ALMOST A MIRACLE!

(The truth of which is testified to by MRS. GIBBS, of Windsor, N. S., in Nova Scotia.)
Perilous Anemia, Hemorrhage of Bowels, with Complete Nervous Prostration, and Heart Trouble, Cured by Skoda's Remedies.

"For 16 or 20 years I have suffered from Hemorrhage of the Bowels. Some days would have 15 Hemorrhages, and have passed 1-2 pint of fresh blood in 4 Hemorrhages, and a portion of my Bowels would protrude while at stool. For the last two years have been worse. Several physicians advised an operation.

GEORGE H. DEWOLF, of Windsor, N. S., a prominent man, having been a member of the County Council, P. E., I was also emaciated, extremely nervous, feet and legs swelled badly, and the least exertion set my heart beating so rapidly, I would have to rest. I wished myself dead rather than alive. Four months' use of Skoda's Remedies has made a new man of me. Have gained 20 lbs. in flesh. Hemorrhage all stopped. Heart beats regularly. I can sleep like a child, and am better than I have been for 20 years."

POETRY.

Misunderstanding.

They walk together, friend and friend,
From week to week, and day by day,
And one chill shadow falls across
Their common way.

They cannot tell from whence it comes,
But nameless things most cruel are,
And friendships time could never break,
They blight or mar.

A veil impalpable as air,
Yet unmistakable as death,
A veil that might be blown away
By one feeble breath.

Shrouds each from each the other's life
And hides the face they used to read,
But hints through all its piteous folds
Their common need.

O friends! once loving, trusted long,
There is one Judge, one Judge alone,
To whom all hearts are open, all
Desires are known.

In His dear Presence you may meet
So sundered and so helpless now;
And he to rend that cruel veil
Will teach you how.

Ye know what He to teach will say—
"Forgive, forget, begin anew."
And learn of Me to love as I
Have loved you.

SELECT STORY.

HIS OPPORTUNITY.

BY HENRY CLEMENS PEARSON.

CHAPTER III.—Continued.

During the conversation, two men, in citizens' dress, and of quiet appearance, had come down one of the broad paths of the park and now stood quiet near. One of them mounted a mound of earth, opened a hymn book, and began in a clear, pleasant voice to sing.

At first, when the words of the song rang out on the still air, Temple moved his head impatiently, and crumpled the paper with a nervous grasp, as if protesting against this interruption to his thoughts; but as the song proceeded, the frown gradually faded from his heavy brow, and the document appeared forgotten, as he listened with increasing pleasure. Not to his ears alone had the song come, for from all parts of the pleasure-ground, rising from recumbent positions in the shade, leaving the rustic seats, breaking from gossiping knots of smokers, young men and boys, and some whose heads were gray, were converging toward the spot.

"Why don't you sing?"
"There was no answer."
"Say, is it a bargain?" continued the other, after a lengthy pause, and holding out a shrunken hand.

But Temple rose suddenly, brushed his aside, and lunged up to a better position for hearing. His companion followed, and ere long they were wedged into a dense crowd that had collected in front of the turf-rostrum.

The reading of the Scriptures followed the singing, and then came brief remarks by and by the time the service was a half-hour old, there had gathered two thousand people. As Temple glanced around over the faces—many of them seared and seared with sin; many old and wrinkled; a few fresh and young—thoughts came to him to which he had long been a stranger, and of which his companion never dreamed. Seeing the gravity that had settled over his chin's face, his friend thought to relieve it by chaffing the preacher, so in his hoarse voice he called out—

"Oh, give us a rest!" looking about for approval, and was much surprised to see on Temple's face a look of contempt, such as he had never before encountered. A few loafers who laughed weakly at his outburst, and who gathered closer to enjoy whatever fun he might be able to produce, affixed his little consolation. The experiment was not repeated, and the services went on.

Nearly an hour had passed when the little man, who was thoroughly weary of the whole proceeding, suddenly made a momentous and alarming discovery. Looking down upon the ground he saw protruding from beneath Temple's substantial boot heel, the stem of his costly meerschaum.

"Jack," he said, in a horrified tone, "you are smashing your pipe."
"There was no reply."
"Say, Jack," tugging at his sleeve, "you've got your foot on your pipe, man, and you'll smash it all to flinders!"

With a sudden, strange glance, Temple turned and looked into the face of the man whom for two riotous years he had called "friend." Then grinding the pipe more deeply into the gravelly earth, and setting his lips firmly together, he bestowed his whole attention upon the chapter then being read from the Bible.

Aghast, subdued, utterly overcome, by this most eccentric behavior, the other stood, not knowing what to do and wishing most heartily that some policeman would make away with the disturbers of his peace. But none did so, and the agony went on. Finally, the last song was sung, the last word spoken, and the two preachers, descending from their improvised pulpit, departed as quietly as they had come, and the congregation as quietly resumed their favorite and usual lounging places.

"Pretty long-winded fellows, aren't they?" suggested the liquor-dealer, as they walked away toward the depot.

This remark received neither rebuke nor approbation, and another was ventured upon.

"Say, Jack, I s'pose you've 'bout made up your mind to come into that, haven't you? Of course it ought to be settled this afternoon."

Temple turned and again looked at his companion with the same gaze he had bestowed upon him during the service, and then he said, slowly—

"Ed. Crabtree, you've known me for two years—known me pretty well, can you tell my god of me?"

"Why, yes," was the startled reply. "Well, don't you do it, because lying is something I everlastingly abominate," said Temple, with decision. "But look here, that proposition is for me to join you in setting up that bar room?"

"Yes."
"And I was going to do it?"
"Yes," with an eager intonation.

"I had almost shaken hands on it, when that fellow began to sing?"
"Yes; it was about the same as settled," said the other, with a satisfied accent.

"Well, now let me tell you, since I've heard that reading, and that speaking, and that singing, I've changed my mind. Sooner than be a Steep-street rumrunner, I'd live as the rats do, on the best picking in the garbage-barrels. Sooner than make other men what I have been and you are, I'd travel the streets from morning till night as a broom-pedler."

"Why, then, fell'er, didn't talk temperance."
"I know that," was the energetic reply, "but what they did talk made me remember who I was, and what my father was. Those songs they sung brought back the old Connecticut homestead that I, since father's death, have poured down my throat and the throats of other folk. The chapters that were read, brought back to me my godly father, the deacon, whom everybody loved and respected, and who would no more do a wrong thing than he would lose his own right arm. And, I tell you, when I remembered all those things, I made up my mind that it was selling rum or starvation, I'd starve; so that's your answer, and here's your paper, and now get; I don't want to see you again to do it!"

There was a ring in the voice that admitted of no argument, and the liquor-dealer, accepting the fact, left, while Temple, his face flushed with excitement, waited impatiently for the night freight.

CHAPTER IV.

Chamberlain had been a workman for several weeks. He now felt assured that he could, without injury to his health, stand almost any work in the place. Mr. Lamson and Doctor Pensoy had predicted that he could not endure the hardships to which he would undoubtedly be subjected—that he would find the workmen coarse, illiterate, and quarrelsome, accustomed to severe labor, jealously demanding that in their company share alike; that he would be obliged to work, fight, swear, and drink with the worst, to make himself ever tolerable to them.

These statements he found to be greatly overdrawn. The men were profane, were hard drinkers, and set many differences with their fists; but, as a rule, they allowed a noisy man to be noisy, a quiet man to be quiet. Strangers of a peaceable turn of mind were not molested.

Chamberlain had adopted the regulation sleeveless flannel shirt, and dark pantaloons belted about the waist. His little figure looked well in this costume, and his white arms, symmetrically developed by gymnastic practice, brought many rough compliments from the workmen. Unaccustomed though he was to labor and self-denial, he did not find it especially hard to spend ten hours a day in the factory. He went into the work with a vim that was altogether unusual, and provoked amusement among the men.

In taking his place he had been obliged to answer questions as to his past life, but although his replies were wordy and amply satisfied the questioner, the actual information obtained was meagre. They learned that he had been at school up to his entry into the file-works, and that information, while it accounted for some of his peculiarities made him of importance in settling minor disputes. On the whole, therefore, the young man had been well received, and was pleased with the prospect of the two years' adventure to which he had now fully determined to treat himself. In addition to this was also the often-present thought of wretched Steep Street. It was his to renovate, and he vowed, if it were within the bounds of possibility, to make it one of the best-ordered streets in the town. In this he was honest, but as yet, little knew the task that lay before him.

His work at the end of the third week was "grinding files." In the great "grinding-room" were, in a long row, ten grind-stones; not the diminutive stone that one sees in the farm yard or carpenter's shop, but monsters weighing tons. Above each was built a wooden saddle, on which the grinder sat, as the stone whirled swiftly between his knees, smoothing the rough file-stock into proper shape for "cutting." The work of grinding required considerable skill, and, as a rule, only the older hands were allowed to do it; but he had shown such aptitude, that as a special favor he was assigned a place and allowed to grind with the rest.

As he bent over his work one afternoon, the perspiration standing in beads on his brow, and mingling with the splashes of slate-colored mud that flew in all directions, he heard near him a clear, feminine voice. Glancing down he saw Mr. Lamson and a young lady standing close by. The agent, with marked politeness was explaining the machines and processes to his companion. With some curiosity Chamberlain looked at the latter. She was strikingly beautiful. That she was the daughter of wealth and culture, her dress and manner at once proclaimed; and that she regarded the men about her as of different clay from those whom she knew as friends and associates seemed probable. Apparently she thought the young aristocrat to have been born to the work, for he received the same well-bred look of carelessness that the rest did.

He was a trifle chagrined that his patriotic bearing, even in the wooden saddle should not be recognized; yet, beneath his disappointment, he laughed at his own absurd pride. He was not wont to worry about the good or ill opinion of young ladies; but for some reason that he did not seek to explain, it would have greatly flattered him to receive notice from this lovely visitor. Her lack of discrimination wounded his self-pride, even while he recognized his own foolishness.

From Lamson's attentions, it was plain that the lawyer was very eager for her good opinion; but whether or not she was pleased with him was not apparent.

The men in all parts of the room looked at the visitor admiringly. She seemed insensible to the compliment which their eyes were paying, and observed them with the same quiet air that she bestowed upon the queer saddle covered stones. Hitherto, Chamberlain had believed that he should never feel ashamed of any honest calling, but now for the moment he felt awkward and out of place. With strong mental protest at his own foolishness, he bent to his work, grasping the file with so much force that when it came in contact with the whirling stone, a large spatter of mud flew from it, striking the young lady full in the face. Chamberlain was aghast.

In response to her startled exclamation, the agent turned wrathfully toward the stone, but seeing who was the aggressor, said nothing. Instead he proffered his handkerchief, and the stain was quickly wiped away. From the wave of crimson that flooded the young lady's cheeks, it was evident that she was vexed. Mr. Lamson apologized as well as he could for his awkward workman, saying that he was a new hand and careless, and that he should be reprimanded.

Had Chamberlain been himself and in his own clothes, he would at once have apologized gracefully; but in a workman's garb, his face smeared with mud, his hands covered with huge leather mittens, he felt like a boor, and could no more frame a fitting excuse than could any of the callow apprentices of the place. He therefore sat and blushed, smarting under the indignant glance that he had received when Lamson had said that it was "sheer carelessness."

A little later the visitor passed from the room, all chance for apology was gone, and he felt as if he should never have the courage to go into society again. The courtesy which he had formerly known so well how to bestow, seemed to belong to the good clothes he had discarded.

"Say, Chamberlain," said one of the men, halting before his stone, "did you doubt that Whitey got a puppus?"

"Who?"

"Why, Miriam Whitney, the agent's gal. You spattered her, didn't you?"

"Yes, but it was an accident; I ought to have apologized."
"Humph, I'm glad you didn't. She's too stuck up to live. She looked as if she would have like to have seen you hangin' for it. Shouldn't wonder if she made the boss fire you," rejoined the other.

"Oh, I guess not," was the reply, and the other moved off.

"Miriam Whitney," thought he; "a pretty name. So she is the agent's gal, is she?"

"Say, the boss wants you in the office at wuzst," said the sweeper, appearing at that moment.

"I told you so. The deakin never gives a man his black look twice."
With much wonderment, Chamberlain walked directly to the office and stood before the glass paneled door of Lamson's sanctum. Within were two ladies; one the fair girl whom he had spattered, and an older lady. The agent's face darkened when he saw him.

"What do you wish?" he said harshly, opening the door.

"You sent for me," said Chamberlain, a trifle disconcerted.

"You are mistaken; I did nothing of the kind. If I had, there is no excuse for your appearing here covered with mud and filth."

"The message said, 'at once.'"
"That will do. You were not sent for. Return to your work," was the stern reply.

Chamberlain realized that the little sweeper had played a joke on him, and he replied:

"The next time your special messenger comes for me, I suppose I needn't notice it?"

"Chamberlain," replied the agent, remember you are only a common laborer here. Go back to your work or I will summon the day watchman to remove you."

This was said in a low, intense tone, and the other realizing at once the power that this man had and the consequences that would surely follow open rebellion, swallowed his wrath and walked back to his work. Poor fellow, he was more excited than he knew, for when he mounted the stone again, his hand trembled so that he could with difficulty work. What could be Lamson's thought in so insulting him? Up to this time there had been only kindness and sympathy. Was it anger on account of the awkwardness that caused that trifling accident? Or did the shrewd lawyer intend to humiliate him until he rebelled and left? The ferment in his mind was not in the least allayed when the foreman of the room came along and shouted savagely, with a string of oaths that made him shudder:

"What kind of work are you doing up there, you college idiot? Look at the face of this file! Don't let me see any more of that, or you'll get down and go to sweeping again. Now mind."

Chamberlain made no reply. He recognized the work as one of his done since the accident, and saw that it was faulty. There came to him the thought that the foreman spoke to few of the others as roughly; and certainly, if he were a judge, their work was fully as often badly finished. Was not this part of a train of humiliation purposely laid to explode the magazine of his temper? With a firmer purpose and a cooler head, the young man set himself harder than ever at work to turn out the best file stock in the room.

There never had been any complaint as to the quantity accomplished—now for the quality. One thing rejoiced him so much that it took away nearly all of the sting of the rebuke, and that was that under this sort of training he could not help but be the best workman in the room. When they had been easy with him, and smoothed his path, and granted him half holidays unasked, it was much harder to be faithful and conscientious in his labor; but now, with every faculty on the alert, with jealous eyes on him, eager for opportunities to reprimand, he progressed finely, and above all, with grim determination, kept his temper.

"You had better leave," suggested one of the more friendly of the men. "Swintert will never give you any peace. He hates you for some reason or other, and when he gets down on a man, it's all day with him. Give in your notice, you can get a job somewhere else."

"I guess I'll stay a while longer."
"Well, you are a fool if you do. No other man but Gaffney would stand what you have. Next thing the boss will do will be to strike you."

"Swintert strike me? Oh, no! I guess not," was the confident reply.

"Why wouldn't I strike you," said a new voice, and the foreman stood in front of him.

"If you will listen, I will tell you," said Chamberlain, assuming a confidential air. "In the first place you are too noisy a man to be dangerous. A man who exercises the muscles of his jaws so constantly as you never does much telling work with his hands."

"Look here, you —"
"I've the lad explain; you invited it," said one of the men.

"Yes, let him go on, it's none of your business," said others, and Chamberlain continued.

"In the second place, you are all broken up through rum and tobacco. Physically you are a wreck. No doubt you were once a strong man, but you are now a very weak one."

"The man made a movement forward as if to carry out his threat, but the bystanders restrained him and the lecture went on.

"In the third place, you lack one essential, which I doubt if you ever possessed, and that is grit. No plucky man will hit a boy as you struck the sweeper yesterday. No brave man will curse a woman as you cursed your own sister at the mill door last week; and lastly, no one but a ruffianly coward will be brought to drive another man out of the mill."

At the last shot the man turned white, and as the whistle blew, hurried into the factory. The men dispersed, discussing the matter and casting ugly looks at the door through which he had disappeared.

In the middle of the afternoon, occasionally to examine his work, Swintert drew near and said anxiously:

"For Heaven's sake, Chamberlain, don't spread that report; the men will mob me! I have a wife and five children to support. Don't ruin me."

"It depends on yourself. Do what is right, and I will see to the men; and remember—I am here to stay."

CONTINUED NEXT WEEK.

A Poor Mathematician.

"Yes," said a society lady, at a well-affair the other evening, "I've crossed the Atlantic ocean eleven times." The smart young man adjusted his eyeglasses and said:

"Ah! Born in England, I suppose?"
"No, indeed! Why do you ask?"

"Because, if you were born in this country and had crossed the ocean eleven times, you'd be on the other side now."

The lady figured a moment on the tips of her pretty fingers, blushed violently and fled.

THE ACADIAN

WOLFVILLE, N. S., JULY 7, 1893.

The Normal School.

The Provincial Normal School closed its annual session last week. The attendance reached the large number, 163, which is the largest number ever registered there.

Everything which relates to the efficiency of our teachers is of importance to our province; for the great majority of the 100,000 children now enrolled in our public schools will never receive any other school training than what they obtain from their teachers.

Support of the Poor.

We regret very much to learn that the Municipal Council at its meeting on Wednesday decided against the amalgamation of the three separate Poor Districts for the county.

Western Progress.

Steady and rapid progress is reported from Western Canada. The first official crop bulletin of the season issued by the Manitoba government, shows the acreage under wheat this year to be 1,003,640.

Wedding Bells.

A large number of townspeople and others, in which the gentle sex largely predominated, assembled in the Methodist church of this town on Wednesday morning to witness the marriage of one of our most popular young ladies—Miss Carrie, daughter of E. L. Collins, Esq.—and Rev. W. B. Turner, of Shubenacadie. The church was prettily decorated for the occasion, with roses and other flowers. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Mr. Gronlund, assisted by Rev. Mr. Wright, of Lower Horton. The bride's dress was of white silk, court train and veil. Miss Gladys Starr was bridesmaid, and was prettily dressed in light blue. The little maids, Misses Hazel Woodman and Hilda Vaughn, looked sweetly pretty, dressed in cream cashmere and lace. All carried bouquets or baskets of flowers. Mr. Roland Jost, of Barrington, supported the groom; and Messrs D. B. Hemmeon and T. Harvey were ushers. Miss Amanda Caldwell, presided at the organ. After the ceremony, lunch was served at the home of the bride's father, after which the bridal party took the fast express for Digby, en route for their wedding tour, followed by congratulations and best wishes of a host of friends.

Weston Items.

The regular examination of Weston school took place on Tuesday last with highly satisfactory results. Mr. Arthur W. Banks has been very successful in the management of the school.

At the Methodist conference at Moncton, the report on temperance was read by Rev. Wm. Harrison. The committee expresses its gratification at the growth of public sentiment and the gradual awakening of the individual and national conscience to the enormity and destruction of the liquor traffic, and it recognizes the continuing progress in the principles and aims of temperance reform. The committee noticed the importance of the advance work which is being accomplished by the introduction into our day schools of valuable text books, also in the Sunday-schools. The committee recognizes the fact that the strength and success of all agitation for temperance legislation depends upon the votes cast, and strongly recommend people at all elections to use their influence and ballots for carrying out of the great principles of temperance.

Referring to an address on education given by Prof. Keirstead at the closing exercises of the provincial Normal School last week, a correspondent to the Halifax Chronicle says:—

"To do justice to this address without giving a full report would be impossible. It was clear and logical in arrangement, rich in thought, sound in its conclusions, and delivered with an earnestness and eloquence which carried conviction and awakened enthusiasm. His estimate of the dignity of the teaching profession is a high one, but not utopian, and the principles which underlie success were elucidated with a clearness and an amplitude of illustration and argument which bespoke a thoughtful mind well trained to draw practical conclusions."
