has listened and, with the cooperation of both chambers of Parliament, has proposed action. The legislation has been improved. I believe public concerns have been alleviated. The public can see that the system has been working.

As we reflect upon this development, I should like to summarize briefly the events which have led us to where we are today. My purpose is not to justify but, rather, to understand, because the rules and conventions we have grown accustomed to are perhaps undergoing some changes, something which I think is welcomed by senators on both sides of the chamber.

The purpose of Bill C-18 is straightforward. It is to suspend the current redistribution process in order to give Parliament and the government an opportunity to examine all aspects of the electoral boundaries process and to produce legislative improvements. This was a matter that flowed out of the Lortie commission and which represented unfinished parliamentary business from the previous Parliament.

During the debate on Bill C-18, an impression was left, in some minds at any rate, that only Liberals were dissatisfied with the current process. I would draw to the attention of honourable senators that that was not the case. The fact is that representatives from all parties in the House of Commons vigorously criticized many of the riding boundaries proposed by the various commissions.

On March 21, 1994, during the debate in the House of Commons on Bill C-18, Gilbert Fillion of the Official Opposition, who represents the riding of Chicoutimi, said the following, as reported at page 2562 of the House of Commons Debates:

> ...as far as the boundaries of the riding of Chicoutimi are concerned, some municipalities were to be removed from the riding and most came out against the process. Today, residents...are still telling us to "Stop the process. Look at what is wrong with the legislation, because every time they want to make readjustments, they have no regard for boundaries or for the people."

From my own province, Diane Ablonczy, who represents Calgary North for the Reform Party, said that the commission did not just take away a portion of her riding, but that it:

> ...ripped the thing in half and gave me a chunk of somebody else's riding. Not only did this disrupt the sense of community that the riding has enjoyed for a while but it also took away a part of another sense of community that has been built up in another riding.

Her remarks can be found at page 2550 of the House of Commons Debates for March 21, 1994.

Paul Forseth, who is also from the Reform Party and who also participated in the debate on March 21, complained, as reported at page 2560 of the House of Commons Debates:

> In many instances the suggested changes of the commission just do not make common sense.

He then went on to describe what the commission had proposed for the city of Burnaby. He said:

> The new proposal cuts down streets that did not represent main thoroughfares or easily identifiable divisions. It cuts through the middle of a park, across the middle of Deer Lake instead of taking the preferred street around the edge, then proceeds up a hill through residential properties and through bushlands where no streets exist at all.
> It leaves small enclaves of residential areas stranded in the new riding of Burnaby North without access, except by travelling a considerable distance through my riding of New Westminster—Burnaby.

• (1510)

Nelson Riis of the New Democratic Party, who has a background as a professional geographer, was even more critical after having had an opportunity to examine the proposed plans for British Columbia. He said:

> I studied all of them and I could find no correlation between an interest in geography and the boundaries in the maps. Historically the boundaries made no sense. As a matter of fact I can only assume it was some sort of creative artistry on behalf of the commissioners who decided on the boundaries in the central interior of British Columbia. I can only assume that whoever they were, and I say this with all due respect, they must have visualised the interior mountains of British Columbia as a flat plain with no topographical variation at all because the reaction was immediate.
> The next morning, after Canada Post had delivered all of these proposals, there was a hue and cry that went up in the communities around Kamloops.

He went on to say that people who normally would never say anything positive about their member of Parliament, because of their political affiliation, rose up and said that they had to rally around him and stop the process before "this lunacy continues any further."

The record shows clearly that the riding boundaries proposed by various commissions caused consternation not only among members of various political parties but also among individual citizens and within municipalities. For example, the council of the County of Kent presented a submission to the Electoral Boundaries Commission for Ontario, wherein it registered its absolute displeasure with what was being proposed and claimed that "The proposed riding of Essex—Kent defies logic."

These and other criticisms of the current process just helped to reinforce the view that it was time to re-examine the whole question of how electoral boundaries are drawn.

As I have mentioned, this was a piece of unfinished business from a previous Parliament. It was felt several weeks ago that, if the government moved quickly, the review could be concluded and perhaps a better system could be in place in time for the next regularly scheduled election.

However, when the government introduced Bill C-18, a number of concerns were expressed, and strongly expressed, that the proposed 24-month suspension of the current redistribution process could see the next election fought on present electoral boundaries, which would not reflect population increases in the provinces of Ontario and British Columbia as contained in the 1991 census. Those views found their fullest expression in our Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which held a series of informative meetings that brought a new focus to this legislation.

In response to the concerns articulated at those meetings; in response as well, as I said in my speech earlier on this bill, to the clear message delivered by delegates at the Liberal Party convention in support of a British Columbia resolution supporting change to the process and protection of fairness in representation from that province; and in view of the criticisms expressed by many others across this country, the government proposed an amendment in the Senate that would have guaranteed that the next regularly scheduled election at the end of 1997 or into 1998 would be fought on 1991 census boundaries.

However, that amendment was not agreed to by my friends opposite, who put forward an alternative proposal that, nevertheless, had the same fundamental objective, namely, ensuring that the 1991 census boundaries for the next regularly scheduled general election would be used. That proposal has, in essence, been accepted by the House of Commons. The only point of disagreement concerns the length of the period of suspension of the current process in order to permit passage of new legislation.

The Senate amendments sent to the House proposed that the activities of the present commissions be suspended only until February 6 of 1995. The government and the House of Commons believe that in order to do justice to the study of the process of redrawing electoral boundaries, we must allow for a longer suspension of the committees, until June 22, 1995.

As explained by my colleague in the other place, the Honourable Herb Gray, the earlier date proposed by the Senate does not make allowances for the provisions of the rules of the House of Commons for an adjournment between December 16 of this year and February 6 of 1995. Such an adjournment means that in reality the whole process would have to be completed by December 16, since the House of Commons will not be sitting between then and February.

In our view, honourable senators, it is simply not realistic to expect that all stages of consideration of changes to the process, from initial committee examination in the other place to the presentation of legislation, to consideration by both Houses of Parliament and to final approval, could be completed by December 16 of this year. The date of June 22, 1995, however, as was the case with the original suspension, still remains an outside limit. The government is confident that it would be possible to have new legislation passed before that date, but it is mindful of wishing to give the process enough time to proceed.

If this legislation is adopted by Parliament, a new redistribution process based on the 1991 census can go forward. As I explained in my remarks of May 25, that process need not necessarily go on for as long as the current practice. Last week the Chief Electoral Officer, Jean-Pierre Kingsley, appeared before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs. In reinforcing the testimony he presented while before our Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee, Mr. Kingsley explained how that process could be reduced significantly if the time periods for a number of the stages were shortened. If certain abridgements were adopted, he said, a redistribution process that began in June of 1995 could be completed in time for an election held in March of 1997 — not even three and one-half years into the government's mandate.

Honourable senators, this is a reasonable and realistic timetable in the life of a Parliament with a majority government and is certainly in keeping with modern day experience.

I would urge the Senate to adopt the motion now before it. We will be taking advantage of an opportunity to experiment with a new attitude on how relations between the two chambers of Parliament — indeed, between the Senate and the government — can be conducted. Through its work on Bill C-18, the Senate has sent a message that it wishes to play a constructive role in the legislative process — a message that most assuredly comes from both sides of this chamber. Through this motion today the government has sent a message back that it accepts that role.

• (1520)

This is not to say, of course, that the government or, for that matter, the House of Commons will always agree with what is proposed in this chamber. Undoubtedly there will be moments of disagreement where accommodation will be more difficult to obtain. That is to be expected among parties with different philosophies and different political roles.

However, I think it is important to note that in this case we have managed to carry out our respective responsibilities with a healthy degree of mutual respect on both sides of this house, and between the Senate and the House of Commons. I believe that this is a positive step in an effort which all of us share to regain public respect for our national Parliament. I sincerely hope all of us can accept this compromise, and accept it in the spirit in which it was offered.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in her closing remarks, and indeed in the first part of her speech today, the Honourable the Leader of the Government placed this motion in the wider context of the relationship between the two Houses of Parliament and between the Senate and the government. At this early stage in the life of this Parliament, it is understandable that she should do so. I do not intend to pursue that point, for the good reason that I happen to know that my friend the Leader of the Opposition intends to do so. I have reason to believe that he intends to discuss something of the background to the action which Conservative senators took, and of the implications of that action for the future.

For my part, I intend to confine myself, as much as I possibly can, to the bill that is before us and the motion proposed by the Honourable the Leader of the Government. I begin by congratulating the government on having agreed to the significant amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-18. It is never easy for a government and for its supporters in the House of Commons to accept major changes to a government bill after that bill has passed the House of Commons.

In the case of Bill C-18, the exercise would have been the more painful because the original impetus for the bill came not from the cabinet but from the government's Parliamentary caucus. The ministers who, more often than not, normally must call upon the loyalty of caucus colleagues to support government initiatives for which there may be varying degrees of enthusiasm, were in this case responding to political concerns expressed by their own backbenchers. Nobody who understands that background or who appreciates the political dynamic involved, especially the relationship between cabinet and caucus, can be stingy in commending the government for taking the action that they have taken. I certainly would want to be unsparing in my commendation of the government for the action they have taken.

The government has accepted in substance all of the Senate amendments. What is markedly different about the message we have received today from the government, and the proposed compromise suggested by Senator Fairbairn — a couple of weeks ago, was it? — is that the commissions are not being abolished, as would have been the case under the government's earlier proposed compromise. There is, as she has pointed out, one change in detail, and it has to do with the duration of the period of suspension in the present process. We had provided that the suspension would be lifted in the month of February. The government proposes to push this date forward to June. This is not a matter of principle with us and, therefore, we will agree to the change in date recommended by the government and approved by the House of Commons.

That being said, I would like to say, in parentheses, that the last thing in any of our minds was to intrude upon the prerogatives of the House of Commons. This was the apprehension expressed by the Honourable Herb Gray in the other place when he proposed sending this message to us.

I believe that, in a practical sense, the apprehensions of the government about the February date were not well-founded. I say that for two reasons: First of all, we have been assured, by the Leader of the Government in the Senate on several occasions and by other spokesmen for the government, that it was not only the hope but the intention of the government that the House of Commons committee would report well ahead of the December deadline. Second, I think it is important to note that the mandate given to the House of Commons committee is not just to produce a report and recommendations, but rather to produce a bill, to produce legislation for consideration by the House of Commons.

Although my friend has been legislative assistant to a Prime Minister in the other place, I tend to disagree with her. I think if things go well that there is a better than even chance that we would have legislation establishing a new redistribution process passed by Parliament before the February deadline; perhaps even before Christmas. I may be wrong.

Senator Fairbairn: Terrific.

Senator Murray: Mr. Peter Milliken, MP, who is the chairman of that committee, has been heard to suggest that the House of Commons committee would sit during the summer and might report by September, and that they will report with a bill. That gives several months for the House of Commons and the Senate to deal with such a bill, and to pass it. I think there is a better-than-even chance that we could do so before Christmas.

In any case, whether it is February or June is, I hope, not important. I hope it will turn out not to be important, because I believe that the overall result of the amendments that have now been accepted can and should be very positive. There can and should be an impartially conducted redistribution on the basis of the 1991 census before the next election. That was always the central objective of the Conservative senators in this matter.

At the same time, the way is open for an improved redistribution process designed by a House of Commons committee and that, as the Leader of the Government has reminded us today, was always the stated intention of the government in bringing forward this bill.

• (1530)

The Commons committee will have received a valuable assist from the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which, while examining Bill C-18, identified a number of areas for reform of the process, a number of areas that should be considered seriously. I think that senators on both sides of this house can take some satisfaction in that. While we disagreed about the bill, I think we were agreed on quite a number of reforms to the redistribution process that should at least be considered.

I have no mandate to speak for the committee on this matter, so what I have to say now in terms of possible changes I put forward as the view of one senator only. First of all, I think it is clear that the process which now takes two and a half years, and can take more, can be shortened. I believe we established that at the committee hearings, both from the administrative perspective of the Chief Elections Officer, Mr. Kingsley, and from a more political perspective in the discussions among ourselves and with Mr. Gray, when he appeared before the committee.

Second, and here I am getting into more controversial territory, there is one stage of the present process that I think could and should be eliminated, and that is the stage where members of Parliament have an opportunity not afforded to other citizens to have an impact on the drawing of the maps. Remember that there is a public hearing process. To those public hearings, members of Parliament and their constituents and their party supporters can, if they wish, repair and make representations about the maps produced by the redistribution commissions. Experience has shown that those commissions take those representations seriously and that they make substantial changes after the public hearings.

The present process provides for a 60-day period in which, even after the commissions have drawn a second draft of the maps, members of Parliament, whose conflict of interest is obvious, get another chance to have an impact on those maps. I am not sure that that is right, and I think that we should consider eliminating that stage altogether.

In that connection, I was mildly scandalized this afternoon to hear the Leader of the Government referring with approval to the debate in the other place in which various members of Parliament from three or four of the parties represented there stood up and complained about the boundaries in their own provinces as the boundaries affected their own constituencies. What they were saying was not that they would go before the public hearings and present their representations and their complaints, but rather that the whole process should be aborted right now because they did not like the preliminary maps. What is the purpose of the public hearings if it is not for these honourable ladies and gentlemen to go and make their representations?

For the first time, we have heard a spokesman for the government actually justify this bill on the basis of the preliminary maps that had been drawn up by the redistribution commissions. We had reproached the government caucus and individual Liberal MPs with having conspired on this bill because they disliked the boundaries that were proposed. All Senator Fairbairn has done today is confirm that and spread the blame around a little bit to include Nelson Riis of the NDP and a couple of people from the Reform Party and somebody from the Bloc Québécois.

Third, to return to improvements that can be made in the process, I think we should revisit the Lortie commission's recommendation that the ridings might be drawn on the basis of the number of electors rather than on the basis of population. If you believe in the principle of the relative equality of voting power, I think it is obvious that number of electors is a better standard by which to implement that principle than is population.

There would be an incidental benefit to using the standard criterion of the number of electors, and it is that the redistribution, instead of being dependent on the decennial census, would be related to voters' lists that are drawn up every four or five years. Redistribution in that event would be more frequent but less disruptive, because, if you made the changes more frequently, you would be fine-tuning boundaries of ridings rather than making massive changes.

Fourth, I think we have to look again at this 25-per-cent variation that is permitted from the provincial quotients. More than 25 per cent in exceptional circumstances is permitted by the present act. If you believe in the principle of relative equality of voting power, 25 per cent is too high. The Lortie commission suggested 15 per cent. I would go lower than that, frankly, because the reasons for permitting those variations, which related to the difference between the geographically large rural ridings and urban ridings, are less applicable today in an age of quick transportation and instantaneous communication than they were some years ago.

All you have to do is examine the horrendous anomalies that this produces, and not so much the anomalies between rural and urban as the anomalies between ridings that are practically neighbours.

I was looking at Nova Scotia, which is not the big offender in this connection. I fail to understand the difficulty of servicing a constituency such as Cape Breton and Richmond, where I was born and which is now represented by Mr. Dingwall, which could possibly justify the great discrepancy between the size of that constituency and, say, Halifax West. Those ridings are not so enormously different as to justify the enormous discrepancy between these two ridings produced under this system.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I must advise the Honourable Senator Murray that his time has expired. Is leave granted for him to continue, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: Thank you, honourable senators.

Fifth, Mr. Gray, when he was before the committee, recalled to our minds that, in the years just after the 1964 act was passed, there was always one member who was a member of all of the redistribution commissions at the time. That was Mr. Nelson Castonguay, who had the title and office of Redistribution Commissioner. Mr. Gray suggested that perhaps we should go back to that regime, and I am inclined to think he is right. Having one member who is a member of each of the commissions would, I think, help to introduce more consistency into the interpretation of the act across the country.

Finally, honourable senators, I just want to say this: I think that on a matter of this kind, the elections law and redistribution process, the government should seek the broadest possible consensus among the political parties in the House of Commons. I believe that, for our part, we senators should look favourably upon any bill that enjoys that kind of consensus.

With regard to this motion today, I think the Senate and the government can take some satisfaction in having put the redistribution process back on the right track. During the next six to twelve months the issue will be back in the hands of the House of Commons and within one of its committees. The Senate will not be directly involved in the process unless and until new legislation arrives here. In the meantime, we will, of course, be watching carefully in the hope and expectation that what we have done on Bill C-18 will ensure that there will be an impartial redistribution before the next election, and an improved redistribution process for future elections.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, first I want to thank Senator Murray for having so well summarized our thoughts on Bill C-18 itself, and on how we envisage certain improvements that can be made to the Electoral Boundaries Act, arising from experience of some 30 years now, and from testimony before relevant committees here and in the other place. I also hasten to endorse his remarks regarding the government's decision to accept, with one modification, the amendments to Bill C-18 proposed by the Senate, since improving legislation when in order is a responsibility, if not an obligation, of this place. The government's acceptance in this case is a confirmation of its appreciation, while admittedly not enthusiastic, of the positive role that the Senate can and should play as legislation is proceeded with.

My purpose in rising at this stage is to share some conclusions and thoughts which can be drawn from this particular experience. All senators are conscious that while the Constitution gives the Senate powers which are broader than any found in any comparable appointed legislative body in the Western World, their exercise must be used with extreme moderation and caution as they affect decisions initiated by an elected body.

In my first remarks as Leader of the Opposition, I stated our position as follows:

> Each piece of government legislation will be given the scrutiny and assessment it deserves. It will be subjected to vigorous committee hearings when found necessary. It may even on occasion be subjected to amendments in order to improve it and be returned to the House of Commons. However, should the House disagree, then so be it, for the Senate must act as it sees fit. The decision of the elected must and will be abided by.

The question which arises is: Would we have honoured this pledge had Bill C-18 been returned in its original form? Fortunately, we will never know the answer. While I do not care to answer hypothetical questions, I still feel it appropriate to develop upon my original statement. This statement referred to government legislation which, by definition, is intended at all times to better the lot of all, or if only of some, not at the expense of others, or to repair an injustice. In summary, government legislation must have some redeeming features.

To our mind, Bill C-18 did not meet these basic criteria. Simply put, it penalized a great majority of Canadians to the benefit of a handful. It was motivated by partisan considerations, even by the admission of some of the government's own supporters. It is in such situations that the Senate's usefulness becomes obvious. Our amending of Bill C-18 has been interpreted by some as an intrusion on the prerogatives of the House of Commons. Those who have been complaining this way are either motivated by a dislike for the Senate per se or have a misunderstanding of its role. For, like it or not, the Senate is one of the three essential components of our legislative system. The Constitution could not be more clear:

> The legislative power is vested in one Parliament of Canada, consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Over the years, the composition and nature of the House of Commons has evolved to keep pace with the evolution of the franchise itself. In the first election of 1867, eligible voters were limited to 21-year old British males who had to have a property interest, and the vote was taken in public. Contrasting that with today's qualifications makes one appreciate the enormous progress, no matter how slow, that has been made since. Contrast this with a Senate which has pretty well stood still over the same period, except for a mandatory retirement age in 1965 and a suspensive veto on constitutional amendments in 1982.

The Senate as an institution has been challenged since it was created, and its opponents far outnumber its supporters, and for reason. How can one justify an appointed body with such wide powers in a society as free and as democratic as Canada's? Sadly, agreement on even the slightest modification to it escapes Canadians constantly. Until this happens, it is our obligation to carry out our responsibilities as set out in the Constitution, always keeping in mind the drastic changes which have taken place in our other political institutions and usages over the past decades. By this I mean we must be both conscious of our obligations, which were spelled out over a century and a quarter ago, and the realities of the legislative world today. In our case, treading the line between the two is made more challenging by the fact that, as members of the opposition, we are in the majority, at least for the time being.

I could quote a number of authorities to support our stand on Bill C-18 but I will use only one, the former Leader of the Opposition, who has written as follows:

> Very rarely does the Senate defeat legislation, maybe once every forty or fifty years. It slows legislative bills down. It even holds long hearings in order to give the public time to get interested in what is going on. The Senate is a chamber of sober second thought; it's there to try to act as a check and balance, digging in only on those rare occasions when a government with a majority in the House of Commons seems to be going much too far or too fast.

Senator Frith has described exactly the situation which led to our stand on Bill C-18.

However, this does not answer the "what if" question I asked earlier. What if Bill C-18 had been returned in its original form? How would the Conservatives have voted? My sense is that many, not to say most, would have voted against it; none with any enthusiasm, however, because of the many interpretations that would have been given to their vote, but, nonetheless, with a strong conviction that Bill C-18 was simply not acceptable, and had to be rejected no matter the consequences. Going as far as we did on Bill C-18 is not a stand we care to make a habit of taking, but it will be taken when need be.

Is there a way to avoid such situations? Certainly, an obvious way is for the government to recognize and admit the value of pre-study. When in opposition, Liberals systematically opposed that measure, claiming that it undermined the independence of this chamber, making it a partner to the government and subservient to the House of Commons. This is an extreme view; a view more emotional than rational.

Pre-study, in the case of controversial or technical legislation where senators' experience and abilities can be helpful in its designing, is certainly to the government's advantage. Since one of our major roles is precisely to improve legislation, why not be involved in the process as early as possible in certain cases? I do not consider this subservience, but rather a concrete reaffirmation of one of our major responsibilities; leaving us free at all times, however, to challenge the pre-studied legislation in the normal fashion once it reaches the Senate, after passage by the House.

The amendments to the Young Offenders Act, Bill C-37, recently introduced in the House by the Minister of Justice, is a case in point. No matter what their content, it is inevitable that amendments of this nature create more controversy than approval. Pre-study by the Senate of major legislation has the advantage of alerting the government to Senate concerns at a time when they can be incorporated before the House takes a final vote, thereby making its passage here that much more smooth.

While on this topic, honourable senators, I want to mention another bill which is causing us much concern, and which is now at report stage in the other place, Bill C-22, the Pearson International Airport Agreements Act. Let me be very clear on one thing: Our apprehensions have absolutely nothing to do with the subject-matter which led to the introduction of Bill C-22. Rather, there are a number of clauses in the bill the like of which cannot be found in any law passed by the Parliament of Canada since its inception.

I will not elaborate on the bill, as I hope it may be changed before it finally reaches us. Suffice it to say, however, that in its present form it includes some very disturbing, even alarming, provisions that have hardly been touched on in the other place. The opposition there has preferred to concentrate on the contract which the bill nullifies and to heap all sorts of abuse on those who were party to it.

Our preoccupation is not with the contract; it has not even been made public, so how can any parliamentarian even pretend to analyze it objectively? It is with the bill itself, which unfortunately meets exactly the situation described by Senator Frith when he said it was "one of those rare occasions when a government... seems to be going much too far or too fast."

Basic questions on Bill C-22 have yet to be answered, and we will be asking them before the appropriate Senate standing committee. We will not engage in the personal attacks or snide innuendoes that have marred both opposition parties' interventions in the other place, for the least it can be said of the Senate that it has a responsible opposition.

Honourable senators, as Senator Fairbairn so well indicated in her remarks, we should all be pleased with the way in which the legislation we are about to vote on has proceeded. I share with all members a satisfaction of a job well done.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, at the time of the second reading of this bill, I interjected with a one-sentence remark to Senator Fairbairn. I said, "I hope you will not take the Senate for granted." She shook her head.

Honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Fairbairn today on putting the best face on what must be, for her colleagues, a rather humiliating abandonment. I agree with her when she says that this is a new experiment with a new attitude.

Honourable senators, the government's approach is not totally new, if one looks at the recent session which began on May 13, 1991. We dealt with 16 bills and 43 proposed amendments in this chamber — not in committees. So, when Mr. Peter Milliken, of fond memory and whom we cannot easily forget, says at page 4619 of the House of Commons Debates that "I know there are many members here who feel it inappropriate for the Senate to make changes to Commons bills, but the fact is that it does happen from time to time and we do have to tolerate this inconvenience," I suggest we get a seeing-eye dog for Mr. Milliken.

On the same day, Tuesday, May 31, 1994, Mr. Milliken said:

> ...many may regard the proceedings in the Senate as irrelevant and unimportant...I do not know whether Your Honour has ever tried to get minutes of the Senate. I have tried to subscribe for the five or six years that I have been in this place, and I cannot get them delivered on a regular basis.

I am sure, Senator Fairbairn, you would want to see that Mr. Milliken's attitude and his inability to get this information are both eased.

Senator Fairbairn: We keep in daily contact, Senator MacDonald.

Senator MacDonald: I end, Senator Fairbairn, in congratulating you on a very fine speech and a very fine attitude. I hope that we can, as you say, reason together.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and Commons amendment concurred in.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

HUMAN RIGHTS POLICIES—INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Ron Ghitter rose pursuant to notice of June 2, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Human Rights Policies, or lack thereof, of the Government of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I bring forward this inquiry relating to the Canadian government's policies with respect to human rights on the international scene against a backdrop of unparalleled human rights abuses in every corner of the world.

From Bosnia to China, from Burma to Mexico, in Central America, Africa and elsewhere, millions of citizens of this world face the horrors and oppression of totalitarian regimes which display a total disregard for the fundamental rights and freedoms that are the cornerstone of any civilized society.

Slave labour, genocide, suppression of free speech, imprisonment without trial, confiscation of lands, torture and starvation are tragically becoming almost commonplace throughout the world, and the nagging question that must be addressed is, can we — or to some, should we — do anything about it?

It is easy to become sanctimonious and self-righteous in a discussion of this nature. It is easy to speak in platitudes about how terrible these atrocities are, and do nothing meaningful. It is easy to be critical of others and ignore the gaps in our own human rights record of this nature.

My first lesson in that regard was as a university student when I recall the Prime Minister of the day, Mr. Diefenbaker, speaking at a Commonwealth conference against the apartheid policies of South Africa, while at the same time a black person was being refused admittance to a CNR hotel in Canada.

I know that as I am speaking critically of governments in other countries, in my own province of Alberta senior political figures in the Alberta government promote the abolition of our human rights legislation, the abolition of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the banning of books, the negation of rights to our native people, and refuse to recognize the constitutionally protected desire of some minority groups for equal treatment in our society. When I examine the vote in Ontario with respect to sexual orientation and the vote of the Legion with respect to Sikh's turbans, I say at the outset that I recognize that in Canada we have a long way to go.

Therefore while I am so very critical of the conduct of other governments, which I find to be so deplorable, I do so with the frank admission that our human rights record in Canada is good, but far from perfect.

Having said that, I do submit, however, that, particularly over the last 20 years, Canada has assumed a meaningful role of leadership in the world with respect to encouraging regimes which disregard the human rights of their citizens to change their policies and recognize their human rights obligations. This is not a model imposed by developed countries upon developing nations set in their own image, but is in fact the universally acknowledged human rights standards and commitments set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which was approved in 1948 by the United Nations and the subsequent two covenants on political, civil, social, economic and cultural rights to which Canada, along with many other nations, was a signatory.

In light of these covenants and our commitments, no one can argue that the introduction of human rights concerns in our foreign aid and trade policies is inappropriate. It is totally appropriate. The question is: How can it best be done?

Canada is eminently suited to provide leadership in this area. We are very credible internationally. We have never been a colonial power. We are connected to the OAS, the Francophonie, GATT, NATO, and the Pacific Rim. We are a middle power with great influence, far beyond the size of our population or our GDP.

Over the past decade we have slowly, sporadically — yes, but in a forward manner — asserted a clear role in human rights leadership in the world. In 1979, Douglas Roche, a Progressive Conservative member of Parliament, called for reducing aid where gross violations of human rights existed. In the early eighties, Canadian academics called for suspension of aid where human rights were grossly and persistently violated.

In June of 1986, the Hockin-Simard report of the Special Joint Committee of Parliament recommended the establishment of an International Institute on Human Rights and Democratic Development, an institute on which I have the honour to serve as a director, which is in full operation and under the presidency of Mr. Broadbent, and which is doing excellent work throughout the world.

In 1987, the Winegard Report from the House of Commons Standing Committee recommended that Canada closely monitor abuses of human rights and provide incentives for good behaviour, as well as penalties for poor human rights performance. Canada, both under the Liberals and the Conservatives, has curtailed aid to countries such as El Salvador and Guatemala because of gross human rights violations, and in 1991, at the Commonwealth Conference at Harare, Zimbabwe, with 50 nations represented, the Prime Minister of the day, Mr. Mulroney, stated as Canadian policy:

> Canada will not subsidize repression and the stifling of democracy.

In finality, Prime Minister Mulroney stated:

> If less developed countries choose not to conform to Canada's notions of democracy but still seek aid, they will be waiting a long, long time.

By 1991, as Maclean's magazine noted, Canada's position was well known in the world and accepted in the international community, that "tough talk and action provides the quickest route to a kinder, gentler world order."

Then in June of 1989, Tiananmen Square became the byword for oppression and total disregard for human rights. As the world and Canadian leaders rose in indignation at the atrocities committed by the Chinese government of the day, the Right Honourable John Turner, Leader of the Opposition, said:

> The force of the House of Commons and the moral influence we have on behalf of our people must indicate to China that that country must cease its brutality or the repercussions for China and the world would be incalculable.

Jesse Flis, Liberal MP, now Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, stated in Parliament:

> At the very least, are we going to re-evaluate our relationship with China? And in so doing, are we going to reconsider our official development assistance commitment which totalled close to $36 million in 1988?

Sheila Copps, MP for Hamilton East stated:

> Yes, it is true that we carry out $2.6 billion worth of business with the Chinese people. However, I do not think that should be a reason for us to prevent movement in the area of sanctions.

Since that time, Canada, to our pride, has continued its involvement in the use of sanctions in Haiti, Central America, South Africa and Cuba. Linking our aid and trade to violations, speaking out with words but also deeds, Canada became a leader in the world in its commitment to human rights.

Yes, we have had some disappointments. As I have mentioned in this chamber, I would have preferred our trade agreement with Mexico to contain some human rights provisions, which it did not. Yet overall, Canada's commitment to universal human rights is recognized throughout the world.

Leading up to the election last October, the commitment continued. The Liberal Party Foreign Policy Handbook of May 1993 stated:

> It is imperative that we resolve the ongoing contradiction between our commitment to human rights and the objectives of Canadian trade policy.

Shortly after its election, the new government appointed a parliamentary joint committee to examine Canada's foreign policy. To this date, a number of submissions have been made to this committee with respect to Canada's international human rights obligations.

Then, as if overnight, and notwithstanding the fact that a parliamentary joint committee was examining this very policy, a whole new policy shift occurred within the Canadian government, without debate and without notice.

• (1610)

Mr. Ouellet stunned the international community and human rights watchers when he remarked — notwithstanding China's atrocious human rights record — just days before the fifth anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre, that Canada will not link trade relations with China to Beijing's human rights record, basically stating that China is Canada's fifth largest trading partner and the fastest growing economy in the world, and is too important to cause such linkages to occur. Frankly, I can understand that reasoning, and within certain limitations I can accept it.

However, Mr. Ouellet's later comment that he "did not intend to get bogged down by Tiananmen Square" in his dealings with China is a total disregard for our past record. It sends out an incredibly bad message to the international community that human rights to Canada now means "getting bogged down" over Tiananmen Square.

The most astounding statement came from our Prime Minister when, in his statement of profound Canadian inferiority, he belittled the work of prior Canadian governments, including his own, over the years on this issue when he stated:

> I am the Prime Minister of a country of 28 million people. He —

Referring to Chinese President Jiang Zemin:

> — is the president of a country with 1.2 billion. I am not allowed to tell the Premier of Saskatchewan or Quebec what to do. Am I supposed to tell the President of China what to do?

What an incredible statement of our policy with respect to human rights! What a shocking understatement of the important role Canada has played in promoting human rights as a party to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights! What a puny, pacifistic approach towards deplorable human rights conditions, and what a total degradation of our foreign rights and humanitarian responsibilities!

We are a nation eminently suited to providing leadership in this area. Yes, there are many things Canada can do in its endeavour to bring democratic development and human rights attitudes to developing countries.

This issue was brought home to me in a starkly realistic manner this past weekend, at a meeting I attended with my fellow directors of the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development in Montreal. We met with Prime Minister Dr. Sein Win of Burma whose party, the NLD, as we all know, won the election, only to find, two months later, it was invalidated by the military junta known as SLORC. Today, SLORC is the most oppressive regime in the world.

Dr. Sein Win stated to us, as he said to the joint parliamentary committee last week:

> More trade and investment will only entrench SLORC, widen the gap between the urban and the rural, the haves and the have-nots and aggravate the current crisis in Burma.

He urged Canada to maintain its strong human rights policy and increase it. He quoted from South African Bishop Desmond Tutu who stated:

> Tough sanctions, not constructive engagement, finally brought the release of Nelson Mandela and the dawn of a new era in my country.

This is the language that must be spoken with tyrants for, sadly, it is the only language they understand.

Dr. Sein Win told us of his concern over the shift in Canadian policy and the message that Canada is sending throughout the world. He affirmed his view that conditionality towards Canadian aid and Canadian leadership in trade policies is vital if progress is to be made in this area. We cannot turn a blind eye to the atrocities in Burma.

We cannot turn a blind eye to Thailand, one of the world's fastest growing economies where, last May, nearly 200 women burned to death in a Bangkok toy factory in which they were locked with no means of escape in clear violation of international principles of human rights, including labour rights. We cannot continue to allocate billions of dollars in foreign aid without demanding that the human rights records of recipients be examined and conditions attached, if aid is to be forthcoming.

Contrary to our Prime Minister's statements relative to China, there are a number of things that we can realistically do that, over time, will assist in the creation of democratic institutions in many of these countries, and will ultimately improve the conditions of the average man and woman in these nations.

May I say that ultimately it is in our own economic interests that democratic development occur in these expanding societies, for if that is the case, growth acceleration, free market economies, better trade relations and more trade will ultimately occur.

Realistically, what can we do? Clearly, the answer lies not in Canada's cutting off trade with China. Abhorrent as its treatment of its people may be, that is not practical, it will not work and we cannot do it alone. It will place Canadian business at an extreme disadvantage in a very important market.

No, we cannot act alone. However, realistically we can do a number of the following.

First, we must continually expose and criticize nations whose human rights records are unacceptable by universal standards. We must encourage non-governmental organizations and continue our support of organizations such as the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development in their endeavours to encourage the development of democratic institutions in other countries.

Second, we must, within our own country, strive to maintain the best human rights record possible, and ensure that within our own boundaries our treatment of our minorities, our aboriginal people and our impoverished is maintained and improved. We must act by example.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt the Honourable Senator Ghitter, but the rules require that I point out that his time has expired.

Does the honourable senator have leave to continue his remarks?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Ghitter: I thank honourable senators.

Third, we must use our influence at multilaterals, at the United Nations, the World Bank, the IMF, GATT and any other international organization to which we are a party. We must urge the international community to use its considerable muscle and influence to say to all nations of the world that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is not mere puffery, is not merely a piece of paper, but is a working document to which the nations of the world have subscribed and committed themselves for the betterment of humankind and the recognition that every citizen in the global community is entitled to the economic, social and cultural rights that are protected under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights.

Fourth, we can encourage our trading partners, and as a matter of policy ourselves, to refuse to purchase goods from any nation that produces goods under slave labour conditions, and monitor and expose these conditions for the world to see.

Fifth, as a nation we can take steps to find ways by which obstacles to human rights could be overcome in these nations. For example, we could assist in helping to build an independent and non-corrupt judiciary in these countries. We could help in the establishment and functioning of legal aid services. We could assist in the promotion of human rights education. We must enhance our commitment to organizations that go out into the field and expose human rights violations that are occurring in the world.

There is so much that can be done. Morally, we must not be silent. It is in our self-interest that this be done, for ultimately as a nation, as a world, we will be much better off if the dictators, the despots, the authoritative military regimes of the world are put to an end and replaced by enlightenment, democratic institutions, individual liberty, creativity and the ultimate betterment of the world community. In the end, it is not only morally right but it is economically right for this nation to energetically promote, wherever possible, the betterment of mankind.

It is not enough for the leader of our country to merely shrug his shoulders and give up, and suggest that he is unwilling to tell the President of China what to do. To that I say, Mr. Prime Minister, you bet you should tell the President of China what to do — not on a Canadian model, but on an international model of fairness, proper treatment of the citizens of the world and the development of basic standards of humanity that presently do not exist in China, or, sadly, in many other nations of the world.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, for Senator Austin, debate adjourned.

AMATEURISM IN JOURNALISM IN CANADA

INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 2, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the amateurishness of the press coverage, in both the French and the English media, of his involvement in meetings in Paris in March organized by the Canada-France Inter-Parliamentary Association; the importance of the role of Canadian parliamentarians in that Association; and the benefit for Canada of strengthening yet further the special and historic relationship between our two parliaments.

He said: Honourable senators, I know that Senator Beaudoin intends to speak after me. I understand that he will deal specifically with the second part of the inquiry.

As far as I am concerned, I would prefer not to have to speak today, honourable senators. I do so because I feel that I have been unfairly attacked.

Webster's dictionary defines the word "amateurism" as follows:

> The practice, characteristic, or status of an amateur.

To appreciate the meaning of the word, let us look at the definition of "amateur":

> One that engages in an activity in an inexperienced or incompetent manner.

One could well qualify sloppy reporting as amateurishness or amateurism.

The onus is on me to show why I would qualify a series of articles that appeared in both the English and French media as amateurish. The most direct approach would be to quote these articles, which break the rules of professional ethics and fail to live up to the standards of serious, well-informed, objective and fair reporting.

The Thursday, March 24, 1994 edition of The Ottawa Citizen printed an article under the "Canada" column entitled "Junketing politicians take spouses to Paris." Among other things, the article says that the "Canada-France Association delegation travelled to Paris this week without authorization." The article goes on to say that:

> According to Gagliano...

Gagliano is the Liberal Whip in the Commons.

> ...only one person had been authorized to attend, namely Liberal Martin Cauchon.

Montreal's The Gazette published the same article on the same day.

According to Mr. Gagliano, the unauthorized parliamentarians were Senator Beaudoin, myself and a Bloc Québécois member of Parliament, namely Mrs. Dalphond-Guiral. The author of this article was Dianne Rinehart from Canadian Press, who never even tried to contact those who stood indicted on summary conviction by Mr. Gagliano. I think that any responsible journalist would have made a point to check the trustworthiness of this statement with those concerned. Mr. Gagliano did not attend the board meeting of Canada-France.

As if he had not aroused enough suspicion about us already, we had the lovely surprise of reading the following in the May 3, 1994, edition of The Ottawa Citizen, and I quote:

> Meanwhile, Liberal whip Alfonso Gagliano says two senators and an MP won't have to reimburse taxpayers for an unauthorized trip they took to Paris in March [...] despite the fact that only one MP — Liberal Martin Cauchon — was approved to go.

On May 4, 1994, The Chronicle-Herald of Halifax reported that:

> Mr. Gagliano had promised earlier to try and find out why the three parliamentarians had gone on the trip and suggested he might even demand repayment.

My colleague Senator Beaudoin and myself were named in these articles. I think this is very serious because there may be an imputation of cheating in there. I am sure that is the impression under which the average reader was left after reading such articles.

Further, the same article reads:

> But the Liberal whip announced on Monday that, instead of demanding repayment, he will work with the parliamentary associations to ensure this does not happen again.

He should have checked his information at the source before so unfairly accusing us in our absence.

The following article was published in the Vancouver Province, on May 3, 1994:

> Ottawa—Two senators and an MP won't have to reimburse taxpayers for an unauthorized trip to Paris.

Mr. Gagliano is quoted verbatim as saying:

> I just let it go for the time being.

I, for one, consider that our reputation was tarnished by this series of articles based on falsehoods. I would have thought that having realized how outrageous his remarks were, especially after I had pointed them out to him, Mr. Gagliano would have attempted to set the record straight publicly, either in a press conference or from his seat in the other place. However, he did no such thing.

More articles injurious to our reputation were published in The Globe and Mail as well as in Le Droit of Ottawa-Hull, La Presse and Le Devoir on May 10, 1994.

Did these journalists, their editors or the people on the news desk — who often bother us for trivialities — even try to contact Senator Beaudoin or myself at any time during or after the trip in question? Not me anyway, never!

No. Never!

This technique is called attacking others' reputations through a third party and not allowing them to defend themselves through the accusing media.

Did Senator Beaudoin and I take steps to try to set the record straight and contradict Mr. Gagliano? Yes. We even signed a statement on May 4, 1994. I will read it to you in its entirety. It was printed under "Corrections":

> With regard to the Canadian Press article published yesterday in Le Devoir (p. A-5) and headlined: "The BQ at taxpayers' expense, we found three inaccuracies."

1. It is totally false that our trip was not authorized: Senator Gérald Beaudoin's trip was authorized by the Conservative Party Whip in the Senate and that of Senator Eymard Corbin by the Liberal Party Whip in the Senate.

2. Alfonso Gagliano, Chief Government Whip in the House of Commons, authorizes travel by government members who sit in the House of Commons; this authority does not extend to senators.

3. On March 16, 1994, the executive secretary of the Canadian section notified all whips of parties represented in the Senate and the House of Commons of this meeting to be held in France and of the delegation's membership, as part of the Canada-France Inter-Parliamentary Association's activities. We ask that these corrections be published.

The document was signed by Senator Gérald-A. Beaudoin and myself.

The Canadian press as a whole ignored our correction. However, it reported around the same date, if I remember correctly, that Mr. Gagliano had admitted that he had authority only over Liberal members of the House of Commons. There was not a word of apology to the senators whose integrity had been questioned. The harmful, unfounded public statements were reported by the press throughout Canada. I think the correction should also be made public. It should be a point of honour for us.

Someone just brought to my attention at lunchtime another article by Dianne Rinehart, that was published in The Gazette on May 10, 1994, and I would like to quote the following passages, because I think it was one of the last articles on our trip to Paris that appeared in the press:

[English]

Gagliano's threats left the three fuming....

The three in question are Senator Beaudoin, Madam Dalphond-Guiral and myself.

All three had approval from their party and senate whips to attend, as well as the executive of the association, headed by Cauchon. Gagliano says he stands by his original assessment. "I didn't agree with the executive — but the executive made a decision to go with that trip, and they went."

[Translation]

Why on earth did he not speak before we left for Paris?

As for Mr. Gagliano's "pardon," his "I just let it go for the time being" comment concerning the expenses incurred by my colleague and me for this trip to Paris is a sword of Damocles hanging "for the time being" over our reputation and our integrity. If he was really serious to the point of having to say publicly that he would consider requiring repayment, which implies that we illegally spent public money, he should either follow up his threats or apologize to Senator Beaudoin and me. I think that it would be the honourable thing for him to do.

I will now talk about the circumstances and formal decisions which made Senator Beaudoin and me the two Senate delegates of the Canadian section of the Canada-France Inter-Parliamentary Association to one of the meetings held in Paris from March 20 to 24, 1994.

The Canada-France Inter-Parliamentary Association is a bilateral country-to-country organization that spans both countries and is not only a provincial association. The Canadian section brings together English- and French-speaking members of both Houses of the federal Parliament from various political parties and all regions of the country. The Reform Party decided not to join this association. That is its business.

At its first meeting on March 9, 1994, the new executive of Canada-France decided to restore relations with French parliamentarians as soon as possible, since there had been no formal meeting for two years because of elections in France two years ago and in Canada last year. During election periods, there is no contact. At that meeting on March 9, an entirely Quebec delegation was proposed, made up of the president and two vice-presidents already named, who were to be accompanied by the administrative secretary, also a Quebecer. Strictly speaking, I have nothing against the delegation being composed that way. I must point out that the administrative secretary is appointed by the Parliamentary Association Secretariat. I have always believed that French Canada is more, much more than Quebec alone. This association does not include only Quebecers or French Canadians but extends to all parliamentarians.

I have always worked for the recognition of this reality which, unfortunately, is too often overlooked within the association. Personally, I could not support the proposal as it was presented to us at first.

Once again, it must be emphasized that during this executive meeting, the possibility of delegating only one person was never mentioned, contrary to what the Liberal Whip in the House of Commons categorically said to the media. In fact, it was initially proposed that three delegates be sent, namely the president, Mr. Cauchon, the vice-president, Senator Beaudoin, and the vice-president representing the House of Commons, Mrs. Dalphond-Ghiral from the Bloc Québécois.

In any case, after a discussion, the executive unanimously approved a formal motion tabled by the independent member for Beauce, Mr. Gilles Bernier, to the effect that the delegation would include MP Cauchon, Senators Beaudoin and Corbin, MP Dalphond-Guiral, as well as MP Maheu, the Deputy Chairperson of the House of Commons.

Again, a formal motion was unanimously approved by the executive. That motion was in order, correct in its form and duly approved in compliance with the statutes of the association.

After the meeting, the association's administrative secretary addressed a memo to the whips of each party in both Houses to inform them of the executive's decision.

Under these circumstances, it is difficult to understand why the Liberal Whip in the House of Commons launched into such a misplaced and unjustified attack before the media, precisely when the Paris meeting was ending. Indeed, he could have spoken up with the other party whips, before the delegation's departure.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senator, your time is up. If honourable senators agree, Senator Corbin will be allowed to carry on.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Corbin: I was saying that the whips should have intervened in the event of a controversy. I may add that after the meeting of the executive on March 9, I personally decided to go and see my whip, Senator Jacques Hébert, in his office. I told him why I asked to be on this delegation, and I also said, and I quote:

> If you think I should not go to Paris because there might be an important vote or because of other imperatives, I will withdraw.

Senator Hébert told me:

> No, go right ahead.

It seemed to me that I had proper authorization. Before I left, no one ever questioned the fact or implied that I should not go.

Honourable senators, those are the honest facts, and I challenge anyone to say this is not what happened. The executive of Canada-France did not circumvent the statutes, rules, traditions or customs with respect to the whip. I did not try to take personal advantage of the funds made available to Canada-France. I am very particular about that.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I simply would like to confirm the facts as stated by Senator Corbin, as far as they concern me.

It is quite true that as the Government Whip, I authorized Senator Corbin to be on this delegation of the Canada-France Inter-Parliamentary Association which was to meet in Paris from March 20 to March 24.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to stress two points on the subject of inter-parliamentary associations.

I think these associations are useful. Many countries, including the United States, France and the United Kingdom, have established similar associations. It is good for parliamentarians to visit each other. As senators and members of Parliament, we can all learn something from our colleagues in other countries. Such contacts are intellectually rewarding. Occasionally, we meet people who are truly in positions of power.

Some will say it costs quite a bit, of course, but the budgets do not seem extravagant to me. In any event, if it is necessary to reduce them, let us not hesitate to do so. In such a case, appropriate cut-backs will have to be made fairly and equitably, taking into account each inter-parliamentary association.

I would like to say a word about the Canada-France Inter-Parliamentary Association, which seems unpopular among certain members of the press. Need we be reminded, given the present political circumstances, that this association between Canada and one of the two mother countries has a valid reason for being. Quebec understood this fact, hence the existence of the Association Québec-France. So, why not Canada-France? Need I say more?

My second point concerns the independence of the two Houses. I am delighted to note that the Senate and the House of Commons send delegations abroad and cooperate closely.

Need I point out, however, that our two legislative Houses must remain autonomous and that the delegates come under the responsibility of their respective whips. The Senate cannot accept any subordination here. My colleague Senator Corbin clearly illustrated this principle in the light of the events of last March in France. I would not want to say too much, but I agree with him in principle.

In closing, I must say, as a point of information, that Canada-France will be receiving a French delegation to Canada in July and that the work will focus on three themes:

> The entry of young people into the labour force in a climate of persistent unemployment;
>
> Cultural exception clauses in trade agreements to which Canada and France are parties; and
> The impact of NAFTA on economic relations between Canada and France.

I am delighted with this initiative by our two executives, French and Canadian.

I believe, honourable senators, that our association will do some useful work.

HEALTH CARE

TRAINING OF WORKERS IN UNDERSERVICED REGIONS—INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean Noël Desmarais rose pursuant to notice of June 8, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the problem of training of health care workers for underserviced areas of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I have a few thoughts to share with you on a topic close to my heart, one that has concerned me for quite a while. The topic is health care practitioners and how we educate them. It is a topic of interest to many Canadians and to all levels of government in Canada.

I want to speak about how we educate our doctors because, in our quest for excellence, we may be going a bit off course. I refer here to our preoccupation with medical super-specialization. No, I am not opposed to research or advancement in the science of medicine. Yes, I do want us to know as much as we can about the human body and the diseases that affect every part of it.

The practice of medicine has advanced so much in recent years that it is now virtually impossible for a doctor not to find something wrong with you. However, for all these remarkable advances in medicine and all the excellent health care programs we have instituted in Canada, there are still numbers of our population who do not have the type and quality of service they should have.

Northern Canada and rural Canada together are home to almost half of our population. When it comes to medical care, all of the people who inhabit these areas are underserviced to varying degrees. Regarding Northeastern Ontario, where my native city of Sudbury serves to some extent as a tertiary centre, it is stated in a soon to be published report by Doctors B. Rowe and G. Bota, for example, that Northeastern Ontario has a rate of trauma-related deaths per 100,000 twice the level reported for Ontario as a whole.

The most hard hit in the most basic services, however, is the Far North, largely populated by aboriginal peoples.

On the other hand, the best quality medical care in Canada has been provided in areas surrounding medical schools. Unfortunately for those who do not live there, almost all of these schools are in the larger urban areas. They are there for a variety of reasons, some more legitimate than others, and I have no particular quarrel with that.

[Translation]

Some schools were opened because there was an obvious need to prepare local candidates to serve a growing population. Others were opened for prestige, political, religious or linguistic reasons.

Whatever the reason, we have set up in Canada some highly regarded schools of medicine, institutions we can be justly proud of, and which have met admirably the health needs of the population. Our schools of medicine, like those of other countries, have generally two roles, teaching and research, and the two are considered inseparable. What enables them to do research and practical training is the availability of clinical material, namely patients.

[English]

This supply of patients has enabled our medical schools to carry out basic and clinical research, recognized worldwide as being of the highest standard. In epidemiological research, for example, we have done work which has produced numerous highly beneficial outcome studies, clinical practice guidelines and criteria for evidence-based treatment.

Academic health science centres have, nonetheless, failed in two respects. First, though our medical schools have done great research, have produced fine doctors and excellent specialists and super-specialists, for some time now they have failed to produce general practitioners best suited to the practice of medicine in the underserviced areas of Canada. Second, particularly in the specialty disciplines, we have concentrated on the leading edge, thereby reducing the scope of practice within each specialty. We have now super-specialists — men and women, for example, who specialize not in the eye but rather in either the cornea or the retina of the eye.

We have reduced the availability of generalists capable of operating in communities with no academic health centres. This means that people in more rural areas have to travel to get the care they need; care that is generally not that complicated. It is only that our practitioners are no longer trained to handle such cases.

For example, to my knowledge general surgeons such as were produced in the Gallie course at the University of Toronto some years ago are no longer trained in such country — this in spite of the fact that such generalists are very much needed in smaller communities. They are needed because, if you do not have the general surgeons willing to perform straightforward surgery in a number of areas, then you have to have a super-specialist for each of these. The problem this creates is that, in a small community, since you cannot keep the super-specialists busy in their area, you will have to do without the super-specialists. They will not work there if they cannot make a living. In other words, where a smaller community is in dire need of a few general surgeons, it probably could not sustain six, seven, or ten super-specialists. As it is, however, those regions are having to do without both. General surgeons do not seem to exist, and super-specialists want to remain in the urban centres.

Generalists of all types are reluctant to practice in underserviced areas. They are not trained for the challenge of such areas and are extremely uncomfortable when placed in these situations. They find comfort in proximity to teaching centres where they can refer patients to specialists, and thereby practice office-based medicine. Due to the limited scope of their clinical experience in hospitals, they are not prepared to function, often alone, in small isolated hospitals or communities.

There is a small light at the end of the tunnel. Universities have recently developed a family practice specialty. These specialists in general practice could be given appropriate rural remote training and thus be better suited and able to carry on as general practitioners in underserviced and remote areas, if they chose to go to such areas.

Again, I repeat, Canada needs to train leading-edge subspecialists. We must further our knowledge and expertise. Our mission in life is ever to do more. We cannot settle for less than a total dedication to our craft. However, we also need generalists. In rural Canada, we need more than consultants or referral services. We need practising doctors who can themselves minister to the sick and the injured.

To my knowledge, however, generalists are no longer being trained in many disciplines, even though they are required for the outlying areas. I would even venture to say that the academic health science centres as they exist today, because of their orientation and structure, are not able to produce generalists. They would not be able to do so for a considerable period of time, even if decisions were made to that end immediately.

[Translation]

We did not find ourselves in this dead-end because of our stubbornness or lack of vision. Neither was it due to unwillingness or lack of sensitivity. We were caught up in the pursuit of excellence. Superior minds working very hard to find a cure for insidious diseases lost track, at least temporarily, of another challenge, namely how to provide excellent health care in remote areas.

Do I have a solution? Perhaps. First, we must answer several questions before we can find a long-lasting solution.

[English]

• (1650)

The idea that we can train people in our urban areas for the type of medicine practised there and then expect them to practise successfully where I come from has not produced sparkling results. In the larger urban centres where our doctors are trained, the lifestyle is such, professional attractions are such, and the style of medical practice they have been prepared for is such that our graduates are reluctant to migrate towards rural Canada to dispense their skills and learning. They have to be bribed or bullied into it, and that is not how it should be.

What if they did not have to go to large urban centres for their medical schooling? What if the teaching could be dispensed from a medical school in a semi-rural area? What if the curriculum were geared to preparing them for a practice that attempts to make the physician more self-sufficient and self-reliant — the type of physician who will be equal to the task of dealing with a number of problems that are now routinely referred to subspecialists in an urban setting?

The medical school would certainly have to be in an underserviced area with sufficient clinical material or patients to allow for practical training. You cannot just explain what a broken wrist looks like. It is far better if you can show students how to recognize and set it. Such a centre would have a very specific mission: to conduct research in the type of training required by a physician who intends to practice in towns or rural areas where all the subspecialties will not be readily available. Having determined what type of training is required, that institution would proceed to make it available.

As well, since generalist physicians do not provide the total solution, particularly in more isolated and remote communities, such a centre would also provide training in other appropriate health disciplines, such as paramedical and nurse practitioners. This would produce all manner of health professionals working in a wide variety of situations in more isolated and remote underserviced areas, with more empowerment and support than they presently have. Development focused on even a few such disciplines would go a long way to improving the current level of underservicing.

A number of innovative training and research programs currently operating in Northeastern Ontario should be considered as candidates to fall within the aegis of such a centre. I believe that an integration of these current programs should be combined with the development of other key components under one administration. That would go a long way toward the development of a knowledge and research base in areas such as distance education and support, distribution of key technologies, development of optimal referral and support networks. It would allow us to fashion delivery systems that are innovative and community-based. Further, we could elaborate the human resource models and training capability required to address effectively the needs of Canada's underserviced areas.

I am sure that there are many objections to such a concept. One of the main objections would undoubtedly come from government with the flat statement that government has no money and that Canada already produces too many doctors. I understand the problem well, and I would not suggest that Canada produce more doctors and more money, but that it redirect its resources.

Let us use Ontario as our example. There are five medical schools clustered in a relatively small area in the southern part of the province. It has been argued that some of the schools have too small a territory and an insufficient clinical pool. This leads one to consider whether a consolidation of Southern Ontario facilities, with an effort to reduce our duplication while maintaining current strengths for which each school is recognized, might be called for. It could provide an acceptable solution by releasing sufficient resources to be channelled into an innovative northern medical centre with a different vocation.

[Translation]

I also strongly suggest that such an institution be established in Sudbury, which is already a centre for health-care services. Located in Northeastern Ontario, the city of Sudbury has enough clinics to train its students. Other factors make Sudbury a particularly attractive site for such a centre, including some tertiary health-care facilities, a university, two colleges — a French-language college is under development — a community deeply interested in health care, a research unit on health-care human resources in the North, as well as training programs in fields such as family medicine, speech therapy and midwifery.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must advise the honourable senator that his time has expired. Is there leave to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Desmarais.

Senator Desmarais: Thank you, senators.

[Translation]

With this kind of centre, the primary purpose of which would be to meet the needs of underserviced regions, I believe the benefits to the regions will more than offset the negative effects associated with consolidation of academic health science centres in Southern Ontario.

[English]

I would therefore strongly urge governments to review all options to support the development of a new centre with a specific and distinct mission to prepare generalists in selected disciplines appropriate to some underserviced areas, and to develop more appropriate service delivery models. Such a centre would also provide research, not directed to the whole of Canada but rather to better addressing the health care needs in underserviced areas. Ideally, the centre would consolidate existing training and research activities which are scattered across a number of organizations.

As well, if we were to develop the capability to train properly the required professional resources and service our underserviced areas in innovative, efficient, and cost-effective ways, we would find that this knowledge would be in demand, not only in other parts of Canada but elsewhere in other countries.

As Canadians, we consider universal Medicare one of our defining national characteristics. Let us rise to the challenge of making our system more equitable by finding innovative ways to better address the needs of our many underserviced areas.

Honourable senators, if I have presumed to trespass on your time, it is that I feel passionately about this subject. I quite appreciate that we must be judicious in the way we spend the ever-decreasing funds available. I am also quite aware that medical education is more of a provincial responsibility than a federal responsibility. However, I have recently learned that when you have the opportunity to speak from such a pulpit as the Upper House, you should not waste it.

I sincerely hope the medical authorities of Canada will not feel that I have criticized their administration of our medical training. On the contrary, I am simply looking to contribute to the collective effort in finding solutions to the problem of providing sound health care to those areas of our country that are underserviced.

On motion of Senator Berntson, debate adjourned.

RIDEAU HALL

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Peter deC. Cory, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, June 15, 1994, at 5:00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

ALBERT CAMUS

ACCEPTED PRONUNCIATION OF FAMILY NAME

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, I would like to inform the Senate that in the last few weeks, I gave Senator Grafstein some advice about the pronunciation of Albert Camus's family name.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I regret to interrupt the Honourable Senator Riel, but we are having some difficulties with the sound system. I am informed that it will take 30 to 60 minutes before the technicians will know when the system will be operative.

We can adjourn now to the call of the Chair and ring the bell for five minutes, or we can do whatever is the wish of honourable senators. Is it the wish of honourable senators that we adjourn now and commence again after a five-minute bell?

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I rise on a matter of vocabulary only.

Your Honour, I think it should be "suspend" as opposed to "adjourn."

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I stand corrected. We will suspend the sitting to the call of the Chair.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Your Honour, if there are committee meetings scheduled for approximately three o'clock and witnesses are waiting, what is the point of suspending the session for 60 minutes? Why not postpone this sitting of the Senate?

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is a small problem in terms of the advancement of the legislative program. I am not sure what to suggest. However, I know that it will be difficult if we have to lose today's sitting. Perhaps other senators have suggestions as to how to proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In 30 to 60 minutes from now the technicians will know when we can resume.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I think we have to suspend the sitting on the understanding that the committees may have leave to proceed with their work while the Senate sits. Perhaps we should obtain permission for them to do that.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I agree completely with what Senator Stanbury has said. If we are to meet the anticipated deadlines as they relate to the legislative calendar, then we cannot lose today's sitting. However, I think we have some obligation to honour our commitment to allow certain committees to meet at three o'clock. We are also to have Royal Assent at 5:00 p.m. If we cannot be back here until three o'clock in any event, then perhaps we should agree to come back at five o'clock for Royal Assent and then adjourn until 7:00 p.m. to carry on with the business of the house.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I think what we need to do is to give permission to the committees to meet while the Senate is sitting and proceed with our work here; otherwise the Royal Assent will not be very useful to us.

Senator Berntson: That is agreed.

Senator Stanbury: I should like to ask for permission for the committees to meet while the Senate is sitting this afternoon, and then suspend until the call of the Chair, or until three o'clock, after a five-minute bell, so that we can get along with our business as well as allowing our committees to do their work.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, am I correct in saying that the problem we face is not with the sound system as such, but is with the communication of the sound from the chamber into the booths where the simultaneous translation takes place? If that is the problem, is there any way that we can get around it until the problem of communication between here and there has been cleared up? Is there any other way to proceed with simultaneous translation except from the booths?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that the translation system cannot now function.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the committees that presently have scheduled meetings be permitted to meet while the Senate is sitting; and that the Senate suspend its sitting until three o'clock, or until the bell rings for five minutes alerting us to return to the chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is suspended until 3:00 p.m. or until after the ringing of a five-minute bell.

At 1:50 p.m., the sitting of the Senate was suspended.

[Translation]

At 2:35 p.m., the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ALBERT CAMUS

ACCEPTED PRONUNCIATION OF FAMILY NAME

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators. I hope your applause is not premature.

I must explain that a few weeks ago, my colleague Senator Grafstein approached me at the caucus table and said that he was looking for a book by "C-A-M-O-U." He had pronounced the name the English way, and I did not understand.

Finally, I asked him to repeat what he had said, and I realized he meant the French author who won the Nobel prize a few years ago. He later died in a car accident, and his last book, after the manuscript was finished by his daughter, was published not long ago.

I told him that the name was pronounced C-A-M-U-S, sounding the s. He took my advice — he has a good ear for languages — and made use of this in this house in the course of a speech which unfortunately I did not hear because I was away. Apparently, during his speech he pronounced the name C-A-M-U-S, as I had told him. When they heard this, some colleagues from Quebec made a few what I would call snide remarks. There may have been other reasons, however.

He told them, and he was right, that I had given him this pronunciation, that I was his source. I maintained that I was right, so after that, I received some snide remarks from Senator Rivest, Senator Lynch-Staunton and Senator Beaudoin. Only Senator Prud'homme refrained.

I then decided to write a letter to Maurice Druon, Permanent Secretary to the Académie française, in which I planned to say the following:

> Dear Sir,
>
> The purpose of my letter is to ask your advice and assistance.
> How does one pronounce Albert Camus' last name?
> I have always pronounced "C-A-M-U-S" while sounding the "s", as in Marius and Fabius. Otherwise, "C-A-M-U-S" would have been spelled with a u as in Raimu. No one has ever remarked on this or corrected me, either in Paris or in Montreal.
> For instance, in Cabanis, the name of your fellow academician, I always sounded the "s" as I heard people do in the case of Baudis, the mayor of Toulouse, —

— This mayor has been on French television often recently because he headed the French majority's list of candidates for the European elections. In my letter I went on to say:

> We do not say "C-A-B-A-N-I" or "B-A-U-D-I."

This is in the south.

> My point is that in the South of France, people pronounce the final consonant of a name and even of ordinary words. Albert Camus was born in Algeria, which is even further south.
> I may be wrong, but in any case, I think that sounding the "s" in "C-A-M-U-S" is more euphonious than saying "C-A-M-U" and leaving out the final "s".

I was told, however, that when referring to a brand of cognac —

Senator Prud'homme told me this:

— the name is pronounced "C-A-M-U" —

I do not know about that, since it is not my brand. But I am willing to switch!

— and I said that was different because it comes from the Landes —

In the Landes, they do not pronounce French the same way they do in the south. But I do know, because I went there, that in the Dordogne, they say "M-O-N-T-A-G-N-E" when referring to the author, and not Montaigne.

I said this earlier to my friend Senator Bolduc and he said: "Certainly not!" However, I heard people in some very distinguished circles in Paris, when I met Mr. Druon, for instance, say Montagne and studiously ignore the "i".

All this is undoubtedly a matter of local or regional accents, but people may have a choice. In the case of the name Montaigne, for instance, either pronunciation seems to be acceptable.

The name "S-H-N-È-D-R-E" was very much in the news in France recently. It is spelled Schneider but is pronounced "S-H-N-È-D-R-E." Very proper people will tend to say Snèdre, as they would say "N-È-C-R-E" in referring to Mr. Necker, the minister under Louis XVI.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senator, I am sorry, but according to our rules, your time has expired, unless you have the permission of honourable senators to continue.

Hon. senators: Agreed.

Senator Riel: Thank you, honourable senators. I concluded as follows:

In point of fact, I advised one of my English-speaking colleagues in the Senate to pronounce the "s" in "Camus." He proceeded to do so and was derided by several Quebec senators.

I must accept responsibility for this piece of advice and state that this is the way I pronounce it myself.

Am I wrong, or am I right? I would appreciate your comments on this point.

I apologize for troubling you for such a trifling matter and I remain, yours sincerely, ...

That is all I wanted to say!

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, is it not a fact that there is no set rule governing the pronunciation of proper names in French?

To my knowledge, the Académie française decreed many years ago that proper names could be pronounced differently. Senator Grafstein's pronunciation was correct. However, this name could also be pronounced "C-A-M-U" because there is no set rule.

Maybe things have changed since then. That was nearly 40 years ago. I do not believe that rule has been changed.

Senator Riel: I understand. I believe you are right. Therefore, the good people of Quebec City are free to pronounce this name "C-A-M-U," but it will continue to strike me as somewhat odd!

When I go to Paris, my name is pronounced "R-E-E-L"! As I was telling one of our colleagues just before we sat, there is a program on the BBC Sunday night — I do not know whether you watch it — called Keeping Up Appearances. One of the characters is called Hyacinthe Bucket, pronounced "B-O-U-Q-U-E-T."

When people speak to her and pronounce her name "B-U-C-K-E-T," she advises them that the correct pronunciation is "B-O-U-Q-U-E-T"!

SAINT JOHN, NEW BRUNSWICK

BILINGUAL NATURE OF WORK FORCE

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, I rise today to share with you the best kept secret of my city of Saint John, and that is that it has the second largest bilingual work force in New Brunswick. With a total of 19,000 people able to speak both French and English, Saint John's bilingual work force trails only that of Moncton.

Many of you associate the province of New Brunswick with successful bilingualism. Few of you would credit Saint John with this asset.

When the majority of people think about the port city of Saint John, they think about the Loyalists landing 211 years ago and the city's rich British heritage. Last Saturday's edition of the Telegraph-Journal stated:

It was only when Saint John began aggressively competing with other areas of the province for new business...that the city made an inventory of its assets.

It discovered that it had the second largest bilingual work force in New Brunswick.

In fact, as it was reported in the Telegraph-Journal, there are more than 5,000 people of francophone origin and a further 14,000 who are bilingual, for a total of 19,000 residents who are able to communicate in both French and English.

Recent job announcements in my province have touted the advantages of having a bilingual work force, as one national company after another has chosen a central location from which they may serve all customers in their language of choice. Saint John has been the site of choice for several of these companies, including Medi-Trust, the mail-order pharmaceutical company, and Canada Trust, the banking institution.

Bilingualism is truly important to the economic well-being of New Brunswick's port city. Once greater harmony between the French-speaking and English-speaking communities is achieved, we will have an edge over other communities, especially when considering our industrial base and geographic location.

Experts and business leaders seek communities that offer a high quality of life, and Saint John compares well with any other city in this nation. The recent restoration of the Imperial Theatre has breathed new life into Saint John's reputation as a cultural centre in the Atlantic provinces, harkening back to the days when it was on the prestigious theatre circuit which included London, New York and Boston. Also, the recent addition of Harbour Station, the city's arena and home to the Saint John Flames American Hockey League franchise, has kindled a new enthusiasm for sport and entertainment in the port city.

As the newspaper article states:

> It's fine to recognize or to look to our past — the Loyalist past, but we also have to recognize that there are different cultures and we need to embrace those cultures so that our community and our municipality has that much more to offer.

As a Saint Johner, I want this secret to be shared by all, and hopefully, in the not too distant future, my name too can be added to the bilingual population.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATE OF SEA KING HELICOPTERS—REPLACEMENT OF FLEET

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, how many more Sea King helicopters have to crash before the government realizes the urgency of the issue of providing our Canadian Armed Forces with new helicopters? Just recently, another Sea King had to make an emergency forced landing near Kenora, again because of mechanical problems. Fortunately, no one was killed or injured in this incident.

The government must realize that the lives of helicopter pilots are on the line every day that it puts off making a decision regarding the helicopter program.

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to please continue to put pressure on her cabinet colleagues to protect the pilots operating Sea King helicopters as well as people like our fishermen who depend on this rescue capability. These pilots should not have to operate under such difficult and dangerous conditions as they presently do with these obsolete helicopters.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: With leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(b), I would move third reading now, honourable senators.

QUESTION PERIOD

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to questions raised on May 10 and 12, 1994 by the Honourable Leonard Gustafson regarding delay in grain shipments from the prairies.

AGRICULTURE

HANDLING AND MOVEMENT OF GRAIN ON WEST COAST—EFFECT OF FAILURE TO MEET COMMITMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to questions raised by Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson on May 10 and 12, 1994)

CP Rail has announced that it is increasing its freight car fleet to handle Western Canadian grain to 15,000 hopper cars by late June. This increase will represent the largest grain car fleet in CP Rail's history. As well, CP Rail has announced it has purchased an additional 900 new covered hopper cars which are expected to be in service in time to move the fall harvest.

Canadian National's rail car fleet is at a near-record 15,000 cars and the railway is adding 1,000 cars on lease from the U.S.

While continuing to negotiate, a temporary agreement has been reached between the Grain Workers Union and the B.C. Terminal Elevator Operators Association with respect to the working of overtime which will allow the Grain Workers to deal with the immediate problem of moving the backlog of grain at West Coast terminals.

Minister Goodale met with key grain industry officials on May 16 in Winnipeg to discuss the immediate problems of getting grain to market. Working groups to address various technical issues were established which will report back to the Minister with recommendations for his consideration. In the meantime, Minister Goodale will be consulting with Ministers Young and Axworthy on a number of related issues and holding additional consultations with industry to gain further advice on measures to alleviate the current problem.

The trucking program which the Canadian Wheat Board (CWB) implemented to allow the trucking of grain from selected country elevators to interior terminals at Moose Jaw and Saskatoon, Saskatchewan has recently been expanded to include terminals at Indian Head and Weyburn in Saskatchewan. The program is expected to increase grain movement because railways will be able to concentrate on servicing main line operations.

The House of Commons Joint Agriculture and Agri-Food/Transport Subcommittee has submitted its recommendations to the Ministers of Agriculture and Agri-Food and Transport for their consideration.

According to the GTA, the "rollover" of grain movement to meet sales has been reduced in recent weeks from approximately 2 million tonnes to 500,000 tonnes. The normal rollover is 400,000 tonnes.

Indications are that the backlog will indeed be cleared by the end of the crop year. According to the CWB, Board grain shipping patterns at the West Coast are expected to be back to normal by mid-June.

THE ESTIMATES, 1994-95

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON MAIN ESTIMATES—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 2 under Reports of Committees:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance concerning the Main Estimates 1994-95, presented in the Senate on June 14, 1994.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, the National Finance Committee has held six meetings and heard testimony from three ministers to begin our examination of the 1994-95 Estimates. As our custom dictates, we will be continuing our review over the months to come, and we expect to table a final report before the end of March 1995.

The first meeting, at which the President of the Treasury Board appeared, and a second meeting with Treasury Board officials were devoted to an overall examination of the government's spending plans as outlined in Parts I and II of the Estimates. The 1994-95 budgetary expenditures in the Main Estimates are $160.738 billion, of which $112.163 billion, or 69.8 per cent, are statutory expenditures under previous authorities, and the remaining $48.575 billion or 30.2 per cent are annual appropriations that Parliament is being asked to approve. These proportions have remained virtually constant for several years.

In his budget of February 22, 1994, the Minister of Finance presented the government's fiscal plan, which anticipates total budgetary expenditures for 1994-95 of $163.600 billion. As explained in your committee's report, the difference between the two amounts consists of anticipated lapses, spending reductions that require the passage of legislation, and substantial reserves to fund spending requirements which have now appeared or will appear later in Supplementary Estimates.

The recent increases in interest rates have played havoc with this reserve amount. The minister will have a problem finding the reserve he was anticipating. Your committee understands that higher than expected increases in interest rates since budget day have necessitated the diversion of some of these reserves towards commensurately larger payments of interest on the public debt.

Three committee meetings were held to devote closer attention to the 1994-95 Estimates of the Department of National Defence. As honourable senators are aware, the budget of February 22, 1994, announced major reductions in defence infrastructure, including the closure of the Royal Military College at St-Jean, Quebec, and of Royal Roads Military College in Victoria, British Columbia, along with a 75-per-cent reduction in Canadian Forces Base St-Jean and the closure and reduction of other bases and military installations across the country.

The decision to close CMR and Royal Roads necessitates the consolidation of all post-secondary military education at the Royal Military College in Kingston, Ontario, which will have an enrolment of about 900 officer cadets in place of the 1,600 currently distributed over the three existing colleges. The Minister of National Defence stated before your committee, in confirmation of the budget figures, that closing the two colleges would yield annual savings of about $35 million, of which $23 million could be ascribed to the closure of CMR at St-Jean.

These numbers are very inconclusive. Many members of the committee felt that they did not accurately reflect the actual situation when you take into consideration the extra expenses in establishing alternative classes and facilities at Kingston.

Honourable senators will be aware that various members of the Senate have been trying to obtain supplementary information through Question Period and in other ways over the past several weeks to shed light on this mysterious set of events.

The previous government commissioned the "Report of the Ministerial Committee on the Canadian Military Colleges," which was completed in July of 1993, but only publicly released in March of this year following the budget announcement. This report, which I would urge honourable senators to read, considers, among other things, the effects of consolidating military education at one college. While the report acknowledged that some cost savings could be achieved, it stated that such a move would, in all likelihood, result in a relatively smaller enrolment of francophone officer cadets and cadets from outside Ontario and a reduced level of bilingualism in the officer corps.

The minister stated before your committee that the report's support of the current three-college system flowed directly from its underlying assumptions that current cadet enrolment levels would be maintained or increased. While this statement agrees with your committee's reading of the report, the minister also played down the negative effects predicted by the ministerial committee if CMR and Royal Roads were to be closed.

The budget announcement indicated, as well, that the consolidation of the three colleges at RMC followed logically from the reduced need for officers in the regular forces. However, some witnesses argued before your committee that this reduced need had not been, or should not have been, established, particularly since the appropriate size of the forces and the officer corps are now being examined by the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy, which, as honourable senators know, has not yet completed its work.

It is certainly possible, instead, that the justification for the closures in terms of a reduced need for officers may have been provided after the closure decision had already been taken. In other words, the number of officers who could be accommodated at the Royal Military College in Kingston dictated the future size of the officer corps.

While your committee has spent most of its time and effort examining the question of the military colleges, it has also heard testimony that the termination of language training at Canadian Forces Base St-Jean may be detrimental to the nation-wide teaching of second languages to military personnel and public servants. Witnesses also questioned the government's estimates of the savings from the various closures and reductions, particularly since the proposal to make RMC at Kingston a completely bilingual post-secondary institution will certainly entail substantial costs. As well, if more education of future officers takes place in civilian universities, some of the operating costs of CMR and Royal Roads will, in effect, have been transferred to the provincial governments at a cost that was probably not considered in the federal government's calculation of its annual savings.

In any case, the savings can be judged as relatively small given that there may be definite, if not easily quantifiable, negative implications of the decision to close CMR and Royal Roads, namely fewer regular officers who are French-speaking or who come from the Atlantic and western provinces and the territories, as well as from Quebec.

One group of witnesses, recognizing that reductions in the costs of operating three military colleges could and should be achieved, proposed that RMC and CMR operate under a unified administration by retaining the two campuses at Kingston and St-Jean. Your committee believes that this suggestion has considerable merit and that the government might do well to consider it.

As the report states, honourable senators, your committee may continue to examine the consolidation of the military colleges in the months ahead. We also have a strong interest in the renewal of the public service, the reviews of the efficiency of government services and programs, and the question of overlap and duplication between different levels of government. All of these are areas of current activities by public servants responsible to the President of the Privy Council, who has already appeared before your committee. We expect to return to some or all of these subjects as we continue the review of the 1994-95 Estimates during the remainder of the fiscal year.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate in the name of Senator Simard.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Bolduc, for Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to speak to the motion for adjournment.

My understanding is that the committee has had full opportunity to discuss the Estimates, that it has had three ministers, Ministers Eggleton, Massé and Collenette, appear before it, and has had the opportunity to cross-examine them with great care. After a number of meetings, which Senator Doody has described, the committee succeeded in coming to conclusions. The committee has had the opportunity to discuss the closing of military bases and the effects of those closures. The committee has made its recommendations.

Honourable senators, the question is this: Is there any reason for continuing debate or for delaying the adoption of the report and the passage of the supply bill, when we know that there will be a Royal Assent ceremony later this afternoon? Passage of the bill will be denied if this debate continues.

The procedure of approving Estimates and adopting appropriation bills is well understood in government. It is a new concept to delay this procedure. The reason for this delay, although perhaps my friends opposite will not admit it, is that they want the answers to the many questions they asked concerning the closing of the Royal Military College and Royal Roads Military College in Victoria.

Our leader has indicated that she has made requests for the answers, and she expects them momentarily. When they are available, the officials will be quite prepared to give a briefing to the opposition on the finances and on the procedure for closing those colleges, and how the students will be accommodated.

It is very difficult for me to understand why it is necessary and appropriate, when we are coming to the close of this session, for the opposition to delay the adoption of this report and the passage of Bill C-39, a supply bill. We have no choice. The opposition has the majority in this house, and of course we will do whatever they want done. I just want to put on record that this is a highly unusual procedure. I think it is unprecedented in our parliamentary history. I want it clearly understood that the opposition will have to take responsibility for this.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Stanbury is embellishing, if not exaggerating somewhat, the situation. Is there any reason why the supply bill must be given Royal Assent today?

Senator Olson: Because there is Royal Assent today.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is the only reason? There will also be one next week, I assume.

Senator Stanbury is suggesting that we are delaying unduly the passage of the supply bill. If it were essential to have that bill passed by a certain deadline, such as today, we would certainly abide by the suggestion that we get on with it, but as far as I know there is no need for the supply bill to be given Royal Assent today. It can wait until next week when I am sure there will be another Royal Assent, since there will be many more bills awaiting Royal Assent at that time.

Senator Simard and others are very concerned about a certain aspect of the report. They wish to discuss it. I can assure Senator Stanbury and his colleagues that they are not waiting for particular answers before giving their approval and allowing us to get on with the supply bill. However, they would like to have some of their concerns on the record. I can assure our friends on the government side that the supply bill will be dealt with next week at the latest, and certainly before we adjourn for the summer.

Senator Stanbury: I appreciate that undertaking. That is what we will rely on.

On motion of Senator Bolduc for Senator Simard, debate adjourned.

EXCISE ACT
CUSTOMS ACT
TOBACCO SALES TO YOUNG PERSONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H.A. Olson moved the second reading of Bill C-11, to amend the Excise Act, the Customs Act and the Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-11 deals with amendments to several acts. It amends the section 66 of the Excise Act which deals with the enforcement provisions. It amends section 12, dealing with the immediate destruction of certain seized goods. It also amends sections 2, 201, 211, 235(3) and 239.1(1). These are the provisions which relate to the stamping of individual cigarettes.

Bill C-11 also amends section 119 of the Customs Act, which deals with the immediate destruction of certain seized goods. It deals as well with the Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act. The purpose of that is to protect the health of young persons by restricting their access to tobacco in light of the risks associated with the use of tobacco.

Section 7.1 is the prohibition on the sale of so-called "kiddy packs," packs of cigarettes of less than 20. Section 7.2 establishes a new level of fines for violation of the act, and section 7.3 prohibits the importation of tobacco products to anyone under the age of 18. By section 10, the title of the act is changed.

No authority currently exists under the Excise Act to allow police forces, other than the RCMP, to enforce civil provisions of the act. These civil provisions provide power to seize vehicles used to transport contraband, to seize tobacco or alcohol, or to seize equipment used in elicit activities.

By this amendment, provincial and municipal police forces, as appropriate, can be designated jointly by the Minister of National Revenue and the Solicitor General with the authority to enforce sections of the act that allow for the civil seizure of tobacco, alcohol and vehicles that are used in illegal smuggling activities. This means there could be a substantial increase in the level of police resources working with the federal government to fight smuggling.

Section 112 deals with the immediate destruction of certain seized goods. Currently, the Excise Act and the Customs Act require that seized goods be kept for a period of one month. This amendment to both the Customs Act and the Excise Act will provide police forces with the authority to destroy certain seized products immediately without hindering the ability of authorities to bring criminals to successful prosecution. This measure will apply primarily to seized tobacco and alcohol. This measure will save Canadian taxpayers over $200,000 per year by reducing the cost for storage of property seized by police forces in the fight against smuggling.

Senator Berntson: You could send that over to the CBC.

Senator Olson: Yes, we could, but we intend to work on the deficit first.

If a court decides in favour of a claimant after the goods have been destroyed, the department will pay to the claimant the fair market value of the destroyed goods.

Sections 201 and 211 deal with the stamping of individual cigarettes. This proposal will amend the Excise Act in order to require individual cigarettes to be clearly stamped to indicate that excise duties have been paid. Law enforcement agencies and all law-abiding citizens will be able to more easily identify those who are smoking contraband tobacco products. The precise stamping required for cigarettes will be prescribed by regulation once Bill C-11 has received Royal Assent. The department has initiated discussions with cigarette manufacturers on the technical issues surrounding the implementation of this amendment.

• (1420)

Turning to the Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act, an act prohibiting the sale of tobacco products to persons under 18 years of age, clause 7.1 prohibits the packaging and selling of cigarettes in packages containing less than 20 cigarettes per package. This amendment will make it illegal for both tobacco vendors to sell, and for tobacco manufacturers to package, cigarettes in packages containing fewer than 20 cigarettes. It will ban vending machines from public places, except bars, taverns and similar beverage rooms. It will effectively ban the distribution of kiddy packs in Canada. These kiddy packs are targeted to price-sensitive segments of the tobacco market such as young people. This amendment will bring that to an end.

Clause 7.2 establishes the fines for violations of this act. It raises the fines for selling tobacco to young persons to $1,000 for a first offence, and up to $50,000 for a fourth and subsequent offence.

Clause 7.3 of the Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act prohibits the importation of tobacco products by or on behalf of a person under the age of 18 years, or the minimum age at which tobacco may be legally sold to a person in the province of entry, whichever is higher. It will also provide Revenue Canada customs inspectors with the authority to prevent the import of tobacco products by or on behalf of persons who are under the age 18, or the minimum age at which tobacco may be legally sold to a person in the province of entry.

That completes a very brief overview of what is contained in Bill C-11. I hope honourable senators will agree to give that bill second reading today and refer it to committee.

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Spivak, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith moved second reading of Bill C-31, to amend the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is a very short one. As you may have noticed, it has only two sections. I thought perhaps the best thing I could do to help senators decide on the principle of the bill — which is what we are debating at this stage — would be to attempt to give some context for this short bill.

The bill amends the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act, and therefore legislation governing Telefilm Canada. That act was passed some years ago with the purpose of providing financing for films, not to make films but to finance films. As I was a member of the original board, I can perhaps give some of the context, because I am aware of the problem that this bill is meant to solve.

I had been doing some legal work in this field before I was appointed to the board. At the time there was not very much work, so I cannot say it was a specialty, in the sense that it was all that I did. There were not enough films being made in Toronto at that time for anyone to spend all their time as a lawyer in that field.

I invite each of you, honourable senators, to consider yourself as having in your hand what every good film starts with, and that is a good script; at least one that you consider a good script. That is why so many best-seller books or novels are made into films; the story is pre-sold. Anyone who has been involved for any length of time in the film business will agree that the whole film eventually turns on the script, and then it is up to the director to shoot that script in such a manner as to transpose that script onto the screen, and at the same time maintain the entertainment value that is sought.

Once you have that script, then the production of the film has to be financed. You may need to finance some pre-production even before the script. When we first started at the CFDC, that is what we did for the first couple of years: we simply invested money in pre-production, that is, in developing scripts. I underline that the CFDC was not there to make films, but to invest in films, and to act as a primer of the pump.

Before going to the CFDC with a script, as a film-maker you would usually try and find a distributor to help finance the film. The next step, the step you are looking forward to when the film is made, is to have it distributed. Sometimes, in the days when I was involved, we would get a distributor and the distributor would invest with others who had been put together to finance the film. The CFDC was there to be a partner with other financiers.

In those days, you would go to the CFDC, show them the script, give them a budget, give them some idea of the shooting schedule and what director you had, prove your Canadian content, and tell them what other financing you had. The CFDC would then invest in the film and become a partner, and would receive its repayment in the normal schedule of repayment enjoyed by those who finance the film. That brings us to this bill.

One of the problems that we had, and still have in this country, is that there are few sophisticated investment bankers for the production of films. There are in the United States. If you have read any of Ben Hecht or Budd Schulberg's books, or short stories about Hollywood and the film business, you will realize that the films are made in Hollywood, but New York bankers finance those films.

We found that Canadian banks generally consider themselves in the business of lending money, and not in the business of investing money. Sometimes loans were available if you had what we would call a "bankable" deal. Senator Finlay MacDonald would have been involved in projects where he could have had a sale, for example, to the CBC of a series, and once he had that contract it could be taken to the bank and to other investors in order to get the money required.

To return to the fact that most banks in Canada are interested in lending money and not in investing it, one aspect that is prevalent elsewhere for the financing of films is the lending of money, at least short term, to get the project going.

The CFDC act did not authorize the CFDC or the present organization, Telefilm, to back loans or go into loan situations, only into investment situations. Meanwhile, other jurisdictions, including Canadian provinces that have similar schemes, have been experimenting with having the government agency concerned — in our case the CFDC or Telefilm — back loans and be, in effect, a lending partner with a bank. The same process has also been operating with success in France.

That is the context for this bill. The bill simply adds to those powers of the CFDC which are set out in section 10 of the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act.

Clause 1 of this bill states:

> Section 10 of the Canadian Film Development Corporation Act is amended by adding the following after subsection (1):
> The Corporation may, in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance, guarantee loans for the production and distribution of films.

Clause 2 is a corollary clause which must be added because of section 19 of the act, which deals with how moneys paid out are to be funded. Similarly, section 19(3) is amended in a consequential way to provide for these loan guarantees.

The general conditions under which the provisions of this bill will apply are that the maximum is $25 million, and that only $1 million will be permitted for each individual project per year. Repayment must be made within 18 months. Most people see the film business as a risky business, which, in a way, it is. The returns reflect that riskiness.

How has the financing of films been working in France? How has it been working in the provinces? From the briefing material I have, I am pleased to find that it has been working well. There have not been defaults. There have not been defaults because people in the business do not want to find themselves without any future in the business. Having not honoured a loan, they could not go back to the CFDC. As honourable senators will notice, the term of the loan is quite short.

As honourable senators are aware, films may be made just for television. Television then becomes the distributor of the film, as opposed to what we call theatrical or exhibitor distribution. Because of television distribution, many films these days do get their money back. They are not all very profitable, but they recoup their costs. Of course, the loans under this proposal would be paid back from those first returns.

This measure is a way to unblock the source of financing for the burgeoning Canadian film industry. I say burgeoning, because when we look at what it has now become, compared with what it was when the CFDC started, we see that the progress and the growth has been remarkable.

I think most people in the film business in Canada would acknowledge that they would not be where they are without the CFDC. The CFDC is to be thanked for this progress, and for the establishment of this industry. I think all would agree that this proposal is a desirable one which will enable the financing of films to proceed as it does in many other jurisdictions.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, will the Honourable Senator Frith entertain a question?

Senator Frith: Of course.

Senator Doody: It has occurred to me over the past few weeks that there is an interesting trend emerging in government policy. A few weeks ago the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation was given authority under legislation to borrow money on its own behalf. Yesterday, we passed Bill C-17, which gave the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation authority to borrow up to $25 million on its own behalf. We now have another government entity which will guarantee loans in the marketplace in its own right.

It seems to me that the authority of the Department of Finance is being diluted considerably by this diffusion of borrowing authorities. It must be becoming increasingly difficult for the Minister of Finance to keep an orderly presence in the marketplace with respect to borrowing if all these relatively little people are out borrowing money on their own behalf. All these loans are guaranteed by the Government of Canada.

Is this an actual new policy of diffusion of the department? I cannot imagine the mandarins in the Department of Finance taking very kindly to this sort of legislation.

Senator Frith: I assume that the Minister of Finance is aware of this. However, I think the homogeneity that Senator Doody wants to apply does not strictly apply, although I understand his concern in terms of what seems to be a trend.

I think these are all quite isolated cases. I do not think they represent a change of policy in relation to government finance. I can understand how Senator Doody, as Chairman of the National Finance Committee, may be hearing some bells go off. However, in this case it is a most specific step that is being taken, consistent with similar programs in other jurisdictions. I do not think it is a part of any general scheme to diversify or fragment government finance.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, my question is not necessarily relevant to the bill which is before us. However, I am curious about some of the activities in this field of endeavour.

In Nova Scotia, for instance, we have movie actors and actresses coming and going all the time. Can the honourable senator tell us, from his experience, if most of these activities are carried out with the participation of the CFDC, or are some of them financed with purely private money? Does the honourable senator have any idea of the percentages involved? Have any of the provinces played the role of counterpoint in these transactions?

Senator Frith: I should like to deal with the second question first. I know that Alberta does play such a role, as do some other provinces. However, I cannot tell the honourable senator which ones. That is something we should leave for the committee. I think it is important at this stage to get the questions down, because then we can get the specific answers at the committee stage of the bill.

Other provinces already have the precise provision which is before us, and have had it for some time. That is to say, they have the loan guarantee versus the investment provision. I will need to find out what are the proportions in that regard.

My experience is that for quite a period of time American film-makers were making films in Canada for two reasons. The first was because of the sites. For the very reasons — the weather, the scenery and so on — that the film industry grew in Hollywood, it grew in Vancouver and on the West Coast. The second reason was that they received government funding.

In many cases, when American film-makers come to us, of course we put on certain conditions. For instance, there would have to be a Canadian director and certain Canadian content. More recently, however, my impression is that, although many of them are still coming to Canada for the scenery and the funding, they also come because there are other advantages to making films in Canada, and in many cases, although I cannot say what the proportion is but will try to find out, they are making them on their own without any government help.

Hon. Wilbert J. Keon: Senator Frith, I have enjoyed very much listening to you. There is a very strong analogy between the film industry and scientific research, in that we do not have pools of venture capital that can get either a film or a research project or a discovery from the bench to the market-place or from the shop to the market-place.

While I commend the government for what it has done in this bill, it seems to me the whole problem that needs addressing in some safe way is this lack of venture capital. I realize governments have been burned in the past through research tax credits and so forth; however, we still have to find some way to allow people in Canada to invest in venture capital pools and, if they lose their money, to get them some kind of tax break down the road.

My question to you is, how much benefit would this be to the film industry? I know it would be of tremendous benefit to the scientific community.

Senator Frith: Thank you for your question, senator. There seems to be wide agreement that this measure will be a help. You mentioned the question of tax breaks. As you know, there was a period of time when the device of fashion for financing films was accelerated write-offs and the ability to use losses against profits in totally different ventures. That resulted, if I may say so, in a lot of very unsophisticated investors getting into the film business, as Finlay MacDonald would know. The tendency was to get your friend the pharmacist, or whoever, to invest in films. In some cases it worked out. I do not say this in a pejorative way; it was not sophisticated money that was being invested in the film.

That is the advantage of this whole structure. The thing that appeals to me very much about this is that the CFDC now has the expertise. So you get this partnership between the banker, who does not know the business too well, and a government organization that has been in the field now for some 25 or 30 years that will be very carefully vetting the proposal. It is very comforting for the banker to know that some expert is vetting all this and that the banker does not have to set up a whole department on film financing.

On the principles involved, I agree with you, senator. I am sure that good experience here will teach us advantageous things for that basic problem you so poetically expressed of getting something from the bench to the market.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to Senator Frith? The summary of Bill C-31 says the new power is subject to certain conditions. My own viewpoint is that it would have been much better had these conditions been listed in the act rather than saying "subject to certain conditions." Is there any reason why they were not listed in the act?

Senator Frith: Only the usual one, I suppose, which I do not always find easy to defend, that they want some flexibility. The basic conditions which I have been told apply, and will be established by regulation as will other conditions, are the $25 million, the $1 million per project, and the repayment within 18 months.

I cannot see why that could not have been put in the act except for the reason that they might have felt they wanted some flexibility. That is all I can say, because I am not a noted champion of government by regulation, as Senator Phillips knows.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Frith. In Quebec, SOGIC, whose goal is quite similar, is somewhat at loggerheads with the Quebec Department of Revenue regarding tax credits, about which department employees do not have all the necessary knowledge to be able to review budget proposals related to the film industry. SOGIC also provides funding.

As far as the honourable senator knows, was the Quebec experience looked at when the act was reviewed or the amendment proposed?

To my knowledge, this situation creates a certain problem in Quebec. Now, with the provincial elections just ahead, nobody wants to deal with the issue. In our case, since the general election is behind us, it may be that the government deemed appropriate to look at the Quebec experience and learn something from it.

Senator Frith: I am not sure if, at the time, when I was a member of CFDC's board, the Quebec institution was already in existence.

Senator Nolin: Around what time was that?

Senator Frith: That was in 1967. As the honourable senator knows, the CFDC's head office is in Montreal. I clearly recall that we used to have fairly frequent meetings with officials of the Quebec agency. I think that, probably, although I am not absolutely sure, some discussions or meetings took place between the two organizations, and there was a passive cooperation, if not a very active one. I am not absolutely sure, but that would be in the normal course of events.

[English]

Senator Nolin: The point I am trying to make is this: In Quebec we have the problem that SOGIC is trying to isolate itself, because if you are producing a film, you will go after whatever government agency is willing to provide you with funds.

Senator Frith: Or nongovernment, anywhere you can get it.

Senator Nolin: Anywhere. If there is one thing producers have in common, it is that they do not have cash. They need cash. They will go after cash. Through government, nongovernment, or financial institutions, they will seek their money. Governments, both fedreal and provincial, have been supportive of the cultural industry.

The experience in Quebec is that they have been supportive through the fiscal system. Those producers were very smart in preparing pro forma budgets to raise cash; so smart that they sometimes doubled the amount they needed. They had to print prospectuses to raise private money and to get approval from SOGIC. This is well known by the revenue and cultural departments in Quebec, and it is a hot potato.

Has the federal government looked into that problem in an attempt to find ways to improve the situation? After all, we are all dipping into the same pocket.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the Quebec feature film industry was the leader in the development of Canadian films. I do not think anyone would quarrel with that, and the CFDC was involved in many of those early successful films that were made there. I believe the joint experience of the two was taken into account, and that is why I think this is a good bill.

The very experience to which Senator Nolin has referred has scared many banks away. I think they will be reassured at least by the fact that they know they will be talking to people with some experience, be it experience shared with the Quebec corporation or the CFDC, or both. I do not know whether this provision would have been appropriate earlier. It is because of the experience to which Senator Nolin has referred that there are now people and government agencies in the field who might persuade the banks to go into partnership.

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, not only the banks but private investors are scared by that industry, because they have been burned in the past by schemes and prospectuses which were, at the end of the day, prepared with false information. The good producers are paying for that problem, because of those black sheep in the flock. My question was more of a general one. When one looks at a particular law to amend the situation, one tries to make it better in all of its aspects. I hope this bill will solve the problem.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with great eloquence, reasonable intelligence and a high degree of precision in his answers, Senator Frith has dealt with the questions put to him relative to this bill. Since we have no particular desire to unduly delay this bill and since, I am sure, any other questions that might come up will be answered in committee, we have no objection to the bill being referred to committee at this time.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Unprecedented!

Senator Frith: I did that a few times, too, when I was over there.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I acknowledge the wonderful sign of cooperation.

Motion agreed to bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to committee, but I am not sure which one. Let me give the options: One would be, it seems to me, National Finance —

Senator Doody: You will get a rough ride there.

Senator Frith: You have talked me out of that one.

Two other possibilities are the Transport Committee, because of the communications feature, and the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee, because of the cultural feature. Taking Senator Doody's comment and reversing it, namely, where would it get the best ride —

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Transport, obviously.

Senator Frith: My feeling is that it should be the National Finance Committee.

Senator Doody: The Social Affairs Committee has nothing before it at the moment.

Senator Frith: Then, honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ORDERS OF THE DAY

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith, moved second reading of C-207, to amend the Auditor General Act (reports).

He said: Honourable senators, I will be briefer on this bill than I was on the last.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Unprecedented!

Senator Frith: Let me say that it, too, is a short bill. I shall give honourable senators a word of history, and then we will have a look at the bill to see whether it contains enough information at second reading to send it to committee.

The idea that this bill legislates is not a new one. The idea goes back at least to 1985. That is why the sponsor of the bill in the other place describes himself as the adoptive father of the bill. It has had other fathers over the years.

The Auditor General, who presently makes an annual report, is limited to such annual reports. That is, he can only make a report once a year. The idea at one stage was that the Auditor General should not be limited at all as to the number of reports he or she can make, but should be enabled to make a report any time the said Auditor General sees fit. I am not sure if that was the original form of the bill in the other place or if that was one of the amendments proposed. In any event, at one stage in the other place that idea was put forward.

Honourable senators, the bill before us now allows for four reports: one annual report and three others. The reasoning behind this change is that the Auditor General might come across some irregularity which, in the Auditor General's opinion, ought to be corrected and which, if corrected, would result in significant savings to the taxpayer. Various auditors general over the years have pointed out that in certain cases a lot of money is lost between the time the Auditor General finds an irregularity and the time the Auditor General puts it into the annual report.

In fact, in the House of Commons Debates you will find examples in the hundreds of millions of dollars. That is why the sponsor of the bill in the other place and his predecessors felt that the Auditor General should be given the opportunity in such circumstances to make a report in the hope that corrective action could be taken to save the taxpayers money, rather than waiting until the annual report. That is a very good argument for unlimited discretion.

However, it seems that the members of the House and the government finally came to a consensus ad idem that, at least for now, the idea would be enshrined in this legislation, but that the interim reports would be limited to three rather than having an unlimited number.

Senator Jessiman: Three or four?

Senator Frith: It would be four in total, the annual report and up to three others. The Auditor General is not going to make four reports, but he will have the right to make three interim reports, especially in cases where he feels immediate action should be taken.

Honourable senators, there are some rather frightening stories.

Senator Jessiman: So this is not similar to corporations reporting quarterly?

Senator Frith: No, it is not.

Let us look at the bill.

Senator MacDonald: You said up to three reports?

Senator Frith: It is up to three, but I want to make sure that we get that right on the record.

The bill, as passed, provides for the following:

> 7.(1) The Auditor General shall report annually to the House of Commons and may make, in addition to any special report made under subsection 8(1), not more than three additional reports in any year to the House of Commons.

The bill then goes on to provide for the submission of the annual report to the Speaker and its tabling in the House of Commons.

> (3) Each annual report by the Auditor General to the House of Commons shall be submitted to the Speaker of the House of Commons on or before December 31 in the year to which the report relates and the Speaker of the House of Commons shall lay each such report before the House of Commons forthwith after receiving it or, if that House is not then sitting, on any of the first fifteen days...
> (4) Where the Auditor General proposes to make an additional report under subsection (1),

— the one we have just referred to — > the Auditor General shall send written notice to the Speaker of the House of Commons of the subject-matter of the proposed report.

> (5) Each additional report of the Auditor General to the House of Commons made under subsection (1) shall be submitted to the House of Commons on the expiration of thirty days after the notice is sent pursuant to subsection (4) or any longer period that is specified in the notice and the Speaker of House of Commons shall lay each such report before the House of Commons forthwith after receiving it or, if that house is not then sitting...

Then there is a reference to section 8.(1):

> 8. (1) The Auditor General may make a special report to the House of Commons on any matter of pressing importance or urgency that, in the opinion of the Auditor General, should not be deferred until the presentation of the next report under subsection 7(1).

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Some time ago, Senator Frith, there was criticism of the Auditor General's department. People said it was ballooning and empire-building. Have you any idea whether the opportunity to prepare three extra reports or up to three extra reports will result in empire-building?

Senator Frith: That is a good point. I can see arguments both ways. I can see someone defending this proposal by saying that the ability to make interim reports will streamline the operation; but I can see an argument being made that, if you make all of those additional reports, you will need to hire extra people. We should raise that question with the sponsor of the bill. I do not see why our committee could not ask the Auditor General to appear before it to answer those kinds of questions.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Once again, honourable senators, the general thrust of the bill is not something we object to. Many questions have already been answered. Unanswered questions can be addressed in committee. For that reason, we do not object to referring the bill to committee at this time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith: I do not think there is much debate, honourable senators, as to which committee this bill should go.

Rule 87(i) of the Rules of the Senate describes the jurisdiction of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

> ...federal estimates generally, including:
> (i) national accounts and the report of the Auditor General...

Honourable senators, it is quite clear that this bill should go to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and I so move.

On motion of Senator Frith, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators pursuant to rule 136(4), the sitting is suspended until 4:55 p.m., at which time we will proceed with Royal Assent.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

At 4:55 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

ISSUANCE OF SPECIALTY CABLE LICENCES

Hon. David Tkachuk: On June 6, 1994, the anniversary of D-day, the CRTC issued specialty cable licences to new applicants. It was a historic milestone, because after all this time we have centralized broadcasting in the city of Toronto and given a monopoly to a state institution for the dissemination of news on our cable networks. For a different perspective we must seek sources outside the country, particularly in the United States.

I want to turn my attention to country music, in which category two applicants from Western Canada, one from Alberta and one from Saskatchewan, built their premise on programming, which is in fact why the CRTC exists. They were rejected.

Fully 39 per cent of the Canadian public prefers country music originating, in large part, in the prairies and the maritimes, where country music is preferred by over 40 per cent of the population to any other kind of music. Outside of the major nine metropolitan areas in the rest of Canada, country music is the most favoured form of music.

The majority owner of the applicant that received a licence in this field is Maclean Hunter. The minority position is held by Rawlco Communications, a company that now operates out of Toronto, whose videos, not country music programming, will blast free of charge to the cable companies supported, they claim, by advertising rather than the cable fee, leaving little or no money for Canadian programming and production.

This reflects the new thinking of the CRTC. If we are concerned about the consumer, why not scrap the CRTC, have cable companies compete and let the market-place determine who wins and loses? I am even more concerned about the corporate control of our cable industry — TSN, Toronto; MuchMusic, Toronto; Youth Channel, Toronto; CBC Newsworld, Toronto; Weather Network, Toronto. Of the new licences — Bravo, Toronto; Country Music Canada, Toronto; Discovery, Toronto; Your Channel, Toronto; Show Case, Toronto, with only Lifestyle Television controlled by Moffat of Winnipeg being outside Canada's largest city.

All of the moneys generated by monopolies, with fixed prices and little choice by the consumer, will flow into the city of Toronto, a state of affairs that is tragic and incomprehensible. Let us rid ourselves of this cultural marketing board that fixes prices, ensures profits and provides a hidden Canadian tax flowing in only one direction, to the province of Ontario.

The rejection of a country music programming channel which would be located in the provinces in the west is a tremendous disservice to country artists, programming and production people, and an economic blow instead of a tremendous economic boost to our creative community.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Stanbury, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), bill placed on Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CROW RATE—COSTS OF TRANSPORTING GRAIN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, the Minister of Agriculture implemented some changes affecting the hauling back of grain from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg that was receiving the benefit of the Crow rate.

What was the cost to the government? How long had this continued before it was stopped? What was the cost to taxpayers, farmers and the railway to haul the grain back simply to get the subsidy?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his question. I will inform myself with respect to the question and provide the answer.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN—REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, two days ago I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate if she had answers to a series of questions, in my case a total of 12, as well as three or four asked by colleagues.

There is a rumour on the Hill that the other place may adjourn next Tuesday. I understand that the government wishes to have the legislation giving effect to the budget passed as quickly as possible.

I do hope that we will receive answers to our questions today so that we can study and analyze those answers over the weekend and then address the issue of the closure of the Collège militaire in St-Jean, Quebec, next Tuesday, when we are dealing with other matters pertaining to the Main Estimates.

• (1410)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, later in the proceedings today answers to those questions will be tabled. They are as inclusive as I have been able to make them. Copies will be given to Senator Simard and his colleagues.

As I said the other day, my colleague Senator Stanbury and I will speak with Senator Lynch-Staunton to arrange for the officials who helped us prepare these answers to meet with the group opposite to answer any further questions they may have, or to elaborate on the answers that have been given.

Senator Simard: Do I understand that copies of those answers will reach me and my colleagues later today? May I suggest that they be tabled in this house so that every senator can see them?

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Simard, they will be tabled in the house. I was merely indicating that I have a package for each of the senators who has asked a question on this subject.

THE MINISTRY

LACK OF FOCUS OF CABINET MINISTERS

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, this morning in the press I read that some Liberal assistants were talking about the lack of focus of some parties in the other place. Those Liberal assistants claimed that ministers were not being briefed regularly and that that represented a potential problem for the government.

One of the ministerial assistants is quoted as having said that the danger is that a cabinet minister will fall asleep at the switch. Is this a potential danger which causes the Leader of the Government in the Senate some unease? If that is the case, perhaps that is why we had to wait so long for the answers to the questions I spoke about previously. If that is not the case, then I think that it was a matter of the Liberal assistants falling asleep at the switch, not the ministers.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): First, honourable senators, may I state that I am bright-eyed and awake and that I plan to stay that way. Indeed, so are those who are doing their best to help me address the questions put to me in this place each and every day.

As a matter of fact, what the honourable senator suggests is not the case at all in terms of the assistance and support I have been receiving from my colleagues. They have been most forthcoming with their help, knowing that there is a special circumstance here in the Senate that does not occur in the other place.

In the case of the series of questions raised about the Collège militaire, I think everyone has been trying to pull it all together to present answers in the most cohesive way. That has taken a little extra time, but I do not believe anyone has fallen asleep at the switch. I will do my very best not to do so myself.

NATIONAL FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK RATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, my next question is really a follow-up to a question that I asked on June 14. It concerns the increase in the bank rate by the Bank of Canada.

I asked Senator Fairbairn if she thought that this latest bank rate increase could trigger an increase in the prime rate offered by the banks. She said that she did not know, that she could not answer that question. I was almost tempted to say at the time that it was her business to know these things.

Effective today, the prime rate offered at most banks has gone up by 75 cents, or three-quarters of a point, to 7.25. That is an 18-month high. At the same time the Canadian dollar plunged to 71.84 cents before closing at 71.99 cents, a drop of .73 cents since a few weeks ago.

Would the minister tell us if she feels that this slide will continue? Furthermore, does she not think that the falling dollar and the increase in both the prime rate and the bank rate are a result of the failure of the government to muster the courage necessary to control the deficit and correct these cultural problems in Canada, which could be reduced by such measures as the signing of agreements with a number of provinces with the aim of reducing the costs of delivering programs by those two levels of government?

Perhaps another reason is the lack of leadership by the Prime Minister in the constitutional domain. He wants to remain aloof from these problems. Some of his ministers, or at least Minister Massé, stated publicly that if the National Assembly did not call an early referendum, perhaps the federal government would consider calling a referendum on the Quebec-Canada constitutional issue.

The problems with the increasing rates and the falling dollar must rest on the shoulders of this government for failing to act, and just saying, "Early tax reimbursements will do the trick. Quick-fix solutions, like the program on infrastructure, will be sufficient." I do not think that is sufficient. I am pleading with the minister in this house to tell us what the government has in mind to ensure that we have sustained economic recovery and that the dollar does not go down even more in the next few weeks, as I predict it will.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it would not be appropriate for me or for any spokesperson of the government to try to project what might or might not happen with interest rates or the dollar merely on a hypothetical basis.

Concerning the honourable senator's question about the bank rate, which is an extremely important issue in this country, there are reasons for these fluctuations. My honourable friend and I probably read the same news reports.

• (1420)

There is almost a consensus at the moment that, apart from international difficulties that other countries are facing as well, part of the difficulty that Canada is facing in relation to the fluctuations in the market is the political uncertainty that is affecting those markets. Practically every analyst is now crediting uncertainty with the volatility that is taking place, and which you have drawn to our attention today.

The Prime Minister, far from being aloof, is very concerned and engaged on this issue. This is one of the reasons he is trying, as he has said repeatedly, to set a course in this country of stability and predictability in our economic policy. We have done this with the budget. We followed through on many of the commitments that we had made during the election campaign.

In spite of the issues that you have raised today, Senator Simard, I will remind you again that we find ourselves in a situation where we have the highest estimated economic growth of any OECD country. This year we have a first-quarter economic growth of 4.2 per cent, and since February, employment in this country has increased by 171,000 jobs.

I will go on again. We have increased retail sales and consumer confidence. We have all the underpinnings for strength in economic growth. That is what the Prime Minister is trying to build on.

Finally, on your question concerning my colleague, Mr. Massé, Mr. Massé was responding to a hypothetical question raised by the media. The real answer is that we do not look to a referendum in Quebec because we believe that Premier Johnson and the Liberal Party in Quebec will win that election.

REDUCTION IN POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION FINANCING

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, in its sixth report tabled this week, June 14, 1994, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance noted that the Estimates for 1994-95 project a decrease in funding of $155 million for payments for post-secondary education and the Canada Student Loans Program.

Bill C-28, a bill which is not yet before the Senate but will be in a couple of days, if passed will provide increased funding for the Canada Student Loans Program. This means that the projected decrease in transfers for the post-secondary education component may be higher than $155 million.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us what the real decrease in post-secondary education financing is expected to be?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Cochrane, I will have a look at your question and the report, and then get back to you.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I was saying a minute ago to Senator Simard, on the subject of the closure of the Royal Military College at St-Jean, I have taken the questions of a variety of members of the opposition and tried to produce a collective answer which I hope will satisfy most. However, there may be other points, perhaps hypothetical points, on which we can still engage in debate.

In providing these answers, I would also ask that copies of all of them be distributed to Senator Lavoie-Roux, Senator Kinsella, Senator Jessiman, Senator Simard, Senator Nolin, and Senator Rivest. I also have a copy for my friend Senator Lynch-Staunton. Again, I renew the offer to set up a briefing session at your convenience.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN— COLLECTIVE RESPONSES TO ORAL QUESTIONS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest on May 31, 1994)

Minister Massé has met with Education Minister Chagnon on several occasions and forwarded to Mr. Chagnon a written offer. Contrary to media reports, the province has not rejected this offer. Negotiations are continuing.

I am informed that substantive progress has been made in terms of reaching an understanding of mutual positions and there are reasonable grounds for a solution. An announcement will follow upon any agreement between the two governments.

(Response to questions raised by Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux on February 23, 1994)

After all one-time expenses have been taken into account, the closure of Collège militaire royal is expected to yield net savings of approximately $23.1 million annually, in 1993-1994 dollars.

There are 92 military personnel, 190 full-time and 120 short-term and part-time civilian personnel (see Note) at Collège militaire royal employed in the education and training of 623 military students. In addition, there are an estimated additional 45 military and 50 civilians employed by CFB St-Jean who support the CMR operation.

(Note: The original response indicated that 173 full-time and 154 short-term and part-time civilians were employed by Collège militaire royal de Saint Jean. The updated figures given above are correct.)

The decision to consolidate military training at Royal Military College and to close CMR and Royal Roads Military College was taken for budgetary and operational reasons and the decision is final.

The Government is committed to maintaining the current overall francophone population in the military college system which is 30 per cent. RMC currently has a bilingual capacity and it has been graduating bilingual officers. By combining all three colleges, and increasing the number of francophone students and faculty, RMC will be able to give bilingual courses in all subjects. Its name will be modified to reflect the bilingual nature of the school.

DND will work actively with the community in continuing to build an environment that will welcome francophones to the Kingston area. The Canadian Forces are committed to the goal of a bilingual officer corps, and we believe the consolidation of English and French-speaking cadets at a single military college will help us achieve our goal.

(Response to question raised by Hon. Noël A. Kinsella on March 15, 1994)

The savings from closing the college given at the time of the budget were an estimate. The net personnel savings from closing Collège militaire royal de St-Jean were included in the departmental military and civilian personnel reductions announced in the budget. The attached fact sheet explains the estimate of savings from closing CMR. (See final page for updated "Fact Sheet for Collège militaire royal de St-Jean").

(Response to question raised by Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman on March 17, 1994)

It is recognized that the educational system varies from province to province, or sometimes within provinces, and the military college system must take this into account. Under the current system, some candidates are accepted into first year as senior entrants; some enter the preparatory year as junior entrants; some senior entrants are required to complete a five week "Academic Bridging Programme"; and a few senior entrants are granted advanced standing into second year. The single military college at Kingston will retain all these methods of entry. Collège militaire royal will admit one more preparatory year class in the Fall of 1994. The Department of National Defence is still considering exactly how and where the preparatory year will be conducted after CMR closes in 1995. Candidates from the Maritimes will still be eligible to enter the Canadian Forces as military college candidates directly after high school graduation.

(Response to question raised by Hon. Noël A. Kinsella on April 21, 1994)

Savings at CFB St-Jean can be attributed to the closure of CMR. CMR is not a self-supporting unit and is dependent upon CFB St-Jean for various types of support, ranging from facility maintenance to transportation. Once CMR is closed, the resources associated with this support can be removed from CFB St-Jean, and may therefore be counted as savings.

The $7.3 million cost of military personnel, from both CMR and CFB St-Jean, may be counted as a saving, since these positions are to be eliminated with the closure of CMR. Therefore, this amount cannot be subtracted from the pre-closure operating cost of $30 million. The savings are $30 million minus $6.9 million (transferred costs) which equals $23.1 million, as stated.

(Response to question raised by the Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard on June 8, 1994)

The focus of this question is the contribution of CMR to the development of francophone officers for the Canadian Forces. The 17% figure used by Minister Massé is technically correct in that 17% of current serving francophones with degrees were granted their "diplomas" from CMR. However, this figure does not include other serving francophone officers who graduated from CMR prior to 1985, but whose "diploma" was granted by the University of Sherbrooke because CMR had not yet received its charter. Other serving francophone officers who attended CMR but who graduated from RMC or RRMC, are also not included in this figure of 17%.

On the other hand, as expressed in the question, the 82% figure has been used out of context. This figure really refers only to that proportion of serving francophone officers who graduated from one of the three military colleges and attended or passed through CMR on their way to a military college degree. It does not include francophones who have entered the Canadian Forces through other officer entry plans.

To put in perspective the contribution of CMR to the development of francophone officers the situation should more aptly be described as follows:

- approximately 61 % of serving francophone officers have degrees and the remaining 39% do not;

- of the approximately 61% of serving francophone officers who have degrees, 48% of these attended CMR on their way to a degree from one of the three military colleges and 52% of these obtained their degree from some other institution;

In summary, of all serving francophone officers (degreed and non-degreed), approximately 30% attended CMR on their way to a degree from a military college, approximately 31% obtained their degree from some institution other than a military college and approximately 39% do not have a degree.

CMR has thus contributed to the development of 30% of all francophone officers currently serving in the Canadian Forces, not 82% as stated in the question. These figures, while approximations, are reasonably accurate and are based on information provided by the Defence Personnel Information System. In order to get a more accurate count, a detailed file-by-file analysis of all serving officer files would be necessary.

(Response to question raised by Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard on June 9, 1994)

The first year in the military college system is equivalent to the first year of a university programme in Ontario. Students who have completed either Secondary V in Quebec or high school in the Atlantic provinces require an additional year of education before they can enter first year. Until 1994, many of these students applied as "junior entrants" so they could complete a Preparatory Year at Collège militaire royal de St-Jean. Some completed CEGEP I or a year of university before applying for admission directly into first year (at any of the three military colleges) as "senior entrants." Most anglophones from Ontario and Western Canada apply as senior entrants.

If at all possible, there will be no Preparatory Year at the military college after academic year 1994/95. A two-tiered approach will be used to attract candidates from Quebec and the Atlantic provinces:

- direct recruiting from CEGEP l/university for candidates to enter first year; and

- early offers to promising Secondary V/high school students

This year's recruiting campaign in Quebec (which pre-dated the Budget announcements) was aimed at attracting francophone junior entrants. Still, 62 Quebec francophone senior applicants' files were reviewed by the military college selection board, as were those of 36 francophone senior applicants from outside Quebec. Of these, 24 francophones from Quebec and 26 from outside Quebec applied to go directly into first year at Kingston. With a new advertising and a re-directed recruiting campaign, there should be an increase in the number of candidates applying as senior entrants.

In the event that there are insufficient senior applicants, the military college will accept applications from Secondary V/high school students. Successful applicants will be given provisional acceptance to the Royal Military College of Canada (RMC) after which they will be subsidized for one year at a civilian CEGEP or university. Entry into RMC in the following summer will be contingent only on academic performance.

The selection of candidates for entry into military college will be more competitive after consolidation of the three colleges. The approach described here will ensure that young Canadians from all regions of the country can compete on an equal basis.

This solution can be achieved at minimum cost to DND. The recruiting campaign will be re-directed but this will be achieved within existing resources. There is no incremental cost associated with accepting senior entrants directly into first year. In the event that there are insufficient senior applicants, it has been estimated that it would cost $2.1 million per year to subsidize 70 candidates from Quebec at CEGEP 1, and 30 from the Atlantic provinces at a civilian university for one year. These 100 students represent the maximum requirement. If we realize a significant increase in the proportion of senior entrants, it is unlikely that the full $2.1 million will be spent.

Background

A "Fact Sheet for Collège militaire royal de St-Jean" was released pursuant to the Budget to indicate how DND will realize $23.1 million annually in saving by closing CMR (included on the last page). Closing CMR will save about $30 million annually but there are new costs of $6.9 million. The maximum $2.1 million for CEGEP/university subsidization was included in these costs.

(Responses to questions raised by Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin and Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard on June 9, 1994)

Expenditures must be considered in three categories: capital, operations and maintenance (O&M) and personnel.

There are no new capital expenditures planned at the Royal Military College of Canada (RMC) to accommodate either the expansion or the full bilingualization of the college pursuant to the Budget decision to consolidate military college operations in Kingston.

Referring to the "Fact Sheet for Collège militaire royal de St-Jean," it is estimated that $2.0 million will be required for "Transfer to RMC to facilitate consolidation" and $2.8 million will be required for "College equipment, personnel-related and miscellaneous." The total of $4.8 million falls into the O&M and Personnel categories.

RMC has prepared a consolidation plan, including resource requirements, which it has submitted to National Defence Headquarters. Not all details are discussed here because the plan has not yet been approved. The plan was completed in three steps:

- RMC absorbed a 15% reduction to all current O&M and personnel costs in accordance with direction to support units to reduce operating costs;

- to this reduced baseline, RMC added the cost of making the College fully bilingual;

- finally, the cost of expanding the College population to 900 cadets was added in.

The projected net increase to the annual resource requirement is less than the estimated $4.8 million in the "Fact Sheet for Collège militaire royal de St-Jean." Of the new resources required after the 15% reduction, about half are required for bilingualization and the other half for the population increase.

(Responses to questions raised by Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin on June 9 and by Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest on May 31, 1994)

The estimate of $50 million given by Brigadier-General Matte in Canada français combines previously authorized capital costs with hypothetical projected costs.

Current facilities at the Royal Military College in Kingston (RMC) are in need of upgrading to properly accommodate 690 cadets on the Point Frederick peninsula. In 1992, Treasury Board gave effective project approval for two projects:

- an expansion of the kitchen, dining hall and recreation facilities in Yeo Hall at a cost of $14,973K; and

- a renovation and extension of the Fort Lasalle dormitory at a cost of $ 14,317K.

These projects, which total $29.3 million, are at the end of the design stage, with construction scheduled to begin in 1995. National Defence Headquarters staff calculated that if both buildings were redesigned to accommodate 900 cadets, project costs would increase by $15 million to $44.3 million. This was the source of Brigadier-General Matte's rough estimate of $50 million.

In actual fact, the present Government has not authorized any capital expenditures in support of the military college consolidation activity, and therefore the proposal to re-design both projects was not approved. The additional cadets will be accommodated in currently vacant facilities at Canadian Forces Base Kingston, which is adjacent to RMC. The cost of operating these facilities is included in RMC's consolidation plan resource requirements (described above). It should be noted that some of the buildings that will be used by RMC are of such an age that they will soon require upgrading and modernization. This is a normal maintenance activity for DND's older infrastructure.

(Responses to questions raised by Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard on June 9 and by Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest on May 31, 1994)

The transition from three military colleges to one military college will take place over several years. Collège militaire royal de St-Jean and Royal Roads Military College will operate for one more academic year, until May 1995.

There will be turnover of faculty at the Royal Miltary College at Kingston (RMC) as some academic programmes are eliminated and others are introduced. Up to 27 new indeterminate (ie, permanent, full-time) professors will be hired although the net increase in the number of faculty positions will not exceed 13% (there are currently 137 professors on staff). RMC's goal is to have a fully bilingual teaching staff, and this will be reflected in all new hiring. Approximately half of the professors now teaching at RMC are bilingual.

RMC has recently begun the process of recruiting professors and other staff to fill positions required as a result of consolidation. RMC needs up to 15 additional professors for academic year 1994/95. Some suitable candidates have been identified from the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean faculty and, so far, four have agreed to move to RMC.

NONREPRESENTATION OF NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may be allowed to ask the Leader of the Government if I am to look forward to an early reply to the question I put to her the other day about the Prime Minister's National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy, which did not include representation from, among others, the province of New Brunswick.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I was pursuing that again this morning, Senator Corbin, and I will get it to you just as soon as I can.

Senator Corbin: Thank you.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one other response to a question raised in the Senate on May 25, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Jean-Maurice Simard regarding the Navy facilities for military training in Quebec City.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISPOSITION OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard on May 25, 1994)

The decision to locate a new Fleet School in Quebec City stems from a government initiative, first announced in 1982, to increase the Naval presence in the province of Quebec in order to raise the percentage of francophones in the sea element of the Canadian Forces to the national level. This new Fleet School will also provide badly needed naval positions in Quebec that will allow more francophone sailors to serve in their home province. Training at this facility will begin in early 1995.

Fleet School Quebec will assume the broad training functions associated with the professional instruction of naval officers and non-commissioned members, from across the country, who are assigned to Coastal Defence and Naval Control of Shipping organizations, and the new Maritime Coastal Defence Vessels. These are primarily Naval Reserve roles and this establishment will be the only school in Canada giving this type of instruction.

VETERANS AFFAIRS— VETERANS' PENSIONS AND ENTITLEMENTS

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 34 on the Order Paper — by Senator Marshall.

EXCISE ACT CUSTOMS ACT TOBACCO SALES TO YOUNG PERSONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Olson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, for the second reading of Bill C-11, to amend the Excise Act, the Customs Act and the Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, the provisions in Bill C-11 to restrict tobacco consumption in general and by young people in particular should and will, I am sure, be supported by all members in this house.

As has been explained very adequately by Senator Olson in moving this legislation, the bill will increase the jurisdiction of provincial and municipal police, authorize officials to destroy seized goods immediately, and mandate marking and packaging tobacco products made in Canada in a way that will help law authorities and citizens to recognize smuggled goods.

Bill C-11 will make it illegal to produce and sell "kiddy packs": packages containing less than 20 cigarettes. Of course the effectiveness of this measure is reduced by the lowering of federal tax on cigarettes. A pack of 25 now costs much less than a pack of 15 before the tax and prices were slashed.

As well, Bill C-11 aims to prohibit the importation of tobacco products for and by people under the age of 18, or the minimum age at which tobacco may be legally sold to a person in the province of entry, by providing Revenue Canada customs inspectors with the authority to prevent the import of tobacco products for persons under the age of 18.

I think it is instructive to review once again the context within which this legislation is introduced: the awesome threat that cigarette smoking poses to the health of Canadians and the truly shocking statistics concerning cigarette smoking, particularly among young Canadians.

Between 38,000 and 44,000 Canadians, depending on which statistics are used, die each year of smoking-related diseases. Cigarette smoking is the single most important cause of preventable illness and premature death in Canada. No other legal product, when used as directed, produces such terrible effects.

Thirty per cent of all cancer deaths, 30 per cent of heart disease deaths, and 85 per cent of chronic obstructive lung disease deaths are caused by tobacco use. Smoking is directly linked as well to a variety of upper respiratory infections, chronic bronchitis and emphysema, strokes, peripheral artery diseases, peptic ulcer disease, as well as cancers of the mouth, throat, oesophagus, kidney, bladder and pancreas. Cigarette smoking is a prime cause of lung cancer, which has replaced breast cancer as the leading cause of cancer deaths among Canadian women.

Some women are particularly susceptible to smoking-related illnesses, and yet the tobacco industry targets women and children in its marketing strategy. Smokers who use oral contraceptives are ten times more likely to suffer fatal heart disease. Pregnant smokers suffer more vaginal bleeding, spontaneous abortions, and fetal deaths. Low birth weight in children of smokers has been linked to development problems as late as age 11.

The Surgeon General in the U.S. stated some years ago that tobacco is comparable in its addictive qualities to heroin and cocaine. No wonder the tobacco industry targets children under 16 in its marketing strategy to boost its market share, because it results in addictive behaviour before adulthood. Thirty-four per cent of individuals aged 15 and over smoke, while approximately one quarter of Canadian teenagers smoke daily. While I do not know what the amount is today, a few years ago $96 million was spent per annum on advertising by the tobacco industry.

It is estimated that health and other related costs of smoking are in excess of $62 billion, according to a recent report of medical costs published in The Gazette on June 10 by Richard Lessard, Public Health Director of the Régie de la santé et des services sociaux de Montréal-Centre. This is interesting because tobacco companies' profits last year were $399 billion, of which, according to this particular study, $51 billion was spent in direct economic impact for Canada. That leaves an $11 billion shortfall for Canadians in terms of the costs of smoking.

Canada is in the top ten countries in the world in per capita consumption of cigarettes, 50 per cent higher than Norway and Finland, where advertising has been banned.

Frankly, in view of the lethal nature of the product in question, the measures in Bill C-11, although laudable, are mild indeed. I hope the government will soon introduce other measures to strengthen its actions to reduce tobacco consumption, including adding tobacco to the Hazardous Products Act, an act which regulates production, import, sale, and advertising of potentially dangerous products.

I commend the Minister of Health for her stated intention, at second reading of the bill in the House of Commons, to look at further actions, such as plain packaging and product standards. A comprehensive educational campaign is also being mounted.

One cannot leave this debate, however, without commenting on an act of outrageous chutzpah —

Hon. Royce Frith: Isn't all chutzpah outrageous?

Senator Spivak: Perhaps, but it serves to give it a little extra punch.

An act of outrageous chutzpah was perpetrated by the U.S. tobacco giants Philip Morris and R.J. Reynolds in the person of Julius Katz before a House of Commons committee a few weeks ago. Not only did these companies threaten a nasty trade fight and possible compensation of hundreds of millions of dollars, but Philip Morris threatened to rethink all future investments in its vast Canadian food business if the Canadian government proceeded with its proposed plain packaging legislation. This "new low in corporate thuggery," according to one of the writers to The Globe and Mail editorial page, seems to regard Canadian sovereignty as, in the words of another writer, "a hopelessly quaint and archaic notion that gets in the way of globalization and maximization of profits."

Faced with the threat of no Tang, Kraft Dinner, Jell-O, et cetera, all overprocessed, overpackaged and overmarketed goods to which we are all so hopelessly addicted, it is to be hoped that the Canadian government will stiffen its resolve and insist on its right to set public policy in the public interest in defiance of advice tendered to it by foreign companies, and that we can expect stronger measures in addition to Bill C-11 to protect the health of Canadian citizens.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Would Senator Spivak permit a question? I meant to ask this question of Senator Olson.

Even though the convenience stores and the people who sell cigarettes were warned that this legislation was coming, were any efforts made by the government to spare them the costs if they are stuck with these kiddy packs on the shelves?

Hon. H.A. Olson: I do not know if it is proper for me to answer, but, yes, there has been a great deal of effort made since February, when the government announced that it would bring in this legislation. Both the manufacturers and the retailers have had plenty of time to clear their stocks. There are probably a few days left before it becomes a prohibition, depending on the date of proclamation of Bill C-11. In any event, I have asked to have prepared a chronological list of the various actions that have been taken and announced, so that everyone involved, from the manufacturers right through to the retail level, will have had adequate notice to clear their stocks of kiddy packs prior to it becoming an offence to sell them.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Olson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Michael Kirby moved the second reading of Bill C-12, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act and to make consequential amendments to other Acts.

He said: Honourable senators, the CBCA, or the Canada Business Corporations Act, came into effect nearly 20 years ago in December of 1975. As most members of this chamber know, its basic purpose was to set the framework for rules that provide shareholders, directors, management, and creditors with an element of trust on how business is conducted in this country. The CBCA was designed to strike a careful balance between providing confidence for companies in the fairness of the governance system, and flexibility.

Times have changed considerably. In today's economic climate, businesses must now be able to respond very quickly to emerging trends. They must keep abreast of up-to-date technologies and business practices. Investors will look elsewhere if the regulatory environment of a country is burdensome or out of date with technological developments. Bill C-12 simplifies the regulatory environment of this country by eliminating several things that were in the original bill, and which are no longer necessary in the current economic climate.

Let me give honourable senators a couple of examples: Some 190,000 corporations in Canada are covered by the provisions of the CBCA. The vast majority of these are small- and medium-sized businesses. A high priority has to be placed on modernizing the regulatory framework and the laws that affect the ability of these companies to compete. This is particularly true now that NAFTA is in place.

Bill C-12 essentially reflects a priority of government policy. Small- and medium-sized businesses, as the government has said on many occasions, clearly hold the key to economic growth and, in particular, to job creation in Canada.

Some 50 provisions of the act are amended by this bill, and most of those changes are technical in nature. The bill does not deal with substantive issues that require further study in order for the government to develop a policy on them; a policy that will be fair to both consumers and company owners. These more substantive policy issues will be dealt with in the future, and, indeed, this bill contains an explicit provision that calls for a detailed parliamentary review of all of the policies and provisions contained in the CBCA.

This bill contains a clause which calls for such a parliamentary review to be completed within three years. In fact, the Minister of Industry has stated in testimony in the other place that, although the bill calls for the review to be completed within three years, it is his hope that it can be completed within 18 months. As a first step in that process, the Department of Industry has sent a consultation package to a wide cross section of Canadians who are interested in the CBCA. Draft regulations and substantive proposed amendments will follow these consultations.

Let me just say a word or two about the technical aspects of Bill C-12. What does it do? In the area of improved service, the fundamental element of Bill C-12 is to make sure that Canadian corporations are able to take advantage of technological changes that have occurred in the past 20 years. Under the existing act the director of CBCA, the person who administers the Canada Business Corporations Act, is prevented from using technology to its maximum benefit. He or she is not able to accept information from companies by electronic filing. One of the amendments in Bill C-12 enables the director to select the form and other details related to electronic filing and the issuance of documents. The result is less expense for companies required to comply with the provisions of CBCA.

Another part of the changes proposed in Bill C-12 could be put under the heading "simplification in corporate governance." Under this heading, a number of improvements are made. Again, let me give a couple of examples because, as I said earlier, some 50 parts of the act are amended by Bill C-12. One example is that Bill C-12 defines a six-year period for accounting records and files to be retained. In its current form, the CBCA has no time provision and, in theory, such records need to be maintained for a long time.

With respect to problems companies face when they have to appoint a limited number of directors between shareholders' meetings, Bill C-12 provides a mechanism for modifying a company's articles of incorporation to do exactly that.

The amendments also allow the CBCA director to exempt companies from filing documents if the same documents are already available elsewhere. Under the current rules, even though documents may be generally available to the public elsewhere, companies are still required to file those documents directly with the CBCA director.

Another change under Bill C-12 is the elimination of the public financial disclosure requirements that are now imposed on large, privately held CBCA corporations. Currently there is no such requirement, either at the provincial level or in the United States for the same size and type of companies. Given the emergence of NAFTA and the increase of competition in the business world, clearly there has to be a level playing field with regard to the types of regulations and the types of costs companies have to incur in meeting regulatory requirements. Bill C-12 provides that level playing field. It brings the Canada Business Corporations Act in line with the provisions that exist in provincially incorporated companies and also companies incorporated in the United States.

I must emphasize, however, that this does not mean that financial statements will no longer be audited. Financial statements will still have to be audited. Full disclosure to shareholders will also be maintained.

Another part of the bill contains several amendments where one could appropriately attach the heading "Clarification and Efficient Administration." Bill C-12 seeks to clarify certain sections of the act and to strengthen the CBCA rules governing corporate names. In particular, it now sets parameters or regulations that will constrain the way in which words such as "limitée," "limited" and "corporation" can be used. Some of the confusion that now exists by the use of those names in duplicate places by related companies will be constrained under Bill C-12.

Bill C-12 also has an economic or government efficiency aspect to it. It changes a number of the provisions that enforce the Canada Business Corporations Act. The requirement for the CBCA director to give notice in a newspaper of the decision to dissolve a corporation, for example, is eliminated. This not only saves advertising costs, but, more important, it enables the CBCA director to move expeditiously against the faulty corporations and encourages companies to comply with the public information filing provisions.

To date, Bill C-12 has received extensive hearings in the other place. Sixteen submissions were received by the industry committee. Among them were submissions in favour of the proposed changes from the Canadian Federation of Business, le Barreau du Québec, the Corporate Subcommittee of the Canadian Bar Association, and so on.

Honourable senators, in the submissions received in the other place, groups of lawyers responsible for dealing with corporate law and a number of business associations across the country were very much in favour of the bill.

Honourable senators, I hope this house will agree quickly to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It would be our hope to hold hearings on this bill next Tuesday morning so that we would then be able to report this bill back to the Senate next Tuesday afternoon without amendment.

Before closing, honourable senators, I should point out that in the version of the bill distributed to members of the Senate there is a minor error. Before I explain to you what the error is, let me say that the final version will be corrected. The version that the committee will have will be the correct version.

An amendment was introduced in the other place and passed. A new section was added to the bill. The addition of that section means that the particular sections and subsections listed in section 36 are all out by one number. They are out by one number because a new section 9 was inserted. Therefore, for instance, when section 36 refers to section 20, it is really referring to section 21, because a new amendment was introduced. None of the substance of this bill is changed by that error. It is a nonsubstantive, typographical error, which will be fixed in the final version. The clerk has the corrected version of the bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I want to congratulate Senator Kirby for giving us such a clever and faithful summary of the bill before us today.

I wish to tell you, on behalf of the majority in this house, that our party does not intend to contest modernization. We realize that several changes, which are aimed at cutting red tape, recognize the impact of modern technology on our daily life. Electronic data transmission and fax machines have now become indispensable. Henceforth, Canadian corporations will be allowed to use them to forward certain official documents. We believe that it is essential for these corporations to have at their disposal all recognized means allowing them to compete on the global market.

In committee, in the other place, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants expressed some concern regarding the elimination of the public financial disclosure requirement for all privately held corporations. At the present time, corporations with assets exceeding $5 million and gross revenues exceeding $10 million must send a copy of their audited financial statements to the director.

We will probably have the opportunity to talk again about clause 17 and several others when this bill comes to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for a detailed review.

Even though I recognize that it may be appropriate, on occasion, to have a wealth of information, I tend to believe, unless proven otherwise, that such bulky accounting documents are used more to satisfy their competitors' curiosity than to serve the public interest. Although accountants deny this vigorously, one could think that they want to maintain the status quo in a laudable desire for meticulousness but also to keep this private preserve for their own members.

[English]

Present provincial laws no longer require that private corporations disclose their financial statements. The government, on the other hand, brought about a useful clarification to one original provision of this bill. In fact, corporations will be required to keep their official documents for a minimum period of six years, and longer if they are compelled to do so by any other federal or provincial act.

Generally speaking, the technical amendments put before us are the first phase of a larger-scale revision. The Canadian Business Corporations Act, chapter C-44 of the Revised Statutes of Canada (1985), was first adopted in 1975. The second part, the one with more consequences, is expected in three years, after a parliamentary committee report is filed.

[Translation]

Finally, having observed for three years my colleagues opposite when the roles were reversed, I learned that you should never be totally in agreement with the government. This is why I want to confess that I have another concern about this bill.

Clause 25 of Bill C-12 cancels the obligation to publish in a local newspaper notice of the decision of the director to dissolve a corporation which has neglected or refused to file its annual report, as provided in the present legislation.

I regret having to say that, but the government is not reassuring me when it says it will take all the necessary means to inform the public of these failures to conform by publishing the notice of dissolution in The Canada Gazette and in the Canada Corporations Bulletin, but no longer in a local newspaper where the corporation has its registered office.

I am not impressed by the fact that the government will save "almost a million dollars over the next few years," as the minister was saying. It seems to me that the drawbacks might be out of proportion with the savings.

Honourable senators, despite these points, I will support Bill C-12 on second reading, and I will listen to any additional information we may receive in committee or in this chamber.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

On motion of Senator Kirby, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

SAHTU DENE AND MÉTIS LAND CLAIM SETTLEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Willie Adams moved the second reading of Bill C-16, to approve, give effect to and declare valid an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and the Dene of Colville Lake, Déline, Fort Good Hope and Fort Norman and the Métis of Fort Good Hope, Fort Norman and Norman Wells, as represented by the Sahtu Tribal Council, and to make related amendments to another Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on second reading of Bill C-16, for which we have been waiting the last few years. This is reminiscent of the Nunavut settlement of about a year ago. Bill C-16 affects about 2000 Sahtu Dene and Métis people of the Mackenzie Valley. Those people have been negotiating this settlement with the Government of Canada for a few years.

The bill was introduced in the House of Commons on March 8 of this year; it was introduced in the Senate on Tuesday last, and is now at the second reading stage here. If it receives second reading now, I think this bill should be referred to the Committee on Aboriginal Peoples where it can be studied either today or tomorrow.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, Bill C-16 will make law an agreement with the Sahtu Dene and Métis. This is one of the final steps needed to settle the Sahtu Dene and Métis' comprehensive land claim.

The Sahtu Dene and Métis' Comprehensive Land Claim Agreement was finalized on September 6, 1993, by the Sahtu Tribal Council and the former Progressive Conservative government. The Sahtu Dene approved the agreement by a majority of 85 per cent and the Sahtu Métis by 99 per cent in a vote held last July.

Some changes to the agreement were subsequently approved by the Sahtu Tribal Council on January 12 and February 11, 1994, with the new Liberal government.

The Sahtu Dene and Métis will receive ownership of 41,437 square kilometres of land in the Mackenzie Valley of the Northwest Territories. They will also receive $75 million to be paid over 15 years and a yearly share of resources royalties derived from the Mackenzie Valley.

The settlement area, which includes the land transferred to Sahtu Dene and Métis ownership, is the actual area where the benefits and terms of the act apply. It covers 280,238 square kilometres, including Great Bear Lake. The five communities in the region are Colville Lake, Fort Good Hope, Fort Norman, Déline — formerly Fort Franklin — and Norman Wells. The Sahtu will have hunting and fishing rights to the settlement land as well as exclusive trapping rights there. They will also play a role in the management of renewable resources in the settlement area.

Bill C-16 provides for the establishment of two boards to regulate land and water use. It also provides for an Environmental Impact Review Board and a Surface Rights Board to be set up under the provisions of the Gwich'in Land Claims Settlement Act of 1992.

[Translation]

I also want to say a few words on the constitutional issue. Bill C-16, the purpose of which is to implement the above mentioned agreement, confirms that the agreement is a land claims agreement within the meaning of section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

This is not a precedent. In 1984, the Western Arctic (Inuvialuit) Claims Settlement Act was passed, while the Gwich'in Land Claim Settlement Act took effect in 1992, and the Nunavut Land Claims Agreement Act was passed in 1993. Therefore, three precedents already exist.

It must be pointed out however, that the agreement as such will not be entrenched in the Constitution. Only those rights which result from the agreement will be protected by the Constitution. They will be considered as treaty rights for the purposes of section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

We must look at two issues: First, since the agreement as such will not be entrenched in the Constitution but the rights resulting from it will, how will we be able to amend the agreement? By using the amending procedure provided in the Constitution Act, 1982? If so, what formula will we use? Otherwise, will the consent of the parties to the agreement be sufficient? Second, does the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms apply to the agreement? This is not obvious. The work of the committee will certainly help us deal with these two issues.

That being said, honourable senators, I agree with the principle of Bill C-16.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Adams, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT AGREEMENTS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Michael Kirby moved the second reading of Bill C-22, respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise today to begin second reading debate on Bill C-22. Bill C-22 makes null and void, or, in ordinary laymen's terms, cancels the agreements entered into between T1T2 Limited Partnership and the Government of Canada for the commercial development of Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson airport.

The contract in question was entered into by the previous government. It turned over the development and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson International Airport for 57 years to a group of private developers. Pearson airport is Canada's largest and most important transportation facility.

I think it is fair to say that not many Canadians, and certainly no one in this chamber, are unaware of this deal. Indeed, very early in the election campaign a position was taken by the then opposition party, now the government, that "cancellation if necessary" was one of the Liberal's main platform planks.

Prime Minister Chrétien made clear during the election campaign, before the contracts were signed, that his party had serious reservations about this deal and that, once the election was over, a Liberal government would have to be totally convinced that this was a good deal if the deal were to stand.

The Prime Minister requested in no uncertain terms that the parties involved defer their signing until after the election. He asked that this be done so that a new government would not be saddled with a deal which had been signed in the dying days of a dying regime. A new government was very clearly in the process of being elected. They clearly wanted to have an opportunity to review the deal before the contracts were signed.

In all the public comments on this issue, and in all the testimony given before the committee in the other place, a question which was frequently asked, but never answered by any of the participants involved, was: Why did they not wait the three weeks until after the election campaign to decide whether or not to sign the deal?

If in fact the deal was so good for Canadians, and if in fact it was so good for the travelling public who use Pearson airport, Canada's largest airport facility, what was wrong with waiting three weeks until after the campaign to see the outcome of the election, and then allowing the new government to review the deal, and, if it was a good deal, having it signed then? One cannot help but be inherently suspicious about an agreement signed during the dying days of an election campaign, when it has been stated by the party likely to win that it would review the deal and cancel it, if required.

Senator Simard: What is wrong with making the deal public now?

Senator Kirby: There is another very strange thing about this deal. The contract contained no cancellation clause. I personally have had the experience of being in deputy minister level positions both in the federal government and in the Government of Nova Scotia. I have never seen a contract of anywhere remotely this size that did not contain a cancellation clause. It is a fact, however, that this particular contract does not contain a cancellation clause. It is precisely the absence of that cancellation clause which necessitates the introduction of Bill C-22.

Had there been a cancellation clause, the government could have invoked it after the election and there would be no need for this legislation. The issue could have been dealt with in the normal manner in which parties withdraw from a contract, by invoking cancellation provisions.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that in looking at this issue one has always to keep in mind the circumstances under which this bill was signed: The party that was about to win the election was not in favour of the contract. There was the absence of a cancellation clause.

There are two other fundamental issues that the government kept in mind when it began looking at this file. First, clearly it is the government's responsibility to determine whether or not the public interest is served by this deal. The public interest is paramount here because we are dealing with Canada's largest airport. Pearson airport serves not only Toronto, but all the people in this chamber and across the country. Flights frequently go through Toronto either to change planes or because the destination of the flight is Toronto. The operation of Pearson airport is of paramount concern, not only to people living in Toronto and Ontario but to all of the travelling public.

The second factor that the government had to take into account in contemplating whether or not to introduce this legislation is the significant public policy problems that would be associated with leaving Pearson airport in legal limbo by virtue of the contract being cancelled and there following a series of prolonged and time-consuming court challenges. That would not be in the public interest. We cannot have a state of uncertainty existing with respect to Canada's largest airport while various legal battles are taking place over a period of several years.

When the government came into power it asked Bob Nixon, the former treasurer of the Government of Ontario, to look at the contract and at the process which led to the contract. He was to look not only at substantive elements of the contract but also at the process which had been used to persuade the government of the day, the previous Conservative government, to accept this contract. As a result of looking at that process, and the substance of the contract, Mr. Nixon recommended to the government that the contract be cancelled. The government accepted his recommendation. As a result, we have this bill. I repeat that if the contract had contained a cancellation clause, then we would not have had to resort to legislation.

I think most members of this chamber know that this bill provides the parties an opportunity to get back their out-of-pocket expenses. Exempted expenses are ones incurred for lobbying, as well as so-called forgone profits; money the developers claim they would have obtained had they managed the two terminals for the stipulated 57 years. What this says to the developers is, "If you incurred out-of-pocket expenses in the course of getting ready to undertake this contract, then those expenses, but not lobbying expenses, will be reimbursed."

In order to determine what those expenses are, the government has appointed Robert Wright as the negotiator in this matter. Mr. Wright is a former faculty member of Osgoode Hall. He had a substantial corporate law practice in Toronto. In fact, he is a former chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission.

The government has asked Mr. Wright to examine the out-of-pocket costs which the developers claim they have incurred and to determine whether or not they were actually incurred. He has been asked to give his views to the government as to whether or not such costs should be reimbursed. In the course of undertaking the process Mr. Wright is being assisted by expert claims analysts who are reviewing the various receipts that have been submitted.

The process that will follow is that Mr. Wright's report will be submitted to the Minister of Transport who will make a recommendation to the cabinet. Mr. Wright's report will also be scrutinized very closely by the Auditor General who, in turn, will report to Parliament. Parliamentarians will thus be in a position to consider both Mr. Wright's report and what will happen to it after the Auditor General reports to Parliament.

What the government has said is that it is prepared to pay certain costs but not others. The basic rationale of the government is threefold:

First, the potential uncertainty of having Canada's largest airport in a position of legal uncertainty because of various court challenges had to be removed. Clearly, public policy and the importance of the development at Pearson airport required that the issue be resolved clearly and definitively in order for the future of the airport to proceed in an orderly, well planned and timely fashion.

Second, as it announced during the election campaign, the government decided that it was prepared to put the public interest and the interests of the travelling public ahead of private-sector profit.

Third, from a philosophical standpoint, the government had to deal with the issue of whether or not Canada's largest airport ought to be in private sector hands. Is it in the interests of the public good that Pearson International Airport ought to remain in the hands of the government or some form of government institution?

Senator Murray: What is the view on that question?

Senator Kirby: The bill makes it clear, as the minister has said, that the issue of how the airport is managed is one that he wants to talk to various groups about, once this bill is dealt with. As the honourable senator knows, several ideas have been put forward. One is that the airport continue to be covered by the Ministry of Transport. Another is that it be managed by a local airport authority.

Senator Murray: The government does not have a view on either of those options, is that it?

Senator Kirby: The government may well have a view in that regard, but it is not particularly related to this bill. Even if the government has a view on either of the issues, it could not deal with the issue in the absence of first getting rid of this bill and getting Terminal 1 and 2 back into government hands.

In considering what costs developers ought to be reimbursed, the government took into account several factors. One was that, as far the government knows, nothing illegal had taken place. Second, several of the companies, and particularly some of the smaller ones which were partners to subsidiaries in the agreement, appeared to have been caught in as much a limbo as the government at the time of the change. Indeed, in the opinion of some who testified in the other place, some of the smaller companies were as much a victim of the lobbyists as the government itself had been. Third, if the agreements entered into by the developer are not corrected by this legislation, they could wind up victimizing other companies which had no part in what has been described repeatedly as a tainted process.

Therefore, in the absence of a cancellation clause, and given the nature of the process, the government decided that it had to cancel this contract and proceed to develop an appropriate public policy for the expansion of the airport. Given the absence of a cancellation clause, a mandatory negotiated process was the only avenue open to the government when it addressed this particular problem. To some people the process in arriving at this decision may seem somewhat difficult. I think the word "harsh" has been used in this regard, and it may well be used again.

It is important for all of us to take into account that this cancellation comes as no surprise. This policy decision was taken publicly during an election campaign. It was overwhelmingly mandated by the people of the country. It was clearly overwhelmingly mandated by the people of Ontario who elected 98 Liberals out of a possible 99. It is very difficult, therefore, for anyone to argue that the cancellation of this contract has not received an overwhelming degree of public support.

The results of this process will be available for review and scrutiny by the Auditor General and by Parliament when it reviews the report of the Auditor General. The media, through a number of requests under access to information legislation, will attempt to get at every scrap of information which has been submitted to the government.

Senator Murray: Why not a royal commission?

Senator Kirby: The Minister of Transport has been clear in saying — and I think his vast political experience in New Brunswick leads him to this conclusion easily — that he has every intention of releasing every scrap of information that he can under the law because he recognizes that it will be important for this process to be as open and clean as it possibly can be.

In recommending that this bill be referred to a standing committee of the Senate, it is important to understand not only that the outcome of Mr. Wright's consultations will be subject to intense public scrutiny, but that Canadians have pronounced very clearly their view on this matter through an election campaign.

Senator Simard: Did you take a poll?

Senator Kirby: I do not think we took a bad poll on October 25. I realize that in running the New Brunswick campaign, Senator Simard, you were extraordinarily successful relative to most of your colleagues across the country. After all, you got 50 per cent of the Conservative caucus elected in that campaign. Fifty per cent of the Tory caucus coming from New Brunswick is not a bad achievement. Too bad 50 per cent of a small number is an even smaller number.

I do not have any difficulty in saying that this particular piece of legislation has the support of the Canadian public. I understand that since some members opposite may take a somewhat different view to mine, it would be interesting if they would attempt to answer the two questions I set out at the beginning of my remarks.

The first was: Why was this contract entered into in the dying days of a clearly dying government? Why was that done if the process was really as up front, open, honest and clean, as they would like us to believe? Second, why was a contract of this magnitude entered into without a cancellation clause? Any contract I have ever seen of even one-tenth of this amount, signed by governments at either the federal or provincial level, had a cancellation clause.

I hope that whoever else on the other side intends to speak to this issue will address these two questions, since they and their former colleagues are the only people who can possibly answer them.

Honourable senators, in concluding my remarks I urge that this bill be referred to a committee and then reported to this chamber as expeditiously as possible.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Could the sponsor of the bill answer a question?

Does the government expect this bill to be passed by the Senate next Tuesday or Wednesday, when the House of Commons is to end its work? It seems very far-fetched to me.

[English]

• (1530)

Senator Kirby: As Senator Simard knows, the issue of how long it takes to get a particular piece of legislation through this chamber is much more in his hands and those of his colleagues. The numbers are not on this side. It would be in the public interest, as well as everyone's interest, to deal with this bill expeditiously. However, the definition of the word "expeditiously" lies with you, Senator Simard.

Senator Berntson: You will have more luck with the Migratory Birds Act!

Senator Frith: That is interesting. I hope that is on record, too.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Kirby made reference to the Nixon report, and seemed to know what Mr. Nixon's mandate was. We have never been able to find in written form what Mr. Nixon's mandate was specifically. Does he have a copy of that report? Is there some document that would let us appreciate exactly what Mr. Nixon was asked to do?

Senator Kirby: I do not know the answer to that question, but I am sure that the minister will be appearing before the committee. I cannot believe that the minister will not be asked to appear before the committee. You can put that question directly to him. However, I do not know the answer.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Government Notices of Motions:

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with the leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 21, 1994, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

I also wish to make a small statement about that, if I may.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, my friend across the way and I have had discussions and have come to the conclusion that, since today we have moved every bill that we had outstanding into committee stage, there is no particular point in us sitting as a chamber either tomorrow morning or Monday evening.

By Tuesday, we should have further pieces of legislation before us. With the cooperation of the opposition in agreeing that they will allow first and second readings of these bills to take place without the usual time lapse for notice, it will be just as constructive for the Senate to sit on Tuesday at two o'clock, in order to give everyone the benefit of the weekend.

Next week is likely to be a tiring week. Our intention is to have the Senate sit as long as is necessary on Tuesday in order for all of the bills that the government requires to have first and second readings. It is then our intention to have the necessary committees meet on Wednesday until they have completed their reports on the bills. We will then sit on Thursday to consider all of the committee reports and give third reading to as many of the bills as possible, and then conclude with Royal Assent.

There is no intention to shorten the debate on any bill or the time taken in committees. We intend to give all the time that is required to complete these matters, but that may mean that we will be sitting in the evenings, as well as during the day next week.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my honourable colleague and friend has essentially put on the record what has been agreed to, but he went just a hair beyond the agreement when he suggested that we had agreed to sit well into the night on Tuesday to deal with Bill C-22, if it appeared to be necessary to move it along.

We are prepared to give Bill C-22 full and ample debate and get it to committee as quickly as we can, and then deal with it in committee as quickly as is reasonable in the normal course. We are also quite prepared to give first and second readings to all of the bills coming before us on Tuesday of next week, in order to move them along and to accommodate the government as much as possible. We will see when that time comes.

Perhaps the honourable senator would clarify for me one more time what the intention was for Wednesday, relative to committees. My reading of the situation is that, with the exception perhaps of Bill C-22, there is not a huge load for any of the committees at this time. I am not sure that we need extra time for committees, with perhaps the exception of Bill C-22.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, it is important to say that I do appreciate the cooperation that we have developed in this house. It is not our intention to try to shorten the debate at all. That is why we may need the evening sittings. We will not use them if we do not need them, but I am putting people on notice that it is foolish for us to be planning to return the following week unless it is necessary. If we are not able to move things through, then we will be returning the following week. However, on the basis that my colleague and I have discussed, it seemed possible that we will be able to wind everything up on Thursday night. If that does not develop, then we will be back the following morning.

Senator Berntson: I understand that that is the honourable senator's desire, but I wonder if he really believes that it is possible to deal with Bill C-22 in all of its aspects next week?

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I have had discussions with Senator Beaudoin, who is not here right now. He is the chairman of the committee that will deal with that piece of legislation. The committee is within the control of his party. I believe it depends entirely on them.

From my discussions with Senator Beaudoin, he did not seem to feel that completing a report on that bill would be difficult. He is looking for legal advisors as witnesses, and he is looking for the two ministers. I said that we would provide the ministers. They have agreed to be available upon request.

That does not sound like a week-long committee meeting. That sounds like a good day-long committee meeting, especially if it goes to ten o'clock at night.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Let us be clear on that one: Bill C-22 preoccupies us greatly. Unfortunately, Senator Kirby today did not touch on the essential aspects of the bill. He touched on everything that led up to the bill, but he did not talk about the bill itself. We will talk about the bill, and we will point out some of its major flaws.

I may be out of order, because right now we are discussing the adjournment motion, but we are also talking about the program for next week. We will not overdo it. We will not stretch out the debate. We will not ask for prolonged committee hearings. However, we will insist on having a debate with the time needed for it, and on having committee meetings with the time needed for them. We will not be stampeded by the fact that we should all be out of here by June 23 at 3:30 in the afternoon, and must have everything done by then. If we have to come back the following week, or the week after that, or even the week after that, we will.

Senator Stanbury: I am sorry if my honourable friend misunderstood. What I said was that we had agreed on a particular proposed method of dealing with the business next week. This was a matter of agreement. We both know that Bill C-22 will be a difficult bill.

Senator Berntson: It might generate some controversy.

Senator Stanbury: There is no intention to cut back on the debate. After all, it is in the hands of the honourable senator's party. You have the chairmanship of the committee. You are the people who have the majority in the house. Why are you asking us how much time you will have?

Senator Berntson: And you do not care, because Senator Molgat is coming back.

Senator Stanbury: Please do not think that we are stampeding you. This is an effort to accommodate all of the members of this house. If we are not able to accommodate the members of the house and if it is necessary to come back the following week, then we will do that, of course.

Senator Simard: Or the week after?

Senator Stanbury: Sure.

Senator Frith: You can refuse an adjournment. Be it on your head — or in your hands, excuse me.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa:

> With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, June 21, 1994, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

FAILURE TO FULFIL COMMITMENT—INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, April 19, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the unreliability of the National Film Board in that it failed to fulfil its commitment in 1987 to produce an historical documentary about Canada's WWI hero Air Marshall W.A. Bishop VC, by the then Commissioner, and is as yet unfulfilled by the present National Film Board.

He said: Honourable senators, I will not be long, but I must speak to this order today, since the 15 days have elapsed within which one must respond. While I do not agree with that rule, and while I have not done all the research required, I will deal with certain aspects of my inquiry which are highlighted in my notice.

Honourable senators, on December 2, 1987, dateline Montreal, a press release from the National Film Board said this:

> The National Film Board of Canada today announced that an historical documentary about Canada's World War I hero, Billy Bishop, will soon go into production.
>
> The NFB has already done one film on Billy Bishop: a docudrama that gives a perspective on the nature of heroism and the legend of Billy Bishop entitled, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss." The NFB feels it's also important to make a documentary on Canada's most decorated military figure, Billy Bishop.
> The production will be entirely financed by the National Film Board of Canada.

Honourable senators, I repeat, that is a release of December 2, 1987, seven years ago, by the National Film Board. It was greeted with satisfaction by myself, and I indicated as much when interviewed by the press.

Then from the December 11, 1987 minutes of a meeting of the Board of Trustees of the National Film Board come the following extracts:

> The commissioner met once again with the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs on October 28 to attempt to reach an agreement on The Kid Who Couldn't Miss.
> Accompanied by Joan Pennefather...

— who subsequently took over from Mr. Macerola, the then commissioner.

> ...he answered questions from members of the subcommittee, and made a two-fold proposal. First, the NFB would add a new disclaimer to the existing one; second, distribution would be carried on less actively. At the last minute, the chairman of the subcommittee informed the Commissioner that this proposal had been rejected.
> On December 2, the Commissioner met with [another party and] he proposed making a new film, entirely financed by the NFB, which would present a historical portrait of Billy Bishop.

That is at a meeting of the National Film Board.

> To conclude, the Commissioner stressed that the decision to make a documentary on Billy Bishop would show that the NFB is indeed responsive to the needs of Canadians, making it possible to write finis to the matter of the Billy Bishop docu-drama, and avoid the possibility of a motion to censure against the NFB...

Those are their words.

> ...being introduced in Parliament or the Senate.

From a November 2, 1987 letter to me from François Macerola, one extract emphasizes what I am trying to get across:

> As agreed, I will keep you, as Chairman of the Subcommittee, constantly informed on a confidential basis concerning the evolution of the film's distribution.

On April 1988, Mr. Macerola wrote to me as chairman to advise me that the National Film Board had begun the production of a documentary film on Air Marshall Bishop which would then change the context of our discussion on The Kid Who Couldn't Miss. He finished up by saying:

> I shall most certainly keep you up-to-date on the schedule and progress of the documentary film which is now underway. I look forward to hearing from you.

I do not think I heard from him after that.

In the fall of 1992, in an advertisement by someone, likely the National Film Board, Contemporary Currents stated this:

• (1550)

> Except for brief segments at the opening and closing of the film, this narrative history uses only archival footage to create the military experiences of a typical Canadian officer

— no individual; no Billy Bishop — > in the Royal Flying Corps, from his commissioning in 1914 to his endeavours as a fighter pilot in 1918.

> "The men themselves," asks George Pearson, "where did they come from? What kind of man had the stamina, endurance, strength of character and dedication of purpose to master machine and weapon, to overcome the deep inner struggle, to go out day after bloody day to meet the enemy? A disproportionate number of those who could, and did, were Canadians. Their country was proud of them. It still should be."

There is no mention of Billy Bishop.

In the film review, November 10, 1993, I quote from another article:

> This movie had its origin in the storm of criticism that was caused by the release in 1982 of the highly inaccurate production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" about the First World War soldier/airman William Avery Bishop, VC. The Bishop character assassination was the subject of an enquiry by the Senate SubCommittee on Veterans Affaires chaired by Senator Jack Marshall, CD. and as a result, in an attempt to mollify the criticism, the NFB Commissioner promised in writing that the Board would produce a "new" film on Bishop. "ACES" is not that film! If the reader did not see "ACES" on its televised debut on the Visions TV channel on November 11 last it is not worth investing the 92 1/2 minutes of time to do so nor for that matter the three dollars and GST required to rent a cassette. In one word it is inane. In the film's defence it must be said that it is on a par with the intellectual junk-food purveyed on much of the air-waves.

Honourable senators, that is the sequence of events which I want to place on the record. However, since I have much more to say, I will adjourn the debate.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

STATUS OF MERCHANT NAVY VETERANS— INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, April 20, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to omissions in Bill C-84, An Act to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the War Veterans Allowances Act and the Pension Act, and to amend other acts in consequence thereof; to omissions in related regulations (which restrict the intent, meaning,and interpretations of such documents as they apply to the recognition of merchant navy veterans, including those who were prisoners of war, and particularly to the urgency of speeding up the process of claims and entitlements to awards); and to the inconsistencies in the responsibilities of the Department of Veterans Affairs Canada, Transport Canada, National Defence and Government House as they relate to the above.

He said: Honourable senators, a consultation paper has been produced by the Minister of Veterans Affairs in conjunction with veterans, of which I have a copy. Many of the answers to the questions that I am seeking in this inquiry are documented therein. In order to move on and make progress, I will withdraw this inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 21, 1994, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, June 21, 1994

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HONOURABLE FREDERICK WILLIAM ROWE

TRIBUTES

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable colleagues, it is with a great deal of regret and sadness I rise to inform the Senate that our former colleague, Frederick William Rowe, passed away yesterday in St. John's, Newfoundland, at the age of 81. With his death, Canada has lost an individual of extraordinary interests and abilities, and his province of Newfoundland has lost one of its favourite sons.

Though in Ottawa we may remember Fred Rowe as a dedicated senator with a wide spectrum of interests, in Newfoundland he is remembered as a builder, an educator, an author, an historian, and a tireless servant of all Newfoundlanders. His time here in the Senate was but one part of a much broader career.

Fred Rowe began his service to the public as a Grade 4 teacher in Little Burnt Bay. This began a lifelong interest in education. He went on to become a high school principal and a supervising instructor. He also looked after his own education with a Bachelor of Arts degree at Mount Allison and a Doctorate of Pedagogy at the University of Toronto. As Senator Petten has pointed out in the past, that doctorate was not an honorary one — it was an earned degree.

Fred Rowe began his political life by participating in public debates over whether Newfoundland should join Confederation. He was in favour of that and, as such, he soon came to the attention of Joey Smallwood. When Mr. Smallwood became the first Premier of Newfoundland in 1949, Fred Rowe was appointed Deputy Minister of Public Welfare. He ran successfully for the legislature in 1952 and was appointed to cabinet as the Minister of Mines and Resources. He served in that legislature and in cabinet until 1971, when 22 straight years of Liberal rule finally came to an end.

During the 19 years he served in cabinet, Mr. Rowe made a profound impact on social and economic life in his province. He served as Minister of Welfare, Minister of Education, Minister of Highways, Minister of Finance, Minister of Community and Social Development, Minister of Labrador Affairs, President of the Council and Deputy Premier. During that same period, he became a successful author with his pioneering works, The History of Education in Newfoundland and The Development of Education in Newfoundland.

After being summoned to the Senate in 1971, Mr. Rowe continued with his literary endeavours. My friends from Newfoundland, I am sure, will know those volumes well: Education and Culture in Newfoundland; Extinction: The Beothuks of Newfoundland; and A History of Newfoundland and Labrador. In 1984 he wrote his book called The Smallwood Era. After his retirement in 1987, he published his own political memoirs entitled Into the Breach. Both books proved a fascinating account of his early life in Newfoundland, as well of his experience as a provincial and federal politician.

Honourable senators, receiving this news, as we did today, it is quite impossible to adequately pay tribute to an individual who, throughout his life, contributed so much to his country and to his fellow citizens. He will be remembered by them for so many accomplishments.

As I became a senator only in 1984, I did not have an opportunity to ccome to know him well. However, I do know he was very supportive of efforts in literacy and education, because of his background in those areas in his own province. I will always be grateful for that.

As an active legislator, he constantly challenged this chamber with his outspoken views. He advocated the decriminalization of so-called "soft drugs." He called for radical revision of the Criminal Code and preached against, in his own words, "the abuses and anti-social behaviour of big business, particularly the tobacco, automobile and legitimate drug interests."

In this chamber he is remembered for his work on our committees, particularly on the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs; and for his willingness to serve whenever he was called upon to do so. That is descriptive of his entire life.

Newfoundlanders will recall that same dedication. To them he was a social reformer, a civil servant, a politician and an author. As Senator Doody noted at the time of Mr. Rowe's retirement in 1987:

> We in Newfoundland remember him best for his contribution to education. His work in that field will be long remembered in the province.

Honourable senators, all who knew Mr. Rowe will be saddened by his passing. All who benefited from the spirit of public service which he showed will long thank him for it. His province of Newfoundland will honour him, as does the Senate of Canada. On behalf of all of us in this house I extend the condolences of the Senate to his wife, his four sons and their families.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to associate myself with the very gracious comments made by the Leader of the Government.

Senator Fred Rowe was a member of this place from 1971 until his retirement in 1987. He earned great respect during his years in this chamber. He was a very active senator, deeply concerned about Canada and, more particularly, his native Newfoundland.

Dr. Rowe was a very successful public servant and politician back home. He served as deputy minister in the first government after Confederation. From there he won five consecutive victories to elected office, all, as I recall, with very handsome majorities. He served with distinction in many portfolios in the Smallwood years. Indeed, he was Joey Smallwood's deputy premier.

Fred Rowe was also a scholar, a writer, a thinker and a teacher. He began his teaching career in 1931 at the age of 19. He went on to become a high school principal and a supervising inspector. Somewhere along the way he managed to find the time to earn his Ph.D. He also found time to lecture, give radio talks, write, publish seven books and raise a fine family. Indeed, two of his sons followed in his footsteps to the Newfoundland House of Assembly.

He had a great love for Newfoundland, especially rural Newfoundland, to which he devoted so much of his illustrious life.

To his wife, Edie, and to his sons, Bill, Fred, Bud and George, I extend my deepest sympathy.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable Senators, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of my colleagues in paying tribute to a great Canadian, the late Senator Frederick W. Rowe.

I first met Fred when he was a member of the government in our province of Newfoundland and Labrador. I was privileged to work with him for many years in the Liberal Party of our province.

As has been said, he was a politician, an educator, and a writer. His first book, Early Education in Newfoundland, was, in my opinion, a mini-history of our province. He kindly supplied me with a number of copies which I sent to many parts of the world where they were well received.

One of his last books, A History of Newfoundland and Labrador, was a work which I know he particularly enjoyed writing since he was a first-class historian. This was the first in-depth history of Newfoundland since Prowse's writings so many years ago.

• (1410)

Among his many accomplishments, and they have been mentioned by my colleagues this afternoon, was the creation of the provincial parks in our province.

To his wife, Edie, and "the boys," as he would have called them, and their families, I extend my most sincere sympathy.

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I, too, rise with great regret to note that Senator Frederick Rowe passed away yesterday after a lengthy illness. He is survived by his loving wife, Edie, his four sons and their families.

He is also survived and remembered with great fondness by people throughout our province of Newfoundland and Labrador; and by those of us who had the privilege of serving with him in this chamber before his retirement in 1987.

As mentioned earlier, the people of his province knew him well for his many contributions and his achievements as an educator. He had a distinguished career as a teacher and as author of seven books, most of them about education and the history of our province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

After his teaching career, he served for 19 years in the provincial legislature and held several cabinet portfolios, including Minister of Education and Deputy Premier.

During his 16 years in the Senate, Frederick Rowe continued to be an educator. He certainly taught me much about the ways of the Senate and how our institution operates. He gave freely of his time to me, both professionally and socially, to advise and help me to become acculturated to the Senate. I valued his intellect and his friendship. I deeply mourn his loss.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I should like to join with my colleagues in paying respect to the late Senator Frederick W. Rowe.

In doing so, I would like to say that, prior to being summoned to the Senate in 1978, I had not had much personal contact with the late senator other than through social occasions with mutual friends. I did, of course, have contact with him as a public figure and as a member of the same political party.

He was always very interesting to converse with, and I was well aware of his various accomplishments as an educator, author, deputy minister and minister of the provincial government. I believe that most of these accomplishments have been elaborated on by previous speakers.

"Dr. Fred," as I liked to refer to him, made a vast contribution to all aspects of education in Newfoundland, both as a teacher and as Minister of Education. His writings on education in the province and other aspects of life and history of the province are invaluable. I am sure they will stand as a permanent monument to the late senator.

Upon coming to the Senate, Senator Rowe and I became good friends. I spent many pleasant hours in his company, both here in Ottawa and while travelling back and forth.

Dr. Fred was a man of great experience and integrity. On his retirement, I looked forward to spending some time with him and partaking of his wisdom. Unfortunately, much to my regret, this was not to be, as he fell victim to a debilitating sickness to which he finally succumbed.

To his wife, Edie, and his four sons, I extend deepest condolences.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I speak as a close friend of Fred Rowe's. I also speak as a Newfoundlander because I still have the twang of one, something which my people learned in Lamaline which is on the coast of Newfoundland. I did not know Fred Rowe at that time because that was way back in the 1800s.

I met Fred Rowe two years after he was elected for the first time. I had to go to St. John's, Newfoundland as Minister of Welfare for the Province of Prince Edward Island. I was taken to the cabinet room to meet the cabinet ministers in Joey Smallwood's cabinet. Sitting next to Joey Smallwood was Fred W. Rowe. That was my first acquaintance with Fred.

I met him many times after that when he held various different portfolios in the Government of Newfoundland. At that time I, too, was minister in charge of several portfolios in the Government of Prince Edward Island. We would meet from time to time at provincial caucuses. We then met here in 1971, after Mr. Moores became Premier of Newfoundland. Fred decided that, rather than spend the rest of his lifetime in Newfoundland, he would come to this great chamber and share with us some of his wisdom.

Fred made sure that we all knew that it was not the Rowes of Newfoundland who killed the Beothuks. Not only did he explain their demise to this house, he wrote a book about it to ensure that all Canadians would know that they died of tuberculosis. The last Beothuk Indian from that province died in 1829 from that disease. It was not the forefathers of the Rowes who slew them.

Fred was a great historian. He was proud of the fact that he got his doctor's degree by earning it. He did not approve of the practice of awarding doctorate degrees to people because they were able to make substantial donations to a university. He always made sure that we all knew he earned his doctorate.

He was an educator, a historian, a politician, a friend, and a great travelling companion. I had the privilege of touring Europe and the Mediterranean Sea with Fred and his good wife, Edie.

Senator Rowe was proud of his children. At one time, his son Bill, a Rhodes scholar, of whom he was very proud, was Acting Leader of the Liberal Party of Newfoundland. Many times he said that not too many families in Canada were fortunate enough to have three people in the legislature of the country at the same time. He had two sons in the Newfoundland legislature, and, at the same time, he was in this upper house. His other children play important roles in the teaching profession in Newfoundland. In fact, Bill is still on a radio talk show in Newfoundland. He was equally proud of his four sons, Fred, Bill, Bud and George.

The only regret he had was that he had no daughters. He tried hard to have a daughter, but he never seemed to know the secret. He asked me one time: "How can you have a daughter?" I tried to explain it to him but it was so complicated that I think he became tired of trying.

Fred would be pleased to know that I took time out today to stand up and talk about him and tell you of his great contribution to Newfoundland and to Canada.

I also want to extend my condolences to his good wife, Edie, who will miss him tremendously, and to his four boys, all of whom we are proud.

FOREIGN POLICY

CONGRATULATIONS ON GOVERNMENT INITIATIVES

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, because of the inexorable advance of the calendar, I shall not have many more opportunities to use this highly important item on our Daily Routine of Business. I am therefore all the more anxious to follow my usual practice of accentuating the positive and doing my best to eliminate the negative.

I was pleased with the recent answer of the Leader of the Government in relation to Canada's contributions towards the economic viability of the new Palestinian entities in the Middle East. It was a comprehensive and informative reply. It is my urgent hope that our country will continue to expand its contributions. It might well be an essential element in any lasting peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

• (1420)

Yesterday I was delighted by statements of Secretary of State Christine Stewart and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. André Ouellet, in reference to Cuba. Long ago, at the time of the Cuban missile crisis, when I was a timid freshman member of the House of Commons, I spoke strongly in my party's caucus against the suggestions from Washington that Canada break diplomatic and commercial contacts with Cuba.

The Diefenbaker government refused to follow the American lead. A few days later, as I was passing through the government lobby, where I spent only a few years of my life, I heard one of our senior ministers tell another, "Of course, we could not go along with them, but it was not until I heard young Macquarrie in caucus that I gave much thought to the matter."

How long ago that was, "young Macquarrie!"

Monday's announcement on aid to Cuba is most welcome and in the best traditions of Canadian foreign policy. If I may be so presumptuous, I would like to say that here is one aging Tory, albeit a Red one, who sends congratulations to the government on this initiative, which I would describe as both humanitarian and hemispheric.

I never considered myself to be one of John Diefenbaker's favourite caucus members, but I am sure that, on this important matter, the old chief and I are totally ad idem.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 22, 1994, at one thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, I would like to make a few remarks.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, by agreement between the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and myself, it had been intended that we would not have a sitting of the Senate tomorrow, and the day would be devoted to committee hearings. However, there is a feeling that some things should be done during the sitting tomorrow. Therefore, there will be a sitting from 1:30 p.m. until 3 p.m., as has been normal.

However, the discussion of that possibility may have misled some of our committee chairmen, so that this afternoon we will have several motions requesting permission to sit while the Senate is sitting, in order that committees may follow through on arrangements they have already made. Senator Doody, Senator Neiman and perhaps Senator Sylvain have motions, I believe.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe the record of the last sitting day will show that there was some discussion about this matter at that time. In fact, the opposition indicated that it is willing to accommodate the government in moving many of these bills along. However, with specific reference to Bill C-22, we indicated at that time that we wanted all the time we felt would be necessary to hold a full debate. We are of the belief that that particular bill ought not to be rushed through. I think there was agreement on that last day. Therefore, while we are still quite willing to accommodate the government to procedurally move these bills along, and while we are not in favour of setting precedents, we have no objection at this particular time to having those committees sit tomorrow while the chamber is in session.

I do not want anyone to misunderstand what was agreed to. It was never our intention to forego our caucus meeting tomorrow morning, nor was it our intention to forgo the sitting of the house tomorrow afternoon, based on the need for debate on Bill C-22.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, it is unfortunate when misunderstandings occur. There is no doubt that we had agreed that we would honour the position of caucuses, and that is why no committees were set to meet until after 12 noon. That was certainly the case, but I must say that I had understood that we had agreed that there would not be a sitting in the afternoon so that committees would have the full day.

However, as I said the other day, that arrangement was not intended to cut short debate on Bill C-22 or anything else, because that debate, whether it be in this house or in committee, could go on ad infinitum, and in that regard we may be talking extended hours and other things.

I do not wish to make a big issue of it; I simply want to be sure that we do not blame committee chairmen for having gone ahead on the same assumption that I had.

Senator Berntson: Honourable senators, I am not trying to assess blame at all. I am as capable of getting into a misunderstanding as anyone. My position has been put on the record, and I am not in the business of assessing blame.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody, Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I ask that Motion No. 1, which stands in my name, be brought forward now. I will explain my motive, if I am permitted so to do.

With the length of the Order Paper that we have today, and motions being the last item on the Order Paper, four o'clock will have come and gone before we deal with the motion. Therefore, in the interests of moving along the business of the Senate, we have witnesses ready and the committee is prepared to meet at four o'clock. BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On Presentation of Petitions:

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest: Honourable senators, on the subject of presenting petitions, I would like to ask the Speaker whether a senator may table during this session a petition tabled during a previous session.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am informed that unless there is unanimous consent, a new petition would have to be presented.

Senator Rivest: If there is unanimous consent, could I ask Senator Hébert to give me his petitions on abolishing the GST? I think I will need them.

Senator Hébert: Why certainly!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is Senator Rivest asking for unanimous consent?

Senator Rivest: Yes, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: No!

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry, Senator Rivest, but there is no unanimous consent.

Senator Rivest: Does this mean that I cannot table these petitions again but that I could assemble new petitions to remind the government that they failed to meet the commitment made during the election campaign to abolish the GST?

The Hon. the Speaker: Lack of unanimous consent does not in any way affect the senator's privilege to present petitions in the future.

I am told that, according to our rules, to repeat what has already been tabled is not acceptable.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL FINANCE

INCREASE IN BANK RATE—DEFICIT REDUCTION PLAN—REQUEST FOR FISCAL UPDATE

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, in today's edition of The Toronto Star — tough words for me to say, "The Toronto Star" — I find that they have shown a certain amount of fairness in their reporting.

Michael Hart from the Friedberg Mercantile Group, speaking about the plunge of the TSE and the dumping of Canadian bonds by foreign investors, states:

> What we are seeing is a lack of confidence in the government's fiscal policy.

Our horrific debt scenario, to be fair, cannot be blamed totally on the government of the day. However, they assumed that responsibility. They said they would deal with it effectively.

Our deficit at the present time is over 5 per cent of our GDP, and the interest rate in the Bank of Canada today rose by 0.67 basis points, bringing the bank rate to 7.09 per cent.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us what immediate steps the government intends to take to deal with this?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator St. Germain for his question. He predicates it on the comments of a person with whom, I must confess, I am not familiar and whose views are not totally shared by a number of other people in the financial world.

It is true, as the honourable senator knows, that the market, worldwide, in recent weeks and months has been extremely volatile. The honourable senator also knows, as does everyone in this house, that the anxiety about the market, particularly in recent weeks, has been very much attributed to the political uncertainty that is being manipulated in this country by those who would speak of separation and political upheaval in Canada. So long as that issue is fueled and kept front and centre in Canada, we will have anxiety among investors, both outside this country and inside this country.

The government put forward a budget in February in which it pledged itself to 3 per cent of GDP in three years. That is the goal. It is on track. That is the conviction of the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister.

While we have an increase in the bank rate, from which no one takes any comfort, we also have another set of indicators in this country that shows that the Canadian economy is growing with a considerable degree of strength: 4.2 per cent of growth in the first quarter of this year. Our employment and our job creation is up. Retail sales are up. Consumer confidence is up. There is strong fundamental growth taking place in our economy.

Interest rates, of course, are worrisome, because we would like them to be going in the other direction. However, my honourable friend knows that this is a phenomenon that is not isolated to Canada, although it is exacerbated in Canada by the political uncertainty created by the situation in Quebec and by the statements of the leader of the Parti Québécois, whose outpourings not only affect individual Canadians in the province of Quebec, but also affect Canadians throughout this country and their job prospects. The sooner they tone it down, the better.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Talk about the tail wagging the dog. Why does the government leader not answer him?

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, to the Leader of the Government again, while she says that we are on track, I would urge her to check with her finance minister. With the significant increase in interest rates, how can we still be on track? One per cent reflects a horrific amount of money, in excess of $400 billion of debt.

Honourable senators, I really question whether we can be on track, and I would urge the Leader of the Government to check that finding. Even though we have this undesirable situation which she described that is causing the increase in interest rates, I believe it is the mismanagement of our economy that will lead to the destruction of this country. Provinces, such as my own province of British Columbia, which is a "have" province, look at the state of the federal finances and question whether there is any proper fiscal management. As the Leader of the Government in the Senate has pointed out, the opposition in the other place are more interested in separation, and the third party is more interested in haircuts, shoe shines and codes of conduct, or discipline within their own ranks.

Honourable senators, I spent last week on government business in the province of British Columbia. While there, I was advised by business groups that there is a definite erosion in the confidence factor in business in that particular province, which has not been as affected by the recession as have some other provinces.

I therefore urge the Leader of the Government to request that the Minister of Finance come forward with an interim fiscal report on the state of the deficit. I know that the Prime Minister is quoted as saying that we do not track the deficit on an hourly basis, but perhaps we could track it on a weekly basis, or on a monthly basis. Considering the technology that exists in this country, one would think we could get an interim fiscal report on the state of the deficit on a monthly basis, at the very least.

I would again request that the Leader of the Government in the Senate bring forth the interim fiscal report I referred to a week ago, in order that honourable senators can go back to their constituencies with ammunition that might possibly help to allay any fears and bolster confidence in the economy.

Senator Frith: You say you were in British Columbia on government business?

Senator St. Germain: Absolutely.

Senator Frith: What were you doing for us?

Senator Fairbairn: Boosting morale! I will certainly pass on your comments to my colleague the Minister of Finance, who, I can assure my honourable friend, is keeping a constant and very sharp eye on economic developments in this country, as is the Prime Minister.

In his question, the honourable senator speculated as to what the government intended to do in this situation. I can tell my honourable friend that one of the things that this government is committed to, and is doing, is the creation of jobs. That is one of the reasons why we are showing continued economic strength. That is also an underpinning of our commitment to the Canadian people.

Honourable senators, the government has taken a number of initiatives, not the least of which is the infrastructure program, which is well on its way. The infrastructure program is one way of building confidence in this country because when people are working and earning a pay cheque, they are able to make purchases and take care of their families. That is one of the ways we maintain confidence in our country.

Another way is to get out into every province and territory and talk about the unity of this country, as I am sure my honourable friend has been doing in his province of British Columbia this last week. We must put aside the absolutely debasing comments that are being made that cut at the economic, social and patriotic underpinnings of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Let us all get our flags out!

Senator St. Germain: For Senator Frith's information, I was in British Columbia on official business, without question or doubt.

Senator Perrault: Monkey business.

Senator St. Germain: I want to make sure that the record is straight. I will support the government on any good project, or on anything that is credible.

Senator Frith: You will be a busy man.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government loses sight of what the real problem is. We have higher interest rates and, as a result, the deficit can only increase. There is only one way to deal with this problem, and that is to cut expenses. If the Leader of the Government in the Senate is not prepared to go back to her cabinet colleagues and urge them to reassess their position with respect to expenditures in this country, she will fail to bolster confidence in the minds of business people. Business people are not stupid. They will not be driven by hype. They will be driven by direct action that deals with the real issue at hand, and that is the cutting of government expenses. Unless we see action of that nature, there will be no activity on the confidence front.

I ask the honourable leader if she would be prepared to go back to cabinet and ask her colleagues to cut the budgets of such Crown corporations as the CBC? That corporation is spending $1.4 billion.

Senator Fairbairn: I know of my honourable friend's frustration with the CBC. He constantly reminds me of it. I will be very candid with the honourable senator; I will not go back to cabinet and demand the cutting and dismantling of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: With respect to my honourable friend's comments about the business community in this country, of course the business community is smart; we know that. They are smart enough to know that this government is determined to live up to and to realize its goals.

The business community is also aware of the exercise currently under way by my colleague Marcel Massé, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, who is sifting through the spectrum of government departments and services to see what can be consolidated, how duplication can be cut, and how the Government of Canada can show the way in terms of efficiency and effectiveness. That is all part of the current exercise, as is the important review of social policy in this country, which is aimed at protecting the security of Canadians in the most effective and efficient way, while keeping an eye on the very deficit that concerns my friend.

Senator Frith: A deficit "your friend" had a lot to do with creating.

INCREASE IN BANK RATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, Senator St. Germain has attempted to have the Leader of the Government in the Senate explain the latest increase in the Bank of Canada rate. However, he failed, so I will try again. Obviously, it does not matter what question we ask. What we have been getting for the last two months from the Leader of the Government in the Senate is a standard answer. "Everything is working well." The government is predicting a boom and increased retail sales.

Senator Frith: We learned a bit from Senator Murray sitting over there.

Senator Simard: We have seen a decline in retail purchasing in the last month. Perhaps the Leader of the Government will want to review her standard answer.

Honourable senators, I have four questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but only one preamble. By way of preamble, I should like to remind those opposite of a promise from their Red Book concerning interest rates. On page 20 of the Red Book, Canadians were promised a monetary policy that would produce lower real interest rates. My question for the Leader of the Government is: When will the government honour its Red Book commitment?

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate feel that the budget contains enough money in its contingency account? According to Mr. Paul Martin, the Minister of Finance, we know that there is $2.4 billion in that account. However, we also know that the 2-per-cent increase in interest rates will cost $4 billion, and that figure keeps escalating, so we are probably looking at a cost of $5 billion or $6 billion. How will this shortfall be made up? When will it be announced that the government is implementing new spending cuts? Will it be next year? If so, that will be too late, because last March the money markets —

Senator Frith: Let us have a question! This is Question Period!

Senator Simard: The money markets are talking about a financial crisis!

Can the minister advise us of what new measures the government will take to address the financial crisis in confidence that the markets now say we are facing?

Those are the first two questions. I have two more, but no preamble next time.

• (1510)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend indicates that he finds the continued reiteration of our economic forecasts and statistical reviews of recent weeks tiresome. Nonetheless, I mention them repeatedly so that we can all understand that there are two very different things happening in this country.

On one hand, we are experiencing strong economic growth. This is recognized not only in Canada but around the world. The forecasts of the OECD for economic growth in Canada are higher than for any other country in that group. On the other hand, we have been experiencing a fluctuation in interest rates in the last several weeks. My honourable friend knows the reasons for that.

The government is committed to maintaining a steady course of job creation and assistance for people who need special measures, such as those in the Atlantic fishery. There is a great deal of activity going on in this country to stabilize and assist in areas of need. The government will continue to maintain and improve on these policies and initiatives. The Minister of Finance is well aware of the comments of my honourable friend and others, and he will be taking whatever action is necessary to keep us on track.

Senator Simard: We on this side and every other well-intentioned Canadian will admit that the problems are not strictly Canadian-made.

I remember a few years ago when senators opposite, who were sitting on this side then, thought that everything should be blamed on the Mulroney government. We did not agree. We recognize that there are forces at work which affect the American currency and that there are other factors, but they do not explain everything that is happening in Canada.

When the Conservatives were in power, the Liberals benefited from a great misunderstanding by the Canadian electorate, a misunderstanding that you compounded by your misrepresentations before and during the last federal election. Now the Liberal government continues to compound the financial problems of Canada by its fiscal and monetary mismanagement.

Senator Hébert: Order.

Senator Simard: The sooner you get out of there or, to put it plainly, resign, so much the better for Canadians.

The markets are passing judgment on federal and provincial deficits. I am not putting everything at the government's doorstep. However, when will the government stop making silly decisions like cutting $23 million to kill a Canadian institution; playing into the hands of the separatists.

Yesterday, Paul Martin said —

Some Hon. Senators: Question!

Senator Simard: I do not raise this because I want to start an argument, I raise it because the honourable senator raised it. Only ten minutes ago the separatists and those of us on this side were invited to tone it down. I wish you would tell Paul Martin to tone it down, too.

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order!

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. There are moments when it is good for this house to be awakened by a vigorous debate. However, I think we have reached a point where it is a little difficult to hear what is being said on both sides.

I would ask Senator Simard to finish his question, and we will give him an opportunity to do so.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Will the government stop putting all the blame for its own mismanagement on the separatists and start fighting for Canadian unity instead, by standing up for and maintaining our traditional institutions such as the military college at St-Jean, to ensure true and long-lasting unity in Canada?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would be the last person in this house to tell Senator Simard that he should tone it down. I was not speaking of my friends opposite when I made those remarks. I was speaking of parliamentarians in the other chamber. I will certainly repeat that.

One of the most positive things that could happen in this country today would be the election of Premier Daniel Johnson of Quebec when he chooses to call an election. That would tone things down considerably.

I appreciate the comments of my friend with regard to the economy because he understands that this is not an easy issue. If I understood him correctly, he suggested that we should be thinking of resigning.

Senator Simard: The sooner the better.

Senator Fairbairn: I suggest that, at the moment, 59 per cent of Canadians have a great deal of confidence in the action the government and the Prime Minister are taking.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kirby, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the second reading of Bill C-22, respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operations of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, not only has government's legislative record to date been remarkably, not to say embarrassingly, unimpressive some five months after Parliament reconvened, but the only pieces of legislation which can be called "major" and were not inherited in whole or in part from the previous government are only four in number, and not four to be particularly proud of either.

First there was the back-to-work legislation affecting Vancouver dock workers, never the sort of law Parliament is happy with as it usually results from weaknesses in existing legislation.

That was followed by the law giving Canada the right to go beyond the 200-mile limit to arrest flags of convenience and pirate fishing vessels. The government showed hesitation about the legality of its own bill by refusing to accept any decision of the International Court on the matter. The European Union recently stated that:

> ...the law and its implementation are not only contrary to international law, but also run counter to the efforts made by the international community... to improve the management of fishing resources on the high seas.

No matter the urgency, it is very disturbing to see this country, which has an unblemished and enviable reputation for honouring international commitments, exempt itself in such a blunt fashion.

Third came Bill C-18. It is fresh enough in our minds that I need not summarize its passage through Parliament. Senator Murray's description of it during second reading as "miserable," prior to it being amended, was as apt as any.

Now we have Bill C-22. If the original Bill C-18 was a miserable piece of government legislation, Bill C-22 is not only miserable but appallingly wretched.

In his explanation of the bill at second reading in the House of Commons on April 26, the Minister of Transport justified this Draconian measure by referring to the agreements it declares null and void in such terms as "not in the public interest," "a reliance on lobbyists ...the backroom dealings... the manipulation of bona fide private sector interests... the lack of respect for the impartiality of public servants," and "uncontrolled lobbying conducted behind closed doors." These are the minister's own words. I will spare honourable senators those of the opposition parties' both in the House and at its Transport Committee. They make those of the Minister of Transport sound even polite, being filled with innuendos, not too subtle implications of possible unlawful acts, and generally insulting references to the contracting parties on the private side. Let us not forget their disdainful conduct toward committee witnesses generally.

I do not intend to discuss the agreements at this stage of the debate at any rate. As far as I know, they have not yet been made public. How is it possible to evaluate something so complicated sight unseen? All we have to support the allegations made in the other place is a report entitled, "Pearson Airport Review," which is dated November 29, 1993, prepared by Robert Nixon.

Mr. Nixon held his hearings in camera. Only those invited by him appeared as witnesses. They were not under oath. Cross-examination and rebuttal were not allowed. Many of the principals involved with the agreement were never consulted, and those who were, for only a few hours. As far as I can find out, Mr. Nixon's mandate was never made public in written form. Certainly, the sponsor of the bill is not aware of written instructions, as he himself admitted last Thursday.

Mr. Nixon was given 30 days to review thousands of pages of written material resulting from a process which covers a period of four years. As Mr. Nixon himself has written:

> ...the agreement is an enormously complicated transaction. There are over 20 separate contracts, agreements, leases and sub-leases.

In his testimony on May 31 before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transport, Mr. Gordon R. Baker, the sole trustee of the Matthews Paxport Trust, which has a 14.4-per-cent interest in the T1T2 Limited Partnership, the contracting party with the Government of Canada, commented as follows on the Nixon report:

> The consequences of that haste is a report that has so many inaccuracies, factual errors, omissions, statements that are rebuttable and allegations without one shred of evidence to support them, that the report unfortunately caused great injustice to the Partnership, its partners and their reputations, officials of Transport Canada, the Ministry of Finance, Treasury Board, Justice Department, and a disservice to the Prime Minister and the people of Canada.

Honourable senators, this is a damning indictment which has gone unanswered by the author of the report. Why? Mr. Baker elaborated at length to support his charges before the House Transport Committee. The Liberal majority on the committee voted down a motion that Mr. Nixon appear before it to answer them. Why?

Mr. Nixon mentions only two names which he identifies with Paxport Inc. One is Donald Matthews, who he identifies as chairman of the Mulroney leadership campaign in 1983, president of the Progressive Conservative Party, and chief fund-raiser for that party. The other is Otto Jelinek, who is described as a cabinet minister in the Progressive Conservative government who did not seek re-election and who is now on the board of Paxport Inc., and President of their Asian subsidiary.

Based on these descriptions Mr. Nixon concludes:

> This, together with the flawed process I have described, understandably may leave one with the suspicion that patronage had a role in the selection of Paxport Inc.

Submissions before the House Transport Committee showed these statements to be riddled with errors. Mr. Matthews was not chairman of the Mulroney leadership campaign in 1983. Although it is implied that he was President of the party at the time of the bid, his term was actually from 1971 to 1974. He was never chief fund-raiser of the party.

Mr. Jelinek has never been on the board of Paxport or any of its subsidiaries. Mr. Nixon never consulted with either Mr. Matthews or with Mr. Jelinek before writing this misinformation. Why?

I mention this because the cancellation of the agreements which led the government to introduce Bill C-22 is justified by the Nixon report, which has been accepted at face value, without any interest by the Liberal government in giving those directly affected, not to say "maligned," by it an opportunity to have Mr. Nixon explain and support publicly some of his disturbing assertions. By blindly accepting the Nixon report and repeating, where and when useful, its most serious and not too thinly veiled allegations of impropriety by the private sector, the government seeks to justify a piece of legislation, the likes of which has never been passed by the Parliament of Canada in its entire history.

The Liberal Party had great sport with the Pearson airport agreement during the election campaign. It successfully convinced many Canadians that the agreement was a result of methods and practices described by the Minister of Transport during his second reading speech. The final approval being given only a few days before the election was concrete proof of this, said the Liberal Party. The Nixon report confirms it, says the Liberal government.

Bill C-22 is a logical result, so let's get on with it expeditiously, urges Senator Kirby. Senator Kirby has claimed that, until this bill is passed, technically, T1 and T2 remain in the hands of the developers.

I wish to draw his and the attention of honourable senators to a statement made by Donald Matthews before the House Transport Committee on May 31. He said:

> But T1T2 Limited Partnership never took possession of the terminals. Let me explain why. The Partnership was approached by the Clerk of the Privy Council in October of 1993 to delay taking possession of the Terminals in order to give any newly elected government an opportunity to review the soundness of the legal, financial and economic arrangements with regards to the Airport. I was in favour of such a review and the Partnership cooperated and agreed to a delay...

I fear, honourable senators, that the real reason for pushing for expeditious passage of this bill is prompted by a desire on the part of the government not to give the bill itself anything but a cursory and fleeting look. As a matter of fact, however, it only takes a cursory and fleeting look to realize what a nasty bit of business Bill C-22 is all about.

Bill C-22 contains a number of provisions which are indefensible and go against the practices and traditions of Canadian society. They are found nowhere else in any law of the Parliament of Canada. The Liberal government's introduction of them is unsurpassed in its mean-spirited arrogance. Having so successfully earned significant electoral support only by tarnishing the reputations of hundreds of Canadians, both in the public and private sector, it is now prepared to punish fellow citizens for supposed illegitimate, if not illegal, acts — not one of which is supported with an iota of supporting evidence, with no name mentioned — by stripping them of some fundamental rights.

Even if all that the Liberal government has suggested about the Pearson agreements negotiations were true — I repeat, even if everything that has been said and written were true — my assessment of the bill would be exactly the same. That is why I do not dwell on the agreements today. They are secondary to the bill which contains clauses which cannot be approved without at least the most careful scrutiny, and even then —

The right to cancel contracts unilaterally is not without precedent, and the government is certainly within its rights in doing so. Senator Kirby made much of the fact that the absence of a cancellation clause is highly unusual and is responsible for the introduction of Bill C-22. It is not, if he digs a little deeper into the matter. The lease for Terminal 3 has no cancellation clause; nor does the one with the Vancouver Local Airport Authority.

As a matter of fact, Transport Canada does not put a cancellation clause in any of its ground leases. In any event, what difference would it have made? One of the agreements being cancelled by Bill C-22, which is found in Part II of the schedule at the end of the bill as Item 7, has a cancellation clause, but the government chooses to ignore it.

With it, unilateral cancellation brings obligations. Dislike of a contract is no reason to be exempted from these obligations. Where there is no provision for settlement in a contract following a cancellation, recourse to a mutually agreed third party or the courts is available. Bill C-22 denies this fundamental right. It arrogantly states that one of the two contracting parties, the Government of Canada, gives unto itself full powers to determine what damages may or may not be paid upon submission of the other party.

I want to read the pertinent clauses 7 and 8 so that honourable senators can appreciate the full impact of what the government is trying to do.

• (1530)

Clause 7 states:

> No action or other proceeding, including any action or proceeding in restitution, or for damages of any kind in tort or contract, that is based on or is in relation to

(a) the Request for Proposals,

(b) the negotiations that followed that Request,

(c) any agreement,

(d) any advice or services provided to Her Majesty in relation to any agreement, or

(e) any thing done by the Government of Canada in relation to the announcement of the cancellation of any agreement, lies or may be instituted by anyone against Her Majesty, or against any minister or any servant or agent of Her Majesty, or any person engaged to provide advice or services to Her Majesty in relation to any agreement, for anything done or omitted to be done, or for anything purported to have been done or omitted to have been done, in the performance of any powers, duties or functions.

Clause 8 reads:

Every action or other proceeding referred to in section 7 instituted before the coming into force of this Act is hereby set aside or dismissed.

Simply put, access to the courts, for whatever reason, having to do with the Pearson agreements, is absolutely and unconditionally denied, whether projected or already underway.

Hon. Royce Frith: Not really.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This is one case where one does not have to be versed in law to appreciate that this denial goes against one of the basic foundations of our society.

Senator Frith: But you can challenge it under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. There is no "notwithstanding" clause.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The government, in clauses 7 and 8, is substituting the rule of men and women for the rule of law. From now on the government will decide who has access to justice.

How ironic that the sponsor of the bill was at one time Secretary to the Cabinet for Federal-Provincial Relations and was intimately involved in the events leading to the 1982 Constitution Act, nearly as much as the then Minister of Justice, who is Prime Minister today. Have they conveniently forgotten some key passages of that act, which they worked so tirelessly to bring about?

Have they already forgotten the preamble to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which reads:

Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law...

Does section 15(1) of the Charter no longer matter to them? It reads:

Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination...

Despite the flagrant abuse contained in clauses 7 and 8, so obvious and despicable, none on the opposite side in the House of Commons made more than a passing reference to it. The opposition parties found it more to their partisan advantage to proclaim their political virginity, while condemning the national parties for their supposed corruption.

The question before us, honourable senators, is not the contract, or how it came about, or who was involved, or how much money was paid to lobbyists, or who spoke to whom in what minister's office, or who is a well-known supporter of what political party, or why the Prime Minister authorized that the transaction be concluded 18 days before the federal election. Those and other related matters, as far as I am concerned, are not for today. The main question before us is the legality of clauses 7 and 8.

It is interesting and even more significant that Senator Kirby hardly touched on the bill itself in his presentation, and not at all on clauses 7 and 8. He spoke much of all that came before but little of Bill C-22 itself. He has been put in an unenviable position, for even with his eloquence and quick repartee it is impossible to successfully defend the indefensible.

There are other aspects of the bill that trouble us.

Senator Frith: You are doing very well "defending your indefensible."

Senator Bolduc: That is because he is right.

Senator Frith: No, it is wrong. Look at it!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The minister, at his own discretion and on his own terms, determines what is and what is not eligible for compensation, and what the amount of that compensation will be, if any.

Senator Carney: This is wrong?

Senator Frith: It is wrong that you cannot challenge the bill under the Constitution. It does not have a "notwithstanding" clause.

An Hon. Senator: Order!

An Hon. Senator: The Liberal king can do no wrong!

Senator Frith: What he is saying is legally wrong, that is all, and he says he is only interested in the legal side.

Senator Berntson: We would be happy to hear this argument, when you enter the debate.

Senator Frith: Good, but I do not think you will be happy.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If the government's intentions are not clear enough, subclause 10(3) is. It states:

> No agreement may be entered into under this section after one month after the coming into force of this Act.

In other words, take it or leave it, but the government will decide whether or not there is anything to take.

The objections raised, particularly the denial of access to the courts, are serious and cannot be dismissed by this chamber. They were not given any consideration by the government or by the opposition parties either in the House of Commons or at its Transport Committee hearings. They cannot be dealt with here without serious examination. They imply, at least to the layman, a horrendous violation of a fundamental right.

I urge honourable senators to concentrate their interest on these issues, for the agreements which led to Bill C-22 should not be the issue at this time.

I want to conclude by reminding honourable senators that not so long ago the Senate was faced with a situation which is recalled by Bill C-22. In 1988, the then government tabled Bill C-55, which amended the Immigration Act of 1976. I want to read from the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, dated May 11, 1988, two paragraphs of which contain observations most appropriate to the debate on Bill C-22. This excerpt from the report states:

> In addition to stipulating that members of the Board were to cease to hold office on the coming into force of Bill C-55, the Bill also contains a provision stating that no person appointed as a member of the Immigration Appeal Board or the Refugee Status Advisory Committee would have any right to claim or receive any compensation, damages, indemnity or other relief for the loss or abolition of his or her office. The Governor in Council would be entitled, however, to provide such relief in its discretion.

This was a bill containing such a section which was before the Senate. This is the reaction of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to that particular section. The committee went on to say:

> The Committee thinks that it is much to be preferred in principle to provide just compensation for individuals who, having undertaken to provide services in reliance on stated terms, find at a later date that their services are no longer required. This would seem to be the equitable way to treat incumbent members and also reflects a principle that is firmly established in our law. Amendment 12(c) — which was an amendment that the Senate proposed to drop that section.

> — recommends that the "no right to compensation" provision be removed, thus restoring whatever legal rights these individuals would ordinarily possess.

The amendment was eventually approved by the House of Commons and became law, thereby allowing a number of challenges, including one by a person who is today Minister of National Revenue.

The Senate intervened then to safeguard a basic principle and a fundamental right. Surely it has a responsibility and a duty to do the same today.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, in rising to speak in this debate on Bill C-22 I have ringing in my ears the maxim that equity abhors forfeiture.

• (1540)

Indeed, honourable senators, free Canadians can only find abhorrent the provision of this bill which seeks to deny Canadians access to a court of law. The history of assaults on the practice of freedom is marked by attempts of those in power to act with supreme authority and never to be subject to restraints on that power.

Bill C-22 provides, as Senator Lynch-Staunton pointed out to us, in clause 7, that:

> No action or other proceeding... may be instituted by anyone against Her Majesty... in relation to any agreement...

and related thereto, and in clause 8, that:

> Every action or other proceeding referred to in clause 7 instituted before the coming into force of this Act is hereby set aside or dismissed.

These are provisions which I believe constitute an egregious affront to our fundamental principles of rights and freedoms.

Honourable senators, how do these provisions of clause 7 and clause 8 measure up against a number of human rights standards which bind us as Canadians?

Honourable senators, if we turn to the Canadian Bill of Rights, the Act of Parliament of 1960, we find that it provides in section 1(a):

> ...for the right of the individual to... enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law.

We must also ascertain whether or not clauses 7 and 8 meet that test, particularly since section 2(e) of the Canadian Bill of Rights provides:

> Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgement or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular, no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to...
> (e) deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations.

Honourable senators, not only domestically but also internationally, we find expression of very clear principles of the right to property, the right to determination, of the significance of the right to property being determined by an independent tribunal. As you know, Canada was a signatory on December 10, 1948, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations.

Article 17 of the The International Bill of Human Rights provides:

> 1. Everyone has the right to own property alone, as well as in association with others.
> 2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Then we turn to article 10, and it states:

> Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal in the determination of his rights and obligations...

Honourable senators, on the international plane, we are party to a number of international treaties, such as the NAFTA which we worked on not too long ago in this chamber; treaties which provide for the protection of the property of investors who choose to invest in countries other than their own. Specifically, under such treaties, foreigners who invest here in Canada are guaranteed compensation for assets being expropriated in Canada and due process for determination of that fair settlement.

We must question therefore: Are we to allow a situation to develop wherein treaties guarantee greater rights to foreigners than the rights Canadians have?

I draw to the attention of honourable senators article 1110 of the NAFTA agreement which provides that:

> No Party may directly or indirectly nationalize or expropriate an investment of an investor of another Party in its territory or take a measure tantamount to nationalization or expropriation...of such an investment, except,
> (a) for public purpose;
> (b) on a non-discriminatory basis;
> (c) in accordance with due process of law and...
> (d) on payment of compensation in accordance with paragraphs 2 through 6.

These principles or standards, honourable senators, are not without a long and noble tradition. Indeed, one can find in that historic meeting at Runnymede in the 13th century, in 1215, the Magna Carta established that the ruler of England could not take the property of its citizens without fair payment.

Senator Frith: Not the property of the barons anyway.

Senator Kinsella: Throughout the centuries, both the English common law and the French civil law have underscored the principle that the Crown cannot seize the property of the citizenry without fair compensation.

Honourable senators, as I read clause 7 and clause 8, the question of all government under the law comes to the fore. The insidious impact of clauses 7 and 8 of Bill C-22 is to remove government from the authority of law — an impact which speaks against the principle that all government is under law.

As the great Professor Scott has written:

> Many great struggles, many sanguinary battles and many leading cases of common law went to the making of the fundamental principle of the rule of law.

If the rights of citizens are to be determined by law and not by the arbitrary will of governors, there must be independent courts to protect those rights.

One can also wonder and reflect on the public policy impact that lies behind the principles from which clause 7 and clause 8 flow, where we are giving final and supreme adjudication of claims to government. Is there an application of parliamentary supremacy without any restriction or review, thereby constituting an expansion of governmental authority over the lives and welfare of citizens without providing enough avenues to question that authority?

Honourable senators, what are the institutions in Canada for the protection of freedom? The first institution is, obviously, the people. Second, it is the courts. Third, honourable senators, it is the assemblies, Parliament and the legislative assemblies. All three institutions need to be vigilant, need to be active and invigorated in addressing the mal-exercise of power over people.

In this bill, what do we find? We find a direct attempt by the government to seize non-supervised power in the denial of property rights.

• (1550)

Senator Frith: That is not true.

Senator Kinsella: The honourable senator, in interrupting the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, postulated that one can go to court. Indeed, no doubt if such a bill were law, I would suspect that there would be very little difficulty in the courts finding that those sections offend the Canadian Bill of Rights, if not the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I say to the Honourable Senator Frith —

Senator Frith: Bill C-22 is subject to the Charter.

Senator Kinsella: — that it is not only the courts that are an institution for the protection and the promotion of the freedom of Canadians. So also is Parliament. We must do our duty to scrutinize those types of provisions that seek to seize greater power and to remove any oversight. Therefore in a bill such as Bill C-22, our responsibility is greater than normally might be the case.

In terms of public policy issues that arise around this type of legislation, many people have expressed concern that the expansion of government authority can threaten individual rights. A healthy constitutional order should provide enough avenues to question authority, so that authority is considerate of the rights of all citizens and not only the legitimate will of the majority, and of the bureaucrats representing that authority. When this delicate balance is destroyed, order is often sought as an end in itself, rather than as a condition for social good, including individual rights.

In conclusion, honourable senators, there are many questions and challenges that this bill presents around those two clauses. First, is the denial of access to the courts by clauses 7 and 8 consistent with the human rights standards which guide us? Second, are those provisions — egregious, in my view — consistent with the principles of natural justice and the duty to act fairly? Finally, what are the public policy impacts of such provisions that make the minister the ultimate arbiter in matters such as these and, at the same time, deny access to the court should the minister err?

Honourable senators, I submit that these and other questions must be thoroughly examined before we proceed with this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, this bill definitely warrants very close scrutiny. When I say "scrutiny," I hope that our government colleagues will use their common sense.

I will not repeat the points raised by my two colleagues, but I think we should consider that this house represents the last control post before the rule of law, as my colleagues referred to it, applies.

I am sorry to contradict part of what was said by the previous speaker, but although Montesquieu wanted the three fundamental powers of government to be equal, they are not.

In a democracy of the kind we have in Canada, one power is supreme. That supreme power is ours, the power of Parliament.

Senator Thériault: The people are Parliament!

Senator Nolin: I hope this bill will not be ratified in its present form. As soon as it is enacted, the courts will have to interpret it, but they will not be able to make any improvements. This house represents the last wall of defence to protect the public rights we believe in.

To avoid extending the debate, I will skip some of the points I wanted to raise.

I think that consideration in committee will certainly shed some light on the following question: What does this legislation really accomplish? Or perhaps I should rephrase the question: What does it prevent?

This bill contains, and perhaps consideration in committee will shed some light on the subject, what could be called a specific privative clause. After looking at the available jurisprudence, I was unable to find a similarly specific expression in federal legislation.

One occasionally finds such terms in provincial laws. In fact, because of the jurisdictions set out by the Constitution, the provinces have, on several occasions, and the province of Quebec is no exception, used this type of clause to remove certain cases from the jurisdiction of the courts to that of quasi-judicial administrative tribunals.

This bill contains such a clause. We in this house must decide, not the courts which will examine it subsequently once this bill is enacted. Then there will be no more recourse. The courts will have to take it as is. They will interpret it, since that is their duty, but it is our duty to examine every consequence of the precedent the government is asking us to create.

The very first days after it came to power, the government asked Mr. Nixon to examine the agreements to which the bill refers. If Mr. Nixon had decided that anything unlawful had taken place, and this is unlawful in the broadest sense of violating federal law, he could have recommended, first of all, cancellation of the contract, whether or not the contract or the agreements contained a cancellation clause, since the contracting parties always have that option.

If he had found any irregularities of a criminal nature, and there were quite a few allegations, the Canadian police authorities are there to deal with this kind of situation. I wish a commission of inquiry had been able to shed some light on all the unsubstantiated allegations in Mr. Nixon's report.

Meanwhile, I suggest we concentrate on preventing the creation of a precedent in this country. I hope that the Senate committee will examine all the legal implications of this privative clause. I am surprised that over a seven-month period, two of the government's controversial pieces of legislation, and there are not many, would contain this type of clause. One concerned international law and one domestic law.

There is no doubt, honourable senators, that I will try to convince my caucus of the impending dangers. I intend to vote against this bill, and I hope the Senate committee will take all the time that is necessary to examine the consequences of this bill.

I fail to understand why the government is applying its steamroller technique. In any case, in committee we will have plenty of time to question ministers and senior officials of the Department of Transport, the same people who negotiated the original agreements and the same people who advised the new minister and made the recommendations for this defective and dangerous legislation.

I am confident that the committee will be able to shed some light on the most troubling legal aspects of this bill.

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Balfour, debate adjourned.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1994-95

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for the second reading of Bill C-39, An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Bolduc, who was to speak on this matter, has had to go to committee. We have agreed that this item should drop to the bottom of the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order Stands.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION BILL, 1994

SECOND READING

Hon. Colin Kenny moved the second reading of Bill C-23, to implement a Convention for the protection of migratory birds in Canada and the United States.

He said: Honourable senators, I am glad to have this opportunity to speak to this bill, which replaces the Migratory Birds Convention Act. That act was passed by Parliament in 1917 to implement the Migratory Birds Convention, which Canada and the United States had signed the previous year. That convention sought to protect species of migratory birds common to both countries.

The act implemented the convention in three ways: It regulated the hunting and use of migratory birds; it prohibited trafficking and commercialization; and it provided for the establishment of sanctuaries where migratory birds would be safe from human interference.

More than 75 years have passed since the signing of the convention and the passage of the act. In those years, the legislation has served a highly useful function in protecting migratory birds. Today, over 400 species of migratory birds in Canada receive protection under the act. Among them are waterfowl, seabirds, shorebirds, and songbirds. In addition, a total of 101 migratory bird sanctuaries exist in Canada, covering some 11.3 million hectares of territory, an area twice the size of Nova Scotia.

Today, the world community is committed to using natural resources in a sustainable way — in other words, in a way that does not deplete the resources and limit the options of future generations. That commitment was spelled out in the 1992 Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro. One of the major successes of that summit was the Global Convention on Biological Diversity which Canada has signed and ratified. The biodiversity convention is an instrument for advancing worldwide protection of living natural resources, and strong and effective legislation is a key component of the effort.

There are many reasons for protecting our wildlife, and especially our migratory birds. They represent a key part of our heritage and our identity. They give immense pleasure to our citizens and visitors to Canada. There are dollars and cents reasons as well: According to Canadian and U.S. government surveys, in 1991 alone, Canadian and American tourists spent $1.4 billion on recreational activities involving waterfowl, a spending that helps maintain thousands of jobs.

The legislative authority provided by Parliament must reflect the values and concerns of Canadians for protecting our wildlife heritage. It should also be consistent with other federal legislation regulating natural resources and the environment. It must be flexible in its application, and yet provide a strong deterrent to illegal activities.

The amendments have three goals: good law, good enforcement, and good management. Most amendments included in Bill C-23 are of an administrative nature designed to modernize and clarify existing provisions. The more substantive changes include significantly increased penalties for violations, increased flexibility for courts in imposing sentences, expanded protection for migratory birds, and streamlined and strengthened enforcement procedures.

Honourable senators, we must have a law that covers all contingencies and prescribes suitable penalties. The amendments do this by modernizing provisions of the act. As it stands, the act no longer provides effective means or penalties to deter lawbreakers, especially poachers and those who make illegal commercial use of migratory birds.

For example, honourable senators, fines under the existing legislation range from a mere $10 to a maximum of $300. Half a century or more ago that might have been sufficient to make would-be offenders think twice about contravening the law, but certainly not today. The poaching and smuggling of migratory birds is a lucrative and growing business. Growing demand for Canadian species of migratory birds and eggs is increasing their value and could put some species at risk. A serious offence under the act is one in which illegal activity is detrimental to the survival of the species; for example, when the activity involves an endangered species or a large quantity of specimens of a threatened or other species.

For serious offences, the maximum fine will be increased from $300 to $100,000 for an individual; or $250,000 for a corporation, with provisions for increasing fines for continuing or subsequent offences. Fines would correspond to the nature of the offence, and sentences could include forfeiture of weapons, vehicles, boats, aircraft or other things used by those contravening the act. On the other hand, the bill ensures that minor offences could be dealt with by issuing tickets.

The court would also have greater flexibility in imposing sentences by providing court authority for special orders. Such orders can be particularly effective in the case of environmental legislation where those convicted can be ordered to remedy the harm, pay for remediation, avoid activity which could lead to repeated offences, publish the facts relating to the case, or perform community service. They allow the courts to take into account not only the nature of the offence, but also the particular circumstances of the person convicted; that is, it allows for constructive and innovative sentencing.

Honourable senators, in preparing the Migratory Birds Convention Bill, we have been given the opportunity to be forward looking in responding to threats to migratory birds. Consistent with the Convention on Biological Diversity, the sperm, embryos and tissue cultures of migratory birds are now being made subject to the act. These activities will be regulated and managed through permit programs.

Included in Bill C-23 are a number of provisions designed to improve and strengthen enforcement powers and capabilities. These include powers of inspection, search and seizure, forfeiture and disposal of seized items, and other provisions consistent with the Criminal Code, the Charter of Rights and other federal environmental and natural resource legislation.

The Minister of the Environment may also designate persons or classes of persons as game officers. If these people are employed by a province, then designation must be with the agreement of that province. Already, provincial and territorial wildlife agencies work with Environment Canada's Canadian Wildlife Service in migratory bird enforcement. Now, under the amended act, the partnership will be strengthened.

The aim of the amendments is to ensure that migratory bird populations are maintained at sustainable levels. The government has developed the amendments only after extensive consultation with all interested parties. That includes provincial and territorial governments, First Nations, conservation groups, and other non-government organizations. The proposed changes are supported by all provinces and territories and by many other parties.

Honourable senators, the partnership approach is essential for conservation of migratory birds. Neither the federal government nor provincial governments nor, for that matter, governments of other countries can hope to effectively conserve biodiversity in isolation. Cooperation and partnerships are the key to achieving this goal and other goals linked to sustainable development.

From a point of view of both practicality and effectiveness, the issue of enforcement is one which a coordinated federal-provincial approach makes the most sense. There are many other areas for which this approach generates benefits, where objectives and concerns are shared, and where building on each other's strengths through cooperative action improves environmental results.

An excellent example of such partnership is the International North American Waterfowl Management Plan. The plan, originally signed in 1986, is an initiative to protect and enhance wetland and upland habitat on a continental basis to stem the decline of waterfowl. It has evolved from a plan focused on waterfowl conservation to one that incorporates benefits to biodiversity conservation. The plan exemplifies sustainable development in action by working with private landowners and resource sectors to integrate wildlife conservation practices with sustainable economic development, particularly through soil and water conservation initiatives. Partners include the United States federal and state governments, non-government organizations, and all Canadian provinces. As well, Mexico is a full partner, making this a truly continental conservation plan.

On June 9, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment signed the update to the plan extending Canada's commitment for another five years. As the minister pointed out, the success of the plan in the last six years has been to arrest the destruction and loss of wetland habitat for migratory birds. Our common goal for the next five years is to set aside more breeding grounds and to see our skies filled with an annual migration of 100 million birds.

There are many other areas of wildlife conservation benefiting from this cooperative approach. The Canadian Wildlife Service of Environment Canada has established a Latin American program under which we are helping to protect the habitats of our migratory birds that winter south of the U.S.-Mexican border.

We also have a memorandum of understanding with the American and Mexican governments to conserve migratory birds and their habitats in Mexico. The Canadian Wildlife Service helped establish the census of the waterfowl carried out by the International Waterfowl and Wetlands Research Bureau. It is also very active in the Western Hemisphere Shorebird Reserve Network, an initiative that seeks to identify and protect critical areas for the migration of shorebirds. The service works with the United States to conserve song birds through a program called, "Partners in Flight."

Honourable senators, I mentioned that the government has consulted with many First Nations in preparing the amendments to the Migratory Birds Convention Act. We recognize that waterfowl harvesting is an important and essential subsistence activity for many aboriginal peoples, providing a considerable portion of their diet. We know that traditional hunting activities also have a great significance in aboriginal culture.

At present, neither the act nor the Migratory Birds Convention itself provides for certain activities that are protected by aboriginal rights. Amongst these are hunting during the closed season from March 10 to August 31 and the collection of eggs. To accommodate and respond to the traditional practices of Canada's aboriginal peoples, we would have to reach agreement with the United States on amending the Migratory Birds Convention. In this regard, honourable senators, I can advise you that negotiations with the United States will take place this year towards bringing about these changes in a responsible and expeditious manner.

In the meantime, a non-derogation clause is included in Bill C-23 that states:

> ...nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any existing aboriginal or treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada under section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Special enforcement measures that allow continued pursuit of traditional harvesting in the spring and early summer are also in place to address the closed season harvest of migratory birds under the existing act, and also under this bill.

• (1620)

The federal government's aim is to work in consultation and cooperation with the First Nations. Partnership could take the form of co-management agreements, self-government agreements and the wildlife management provisions of comprehensive claims agreements.

The changes we are proposing to the Migratory Birds Convention Act will establish penalties that will make potential lawbreakers hesitate and think again. They will improve enforcement and provide for more flexible management. Above all, they further the partnership we must have to sustain our living wildlife resources into the future. The changes will transform an outdated piece of legislation and make it law for the coming century. For this reason, it deserves the support of this chamber.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Kenny for his full discussion with regard to Bill C-23. I am sure all senators will want to see this bill pass quickly. As Senator Kenny has pointed out, this bill is to repeal and replace the current legislation, which was enacted in 1917 to halt the indiscriminate slaughter of migratory birds.

A comprehensive review of Environment Canada's regulatory programs was conducted in 1993, including a review of the regulations pursuant to the Migratory Birds Convention Act. The review recommended improvements to streamline administration, modernize procedures and regulatory authority and make regulations more enforceable. This bill reflects that review in some detail.

As Senator Kenny pointed out, a striking example is the maximum fines, which were $300 for indictable offenses but are now $250,000 for corporations and $100,000 or imprisonment — or both — for individuals. As Senator Kenny has gone so thoroughly through the bill, I do not think I need to go into it specifically.

I would like to talk about the issues on aboriginal and treaty rights to harvest birds during the closed season and to harvest eggs. This matter was raised in the House of Commons committee by Matthew Coon-Come, the Grand Chief of the Crees. The grand chief underlined the importance of conservation to the protection of the native way of life, as guaranteed by the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement. In these agreements, Canada committed itself to seeking the necessary amendments to the Migratory Birds Convention, in order to ensure that it would be consistent with the provisions made in those agreements.

The Migratory Birds Convention Act includes a provision to implement amendments to the Migratory Birds Convention by the Minister of the Environment, without recourse to Parliament. I assume that this is because the process currently under way to amend the Migratory Birds Convention to address aboriginal treaty rights to harvest birds in closed season and to harvest eggs is not yet completed.

It is imperative — and this is an issue of some concern to the Crees because it has been going on for some time — that, as Matthew Coon-Come pointed out, this legislation not place in jeopardy the subsistence economy of the Crees and of other aboriginal peoples, and that their treaty rights and those under the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement be enshrined in convention amendments.

It is also important to note that the activities of hunters and others should not be allowed to threaten the preservation of wildlife so necessary to the continuance of a chosen way of life for certain aboriginal peoples. It is to be hoped that this legislation will indeed advance both the preservation and conservation of migratory birds, their habitat and the management of wildlife resources to enable people such as the Crees to continue their age-old hunting practices without the decimation of bird populations that is part of modern development. Recent reports in La Presse indicated that 1,000 out of 9,600 bird species, or 10 per cent of our bird population, are threatened or will become extinct in the short term.

I should like to commend the work of Mr. Caccia and other members of the standing committee for amending the bill to include a clause that provides that nothing in this act should be so construed as to abrogate or derogate from any existing aboriginal or treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada under section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Problems caused by deforestation and by urban sprawl, among other things, contribute significantly to a degraded atmosphere for migratory birds. Industrial and domestic pollution are also among the pressing concerns the government must take into account if we are to provide a future for migratory birds specifically, and for our environment in general.

Something the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment said in reference to this bill makes particular sense, as it applies not just to bird embryos and bird tissues but to the theory of island biogeography. He said:

> You can immediately see that as we cut up the forests into smaller and smaller patches there have been smaller and smaller numbers of these birds, and now it is down to a critical level of just a few dozen pair.

He was referring to the Acadian flycatcher.

In my own province, the Oak Hammock Marsh, an internationally known bird refuge, has been somewhat threatened by the establishment of a huge building on the edge of the marsh. Sometimes, in the effort to enhance tourism dollars and development, the wrong things are done. I certainly think this bill is a step in the right direction, and I urge all honourable senators to support it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kenny, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources.

CANADA WILDLIFE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Colin Kenny, moved the second reading of Bill C-24, to amend the Canada Wildlife Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak in support of Bill C-24, amending the Canada Wildlife Act. Wildlife is of immense importance to our country. It is part of our heritage in which we take great pride. For many years, aboriginal Canadians have relied on this resource for their subsistence, and it has had a central place in the tradition and culture of all aboriginal peoples.

For Canadians in general, wildlife-related activity is a highly popular form of recreation; one to which we devote considerable time and money every year. The spending adds up to millions of dollars, contributing to our gross domestic product, creating jobs and generating income and tax revenues.

• (1630)

Canadians strongly support wildlife conservation and look to the federal government to play a major role and catalyze efforts in ensuring the sustainability of wildlife and its habitat.

Bill C-24 is part of the current effort to improve federal wildlife and habitat legislation, including the new Migratory Birds Convention Act, and consultations which will lead to negotiations with the United States later this year on amending the Migratory Birds Convention.

Solutions to conservation issues must be based on good science, consultation, cooperation and agreement. That is why the Canada Wildlife Act is so effective and why, with the amendments proposed in Bill C-24, it will be even more effective.

Parliament passed the Canada Wildlife Act in 1973. It authorizes government to carry out wildlife research and, in cooperation with the provinces, to undertake a wide range of wildlife conservation and interpretation activities for wildlife and its habitat, including the protection of endangered species. It also allows the minister to establish protected areas for wildlife, known as natural wildlife areas. A total of 45 national wildlife areas have been established to date covering approximately 287,000 hectares.

This act does not position the Government of Canada to act alone. It is not possible to impose solutions for the kinds of problems we are talking about here — problems of species loss and habitat conversion, problems of lack of information for informed decision making, and so on. We must ensure that we have come to an informed consensus of the need to take action and we must in fact act together. That is why this act is set up as enabling legislation. That is why it demands that the government establish partnerships with the relevant provincial and territorial agencies and with other nongovernmental partners.

There are many examples of conservation programs, cooperative research efforts and bilateral and multilateral conservation agreements that have resulted from the act's implementation. For example, RENEW, an acronym for Recovery of Nationally Endangered Wildlife, is a cooperative program of the federal and provincial governments and national conservation organizations to develop and implement recovery plans for Canada's endangered species. Under this program recovery teams have been set up for all threatened and endangered species of birds, mammals, reptiles and amphibians in Canada.

Another example is the Canadian Cooperative Wildlife Health Centre, which was established with the provinces, territories and the private sector in 1992, with its headquarters at the University of Saskatchewan Veterinary College and regional centres at the Universities of Prince Edward Island, Montreal and Guelph. This network provides an improved capacity to detect and monitor diseases and impacts of toxic chemicals on wildlife, to investigate specific instances of disease and provide expert advice on the risks to wildlife of genetically engineered microbes and other biotechnology products.

Honourable senators, I referred earlier to national wildlife areas. These are perhaps the most tangible evidence of the Canada Wildlife Act at work. Already this network covers a vast array of landscapes and ecosystems throughout Canada. The wildlife areas support such varied activities as hiking, photography, bird watching, grazing or haying, and hunting, all in a manner compatible with the wildlife conservation objectives for a given area. National wildlife areas can be found from the Arctic to the shores of Lake Erie, from the mouth of the Fraser River to the Bay of Fundy. In every case they shelter nationally important wildlife habitat, the loss of which would have an adverse impact on the Canadian population of one or more species.

The areas serve a second and equally important function, and that is education. They provide sites for wildlife research and they give the thousands of yearly visitors first-hand experience of the beauty, abundance and value of Canada's wildlife. Such places include Cap Tourmente in Quebec, Wye Marsh in Ontario and Last Mountain Lake in Saskatchewan.

Over 20 years have passed since the Canada Wildlife Act came into effect. The legislation met the needs of the 1970s, but we now have new insight into wildlife and what it takes to protect it. We have come to understand the value of an ecosystem approach. In other words, the effort should be to protect not simply individual species, but the entire habitat in which they live.

There are two provisions in Bill C-24 that will significantly enhance the potential scope for establishing protected areas. The first is the expanded definition of wildlife, which now includes not only all wild species of animals, but also plants or other organisms. Traditionally, wildlife conservation has focused on particular species or species groups and has been limited to the higher orders of animals. It is now widely recognized that a broader approach to conservation is needed, an ecosystem approach that considers all ecosystem functions and values, including all animal and plant species and the full range of their habitat requirements.

Expanding the definition of "wildlife" is consistent with the recommendation of the Wildlife Policy for Canada, which was endorsed by the Federal-Provincial Wildlife Ministers Council of Canada in 1990. It will allow for research and for the establishment of protected areas based on an ecosystem approach, and will respond to the recommendations of the Convention on Biological Diversity dealing with habitat and ecosystem conservation.

The second change introduced in Bill C-24 that affects the scope of protected areas is the provision allowing for the establishment of protected areas beyond the territorial sea to the 200-nautical-mile limit. Critical wildlife habitat, including areas with significant concentrations of sea birds and breeding and feeding grounds for whales, exists or extends beyond the territorial sea. Such areas include seasonal or permanent openings in sea ice, where birds, whales, polar bears and other wildlife concentrate, and underwater mountains, upwellings of nutrients in the ocean and other areas associated with Canada's continental shelf. Protecting these key areas would contribute to sustaining the biodiversity and associated economic benefits of marine ecosystems.

The amendments also improve administration and enforcement in several ways. All of the existing provisions for administering and implementing the act are being updated, streamlined and made consistent with other federal conservation laws.

As in Bill C-23, penalties will be made much more severe so that they present real deterrents to those who might consider poaching or destroying wildlife habitat. Penalties for serious offences will be increased to a maximum of $250,000 for corporations and $100,000 for individuals, or imprisonment for up to five years, or both. On the other hand, for a minor offence an enforcement officer could issue a ticket to be paid directly.

Courts will also have greater flexibility in applying the act. For example, court orders could be issued to prohibit the continuation of activities harmful to protected areas. Persons who have damaged habitat in national wildlife areas could be forced to pay the cost of restoration or remediation. Judges would also have the option of sentencing a person convicted of an offence to performing community service or to remedying the harm caused by the violation, thus providing practical conservation benefits.

As I have stated, the value of the Canada Wildlife Act is that it provides a basis for research, partnerships and cooperation. The amendments included in Bill C-24, which I have just described, present a new challenge to Canadians to be successful in understanding and protecting ecosystems and their biodiversity, including moving into the area of marine protected areas, and will require new and innovative partnerships involving a wider range of people than has been the case in the past. Broad-based strategies of a cooperative nature must be developed to ensure that both environmental and economic objectives can be met.

• (1640)

I am convinced that Bill C-24 will help to achieve these ends, and I strongly encourage members of the Senate to support it.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I support this bill, as I think should all honourable senators on all sides of the house.

As Senator Kenny pointed out, Bill C-24 generally amends the Canada Wildlife Act to strengthen protection of wildlife and to streamline administration of the act. It is important to emphasize that the changes being introduced include elements necessary to make the legislation consistent with the Wildlife Policy for Canada, adopted in 1990 by the Wildlife Ministers Council of Canada, which is made up of the federal and provincial ministers responsible for wildlife. The bill also makes the act consistent with the International Convention on Biological Diversity which was ratified by Canada in 1992 under the then Minister of the Environment, Jean Charest.

It should be noted that the Wildlife Policy for Canada recognizes that a broader approach to conservation than before is needed, as well as an ecosystem approach that considers the functions and values of all ecosystems, including all animal and plant species, and the full range of their habitat requirements. Although not ideal, this bill is a step towards improving the legislation to protect wildlife.

Expanding the definition of wildlife to include all wild organisms will enable a shift in research and conservation efforts toward an ecosystem approach. Provision to allow for the establishment of protected areas within the areas bounded by the Territorial Sea and the 200-nautical-mile limit will contribute to sustaining biodiversity and associated benefits from our marine ecosystems through protection of habitat critical to survival of certain species such as whales and sea birds.

More appropriate penalties and use of enforcement powers consistent with other legislation is also helpful.

Both the Canada Wildlife Act and the International Convention on Biological Diversity acknowledge the benefit of Canada's wild animals and plants and the need to sustain these for future generations. The Wildlife Policy for Canada proposes that legislation be effective in conserving wildlife; in ensuring that all uses are sustainable; and that penalties provide an effective deterrent to the illegal use of wildlife.

The convention ratified by Canada requires that countries regulate or manage biological resources to ensure their conservation and sustainable use and that countries establish a system of protected areas to conserve biodiversity. It is to be hoped that this legislation will help to ensure that these values, as expressed in policy and conventions, are upheld in protected areas such as Banff, where further development will most certainly destroy the existence of the world's last great area of large mammals in their wild habitat.

Environmental problems are not random occurrences or the consequence of specific mistakes. They are a pattern of cumulative damage generated by a structure of abuse founded on our general approach to economic activity. I think this approach is certainly changing, certainly as expressed in the policy statements of government. A number of non-governmental groups will be inspired by this legislation. I am thinking in particular of a group in Calgary which is committed to establishing a protected area from Yellowstone to the Yukon, a huge area, to protect large mammals. Canada is the last country in the world to have such a resource.

I commend the government for bringing this legislation forward. I certainly intend to support it. I hope that other senators will do the same.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kenny, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1994

SECOND READING

Hon. Joan Neiman moved the second reading of Bill C-40, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies and errors in the Statues of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in those Statues and to repeal certain provisions of those Statutes that have expired, lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-40 is a culmination of a procedure that was instituted in the Department of Justice some years ago. It is really a housekeeping project that is undertaken by the Department of Justice periodically, perhaps every second year or so, in which the department asks all other departments of the government to send it notices of errors, omissions and anomalies that may be contained in legislation for which they are responsible.

The Department of Justice collects all these proposed amendments in one draft bill which is sent, simultaneously, to the House of Commons and the Senate. As it states in the summary of the bill, they must be of what is called a "non-controversial" nature. They cannot involve the expenditure of money from the public purse. It is provided further that, if they do not meet this criteria, then the proposed clause or amendment is dropped automatically from the draft bill.

Over the years, bills of this nature have been referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. They are sometimes as large as the Ottawa telephone book. It was an enormous task to try to go through them. With each struggle we managed to surmount, we would eventually make recommendations on how the procedures could be simplified and how we could be helped in understanding what these amendments were all about. In that regard I wish to commend the Department of Justice because it has done a splendid job in carrying out the requests we have made of them in presenting bills such as Bill C-40.

Before us today is a relatively small bill which contains 78 amendments affecting 36 different federal statutes. The draft bill came before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee on June 2, at which time we heard from officials of the Department of Justice and others who explained the clauses with which we had difficulty. I must say there was very little in that regard this time around. We did not find one clause with which we could take any exception. As our report states, we agreed that the draft bill be reported without amendment.

Having gone through this bill, I have come to the conclusion that it is in exactly the same terms as the draft bill which we studied clause by clause in the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I have discussed this matter with the chairman of the committee, Senator Beaudoin, and we have agreed that, under the circumstances, it is unnecessary that it be referred to committee. I am sure Senator Beaudoin will confirm that himself.

That being the case, I would recommend that the bill not be sent to committee but that it be given third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I agree completely with what Senator Neiman said.

I think my colleague Senator DeWare has a few words to add.

[English]

• (1650)

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, this is the eighth bill of this kind since 1977 that has come before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

As Honourable Senator Neiman has said, the bill will correct irregularities, inconsistencies and errors in several laws. It does not infringe on anyone's rights, or cost any money, or create any new offences.

These amendments also went through the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs before being referred to the Senate, and to our committee here. There is no need for further debate. We concur with the passing of this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Gigantès, that the bill be read the second time now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Neiman, bill placed on Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADA STUDENT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès moved the second reading of Bill C-28, an Act respecting the making of loans and the provision of other forms of financial assistance to students, to amend and provide for the repeal of the Canada Student Loans Act, and to amend one other Act in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I am delighted to speak to you in support of the Canada Student Financial Assistance Act, Bill C-28, the purpose of which is to provide needy students with the assistance required to help them pursue their post-secondary education.

This bill is a key component of the youth employment and knowledge acquisition strategy which has been adopted to expand the opportunities open to Canadians in school and on the job market. The financial assistance for needy students which this bill provides is a step in the right direction.

Allow me, first of all, to briefly review the history of the Canada Student Loans Program. This program was created in 1964, when the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson was Prime Minister and there were only six teams in the National Hockey League.

In the years that followed, Canadians started flocking to colleges and universities, and it was feared that some would be denied access to post-secondary education for lack of money. The federal government responded to these concerns by establishing the student loans program. Over the years, more than two million students have received assistance under this program to attend educational institutions in Canada and abroad.

The situation has changed drastically since 1964. The post-secondary education system has grown impressively and now has more students than ever before. The number of older students is increasing steadily, and some have dependants. The structure of the family has also changed, and economic realities — including the cost of college and university studies — are very different from what they were 30 years ago.

The Canada Student Loans Program did not follow this evolution. The time has come to reform and modernize this government student assistance program to meet the challenges of the 1990s and beyond. That is what Bill C-28 proposes to do by improving assistance measures and benefiting the neediest, by helping alleviate the repayment burden, by providing for new financing agreements, by laying the foundation for the harmonization of federal and provincial student assistance programs, and by ensuring that the program is flexible enough to explore an income-based repayment formula.

It is urgent that we update and improve the student assistance program. We cannot afford to wait any longer if we want to meet the needs of today's students. The current government got elected by promising to count on Canadians to give renewed hope to the population, and that is exactly what this bill would do. To ensure our future prosperity, we must count on Canadians.

Over the years, the issue of student assistance was the subject of a number of consultations, studies and reports. Everyone — students, parents, interest groups, colleges and universities — was consulted. All recognize that the government must improve and diversify its program. Other studies are not needed. The time has come to take action.

Bill C-28 draws on the success of the Canada Student Loans Program. The basic principle remains the same: to help needy students. The bill also benefits from the excellent cooperation established from year to year with the provinces to deliver assistance to the students. I want to point out in passing that participating provinces play a determining role in implementing the program, as they determine what students are eligible, assess their financial needs, deliver student loan certificates and accredit educational institutions. They also have their own assistance programs for needy students.

Federal-provincial cooperation in the field of student financial assistance extends to Quebec and the Northwest Territories, both of which have opted out of the federal program. In return they receive alternative payments to operate their own student financial assistance plan. The opting-out clause remains intact in the bill. Pursuant to this provision, Quebec received $72 million in payments this year and the Northwest Territories, $800,000. In fact, the alternative payment formula has been extended to include new program components and to ensure that students from all provinces and territories benefit from the reforms. Provincial officials have spoken enthusiastically about the importance of the federal program and about the excellent degree of cooperation in this area. Their wish is that the bill be passed as soon as possible.

The ten-year freeze on loan amounts clearly shows that the Canada Student Loans Program is not up to speed as far as today's realities are concerned. Students have paid the price for the restrictions and for the government's refusal to come up with new and innovative approaches. They are demanding increased financial assistance to offset the effects of the ten-year freeze on loan ceilings and to cover higher tuition fees and education costs.

The bill meets their expectations. The weekly amount of full-time student loans will increase considerably, from $105 to $165. Part-time students will be eligible to receive $1,500 more for their studies, and will benefit from an improved assistance program.

Students also called for a diversification of assistance measures to meet the special needs of disadvantaged students. Special initiative grants will cover part of the extraordinary expenditures incurred by disabled students, part-time students with very limited financial resources and women enrolled in doctoral studies in certain fields.

The method of determining the financial assistance needs of students must also be updated. We must make certain that financial assistance goes to those who need it most. A new needs assessment method that is objective and takes regional differences into account has been developed jointly with the provinces and will make it possible to award assistance fairly and uniformly.

I repeat, a new needs assessment method that is objective and takes regional differences into account has been developed jointly with the provinces and will make it possible to award assistance fairly and uniformly. This is another example of cooperation between two levels of government for the benefit of Canadians. Regardless of what part of the country they are from, students merit equal treatment in order that they may take advantage of educational opportunities.

Students demanded better repayment conditions, which this bill provides. Deferred grants will reduce the indebtedness of the neediest students who have to borrow the most money. The current interest-free provisions, which apply to unemployed borrowers, will be extended to borrowers with low-paying jobs.

The new financial agreements constitute one of the principal measures of this reform package. Negotiations on these agreements are under way with two major lenders, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and the Royal Bank of Canada. Under the new financial agreements, all eligible students will continue to receive loans, and borrowers will be given repayment conditions tied to their income levels.

In addition, replacement of the 100-per-cent government loan guarantee with a risk premium for lenders will considerably lower costs to taxpayers. The minister responsible has indicated a willingness to have a wide range of lenders participate in the program, under the same conditions as will be negotiated with the major lenders.

This bill would also increase the harmonization of federal and provincial student financial assistance programs. By rationalizing the financing and administration of the program, we can work to improve services to students and to reduce costs to taxpayers.

Furthermore, the reforms will allow the federal government to put in place pilot projects with interested provinces to explore the principle of income-based loan repayment. The federal government is aware that this issue deserves a more in-depth review, but that international experience in this regard is recent and incomplete. The pilot projects will provide data allowing the government to make decisions. The will to look at new ways to approach student assistance reflects the government's openness to new ideas. We owe it to Canadian students and taxpayers to consider new ways of helping students.

Who will benefit from these measures? Today's students are the sons and daughters of our neighbours, our relatives and our friends living in cities and towns across the country. They also include older Canadians pursuing or, in certain cases, starting advanced studies. What they want, and what this bill offers, is a chance to pursue their studies and improve their lives.

Let us try to put faces on these people. Let us think about the single father or mother who wants to enrol in a community college in Nova Scotia and who will be eligible for a new federal subsidy. Let us think about the handicapped worker who wants to get an engineering degree at a university in Ontario and who will now receive a subsidy to help pay for the special equipment he or she needs, in addition to loans for tuition fees and living expenses. Let us think about the high school graduate from Saskatchewan who wants to enrol in a farming program and who can now get enough help to achieve his dream thanks to a debt-reducing deferred subsidy. And let us not forget the student from British Columbia who has the ability and the will to earn a doctor's degree and who will now be able to afford it.

In short, the improvements proposed in this bill will benefit all kinds of students from coast to coast: men and women, students at the undergraduate, graduate and postgraduate levels, young and old, from urban and rural communities. They have in common the simple fact that, without the federal government's help, they would be less likely to pursue their studies.

Questions were raised in the other place about the regulations under this bill, and I would like to take a moment to tell you about them.

These regulations are needed to give the Student Financial Assistance Program the required latitude. This latitude is particularly important in the field of student financial assistance because this aid must be adaptable to meet students' changing needs. Students cannot afford to wait, and the regulations will provide for the adjustments and modifications that will be required in the future.

I will repeat the last sentence. Students cannot afford to wait, and the regulations will provide for the adjustments and modifications that will be required in the future. We will feel our way a little, we will try some things out but we will make adjustments to serve students better.

The government believes that higher education is still a step in the right direction. We will continue to encourage and support the efforts of Canadians who want to begin an education or training course to improve their qualifications and their employment prospects. This bill will help hundreds of thousands of students fulfil their dreams of higher education. They are counting on us.

The reforms in this bill are positive. They fill the gaps in the Student Financial Assistance Program and take advantage of its strengths. The bill sets high standards for cooperation and creates an enviable precedent for innovative partnerships among educational institutions, lenders and governments. Above all, the bill is good news for needy students.

Honourable senators, I am proud to speak in favour of this bill and I hope that it will be passed quickly so that we can deal with the task of helping Canadians realize their tremendous potential.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, would Senator Gigantès agree to a question on the excellent speech which he has just given?

Senator Gigantès: If you want to torture me with questions, go ahead, sir.

Senator Beaudoin: Is the federal government active in this field? Normally, I believe it intervenes using its spending powers, which is easily justified in a federation.

Am I to understand that Quebec has opted out and receives a certain amount of money annually? Are relations between Quebec and the central government in this regard excellent — quite positive, in fact?

My question is strictly for the sake of information. I am very interested in the university community, personally. I thought that was exactly what you said, but I wonder: Can you confirm that things are running smoothly in practice?

Senator Gigantès: That is exactly what I said. Quebec decided to opt out and receives an amount equivalent to what it would have received had it remained in the program. Quebec administers the whole program on its own. As you say, relations are quite positive; it is a honeymoon of sorts. Let us hope that this sets a precedent for all the other little ills. It is a sign that, if we want to get along together, we can do it.

• (1710)

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, as Senator Gigantès has pointed out in his presentation, it was in 1964 that Canada introduced the Canada Student Loans Program to provide low-income students with the opportunity for higher education. Now, 30 years later, the program is in desperate need of reform. Recent world trends, with intense global competition and increased emphasis on knowledge-based industries, have made higher education even more valuable in the Canadian economy.

Moreover, as job retraining becomes more and more important in the fight against unemployment, the loans system must be reformed to address the growing number and special needs of mature and part-time students.

Furthermore, over time it has become apparent that certain groups require additional assistance — those students traditionally underrepresented in Canadian universities and colleges — and that their needs must be met if Canada's commitment to provide the right to education for all of its citizens is to be taken seriously.

With the Canada Student Financial Assistance bill, the government is hoping to solve many of the problems that have plagued the Canada Student Loans Program in recent years. They have raised loan levels for full and part-time students as a response to the growing cost of post-secondary education. They have created "special opportunity grants" to aid those persons with disabilities and high need, part-time and female students who are traditionally underrepresented at the post-secondary education level. They have allowed the provinces to test alternative financial schemes on a pilot-project basis in search of new ways to provide more students with access to university, while at the same time saving taxpayers' money. However, raising loan limits and creating special opportunity grants are not enough to meet the growing needs of Canada's university and college students.

The government's proposals address only those concerns that are found at the surface. The present government has chosen to ignore the real problems that lie at the core of the Student Financial Assistance Program, namely, those of accessibility and freer education. The government has chosen to ignore the demands of our nation's students and university administrators, who want lasting, effective change that will make our loans system better so it can immediately meet the demands of the next 30 years. In choosing short-term gains over long-term losses, the government has implemented changes that seem to amount to little more than "Band-Aid solutions for gaping wounds."

As a result, this reformed financial assistance program begs numerous questions that demand government clarification and response. From the beginning of the loan process to the very end, problems arise and remain unsolved. The process, honourable senators, begins with the designation of an appropriate authority. According to Bill C-28, the minister may, by order, designate an appropriate authority for a province. This marks a departure from the existing act, which leaves the responsibility for choosing a designating authority to the provinces. Some commentators might suggest that this represents another form of centralization that many of us have found unsatisfactory in the past, not only in this area but in many others.

By allowing the federal government to play a role in the designation of appropriate authority, Bill C-28 raises several fundamental questions that we should look at. For example, clause 4 defines the appropriate authority as a body which designates educational institutions for the purposes of the program and is monitored by the duties and functions listed in the bill. The regulations need to be looked at. However, the bill provides no indication of the nature of the relationship between this authority, which may or may not be private, and the federal government. Could patronage play a role in the designation of an appropriate authority? Who will pay this authority for its services? How much will this body receive? Moreover, could the appropriate authority and the lender be the same body? Is there any protection within the legislation that would prevent this potential conflict of interest?

Above all, the bill neglects to specify what rules and regulations will govern this relationship between the minister and his or her designated authority. Clause 4 states:

> The Minister may give directives to any appropriate authority respecting the exercise or performance of any of its powers, duties or functions under this Act or the regulations, and such directives are binding on the appropriate authority.

The use of the term "may" suggests that such "directives" may or may not exist and are dependent on the mood of the minister of the day. Does this mean that the Minister of Human Resources Development will provide directives from the outset of the program, or will he wait until there is sufficient political pressure to place additional restrictions on the activities of the designating authorities? What type of directives does clause 4 refer to? Will they be made public to protect the rights of students if and when they are established? Finally, what will guarantee that any directives that are established will not be overturned by a succeeding minister?

The next step in the process is that after the designating authority has been appointed and the institutions eligible for inclusion in the Canada student loans system have been selected, the student in need of assistance is able to apply for one federal-provincial loan. He or she is immediately subject to two eligibility requirements. First, the student must meet a satisfactory scholastic standard, although neither the definition of "scholastic standard" nor the criteria have yet been established.

Appearing before the committee in the other place, the Minister of Human Resources Development insisted that academic marks would not be a requirement for eligibility for a federal student loan. While refraining from listing the criteria under consideration by the provinces and the federal government, the minister argued that passing a minimum amount of courses may be one prerequisite for future loans. However, without a firm stance on eligibility entrenched in the legislation, the government is providing false assurances. The minister cannot guarantee that marks will not be a factor for eligibility, should the number of students seeking financial assistance sharply increase and new criteria are needed to reduce the number of eligible applicants.

As a result, this bill has left many student, university and college organizations still wondering whether or not a student's academic performance will be a determinant for financial assistance.

The bill neglects to provide safeguards against discrimination on the basis of the course of study the student has selected. There is concern that potential doctors, nuclear physicists and social justice advocates might be more likely to receive a certificate of eligibility than students studying literature, music and art.

Clearly, honourable senators, we must guard against decision-making on an anti-intellectual basis. We must preserve the freedom of education to which we are committed as well as the coveted multicultural and multi-talented nature of our nation. We want to ensure that the Aristotles and Socrates, or the Michelangelos and Raphaels of our society will receive the same support as our Einsteins, Lester B. Pearsons and John Diefenbakers.

Furthermore, students applying for loans are doing so because they require financial assistance to further their education in a society that largely demands that they must earn a degree or diploma. Why, then, should scholastic achievement have any bearing on the decision to provide a student with the opportunity for a higher education?

This brings me to the next criteria for student loans. Clause 12 specifies financial need as a factor for eligibility, yet the bill does not give us a clear definition of need or criteria for needs assessment. The government, apparently, is not in a position to offer any indication of what factors will be considered in the final assessment of need. One might ask whether fishing boats and farmland would be considered as assets, although the family fishing business or farm does not turn a profit. Will saving for retirement and guaranteeing their future well-being through RRSPs penalize students and/or their parents? Furthermore, will parental assets be included in the assessment of need, or will students be considered as independent? Both uncertainty about the criteria for eligibility and the multitude of regulations within the proposed system have heightened the urgency for an appeal mechanism at the federal level.

On the point of regulations, I again draw the attention of honourable senators to a bill that is totally dependent upon subsequent regulations to make the new process that is proposed functional. Unfortunately, we do not have a draft of those regulations to examine, so in a sense we are being asked to make a great leap of faith. However, when we have a system such as this bill proposes, allowing for judgments to be made over the adequacy of an applicant with criteria which are not clear at this stage, the propensity for error is large. Clearly the urgency for an appeal mechanism becomes all the more great.

Currently, students who are refused loans are referred to a provincial appeal body for reconsideration. This bill proposes a certain streamlining of the federal and provincial loan system. With that streamlining of the two loans systems and the increased power for the Minister of Human Resources Development, now seems to me to be an appropriate time to establish such a body at the federal level to ensure fair and equal consideration for all appeals. As part of our commitment to the right to education, we must provide the machinery for appeal to protect our students against the infringement of that right.

Beyond the immediate question of eligibility is the broader question of privacy. The privacy of students and their parents must be protected. Performing needs assessments and enquiring about scholastic standing clearly invades this privacy to some extent. Consequently, safeguards must be put in place to prevent the dissemination of this confidential information to individuals or groups that do not possess the authority to determine loan eligibility. However, when we examine the bill — and we have not seen the regulations — we find that there is no provision of any guarantee to ensure this right to privacy.

No safeguards exist to prevent a lender from accessing personal information, although they are unable to refuse a certificate of eligibility, nor does this legislation even define which authorities would have access to the information. Similarly, there are no provisions to guard against confidential financial and scholastic information being put into an unsecured data base. As we know, in a technological world such as ours, these issues must be addressed to preserve the privacy which we have learned to expect and enjoy.

Honourable senators, at the next stage in the process, when the students are finally granted a certificate of eligibility, they encounter more barriers that must be dismantled before they can realize their goal of higher education. What seems simple to the government has now become a long, arduous process for the student. Now they must raise the money necessary to cover any additional expenses related to their education. Prior to this bill being amended in the other place by the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development, the cost of books and supplies, as well as tuition, would have been subject to a ceiling under the terms of the needs assessment policy and procedures manual. When the cost of university and college exceeded these limits, students were forced to seek additional assistance elsewhere. The AUCC, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, found this restriction decreased accessibility to Canada's post-secondary institutions. Those students who worked part-time or received awards to pay the costs beyond the ceiling, found that their total loan entitlement was reduced by 80 per cent of the dollars earned as a result of this extra effort. Fortunately, this provision has been amended, although the amendment must be reworded to prevent any problems of interpretation from arising. It will be the Senate's duty to ensure that no ceilings will be placed on the academic-related costs of post-secondary education.

When the student becomes eligible for financial assistance, the student enters into a relationship with the lender who provides the financing and delivers the loan. Under the current Canada Student Loans Program, student loans are financed and distributed by two separate entities acting for either the provincial or the federal government. The proposed reforms in Bill C-28 seek to alter this arrangement. According to the press release that accompanied the introduction of Bill C-28 in the other place on May 9:

> The proposed legislation will enable the government to enter into arrangements with provinces to streamline the financing and delivery of student assistance programs.

By virtue of this bill, eligible students would benefit from what we have come to call "one-stop shopping." whereby they would receive one federal/provincial loan and have one repayment scheme. Consequently, eligible students should enjoy more effective and efficient access to their loans in the future. However, similar agreements between private lenders and the provinces have produced contrary results.

Just before Christmas last, the New Brunswick government signed a five-year deal with the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce to take over the student loans business, hoping to ease the financial burden of the loans program and provide better service for its post-secondary students. However, after the holiday season, students were faced with week-long waits for their loans, as the CIBC suffered service problems in the delivery on their loans from Burlington, Ontario. An editorial in The Brunswickan, which is the student newspaper at the University of New Brunswick, explained the problems associated with such a delay. It stated:

> As students were returning to university reeling from the financial burden of Christmas, to delay the receipt of the loan for even a few days — never mind a week — was to create an unnecessary hardship for students.

Given a similar agreement is being negotiated between the CIBC, the Royal Bank and the federal government, it is my submission that the government must provide guarantees that a repeat of this scenario which occurred in New Brunswick will not happen. Students have far more important things to worry about than the delay caused by such an event.

Honourable senators, Bill C-28 requires more elaborate explanation of the powers of the lending institutions. Will they, for example, have access to credit information? Will they be obligated to provide counselling for first time borrowers, and clearly inform all students of their rights and obligations as borrowers and the services to which they are entitled? Moreover, there is concern that a lending institution will be able to refuse to provide a loan or terminate a lending relationship with an eligible student.

Appearing before the House of Commons standing committee, a representative from the credit unions felt a student could be denied a loan because a particular branch's loan portfolio had reached its limit. He argued that while the government insisted an eligible student would not be refused a loan, there is nothing in this legislation that prevents a lender from sending a borrower across the street. For the student living in a small town with one bank or credit union, this would cause unnecessary frustrations. Thus, we may wish to ask the government to provide safeguards against the rejection of loans for eligible students.

Honourable senators, once the student has received his or her loan from the lending institution, the student is able to pursue his or her course of study. However, suppose the student becomes disillusioned and unhappy with post-secondary school and decides to drop out. Once again, confusion reigns. How and when will the government realize that the student is no longer attending a designated institution of higher learning? What would happen if the student decides to return to university or college in the fall? Will the student still be entitled to receive a student loan?

Perhaps the student requires an additional credit to meet degree requirements, but decides to stretch that credit over the course of an entire year to avoid paying back previous loans. Would the student be obliged to start paying back his or her loan, or would the taxpayers continue to pay his or her interest as he or she dodges payment?

Perhaps the student does graduate, but intends to start another degree after taking a leave of absence for a semester. For the purposes of loan collection, when has this student completed his or her studies?

While the government believes its reforms to the Canada Student Loans Program will help make loan collection easier, there is no shortage of questions as to when such collection would begin, and when the borrower would cease to be a student. These two must be answered before our country's student financial assistance scheme can be reformed.

Honourable senators, the beginning of loan payments to the lender marks the end of the federal loans process, but not an end to the problems surrounding the bill. Under the proposed legislation, the student would formulate a repayment scheme with the lender that would be sensitive to variations in his or her income. Furthermore, in periods of unemployment or low income, the borrower would be able to defer payments for a period of 18 months. Thus, if a student's income stays relatively low, it could take 25 years for the borrower to repay the balance of his or her loan. In fact, with accumulated interest, low-income borrowers with heavy debt burdens due to exceptional need assistance during their post-secondary careers would be forced to pay more than their colleagues who earn more money and have smaller debts. This, some might suggest, is not quite fair.

The Canada Student Loans Program, as honourable senators will know, was established to provide financial assistance for low-income students, but the net effect might be that it penalizes them for their need, or because of their need.

Instead, honourable senators, the Canada Student Loans Program should be revamped to ensure that the loan principal is reduced so that students are not burdened with debt well into the future. By focusing on the repayment of the loan rather than the mere payment of added interest, we are providing our former students with the opportunity for a prosperous future. Purchase of retirement savings plans or entering the housing market and the automobile market will not be possible if Canadian students are faced with lifelong student debts.

We must be concerned, honourable senators, with the debt burden that our graduating students are facing. One of the net effects of increasing the access to loans is that, at the end of the day, you are creating an increase in the debt burden of these students. It is our duty to provide our students not only with accessibility to post-secondary institutions, but also with the opportunity to prosper. In this respect, some might suggest that Bill C-28 fails.

Much of what I have said, honourable senators, has focused on specific or projected problems with the proposed reforms to the loans process. We cannot ignore the larger social issues that must be considered when we speak of changing the way we provide financial assistance for students in this country. Reform of the Canada Student Loans Program extends well beyond the issue of accessibility to our higher institutions of learning. It is, honourable senators, a question of promoting the social, economic and cultural development of our nation.

Canada has long recognized it to be a fundamental right in our democratic society that all citizens should be able to develop their full potential through an advanced higher education system of high quality which is open and accessible to anyone who can benefit from attendance. Canada affirmed this commitment by way of the ratification in 1976 of the United Nations International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. That treaty articulates economic, social and cultural rights as human rights.

However, at page 83 of the report of the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on that topic — co-chaired by our distinguished colleague Senator Beaudoin — the committee denied economic, social and cultural rights as being human rights. They said that they were some kind of privileges. That is clearly wrong. The covenant that I just cited has been recognized, not only in terms of principle, but in terms of international law. Article 13 of that treaty provides that:

> Higher education shall be made equally accessible to all, on the basis of capacity, by every appropriate means, and in particular, by the progressive introduction of free education.

Honourable senators, this is an undertaking that the Government of Canada made in signing that treaty with the support, in writing, of every government in Canada in 1976. Thus, when we look at ways to reform our loan system, we must first ask ourselves a fundamental question as to whether or not we are trying to ensure that post-secondary education becomes progressively freer. To answer that question, we must ask yourselves whether the system of loans we have developed has made it more costly to attend university and colleges than it was 20 years ago.

Since 1976, the cost of attending university, as we know, has skyrocketed. In the last 10 years alone, tuition has doubled. Moreover, we are witnessing — and this is a matter of grave concern to students, to university administrators and to the public — a great variation in the level of fees from one university to another across Canada.

In their presentations to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Human Resources Development, the Fédération de la jeunesse canadienne-française explained the financial hurdles that face students from Quebec when they try to pursue post-secondary education outside of their province. As honourable senators know, students living in Quebec are living in a province where tuition fees are the lowest in the country. These students often cannot afford to attend, for example, the University of Nova Scotia, where tuition fees are about $1,000 a year higher. This startling difference in the cost of university fees from province to province, and from university to university within provinces, demonstrates that Canada has a long way to go on the road to free and equal accessibility to our institutions of higher learning. We want our students to be able to seize the opportunity to study wherever they wish in Canada, and sometimes within another culture. Hence, we must ask if our financial assistance scheme provides that opportunity, and if it does not, how it can be changed so that we may fulfil our commitment to the United Nations' Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and, more important, to our citizens.

Honourable senators, perhaps we need to initiate a national debate on the matter of fees in our universities, a debate on the control of fees and, indeed, perhaps a program re-evaluation of universities and colleges, the manner in which they are administered and the manner in which they assess costs. Are universities too costly or not costly enough? Have we ensured that our post-secondary educators have received sufficient scrutiny in terms of costs, efficiency and the other tests that are needed to be applied in a fast-moving society where resources are under such pressure?

Furthermore, we need to explore new ways in which we can educate our students. Perhaps the loan system has failed to achieve its goal of fair and equal accessibility because there is a fault within the university system itself. We need to ask ourselves what has driven the cost of higher education so high, and whether or not we could be getting more for our money. We should explore new avenues of education that meet both our goals of freer education and the efficient use of taxpayers' money. Perhaps we should ask why it takes three or four years to receive a bachelor's degree when year-round programs may require less time to earn a degree while saving money.

These are questions we cannot be expected to answer today, but they are the types of problems we should be trying to solve for the future. In the meantime, it is our duty to ensure that students get the best possible chances at the post-secondary educational level. In this regard, we must keep a close eye on the administration of the proposed loans program to ensure that our goal of free accessibility is not compromised. Through, particularly, the scrutiny of regulations governing the administration of the federal loans program and through testing new ways of distributing financial assistance to our students, we can protect the rights of our students now and in the near future.

Where do we go from here, honourable senators? The next step for the Senate will be to study the policy issues and the particulars which lie at the base of our examination of Bill C-28, in order to see that the bill will achieve the objectives of greater accessibility and, at the same time, ensure the fairness of the system. So many regulations will have to be drafted in order to implement and deliver the program — and we have not seen a text of those regulations — that in committee we will want to ask a number of questions of technical detail about those regulations, and perhaps find a solution to the need for oversight. Perhaps the committee will examine ways in which the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations may play a role.

I know that the major stakeholders in university communities are supportive of the bill, and we look forward to examining some of these technical matters in detail in the committee.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have a quick question for Senator Gigantès. I was reminded of something while he was speaking. Last August, obviously just before the election call, the then government proposed a series of reforms to assist students. He must have been aware of those reforms. Does this bill bear any resemblance to those reforms of last August? I suppose I am asking for a memory test, since I cannot remember.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I am sorry I do not remember those reforms. I am sure it is something that can be examined in committee. I am grateful to Senator Kinsella for raising all of these points. They illustrate that when we are dealing with human beings, young people and older people who are trying to utilize education in order to fashion their lives in the future and to carve careers for themselves, that there are no predictors as to which educational equipment will help you, because change happens so fast.

Of necessity, it is not possible to produce a simple system of rules that will operate in the same way for everybody. Therefore it must be tentative, and the bill must say, "We may have to change the regulations as we go along in order to adapt. We may have to change the legislation as we go along, as we are doing now."

As for the business of finding a central federal provision that will provide an appeal mechanism and that will provide a common standard of cost, we must not forget that we live in a federal system, and that within that system education is a provincial jurisdiction, jealously cherished, protected and defended by the provinces. In consequence, every step of the way there will need to be agreements as between the federal government and the provinces.

These agreements may vary from province to province. As Senator Kinsella was saying, Quebec has the lowest university fees of any province. On the other hand, Quebec pays less to its physicians in health than other provinces. The problem there is, what happens when a Quebecer needs medical care outside of that province? Often the doctor in Ontario does not make a fuss and accepts what the Quebec health service is prepared to pay.

I was fascinated while in Switzerland to discover that they have an education system so decentralized that it is not even at the level of the canton; it is at the commune level, the municipality level or the level of the agricultural regional community. It is a bizarre system. You have two neighbouring little rural communes, and the children start school at a different time and have different passing marks. Necessity is now leading them to collaborate so as to have standards that are compatible with those of the European Community, because the Swiss want to be able to trade with the EC. If they want to have technical standards that correspond to those of their main trading partners, they will have to have educational standards.

These communities that have so jealously preserved their educational independence are being pushed towards a certain agreement. I frankly think we would have fewer problems in Canada if we stopped saying "national standards" and started saying "international standards." It is one of my little ambitions, because no province would be able to say, "You are forcing me to do what other provinces are doing. This is my little jurisdiction."

The world is forcing us to change. We have outside pressures; we have the impossibility of predicting the future, the impossibility of students of whatever age being able to predict what will be best for them, and it is difficult to produce legislation that will meet and answer all the very pertinent questions Senator Kinsella has raised.

• (1750)

It is perfectly legitimate to send this bill to committee where we can ask for whatever detail and clarification the officials can give us. They have studied this issue and discussed it with the provinces. They will know a little more.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Senator Gigantès, should this legislation pass, when does the government want it to be implemented? Does it want it to apply for the academic year 1994 or 1995?

Senator Gigantès: I think the government would like it to be in place this fall so that the needs of students can be met immediately.

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this legislation to change the Canada Student Loans Program. I would like to make it clear at the outset that I intend to support this bill because there is much in it that is not only desirable but urgent and necessary.

The Student Loans Program has needed serious revamping for some time. There is general satisfaction that action is being taken to increase weekly loan limits to better reflect the costs that post-secondary students must bear in the 1990s to pay for their education.

I note that there have been discussions with the provinces about this legislation and that provincial governments support those changes. Their support is echoed by university and college associations and by some, although not all, student groups. There are commendable provisions in Bill C-28 to provide increased support for disabled students, for female doctoral students in some fields of study, and part-time students who constitute an increasingly significant proportion of post-secondary enrolments.

Having said that, there are some provisions of this bill which create uncertainties which concern me, and other elements which I consider simply undesirable. I shall mention the uncertainty features only briefly and concentrate my attention on the undesirable ones.

There is considerable discretion left to the minister in this legislation, particularly with respect to the negotiation and regulation of financial arrangements with lending institutions. In effect, the government is privatizing the Student Loans Program and the responsibilities for collection of student loans, while still providing some guarantees both that those loans will be made and that interest will be paid.

I have heard some horror stories, particularly in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but also in other provinces, about students' experiences in dealing with lending institutions. I would hope that the federal minister and the provincial governments will heed students' complaints about those experiences and avoid entering into any long-term agreements with lending institutions without a thorough assessment of the performance of those institutions in adhering to the spirit of the Student Loans Program.

There are four other issues I would like to raise in conjunction with this bill which I regard as quite serious problems that I hope the government will consider.

The first is the potential for development of massive student debt. After four years of studies a student could be left with a debt of $22,000. That is a tremendous financial obligation to be faced by a graduate just entering the workforce, and quite possibly considering marriage and starting a family. That debt, according to a government spokesman, could be reduced by $6,000 to about $16,000 for what we might call "good behaviour," that is, fulfilling academic standards and graduating on time. On the other hand, the debt could also be increased if a student takes more than four years to complete a degree or takes additional loans to take courses during the summer.

In any case, we are contemplating graduates with very large debt loads at the beginning of their careers. I ask you to consider that this might be a very daunting prospect, particularly for students in Atlantic Canada who face graduation into a labour force with the highest unemployment rates in Canada, the lowest wages, and the least appealing job prospects. That would discourage many young people from taking post-secondary training.

My second concern is the potential, as a result of this legislation, for large increases in tuition fees at post-secondary institutions. This is particularly true because of the income-contingent repayment schemes which Bill C-28 encourages the provinces to experiment with as pilot projects. I will not go into details of the operation of those pilot projects, but I would like to consider the possible results. If the ICR loans result in drastically inflated tuition fees, that will mean that more and more students are forced into taking larger and larger loans to finance their studies. At the end of those studies, they will face larger accumulated debts to repay as a result of the ICR experiment. There was much discussion on this issue during committee proceedings in the other place.

I apologize, honourable senators, because I cannot give you specific page references to the testimony at those hearings. I have had to rely on preliminary, unedited transcripts. I can report, however, that the question about pressure from massive tuition increases was posed to several witnesses. The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada strongly endorsed income-contingent repayment and called it "the single most important advance that could be made over the remainder of this decade in student aid in Canada." However, when asked about the potential for large increases in tuition fees, that association ducked the question. The response of the spokesperson was:

> I would urge you not to see a role for the government of Canada in setting tuition fees. This is a matter that should be dealt with at the provincial level... it's a matter that should be dealt with at the individual institution within each province...

Other witnesses were less equivocal. One was Mr. William Smith, the Assistant Deputy Minister for Education and Labour from the Province of New Brunswick. He stated the following:

> In terms of the relationship between student aid and university financing, I'm afraid I was initially of the view that the lobby for income-contingent repayment was largely designed to create a way of allowing increases in tuition fee revenues to replace operating grant revenues which have been restricted by financial circumstances of government. I think these are separate but related issues and I do think that is something that this committee ought to be somewhat leery of, is the relationship between student aid and the tuition fee question and the university financing question in general...

I have concerns with the levels of debt we are seeing, that the income-contingent repayment schemes, at the percentages of income being discussed, just won't handle those levels of debt and need to be rethought.

Another witness was Mr. Fred Hemingway, Chief Executive Officer of the Student Finance Board of the Government of Alberta. Last year the Alberta government commissioned a consulting firm to review the loan repayment process and Mr. Hemingway offered this observation:

Our province suggests caution in two program areas identified in Bill C-28. The bill provides for pilot projects on income-contingent repayment. Income-contingent repayment programs were examined as part of our student loan repayment review, which I mentioned earlier, and were rejected by our consultant and by us due to the likelihood of increased cost to government in the long term.

Our consultant also felt income contingent lending does not promote responsible credit behaviour and would lead to repayment terms of twenty to thirty years for many students. Such plans would also create a powerful incentive to raise tuition levels, and this could have an impact on access to post-secondary study, especially for students from low-income families.

While such plans may be attractive in principle, we have no evidence they are financially sustainable over the long term. The evidence we have is the total debt students could incur for tuition and living costs cannot be reasonably managed and repaid under current income contingent repayment models.

With respect to the debt load, under ICR programs, that, of course, would depend upon the design of the program itself. There have been many, many different options put forward in terms of what that design might be.

Most of the ones we've heard talked about, talk about students borrowing the total cost of their education to cover not just living costs, but tuition costs as well. If that were to occur — in Alberta today, for example, the cost of attending a four-year university undergraduate program exceeds $35,000 and if tuition levels were to increase substantially, that could go to at least $40,000 to perhaps $45,000. There is no question that level of debt load we don't feel is sustainable.

• (1800)

I suggest, honourable senators, that these statements from two provincial governments which have initiated research on ICR programs should act as a strong warning to us about the potential implications for creating truly frightening levels of student debt.

Third, I have a concern about the way in which different provinces will react to the proposed new levels of student assistance. Bill C-28 envisions a 60-40 split in funding between federal and provincial governments. It is not at all clear at this point that any province will be able to come up with the money to fund its 40-per-cent share of this increased student assistance. If it does not, then federal funding will decline accordingly. The 60-40 split, as I understand it, would be maintained, but the total assistance available to the student could be substantially lower in Newfoundland and Labrador and in other poorer provinces than in those provinces whose treasuries allow them to match the total available federal funding.

What we could well see is that the poorer students in the poorer provinces have the least access to loan and grant funds to finance the education in which they are most in need. This is hardly a measure to promote greater equality of access to higher education.

Finally, I am especially concerned about the effects of larger student loans and higher tuition fees on one particular group — adult students. As the Minister of Human Resources Development, Lloyd Axworthy, noted in his speech in introducing this bill in the other place:

...increasingly, Canadians born in the fifties and sixties are also returning to school... This means that we must provide substantially better support for part-time students or for adult returning students.

That is an understatement. In fact, the government is actively encouraging older workers or, in the case of fisheries workers, forcing them to retrain and get better education to qualify for other jobs and careers.

It is a frightening prospect for a young student in her twenties to graduate with a debt load of $20,000 or $25,000, or more if they do post-graduate work, and then begin looking for a job that will gradually enable repayment of that debt. However, it is even more frightening for an adult aged 40 or 50, with family responsibilities and a mortgage to pay, to take on that same debt knowing that she might have only 20 more working years to repay it while trying to save for retirement.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, the Student Loans Program needs fixing. It needs that fixing quickly in order to provide more available financial assistance for needy students in time for the next academic year. For that reason, I support Bill C-28, but I do so with many serious reservations about the effects this legislation will have.

I sincerely hope the government will pay heed to these concerns and consider further changes to the Canada Student Loans Program to remedy these problems.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Gigantès, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, as it is now six o'clock, according to our rules —

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Your Honour, it has been agreed by honourable senators not to see the clock.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell moved the second reading of Bill C-30, to amend the Department of Labour Act.

He said: Honourable senators, first, I want to congratulate the Acting Speaker on his promotion to the Chair. I should like to say how good he looks in the Chair. Perhaps in the future we will see him there permanently, once he learns both official languages.

Honourable senators, I have moved the second reading of Bill C-30, to amend the Department of Labour Act. This bill will enable the government to assist older fish-plant workers who find themselves unemployed because of the dramatic decline in the East Coast fishery.

These are among the most difficult circumstances in which any group of Canadian workers have ever found themselves. I ask honourable senators to imagine for a moment having their very livelihood, the profession they have toiled at for many years, suddenly taken away from them. That is the situation in which the hard-working men and women of the Atlantic fishery now find themselves. As we know, the groundfish are depleted. It will be quite some time before stocks replenish and workers will once again be able to make a reasonable living from that industry.

In the meantime, the compassionate thing to do is to help these people who, through absolutely no fault of their own, find themselves unable to earn a living. That is what we are doing now.

Under the program known as the Atlantic Groundfish Strategy, the government is addressing the plight of some 30,000 fishers and fish-plant workers. Known by the acronym TAGS, the strategy is a $1.9-billion, five-year program that took effect May 16 of this year.

The strategy is a fine example of this government's new spirit of cooperation. Before Minister Axworthy and Minister Tobin announced the initiative in April, federal officials carried out an extensive consultation with governments in the Atlantic provinces, as well as fishermen's associations, unions, industry representatives, fishing community representatives, and other interested parties.

• (1810)

The strategy has two major components. One is the responsibility of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Groundfish, essentially cod, will not return to their previous levels. The honourable minister is faced with the enormous challenge of reducing the industry capacity by 50 per cent and rebuilding a fishery that will be economically viable and environmentally sustainable for decades to come.

The other component contains labour adjustment measures that will assist fishers and fish-plant workers in developing careers outside the fishery. The eligibility of fishers and fish-plant workers to receive labour adjustment assistance will be based on the individual's historical attachment or dependence on the groundfish industry.

The great majority of workers who qualified for assistance under the strategy were already receiving assistance under the former government's temporary initiatives known as the Northern Cod Adjustment Recovery Program and the Atlantic Groundfish Adjustment Program. These programs expired May 15 and TAGS came into effect on May 16.

The Minister of Human Resources Development is responsible for the labour adjustment component. Unemployment insurance agents will help eligible participants determine their immediate possibilities for employment and plan new careers. They will assist former fishers and fish-plant workers in setting goals and developing plans to reach those goals. The objective is to help individuals adjust out of the fishery and into long-term, satisfying jobs.

That is an overview of the current situation in the Atlantic groundfish industry and the measures that the government is taking to address these dire circumstances.

One component of the Atlantic Groundfish Strategy is the Fish Plant Older Worker Adjustment Program. As its name implies, this plan addresses the predicament of older workers who have spent virtually their entire lives in the fishery and, realistically, have few prospects of finding new jobs. I ask honourable senators to note that, at the federal level, Human Resources Development and our provincial partners are responsible for the program, which applies only to older fish-plant workers. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is consulting with its partners to develop a similar program for fishermen and women. Income assistance for older fish-plant workers will be jointly administered by the Department of Human Resources Development and the provinces. Program costs will be shared 70 per cent by the federal government and 30 per cent by the provincial government.

Under the Department of Labour Act, the Minister of Human Resources Development, with approval of the Governor in Council, has authority to make income assistance payments to eligible TAGS participants who are between the ages of 55 and 64, inclusively.

Through extensive consultations with its partners, the government has come to realize that it is more realistic and beneficial if we extend adjustment payments under TAGS to eligible plant workers who are at least 50 years of age on May 15 of this year. They do not qualify for assistance under the current legislation, thus the importance of Bill C-30.

Bill C-30 will amend the Department of Labour Act to include unemployed fish-plant workers at the lower age — that is, at least 50 years of age as of May 15 of this year — and who are participants in TAGS and are eligible for older-workers' assistance. To ensure that the program is not abused, the federal government is proposing strict criteria. To be eligible for benefits, first, a person must have been determined eligible under the TAGS program. Second, the individual must have been a fish-plant worker. Third, he or she must have a long-term attachment to the groundfish industry. Fourth, the person has to be out of a job because of a permanent reduction of the work force at the fish plant. Fifth, that permanent reduction has to be a result of the decline in the fish stocks.

Honourable senators, the government estimates that there are approximately 1,200 unemployed fish-plant workers who qualify for special adjustment assistance. Of that number, about 700 would have reached the age of 55 by May 16 of this year when the Atlantic Groundfish Strategy came into effect. The government estimates that an additional 500 workers will reach the age of 55 during their entitlement under TAGS. It is those 500 dedicated men and women that passage of this bill will help.

I implore my honourable colleagues to demonstrate their compassion for the horrendous circumstances these men and women are facing. Not only have individual lives been disrupted, but, because the fishery is the major industry in Atlantic Canada, entire communities are in peril as well.

Providing income assistance to older workers will recognize their years of contributing to Canadian society and will enable justifiably proud men and women to maintain their dignity. I appeal to the benevolence and understanding of honourable senators. I know that they will show their concern and support for the passage of Bill C-30.

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-30 and equally pleased to be able to say that I support the government's willingness to bring forward this legislation.

This amendment to the Department of Labour Act will enable the government, in cooperation with provincial governments in the Atlantic region, to offer some measure of financial relief to a particularly disadvantaged category of workers.

I recognize the Department of Labour Act at present gives the government the opportunity to offer assistance payments to former employees between the ages of 55 and 64. This amendment will allow the extension of benefits to fish-plant workers between the ages of 50 and 54 on May 15 of this year.

I noted that there was some opposition to this amendment expressed by the spokesman for one of the opposition parties in the other place. I quote from the representative for the constituency of Delta, B.C., in his statements, on pages 4533 and 4535 of the House of Commons Hansard on May 27, 1994:

> We suggest that the bill is defeatist, that it shows a lack of faith in people.
> The government would have Atlantic Canadians living dependent on government handouts and in a constant state of instability.

Honourable senators, these government handouts will amount to only 70 per cent of the NCARP unemployment benefits currently available, up to a maximum of $1,000 a month. That is not what I would call an excessively generous handout.

I was glad to see the representative for the constituency of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception point out in the debate in the other place that the official unemployment rate in Newfoundland and Labrador now hovers at about 25 per cent; but the unofficial rate, the real rate of unemployment, is over 50 per cent in our province.

In the face of that, it is unseemly for a representative from a province with an unemployment rate of only 9.2 per cent to complain that 50-year-old fish-plant workers who have devoted decades of their lives to productive work should be denied assistance when they are displaced from their jobs in an economy where there simply are no other jobs available.

This program is also voluntary. Older fish-plant workers who want to benefit from alternative training and career planning initiatives may choose to do so. Some of those former fish-plant workers in Atlantic Canada may choose those other options. Many will take advantage of this new program.

I sense that some of the newer elected representatives from other parts of Canada still need to be educated about the magnitude of this issue and the extent of the displacement of individuals and communities in our region as a result of the fisheries closures.

I do have two reservations that I would like to voice. One specifically concerns this bill, and the other one is more generally on the subject of unemployment in Atlantic Canada.

Bill C-30 provides for 70-per-cent funding of assistance by the federal government for workers aged 50 to 54 with the balance to be funded by provincial treasuries. It is estimated that this program will cost the federal government $60 million, though it is not clear over what period of time those costs will be spread out. The government also estimates that 1,200 older fish-plant workers will benefit from this program, 75 per cent of them in Newfoundland and Labrador. By my calculations, this means a total cost of $25.7 million to provincial treasuries, $19.3 million to the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

In the aftermath of the recent provincial budget which included very serious expenditure cuts, I have some concern about how the provincial government will find the additional funding for this program. I note, however, that both Premier Wells and Fisheries Minister Walter Carter were cited by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Human Resources as being supporters of the program, as were the representatives of the industry workers. I presume that the provinces anticipate savings in social welfare expenditures to defray the costs of this program.

My other concern is more general and more serious. It is ironic, to put it very mildly, that we should be debating Bill C-30 in the aftermath of our debate on Bill C-17, which will have such a damaging effect on payment of unemployment insurance benefits in Atlantic Canada. There is certainly no question about where the federal government is finding the moneys to fund the expenditures envisioned by Bill C-30. The money taken out of Atlantic Canada by Bill C-17 will fund many expenditures of the magnitude expected in Bill C-30. Critics who complain about hand-outs to the Atlantic provinces should realize that the money saved in the Atlantic region by the cuts to unemployment insurance in Bill C-17 will more than pay for the expenditures involved in Bill C-30. Taken together, these two bills underline the failure of the government to stimulate the creation of new employment opportunities in the Atlantic region, a failure that is admittedly shared with previous administrators, both federal and provincial.

To return to Bill C-30, the member for Bonavista-Trinity-Conception in the other place also mentioned in his contribution to the debate that there are, or were, 57 fish plants in his constituency. In the province of Newfoundland and Labrador there are, or were, hundreds of fish plants which, in turn, supported the livelihood of thousands of individuals and families and hundreds of communities. Bill C-30 is as much about the future of those communities as it is about the individuals and the families who will be supported by this amendment.

This added income, small though it may be for a small number of former workers, may also give help to the little corner stores, the gas stations, the schools. In short, the communities will be able to survive.

Honourable senators, I commend the government for this legislative initiative, and I intend to support it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, before we talk about when this bill should be read a third time, I am very pleased to note that the Acting Speaker is from Newfoundland, the opposition member supporting the bill is from Newfoundland, and the seconder is from Newfoundland. I, as a Prince Edward Islander, would say that since everyone is in favour of the bill, perhaps we could go straight to third reading.

However, since it is not Senate policy to do that, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, to be reported upon as soon as possible.

On motion of Senator Bonnell, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Senator Lewis: He is not here.

Senator Bosa: He is not here, but he can read my answers in Hansard.

Senator Corbin: You should wait for him. It would be rude.

Senator Bonnell: Why don't you table them?

Senator Bosa: I see that I am getting a great deal of support from my colleagues. Having observed that, I will stand the matter until tomorrow.

THE HONOURABLE HEATH MACQUARRIE

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, anyone planning to make a speech in this Chamber of Great Expectations was always wise to check the Orders of the Day to make certain one's path of oratory would not take him or her close to Macquarrie ascending. To each his own vanity is fair enough, but she or he who is foolish enough to invite comparison with a silver-tongued devil is asking for trouble.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is not necessarily what he says that does you in; it is how he says it — the whisper that gathers resonance until it fills the space, and wakes the few unsuspecting tourists in the gallery. Because that is the sound of truth, and you had better believe it.

Actually the spell — the Macquarrie spell — begins before a word is spoken. While the innocent, complacent rookie who has not checked the Orders of the Day drones on, one senator is already elbowing another to look that-a-away, Macquarrie's way, until all eyes are upon the master intent on building his lectern.

It has often been said here — whether true or not he may at last tell us — that Heath Macquarrie chooses his lectern building blocks to match his themes — engineering manuals to underpin his very personal evaluation of the fixed link, the Oxford Book of Quotations to rip the toga off an attempted riposte from Senator Frith, and so on.

I am close enough to all of this scene-stealing to believe what my eyes tell me: that the stuff of this construction appears to be mostly Foreign Affairs Committee silage, with padding, as needed, from half-hearted Hansards of the GST debate, which even when new were useless to Macquarrie.

Sometimes his podiums — or is it podia? — lean or teeter, but even if they fell 'twould be no disaster. Heath scarcely scans the written words atop his personal Towers of Pisa — solemn pronouncements on fragile peace in the Middle East; high wind of reform of his country, his Senate, his party, his very own good intentions.

In his autobiography, he tells of the answer he gave to the clichéd question: "What is the first thing you would do if you were Prime Minister?" Quicker than a Prince Edward Island professor, he answered: "My first move would be to appoint myself to the Senate."

Heath campaigned openly and actively for a Senate seat. He was terrified that he would be eliminated from the race if historical selection methods in P.E.I. were followed. Fortunately for him, and for us, they were not. On September 17, 1979, his wife Isabel came home to find a bottle of champagne on ice in the back kitchen.

Has there ever been a senator who brought so much academic, literary and political experience to this place? He attended four universities in three provinces and has lectured in at least five universities in four provinces, as well as abroad. He attended his first party meeting at the age of 11. He won the great Prince Edward Island constituency of Queens for the first time at the age of 38, and was re-elected seven times after that.

He has written a fine history of the Conservative Party; he has edited Robert Borden's memoirs; he has written his own political memoirs. He has been published in numerous publications, including learned journals. He is a voracious reader. In his maiden speech in the Senate in October, 1979, he even admitted to having been a reader of both Hansards for many years. In that same speech, he said something about the Senate which is as appropriate today as it was 15 years ago. He said:

> I may be many things. If I am here with you, if God gives me health for the next 15 years, I may become a consistent advocate of certain things, but I am a great believer in Edmund Burke. You do not discard the institution. You subject it to these great qualities and you end up with his judgment when he said that all government, all virtue, every positive act is founded on compromise and virtue...the art of government, surely, is compromise, common sense and adjustment.

Senator Macquarrie has never hesitated to criticize his party when he feels it is straying from certain basic principles. Titling his memoirs Red Tory Blues sums it all up. His advocacy of recognition of the plight of the Arabs began at a time when, to use a faddish term, such causes were "politically incorrect." This only spurred him on, for Senator Macquarrie is truly a man of principle and of conscience. He adopts difficult causes and unravels complex situations.

He recognizes the significance of dropping a colleague a short note of encouragement, for he is very sensitive to the feelings of others.

By the way, our colleague believes, too, that the Senate is the superior House of Parliament. He tells you why in Red Tory Blues, his popular political memoir, in which Prime Minister R.B. Bennett is given a whole page to talk about the abuses of capitalism and big business.

When you have read — or reread — Red Tory Blues, it is almost certain that you will come away convinced that whatever new tasks Heath and the effervescent Isabel Macquarrie undertake on behalf of their country, they will be spoken of here in the present tense; a vigorous, affirmative tense for Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I, too, rise today to pay tribute, and I must say reluctant tribute, to our honourable colleague and friend Senator Heath Macquarrie, who will be leaving this chamber as of September. I say "reluctant tribute" because, Senator Macquarrie, you and I go back on this Hill a very long time. It saddens me to think that I will be looking across at the other side of this chamber and not seeing you here.

Senator Lynch-Staunton said that one is impressed with Senator Macquarrie even before he speaks. That is absolutely right. He has been that impressive figure with the umbrella and beret, trotting along the highways of Parliament Hill. He also dazzles one and all on Parliament Hill in his kilt, as a fashion statement.

However, honourable senators, it has always been the smile and then the words, because Senator Macquarrie has always been a wordsmith. As well as being instructive, it has always been a pleasure to listen to the speeches of Senator Macquarrie, whatever the subject.

In his maiden speech in this place he said:

> I am here as what is called a Red Tory... if it means I have compassion for those in society who most need help from the government... then I am; if it means I believe in the value of historic tradition and the honourable process through time and valuable institutions, I am that too.

That sums up for us all the attitude that Senator Macquarrie has brought to public life, and the personal independence which has guided his actions through thick and thin these many years.

As was noted, Senator Macquarrie came to the Senate in October 1979, but this was after serving as the member of Parliament for Queens—Hillsborough, Prince Edward Island, for over 22 years. This morning, as I was contemplating saying farewell this afternoon, I had a chat with Senator Macquarrie's most recent successor, George Proud, who is the Liberal Member of Parliament for Hillsborough. As I spoke with George, I got the distinct impression that he wished he could come into this place this afternoon and pay his own tribute. Without hesitation he said, first, "Heath is a master politician." He told me of the networks that Senator Macquarrie had built up in Prince Edward Island, in Ottawa and in the party.

George had another life before politics. He told me that he would quietly and secretly come to Ottawa on business. He would register in the hotel and, as soon as he entered the room, the light on his phone would be flashing and it would be Mr. Macquarrie who had, through this astounding network, charted his course across the country from Prince Edward Island. Mr. Proud also said that his friend was a great Maritimer, a great Scot and an Islander with a great heart. As the current member of Parliament for that constituency, his goal is to be as good a member of Parliament as Heath Macquarrie was for the people of that part of Prince Edward Island.

Senator Macquarrie's career did not begin in Parliament, although a good deal of time has been spent here. Prior to his career here, he was a member of the Board of School Trustees for the City of Brandon, Manitoba, he was National Vice-President of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, and he held several offices in constituency and provincial organizations associated with his party.

As Senator Lynch-Staunton said, Heath Macquarrie has been a staunch supporter of the upper house throughout his career. He is described by some as "provocative and fiercely patriotic," and he has certainly been outspoken in his high regard for the Senate and its work. He once commented that it was "unfortunate that we live in a society which disregards and devours the past."

In his maiden speech in the Senate, he spoke of his pride and honour at being summoned to this chamber, which he called "the oftentimes misunderstood and sometimes abused" Senate. He also touted Senate committees as the most "efficient and valuable committees of inquiry and investigation of any deliberative body" that he had ever known.

Honourable senators, he should know about those committees, because he has served on so many of them over the years, including the committees on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, Internal Economy, Aboriginal Peoples, Fisheries, National Finance, Transport and Communications, and the Joint Committee on the Parliamentary Library.

When he came here, he brought not only 22 years of political experience in the House of Commons with him, but also a lifetime background in the field of education as a public and high school teacher in Prince Edward Island, as an assistant professor of economics and political science in New Brunswick, as a visiting lecturer to many universities, as a professor of political science and international relations in Montreal, and as an instructor of international relations at Carleton University here in Ottawa.

Senator Macquarrie's compassion for people was very evident throughout his affiliation in many areas of foreign affairs with organizations such as the African Student Foundation, the Canadian Diabetes Association, the Canadian Human Rights Association and also in the Canadian branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and the Canadian Bureau of International Education. He has also been truly committed to the people of all of Canada, and has demonstrated his great admiration for our political institutions and processes by always carrying out his responsibility with honour and dedication.

There is much more to Heath Macquarrie than a chronological listing of his career and his achievements. His love for Prince Edward Island and its people goes beyond words. During our exchange on the fixed link resolution earlier this year, we all understood that the concerns that he expressed were rooted not in politics but in his concern, his anxiety for the future of the unique experience that is Prince Edward Island. To him, it is as distinct as any other spot on the face of the earth, if not more so. It is not merely a place for him to call home. He has always spoken about it as a way of life and love. It is this that he is so determined to protect, and we all understood the passion with which he spoke in that debate.

Senator Macquarrie, as we also know, and this has been said before, is a genuinely humorous and engaging individual. His love of discourse, not only speechmaking but also debate, is legendary on Parliament Hill and his genuine interest in people is evident from even the most cursory relationship with him.

Yesterday, honourable senators, we spoke about what Newfoundland had lost with the death of Frederick Rowe. Today we speak about what we in the Senate will lose and miss with the departure of Heath Macquarrie. Our loss, however, will be Prince Edward Island's gain.

I believe that Senator Macquarrie will never retire. I do not think it is in his psyche to retire. He will continue to promote the best interests, not only of that province, but also of the whole country, which he has served with such distinction and great care.

Senator Macquarrie will continue to brighten the lives of everyone he meets — Scots or otherwise.

All of my colleagues join with yours, Senator Macquarrie, in wishing you much health, great happiness in the years ahead, and good times for you and your family.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have often thought how unfortunate it has been for Parliament, for the country, and certainly for my party, that Heath Macquarrie and other talented Conservative MPs from the class of 1957 and 1958 have never had the opportunity to serve in ministerial office. He and they would have made a most impressive cabinet. However, it was not to be.

During their first six years in the House of Commons, they had to yield to the seniority of older Tory MPs who were chosen for Prime Minister Diefenbaker's cabinet. Then came 16 years in the ranks of opposition. Such are the fortunes of politics and of life.

As a pillar of the Presbyterian church, Senator Macquarrie will be familiar with the reminder in the Book of Ecclesiastes, that "Time and chance happeneth to us all, however swift, strong, wise, understanding or skilled we may be." Time and chance turned in his favour in 1979. Although he had not run in that election, a Conservative government came to office and Prime Minister Clark appointed him to the Senate before the new Parliament met. Thus, Senator Macquarrie's service to Parliament has been uninterrupted since 1957.

He has never been given to narrow or excessive partisanship, but his party loyalty is strong. He has given generous service to the national party organization on its policy committees for many years, on its party constitution committees for many years, and as a trusted interlocutor with its youth wing during most of his political career. He knows how to play the political game and he is a formidable campaigner. Ask any of the candidates who opposed him unsuccessfully in eight general elections.

Throughout his career he has attracted loyal followers to his side and to the ranks of the Conservative Party. Over the years hundreds of young people on the Island and hundreds more on university campuses across the country have looked to him as a mentor and friend.

In many different ways Heath Macquarrie is a wonderful asset to the Conservative Party, even when — perhaps especially when — he has been somewhat out of line with the mainstream thinking of the party. I will not go so far as to say that this has been a common occurrence in his career, just that I have lost count of the number of times that it has happened. Indeed, on occasion he has managed to offend both the leadership and the rank and file of the party at the same time. In the Conservative Party that is quite an accomplishment!

Whatever the issue and however uncomfortable the disagreement, respect and affection for him have remained unimpaired, because his integrity and sincerity are unquestioned.

Honourable senators, in 1937 the then Governor General of Canada, John Buchan, went to Charlottetown and delivered a speech that for many years was reprinted in the old high school "readers" of poetry and prose for Canadian students. The speech was entitled, "Island Magic." In it, Buchan spoke of local patriotism and of a wider "patriotism of humanity." He said:

> I do not think you can exaggerate the value of this local patriotism.

He then added:

> The man who has it is at home in the world, for he has his roots deep down in his native soil.

Such a man is our friend Senator Macquarrie. Sometimes his many local, national and international interests have happily converged.

I saw an illustration of this in 1983, when the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs travelled to five countries in the Middle East. We met two kings, one president, one prime minister, leaders in politics, business, the military and education. Senator Macquarrie was easily the most experienced and best informed among us on the great issues that faced that part of the world and he did us all proud. There was another issue on his mind. It concerned problems that had arisen in the marketing of Prince Edward Island potatoes in Saudi Arabia. No time was lost and not an opportunity was missed by Senator Macquarrie to raise this problem with our hosts in Saudi Arabia. I do not know whether the members of the Saudi Royal Family and other important people that we met there had been familiar with the problem before our arrival, but I can say with certainty that Senator Macquarrie got their attention. This is the essential Macquarrie. The true nationalist, true internationalist, but ever mindful of his duty to his beloved Prince Edward Island.

Finally, honourable senators, I can only acknowledge, because I could never find words to express myself adequately, my own gratitude to Senator Macquarrie and to his wife, Isabel, for the warm friendship and hospitality that they have accorded me, as so many others, for more than 30 years.

• (1350)

Senator Macquarrie has been an adornment to Parliament and to Canadian politics. I am proud to have been his colleague, and, like many others inside and outside this place, I am proud to be his friend.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have had a longstanding association and friendship with Senator Macquarrie. I will not tell you the number of years we have been associated, but I will say that we both had hair when the association began.

Both Heath and I were surprised to be elected in 1957. Heath described himself as being a political scientist. As honourable senators are aware, political scientists are long on theory, but very short on the practical aspects of politics. Heath had a very efficient secretary, Bonnie Howatt, and she and I were given the task of making a practical politician out of Heath. This involved a lot of serious discussions, a bit of scheming and a lot of laughter. I must say that Heath proved to be a very apt student, because he kept coming back, election after election, until he retired to become a professor at Mount Allison University, which later honoured him with an honourary doctorate.

I think of Heath as a scholar. He was an ardent supporter of the Learned Society. He, as the leader has mentioned, completed the definitive work on the life of Sir Robert Borden. He published his own memoirs, Red Tory Blues. He covered that book, I think out of respect to the rest of us, in a blue cover, and that made it seem that much more interesting to me.

Heath also wrote numerous articles for papers such as the Christian Science Monitor, articles on international affairs. It always seemed strange to me that such a devout Presbyterian would be publishing articles in the Christian Science Monitor.

Someone mentioned Senator Macquarrie's speaking tours on behalf of the Conservative Party, particularly when the Conservative Party was in one of those frequent periods when we were low in the polls. Heath used to go out on speaking tours. It was amazing how the polls improved after one of those tours.

In spite of all these extra activities, Heath always found time for his House of Commons duties. No one ever contacted him with any complaint that did not receive a reply, and, if anything could be done to assist that individual, Heath would assist him.

Frequently, I meet people in the Charlottetown airport and they comment on what a nice airport it is for a small town like Charlottetown. I always tell them to forget the brass plaque on the wall that states who opened it, because the credit for that airport belongs to Heath Macquarrie, and he leaves behind not only the Charlottetown airport as a token of his efforts, but many other projects on Prince Edward Island, and we appreciate them all.

He is very proud of his Scottish heritage. I have a suggestion for the reception this evening, and that is that we have a piper and have Heath show us how young he is, because he can still perform Scottish dances. I think we should have a piper for this evening, and I hope our leader will look after that detail. Perhaps that is the whip's job, so I will pass it to him.

Throughout his career Heath was always fortunate to have the advice and the backing of his charming wife, Isabel, and his children. I am sure Heath would be the first to give them credit or partial credit for his great success in the political life of Canada.

Heath, I wish you a very long, healthy retirement. It is my hope that we will have the pleasure of seeing you and hearing you at many Conservative gatherings in the future and that you will continue to be as eloquent as you have been in your first 75 years. I wish you all the success in the future, my friend, and thanks for our friendship.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Senator Macquarrie, I want to thank you for having been here while I was here. You have pleased me, entertained me and enlightened me. I cannot add anything to the political praise heaped on you by Senator Murray as regards your judgment. He is right and it is wonderful. I should simply like to say that you are a scholar, a gentleman and a statesman, and you have added lustre to scholarship, statesmanship and gentlemanliness.

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, I should like to add my tribute to those already expressed. Senator Macquarrie has been a neighbour of mine on the second floor of the East Block since my appointment as a senator eight years ago, and it has always amused me and seemed appropriate that his office was just down the hall to that of Sir John A. Macdonald. There are a number of similarities, and I suspect that, if Sir John were here today, they would have been getting along just fine.

Senator Macquarrie has been a very loyal, energetic and dedicated member of Parliament. It is no wonder that he commanded the support of his constituents for so many years. What I have always marvelled at is his ability to articulate his case intelligently and with humour. While he did not speak often in this place, when he did, people listened to the elegant presentation which always added significant value to the debate.

I view him as an exceptional parliamentarian, but he is more than that. He is a talented and masterful author and a wonderful teacher. I am told his students at Mount Allison University looked forward to going to his classes, knowing full well that they would receive great value from his lectures.

I wish him well during his retirement. I hope that he will continue to participate in the public affairs of this country and that he will find something that will keep his interest for a long time to come.

Finally, I know he will understand how sincere I am when I say I remember him as one who was there when it counted. May he visit the second floor in the East Block on many occasions in the future. I know he will certainly be welcome. This is one Red Tory who is feeling blue because Heath Macquarrie will no longer be with us in this place.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should also like to say a few words about Senator Macquarrie, but from a different perspective. He and I live in the same apartment building, and I have met him quite a number of times in the swimming pool. He is quite a sportsman, you know. We have walked together from the apartment building to Parliament Hill on a number of occasions. He is most conscious of the environment and clean air and, to that end, he mapped out a route in order to avoid breathing the exhaust fumes from the multitude of cars that are on the streets from the apartment building to Parliament Hill.

• (1400)

What I admire most about Senator Macquarrie is his ability to articulate his ideas and his thoughts. He is most erudite. I tried to learn from his English in the course of our walks. From time to time we would discuss literature. I would take some pride in reciting the first few lines of a poem. He would then not only mention the author but complete the poem. I would say, "Behold a young solitary Highland lass reaping and singing by herself..." He would continue to finish the poem. If I said:

> Once upon a midnight dreary, while I pondered, weak and weary,
> Over many a quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore...

He would say, "'Nevermore'. That's Edgar Allan Poe."

I have been a great admirer of Senator Macquarrie. I shall miss him. I wish him and Mrs. Macquarrie a happy and enjoyable retirement.

Before he leaves Parliament Hill I hope I have the opportunity to sing "Just a wee deoch-n-duoris" with him. I think I am the only new Canadian, not only in this chamber but probably in all of Canada, who knows all the words of that song.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my relationship with Heath goes back, like so many of you, to the days of the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker. His was such an improbable name one wonders how he ever got elected Prime Minister.

We go back to the days when frequently there were more people on the stage than there were in the audience. Those were the days when loyalties were developed and modern traditions within our party formed. I had the good advantage of being first elected to the House of Commons with Bob McCleave. Bob and I, together with Heath Macquarrie and Angus MacLean, were the last four parliamentarians to seek office in dual constituencies. They were the last of the dual constituencies in Canada.

It is appropriate to recall that because, if there were a new era, it could, perhaps, be dated by our having caught up with ourselves and having brought our institutions into the modern era. Doing that required careful and thoughtful guidance. Above all, it required knowledgeable guidance, based upon experience, broad reading, and a deep understanding of human nature. It was thought in Prince Edward Island that Heath Macquarrie was one of the figures in those days who gave good guidance, good direction, good counsel and good advice. I am grateful to you, Heath, for that.

Our offices were almost shared. I was on one side of the hall and Senator Macquarrie was on the other. We sealed off the end of the hall so that we would have even more privacy. Those were great days. Heath was summoned here and, lo and behold, I moved into the finest office in Ottawa. It was a magnificent office in the corner of the third floor of the West Block. It has been noted that when he was summoned to the Senate he just went across the lawn. He made sure he had the same view he had had for some years before.

Politically, I matured in that office. Heath took on the role of mentor quite willingly, not just with myself but with young and old reporters alike, with other parliamentarians, and with people on the Hill interested in the workings of the place. It was a great place for good conversation. Heath's role of mentor did not stop there, he continued to teach at home. It was a way of life for Heath to teach. He was a teacher; scholar; he was all those things, not to mention a parliamentarian and a historian.

I will miss him in the sense that no longer will I be able to walk across the lawn for advice and counsel, the type of advice and counsel that I watched him give to Robert Stanfield during his years as our leader. Indeed, in the months prior to him becoming our leader, Heath's role was energetic, supportive and creative in encouraging Robert Stanfield to seek the leadership of our party when most others, notably some of our colleagues here in this chamber, had given up on him. Heath Macquarrie did not.

I wish him well. I know I will not miss you because we will continue to see each other. I know where Crapaud is; I know where Victoria is; and I know where Ottawa is. I also know that, which is most important to me, your counsel, freely given in the past, will always be available.

God bless and keep you, Heath. Thank you very much for all the years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am glad I arrived here before this great occasion had concluded.

My good friend Heath Macquarrie is a neophyte. I was in the legislature of Prince Edward Island about 15 years before Senator Macquarrie was first elected to the House of Commons in 1957, at which time his old friend, Angus MacLean, had been there since 1951, some time after me.

In 1957, John George Diefenbaker came before the country and talked about the great Canadian vision. Incorporated into that vision was a fellow called Heath Macquarrie in Queens County, Prince Edward Island. At that particular time, Queens County was one of two historic districts in all of Canada because it had two members of Parliament. With Heath Macquarrie, there was Angus MacLean, a former Minister of Fisheries of this great country of ours, and a former premier of Prince Edward Island. He ran with Heath Macquarrie in Queens County which was a dual constituency. The only other such constituency was in Halifax.

This young neophyte, Macquarrie, a professor from Victoria, Prince Edward Island, had the gall to enter his name on that ballot. He won the seat. So did Angus MacLean. In fact, every seat on Prince Edward Island supported John George Diefenbaker. We lost every seat, and we blamed Heath Macquarrie as the organizer behind that campaign. Even our good friend Orville Phillips from Prince County was elected at that time, and they both came here in the same year.

You know, it was a strange situation to have Conservatives elected federally in Prince Edward Island, and yet they took every single, solitary seat. No longer was Chester McClure available, who had been there before Heath Macquarrie, with his good friend Angus.

Sometime after that, they had redistribution, and redistribution meant that either Angus MacLean, who was there previous to Heath Macquarrie, or Heath Macquarrie had to take the city of Charlottetown, where all the Tories were. Heath decided he should represent Charlottetown or Hillsborough. He moved to the Hillsborough district and let Angus MacLean have the Malpeque area. Heath thought he would take the city seat or the Hillsborough seat, which has been Liberal since he left. He won that seat until he finally quit, when his good friend from Nova Scotia promised wage and price controls.

Heath decided he should go back to teaching. He returned to teaching until his very close friend Lowell Murray, and his other friend Joe Clark, decided that Heath should come here to the Senate to represent the province of Prince Edward Island, with the vast experience in political life which he had.

In Prince Edward Island, we had a young Rossiter, the brother-in-law to Senator Rossiter. He was looking for the seat. In fact, he thought he had it in the bag, but no, sir. Senator Macquarrie, with his past experience and his friendship, and close ties with the upper house and in Parliament, ended up here in this lovely chamber and he has been proud to stay here. In fact, Heath said he would not even bother to put his shoes on to come here. He would come, if he ever got the call, without his shoes.

Senator Macquarrie has been a great asset to us here. I have to say, as a Liberal, that I have been very pleased to have him here as a Conservative because, in all his time here, I do not think that, even once, he or I have had any conflicts, one way or the other. He voted against me sometimes, but he never once said the wrong thing or the bad thing. In fact, I can say the same thing for Senator Phillips.

Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Bonnell: No, no. Senator Phillips is not retiring; I will tell you what. He will be here, and I will have to wait for a few more years to see whether he ever says a bad thing about me. So far, he has not.

Islanders are funny people. We are Islanders first, politicians second. I can tell you a funny story about Senator Macquarrie. One thing he is very proud of is his religion. He is a great Christian and a great Presbyterian. He will stick up for those Presbyterian beliefs, wherever he is.

Senator Macquarrie and I had the opportunity at one point to visit John Paul, the Pope, in the Vatican. There we were, with some very good Roman Catholic friends and colleagues of ours. They thought they had met the Lord — but I knew they had only met the Pope — so they never said one word. I did all the talking. No change there.

Anyway, after the conversation was over, and the Pope had his picture taken with me — if you do not believe me, I have the picture to prove it, and Heath Macquarrie knows it — then the Pope said, "Would you like to come to Mass?" I said "I would love to." This was on the Wednesday, before Easter Sunday Mass. I asked Heath if he was coming with me. He said no, that as a Presbyterian, he thought he would go to his own church, just down the corridor below.

So he went to the Presbyterian church, and I went to Mass. But let me tell you, the Pope never asked me if I was Presbyterian, Baptist, Roman Catholic, Methodist, or what I was. He invited me to Mass and where did I end up? In the pulpit, with the Pope for Easter Sunday Mass. I have the pictures to prove it.

On another occasion, Senator Heath Macquarrie travelled down through the northern part of Italy with me. We had many good times together. I will be sorry to see him retire in September. He will be a senator for a long time to come. He will never not be a senator, but he may not be able to come here, because they changed the rules of this place some years ago and he has to retire when he reaches a certain birthday. That birthday comes up in September.

I wish Senator Macquarrie and his good wife well. I want him to know, if he needs any help, he can come stay with me.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I rise with some trepidation to speak after Senator Bonnell. Nonetheless, I will plunge in.

I rise to correct the record. There has been a newspaper article circulating on the Hill recently which contains two grading categories. Unfortunately, Senator Macquarrie did not fare too well in one of those categories. I want to assure him today that most of us, particularly the women on the Hill, disagree with that poll. I think the writer misunderstood his charm, his continental suave, and a manner that we all appreciate and note.

Furthermore, I think some of us perhaps would have relegated Senator MacDonald to second place in the other category. I wanted to make sure that those feelings were put on the record, Senator Macquarrie, because we notice you on every occasion you come to the Hill.

I also wanted to correct the view that Senator Macquarrie's experience, his knowledge and his scholarship are known only in the Atlantic region. I had the pleasure of hearing Senator Macquarrie many years ago in Saskatchewan, where he is known for his scholarship and for his writings. I appreciate the short time I have had to serve with him here.

Senator Macquarrie, I wish you success in the future.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am sometimes accused of too frequently giving voice to classical sayings, utterances of the great and the past. For this little while, I have been thinking of that well-known expression, "What manner of man is this?" about whom you were making such wonderful observations.

This is a place of debate. It is important that opinions be expressed well. However, for once in my time in Parliament, I am delighted that only one side of the story has been given voice. I do not want to open it further to the opposition, because God knows what might emerge.

I am very glad — not to be going, but glad to hear what is being said today. Some former senator said long ago, "It is the only place in the world where you get a chance to hear your own obituary." Everybody likes that when it is favourable.

• (1420)

I was a little leery yesterday. I heard my Presbyterian friend Senator Stanbury indicating that the committees were so heavily laden that there probably would not even be time to meet today at all. I had visions of saying good-bye to you all by a Hasti-Note, or something like that. That would not have been nearly so enjoyable for me as today has been. Some of you may find it quite boring, but not I. Not I. You have been generous. Indeed, on occasion, flattering. Again, not offended am I.

For a while, so many wonderful things were being said that I became almost speechless, but you notice only almost. I am impressed by the fact that every person who has spoken has spoken, in my opinion, at their best. The subject-matter, perhaps?

I have been reminded of things that I had not given much attention to of late, and I am glad of the reminders. I am glad my dear wife is here to hear what a wonderful man I am. I hope she will be smart enough to accept it. My only son is here to realize what a wonderful heritage he may follow. I am moved by the fact that some people who are very wonderful to me are in that gallery, which is not notoriously overcrowded, I have noticed. I appreciate the support and interest today, the friendship and support of many years.

Senator Forrestall has mentioned Mrs. Howatt, my first secretary. In fact, like the American aboriginals, she was here ahead of the Pilgrims because she was secretary to the man I defeated in order to get into the House of Commons in 1957.

Senator Lynch-Staunton was at his most eloquent. I had no idea that people examined my platform so carefully. It is wise to have a platform. Some American politicians have said that platforms are only to get in on, but I like them for something to lean on. When I taught at university, when I was never too sure of the profundity and weight of my utterances, I made sure I took along a good many books so that at least something would be heavy and substantial. I do that here as well. I appreciate my leader's eloquence on my behalf. I admire his perception, as I admire his leadership of this group.

To Senator Fairbairn, I can make only one correction. In her most agreeable, sensitive, and deeply appreciated remarks, she talked about me "trodding" uphill. I would have preferred "dashing."

Senator Murray, younger than I by far, is in some ways, in part, my creator in my coming to this place. Senator Lynch-Staunton is right. I never had any reluctance about coming to the Senate. When Prime Minister Clark phoned me in Victoria, P.E.I. that day, we had the champagne out. Apparently he had been calling a number of prospects, and he said, "Heath, I guess we do not have to spend much time on the consent aspect, do we?" I said, "No, sir." One-quarter of a second later, I said "yes" and "thank you." I knew what the Senate was like. I had known senators on joint committees. That knowledge was very helpful to me.

I am deeply moved by the brief but eloquent remarks of Senator Gigantès, and if I may be so presumptuous, since someone has called me this, from one wordsmith to another, I give faith and high marks to a compliment from that source.

Now, with Senator Phillips, we get into a little different situation. He said that I was surprised that we were elected in 1957. If I may amend that, I was surprised that he was elected. I want to also say this, and any Prince Edward Islander here will know what I mean: For Senator Phillips to be as effusive and as complimentary in such a forward manner about anyone or anything is indeed a very important occasion. I thank him deeply.

Senator Atkins, my neighbour and fellow Red Tory, recalled incidents and enunciated some very important aspects of my political memories. He was very delicate about Sir John A. Macdonald's propinquity. I am glad to have an office very close to his, because on some of these heavy days when I am troubled about the country, or the party, or about my Presbyterian soul, I have one drink of rum, and I think of two, and I know that good old Sir John would say, "Go to it, lad." He sustains me in the gap between the second and the third. Much have I loved that man.

Senator Bosa, for whom I have the highest regard as a neighbour and as a fine internationalist, has been very kind too. Not only does he know what a "wee deoch-n-duoris" is, I helped him with the spelling of it. I hope that while I am around here but not in the chamber, until I become 75, a mere stripling, that we will know what a "wee deoch-n-duoris" is together.

Mike Forrestall calls me "father." He always has, and I have always answered to that, which of course is a subtle suggestion that he is very young. A man so experienced, such a backroom man and such a frontroom man for so long, is not exactly junior. He and I have trod the ways together.

I remember those days when to be a Tory at all was to be as close to extinction as being a Red Tory is today. I have inured myself twice to that. I can only say that, to most optimists, hope springs eternal. Yesterday's low tide is later on a high tide, and so we sit and we wait, and we hope. When we are good, we pray.

I am impressed by this reference to my Presbyterianism and the fact that I went to the Church of Scotland when I was in Rome. Where else would I go?

• (1430)

I have never claimed to be the greatest Presbyterian. I sometimes went so far as to say I was a pillar of the church — a crumbling pillar, more crumbling than pillar-esque. I am sure most of my fellow Presbyterians would agree with that. Some people in Prince Edward Island say, "I do not know whether you are a good Presbyterian or not, but you sure as hell are a stubborn one!" There may be something to that as well.

It was kind of Senator Andreychuk to come to my rescue about certain adverse, sensitive polls. When my party was languishing in the polls, which it has been most of the time in my long life, people would say, "Oh, polls; pay no attention to them!" Somehow I always liked them better when they were favourable. I did not mind reading a paper about our party being so well received.

Dealing now with the references to my being the worst-dressed senator, I always comfort myself that, if you are going to make the list, make it at the top! No need of this nonsense of being the third worst. Be the worst! Whoever was involved in this electoral college, those beggers have had me in that position now for three years. As Richard Nixon — whom I did not admire — might have said, "They will not have Macquarrie to knock down on the list again."

My own defence is that if any of these sedentary senators think that I am going to take my 25-minute walk every morning in a hard collar, a gray tie and a frock coat, they have another think coming. I have been trained in athletics. That has been referred to. I am an athletic type now. God help us. My children will not be impressed by that.

Thank you very much, honourable senators. I hate leaving this place. I am immensely sincere in my view that the Senate is an important place.

I read once that the Senate is the second chamber, but that it should not be the secondary chamber.

A good many years ago I was furious at a famous Englishman, Harold Laski, who wrote that the Senate of Canada does not even entertain its own self-respect. I thought that was a snobbish remark for an Englishman to make. Then I reflected on that comment — I do a lot of reflecting, not always thinking and talking. There was something in what he said. Perhaps we do not have a sufficient regard for our place in the structure.

I was always a bit amused and annoyed by people who worried about our legitimacy — we are not elected. I have been called a bastard more than once, but I was never, myself, troubled about our legitimacy.

As Senator Phillips once said, we have the legitimacy of the Constitution. We are put here by the Constitution; we come here in a particular way; we are appointed by the leader of the party that has the majority of the people supporting that party. I feel that, through the years, we in the Senate, and I am speaking in the continuity of history, have been a bit too supine.

Honourable senators, the great Arthur Meighen once stood here declaiming about this time of the session and the fact that the senators are here, ready to work, ready to legislate, ready to discuss, and nothing happens until the last day or two. We are deluged by a veritable plethora of legislation. Mr. Meighen said, "We are expected to pass legislation without amendment, without delay, and without argument." Shouldn't the Senate of Canada, somewhere in its great history, have said to the lower House, "This is the period of the year in which this house plans to sit!" We do not have to be called into existence by their whim! However, that was never done. I have often thought that perhaps a better, more used, communication system between the two houses would be useful. Conferencing, if I may so, was arcane when it was created. It has not worked.

Honourable senators, I have no trouble defending the Senate still, and my defence comes from my view of the Constitution. It primarily comes from the fact that I have been privileged to know, over many years — even before I came here — a host of people appointed to this place. They have been an excellent group of people — able, sensitive, competent and dedicated to the best things in our country. So I do not think we should too readily accept the denigration that so easily flows from the uninitiated, the uninformed, and the insensitive.

Thank you very much, honourable senators, for today's remarks and for the well-recalled recollections of great fellowship.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages.

Tuesday, June 21, 1994

The Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages has the honour to present its

FIRST REPORT

The Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages has held 11 public hearings since 21 April 1994. This report describes what was accomplished during the hearings.

The President of Treasury Board appeared before the Committee to discuss his 1992-1993 annual report entitled Official Languages in Federal Institutions. The sitting allocated to a review of the 1992-1993 annual report of the Minister of Canadian Heritage on Part VII of the Official Languages Act was cut short by a vote in the House of Commons. However, the Minister agreed to appear before the Committee again as soon as possible. The Committee held two meetings with the Commissioner of Official Languages. It began its consideration of the 1993 annual report of the Commissioner. The members of the Committee raised questions regarding the expenditures and estimates pertaining to official languages programs. The Committee looked at the official languages policies and programs of the departments of National Defence, Agriculture and Agri-Food, Finance and Natural Resources and of the Public Service Commission. Finally, the Committee heard the testimony of representatives of Alliance Quebec and the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadienne, who voiced the concerns of minority official-language communities.

The Committee intends to continue its hearings when Parliament resumes sitting in the fall, and will report its observations and recommendations to Parliament at a later date.

A copy of the relevant Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence (Issues No. 1 to 10 which includes this Report) is tabled.

Respectfully submitted,

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT AGREEMENTS BILL

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kirby, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the second reading of Bill C-22, respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, the details of this matter are familiar to you all. The previous Conservative government entered an agreement to privatize Terminals 1 and 2 of Pearson International Airport in Toronto, Canada's largest airport. In return for a proposed investment of some $700 million, the principals involved were to receive a government-supervised monopoly for a specific period and a share in the profits.

Since this question first became an issue, the perception has been encouraged that the deal was a last-minute transaction cooked up by a government in the throes of an election. Nothing could be further from the truth, as a brief look at the chronology of events clearly shows.

In October, 1990, the government announced its intention to privatize the two terminals in question. Some 17 months later, in March 1992, it called for requests for proposals. In December of that same year, the group eventually known as "Pearson Development Corporation" was selected. Formal negotiations began in May, 1993; a letter of understanding was signed in July; and Treasury Board approval was given in August. The deal was closed in October. That is a total of three years from beginning to end, hardly a last-minute job.

The negotiations leading up to the signing of the agreement were extremely complex, involving a wide variety of interests and issues. Despite this, little criticism was heard prior to the last general election campaign.

By October, however, the situation had changed dramatically. Suddenly Pearson International Airport had become a major issue. Disgruntled civil servants and others were leaking to newspapers confidential cabinet documents concerning the alleged financial instability of the company that had won the contract. Opposition politicians from all levels soon jumped on the bandwagon expressing outrage at the contract and concern for the future of the airport. The press, ever alert to division and conflict, readily communicated and, in many instances, distorted, critics' comments.

The Pearson issue revolved around two main questions. The first was whether to privatize Lester B. Pearson Airport at all. If so, should it be handed to owners having an eye to profit or to local authorities who would put regional concerns first?

The second issue was that of the redevelopment of Terminals 1 and 2. Both quickly fell by the wayside amid the hype and frenzy of the campaign.

The Liberals created a third issue, claiming misuse of patronage and improper lobbying. In essence, they charged the government with corruption. "If elected," they said, "the deal would be cancelled." It was an effective election ploy. It followed the maxim that an accusation, no matter what its nature, always has more impact on the mind of the electorate than any number of subsequent denials and explanations. This is especially true when the accusation is repeated, and given credence by critics and observers alike. It was the beginning of the big lie.

• (1510)

The efficacy of the Liberal campaign was enhanced by its very simplicity. It was tailor-made for the media's black and white mentality. It apparently contrasted the good and the bad, the ethical and the corrupt, the Grits and the Tories. As the rhetoric heated up, policy took a back seat to people, personality, and the gross simplification of issues. Despite all of the lofty oratory, however, no one, then or since, has come forth to offer one shred of concrete evidence of impropriety or illegality.

Following the election, the new Prime Minister called on former Ontario treasurer and leader of the Ontario Liberal Party, Robert Nixon, to inquire into the so-called Pearson affair. He had 30 days to investigate, analyze and report on a series of tremendously complex business agreements that made up the final proposal.

Nixon was accountable only to the Prime Minister. His terms of reference were never made public nor were, with few exceptions, the names of the people he interviewed. Those standing accused were offered no opportunity to rebut or refute the criticisms directed their way.

The Nixon report was made public on November 29, 1993. Highly condemnatory, it was also culpably vague. It referred to the "perception that political staff were interested in this transaction to a highly unusual extent." One phrase stated that "It appears that one company received favoured treatment." Another phrase spoke of "suspicions" of patronage. Like a famous commercial, there was much bun but no beef.

The reception given Mr. Nixon's report was less than laudatory. Even The Globe and Mail was moved to comment that it was little more than a shoddy piece of innuendo. Shoddy indeed, yet hardly inexpensive. The Nixon exercise cost the Canadian taxpayer over $80,000, one-quarter of which comprised Mr. Nixon's fee. In passing, the Prime Minister subsequently appointed Mr. Nixon chairman of the Atomic Energy Control Board.

The irony of all this, as you are all no doubt aware, is that the target of Mr. Nixon's cynicism and intimations, the Pearson Development Corporation, is controlled by the Bronfman family of Montreal, who are longtime friends of the Liberal Party. Mr. Charles Bronfman himself paid $1,000 to meet with Mr. Chrétien at a Liberal fundraising party in the midst of the election.

Following the release of the Nixon report, the Prime Minister appointed an arbitrator to negotiate a settlement with the Pearson group. Again he called on a friend, and again things were being done behind closed doors. The man he chose was Bob Wright, his former law partner and chief fundraiser for his 1984 bid for the Liberal leadership. According to The Toronto Star the government is paying Mr. Wright $1,000 per day, plus expenses. His negotiations could eventually cost taxpayers as much as $100,000.

Using the Nixon report as its justification, the Liberals recently introduced the innocuous-sounding Pearson International Airport Bill. Let us examine it briefly.

The bill begins by nullifying the series of agreements negotiated and reached in good faith by the Government of Canada and representatives of the Pearson group. These agreements, states clause 3 of the bill:

> ...are hereby declared not to have come into force and to have no legal effect.

Having fired a first shot across the bow, the government then decides to drop a bomb or two down the funnels. It does this in the form of immunity for itself, its acts, and those of its surrogates like Mr. Nixon. Clause 7 states that:

> No action or other proceeding, including any action or proceeding in restitution, or for damages of any kind in tort or contract...

— related to the agreements, or the acts of the government in cancelling them, may be instituted.

Finally, it aims its guns at the engine room. Clauses 9 and 10 state that:

> No one is entitled to any compensation from Her Majesty in connection with the coming into force of this Act.

However, should the government feel that compensation of some sort is due, it alone will decide the appropriate amount "subject to the terms and conditions that the minister considers appropriate."

Having all but sunk the ship, the government then pulls up alongside and offers a life buoy in the form of a shotgun clause. In order to receive any compensation, those deprived of their property have one month following passage of the bill to come to terms with the government. Failing this, they will be left to swim on their own, with no compensation for the time and resources they invested in their proposal.

Honourable senators, this is the most odious piece of legislation I have seen in all my years of practising law. It is a punitive and partisan measure based upon suspicion and unproven charges; an ill-disguised and sordid attempt to punish political opponents. It denies people their property, their right to go to court to protect it, the ability to seek compensation to pay liabilities incurred by the cancellation of their contract and, finally, it denies them the right to protect and clear their reputations.

Newspapers friendly to the government call it "unusual" legislation. Industry Minister John Manley, in a masterful example of understatement, recently described it as "unique." I would go further. I see it as an unvarnished attempt to deprive a group of Canadians of their basic rights to due process in open court. This impression deepens when I look at the proceedings of the Transport Committee that studied the bill following second reading.

It is apparent that the government was intent on getting this issue out of the public eye as quickly as possible, ostensibly in order to move on to what it felt to be more important business. Like Mr. Nixon, government members of the committee were in a hurry to put the stamp of superficial legality and respectability on their doings.

During proceedings they used their majority to block attempts to extend the committee's schedule to accommodate witnesses temporarily unavailable. They also refused to entertain the idea of subpoenaing witnesses involved in the affair who had refused to appear.

The Toronto Star quotes the Minister of Transport, John Young, as saying:

> I do not know what's to be gained by subpoenaing people to discuss a deal that we have already described as being flawed and we have already taken legislative action to cancel.

Absolutely unbelievable! So much for democracy and the concept of the rule of law.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Hear, hear!

Senator Balfour: From the beginning, this whole affair has been little more than a partisan and openly cynical manipulation of the democratic system. It began in the heat of an election campaign. It was coaxed and nurtured by a media eager for stories of supposed impropriety and abuse in high places. Facts were in short supply. In their absence came indiscriminate and undiscerning rhetoric.

The real issues — privatization, refurbishing of Pearson's Terminals 1 and 2, passenger safety, and the needs and benefits to the region of Toronto — all disappeared in the rush to reduce the story to the largest common denominator easily recognized by all: apparent scandal.

This, in turn, has led to an overflow of fatuous rhetoric from a host of self-appointed moralizers eager to pontificate and condemn. Newspapers like The Ottawa Citizen, that paragon of journalistic excellence and probity, refer to the "secrecy, cronyism and suspicious excesses of lobbying" which, according to it, characterize negotiations between the former government and members of the Pearson Development Corporation. The ever-sententious Lucien Bouchard called the agreement "one of the biggest scandals in political life in recent years."

• (1520)

The real scandal, however, lies not here but in the actions of the Liberal government since assuming power last autumn: secret and high-priced friends of the Prime Minister, appointed by and responsible to him alone; Potemkin-like hearings, full of form but empty of content; Draconian and anti-democratic legislation depriving Canadian citizens of their property and their supposedly inviolate right to a fair trail; and, interwoven through it all, a combination of innuendo reminiscent of McCarthyism and Kafkaesque refusals to define specific charges. As a result, a number of highly competent and professional business people are left with sullied reputations and no recourse before the law.

Heedless of the travesty of justice it is perpetrating in the name of expediency, the government has ignored calls for a more extensive investigation of its charges. It says the Pearson issue is closed, and that it is time to press on and make new arrangements.

Honourable senators, you will recall during the past election how the now Prime Minister promised to replace the Pearson agreement with one more suitable to the members of his Toronto caucus. Over and over he waved his "Red Book" to the cameras and repeated, mantra-like: "Chrétien is my name and jobs are my game."

However, in the eight months since the election we have seen neither jobs nor progress in the dossier of the Toronto airport. In fact, we have witnessed the exact opposite, as internecine squabbling between different factions rival with the contradictory proposals of the government and combine to create stagnation and continued unemployment.

I suspect the government is beginning to realize that the deal it has so dogmatically inveighed against is not as iniquitous as it would have the public believe. It has, however, painted itself into a corner. By proclaiming the deal to be bad, and implying that all those associated with it are somehow impure, including one of its most important financial supporters, it has severely limited its options.

The government could, of course, simply allow the construction to proceed as planned and get on with the job; but given the Prime Minister's much vaunted stand on ethics, and his repeated references to the supposedly "flawed" and "politically manipulated" nature of the agreement, this appears unlikely to occur.

What the government could and should do is establish a nonpartisan, impartial inquiry. Its mandate would be to investigate the manner by which the Pearson agreement was arrived at, evaluate its terms, and determine the existence of any impropriety.

Such an approach would allow those implicated by the government's accusations the opportunity to clear their reputations, or, as the case may be, to defend themselves properly should misconduct be proven. In addition, it would afford the Canadian public an opportunity to judge the merits of the deal.

The Liberals have ruled out the idea of such an inquiry. Why? Do they fear that an impartial investigation would clear those Conservatives they have so crassly and carelessly accused of wrongdoing? Or are they afraid that some of their friends might find themselves implicated?

The Prime Minister speaks of ethics and transparency in government. Let him begin in his own back yard. Call an inquiry, let the facts be known and the air cleared. An impartial inquiry would obviate the need for Bill C-22, which in any case should be withdrawn.

I feel strongly about this. I think this act is wrong. I think it is discriminatory. It violates the basic constitutional rights of a person to be heard, to answer charges of impropriety, and, in this case, to sue for just compensation in the face of state expropriation. In sum, it denies those involved in the Pearson agreement those elementary rights that are fundamental to our democratic system.

Twice now in the space of a few weeks the government has attempted to ride roughshod over the rules and principles that guarantee the liberty and freedom of our society.

Clause 7 of the bill referring to immunity from prosecution is particularly contemptible. In itself it should be enough to incite everyone present here to rise and vote against the bill's passage. How a supposedly democratic government could even conceive of drawing up such legislation is beyond me. Both the Prime Minister and his cabinet merit the censure of this chamber and the opprobrium of the Canadian people.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, I concur with the remarks made by Senator Balfour. I shall not review the legislation from the point of view of all that has gone wrong, although I shall mention a few instances. I want to go into the legality of the situation.

Bill C-22 was passed by the House of Commons for the sole purpose of relieving the government, its ministers, and anyone engaged by the government from any financial responsibility for the cancellation of contracts that were entered into by the government with parties dealing with the government in good faith. It also relieves the government of the responsibility of giving the contracting parties one penny.

The senior executives of these parties were described as "responsible and professional people," you will be surprised to learn, in the Robert Nixon report. These are the people from whom they are taking the rights. That is how they are described in this report written by Mr. Nixon after he, together with one lawyer, one accountant and one administrator, spent a mere 30 days reviewing the documents — he said there were 20 documents, but Mr. Baker on behalf of the parties said there were 50 — and speaking to some, but certainly not all, of the persons involved in this most complicated transaction.

The government is relying on Mr. Nixon's report for the basis of this legislation. The engaging of Mr. Nixon verbally by the Prime Minister, with no evidence as to what he was asked to do, and the manner in which Mr. Nixon carried out his work are contrary to any rules of fair play imaginable. The hearings were in camera. Witnesses were not sworn; there was no right for the parties to be present to hear what was being said about them, and no right of cross-examination. That is a far cry from what our supreme court has said in respect of fundamental justice in Singh and Minister of Employment and Immigration, which is found in 17 Dominion Law Reports, fourth edition, at pages 422 and 425:

> At a minimum the constant of fundamental justice as it appears in section 7 of the Charter includes the notion of procedural fairness. The tribunal which adjudicates upon his rights must act fairly, in good faith, without bias and in judicial temper and must give him the opportunity adequately to state his case. Procedural fairness may demand different things in different contexts...However, where a serious issue of credibility is involved, fundamental justice requires that credibility be determined on the basis of an oral hearing.

Mr. Nixon never heard from most of the major players in this transaction, a number of whom he maligned in his report. It is just not fair.

I then looked at the act itself and tried to determine whether it was unconstitutional. Were parts of it contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Canadian Bill of Rights? When I first looked at this bill I was almost convinced that it was within the jurisdiction of the Province of Ontario. Certainly, we are dealing with property, and section 92 (13) of the BNA Act comes exclusively within that jurisdiction.

Then I thought, no, maybe it falls under "Local works and undertakings..." which is covered in section 92(10) of the BNA Act. Those local works and undertakings would not come within provincial jurisdiction, if, under (c):

> Such Works as, although wholly situate within the Province, are before or after their Execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general Advantage of Canada...

I am told that the Parliament of Canada has not declared the Pearson airport to be "for the general advantage of Canada." On that basis, it was my view that it came within the jurisdiction of the Province of Ontario.

• (1540)

It was then suggested to me that I should read a case on which the Privy Council had decided in 1932. The case is Re: Aerial Navigation, Attorney General of Canada versus Attorney General of Ontario, 1937, 1 Dominion Law Reports 58. That is the case in which it is stated that certain provisions of an aeronautical act come within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada.

I have read the case, as well as other cases which followed it. I am not convinced that those who have followed it have read it properly. I do not think that case went nearly so far as some of the writers and some of the judges took it. There are judges who have said otherwise.

That case had to do with section 132 of the British North America Act which has to do with the giving of power for performing obligations of Canada or for any province as part of the British Empire. I have come to the conclusion that it falls within the jurisdiction of the federal government under section 91(1) which has to do with public debt and property. As this is public property, which is owned by the federal government, I think it falls squarely within federal jurisdiction.

It is interesting to note, however, that seven of nine judges in the case of Construction Montcalm Inc. and the Minimum Wage Commission and the Attorney Generals of Quebec, Alberta and Saskatchewan, 1979 Supreme Court Reports 754 at 755 stated this:

> The construction of an airport is not in every respect an integral part of aeronautics.

It was held that the provincial laws in respect of wages were valid. The two dissenting judges in that case were Chief Justice Laskin and Justice Spence who thought, as I do in regard to this case, that it did fall within the jurisdiction of the federal government because of section 91(1).

I then turned to the Charter and in particular to section 7 thereof which states:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

I must say that the way in which the word "everyone" has been interpreted is certainly not in my favour in terms of what I want to try to prove today.

However, in Dwiday Systems v. Zutphen Bros. Construction which is reported at 1990 Supreme Court Reports at 705, it is stated at page 709:

> There can now be no doubt that a corporation cannot avail itself of the protection offered by s. 7 of the Charter. In Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), (1989) 1 S.C.R. 927, the majority of this Court held that a corporation cannot be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person and cannot therefore avail itself of the protection offered by s. 7 of the Charter.

At page 1004 it states:

> ...it appears to us that s. 7 was intended to confer protection on a singularly human level. A plain, common sense reading of the phrase "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person" serves to underline the human elements involved; only human beings can enjoy these rights. "Everyone" then, must be read in light of the rest of the section and defined to exclude corporations and other artificial entities incapable of enjoying life, liberty or security of the person, and include only human beings.

I understand that the partners of the limited partnership in this case are corporations and therefore probably fall within what I have just set out.

Although corporations are not given protection under the Charter, it does not mean they do not have rights under the common law. I will speak more about that later.

I then looked at the Canadian Bill of Rights. I will read those parts which are relevant. It states:

> The Parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian Nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God...in a society of free men and free institutions;
> Affirming also that men and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect...and the rule of law;
> And being desirous of enshrining these principles and the human rights and fundamental freedoms derived from them, in a Bill of Rights which shall reflect the respect of Parliament for its constitutional authority and which shall ensure the protection of these rights and freedoms in Canada:
> THEREFORE Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:
> 1. It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist...fundamental freedoms, namely:
> > (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;

Section 2 states:

> Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights...

The government did not dare put that in this bill. If it had, we might have some difficulty under the Bill of Rights because it states:

> ...be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgement or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular, no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to...
> > (e) deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations;

I want to emphasize the difference between sections 1(a) and 2(e). In 1(a) it states "the right of the individual." That has now been interpreted to mean human being — not a corporation; not a partnership; not a joint venture; but a human being. Under the Bill of Rights these corporations may not have such a right. I am not saying they do not have similar rights, but they do not have it under the Bill of Rights.

The next section, which states shall not "deprive a person" as opposed to an individual, has been interpreted to mean corporations as well as individuals.

• (1540)

It is much wider so they cannot —

> ...deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations;

I refer to Peter W. Hogg's 3rd Edition (1992) of Constitutional Law of Canada, where he states at page 32-2:

> The Canadian Bill of Rights lost most of its importance in 1982, with the adoption of the Charter of Rights. Most of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Bill are now guaranteed by the Charter. The Charter is part of the Constitution of Canada, and can be amended only by the constitutional amending procedures.

A little farther down he states:

> ...it is plain that the Bill remains in force, despite the fact that most of its provisions are duplicated by the Charter. Those provisions of the Bill that are not duplicated by the Charter are two in number: (1) the Bill's "due process" clause (s. 1(a)), which extends to the protection of property, and (2) the Bill's guarantee (2 (e)) of a fair hearing for the determination of rights and obligations. Both these provisions go beyond the guarantees in the Charter, and will therefore continue to be operative restraints on federal (but not provincial) activity.

He also wrote at page 32-9:

> The effect of the Canadian Bill of Rights on subsequent inconsistent federal statutes...

— and I emphasize this —

> ...which do not include an express declaration of exemption is also said to be to render them inoperative. Probably, however, the Bill of Rights renders such statutes invalid, not inoperative. The constitutional basis for this effect is the manner-and-form doctrine. Parliament has bound itself to enact laws inconsistent with the Bill of Rights only in the manner and form prescribed by the Bill of Rights.

We had the same problem with the Bill of Rights as we did with the Charter. How did it affect corporations? There have been only a couple of relevant cases, none of which has gone to the Supreme Court of Canada. It appears that, as far as the right under section 1(a), which is the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person, enjoyment of property, that does not —

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. I apologize for interrupting the honourable senator. I am told that his time has expired. I allowed him to continue in case he was reaching a conclusion. If we are in unanimous agreement, he may continue. Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Jessiman: As far as the Bill of Rights is concerned, as I have said, there have been only two or three cases involving these particular sections relating to corporations. In effect, they have said that section 1(a) does not apply to corporations. One decision has inferred that they could, but the other two denied it. I will give the names later to save time. Only section 2(e) is applicable.

I would refer to the particular words of the Court of Appeal of Ontario in New Brunswick Broadcasting Co., Limited v. CRTC, 1983 1 F.C. 453, where at page 427 it stated:

> I am of the opinion that the word "individual" in section 1 of the Canadian Bill of Rights does not include a corporation and that the text of section 1 of the statute does not apply or secure rights to the appellant. However, what is recognized and declared by the statute are existing fundamental legal rights and I know of no reason for concluding that a corporation is not entitled at common law to the same rights as a natural person to the enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law.

The other case is Smith, Kline & French et al. v. Attorney General of Canada, 1986 1 F.C. 274, and it says, in effect, the same thing.

I will close by saying that parts of this bill are bad law. They should not be supported. I hope that it will not only be Conservative senators who will not support it. I would like to think that, after serious thought by senators on both sides of this house, once this matter is referred to committee, there will be amendments whereby some of these clauses will be deleted.

When I was first appointed to this house, I did not believe that this Senate, under any circumstances, should ever defeat a bill passed by those persons who have been elected to the House of Commons. For the first time, I am of the view that, if this bill is not amended, I am afraid I cannot support it.

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Andreychuk, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES, 1994-95

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON MAIN ESTIMATES ADOPTED

Leave having been given to proceed to Reports of Committees.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Sixth Report (Interim) of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Main Estimates 1994-95), presented in the Senate on June 14, 1994. — (Honourable Senator Bolduc).

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I would like to comment briefly on what was said about the Collège militaire royal at St-Jean by witnesses who appeared before the Committee on National Finance.

The minister told us that he felt he had made a good decision. He tried to justify his decision. I realize there are financial constraints and that it was a matter of saving money. Personally, I do not think it was a good decision.

The Collège militaire royal at St-Jean was more than just an adjunct to a military base. It is a training school and a research facility. Any Canadian citizen would be dismayed if a university were shut down in his province. No one would be pleased if St. Francis Xavier University, Mount Allison or any other university had been closed. That is more or less how Quebecers feel. This is not only a Quebec institution but a national institution. The CMR was important, and we will feel hurt if the decision is upheld.

We are not talking about a hangar and a military base. We are talking about an educational institution. It was also, and this is very important, a way to ensure there was a reasonable percentage of francophones in the armed forces, especially in the navy and the air force. In this respect, the CMR was instrumental in promoting equal opportunity in Canada.

I think it was unfortunate the government decided it had to close the Collège militaire at St-Jean to save $15 or $20 million, although that is not a foregone conclusion.

The other point I wanted to raise is that at the CMR, bilingual officer training had been particularly effective, not only for francophones who learned English but also for anglophones who learned French. It was also an important tool for recruiting people from Canadian provinces where the standard of secondary education was not sufficient for entrance to university. This was true in the maritimes, where one-quarter of the students came from. There were 150 anglophone and francophone cadets from the maritimes who came to St-Jean because it was a good way to get admitted to Kingston.

The important thing is not whether the CMR will close or whether Kingston will be bilingual. I have lived in Kingston myself, and I have my doubts. Not that Kingston is not a nice city; it is, but we cannot expect Kingston to be what it is not. This will be a problem.

The other criterion is whether the proportion or percentage of francophone officers in the military will be maintained. I have serious doubts on that score. An unacceptable proportion of francophone officers 20 years down the line would undermine the legitimacy of the armed forces in an environment such as ours in Quebec. I find that unfortunate.

About the budget, I just want to mention one thing: The minister tells us that the government wants to save money. First of all, that is uncertain; the figures are very contradictory. I have data here to indicate, for example, according to the superintendent of the College, that there is a difference of several million dollars between what the federal government says and what actually goes on.

I do not want to debate figures, because to me this is a secondary argument.

However, I would point out to the minister that if he wants to save money — and we are prepared to do our share in the province of Quebec — there is a very simple solution: There is a military housing development behind the Sainte-Foy shopping centre near my home in the Quebec City suburb of Sainte-Foy, not half a mile from my house, in fact, with about 50 houses that were built after the war. This piece of land is about half a mile long and a quarter mile wide; the land alone is probably worth about $10 million, maybe more, not to mention the value of the houses themselves. He could save his $20 million here. There are 400 vacant housing units in Sainte-Foy. It would be easy, therefore, to find alternative housing for affected military personnel.

I know how budget decisions are made: It is all put together by public servants; they draw up a shopping list and present it. I think that they could have cut so many other places in the defence department. It would have been easy, on an $11-billion budget, to find some way to save $20 million without closing the university. I fail to understand how the government can persist in this reasoning. I think that enlightened leadership on an issue such as this, would have reversed this nonsensical decision. It is a mistake.

[English]

It is an administrative blunder by civil servants. That is what it is. The government should put its —

[Translation]

The ministers should exercise some authority and make the decision. This is not something for civil servants to decide. I think that this is what should have been done. I find it extremely unfortunate, particularly when we are having problems in Quebec — and you know what kind of problems I mean — that this should have been done now. The ministers must take the blame for this.

I think the government will perhaps reach an agreement with Quebec. Even if such an agreement is worked out, it will not solve the fundamental problem. It is not an agreement with Quebec that we want, but rather federal responsibility for a national institution. On this I am "dead on."

We cannot let this go through. That is why I have spoken repeatedly on this subject and do so again today.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I would like to speak to you about the same interim report, that is the sixth report produced by the National Finance Committee, and on the same subject as well. The committee report states that other issues, cuts, government intentions and so on were examined.

If we chose — I am one of those, on this side of the Chamber — to examine this particular subject on a priority basis, it is because, as Senator Bolduc just said, this is a national institution. Its closing could cause irreparable loss and harm to the country and the Canadian Armed Forces, which the government of the day — some 50 years ago — sought to improve linguistically and culturally because at the time there were not enough francophone officers.

I have had occasion, both in Fredericton and here — and I was surely not alone — to speak often to please the crowd or to embarrass the opposition, our adversaries, and perhaps to have a little fun!

I can tell you that I am not kidding today on this subject. I am pleading with the government, as best I can, to reverse a decision made on the basis of suggestions from civil servants — as my friend, Senator Bolduc, just said — which Minister Collenette accepted, probably without fully understanding the significance of this action.

We suspect that most of the ministers in the Chrétien government first heard of this decision on the floor of the House of Commons, when the Budget was tabled on February 22. That is the way it goes!

The government has had ample opportunity to re-examine this decision. It fielded questions, supplications and repeated requests from a slew of people, many of whom appeared before our committee and all of whom were strongly opposed to this decision, as we were throughout the course of our examination.

In particular, six groups of witnesses, which I will name in a few minutes, urged the government to reverse this decision, which undoubtedly will prove very harmful to the armed forces and to Canada. The decision is particularly ill-timed, given the present political and constitutional situation.

I cannot understand this statement that Mr. Collenette made to the House of Commons on February 24, 1994, two days after the budget was brought down, which clearly contradicts another statement that a certain Pierre Elliott Trudeau made several years before on the same subject of the presence of the military college in St-Jean and the wisdom of the decision to give training courses there.

I will quote this statement by Mr. Collenette for you:

> I completely reject the idea that you can have bilingual institutions only in Quebec. In Canada, francophones must feel comfortable everywhere. That was the dream of Mr. Trudeau and the Liberals of old.

It would be desirable to have other bilingual institutions elsewhere in Canada outside Quebec. It seems that it would be a little harder to achieve in Kingston! I said that this statement conflicted with or flatly contradicted another statement that Prime Minister Trudeau made on October 8, 1977, on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the college:

[English]

> ... it has one even more significant feature: it is a totally bilingual institution. I cannot think of any place where bilingualism is more respected or more thoroughly practised than here. When we recall the wearisome difficulties we come up against elsewhere in the public and private sectors, your success in this area — which seems somewhat disconcerting at first glance — really excites the imagination.

Mr. Trudeau goes on to say:

> You are the living proof that the ideal of Canadian bilingualism is not an illusion but an immediate possibility, ready to spring forth from the roots of the nation - given a small but sincere effort to reach beyond ourselves and our own particularities.

[Translation]

At least on this point, Minister Collenette disagrees with a previous statement made by Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

It gets worse. In spite of all the questions that have been raised — this was clear from reading the answers given to us by Senator Fairbairn, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, late last Thursday, June 14, 1994 — it is clear that Minister Collenette has completely disregarded the contradictory statements coming from his officers, from the dean of the military college, from former DND officials and from people in his own department.

These contradictions are evident, whether the debate centres on capital costs for current and future operations, the number of officer cadets that have been or could be recruited or the percentage of francophone officers who received their training in St-Jean.

No doubt repeating an earlier statement made by his colleague Mr. Collenette, Minister Massé told us that the situation was not serious because, first of all, francophone officer cadets could just as easily be recruited from universities as from the three colleges. He went on to add that only 17 per cent of francophone officers had been trained in St-Jean, whereas the correct figure is 82 per cent. When the government is confronted with these contradictions, it has nothing to say. It continues to tell us that there is a $6.9 million fund to cover all unexpected future costs, that everything will be fine and that they will save $23 million to boot.

We realize full well, as Senator Bolduc and others before him have said, that if the government were serious about wanting to have all provinces share in cost-cutting measures, it could have sold off its property holdings in Ste-Foy or it could have cut elsewhere. There is talk of eventually cutting $5 billion or $6 billion over the next five or six years. Considering the cost of military equipment, it seems that $23 million could easily have been saved without attacking this institution. I think that from the outset, the government was had.

I once belonged to a government that was had by officials, perhaps because it did not conduct the proper analyses during the period leading up to the tabling of the budget. In certain instances, we reviewed the situation and when the public saw that we were acting in good faith and were prepared to admit our mistakes, it forgave us for our hasty, ill-conceived decision. They said, "Here is a government that listens to us."

I will dispense with the list of all the questions that have remained unanswered. Maybe we will have an opportunity to come back to this subject. As you know, the debate is not over yet. Let us just say that we are wrapping up one phase of the debate. I call upon the government to review this matter at the earliest opportunity.

Senator Bolduc is not fiercely partisan. He is more of a fiscal conservative. He has proven this recently and under the former government. He made a number of suggestions, some of which were followed. Senator Bolduc is not prone to knee-jerk reactions and is certainly not wont to go off half-cocked. The same can be said of Senator Kinsella. I, on the other hand, am slightly more excitable because I love a good fight.

I think this is a fundamental question. What led me to take an even closer look at this decision, in particular, is the fact that this budget decision was made by an anglicized department. This department has led the field, over the past 25 years, in terms of anti-bilingualism and injustices under the Official Languages Act. The Department of National Defence has won the "Prix du lys flétri," literally the withered fleur-de-lys award, given annually to the department most guilty of injustices and infractions under the Official Languages Act. The answers we received indicate that the Department of National Defence will be a prime candidate for attention from the Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. Goldbloom, next year. It makes you think. I am not confident. I can tell you that I do not quote Mr. Trudeau too often and refer to his recent or past statements as what the doctor ordered. In this case, however, I think I prefer Mr. Trudeau's words to those of Mr. Collenette, although I am sure he is a man of good faith and all that. I think he lacks experience. I think he was sold a bill of goods.

Before I conclude, I would like the government to be receptive to more than just the opinions of Liberal delegates at a weekend convention, as was apparently the case recently with Bill C-18. Honourable senators will recall that delegates to that convention from Ontario and British Columbia, among others, had enough influence to alter the government decision on Bill C-18.

I would like the government to listen to other people as well, such as those who represented the groups that appeared before our committee. I will name them for you. There was the committee for the future of CMR de St-Jean —

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Honourable Senator Simard, but I assume he is nearing his conclusion. I must tell the honourable senator that the time allotted to him is up, unless there is agreement to let him finish.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I could perhaps stop until we get to Inquiry No. 8, which was raised by Senator Phillips. However, if you want me to continue, I will be finished in about five minutes.

Honourable senators, I would like the government to listen to representatives from the committee on the future of the military college in St-Jean and to former rector Roch Carrier, recently appointed to a higher position in a different field. I would also like the government to listen to suggestions, arguments and objections expressed by the Director General of the City of St-Jean and by representatives from CROP-Conseil, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, CMR alumni groups — one from Quebec and the other one from outside Quebec — and the association of language teachers who teach at the St-Jean school, now the largest government language training school. As I was saying earlier, these people are all strongly opposed in various ways to the government's decision regarding this bill.

[English]

It is a budgetary decision of the government to close the military college at St-Jean. The timing of the decision is bad, and it is as a result of the toss of a coin. The decision was made before conducting a study on the long-term defence needs of Canada. If the government is serious about the future of the army, the need to refurbish and equip it and determine the number of people needed, it should have awaited the results of a study. The government should collect all of the information before it determines that 900 people will need to be trained. At this time, that decision is nothing less than provocation of the separatist forces in Quebec. The decision has caught the cabinet by surprise.

We hear that the federal government is negotiating with the Government of Quebec, and perhaps a deal might be signed shortly. For New Brunswickers and Canadians living inside or outside Quebec, any decision or agreement at any cost that does not include military training in the French milieu is no good, and will not satisfy Canadians. It will not satisfy New Brunswickers. Certainly, I am sure most Canadians do not see the need for a large, new, modern, Berlitz school in St-Jean. What is needed is training en français.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I give notice that we will continue this debate, even into July and August and in all possible and conceivable fora, because it lies at the heart of the Canadian unity problem.

[English]

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few remarks on the interim report as it relates to the Collège militaire at St-Jean. This is an interim report, and it is understood that we will be able to ask further questions relating to the decision of the government to close this military college.

A witness who testified in committee underscored the fact that this is the first time in the history of Canadian universities that government action is closing a university. Representatives from the Canadian Association of University Teachers were particularly concerned with the fact that this is a terrible precedent to establish whereby we close a university without any program evaluation. Not only is that a difficulty in and of itself in terms of trying to understand what is happening, but by all reports the military college in St-Jean is doing an excellent job, so that, in terms of results, it is a success story.

From the standpoint of an anglophone Canadian, the military college in St-Jean provided a unique opportunity to become immersed in the dominant French culture, to study as an anglophone Canadian in a minority cultural situation in the dominant francophone culture. That is what was unique about the Collège militaire. Many students from my part of Canada expressed to me directly the particular benefit they had experienced, having had the opportunity to study at that military college.

In terms of who we are and the type of people we are, the Collège militaire in St-Jean was almost a symbol of Canada as a bilingual country, and it was efficacious. It spoke directly to who we are as a bilingual country.

Many suggestions have been made about one military university, if indeed we could afford one. It seems to me it is possible that we could have one military university with several campuses. I would hope that that idea will be explored in the period to come.

Through our questioning of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, we have had an opportunity to receive more details on the numbers around this dossier, and she has been very helpful in providing replies to the questions we have asked. Unfortunately, the answers we received engender more questions, so I think one could expect that the National Finance Committee will need to keep this issue alive.

As a final point, while these things are never certain until they happen, it is my understanding that, as the Leader of the Government has told us, progress is being made in negotiations between the Governments of Quebec and Canada to find a new mission for the college, and that they are very close to reaching an agreement which will provide for the maintenance of a significant military presence in that college.

If that is the case, and federal money is to be spent, while I will be supportive of whatever creativity is brought to bear on the future of the college, it does speak to the issue of what the saving is in dollars and cents. We are told, over and over again, that it is $23.1 million. If the continuance of the college will require an investment of $4 million or $5 million a year under this new model, we know for sure that the saving is not in the order of $20 million. We did not think that would be the case, in any event.

Many questions remain. I hope that the National Finance Committee will continue to keep the file open.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to remind honourable senators that this question has been discussed at great length in the Senate. Detailed answers to the questions raised by the opposition have been provided. In addition, our leader has invited the opposition to be briefed, at their convenience, by the officials in order to have any remaining questions answered. I hope that we are now in a position to adopt the report.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1994-95

SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for the second reading of Bill C-39, An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, as you are aware, it has been the custom in this place not to debate the appropriations bill in great detail. We in the Senate do our work through the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. To that end, the interim report has been debated at length. I am sure that as the year progresses, we will bring in other reports on other items in the Estimates which honourable senators on the committee might wish to pursue. Some of the options available were listed in the report which we presented. These and other opportunities will be given to senators to question various Estimates of the government in the course of the year.

To that extent, I see no reason why we should hold up the passage of Bill C-39.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE HONOURABLE MARIO BEAULIEU

TRIBUTES ON OCCASION OF RESIGNATION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is always difficult to say goodbye to colleagues who must leave us because they have reached the mandatory retirement age, but at least in those instance, we can prepare ourselves mentally for that fateful day. However, when a colleague decides for personal reasons to leave the Senate before his mandate is up, his departure is even harder to accept because it comes as a total surprise.

Yesterday, we learned of Senator Mario Beaulieu's decision. He had already advised me that certain circumstances might force him to make a decision that no one wanted him to make. Indeed, we learned on Tuesday evening that he had submitted his letter of resignation to the Governor General that morning.

I am saddened not only because I am losing a hard-working, faithful colleague, but also because I am losing a close friend who has been active in politics with me for more than 25 years.

Throughout his career, both in the private and public sectors, Mario has displayed such qualities as integrity, loyalty and generosity of spirit, qualities which are unfortunately becoming less and less appreciated given the cynicism that those with the courage to work in both sectors often face.

[English]

Mario Beaulieu has never hesitated to further the cause of his community, for he has always been, and will continue to be, one who feels proud and privileged to be part of Quebec society. To some, he is a contradiction: A nationalistic Quebecer and a loyal Canadian. We have recently heard words from a member on the government side to the effect that a person cannot be one and the other at the same time. What a misunderstanding of Quebec and of Canada!

Mario Beaulieu represents what Quebec is all about: a society anxious about its future, yet equally keen to secure it within Canada. Sadly, it is the Lucien Bouchards who get all the headlines. It is to be hoped, honourable senators, that with a little tolerance and understanding, it is the Mario Beaulieus who will keep this country together.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand Roberge: I want to pay tribute today to our colleague Senator Mario Beaulieu, who had to resign from the Senate after his company, Simard-Beaudry, was the lowest bidder and obtained a Department of Public Works contract.

Unfortunately, what I consider an archaic law that dates back to 1876 prevents any company owned by a senator from bidding on a Public Works contract, even if that company is a public corporation.

Senator Beaulieu has made his mark in several fields of activity: as a notary, as the chairman of the board of Simard-Beaudry, as a deputy minister in Quebec City, as a politician, particularly as the late Daniel Johnson's chief of staff, as a member of the National Assembly, as Quebec's Minister of Finance, and as a senator.

Our colleague Mario has many admirable qualities, but two of the most notable are his great generosity and his availability.

I had the honour to be escorted into this prestigious Chamber by Senator Beaulieu, who has guided me through the workings of the Senate and who has been a confidant and a friend.

Mario has led a very full and successful life. Today, we bid him farewell from the Senate and good luck in his future endeavours.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of my colleagues, I wish to echo the sentiments of my friends in the opposition. The message that we have received is a surprise. We wish Senator Beaulieu a very long and fruitful career as he returns to his province of Quebec, where he served for many years prior to coming to this place in 1990.

Mario Beaulieu was first elected to the Quebec National Assembly in 1969, and had a very active career within that legislative body. He was appointed Minister of Immigration, Minister of Financial Institutions, and Minister of Finance and President of the Treasury Board. Those are the kinds of roles and experience that enabled him to bring a voice of reason and understanding to the issues that come before a federal Parliament.

In addition to his legislative experience, he has also had a very long association with his party, the Conservative Party, beginning with the young Progressive Conservatives of Quebec back in the 1950s, and he has remained true and loyal to the cause ever since. He has had a very successful private career as a notary and a businessman, and as my friend Senator Lynch-Staunton has said, he has always been involved in the community, in the Laval Kiwanis and the Scouts, and, at one point — and Senator Hébert will be interested to learn this — as vice-president of Katimivik, I am told. We wish Senator Beaulieu and his family well, and we will miss his presence in this chamber.

[Translation]

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I have known Senator Beaulieu in a political rather than a business context. Senator Beaulieu and I were both active in the Union Nationale and the Conservative Party.

I met Senator Beaulieu for the first time 33 years ago, when we both supported Daniel Johnson in the race for the leadership of the Union Nationale, at the convention held in Quebec City in 1961. At the time, Mario was one of the main convention organizers, and as you know, Mr. Johnson subsequently became premier of the province of Quebec. As mentioned earlier, Senator Beaulieu was appointed to the cabinet of the Honourable Jean-Jacques Bertrand as minister of finance.

Subsequently, Senator Beaulieu and I witnessed the unfortunate disintegration of the Union Nationale. However, we were both very much into politics and also very active Conservatives. Granted, after Mr. Diefenbaker's time, our party experienced a long drought, but nevertheless, Senator Beaulieu remained a faithful member of the Conservative Party, even when times were hard.

I remember that during the Pearson and Trudeau years, when few Quebecers voted Conservative, Mario and I were often on the front lines. Mario knew how to boost the morale of those who came from outside. I was responsible for Northwestern Quebec, including the vast region of Abitibi, Rouyn-Noranda and Témiscamingue, and every election, Senator Beaulieu told me we had to work hard because we might win.

Today, however, I have a confession to make to Senator Beaulieu, who will probably have time to read this in Hansard.

The fact is that during the Conservative drought, we had a few political phenomena in our region, and I am referring to Réal Caouette and Social Credit. Réal Caouette was king of the Abitibi, Rouyn-Noranda and Témiscamingue, and of practically the whole province of Quebec. Although Mario asked me to work hard for the Conservative Party, I must confess that on two occasions, I voted for Réal Caouette.

Senator Molgat: An ardent federalist!

Senator Grimard: As Senator Molgat just said, an ardent federalist. What else could I do? As you very aptly pointed out, Senator Molgat, he was a federalist, but also a fellow citizen, a friend and one of my clients. Mario, I hope you will forgive me when you read this in Hansard.

In concluding, I would like to mention a few qualities that are typical of Senator Beaulieu. Senator Roberge already mentioned his extreme generosity, but I would like to add that Senator Beaulieu is not only extremely generous, but often anonymously so, and that is worth mentioning!

Senator Beaulieu is modest and always prepared to serve without expecting anything in return, which is worth mentioning as well. I repeat: He was and is always prepared to serve without expecting anything in return.

Finally, I want to say we will miss you, Senator Beaulieu. Personally, Mario, I miss you already.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I knew Mario Beaulieu in 1966 when he arrived in Quebec City as Premier Johnson's chief of staff.

At the time, I was a public service commissioner. As you know, when there is a change of government, it is always very important, and not always easy, for the premier's chief of staff and the commission, at the time referred to as the Civil Service Commission and later as the Public Service Commission, to have a good relationship. Having played a key role in Mr. Johnson's victory, Mario had to deal with a custom that was firmly anchored in political circles in Quebec and also with a somewhat ambivalent perception of the Union Nationale, which was common at the time.

I must say that Mario Beaulieu never showed any favouritism towards one of his friends or anyone else during that time. He was never like that. Our relations were excellent. I think we played our role as senior public servants and he played his as the premier's chief of staff.

Indeed, he was the rallying point around which senior civil servants were able to join hands. Thanks to him, the Union Nationale government, during the quiet revolution, decided to trust the mandarins of the day to continue playing an effective role in public administration. These same senior public servants — and I could name them all — worked very closely with the then premier of Quebec.

When Mr. Bertrand took power in 1969, following the death of Mr. Johnson in 1968, Mario Beaulieu became the province's Minister of Finance. Since we already had excellent relations with him, he asked us to work on the 1969 budget, and we worked fiendishly for three or four months to present the best budget possible. Unfortunately, an election was called in April and the Finance Minister was never able to table his budget. I know, from having spoken to him since, that he remembers it nonetheless. You know, the various phases of budget preparation leave a lasting impact on a man.

It is that time, in particular, that I wanted to share with you about Senator Beaulieu. He is a generous, loyal, sober, humble and very sensitive man — which is probably why he is not here with us today. I know that he is embarrassed by such testimonials.

Senator Beaulieu has been my friend for 25 years. I wish him all the best in his endeavours.

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, I was not aware that Senator Beaulieu was leaving us, and I am sorry I did not hear about it until this morning.

I have to leave right away, because I have a routine appointment with the doctor at the hospital before I go to Montreal.

Mario Beaulieu has always been a prominent member of the French-Canadian business community in Montreal. I say French-Canadian because I am old-fashioned. Today, people say québécois —

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Old-fashioned is fine!

Senator Riel: This means that, although he is retiring from the Senate, Mario Beaulieu will continue to be a prominent member of the French-Canadian community in Montreal. We will see him around, cheerful and dynamic as always, the epitome of the successful French-Canadian businessman, and I am sorry that one of his companies should be the cause for his resignation. However, when you are in business, you have to weigh the advantages and disadvantages and act accordingly.

I hope he will be as successful as he has been in the past, and I hope we will continue to see him. I am sorry to be so brief, because there is much I could say about Mario Beaulieu. We have known each other for a long time. In Montreal, we were both involved in various activities at the same time. I wish him good luck.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to pay tribute to Senator Mario Beaulieu. Mario and I both received our classical education in Montreal at the Jesuit colleges of Saint-Ignace and Sainte-Marie.

I became a lawyer and he became a notary. He went into politics, while I concentrated on a university career.

Mario Beaulieu held various important positions, including that of Quebec Minister of Finance. After many years, we met again in the Senate in 1990. As he leaves the upper house today, I wish him every success in his business.

Again, the very best!

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

SAINT-JEAN-BAPTISTE DAY

FELICITATIONS TO FRENCH CANADIANS

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I would like to take a few moments to recall that tomorrow is Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day, the national holiday of French Canadians.

Senator Riel need not apologize for speaking of French Canadians, because that is what I truly feel I am.

I would simply like to remind honourable senators that the origins of Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day date back to 1834 when Ludger Duvernay felt that the descendants of the French in New France should have a common day on which to celebrate their heritage. Over the years, this event has grown and expanded, to the point where it is now celebrated as the national holiday of all French-Canadians. It is my fervent wish that it remain so.

Of course, Quebec celebrates this holiday in a special way, since it is the focus of la Francophonie in North America. May I just say to my fellow Quebecers that I hope that the years ahead, during which important decisions will be made, will not lead to the division of this country that is home to francophones or people whose culture is French, but rather provide an opportunity to strengthen the ties that bind and unite us all as Canadians.

I invite all Canadians to join in the celebrations that may be taking place right in their own community.

I also hope that this day will give Canadians who speak other languages or come from other cultures a chance to learn a little more about this country's history. People often harbour misconceptions, not because they are lacking in goodwill, but because of ignorance, or they fail to understand the aspirations of their fellow citizens. Far be it for me to lecture my colleagues, but each one should endeavour in his or her own community to heighten public awareness that Canada was founded by two peoples, along with the native peoples, who were forgotten for too long, and that we must all work together to make this country prosper.

In the meantime, I want to wish all my fellow French Canadians a happy Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day.

THE SENATE

RETURN TO CHAMBER OF DEPUTY LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I welcome back to this chamber the Deputy Leader of the Government. Senator Molgat — and this was almost a condition of the job — has been in Europe as an honorary colonel of the Royal Winnipeg Rifles over the last few weeks, commencing with D-day. He has been travelling in France, Belgium and Holland as part of a Canadian group that went there to commemorate with those European countries the comrades who fell during the war, and also to commemorate the liberation of those countries at the end of the war. He has been missed, and we welcome him back.

I also want to say thank you to Senator Stanbury who, as we all know, is one of the most experienced people in this place. He is a true friend of the Senate, and has conducted himself with customary skill, enormous patience and great good humour. I am in the happy position of being surrounded by the incredible wisdom, support and experience of my colleagues.

I thank Senator Stanbury, and welcome back Senator Molgat.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, presented the following report:

Thursday, June 23, 1994

The Senate Special Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on February 23, 1994, to examine the legal, social and ethical issues relating to euthanasia and assisted suicide, and to present its final report no later than December 15, 1994, respectfully requests that, notwithstanding Rule 93(1) which requires that all Committee meetings are to be public, it be empowered to hold occasional meetings in camera for the purpose of hearing witnesses and gathering specialized or sensitive information.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN NEIMAN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Neiman: With leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a), I move that the report be considered now, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, the committee is asking permission to hold certain parts of hearings in camera. We have had discussions with certain witnesses who are prepared to give rather sensitive and specialized evidence to the committee, but not on the public record. They have presented sufficient reasons in this regard. The committee is satisfied that under very exceptional circumstances it is prepared to hear evidence in camera in order to have the knowledge necessary to help it make decisions in the future.

I ask that the Senate agree to this request.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, we on this side of the house fully agree with what was said by Senator Neiman.

[English]

Hon Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I ask the chairman of the committee to explain why the committee needs the authority of the Senate to do this.

• (1040)

Senator Neiman: Under rule 93, we are not allowed to have in camera meetings except for discussions dealing with labour relations, wages and salaries, et cetera. However, we can have in camera meetings with a sub-committee. By way of subterfuge, we could call a meeting of our sub-committee and hold in camera meetings, but this subject is important and all committee members should be present. We would prefer to do it openly and receive the permission of the Senate for these exceptional hearings.

Hon. Lowell Murray: I do not want to quarrel — and, in fact, I do not — with the decision that the committee has come to after due consideration, but I would like to know the ground rules. Because the meeting is being held in camera, I take it that no verbatim transcript would be kept. Is it the intention of the chairman to report in any way to the Senate on the evidence that is heard in the course of those hearings?

Senator Neiman: We will have to assess the evidence bit by bit. There are certain implications. We can report in a general way. We would like to have some verbatim evidence that the committee may wish to study after the evidence is complete. We may be able to make general use of the testimony when we make our report. However, we would not want to include specific identifications in our report. We would respect that type of confidentiality.

In general, the committee feels strongly that it wants to hear as much evidence as possible in public so that we can make use of it all in our report, if we feel it is appropriate.

Senator Murray: Are the witnesses seeking any other assurances besides the opportunity to testify in an in camera session? For example, are the witnesses seeking an assurance of immunity with regard to their testimony before your committee?

Senator Neiman: They do not need to make that request. We do have parliamentary immunity regarding testimony before the committee. I think their reasons are more sensitive or personal than that.

Senator Frith: I have a question of procedure. The chairman is not asking for permission, but that rule 93 be suspended. It is important to proceed in that fashion, because we must then realize that we are suspending a rule that establishes the principle of public access to all Senate committee hearings. This is not a matter that should be taken lightly, but I want to be persuaded by the chairman of the committee.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Frith raises a valid point.

Senator Neiman discussed this matter with me some time ago. There are some reservations on the part of witnesses who will be giving useful information to the committee. They have reservations in that they think they could be subject to legal problems should they fully expose their knowledge and experience to the committee. Yet, from the committee's standpoint, their evidence may be useful.

While this involves a change in our rules, I think the request by the committee chairman is valid, and that the committee should hear these people. Subsequently, should the committee disagree as far as the confidentiality of the matter is concerned, the committee could go back to the witnesses and tell them that they want the hearings to be made public. That could then involve a decision of the committee and of the people who appeared to give evidence.

For the time being, the request is valid. The committee should be free to hear these people, subject to a further decision.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Perhaps I missed something, honourable senators, but I did not hear the motion. Will this be done by way of motion?

Senator Neiman: It is a request within the second report of the committee. The committee is reporting and, within its second report, it is asking for permission.

As Senator Frith has said, a more correct wording would have been: "To suspend rule 93(1)" rather than "notwithstanding," but that is the effect of it and of the request in the report.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I repeat that I did not hear the motion. I should like to have a look at the motion. If you suspend a rule does it mean that you suspend it just for that meeting, or is the rule suspended permanently?

Senator Berntson: Just for that meeting.

Senator Neiman: I will repeat the request for Senator Thériault. In the report itself it states that the committee:

> ...respectfully requests that, notwithstanding rule 93(1) which requires that all Committee meetings are to be public, it be empowered to hold occasional meetings in camera for the purpose of hearing witnesses and gathering specialized or sensitive information.

Senator Thériault: If your request is that the rule be suspended, you will have to change the wording of your request to include the word, "suspend."

Senator Frith: The word "notwithstanding" is there. I believe the wording will be satisfactory if you underline the request with the words "notwithstanding rule 95..." and we, therefore, will know what we are doing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there has been a fairly lengthy discussion of this matter. Senator Neiman has presented the committee's report. Should the question be put?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

EXCISE ACT
INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-32, to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act and the Income Tax Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1050)

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, Bill C-32 will implement a number of income tax and excise changes announced over the past three months. These changes include a range of legislative amendments to implement the government's national action plan on smuggling announced February 8, 1994, and amendments to the Air Transportation Act and the Goods and Services Tax announced in the federal budget of February 22, 1994.

There can be little doubt that the increasing market penetration of contraband tobacco products over the past few years has caused serious economic and social consequences for government, businesses and citizens of Canada. Governments have suffered a sharp decline in revenues derived from taxation of tobacco products. These revenues are an important part of government tax collection and are used to provide funding for programs and services across many areas of responsibility.

Growing acceptance of contraband tobacco products among Canadian consumers has caused legitimate wholesalers and retailers to suffer a market decline in their business interests. At the other end of the smuggling equation, the profits from tobacco smuggling steadily increased and flowed more and more into the hands of organized criminal networks.

Citizens of Canada began to express an understandable concern with the climate of increased lawlessness and violence surrounding the contraband trade. As well, the ready availability of inexpensive black-market tobacco products to consumers of all ages was impairing the government's health policies to discourage tobacco consumption, particularly among young people.

Responding to these concerns, the government announced a comprehensive anti-smuggling initiative on February 8, 1994, designed to eliminate smuggling as a significant national problem. At the forefront of this national action plan was an increase in enforcement. Both the RCMP and Canada Customs were assigned greater resources to intensify their efforts along the Canada-U.S. border and to target organized criminal networks now dealing in contraband tobacco and other products.

As a complement to increased enforcement and to stymie the increasing market share of contraband tobacco products across the country, the government undertook a national $5 reduction in rates of excise tax on tobacco products. The government also offered to match provincial tobacco tax reductions in excess of $5, up to a maximum total federal reduction of $10, so as to allow for a more concentrated effort in those areas where smuggling was particularly entrenched.

Matching reductions have now been undertaken in response to provincial tax reductions in Quebec, New Brunswick, Ontario, Prince Edward Island, and Nova Scotia.

To ensure that tobacco corporations did not derive any benefit from the reduction in tobacco taxes, the government also moved to impose a new health-promotion surtax on corporate profits from tobacco manufacturing and processing. This new surtax will apply for a three-year period and will fund the largest anti-smoking campaign ever undertaken in Canada.

Finally, the government moved to help the smuggling problem by reimposing an excise tax on exported tobacco products so as to reduce shipments that could fuel the contraband trade.

In addition to these excise and income tax changes, Bill C-32 also contains a number of related measures that are critical to ensuring the long-term success of the national action plan on smuggling. All wholesalers and retailers are eligible to apply for a full inventory rebate in respect of the national $5 excise tax reduction. The rebate is applicable to their tax-paid inventories of cigarettes, tobacco sticks and fine-cut tobacco held as of midnight, February 8, 1994.

Where federal excise taxes are further reduced to match provincial tax reductions, partial inventory rebates are being provided. Wholesalers and retailers can apply for the additional rebate in respect of their inventories of cigarettes in excess of a certain threshold amount held as of the effective date of the matching federal excise tax reduction.

Administration of the inventory rebate program is the responsibility of Revenue Canada. This bill will provide the Minister of National Revenue with the authority to pay out inventory rebate amounts once it receives Royal Assent.

Responding to the variable excise tax reductions undertaken to match provincial tax reductions, Bill C-32 contains new tax liability and offence provisions designed to ensure that tobacco products marked for sale in a particular province are restricted to personal consumption in that province and are not diverted to any other province.

Towards this end, wholesalers and retailers are liable to pay an additional federal excise tax on any sale of marked tobacco products to a person in another province. As well, the legislation makes it an offence, subject to a fine, for any person to sell or offer for sale tobacco products marked for consumption in one province to a consumer located in another province.

These two measures will substantially impair the potential for interprovincial diversion of tobacco products from low-tax jurisdictions. I would note, however, that while the collection of the additional federal excise tax can be enforced immediately, the offence provisions cannot come into force until such time as this bill receives Royal Assent. Also, with respect to matching federal excise tax reductions, the bill contains provisions to ensure that unmarked tobacco products may be sold on reserve to Indians in Ontario and Nova Scotia at the reduced rates of federal excise tax that would otherwise apply to marked tobacco products in each province.

Finally, the legislation amends the fines in the Excise Act for possession or sale of tobacco products on which federal taxes have not been paid. Because these fines were based on previous rates of federal excise tax, this amendment is necessary to maintain the fines at their former minimum and maximum amounts.

Honourable senators, these changes to the excise and income tax structures affecting tobacco products are an integral part of the government's action plan to combat smuggling. Combined with increased enforcement, these measures form a comprehensive approach that will work to eliminate smuggling as a significant national problem.

Bill C-32 also implements changes to the air transportation tax. Honourable senators may recall that the budget of February 22, 1994, proposed certain changes to the structure of the air transportation tax to reduce the tax burden on short-haul domestic and transporter flights and to recover a greater proportion of the cost of air facilities and services provided by Transport Canada.

For domestic and transporter flights, the air transportation tax is comprised of both a flat tax component and an ad valorem component up to a stipulated maximum. Bill C-32 will alter the structure of the air transportation tax in respect of domestic and transporter flights by reducing the flat tax component while increasing the maximum amount.

For international flights where the air transportation tax is comprised solely of a flat tax, this amount is being increased.

Finally, Bill C-32 contains one change to the goods and services tax that was announced in the February 22, 1994 budget. The Excise Tax Act will be amended to reduce the income tax credit in respect of the goods and services tax paid on eligible business meals and entertainment from 80 per cent to 50 per cent. This change will better reflect the personal consumption element of these expenses and is consistent with the reduction in the income tax deduction for business meals and entertainment expenses from 80 per cent to 50 per cent.

• (1100)

In conclusion, Bill C-32 is an important bill. It enacts a number of provisions that will make a significant contribution to the government's efforts to combat the trade in contraband tobacco products. Bill C-32 also implements changes to the air transportation tax, the goods and services tax, and will improve the fairness and efficiency of the tax system.

I would remind honourable senators that two very important tobacco measures, the ability to pay inventory rebates and the offence provisions in respect of interprovincial diversion, will not take effect until this bill receives Royal Assent. I therefore urge you to give your attention to this bill and, if possible, give it speedy passage.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, Senator Hays has given us a good overview of Bill C-32. There are but a few particular items that I would like to focus on, recognizing this is an omnibus bill that includes some budgetary measures relating to the air transportation tax and the GST input credits on meals. There may be some questions of specificity that we would want to raise when we do clause-by-clause study relating to that matter.

I would call to the attention of honourable senators that when the bill was given second reading in the other place, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance stated:

> The primary purpose of the bill is to implement a range of measures related to tobacco taxation that were developed to combat the very serious smuggling problem facing Canada.

Let us focus for a few moments on those provisions. The Prime Minister announced the government's action plan on smuggling on February 8, and there are some commendable elements to that plan: the increased monetary and human resources devoted to law enforcement; renewal and extension of initiatives of the previous government to educate Canadians about the effects of tobacco consumption; and some of the measures included in this bill, such as the imposition of an export tax on cigarettes and a surtax imposed on the profits of manufacturing companies.

On the same day as the Prime Minister made this announcement, the Minister of Health issued a press release which stated:

> We recognize that there are health risks associated with some of the tax measures that we are taking. Let's be clear. On their own, lower prices are likely to lead to increased tobacco use, especially by young people ... For this reason ... there is a strong health component in the government's overall strategy. Starting immediately, we will spend $185 million on this health component over the next three years.

Honourable senators, that health component is to be funded by one of the desirable measures of this bill, the surtax on profits of tobacco manufacturing companies. Some have difficulties, however, even with this desirable element. This tax measure is expected to raise $200 million over the next three years. So far, we have seen only an announcement of $55 million in planned expenditures for an education campaign on the effects of smoking. Like those in the health community across the land, one would like to see some indication of where the rest of these revenues will go. One hopes that the government will follow through on its commitment to spend that money on the health care component of the tobacco strategy.

Others are also troubled by the limit of three years on this surtax. Why should it be limited at all, one might ask. Does the government expect that after three years of education on the subject, we will no longer have any smokers in Canada, and it will no longer be spending any health care dollars on the effects of smoking?

Another desirable provision of this bill is the imposition of an export tax of $8 per carton of cigarettes as well as taxes on other export and tobacco products. What one does not understand, however, is why the government did not try this measure first in combination with enhanced enforcement measures to see what effect they would have on the smuggling problem. Enforcement and export taxes were not given a chance to work. By dramatically decreasing the price of tobacco in this bill, the government has ensured that there is nothing left to attempt to enforce.

By reducing tobacco taxes in this bill by $5 per carton of cigarettes, and similar amounts on other tobacco products, and up to $10 per carton in provinces which choose to match that decrease, the government has clearly shown, as has been said before in this chamber by a number of honourable senators, that it views tobacco sales and consumption as simply a smuggling issue rather than a health problem. Health concerns have been lost in the rush to deal with the economic issue of illegal tobacco sales in the underground economy.

Tobacco prices were dramatically lowered by nearly 50 per cent in the province of Quebec over four months ago, immediately after the strategy was announced, even though we have yet to pass Bill C-32 into law. Neighbouring provinces such as Ontario, my own province of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island were effectively forced into following suit for fear of having their retailers lose the bulk of their sales to vendors in the province of Quebec. This is particularly true for those who live along the interprovincial border areas. This will inevitably also encourage consumption, as the Minister of Health noted in her press release, especially among young people who are the most susceptible to adopting the smoking habit and the most influenced by price changes.

This tax measure encourages our youth to experiment with the most toxic and addictive substance legally available in Canada. It comes at a time when all levels of government in Canada have been trying to discourage tobacco usage, especially by young people. We recently passed Bill C-11, which bans the sale of so-called "kiddy packs," but Bill C-32 will make it legal to sell a full package of cigarettes at a lower price than kiddy packs used to cost in some provinces. Because of the effects of this bill, our passage of Bill C-11 will have an effect only in the western provinces.

Bill C-32 also contains provisions to ensure that the province of origin of tobacco products is marked and to impose fines for selling tobacco for consumption in another province. Quite apart from the silliness this could create for tobacco sellers and consumers in areas like the National Capital Region, where people do frequently migrate across provincial borders for a lunch or dinner and might well buy tobacco while in the other province, these provisions suggest recognition by the government that these anti-smuggling measures have in fact created a new interprovincial smuggling problem. That was very apparent immediately after February 8 when the province of Quebec drastically lowered prices. Soon after, my own province of New Brunswick, then Ontario, then Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, were forced to do the same.

Whether it is admitted or not, Newfoundland and Labrador and the four western provinces are now facing the same problem. Bill C-32 does not solve the smuggling problem; it simply changes the borders where the problem exists, and we do not have customs officials at those borders to undertake enforcement.

Finally, honourable senators, there is evidence that by acting precipitously on this issue, the Canadian government may be on the verge of creating a reverse smuggling problem with the United States. In an article in The Globe and Mail on June 15 of this year at page 83, it was reported that the United States Supreme Court has recently issued a ruling that will allow the State of New York to limit the supply of untaxed cigarettes to Indian reservations.

The article also notes that fully taxed cigarettes in New York State now cost about 25 cents U.S. per pack more than in Ontario or in Quebec. If the expected U.S. health tax on cigarettes — estimated to be 75 cents to $1.25 per package — is added on later this year, Canadian cigarettes will be about $1.50 per package cheaper. On that point, it is fervently hoped that the federal government, the governments of Ontario and Quebec and the governments of the maritime provinces will consider significantly increasing taxes on tobacco.

In the meantime, Canada's enviable record of sending a health message and setting a healthy example to other countries — especially the United States — on tobacco taxes is seriously undermined, if not entirely destroyed, by some of the measures in Bill C-32.

On a more technical basis, in the bill at pages 41 and 30, one finds reference to formulae. On page 30 of the bill there is a formula which reads as follows:

$$U + (V \text{ times } W \text{ over } X) - (Y \text{ times } Z \text{ over } A_1) - B_1.$$

It is to be hoped that in committee we will be able to examine the full meaning of such a formula in a bill that is 62 pages long. It is also to be hoped that we will have sufficient time at the committee stage to fully examine the matter.

Senator Oliver: Perhaps Senator Hays will answer it now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Senator Eymard G. Corbin in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate in now in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-32, to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act, and the Income Tax Act.

Shall the title of the bill be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Pursuant to rule 21 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable David Walker, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we are honoured to have with us Mr. David Walker, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. David Walker, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance: Thank you, honourable senators, for the opportunity to be here today.

The officials with me are Mr. Brian Willis and Ms Patricia Malone from the Department of Finance, who are here to answer more detailed questions.

Senator Kinsella made reference to the mathematical chart on page 30 of the bill. The only exam I flunked in 21 years of education was during my first year math course at Carleton University. Therefore I will refer that question to the officials who are with me today.

For Senator Hays, thanks for your introductory speech on the second reading of Bill C-32. If Senator Hays sounded strong and healthy, it is because I fed him last night. He has a very good skill — he can sharpen knives. If any of you have a dull knife collection, just get Senator Hays to come by. He will sharpen every knife in your house.

Senator Frith: Mac the Knife!

Mr. Walker: I am sure he did not learn that at the Senate; he learned it at home.

Since Senator Hays has outlined most of the major considerations contained in Bill C-32, unless the Senate wishes to review those same points, I will consider them read. If there are specific questions, I would be more than happy to answer those questions and elaborate on any concerns that senators may have over this piece of legislation.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, may I suggest that we proceed on a clause-by-clause basis, unless there are senators who wish to make a general comment at this time.

Senator Kinsella: I have a few questions of a general nature.

Can the parliamentary secretary and the officials give an indication as to how much manufacturing of tobacco takes place in Atlantic Canada? I know that clause 1 of the bill gives a definition of Atlantic-manufactured tobacco. What is the profile of manufacturing across Canada?

Mr. Walker: In answer to your first question, my understanding from our officials is that there is practically no manufacturing of tobacco in Atlantic Canada. The primary manufacturers of tobacco are in Quebec, and the second largest tobacco-producing province is Ontario. That would account for the vast majority of production in this country.

Senator Kinsella: Why the need, then, to have Atlantic-manufactured tobacco defined this way?

• (1120)

Mr. Walker: This definition is used to distinguish those tobacco products that have the Atlantic marking, and are taxed at the full federal excise tax rates, from those tobacco products that have a distinct provincial marking and are taxed at the reduced federal excise tax rates. The exception is the Atlantic-marked cigarettes for retail sale on Prince Edward Island from June 1, 1994 to September 11, 1994.

Senator Kinsella: So "Atlantic-manufactured tobacco" is a bit of a misnomer. They are actually not manufactured in the Atlantic region?

Mr. Walker: The marking refers to distribution, and not to the actual production.

Senator Kinsella: The word is "manufactured" not "marketing," Minister.

Mr. Walker: I agree with you, Senator. In the definition in the act under subsection 2(1) "Atlantic-manufactured tobacco" is defined as manufactured tobacco, cigarettes, tobacco sticks and fine-cut tobacco that is marked for retail sale in the Atlantic provinces.

Senator Kinsella: The act distinguishes between Indians, or aboriginal persons defined as Indian, in relation to the Indian Act. There is no definition of aboriginal persons who are other than non-status. What is the public policy behind that?

Mr. Walker: Most of the policies of the federal government are based on the definition provided in the Indian Act as to who is an Indian. This is consistent with that definition.

Senator Kinsella: In newspaper accounts since January on smuggling, native persons in particular communities have been identified. Is that part of the reason for having Indians defined in this bill?

Mr. Walker: Yes, it is because the taxation policy on reserves concerning Indians as defined in the act is different from the taxation policies for the rest of the country. Therefore, the act has to recognize those distinctions, particularly in Ontario and Nova Scotia.

Senator Kinsella: I have a final generic question on some of the issues I attempted to raise in the debate here on second reading. It deals with the health issue. Are we to understand that the government's policy is to use the moneys generated here in part to fund the health education program over the next three years?

Mr. Walker: That is correct.

Senator Kinsella: Is there a particular reason why it is capped at three years?

Mr. Walker: The government is very cognizant of the health nature of its measures, and that there is a great deal of dispute within the health community as to the degree to which this may or may not encourage increased consumption. As you know, we are watching the StatsCanada material very closely.

As I said before the committee of the House of Commons, I would not belittle those who are concerned about this. Three years was put in on the assumption that within the next three years we will be reviewing this measure, and taxation will be subject to our ability to adjust taxes and to respond to any health issues that arise in that time.

Senator Hays: I join with other senators in welcoming the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Walker, to this chamber, particularly inasmuch as he is well known for his great hospitality.

My question arises out of Senator Kinsella's excellent speech. He spoke of a possible reverse smuggling problem in the event that the United States, as anticipated, increases its tobacco taxes as part of its health tax. Could you, Mr. Walker, comment on what would likely happen in that event? Is it anticipated that the Government of Canada would respond quickly, in that event, to increase excise taxes so that we could resume the situation where we had higher taxes on tobacco? I think that would please everyone who is against smoking in that it would make it more difficult for people to buy cigarettes, particularly young people.

Mr. Walker: Although this problem has not been raised formally by the American government or by the states with the Department of Finance, the enforcement agencies work very closely together on both sides of the border. There have been a number of media accounts speculating on the reverse flow, although this has not been brought to our attention in a formal way.

We do think that in some respects this will be of assistance to us in the short term. In the longer term, if it becomes an issue for the American states and the American national government, we will be very responsive to that. Since we just went through this battle ourselves, we are not about to create problems for other jurisdictions.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Senator Kinsella: Clause 11 amends section 99.2. What safeguards are in place for privacy and notice for persons who must make their records, books, accounts and vouchers available?

Mr. Walker: Revenue Canada follows its normal procedures and, in addition, the act specifically protects the privacy of the businesses and prohibits the release of any information dealing with any one of these plans of the department for each one of these businesses. It is specifically prohibited.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 13 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 14 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: We now go to Part II of the bill. Shall clause 15 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: We now proceed to Part III of the bill. Shall clause 16 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1130)

The Chairman: Honourable senators, before rising I wish to thank the honourable parliamentary secretary for his cheerful spirits and his excellent cooperation. Also, on behalf of the Committee of the Whole, I would thank the officials who have accompanied him.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I would also like to thank the senators for their cooperation. We all realize how busy June is and sometimes very important pieces of legislation come quickly to the Senate. I appreciate the tolerance and cooperation of the people in this chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-32, to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act and Income Tax Act, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Day Hays: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

YUKON FIRST NATIONS LAND CLAIMS SETTLEMENT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-33, to approve, give effect to and declare valid land claims agreements entered into between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, the Government of the Yukon Territory and certain First Nations in the Yukon Territory, to provide for approving, giving effect to and declaring valid other land claims agreements entered into after this Act comes into force, and to make consequential amendments to other Acts.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I rise to address Bill C-33, the Yukon First Nations Land Claims Settlement Bill.

I am extremely pleased to be bringing this bill before the Senate at this time. Today, we are being asked to continue to demonstrate the good faith and wise judgment that was demonstrated by our colleagues in the other place as they quickly dealt with this important piece of legislation.

We are being asked to bring a fair and respectable end to many years of difficult negotiations to provide a basis for the beginning of the Yukon Indians and a new partnership between governments and Yukon First Nations in the management of lands and resources.

For example, each final agreement guarantees employment opportunities for the beneficiaries at heritage sites, in the forestry industry and in the surveying of their settlement lands. Each first nation will also have the right to buy a 25-per-cent interest in any new hydroelectric or non-renewable resource project undertaken by the Yukon government in their traditional territories.

The final agreements differ significantly in other ways — for example, in terms of the quantity of land and financial compensation provided to each first nation and the special fish and wildlife harvesting rights granted to each group. Each agreement also includes unique ratification and amendment processes and legal descriptions of the settlement lands.

Honourable senators, I should like to read into the record of the Senate some quotes from a report of Judy Gingell, the Chair of the Council for Yukon Indians. Miss Gingell is in the gallery today. I feel it is important that some of her comments and those of the leaders of the Yukon Legislative Assembly be read into the record, and I would do that at this time.

Judy Gingell, the Chair of the Council for Yukon Indians in her presentation to the House of Commons committee on Bill C-33 stated:

> Mr. Chairman, members of the standing committee, Chiefs, respected Elders, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great pleasure to present the views of the Council for Yukon Indians regarding the proposed legislation giving effect to our final land claims and self-government agreements. We have occupied what is now known as the Yukon Territory longer than any other people. Evidence of our occupation goes back approximately 40 thousand years, in areas within the Old Crow flats, of North Yukon. Our recent history has witnessed first contact with fur traders in the mid-1700s. This trade severely altered our lifestyles and livelihoods and introduced the new concept of European trade and currency.

The subsequent discovery of gold prompted Canada to include the Yukon Territory as part of Canada in 1870. The 1870 Order, as it was referred to, includes the constitutional commitment by Canada to settle with us prior to granting land interests to third parties. This constitutional commitment remains a part of the Constitution of Canada and is still an outstanding obligation for Canada to address.

In 1898, the Klondike Gold Rush brought approximately 30,000 gold seekers to the Yukon Territory. This gold rush necessitated the establishment of the Yukon as a Canadian Territory under the YUKON ACT in 1898. This in-migration of gold seekers had an unprecedented impact upon the Yukon First Nations. This prompted Chief Jim Boss of the Ta'an Kwach'an of Lake Labarge to formally request that a treaty be made with our people. This petition by Chief Jim Boss occurred in 1902. Canada, at that time, responded that a treaty was not necessary. However, the Northwest Mounted Police would continue to take care of the interests of Yukon Indian people.

Following 50 years of inability to present our grievances and solutions; Chief Elijah Smith and all Yukon First Nation Chiefs presented a petition to Canada to negotiate a comprehensive Land Claim Agreement. This petition followed closely on the heels of the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Calder vs The Attorney General of British Columbia. This petition, entitled: Together Today for our Children Tomorrow was the first request for a modern day treaty and was presented on February 14, 1973. It is also important to note that this petition included all individuals who met the criteria of a Yukon First Nation citizen.

On that same day, then Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau accepted our request to commence negotiations. At the time, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was the Honourable Jean Chrétien. Since 1973, we have negotiated with 15 Indian Affairs Ministers in our attempt to finalize a Land Claim Settlement in the Yukon Territory.

I believe that it is entirely appropriate that the Right Honourable Jean Chrétien, now the Prime Minister of Canada, conclude the circle of negotiations of our Final and Self-Government Agreements. My sincere regret is that Chief Elijah Smith and many of our Elders who provided their guidance and direction are no longer with us to witness this historical event.

We have negotiated an umbrella Final Agreement, the terms of which provide a basis for negotiating individual First Nation Final Agreements. Any Yukon First Nation that seeks to enter into a Final Agreement with Canada and Yukon, may negotiate specific provisions that will be unique to that First Nation. In this fashion, we have common framework for a settlement throughout the Yukon Territory and at the same time have incorporated the flexibility into each Final Agreement to ensure that the provisions are appropriate for that particular First Nation.

As an aside, honourable senators, what I am holding in my hands now is the umbrella final agreement dealing with four of the 14 claims. As you can see, it is not a light document. It contains approximately five different books and makes up a nine-inch-high pile of paper. Its scope is obvious.

Ms Gingell went on to say:

> The UFA contains 28 chapters. The UFA was ratified on December 7, 1991 by a Special General Assembly, called specifically for that purpose. Our General Assembly is the ultimate power base of our First Nations. Our General Assembly consists of no less than five voting delegates from each Yukon First Nation, in many cases supported by their own community caucus. Following 21 years of internal debate, the UFA was ratified by consensus.
> These agreements manifest the vision of our Elders. Our Elders maintain that our homelands must be protected in a manner that allows the sharing of the natural resources with other Canadians. Our Elders know the importance of healing, following the major cultural impacts upon our people. Our Elders have instilled in us a great respect for other cultures and other people. Their vision of justice and fairness form the basis of our agreements. Their guidance and strength has carried us to this point in our history and now my generation must carry on with implementing the vision of our Elders.
> Bills C-33 and C-34 are enabling pieces of legislation for our agreements. In my opinion these agreements and the proposed legislation provide the social, economic and political foundation in the constitutional and cultural fabric of Canada for Yukon First Nations.

I should now like to quote part of the presentation made by Mr. John Ostashek, who is the government leader in the Yukon. Mr. Ostashek has not been in office for very long. While he has been a Yukoner for some time, he was not in government for most of the negotiations. His are important points to be put on the record. Mr. Ostashek said:

> Bill C-33 and Bill C-34 ensure that Yukon First Nations have access to the use of the land and its resources. That assurance is the key to preserving Yukon First Nations' traditions and cultures, and to building an economic base that will allow Yukon First Nations to move toward self-sufficiency. These agreements will also provide Yukoners with the security and certainty about land and resources, so that all Yukoners and Canadians, both aboriginal and non-aboriginal, will be able to pursue economic opportunities, some of which have been on hold for many, many years.

Throughout the 20 years of land claims negotiations, Yukon First Nations have all said that what they want is something made in Yukon, something that works in Yukon and that permits all of us to live together and to work together for the betterment of the whole Yukon. That is what we have achieved through the agreements and that will be realized fully through the passage of the federal legislation.

The fundamental goal of the claims and the self-government agreement is to ensure both aboriginal and non-aboriginal people realize their potential and live in a society that reflects and respects each other's values.

It is important that the committee understand that in the Yukon, from Old Crow to Watson Lake to Beaver Creek, all Yukoners are supportive of the agreement and the aspirations that they represent.

I would draw your attention particularly, honourable senators, to the last paragraph where Mr. Ostashek states that this measure is supported by all Yukoners.

I will now quote the words of Mr. Jack Cable, the Liberal leader in the Yukon, although, I must add, he was the only Liberal elected to the legislature.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We know how you feel.

Senator Lucier: We are quite proud of him.

He said:

As was indicated by the Government Leader, the claims legislation passed unanimously in the Yukon Legislative Assembly and it is my opinion that the large majority of Yukoners are supportive of the principles behind the settlement of the First Nation claims in what we now call the Yukon Territory.

I should say, it's my sense, due to the complexity of the relationship that there is no single set of documents or legislation or contracts that we can point to and say that is the right deal, the only deal that will work. It is also my sense, that the Yukon people are ready to proceed and they're prepared to take the risks that are inherent in creating so complex a relationship as what we're about to do.

Now the first four nations will break trail. There are issues to resolve. I have to say from talking to many people that there is sufficient goodwill present in the Yukon Territory to make these arrangements work. Most people are prepared to view the new relationship between the First Nations and the non First Nations People as a challenge rather than with fear.

The last quote I wish to use from those committee hearings, honourable senators, is by Mr. Tony Penikett, who is presently the Leader of the Opposition in the Yukon Territory. He represents the New Democratic Party. Mr. Penikett was the Government Leader when much of this work was done. He deserves a lot of credit for having kept it on track when it was difficult to do so.

He said:

I can say that in the years in which I was not only involved in negotiations but also involved in trying to explain the land claims and the self-government agreements, there were many, many tough questions from many, many quarters of the community.

But the overwhelming sentiment of every audience I addressed in the years we were dealing with this matter at the end of any meeting on the subject, was the view that whatever concerns or questions they may have had about the particulars in the agreements, they desperately wanted to see these negotiations completed, the legislation finished. Because from the point of view of the business community, the need to get certainty to the ownership of the land and resources in the Yukon was absolutely essential.

Honourable senators, it is unusual that the whole of the legislature of the Yukon agreed to this position. They were urged to appear before the committee at the insistence of our member of Parliament, Audrey McLaughlin, a member of the NDP who also strongly supports these initiatives. I want to make the point that every representative of the Yukon Territory in the legislature was in agreement with the passage of Bills C-33 and C-34.

I should like to take this opportunity to review the major elements of each of the four final agreements so that honourable senators can appreciate the full benefits that will result from Bill C-33. I would remind you that the rights provided under these agreements will be constitutionally protected when this bill becomes law.

Under its final agreement, the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation will have recognized title to 7,744 square miles of land. This entire quantum of land will be Category "A" land — in other words, land on which the Vuntut Gwitchin will have rights equivalent to fee simple title to both the surface and sub-surface of the area.

This First Nation, which is situated in the remote Arctic Circle community of Old Crow, is one of the oldest communities in Canada, and will receive financial compensation of $19.1 million in 1989 dollars. As is the case with all final agreements, this money will be paid over 15 years.

The Vuntut Gwitchin will have a number of special rights in relation to hunting and fishing in their settlement area. These will include the right to harvest salmon from the Porcupine River drainage basin and to harvest moose for subsistence needs. As well, for the first 15 years after the final agreement comes into effect, the Vuntut Gwitchin will receive all commercial and sport fishing salmon licences in the Porcupine River drainage basin area. They will have the right of first refusal on new licences or permits for wilderness adventure travel, freshwater sports fishing in their traditional territory, and the exclusive right to all new big game outfitting concessions.

Honourable senators should also be aware that three special management areas will be established under the final agreement: Vuntut National Park, a fishing branch ecological reserve, and the Old Crow Flats Special Management Area. Within Vuntut National Park, the beneficiaries will have special rights related to subsistence wildlife harvesting and commercial harvesting of fur-bearing animals for pelts. They will also have a role in the development, operation and maintenance of the park, including significant employment opportunities.

The Vuntut Gwitchin will also have preferential fish and wildlife harvesting rights within the ecological reserve. Mines and minerals will be withdrawn from exploration and development, and the beneficiaries will work with the territorial government to develop a management plan for the reserve.

The Old Crow Flats area, which will compromise both settlement and non-settlement lands, will be jointly managed by government and the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation. The primary objective will be to preserve the unique ecological character of this remarkable area. The Vuntut Gwitchin final agreement also provides for the protection, ownership and management of designated heritage sites.

Bill C-33 will also give effect to the final agreement of the First Nation of Nacho Nyak Dun, whose members live in the village of Mayo and the surrounding area on the Stewart River north of Whitehorse. This Yukon First Nation will have recognized title to 4,739 square kilometres of land, with a virtually even split between Category "A" and Category "B" lands. For this latter category, the First Nation will have rights equivalent to fee simple title to the surface. The First Nation will also receive financial compensation of $14.5 million in 1989 dollars.

Within their traditional territory, the beneficiaries of this agreement will have subsistence harvesting rights to moose and woodland caribou. They will also have the right to 25 per cent of all new licences and permits for commercial freshwater fishing, wilderness adventure travel and freshwater sports fishing, in the event that quotas are established.

Under this final agreement, the existing McArthur Wildlife Sanctuary will become a special management area, and a new habitat protection area will be established to preserve the wetland at Horseshoe Slough. Representatives of the Nacho Nyak Dun will also sit on an advisory committee that will make recommendations on water and land use issues in the Peel River watershed.

In terms of heritage protection, the old trading post at Lansing will become an historic site, and the Bonnet Plume River will be nominated as a Canadian heritage river.

Honourable senators are also being asked today to endorse the final agreement of the Champagne and Aishihik First Nations. This agreement provides for recognized First Nation ownership of 2,395 square kilometres of land, approximately 51 per cent of which will be Category "A" land. The members of those First Nations who live in and around the village of Haines Junction, northwest of Whitehorse, will receive compensation of $27.5 million in 1989 dollars.

In terms of fish and wildlife, special provisions are made for the Champagne and Aishihik people to harvest moose for subsistence needs within their traditional territory. They will also have special rights to harvest freshwater fish in specified lakes, and sockeye and chinook salmon from the Alsek River Basin.

With limited exceptions, the beneficiaries will have exclusive subsistence harvesting rights in that part of Kluane National Park that falls within their traditional territory, as well as the exclusive right to harvest fur-bearing animals for pelts. The Champagne and Aishihik First Nations will have a role in the development and management of this part of the park, and will benefit from significant economic and employment opportunities.

The final agreement also commits the government to work with these First Nations to prepare a heritage resources management plan for the Sha'washe and surrounding area. This plan will recommend whether the area should become a designated heritage site. Under the final agreement, the Tatshenshini River will automatically be nominated as a Canadian heritage river.

Aside from the economic opportunities with Kluane National Park, the Champagne and Aishihik First Nations will have a right of first refusal to the first outfitting concession established in their traditional territory. They will also have a right of first refusal to operate a commercial wilderness campsite at the junction of Silver Creek and the Tatshenshini River. They will also have the right of first refusal to acquire up to 25 per cent of the new permits or licences for commercial freshwater fishing, wilderness adventure travel and freshwater sports fishing in their traditional territory. The Champagne and Aishihik First Nations will also receive 26 per cent of the commercial salmon fishing licences issued for the Alsek River Basin, or the first two licences issued, whichever is greater.

Finally, I should like to address the Teslin Tlingit Council Agreement. This First Nation comprises people living mainly in and around the village of Teslin, on the shore of Teslin Lake on the Alaskan highway.

Like the Champagne and Aishihik First Nations, the Teslin Tlingit Council will have recognized title to a total of 2,395 square kilometres of land, 51 per cent of which will be Category "A" lands. The council will receive final compensation of $18.6 million in 1989 dollars.

Under the terms of its final agreement, the Teslin Tlingit Council must approve any proposed game farming or ranching activities in its traditional territory which may affect wildlife harvesting rights. The Teslin Tlingit will have special rights should it be necessary to establish a harvesting quota for moose within this territory. As well, they will receive primary consideration in the allocation of freshwater fish resources and will have preferential harvesting rights for freshwater fish in certain lakes.

Also under this final agreement, the Government of Canada will establish the Nisutlin River Delta National Wildlife Area. The Teslin Tlingit Indians will have the right to harvest wildlife in this area pursuant to the fish and wildlife provisions of the final agreement. They will have the right to harvest forest resources for traditional pursuits. A management plan for the area will be prepared jointly by the Teslin Renewable Resources Council and the Canadian Wildlife Service.

This final agreement acknowledges the heritage and cultural significance of the Nisutlin River valley and a number of other routes and sites in the settlement territory. The government will give special consideration or protection to these areas and to all heritage resources identified in the future.

Until January 1, 2016, the Teslin Tlingit Council will have rights of first refusal to a number of economic opportunities.

For example, they will have the right to acquire the first new outfitting concession established in their traditional territory. They will also have the right to acquire new commercial freshwater fishing permits or licences to a maximum of 25 per cent of the commercial fish quota in the territory. Finally, the Teslin Tlingit will have the right to acquire up to 25 per cent of new licences or permits, if a quota is established for either the commercial freshwater sports fishing industry or for any sector of the wilderness adventure travel industry.

Each of these final agreements has been duly ratified by the beneficiaries, who are eager to proceed to implementation. There is also support for the agreements among remaining Yukon First Nations, five of which are actively negotiating their own final agreement.

As honourable senators can appreciate, a great deal of effort has been devoted to negotiating the complex documents that will be given forth by Bill C-33. I urge my colleagues on all sides of the house to support this legislation so that the people of these Yukon First Nations can begin to reap the benefits that will flow from their long overdue land claim agreement. This will benefit not only First Nations, but also all other Yukoners and all Canadians.

Honourable senators, this has been a long, drawn-out procedure. A lot of water has flowed down the Yukon River since Mr. Trudeau, Mr. Chrétien and Elijah Smith first met to begin the process that we will be concerned with later today and, I hope, will be putting a conclusion to in the next day or two.

The Council for Yukon Indians, under the able leadership of several chairpersons, beginning with Elijah Smith and currently Miss Judy Gingell, is to be congratulated. Miss Gingell, honourable senators, is in our gallery today with her delegation. The job they have done has been quite outstanding.

An Hon. Senator: Superb.

Senator Lucier: They have negotiated with honour, honesty, integrity and, most of all, with patience — and they needed a lot of that. Since this process began, honourable senators, they have dealt with 15 ministers of Indian and Northern Affairs. They have dealt with over 17 federal negotiators, with 5 different federal governments, and at least 5 territorial governments. It has not been an easy process.

I must also say that when the present Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs, Mr. Ron Irwin, was appointed, he came to the Yukon and met with virtually everyone. We had him there for three days and he never slept for three days. He decided that this legislation should be put before Parliament and put before it very quickly. I honestly do not believe that one of his department officials has had a day off since. They have done a tremendous job in order to get this legislation before us at this time.

I must also mention some people involved in the early days of the negotiations. I refer to Joe Jacquot and Harry Allen, and I can still remember Johnny Johns, one of the Elders from Carcross, who had a perpetual smile on his face and a perpetual joke on his lips. When things got very difficult for the negotiators, he was the first one to come in with a little joke and loosen them up. Mr. Dave Joe, a lawyer for the Council for Yukon Indians and a Yukon Indian himself, is in the gallery today; he did a great job on their behalf.

Elijah Smith is the Sir John A. of the Yukon. He is the one who really put all of this together. Elijah Smith was awarded the Order of Canada. I remember getting myself an invitation to the Governor General's residence when that happened. People who know Elijah Smith will understand this: He came to me and said, "Why did they give me this? I didn't do anything." Well, he did a lot. He is the one who made all of this possible today.

Honourable senators, this is a great day for the Yukon. I am very pleased that I can be here today speaking on their behalf.

We really must understand here that this is a Yukon deal. This agreement is for the people of the Yukon and it is by the people of the Yukon and it is good enough for them. We should reflect that in our dealings with this legislation the consultation process in the Yukon included, first of all, as I said before, unanimous consent of the legislative assembly.

Consultations included those with the Yukon Chamber of Mines, the Klondike Placer Miners Association, the Mining Association of Canada, Canadian Petroleum Association, B.C. & Yukon Chamber of Mines, Yukon Fish and Game Association, Association of Yukon Communities, which represents all municipalities in the Yukon, and the Yukon Outfitters Association. Public consultations were held through public meetings held in Whitehorse and all major Yukon communities, through community tours by the Yukon Legislative Special Committee on Land Claims and Self-Government, and through municipal governments' participation in the land selection process. This legislation has gone through every process that it should have gone through, as far as we are concerned.

In ending my remarks, I want to point out again that there have been a lot of people doing an awful lot of hard work on this legislation. As I said, Miss Gingell and her delegation are here now. They have been here for some four weeks trying to make sure that this legislation stays on track.

I thank you for your attention. I hope we can get on and get this piece of legislation behind us and get the people of the Yukon working together.

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, because Senator Tkachuk is attending the high school graduation of his son, he asked me to deliver his written response to Bill C-33, the Yukon land claims legislation.

Honourable senators, before we approve this bill, I present for the record a brief overview of some major Progressive Conservative government achievements during the years 1984 to 1993 in providing greater justice for aboriginal peoples.

They appointed the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples to examine the broadest range of issues ever put before a royal commission. The commission, whose co-chair and majority of members are aboriginals, is examining the history of relations between aboriginal peoples, the Canadian government and Canadian society as a whole, as well as social, economic and justice issues of aboriginal people.

A major new initiative, the Native Agenda, was announced, and implementation was well under way. The initiative affirmed the government's commitment to deal with land claims and unfulfilled treaty obligations; to improve economic and social conditions on reserves; to build a new partnership between aboriginal peoples and governments; and to review the fundamental place and role of aboriginal people in contemporary Canada.

The Indian Act was amended to remove discrimination on the basis of gender from the act and to restore Indian status and band membership rights to eligible persons, particularly women who had lost their status by marrying non-Indians, and to enable bands to assume control over their membership.

In 1992, the Gwich'in Comprehensive Land Claim Agreement was finalized. Under this agreement, the Gwich'in become the private owners of 22,331 square kilometres of land, an area approximately three and a half times the size of Prince Edward Island in the Northwest Territories and Yukon, and participate in renewable resources and land and water management, and receive significant financial benefits.

The B.C. Treaty Commission was established in September 1992 to help resolve B.C. land claims.

The government's specific claims policy was modified to cover pre-Confederation claims. Additional funding of $355 million was provided.

Canada, Saskatchewan and the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations signed an historic $450-million agreement to settle outstanding treaty land entitlements in Saskatchewan.

• (1210)

Specifically, in the area of comprehensive land claim agreements of the sort contemplated in Bill C-33, the Progressive Conservative record is very strong. Once Bill C-33 receives Royal Assent, the total will have risen to four comprehensive land claims which were signed by the former PC government and subsequently concluded. By comparison, the number of comprehensive land claims which were signed and concluded by the former Liberal government is three.

I salute the agreement behind Bill C-33 and congratulate the Yukon First Nations in their long drawn-out fight and their search for justice and real equality, which has eluded them for so many years. Their dream has finally become a reality. We approve of and support the bill.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I think it is important to note for our record that although we are dealing with this bill and Bill C-34 quite expeditiously, the negotiating process was far from speedy. From what I have been told, it has taken 21 years, and it has involved 15 ministers, 17 negotiators, 5 territorial governments and 5 federal governments.

Since we are dealing with these bills so expeditiously, it is important that our record, including the committee record, shows that we were aware of some of the important consequences to the finalization of this long process. I would ask that the committee deal with some questions I have been receiving in correspondence over the past three or four months. By a process of synthesis, I am left with about five questions to which I do not know the answers. I am sure that some witness who appears before the committee, probably the minister, can give us the answers. I intend to ask the committee to deal with those five questions together.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

YUKON FIRST NATIONS SELF-GOVERNMENT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-34, respecting self-government for First Nations in the Yukon Territory.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I would first congratulate the Yukon First Nations on the success of their negotiations.

I rise to speak in support of Bill C-34, the Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act, and to urge the speedy passage of this important and historical piece of legislation.

This act, together with the Yukon Land Claims Settlement Act, which is also before the Senate, will usher in a whole new era of stability and opportunity for the Yukon Territory. It will provide Yukon First Nations with the power to govern their own affairs to a degree not possible before. It will help to strengthen the relations between the aboriginal and non-aboriginal Yukoners, and it will help create an atmosphere of certainty which will encourage investment, development and jobs in the territory. For these reasons, honourable senators, this legislation has the strong support not only of Yukon First Nations but all sectors of the Yukon society.

One of the significant characteristics of the Yukon First Nations Self-Government legislation is the substantial degree of flexibility that is offered in many of its provisions. It is this flexibility that will enable First Nations to develop their governments in the manner and at a pace most suitable to them. It is this flexibility that will help each First Nation achieve the goal of self-determination and economic, social and cultural progress.

From the beginning, it was clear that no single model would meet the needs of all aboriginal people and all situations. A "one-size-fits-all" approach would simply not respond adequately to the varying political, economic, legal, historic, cultural and social circumstances of aboriginal people across this land.

What was needed to be developed was a broad framework for negotiations covering basic areas including law-making powers, administration of programs, taxation powers, administration of justice, and so forth. Within this framework, individual self-government agreements could then be developed reflecting the particular needs and priorities of the communities concerned.

This is a more painstaking process, but it is a process much more likely to lead to successful agreement and effective implementation after the agreement. This flexibility of approach is very much in evidence in the agreement reached with the Yukon First Nations. Although the Yukon Indians have many common interests and aspirations, there is a considerable variety of needs and priorities within the group. Thus, the decision was made to enter into individual self-government arrangements with each of the 14 First Nations involved under the general aegis of the umbrella final agreement.

Honourable senators, one area of agreement with the Yukon First Nations that reflects this flexibility of approach is that of transferring the administration of many programs and services now provided by the federal and territorial governments to the First Nations. This is a very important element of any self-government arrangement. It is fundamental to the concept of aboriginal people managing their own affairs and of elected councils setting their own priorities according to the needs of each community.

Here, the government has taken a very flexible approach. This process should go ahead at a reasonable pace without forcing program delivery on any First Nation before it is ready, or impeding progress when a First Nation has demonstrated its willingness to take on such responsibilities.

Under this flexible approach, First Nations will determine which programs and services they wish to take on. The First Nations will decide on their priorities, and they will set their own timetable and decide in what order they wish these transfers to take place. Government will meet each year with their governments to discuss this timetable for transfer of programs and services, including the details of implementing the transfers.

The question of program administration has a particular significance in the Yukon, as this is the first self-government legislation that will provide for First Nations to assume the responsibility for the provision of program and service delivery to First Nation citizens off settlement land as well as on.

As First Nations assume treaty responsibility for a wide range of programs and services, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has made it clear that he intends to press for a much diminished role for his department over the next few years. It is anticipated that, over the next few years, the department will be downsized by 75 per cent in the Yukon, with the balance remaining only to fulfil federal responsibilities and obligations that arise from negotiated self-government agreements.

Another aspect of these self-government agreements with the Yukon First Nations into which a good deal of flexibility has been built is the financial transfer agreement. First Nations cannot be expected to administer their affairs without a financial base that permits flexibility in setting priorities and allocating resources among a range of social and economic programs.

The new arrangements will provide a more stable financial regime with greater opportunity for long-range planning and economic growth. The flexibility of this self-government legislation can be seen throughout many of these provisions.

Honourable senators, Yukon First Nations will have the power to enact laws in a range of areas — from internal management on settlement land, delivery of programs and services, to taxation and administration of justice. However, First Nations are not obliged to pass laws in any or all of the areas it sets out in this legislation and are free to determine when to exercise those powers, just like any other government in Canada.

It is this flexible approach that gives these self-government agreements and enabling legislation much of their strength. It provides individual First Nations with a considerable degree of autonomy and many options as to how they manage their affairs; yet, it is constructed within the broad framework which ensures that Canadian law and the Canadian Constitution will apply to First Nations and their citizens, as they do to all Canadians.

Yukon's Indians have waited a long time for this day. Land claims negotiations began more than twenty years ago and self-government negotiations some seven years ago. The agreements are now in place.

Congratulations are in order for the negotiators and the resource people who have worked so hard over the years. The necessary territorial acts have been passed.

Honourable senators, this legislation represents the final step in what has been a long but worthwhile journey. Let us give prompt attention and speedy passage to Bill C-34 so that the process of renewal for Yukon's First Nations can begin today.

Honourable senators, I should like to make one additional point in relation to the bill that was dealt with before Bill C-34. The two bills are sewn tightly together. It is very important that the Yukon First Nations deliver the message to their people that both bills have been taken care of sufficiently.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as Bill C-34 is, in part, a result of the work of the previous administration, as it relates to that government's efforts to redress historical injustices for Canada's aboriginals, I would like to briefly review some of that administration's achievements in providing greater justice for aboriginal peoples.

First, they appointed a Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples to examine the broadest range of issues ever put before a Royal Commission. The commission, whose co-chair and majority of members are aboriginals, is examining the history of relations between aboriginal peoples, the Canadian government and Canadian society as a whole, as well as social, economic and justice issues of aboriginal people.

Second, a major new initiative, the Native Agenda, was announced, and implementation was well under way. The initiative affirmed the government's commitment to deal with land claims and unfulfilled treaty obligations; improve economic and social conditions on reserves; build a new partnership between aboriginal peoples and governments; and review the fundamental place and role of aboriginals in contemporary Canada.

Third, the Indian Act was amended to remove discrimination on the basis of gender from the act; to restore Indian status and band membership rights to eligible persons, particularly women, who had lost their status by marrying non-Indians; and to enable bands to assume control over their membership.

Next, the Gwich'in Comprehensive Land Claim Agreement was finalized. Under the agreement, the Gwich'in would become the private owners of 22,331 square kilometres of land — an area approximately three and a half times the size of Prince Edward Island — in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, participate in renewable resources and land and water management, and receive significant financial benefits.

Next, the B.C. Treaty Commission was established in September of 1992 to help resolve the B.C. land claims. In addition, the government's specific claims policy was modified to cover pre-confederation claims. Additional funding of $355 million was provided.

Canada, Saskatchewan and the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations signed a historic $450-million agreement to settle outstanding treaty land entitlements in Saskatchewan, a process in which I am happy to say I was involved.

Bill C-34 represents a continuation of the work toward greater justice for Canada's aboriginal people. I am proud of this legacy, and I would strongly urge fellow senators to support this legislation in principle. Everyone who has been involved in the process over the many years ought to be congratulated as it arrives at this final phase.

However, the bill is not uncomplicated, and it deserves the scrutiny of this chamber. We received this legislation 15 minutes ago. We have an obligation to scrutinize it. I understand that the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples will be receiving this bill later today, together with Bill C-33. I do not think that Bill C-33 breaks new ground at all. It is not dissimilar to other entitlement bills which have passed this house. I fully expect that it will go through committee and be back to this house very expeditiously.

The Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples has agreed to sit when the Senate rises today in order to receive these bills and start their work. I have no doubt that they will complete their work on both of these bills next week. Following that, the bills will be reported back to the Senate, and I have no doubt that they will be given third reading at that time, and the work will be complete. At that final step, congratulations should go to everyone involved in the process.

Again, I want to congratulate everyone who has been involved throughout the many years it has taken to get the process this far. I am sure the committee will complete its work in the next few days. I fully expect that when the Senate reconvenes the week following next, these bills will be dealt with in their final form.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, as I mentioned with regard to Bill C-33, and as others have mentioned, including my colleagues Senators Lucier and Watt, these bills are of landmark importance and of significant and complex consequence. It is my opinion that many Canadians, perhaps even some senators, may not understand some of the consequences of these bills, or perhaps they misunderstand some of them.

As I mentioned, I have received a lot of correspondence about these bills, raising questions that may well be easily answered. I ask that our committee record show that they were dealt with, for the benefit of my correspondents and interested others.

The last correspondence I got on this was a fax received yesterday. I have synthesized that and the other correspondence into five questions. I ask that the committee deal with these questions. I will put them on the record now because I want to give the officials of the department, and any others, the opportunity to deal with them.

First, Bill C-33 deals with four land claims in the Yukon, and Bill C-34 deals with four parallel agreements relating to native self-government. Is it the case that these two bills are the forerunners of ten more land claims and ten more self-government agreements, and that, when finally passed, the agreements will cover all of the Yukon? I have some hints from my colleague's interventions that the answer is that they will.

Is it correct that the two bills provide for ten subsequent claims and agreements to be ratified by order of the Governor in Council and that, accordingly, the remaining ten agreements would not have to come before Parliament?

I hear a "yes" from my colleague and I have a feeling that most of these questions will be answerable with a "yes" or a "no."

Bill C-34 gives exclusive law-making powers in 44 specified areas; that is, powers with regard to the administration of justice, control or prohibition of motor vehicles, regulations of business, marriage, and others. Is it, in fact, exclusive law-making power?

Does the bill contemplate a citizenship other than Canadian citizenship?

Clause 8 leaves in the hands of the First Nations the composition of the legislative assembly. Does that include power over establishing voting rights?

Clause 9(2) allows a delegation of power to enact laws to any other First Nation or any other person. Does that mean that it is possible that this delegation could be to a single person such as a supreme chief?

Finally, following enactment of the bills the Yukon will be governed by 16 bodies, namely, the federal government, the territorial government and 14 First Nation assemblies. Senators Lucier and Watt told us that the structures which are proposed by this legislation have virtually unanimous support from all the citizens of the Yukon. The information I have received through correspondence is that of the Yukon's 32,000, inhabitants, 8,000 are First Nations peoples and some 24,000 are not. Is that correct? If so, what is the instrumentality of political power in these 16 bodies for the non-First Nations residents of the Yukon?

• (1240)

Honourable senators, I admit that in much of the correspondence that I received there was some rhetoric, but I tried to edit that out. I am not asking these questions rhetorically. I am asking them for information. A "yes" answer or even a "no" answer to some of those questions does not mean that I will not vote for the bill. In fact, I intend to vote for it at second reading. However, I wish to know what it is I will be asked to vote for when it comes to third reading.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have a few comments I would like to make. I am an Okanagan Indian, and was a parliamentarian in the other place. The whole question of land settlements and self-government is fundamental to our people. On behalf of the people in the Yukon, I am happy that we have come this far.

I seldom like to talk about things I have done, but I will at this time, just a little. As a parliamentarian in the other place, it gave me the utmost pleasure to be Parliamentary Secretary to the Honourable Jean Chrétien, our present Prime Minister, when he was Minister of Indian Affairs in 1973. Following the Nisga judgment of the Supreme Court, those of you who were in the other place at the time will recall the heavy debate that went on.

For the duration of my active political life, we have been attempting to achieve proper land deals for our people. I have to say emphatically that this is a proper land deal. After the Nisga case, we had a meeting with Pierre Trudeau, all the Nisgas and the late George Manuel. That was the time when Pierre Trudeau said, "I guess you people have a lot more rights than I thought you did." He was a little sceptical about the whole question of aboriginal rights, and asked many questions just as Senator Frith is doing; very honest questions.

Senator Frith: I do not mind the association.

Senator Marchand: Around August 14, 1973 we had lunch at 24 Sussex, Pierre Trudeau, Jean Chrétien and I. It was at that meeting that the decision was made to negotiate settlements to land claims. Of course, the people in the Yukon have been working on it since that date. One can understand their anguish. That is why they are here today. One can understand why they are here, because they have been working at it a long time. We had hoped, and they had hoped, that by the end of today the bill would have been passed, and the matter completed, so they could go home to their people and celebrate.

Senator Doody used to say, "I can count," so we have to do what the other side, the opposition, wants us to do in this case. I can count. They have the majority. I am at least glad to have the commitment from the other side that the Senate will pass these bills, and hopefully in good time.

I am a little apprehensive about some of the things that could go wrong, or that might go wrong. I know many of my people, Senator Twinn's people, treaty people, status Indians from Southern Canada south of 60, may not agree with many of the things that are in these two bills. So be it. It still comes down to that important fundamental statement that this is their deal. This is the deal of the people of the Yukon. We have to understand and recognize that this is their deal, and that that is what it is all about.

Unlike so many deals that our people have made in the past, the people of the Yukon have gone into this deal with their eyes wide open. They have gone into this deal with competent lawyers who were their own people. It has given me great comfort to know that, especially after having read the history where our people were, frankly, cheated. There is no other word for it.

In the province of British Columbia where I come from, I weep when I see the type of land settlements they are making. In British Columbia we are fiddle-faddling along. I am not sure how far we will get. The big stumbling blocks have always been the provinces. The provinces have been stubborn.

I was happy to see what the Tories did when they were in power. Frankly, I was a little afraid when they came to power that perhaps this whole question would be swept under the rug. They did not do that. They made some good settlements with respect to the Gwichin and the treaty commission in B.C., and so on.

We, in British Columbia, have approximately 860,000 acres of land in total. If one wishes some perspective, Banff National Park is twice as large as all of the lands that are in reserves in British Columbia. Our reserves comprise .36 per cent of the province of British Columbia. One may ask why we have been concerned. One may ask why we have wanted the land deal.

Our people would not be in the sad situation and the sad conditions that we are in today if we had made a proper deal in the beginning to have a proper economic base in our homeland, so that we could properly raise our children, and generations could look back and say that we did have a good beginning. That was not done. In British Columbia we were absolutely cheated out of our lands.

I wished to put a few of those comments on the record to let honourable senators know how I feel, and perhaps express how the people in the Yukon feel about what is going down here today, and how important it is to them.

I very much hope that we can pass these bills quickly next week, and that we will not unduly complicate things. We can ask all types of questions. I would prefer it if they were passed today. We can still do it. We can do anything we want with unanimous consent. We can call the minister and have him brought down here, and he can answer all these constitutional questions in one hour. We can do it if the will is there.

Senator Lucier: He is here and ready.

Senator Marchand: He is here and ready. It can be done.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Walter P. Twinn: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few comments following those of Senator Marchand. I do congratulate the people from the Yukon. With respect to the concerns of the people south of 60, I wish to state that there are already treaties. They do not want to be affected by this legislation, nor have it set a precedent. That is exactly the way it has to go.

• (1250)

Senator Marchand has said that we were cheated out of our lands, and he used the word "cheat" often. I hope that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Ron Irwin, does not do that by using this measure as an umbrella with regard to those reservations south of 60 which have treaties.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Watt, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I wish to advise the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples that the committee will meet when the Senate rises today.

PRIVATE BILL

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-35, to establish the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and to make consequential amendments to other Acts.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, it is with real pleasure that I rise to speak on Bill C-35.

This week marks the 125th anniversary of Canada's immigration service. This bill marks one more step forward in our country's proud history of citizenship and immigration legislation.

This legislation has a simple and straightforward purpose: the creation of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. For all its brevity and clarity, the bill is significant for a number of reasons. It fulfils a major campaign commitment of the Prime Minister. It carries through on the principles of the Red Book. It organizes the immigration and citizenship promotion functions of the government in a coherent and common-sense fashion.

Most important, the legislation before the Senate modernizes and streamlines our government to meet the needs of Canadians and to give us the foundation to deal properly with a host of complex citizenship and immigration issues.

Honourable senators will recall that last summer and fall the Prime Minister campaigned vigorously on this issue. The government feels so strongly that on the very day he was sworn in, November 4, the Prime Minister announced:

> ...the creation of a separate Department of Citizenship and Immigration, under its own Minister, which will bring together all immigration policy and program activities currently in the Public Security and Human Resources portfolios, plus the citizenship registration and promotion programs of the Canadian Heritage department.

The department has been operating since last November through Order in Council. Today, the Senate is asked to give formal approval to the creation of the new department.

The government believes that citizenship and immigration spring from the same common values and objectives. Citizenship and immigration fit together naturally. Citizenship completes the process that immigration begins, the process of making a personal commitment to this country, its privileges and its responsibilities.

By taking programs, resources and responsibilities from a variety of different departments and consolidating them in one department, we can make government more open and more accountable. The responsibilities of the new department include: immigration applications; immigration levels and selection criteria; federal-provincial relations on immigration; visa requirements; refugee matters; enforcement; settlement; citizenship applications and registration; and citizenship promotion.

Honourable senators can see the continuum here stretching from the time someone applies to come to this country to the time that person takes on the obligations of being a Canadian. Of course, citizenship does not end with the swearing of an oath and the acquisition of a document. In some ways, that is only the beginning.

That is why the new department will take a lead role in strengthening the values, identity and commitment required of all citizens — those who are born here and those who choose to come here.

Like the minister who introduced this bill in the House of Commons, I am an immigrant and a naturalized citizen of Canada. I am deeply aware of the value and importance of the words "immigrant" and "citizen."

Honourable senators recognize the need to overhaul our immigration policies and to consider the long-term role of immigration in nation-building. All of us recognize the need to improve the immigration system. All of us know the importance of redefining and reinforcing our citizenship policies. All of us understand the profound impact which immigration issues are having upon the world.

• (1300)

The government has moved, and will continue to move, on these important matters.

Honourable senators are aware of the goals that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is actively pursuing. They are goals I am sure we all share. As Canadians, we need to think about immigration in a bigger way. We must consider the vital role that immigration has played, and should continue to play, as part of our nation's growth.

We have to clean up the problems with our immigration system. We want to stop the small number of abusers who so undermine the aspirations of the overwhelming majority of upstanding immigrants. We have to push even harder to ensure that the international community comes to grips with the problems confronting 20 million refugees every year. We must try to understand the particular problems facing women immigrants and refugees.

We must move our citizenship ceremonies out of the courtrooms and into communities. Citizenship should be a real "grass roots" celebration. We must also eliminate the overly large backlog facing qualified applicants who wish to become Canadian citizens. Honourable senators will also agree that we should act to strengthen the values and principles inherent in citizenship.

The bill before the Senate today does not accomplish all of those objectives. What it does do is create a rational, common sense department that will allow us to pursue those objectives more effectively, more fairly and more cohesively. The legislation to establish the Department of Citizenship and Immigration will put in place the integrated and simplified framework we require as we move together to address the challenges and the tremendous opportunities offered by immigration and citizenship.

This legislation puts in place a modern, efficient and intelligent structure. With this structure we will be better equipped to introduce and carry through on fair and open policies to reunite families, offer safe haven for refugees, use immigration as a building block for economic growth, and promote the concept and the principles of citizenship. This legislation will not stop further debates about specific immigration and citizenship policies. I cannot foresee how all our policies will evolve, but I do know that the setting up of this department will ensure that we put the horse before the cart.

As I said before, this legislation is short and straightforward, but it is important. I encourage honourable senators to give this bill speedy passage so that we are in a position to change immigration and citizenship policies for the better and, in so doing, change our country for the better.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Will the honourable senator permit a question? I heard the honourable senators say that the new Department of Citizenship and Immigration will have responsibility for the naturalization activity under the Canadian Citizenship Act. Will this new department have the mandate for promoting Canadian citizenship for the 27 million existing Canadians, or is their mandate on the promotion side limited to the new immigrants who apply for, and subsequently receive, citizenship?

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, the department is going beyond just presenting a document to new citizens. As it evolves, the department will develop new policies in the future in order to create the feeling of citizenship and to promote Canadian citizenship.

I mentioned during my remarks that the coming into being of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration does not end there. New policies will evolve. This is just the commencement of something of which there will be more to come.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, although I understand the reasons, the process that we are following in dealing with this issue is unacceptable. The haste with which we are being asked to deal with this and other important issues, such as Bills C-33 and C-34, does not do justice to the subject-matter covered by these bills.

Honourable senators, I understand that a major revision of the immigration and citizenship issues will be forthcoming within the next few months. I look forward to the dialogue and debate which this critical issue will engender, and intend to participate with a wider, and hopefully more substantial, intervention at that time.

Honourable senators, Bill C-35 embraces the previous government's downsizing and restructuring of the federal government. It is principally a housekeeping initiative necessary to implement the changes made by Order in Council when this present government took office.

New in this legislation is the power granted to the minister to enter into agreements with international and other organizations. The minister should be aware that we will follow closely his use of this new power, and ensure that it is used for the betterment of Canada and Canadians.

The promotion of Canadian unity is also included in this bill. We support this initiative.

I should like to remind all honourable senators of the exceptional work done on Canadian citizenship by Senator Kinsella last year when he was acting chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. I recommend Senator Kinsella's report to all colleagues and, in particular, to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Bill C-35 does not appear to address any policy issues. As I stated earlier, I look forward to participating fully in future debates.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole. However, we may have to wait a few minutes before the government official arrives.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to Committee of the Whole for consideration later this day.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Government Notices of Motions:

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, July 6, 1994, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators are due some explanation. You may have noticed that Senator Berntson and I have been wearing out the carpet, going back and forth between our seats. Others have also been doing some running around. We have been trying to come to an agreement and we have reached an agreement.

• (1310)

First, I must say two things. One comment is in agreement with Senator Murray and with Senator Frith that, somehow or other, we must persuade governments to give us legislation much more quickly. Probably the answer to that is to have a much greater volume of legislation begun in the Senate so that there is an interchange of legislation at the end, rather than all of it being dumped on us. We understand the difficulty, so the second comment is that we also greatly appreciate the cooperation we have had. The situation is under control, or will be if Bill C-35 is looked after. There will then be the opportunity for all bills presently available to receive Royal Assent.

Everything else will be sent to committee. Bills C-33 and C-34 will go to the Aboriginal Peoples Committee, which has agreed to meet when the Senate rises today in order to consider those bills. I know that will be of great help to our friends who were in the gallery and to our friends who have been involved in the committee. Senator Andreychuk has been kind enough to make those arrangements. The intent, then, is that the Aboriginal Peoples Committee will meet next week, as Senator Berntson said. That means we will have urgent consideration of those two bills.

Bill C-11 is still before the Banking Committee, where there are some discussions, apparently, on whether there is some means of making it more attractive. That still has to go on. I would hope that that committee, if it is able to get on track, will sit next week as well.

Bill C-22 is the only other bill remaining, and we all know that it will take a bit of time. The suggestion is that the committee will meet on Monday, July 4. That is in the hands of the committee, but it will have two or two and a half days. There are no Wednesday morning caucuses these days. The committee will have that amount of time to consider the bill.

The Senate will then come back at two o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, July 6, with a view to being able to deal with Bills C-33, C-34, C-11, and C-22. We will be able to wind up, it is to be hoped, by Thursday night, with a complete program. If we are so successful, then I, for one, believe that we will be entitled to very substantial congratulations, because it has been a most difficult time.

Again, I do appreciate the help and cooperation of Senator Berntson and others on his team.

Hon. Paul Lucier: May I ask Senator Stanbury a question? Would the proceedings next week include Royal Assent on Bills C-33 and C-34 next Thursday?

Senator Stanbury: No, the Senate will not resume until July 6. We will do all those bills in the final week, if they are reported without amendment.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think that fairly reflects the eminently reasonable arrangement which was arrived at by my counterpart Senator Stanbury and myself.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, this might be an appropriate time for us to start thinking about a way to avoid the last-minute rush, and that is to establish that we adjourn at a certain date in June of every year, so that the other place will know well in advance.

Senator Murray: There are always pre-studies.

Senator Frith: Let us have one intervention at a time. That is another question.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, to the point raised just now by Senator Frith, we had an excellent suggestion from our colleague Senator Macquarrie the other day as he was speaking after tributes, that there should be a fixed calendar for this chamber.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I would like to put in my two cents' worth on this issue as well. I do not often find myself in total agreement with Senator Frith, although partially many times. He is absolutely right on this occasion. We really cannot be expected to do justice to some of the subject-matter with which we are being presented when we are given such a short period of time. One must wonder at times whether it is not being done on purpose so that we do not get a lot of time to deal with these issues.

It is not criticism of this government solely. We had the same problem with the previous government.

Senator Fairbairn, it is not meant as criticism to you or your government. However, I do get the feeling that the other place is not necessarily respectful of our time frame and the kind of job that we in this institution are being asked to do.

I support Senator Frith's position.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I am tempted to make a small remark after Senator Di Nino's remark. I will resist, except to say that, certainly during the time that I have been filling in for Senator Molgat, Senator Fairbairn and I have had the greatest cooperation from Mr. Herb Gray and his staff and the people in the House of Commons, who have been most considerate.

For other reasons, some of these bills have been slow getting through. I am not sure exactly what the answers are, but we must try to find some.

Honourable senators, we have agreed not to have a Question Period, but I would like to table some documents.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if I may be allowed, I think we have a motion before us now. There have been so many amendments that I think the archivists will grow old studying this. Still I must ask a question before I put the motion. Is it two o'clock on July 6?

Senator Berntson: Two o'clock on Wednesday, July 6.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with your permission, I will put the motion.

It is moved by Senator Stanbury, seconded by Senator Hébert:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, July 6, 1994, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

DELAYED ANSWERS

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two deferred answers, one to a verbal question by Senator Cochrane on May 25, 1994, and one to an Order Paper question by Senator Marshall on April 19, 1994.

YOUTH

(Response to question raised by Hon. Ethel Cochrane on May 25, 1994)

1. The Atlantic Groundfish Strategy (TAGS) is the program referred to by Mr. Jasen, when he was quoted in The Globe and Mail, in reference to individual contracts that unemployed fisheries workers would not be required to sign in return for income support and job training.

2. Under TAGS, participants agree to "help themselves" by actively participating in the range of labour market adjustment measures available.

3. Fisheries workers will be required to develop a career action plan that will identify what labour market adjustment measures they will be required to participate in, in order to receive ongoing income support.

4. Fisheries workers are required to demonstrate significant past attachment to the groundfish industry in order to qualify for TAGS. The criteria include significant past attachment to the groundfish fishery, with a rate of income support determined by previous Unemployment Insurance benefit rates. Enforcement of requirements under TAGS will be achieved through ongoing counselling, use of a report card system not unlike that used under the Unemployment Insurance program and a number of other administrative procedures normally used in the delivery of regular Human Resources Development Canada (HDRC) labour market programs and services.

5. Fisheries workers have to meet requirements as described above.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-35, to establish the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and to make consequential amendments to other Acts.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole, the Honourable Eymard G. Corbin in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole to consider Bill C-35 to establish the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, for the purpose of proceeding with Bill C-35, we have officials from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration who are prepared to assist us through our colleague Senator Bosa, who is sponsoring this bill.

Pursuant to Order of the Senate, Mr. Bob Blackburn and Mr. D. Martin Low were escorted to seats in the Senate Chamber.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, we have with us Mr. Bob Blackburn, the Assistant Deputy Minister in charge of policy in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and Mr. Martin Low, Senior General Counsel.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Senator Kinsella: Perhaps the officials could give us a brief description of the machinery of government change. In particular, am I correct in my understanding that from the former Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, there will be transferred to the new Department of Citizenship and Immigration the Citizenship Registration Branch?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Kinsella: On the citizenship promotion side, what parts of the old Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship that dealt with citizenship promotion, as distinct from the citizenship registration activities, are being transferred?

Senator Bosa: That part of the department which dealt with citizenship promotion is being transferred to the new department.

Senator Kinsella: What is the distinction between the Department of Heritage Canada's responsibilities for Canadian identity and Canadian heritage and the responsibilities of the new department, sustained by this bill, in promoting multiculturalism and Canadian citizenship with our 27 million Canadians?

Senator Bosa: The promotion of citizenship is moved to the new department. What remains in the heritage department is that part which is called "Canadian Identities." That remains with the heritage department, but citizenship promotion is moved on to the new department.

Senator Kinsella: Mr. Chairman, which minister will have responsibility for the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, which was the old Bill C-63?

Senator Bosa: The Minister of State (Multiculturalism) in Heritage Canada. There have been many changes in the restructuring of the government departments, and I sympathize with the honourable gentleman. It is difficult to keep track of what has happened, and to where these responsibilities have been transferred.

I think that what the honourable gentleman was interested in was whether the new department has responsibility for the promotion of citizenship. To that question, I answered yes, the new department has responsibility for citizenship promotion and for doing the kind of work that the honourable gentleman did when he was chairman of the Social Affairs Committee which carried out this particular study.

Senator Kinsella: Does the human rights branch, which was in the old Department of the Secretary of State and then I believe in the new Department of Heritage Canada, remain within Heritage Canada, or does it go to the citizenship promotion unit in the new department?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Kinsella: Yes what? Where is the human rights branch?

Senator Bosa: It will remain under Heritage Canada.

The Chairman: I do not believe your answer was recorded, Senator Bosa. Would you repeat your answer?

Senator Bosa: The answer is that the part that the honourable gentleman was asking about will remain within Heritage Canada, the human rights section.

Senator Di Nino: I wish to welcome the departmental officials to the Senate. First, I would like to commend the officials to the report that Senator Bosa spoke of a moment ago, which was prepared by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology under the acting chairmanship of Senator Kinsella. I think it would be a very useful document in your deliberations on future dealings with the issue of citizenship in particular. If you do not have one, please get one.

Mr. Chairman, my questions relate to another clause.

The Chairman: Let us deal with clause 2. If there are no further comments on clause 2, shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1330)

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, I have a couple of questions with respect to clause 5. I understand this clause deals with a new power that is being given to the minister.

Senator Bosa: These are essentially the same powers that existed before, except for one minor amendment. If the honourable senator would count four lines down from the top where it is written "or any agency thereof," that part has been removed.

Senator Di Nino: With regard to the authority the minister has to enter into agreements with those agencies and/or international organizations, was "international organization" there already, or is this new?

Senator Bosa: No, this part is new.

Senator Di Nino: That is what I thought. Can you give me examples of these agencies and/or organizations?

Senator Bosa: The High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Organization for Migration.

Senator Di Nino: So these organizations are entities dealing with immigration issues principally, or refugee issues?

Senator Bosa: Yes. They are United Nations agencies.

Senator Di Nino: This reference is so broad that obviously it may include other organizations and agencies. That was the point I wanted to make. I understand the need to have a relationship with UN organizations, but are there other organizations not associated with the United Nations, or UNESCO, or entities of that nature?

Senator Bosa: The International Red Cross; the European Union, because it is a new organization.

Senator Di Nino: So it is a very wide authority. What kind of subject-matter would the minister deal with, just for clarification?

Senator Bosa: Matters relating to immigration and refugees.

Senator Di Nino: Let me be more specific: Would the minister, for instance, be empowered, without reference to Parliament, to sign agreements with an organization on the number of refugees that it may take in any one particular area or from any particular source? Would the minister have the authority under this clause to set limits of immigrants from a particular area, such as the European Community, which is one that you mentioned?

Senator Bosa: It could theoretically happen, but the minister must comply with the terms of reference of his department. He cannot move beyond them.

Senator Di Nino: I do not want to get into a debate on the issue now. As I stated in my response to you, Senator Bosa, that is the one area I have some concern over. It is important to register that we must monitor this area carefully, so that we are better able to understand its use once the minister applies his authority to actual practice. It is still unclear to me how far and wide this authority is.

I will not prolong the debate except to suggest that if there is a better answer, you can provide it for me at some future time, understanding the fact that the minister is not here.

Senator Bosa: The minister must have the consent of the Governor in Council before he goes beyond the terms of reference.

Senator Di Nino: That was my question specifically. I said, "without reference to Parliament." You suggested it may happen. Obviously, we are not totally sure.

Senator Bosa: It has not happened in the past, to my knowledge.

Senator Di Nino: In the past, the minister did not have this authority.

Senator Bosa: However, if it does happen, the minister needs the authority of the Governor in Council.

Senator Kinsella: Will clause 5 permit the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to enter into a contract with the Minister of Education of a province for the promotion of teaching civics and citizenship in Canadian schools?

Senator Bosa: The minister has the authority to deal with education now. This clause would confirm that authority.

Senator Kinsella: Then if the Government of Canada wants to enter into an agreement with a province for a program of Canadian citizenship education, this clause represents the facultative provision for that minister?

Senator Bosa: There are always negotiations taking place between the federal government and the provinces.

Senator Kinsella: I understand that.

Senator Bosa: A great deal of consultation goes on before a program is instituted.

Senator Kinsella: My question is very specific: Who in the Government of Canada will have the authority to negotiate with the provinces with respect to Canadian citizenship education programs that will be programs for all the children of Canada, not just immigrants? Do you understand my question?

Senator Bosa: That would be under the authority of the minister, with the approval of the Governor in Council.

Senator Kinsella: Then clause 5 allows the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to do this.

If the program was one of multicultural education under a federal-provincial agreement, it would not relate to this minister under this provision. It would relate to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism under —

Senator Bosa: Under Heritage Canada. There is very close cooperation among the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism under Heritage Canada, and the commensurate officials in the provinces — the Minister of Education or the Minister of Citizenship, whatever the case may be. There is constant communication. They deliberate these matters amongst themselves.

Was that your question, Senator Kinsella?

Senator Berntson: That was the right answer, but for a different question.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Senator Di Nino: Question!

The Chairman: Senator Di Nino.

Senator Di Nino: I have a quick question that can be answered "yes" or "no."

Will any further funds be appropriated by this change, or is the budget established for the previous departments and ministries sufficient to cover the costs of this new department?

• (1340)

Senator Bosa: I understand there are no new appropriations for the running of the department.

Senator Di Nino: Will the department live within the appropriations which were budgeted, and will no increases be requested or required?

Senator Bosa: My understanding is that there will be no increases, no requests for additional funds, subject to Supplementary Estimates.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

We shall now deal with clause 10.

Senator Kinsella: For greater clarification, this provision amends the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship Act by replacing section 4 of that act. Is this where we see that Canadian identity is the responsibility of that Minister of State?

Senator Bosa: Yes, you are right.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 13 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 14 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 15 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 16 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 17 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 18 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 19 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 20 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 21 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 22 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the short title carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senator: Agreed.

The Chairman: Before reporting the bill, I would thank Senator Bosa, in his acting capacity, for his cooperation. I also wish to thank the officials who assisted Senator Bosa.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-35, to establish the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and to make consequential amendments to other acts, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 59(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CONSTITUTIONAL IMPLICATIONS OF UNILATERAL PROVINCIAL ATTEMPT TO DECLARE SOVEREIGNTY OR SEPARATION

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Tuesday, June 28, 1994, I will call the attention of the Senate to a letter of June 13, 1994 from Gordon Robertson to Lise Bissonnette of Le Devoir, copies of which were sent to Le Soleil, La Presse and the Gazette, on the subject of the constitutional implications of a unilateral provincial attempt to declare sovereignty or separation.

SECOND READING—DEBATE SUSPENDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kirby, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the second reading of Bill C-22, respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, in the past few days several of my colleagues have raised substantive concerns with respect to this legislation; concerns with which I agree. My intervention in this debate will be restricted to two points: the request by certain parties for an independent and impartial public inquiry; and clauses 7 and 8 of Bill C-22.

Honourable senators, I am incredulous at the position taken by the Minister of Transport and his government on the request by, among others, the person who claims to be most aggrieved, to have an opportunity, publicly, fairly, openly, impartially and justly, to defend himself and to clear his name.

If for no other reason, the government should agree to an independent public inquiry into this whole Pearson mess to clear the name of Robert Nixon, the author of the report that led to the creation of Bill C-22. Failure to do so denies one of the most basic and important rights enjoyed by Canadians.

Mr. Nixon is being accused of covering up facts and getting them wrong, of being secretive, of misleading the government and of being negligent in the performance of his duties. One national columnist called his report "a shoddy piece of innuendo."

Let me remind honourable senators that Liberal members of the Committee on Transport and Communications would not even agree to invite Mr. Nixon to testify about his investigation and subsequent report, a rather glaring omission on the part of a committee supposedly impartially probing the issue. Are they hiding something?

• (1350)

Only seven witnesses testified. I understand they were all chosen by the government. The Liberal majority in the committee denied efforts to subpoena others.

None of this Pearson airport innuendo has ever been openly investigated or prove. Not a shred of evidence has been produced to demonstrate that the Pearson contracts are anything but legal, sound and desirable agreements.

I find myself agreeing with Giles Gherson of The Globe and Mail, when he states:

> The Liberals refuse to confront the possibility that their election rhetoric about the Pearson contract might turn out, in the full light of day, to be off the mark.... Disgracefully, there has been no due process here.

He continues:

> Above all, this government has striven obsessively to avoid putting itself in a position of having to retreat from its election promise to cancel the deal. Any independent arbitration that might have impartially examined the merits of the contract was wholly out of the question.

Still another columnist wrote:

> Whatever their motives, the Liberals are preparing to seal the Pearson coffin forever with a Draconian piece of legislation that not only kills the deal, but effectively bars even the courts from ever prying into the truth behind this mess.

Honourable senators, is Mr. Nixon nothing but a negligent, misleading secretive flunky of the Chrétien government? Is he the kind of person who would cover up facts? Would he be party to unfair and unjust treatment of Canadians, particularly when those Canadians claim they are innocent and ask for an impartial, independent public inquiry? Would such an inquiry not allow the parties to defend their actions and provide them with an opportunity to clear their names? To deny such a basic right is undemocratic and un-Canadian.

On the one hand, the government states that its most important goal is to restore the trust of Canadians in their institutions. On the other, it undermines its own integrity and potentially the economic interest of the nation, by denying a full and public inquiry into this matter.

If the process itself undermines that integrity, clauses 7 and 8 of Bill C-22 send a clear and chilling message to Canadians that we as parliamentarians cannot be trusted to protect their fundamental property rights and their right to judicial recourse.

Clause 7 of the bill states:

> No action or other proceeding...may be instituted by anyone against Her Majesty...in relation to any agreement...related thereto.

Clause 8 adds:

> Every action or other proceeding referred to in section 7 instituted before the coming into force of this Act is hereby set aside and dismissed.

Terence Corcoran summed it up succinctly on June 14 in The Globe and Mail, when he wrote:

> Bill C-22 is an act to protect all government and Liberal hacks against legal liability and they ram through what is almost certainly an unconstitutional law to confiscate property and contracts without proper hearing, compensation and restitution.

Another commentator stated:

> In effect, the government is using the supremacy of Parliament — and the supremacy of the Liberal majority in the Commons — to settle its own breach of contract with a group of Canadian companies. The companies have no practical recourse to the courts. Take it or leave it.

Appearing before the Standing Committee on Transport in the other place Robert Vineberg, legal counsel for Pearson Development Corporation, said this bill has as its basic objective "the taking of property and the cancellation of contractual rights without the payment of fair compensation. We ask you to consider that this bill is nothing more or less than that. A simple act of confiscation."

Perhaps all too smugly we like to associate such measures with Nazis, despots or dictators of one sort or another. It could not possibly happen in Canada — or could it? However, it will, unless we put a stop to it right now in this chamber.

Clauses 7 and 8 have no place in a bill passed by the Parliament of Canada. The right to fair and just recourse is basic to our system. This principle dates back to the Magna Carta. It has been enshrined in English common law ever since. The French fought a revolution to achieve the same rights under their civil code. Canadian men and women went to war, and too many died, protecting these very rights. Yet, incredibly, this bill takes away from certain Canadians this fundamental right.

Honourable senators, all too well we remember the last time a Canadian government passed a similar law. Ask the thousands of Canadians who were denied their fundamental rights under the War Measures Act because they were members of a particular race. Ask those Canadians of Italian, Japanese and other backgrounds what it feels like to be treated as enemies in your own country and have your property, your dignity and self-respect taken away from you. Some of us in this chamber on both sides have met some of these Canadians, survivors of those dark days, and felt their pain and their shame. Are we to make the same horrible mistake we made some 52 years ago? Honourable senators, not if I can help it.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on Bill C-22 after some considerable thought. Initially, my feeling was that the government of the day had a right to cancel any contract which it believed was not in the best interests of Canada. This government in particular was given a clear mandate and, in my opinion, it was exercising that right. However, on reflection, the bill before us goes way beyond the principle of determining the public policy or programs of the federal government. Therefore, I feel compelled to put my concerns on the record.

First, I support the position outlined by Senator Kinsella, that property rights and the opportunity to receive fair and adequate compensation is a compelling reason to question this bill. The right to cancel a contract cannot be the right to cancel it unilaterally, but only with some proper compensation for the other party and access to an impartial tribunal.

Second, I associate myself with the comments made by Senator Balfour, who spoke very comprehensively in favour of due process, the right to an independent inquiry, and the right not to be tainted by innuendo.

I would, however, also add these further thoughts and appeal to the government to reconsider not the decision it has made particularly, but rather the manner in which it is imposing it on the parties to the contract and, more particularly, on the people of Canada.

In a free and democratic society it is the responsibility of the government to act within the laws and within the traditions of the country and not to act in a summary fashion. The people have a right to know. In a good functioning democracy, governments do not stand behind rules and authorities, but refer to the checks and balances for confirmation of their good intentions. In a responsive democracy, the leaders of the day share information and operate in an open and transparent manner.

Not to allow full disclosure of facts, not to allow access to the courts for compensation, and not to allow the public to know what alternative will be put in place are not in keeping with an open and responsive approach. Why should the people of Canada, put such absolute faith in their government?

Perhaps the first inclination has been, as it was with me, that it was only big corporate interests that were involved. A growing uneasiness is that if it can be done to a big corporation, what protection do individual citizens have against their government?

Second, by denying due process, the government of the day is indicating or sending a signal that the laws of the land could be selectively applied and that other institutions of the democratic state are less important.

Finally, in any responsible democratic government, the right to cancel a contract or change a policy comes within the right of a majority government. Surely, there is a responsibility to indicate what alternative it is choosing when cancelling the initial contract, which was in fact a contract put in place by a democratically elected government.

• (1400)

A choice to privatize Pearson airport may not be the direction this government wishes to go. It may not wish to be bound by a contract previously entered into. It may not wish to deal with the people who were contracted with previously. However, it is a fair government that shows what the alternative is so that ultimately the people can judge what is in their own best interests.

It will be ironic if this government cancels a contract with particular individuals and corporations and then turns around and renegotiates, after compensation or not, another contract, perhaps with the same individuals and corporations. Rarely is parliamentary choice inherently good or bad. It must be judged against other alternatives and in an open and transparent exposure of facts.

Some have argued that it is the government's right, and in certain cases it is preferable, to act within the ambit of cabinet confidentiality or government secrecy. In today's times, with rapid communication and a growing sophistication and involvement by people, surely secrecy and arbitrary decision-making have little or no place except in times of crisis or danger. I do not believe that anyone can seriously characterize this contract in that way.

It is not just a contract; it is a precedent unworthy of pursuit. Surely, the checks and balances of the courts or other inquiry systems are safeguards worthy of protecting. Surely, open scrutiny would go a long way towards counteracting the cynicism expressed by citizens about our governments today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, in my opinion, the issues for us at second reading of Bill C-22, the debate on the principle of the bill, are essentially two. The first is a political-legislative one. The second is purely legal, or can be looked at in that context.

The first is this: Is the cancellation of the contract, including clauses 7 and 8, politically and, therefore, legislatively, justified? After all, we are a political-legislative institution. What is the context for this first question? What are the facts?

Senator Balfour helped us with part of that yesterday, when he said:

> In October, 1990, the government announced its intention to privatize the two terminals in question. Some 17 months later, in March 1992, it called for requests for proposals. In December of that same year, the group eventually known as "Pearson Development Corporation" was selected. Formal negotiations began in May, 1993; a letter of understanding was signed in July; and Treasury Board approval was given in August. The deal was closed in October.

In order to put a slightly tighter focus on the dates, the private sector participants formed Pearson Airport Development Corporation and T1T2 Limited Partnership for the purpose of carrying out the project, and in August of 1993 the federal government, the previous government, and PDC announced that they had reached an agreement to redevelop and operate Terminals 1 and 2.

Legal agreements at that time were to be finalized in the autumn of 1993. We know that a federal election was called on September 8, 1993. During the election campaign, the Leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister, declared that a new government under his leadership would cancel any deal to privatize Terminals 1 and 2, if the transaction was deemed not to be in the public interest.

The chief negotiator for the government sought written instructions on whether to complete the transaction. On October 7, 1993, three weeks before election day, he received written direction that it was Prime Minister Campbell's wish to complete the deal on that date. The legal agreements were therefore finalized on October 7.

The decision to enter the contract, knowing that it probably would be cancelled if the government lost the election, must have been taken wanting at least to succeed in sticking a successor government with a lawsuit, a long and expensive one, effectively nullifying the cancellation by tying up development of the airport with years of lawsuits, injunctions and goodness knows what else. I do not quarrel with the government's right to do this at all. It was the government. It had carried out the negotiations. It was still the government. It had the right to do it. From a certain point of view, it was not a bad move. If I had been acting for the developers, I probably would have recommended just that.

We can see the situation. The negotiations have gone on, as Senator Balfour said. They did not really heat up until the summer. We can picture the meeting at which it would have been said, "What will we do? We are in the middle of an election. If we lose the election, we already know that if the Liberals win the election they will probably cancel it. If we sign the deal, then we can at least keep the thing alive with lawsuits."

In fact, the Conservative government did lose the election and the new government did cancel the contract. By the legislation that is before us not only did it do that, but it refused to be stuck with the lawsuit.

It seems to me, honourable senators, and I say this in parentheses, although most, not all, of the opposition interventions did not deal with the contract or wish particularly to deal at length with this or dwell on this aspect, we can at least go this much further — and I do not want to dwell too long on it either — it seems to me that clauses 7 and 8 are the inescapable corollaries of the decision to take the legislative route.

The Liberal government might well have decided to go with a cancellation. It could simply have moved on a cancellation and taken on the lawsuits that would follow. Instead, it decided to go the legislative route.

Once it decided to go the legislative route and pass a law cancelling the contract, then, it seems to me, it would have been foolish not to take the next step and state that there could not be any lawsuits, because there could have been lawsuits by simply cancelling the contract. The result of refusing to accept the inevitable lawsuits is that the decision to cancel the contract can be effective.

None of that decides, of course, the issue of whether or not the government should have gone the legislative route. There is considerable debate to say that they should not, which the opposition has quite properly placed on the record. I am simply saying that, once they had decided to do it that way, it would have been foolish not to cancel the possibility of law suits.

• (1410)

The answer to the first question, namely, is the cancellation of the contract and the refusal to be tied up by consequent law suits legislatively justified, is "yes."

The second question is: Are clauses 7 and 8 justified in the legal context? I put "the legal context" in the broad legal context that it has been put by honourable senators who have debated this issue.

Is the government justified in being in conflict with the rule of law? I am using the phrase, "the rule of law" in an attempt to embrace everything that has been said by members of the opposition. That is, in the very broadest sense, consistent with principles of human justice and rightness in its broadest sense. I do not wish to limit it.

Perhaps it is worthwhile putting on the record an answer to the question: What is the rule of law? Any of us trained in law, whether lawyers or not, or having taken any courses in law, would have names like Blackstone come to our minds concerning what the rule of law is.

Black's Law Dictionary, Sixth Edition, defines it as follows:

> A legal principle, of general application, sanctioned by the recognition of authorities, and usually expressed in the form of a maxim or logical proposition. Called a "rule," because in doubtful or unforeseen cases it is a guide or norm for their decision. The rule of law, sometimes called "the supremacy of law," provides that decisions should be made by the application of known principles or laws without the intervention of discretion in their application. See e.g. Rule against perpetuities above; also, Shelley's Case, Rule in. See also Stare decisis.

The Dictionary of Canadian Law defines the rule of law as follows. I do not know which edition it is.

The Hon. the Speaker: I apologize for interrupting, as I always regret interrupting any speaker. Pursuant to rule 136(8), I must interrupt the proceedings so that we can proceed to Royal Assent since we set the time earlier this morning.

I am in your hands, honourable senators. I assumed we could continue with the sitting after Royal Assent. That is why I felt that I had to interrupt at this time.

Senator Doody: Let him finish his speech!

Senator Frith: I will finish this one point and then I will wrap it up.

Senator Simard: Order!

Senator Frith: It is a bit ironic that I am in the middle of talking about the rule of law when I am interrupted. I suppose we should not detain a lawyer who is a judge.

The Hon. the Speaker: As I watched the clock I became increasingly concerned because I thought we might find ourselves in this situation. In many ways, it is unfair to interrupt any speaker while he is developing his thoughts, but I am afraid I have no choice. We must proceed to Royal Assent at this time.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT AGREEMENTS BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kirby, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the second reading of Bill C-22, An Act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, before I was interrupted by the Speaker of the Senate, Her Majesty's representative, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, a group loftier than I pretend to be — in fact, Parliament in its full panoply, the three parts — I was saying:

We were looking at the two issues as I see them in this bill. The first is the political, legislative one; that is, whether the cancellation of the contract, and therefore any ensuing lawsuit, is politically and therefore legislatively justified. I pointed out why I thought that it was so justified. This bill is extraordinary, clauses 7 and 8 are extraordinary, and this is in effect a most extraordinary answer to what was a most extraordinary act, though one that the previous government had a strict right to do. It has to be in that context that we look at the first question, namely, the political and legislative justification for what is an extraordinary piece of legislation.

Then we were talking about whether clauses 7 and 8 are justified in the more legal context, namely, are they unjustified as being in conflict with the rule of law? We were looking at what the rule of law is. Although I do not mean to restrict it, I had given the definition in Black's and was just about to give the definition in the Dictionary of Canadian Law. The authors are Daphne Dukelow and Betsy Nuse. There it is defined as follows:

> Rule of law. Processes which are ultimately predicated on fair and just methods and which theoretically adhere to standards of consistency, predictability of result, and impartiality.

Those of our colleagues who studied law before 1982 will remember that in those times we were taught that the basic rule of law was that Parliament was supreme. It used to be jokingly expressed as the fact that Parliament can make a man a woman, and vice versa, so long as it does so within its legislative competence as between the federal and provincial legislatures.

That is not the case now. Parliament is no longer supreme. It still is in Great Britain. It is not, and never has been, in the United States. We fell between the two when we adopted a Charter of Rights. The Charter of Rights and the new Constitution provide, in section 52, that the Charter is supreme. I quote:

> 52.(1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force and effect.

The Charter, therefore, overrides any legislation. Senator Jessiman, Senator Balfour and I — and all of us who studied law before 1982, had to adjust what we were taught because, since 1982, all laws must comply with the Constitution and with the Charter. As a result, of course, it is impossible to open any law report these days without seeing some Charter cases. The rule of law is now enshrined in the Charter.

The question then becomes a translation of the question of what is the rule of law from the old sense. You used to have to dig back to Blackstone and elsewhere to try and find the rule of law, even though it did not help that much, so far as Parliament was concerned. That is translated now into what is in Canada the highest form that the rule of law has ever had, namely the Constitution. Many of the principles in the Constitution and in the Charter of Rights formed the subject-matter of most of the interventions that our colleagues have made today.

Again, then, our second question is whether clauses 7 and 8 are unjustified as being in conflict with the rule of law, and, in fact, is even the cancellation of the contract without clauses 7 and 8 against the rule of law, which now means, in its highest form in Canadian history, the Charter. The answer to that question is: It may very well be.

My colleagues during this debate made some very searching comments about the Charter. It is not easy to find a specific section that clearly establishes that this bill is against the Charter, and neither is that so in many of the cases that we all read in the law reports.

There is no question that Bill C-22, the bill that is before us, is subject to the Charter. Not only does the Charter apply in the normal sense, but there is nowhere in this bill the use of the famous or infamous section 33, which says:

> 33.(1) Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature, as the case may be, that the Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter.

This bill does not have a notwithstanding clause. I must say that if it had, I would have had some difficulty disagreeing with many of the observations made by interveners on the other side. However, it does not. Ergo, again the answer is yes, this bill is subject to the Charter. If clause 7 and 8 offend against the rule of law, which in its highest form is now the Charter, then it will be struck down.

Let me explain, honourable senators, that that would not be a complicated or unusual proceeding. Better put, it would not take place in an unusual proceeding. It does not involve a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to see whether Bill C-22 is consistent with the Charter. It would arise in a straightforward and normal way. It would arise in the way most Charter cases arise. The scenario would be as follows: The aggrieved parties would decide to sue for damages. They might even ask for an interim injunction; they might even ask for a permanent injunction, the very thing to enforce all of their rights under the contract as they see them.

• (1440)

The government would plead Bill C-22, clauses 7 and 8, and say, "You cannot sue because your right to sue has been totally destroyed by clauses 7 and 8." To that the plaintiffs would say "Ah, yes, but clauses 7 and 8 and the whole bill are unconstitutional." In most cases, that is the way the Charter or Constitution arises. Therefore, the right to sue has not been foreclosed by Bill C-22, because all parts of Bill C-22 that purport to destroy the right to sue are subject to the Charter and can be struck down, if found offensive.

As a footnote or epilogue, I do not fault the opposition for engaging in a passionate debate on this extraordinary legislation. In the first place, it is their duty as the opposition; in the second place, it is an extraordinary piece of legislation. I must say, I quibble with some of the rhetoric, but that is essentially a quibble. It has been a good debate and a necessary debate.

Senator Lynch-Staunton covered many of the dimensions to which I have already spoken.

Senator Kinsella dealt mostly with the Bill of Rights and the Magna Carta. Incidentally, perhaps I have misunderstood the Magna Carta all these years, but we do tend to refer to the Magna Carta as a great charter of rights of the subject. It really was not. It was a great charter of the rights of the barons against the kings.

Senator Gigantès: That is what the Conservatives are, the barons!

Senator Frith: At any rate, that is merely a footnote. I have been guilty of the same thing.

The Bill of Rights was quoted by Senator Kinsella. It is important to this issue because the Bill of Rights does contain rights to property which the Charter does not. The difficulty one would have with the Bill of Rights in court is that the Bill of Rights is simply parallel legislation and not paramount legislation, as the Charter is. So the best wicket for the plaintiffs in our case would be the Charter rather than the Bill of Rights.

Senator Nolin dealt very well with what is technically called a privative clause — a clause attempting to oust the jurisdiction of the courts.

When I was studying for my diplôme d'études supérieures at the University of Ottawa, my work included a particular study on privative clauses. I thought Senator Nolin added significantly to the debate by putting the issue in that context. I can say that a privative clause — that is, one ousting the jurisdiction of the court in legislation — is normally found with reference to administrative tribunals. The whole course that I took from Mr. René Dussault dealt with la revue judiciaire de l'administration, of which privative clauses form an important part. He had written a book on the subject, which he has expanded now to two volumes. I say simply this: It has added an extraordinary dimension to this bill. Normally, the exclusion of judicial review or judicial participation does not apply and is not used in this specific context. That is what makes it so unusual.

Senator Balfour also dealt particularly with the question of the reputation of people involved.

Two aspects were interesting with respect to Senator Jessiman's comments on this issue. His was a quite learned and appropriate intervention. He dealt with the question of legislative jurisdiction as between sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution and the question of whether or not it fell within that category of unconstitutionality which would be a ground of challenge. If the plaintiffs read our debates, they might want to retain Senator Jessiman, or at least ask him to pass along his brief.

Honourable senators, without going over all of the interventions, I simply want to say, as a postlude, that this has been a good debate. There is a lot of good material on the record. It is not an open-and-shut matter, in my opinion.

To repeat the answers to the first two questions that lie at the root of our debate on this bill, on the first I take it there is no quarrel with the right of the government to cancel — as distinct from the propriety — any more than there is a quarrel with the legal right of the previous government to have entered into the agreement.

I believe that any government, if the roles were reversed, would have done the same thing. If a Liberal government had done what the previous government did, any succeeding government, if it decided to really cancel the contract effectively, would have done the same thing as is done in Bill C-22. To sever clauses 7 and 8 from the cancellation ties up the whole matter and has the practical — versus the legal — effect of killing the bill.

Just as a parenthetical remark, I can imagine why we lawyers would argue against too wide a use of this type of legislation: It would be very bad for business.

In this case, either we do not go the legislative route or we do; if we do, we then cancel, and we need clauses 7 and 8 in order not to nullify what has been done. The practical effect of severing clauses 7 and 8 would be to kill the bill.

If the bill is against the rule of law, that is, the Charter, then the courts will kill it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!
