THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and to take strong umbrage at remarks about western separatism attributed to the Prime Minister in a headline story in Saturday's Toronto Star. In the Canadian Press report the Prime Minister is alleged to have blamed provincial and federal politicians for aiding and abetting the cause of western separatists. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Prime Minister tell this House who is ramming unpopular federal programs down the throats of Canadians by orders in council; who yelled at western grain growers about lagging sales of wheat, "You grew it! You sell it!", and who said "I came into politics to save Quebec in confederation—someone else can save the west."

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE SALVATION ARMY

CELEBRATION OF ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of great public importance. The Salvation Army is celebrating 100 years of service to God and man in Canada this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: During this time, in peace and in war, the Sally Ann has demonstrated the "heart to God and the hand to man" service of a voluntary association, motivated by a strong religious faith and a deep social conscience that goes for souls and goes for the worst. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons):

That this House through you, Madam Speaker, expresses its appreciation to the members of the Salvation Army and its leaders, and extends best wishes for continuing progress in its humanitarian endeavours in Canada and around the world during this time of growing spiritual need.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM

CALL FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF AN ELECTED SENATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under S.O. 43. In light of the fact that on February 17, 1982, a by-election held in the Alberta constituency of Olds-Didsbury elected western Canada's first separatist-oriented legislator, and in view of the fact that in subsequent days there has been an enormous expression of jubilation from many western Canadian citizens arising primarily from the belief that perhaps for a change the federal government will now pay attention to western issues, and since the potential for separation is far more serious and possible in western Canada than it ever has or probably ever will be in the province of Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House call upon the Prime Minister to initiate the one act that would most unify this nation, which is to lay aside his suggestions of a system of proportional representation and opt instead for an elected Senate with equal representation from all provinces and territories.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MEMOIRS OF CONVICTED MURDERER, CLIFFORD OLSON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order

43 on a matter of pressing importance. I hope in view of the comments made by the Solicitor General, together with my consultations with him and with members of the official opposition, that we might have unanimous consent for this motion. All Canada views with disgust and dismay the announcement by mass murderer Clifford Olson that the sensibilities of Canadians may soon again be abused by his memoirs. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) and the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That while this House will and must always uphold the principle of freedom of the press, we unanimously urge all Canadian book, magazine and newspaper publishers to act in accordance with their responsibility to the people of Canada to the end that neither Clifford Olson nor his estate should be enriched by compensating him for the publication of his crimes.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION AS PARTY LEADER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Today marks the sixth anniversary of the election of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) as Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: And we congratulate him on his survival in that position. In view of his outstanding performance as Leader of the Opposition for most of the past six years, and in view of the incisive judgment he demonstrated as Prime Minister, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau):

That this House unanimously urges the Progressive Conservative Party to support the leadership of the Right Hon. the Leader of the Opposition with a view to having him lead his party in the next general election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a minute or two to speak to this motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I am glad to see that all members of the House join with us on this side in marking the sixth anniversary of the leadership of this party by the right hon. gentleman with whom I have the honour of sharing this desk.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I should note in passing, however, that the mover of the motion failed to include his own leader in those same urgings, because the only thing we have going for us on this side is his leadership over there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Nielsen: That may not have emerged as I intended it, Madam Speaker. What I meant to say is that the only thing we have going for us over there is that leader, and we urge him to stay where he is until the next general election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I am sure he will. I would like also to say to all of those hopefuls over there, the smiling Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts), and the leader's seatmate, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He is among the hopeless.

Mr. Nielsen: —that I am sure he will stay where he is until the next general election. So we wholeheartedly join in those urgings, Madam Speaker, because had they the courage a week ago Friday to go ahead with the designated allotted day, that general election, much to the relief of the Canadian people, would have come about and saved this country from the disastrous policies which are being stubbornly adhered to by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

• (1415)

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, as self-serving as it might just seem to be, I would like to suggest to the House leader of the Conservative Party that, speaking for all 33 hon. members of the NDP caucus, we would accept this proposed motion.

Mr. Nielsen: Where were they last Friday?

Madam Speaker: It being 2.15 p.m., I must interrupt this debate. Oral Questions.

DISASTERS

REQUEST THAT INQUIRY INTO SINKING OF "OCEAN RANGER" DRILLING RIG BE HELD IN PUBLIC

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport, and it arises out of the tabling of the terms of reference for the inquiry into the sinking of the Ocean Ranger. They were tabled in the House on Thursday night. Would the minister assure the House that the inquiry will be held in public, with a report which will be public and, regardless of the high seas aspect of this tragedy, that relevant, compellable witnesses will be called to testify on all matters, including any evidence of prior notice concerning the seaworthiness of and the safety procedures on the rig?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the difficulty is that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I are both partly in charge of that inquiry, in the sense that it was created under the Inquiries Act and also under the Canada Shipping Act. I think I can answer "yes" to all the questions, as I heard them. This will be a public hearing. There will be a public report and witnesses will be heard. What was the fourth aspect?

INQUIRY RESPECTING PRIOR WARNINGS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): My supplementary question really relates to the last part of my first question as to whether the terms of reference were wide enough to include any prior notice of seaworthiness of or the safety procedures on the rig. I would like to know whether, prior to the tragic sinking, there was any communication, letter or report to the government or to any of its agencies warning about the seaworthiness and safety procedures of the Ocean Ranger and, if so, what action was taken?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The answer is that to the best of our knowledge, no, there was no such communication.

REQUEST FOR HOLDING OF JOINT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL INQUIRY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As I understand the situation, the government of Newfoundland sent a message to the minister last Friday, proposing a joint inquiry with respect to the tragic sinking of the Ocean Ranger. The government of Newfoundland has suggested that the commission of inquiry of the federal government be combined with the royal commission of the Newfoundland government and that they have joint terms of reference. It has suggested that there be one federal-provincial royal commission with the Honourable Gordon Winter and the Honourable Chief Justice Hickman as co-chairmen, and that the federal government could appoint other commissioners if it so wished. It has also suggested that the report may be made public.

Has the government now considered this request from the government of Newfoundland that there should be a joint inquiry? Has there been a favourable consideration of that? If so, when will the necessary changes be made so that we can have a joint inquiry? I might add that this would conform with the wishes of all of the religious denominations of Newfoundland, as expressed by Archbishop Penney last Friday.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada did offer the proposal of a joint inquiry to the government of Newfoundland last week. My executive assistant phoned the government of Newfoundland on my behalf to propose such an inquiry. Unfortunately, this offer was not taken up, and the government of Newfoundland decided to go ahead with its own inquiry.

This morning I received the telex which the minister responsible for energy in Newfoundland sent us on the weekend. We have not had time to examine the situation. I will discuss this matter with my cabinet colleagues and I will give our answer in the next few days. I might just point out to the hon. member, however, that there are limits to the number of commissioners who should be envisaged, and we will look at this matter.

TIMING OF DECISION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I am not too concerned about who suggested the joint inquiry first. However, let me tell the minister that there was no suggestion, I am advised by the government of Newfoundland, from him or the federal government that there should be a joint inquiry; rather, all that was done was to contact the government of Newfoundland to ask whether they had any views to give on the terms of reference. The minister appointed and announced a federal commissioner last Tuesday, in this House. However, putting that aside for the moment, the government of Newfoundland has now proposed a joint inquiry, which is the wish of the people of Newfoundland. The majority of the people who were lost on that rig were Newfoundlanders. The people of Newfoundland want both governments involved in a full public investigation of this tragic event to ensure that every possible angle is covered.

• (1420)

There have been joint chairmen of commissions before. I remind the minister of the bilingualism and biculturalism commission of some years ago. Also, it would only make a total of six commissioners if the federal government wanted to appoint two additional commissioners. Can the minister tell the House when the government will make its decision? Could it be within the next 24 or 48 hours, in view of the very deep feelings about this whole matter in the province of Newfoundland, and the traumatic shock that has been experienced there?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am sure it would never cross the hon. member's mind to spread lies. I must tell him that the Government of Canada and my executive assistant on my behalf communicated with Mr. William Marshall last week and suggested to him that we have a joint inquiry. I know, through a third party, that this fact was communicated to the Premier of Newfoundland. The government of Newfoundland had decided to have its own inquiry. We now have a request or a suggestion that it should be joint. The government will examine this very carefully and see what arrangement can be made that will be satisfactory to both governments to ensure that there will be a full investigation and inquiry, and that all facts are brought to the attention of the public. In the meantime, it is very important that the record be set straight.

REASON FOR DELAY IN ANNOUNCEMENT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I wish to ask a final supplementary. I spoke today with the Newfoundland minister of energy, Mr. Marshall, who has a solid reputation for honesty and truthfulness. He advised me that at no time has the government of Newfoundland been invited by the Government of Canada to have a joint inquiry. I would put his reputation for truth and veracity above that of anybody else one might care to mention in the Government of Canada. Be that as it may, suppose there has been some mistake about this matter, if the minister has already invited the government of Newfoundland to have a joint inquiry, why can he not say today that there will be a joint inquiry and that the details will be worked out in the next 24 hours? Why can he not do that?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): For a very simple reason, Madam Speaker. A number of conditions seem to have been put by Mr. Marshall in his telex. We have been served ultimatums before by the government of Newfoundland. I want to see what those conditions imply. We will discuss this matter. As far as the reputation of Mr. Marshall or my own is concerned, I will say before the House quite clearly that this government did offer a joint commission.

Mr. Crosbie: Then let's get on with it.

AVIATION INDUSTRY

FINANCING OF EXPORT SALES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last week I pointed out that in Canada we were losing some 3,000 industrial jobs per working day because of lay-offs attributed to a lack of sales in the domestic market and because of declining export sales. On the weekend de Havilland aircraft, which produces some of the best planes in the world, announced a lay-off of 475 men and women in Toronto because, it said, competing governments in the United Kingdom, Spain and France offer better financing arrangements for sales.

Will the minister agree that the time is overdue in Canada that, when we have a first-class competitive product, the Government of Canada should ensure that our financing for the sales of that product is second to none in any other nation in the world?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, we are working on ways of dealing with this financing situation. We hope to have some decisions to announce before too long. At the same time, there is no question that the sluggish world economy is affecting sales, not just of de Havilland but of all competing companies. A number of other companies in other parts of the world have also announced lay-offs. At the same time I am glad that my hon. friend confirms the quality of the de Havilland product. We are working actively to ensure the success of its sales in Canada and around the world.

• (1425)

REQUEST FOR FINANCING TO RETAIN COMPANIES IN PRODUCTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the minister has missed the point. The company specifically noted that other countries were getting the sales. They are not laying off the same numbers. They are beating us, and more specifically they are beating the Government of Canada in intense competition.

I would like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, since we now have in this first-rate industry in Canada a lay-off of 1,140 jobs by de Havilland of Toronto, and over 900 by Pratt & Whitney in Montreal, would he agree that instead of losing another first-class industry such as we had with AVRO Arrow, it makes immense financial sense in the short run, with high interest rates, either here or elsewhere in the world, that the Canadian government step in with financing to ensure that those jobs remain, so that when interest rates finally come down, here and elsewhere, these first-class competitive firms will remain in existence in Canada, employing the men and women in this country who need jobs?

Mr. Lalonde: What about Candu reactors?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, my recollection of the reason for the lay-offs announced by Pratt & Whitney was not the rationale linked with export financing but the slow sales of airplanes which were built by other companies outside of Canada and which were major customers for the very fine engines built by Pratt & Whitney in Montreal.

At the same time, the hon. member has spoken of a problem of which we are aware and for which we are actively developing solutions. We recognize the need to enable companies like de Havilland to deal with the export financing situation. I look forward to having some announcements in this regard before too many more weeks go by.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

MEETING TO DISCUSS AWARDING OF CONTRACT TO JAPANESE FIRM

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The minister promised in private discussions, and publicly last Tuesday in answer to questions related to Ridley Terminals Incorporated that there would be a meeting to provide full disclosure of the reason why hundreds of jobs were given to Japanese rather than Canadians both in Ontario and Quebec. Both the National Harbours Board and Ridley Terminals Incorporated have refused such a meeting. If we cannot have the memos for which I asked, will the minister keep his promise, which he has made twice now, and arrange a meeting for full disclosure?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I said I would arrange a meeting between the company, Stephens-Adamson, and the consultant to the National Harbours Board, Swan Wooster, on the west coast, at which point both parties would have ample opportunity to exchange views, and that has been done. That is what I suggested I would do. Does the hon. member suggest that I should do more? Is he suggesting that I should obtain a letter, presumably from the National Harbours Board, explaining to me in detail why they made that decision?

Mr. Ellis: Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well that at the meeting between Stephens-Adamson and Swan Wooster, and the National Harbours Board, a week ago tomorrow, the terms of the meeting were full disclosure. Full disclosure was denied by the National Harbours Board and Swan Wooster unless Stephens-Adamson would agree that they would not disclose or use the information they received. Obviously, they cannot do that.

REQUEST FOR FULL DISCLOSURE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, will the minister have in place, by perhaps this Thursday when I understand he will be speaking in Vancouver, a meeting which will include the same principals, with the intent of full disclosure?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this was not an easy decision to make. Due to the urgency in procuring the stacker-reclaimers, the decision had to be made very rapidly. At one point I had a choice between substituting my knowledge for the knowledge of the National Harbours Board of Canada and its consultant. When confronted with matters of this kind, a minister does and should hesitate a lot. I did that and, after waiting, I thought I should side with the National Harbours Board and the consultant.

My hon. friend might imply that he would have done differently had he been the Minister of Transport, but I suggest he would not have done so because the danger would have been great in the sense that the project, which is so important to the development of the west coast, might not have been built on time.

GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT POLICY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I would suggest to the minister that he could have decided to take the Canadian company and provided jobs in Canada.

Is the minister aware that the unions on the west coast have said that on this first megaproject they will not permit the industrial spin-off to be in Japan and that they will close down the project, if necessary, in order to get the government to respond? The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce could answer this question, in view of his answer to the question put by my leader. Is there a government procurement policy in Canada, a policy to procure jobs for Canadians so that 97 per cent of the jobs on this project could go to Canadians, two thirds to British Columbia and one third to Ontario, and so that we could have an industrial strategy for this country?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it is awfully easy for the hon. member to be that cocky when he does not have to make the decision. In this instance money was not the principal consideration. I want to emphasize that. The principal considerations had to do with technology and timing. What I did was make sure that a percentage—a substantial percentage, because it is 53 per cent of that piece of equipment—would be produced in Canada, which is somewhat of a compensation for the loss of the sale itself.

In matters of this kind the position of the minister is not easy—everyone will understand that—because the minister is not a technician. The minister does not have full knowledge of the equipment, technology and so forth. He has to rely on somebody, and I prefer to rely on the National Harbours Board rather than on the hon. member.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

KIDNAPPING OF CITIZEN BY UNITED STATES BOUNTY HUNTERS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the minister is aware, a Canadian citizen, Sidney Jaffe, was kidnapped forcibly and against his will by American bounty hunters in Toronto last September 23 and taken to Florida for prosecution. This kidnapping was a gross violation of Canadian law. It was a violation of our Criminal Code. I would like to ask the minister what steps have been taken by the Canadian government to see that these bounty hunters are extradited to face charges in our country, and what steps he has taken on the reported complicity of American border officials in this kidnapping. What is he doing to remedy this outrageous affront to Canadian sovereignty?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we have made very strong representations to the United States about this case. We have asked for the extradition of the bounty hunters, and the matter is under consideration by the United States state department.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, it appears to me that the government is not giving this priority attention. If the government is not really interested in this matter, perhaps it could arrange to hire these bounty hunters to find Mr. John C. Doyle, Hal Banks and other Liberal friends.

DELAYED RESPONSE BY UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): In 1974, Ronald Anderson was arrested by American officials on Canadian soil and freed within six days. I want to ask the minister what has happened to Canadian-United States relationships that it now takes something in excess of six months before we get any response, let alone any action in this particular matter.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend knows that in a case of this kind, which involves state authorities and the courts, there is no easy way by which a strong representation made by this government—one repeated recently on a visit by our ambassador in Washington to the United States deputy attorney general—can automatically be acted upon by the state and judicial authorities in question. We have made very strong representations, as we are able to do, to the United States federal Secretary of State, and we believe that the United States government will respond to our request.

HEALTH

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON NATIVE HEALTH

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister will be aware that because of the desperate health conditions amongst native people discovered by our Special Committee on the Disabled and Handicapped, the committee issued a special follow-up report which strongly endorsed the upcoming national conference on native health. In view of the fact that plans for this all-important conference have been scuttled by the minister's department, and because of the urgency of the matter, will the hon. lady give her assurance that the conference will be held at an early date?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, of course, Madam Speaker. I have not heard anyone say that plans for the conference on health to be held by Canadian Indians have been scrapped. I do not know where the hon. member got his information. As far as I know, native leaders are now making arrangements and will be submitting concrete proposals, which I shall support wholeheartedly.

[English]

REQUEST THAT MINISTER MEET INDIAN REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, the information came from the National Indian Brotherhood, and representatives of that organization have been endeavouring to have an audience with the minister for several months, without success. Will she now take the opportunity to meet with them at the earliest opportunity with a view to putting plans for the native health conference back on the rails?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I quite understand that the hon. member wants to give me all the help he can in promoting projects to help Indians suffering from various physical handicaps. However, I am not very happy with the manner he has chosen to raise the subject. When native groups want to see me, they call my office and I see them regularly. This has always worked and it will continue to be my policy.

DISASTERS

COMPOSITION OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY INTO SINKING OF "OCEAN RANGER"

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. After the intervention of Archbishop Penney at the ecumenical service for the crew of the Ocean Ranger, the Newfoundland provincial government announced it was willing to participate in a joint commission to investigate the accident. If the federal government goes ahead with the joint commission, can the minister tell us whether the federal government will allow labour participation on that commission?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I answered a similar question put by the hon. member for St. John's West a few minutes ago. The government will examine the situation and announce a decision in the next few days.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, the minister obviously did not hear the question, probably because it was not addressed to him. I specifically asked the Minister of Labour whether the government would allow labour participation on any joint board, if it was decided to have one.

FEDERAL LEGISLATIVE PROTECTION FOR WORKERS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question relates to the same matter. It has been said by some federal officials that any inquiry will take over a year to complete. In the meantime will the minister allow the workers to be protected under Part IV of the Canada Labour Code so that they will at least have some protection?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member had been here last week he would have heard the answer to a similar question, namely, that we are very interested in resolving this matter through the next package of amendments to the Labour Code, and we hope when that time comes all members of all parties in this House will give it their full support.

An hon. Member: When?

PUBLISHING

REQUEST FOR BAN ON FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS SLANDERING CANADIAN PUBLIC FIGURES

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question, which was raised in the Ontario legislature but appropriately referred to this House, is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In light of the fact that last week this House approved a motion expressing its strong disapproval for the publication News from the Ukraine, a Soviet publication distributed in Canada which deliberately spread hate literature about a former member of this House, the former member for Parkdale, and considering that this publication compared Mr. Shymko with the would-be assassins of Pope John Paul II and President Reagan, and in view of the fact that this kind of malicious propaganda by a foreign publication against a former member of this House cannot go unchallenged, what appropriate steps is the minister prepared to take to ban such publications from invading our borders and attempting to destroy the reputations of certain Canadian statespersons?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, last week I joined this House in supporting the motion which was passed. The statements made about Mr. Shymko were indeed deplorable.

We, being a free society, do not ban publications at the border. We do not have the power to act in that way but we have power, under our domestic legislation as in the anti-propaganda legislation for instance, to take action against publications which may attack individuals. I have written to Mr. Shymko advising him along those lines, and I have no doubt that he is seeking advice from other quarters as well.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for St. Catharines.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, I have a short question for the minister who answers for the Canada Post Corporation. He was in the House a moment ago. I wonder if I might reserve my question until later in the question period.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

COURT-MARTIALLING OF ORDINARY SEAMAN

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I have given the Minister of National Defence notice of my question. Ordinary Seaman Emery was court-martialled in early January and sentenced to six months detention and fined $750 on a drug related charge. The detention portion of the sentence was suspended by the court. Five weeks later, the commander, Pacific Command, using his authority to remit, remitted the fine but lifted suspension on three months of the detention, thus greatly increasing the punishment. Can the minister assure the House that he will take steps immediately to rectify this miscarriage of justice?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for advising me of the question ahead of time. I am well aware of the case of Private Emery. As soon as I got the telegram from his lawyers—and I think the hon. member received a copy—I asked that the proceedings of the court martial be sent to NDHQ to be reviewed quickly.

Despite the strict discipline that we must have in the military, and also the very strict regulations, I am always careful to ensure that the fundamental rights of all members of our forces are well preserved.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

RESPONSE TO DISTRESS CALL FROM "OCEAN RANGER" DRILLING RIG

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence concerning the tragic sinking of the Ocean Ranger. From the time the distress call came in to the Armed Forces Rescue Coordinating Centre at 1 a.m. on January 15, can the minister tell us why it took almost eight hours for the first National Defence plane to get to the scene? It did not arrive until 9 a.m. that same day. A helicopter from Universal Helicopters Ltd. in St. John's which had received the distress call at the same time was on the scene at 3.20 a.m., 35 minutes after the order had been given on the Ocean Ranger to abandon ship.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the answer to this question is very simple. In rescue operations there is a big difference between what can be accomplished with an airplane and what can be accomplished with a ship. As the hon. member knows, the weather at the time made it impossible for the plane to take off on time. Some of the rescue planes were ready to fly and some helicopters were also ready to fly, but they could not take off because of the adverse weather conditions. I think this is the only answer I can give the hon. member. From the information that I have, I am not aware that there was any abnormal delay, or change from what we usually do in such cases; we made every effort to ensure that we were there as fast as was possible and that we responded as soon as possible after the call was received by us.

EQUIPMENT ON HELICOPTERS STATIONED AT GANDER, NFLD.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): As a supplementary question, Madam Speaker, could the minister explain to the House why the Universal Helicopter which received the distress call at the same time, 1 a.m., was on the scene at 3.20 a.m., while the Armed Forces rescue helicopters from Gander did not reach the scene until 10 a.m., nine hours later? Could it be that the helicopters at Gander do not have the necessary equipment to operate in this kind of weather?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think the last part of the hon. member's question is true; the civilian helicopter did not have the necessary equipment to rescue people. For example, it was not equipped with the hoist equipment which is very important in a rescue operation. Our rescue helicopters are equipped with that equipment.

I will inquire why there was such a delay, but as far as I am aware there would have been no reason why we could not have been on the scene of the tragedy, providing the weather had permitted.

I do not want to presume, but I think that the inquiry into the tragedy of the Ocean Ranger will indeed prove that regardless of the amount of equipment we could have had; twice or three times or five times as much, we could not have saved any of the lives lost.

FINANCE

SOCIAL SECURITY CONTRIBUTIONS PAID BY FOREIGN DOMESTIC SERVANTS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister is probably aware that individuals who are employed in domestic service in Canada on work permits must pay the normal contributions for unemployment insurance and Canada Pension even though they can never collect either benefit, since they must leave Canada as soon as their employment terminates. Has the minister considered the unfairness of these taxes which are imposed upon this group of people in his recent budget and, if not, will he give the matter consideration soon?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not recall having considered these particular cases specifically but I will keep in mind the hon. member's representations and consider the views he has expressed.

CHILD CARE TAX DEDUCTION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. It is usually working mothers in Canada who employ these domestics so that they may go out to earn a living. At the moment the minister is allowing the magnanimous child care deduction of $1,000, which has been unchanged for the past six years, although child care expenses are many times that exemption. Would the minister please keep that in mind when he is considering the other matter?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker. The question of the child care exemption or deduction is presently under consideration, as I recollect, by an interdepartmental committee. It has not been possible to reach a conclusion but it is an area that I believe deserves consideration.

FISHERIES

ALLOCATION OF FISHING RIGHTS TO WEST COAST TROLLERS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. As the minister knows, there are a number of small communities on the west coast which are very dependent upon the west coast fishing fleet, especially the trollers. I understand that representatives of the trollers' association met the minister recently.

In the allocation of the stocks of the salmon catch, which have been steadily reduced for the trollers from 30 per cent to 25 per cent then to 20 per cent, is it the policy of the department, to consider the effect this will have on the coastal communities? Has he considered that the consequence of reduced catches might cause the troller fleet to withdraw from those communities?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I should like to draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of Mr. Clem Tillion, the former president of the Senate of Alaska who is now the director of international fisheries for the Governor of Alaska. I had a very pleasant discussion with Mr. Tillion at lunch today.

In answer to the hon. member's question, I must tell him that I met with representatives of the trollers. I would point out that all segments of the fleet are a bit nervous at the present time because we are considering adjustments for the coming season. The same day that I met with the trollers I received a telegram from the vessel owners' association cautioning me not to make concessions to one fleet type at the expense of another. This will be the subject of the usual discussions, and there have been some discussions already. I will try to keep the impact on all segments of the fleet very much in mind before management decisions are made. This may not be as simple as it appears, because in some cases trollers are targeting or by tradition have targeted on fish which are in rather difficult shape. We will keep this in mind, as we usually do.

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON ALLOCATIONS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister could return to the question that I put to him. What will the policy of the government be with respect to these coastal communities and, most specifically, with respect to the allocations? Because trollers will have to move off the threatened chinook and cohoe stocks, what consideration is the department giving to allowing trollers to have some share of this year's Adams River sockeye run?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, that very question is being discussed now. I had a chance to discuss this very issue with the representatives who met with me last week.

TAXATION OF NORTHERN ALLOWANCES—REQUEST THAT MINISTER MEET UNION REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Finance. For several months officials of the United Steelworkers have, without success, repeatedly requested a direct meeting with the minister to discuss the impact of this coming November's termination of the tax moratorium on negotiated northern benefits and the need for a longer, more flexible transition to and consultation about his as yet undefined new regime north of 60. Will the minister finally agree to the oft-repeated and reasonable request for a face-to-face meeting? If so, when? And, if not, why not?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, of course in principle I accept the hon. member's invitation. I have quite a number of delegations which I must see in coming weeks, and of course I will attempt to give the group he mentioned the priority he wishes.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER WITHDRAW BUDGET MEASURE

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I hope the principle turns into a reality very soon. Both construction workers and loggers in my constituency and elsewhere across Canada have calculated that the government's new taxes on employer paid benefit premiums, and camp room and board will cost each of them an extra $3,100 to $6,400 a year in taxes, driving some net incomes below the poverty line. Will the minister please consider dropping these new taxes before they cause irreparable harm to industrial relations and the economy, ceasing his experiment with "Dickensian" economics, and stop driving proud workers into either the poorhouse or on to the dole, as some of them are talking about doing?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would really like to meet with a representative of the group reaching those extravagant conclusions, because there was nothing in the budget measures which would produce the annual tax increase of that amount.

AWARDING OF CONTRACT TO JAPANESE FIRM—REASON FOR CONFIDENTIALITY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It is supplementary to a series of questions put by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings which related to the deliberate awarding of a contract to a Japanese manufacturer over the Canadian Stephens-Adamson company, at a significant loss of Canadian jobs. On February 16 the minister said that he had arranged a meeting at which a full explanation of the decision would be given. Nothing at that time was said about confidentiality. When the company came to the meeting, it was told that it would be given an explanation only if it agreed in advance not to use the information to cause re-evaluation of the decision. Why was that condition imposed, and exactly what is it that the minister is trying to hide about the decision, which is costing Canadians jobs?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the reason for the confidentiality given by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, that is to cause a re-evaluation, is a personal one of his. I will find out about the real reason, which probably concerns commercial confidentiality. In answer to the hon. member who previously asked the questions, I more or less hinted that, if he were to suggest it, I would try to produce from the National Harbours Board an explanation in general terms as to the reason for the decision. Again I return to the basic difficulty I had. I had the choice of imposing my view on the subject or the view of experts. Had I gone the other way and had the project been a failure, the Leader of the Opposition would have been the first one to dump on me.

Oral Questions

EXISTENCE OF MEMORANDA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport, as with other ministers in government, has an obligation to make arrangements which protect Canadian jobs and advance Canadian development. He has done the opposite. He is not the minister of transport for Japan; he is the Minister of Transport for Canada, and he has responsibility to Canadian citizens.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: He said that the question of re-evaluation was entirely something I invented. I drew that language precisely from a letter written by Stephens-Adamson to Mr. Jacques Auger, the acting chief executive officer and vice-chairman of the National Harbours Board, who indicated that that qualification or demand for confidentiality was imposed in his presence; that was the testimony of Stephens-Adamson. Does the minister have in his possession any internal memoranda from any officials of his ministry which call into question the decision recommended to him by the National Harbours Board before the decision was taken? If he has, will he publish these memoranda?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have such memoranda which prove that I was on the case quite extensively for a period of a week or more. I asked the National Harbours Board to produce the reason the decision had gone the way it did. I did my job, which was to ensure that the Canadian company bidding on the project had ample opportunity to present its case.

I want to emphasize the fact that 53 per cent of the piece of equipment is to be produced in Canada, again showing that, even because of technology and timing a Canadian manufacturer could not get the contract, but nevertheless offorts were made to bring about the maximum work done in Canada.

REQUEST THAT MEMORANDA BE TABLED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, perhaps inadvertently the minister is confusing this question more than need be. My question to him is simple. Does he have in his possession memoranda from officials of the Department of Transport which call into question the recommendations of the National Harbours Board? Does he have such memoranda and, if so, will he table them?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Not to my knowledge, Madam Speaker. I have memoranda from the National Harbours Board explaining why the final decision was what it thought it should be.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY WHETHER MRS. CONFINO-LEVI MAY REMAIN IN CANADA

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, in the temporary absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, my question is directed to his parliamentary secretary.

Could the parliamentary secretary inform us whether he is aware of the case of Mrs. Gisella Confino-Levi of Toronto, who was ordered by the minister to leave Canada because she had entered Canada illegally? She was asked to leave Canada voluntarily, otherwise a deportation order would be made against her.

Can the parliamentary secretary inform us whether the minister is aware of this case and, if so, is there any hope that this lady will be allowed to remain in Canada under the appropriate legislation?

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, during the past weekend a major symposium on refugee status was held in Toronto. The minister and others attending the symposium were advised of the case of Mrs. Gisella Confino-Levi, and since Canada has a solid reputation in this area, the minister promised to look into the case as soon as possible and is expected to make a decision within the next few days.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM

INQUIRY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PROPOSALS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. It is now approximately two years since a promise was made of very early action with respect to parliamentary reform. We still have not seen any proposals from the minister, although he made a very interesting speech to the Federal Lawyers' Club of Ottawa before Christmas. When will the President of the Privy Council bring in the proposals which were described as imminent about two years ago?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the matter of parliamentary reform is under discussion among House leaders. We have already had a meeting. I have submitted documents to them, and I am expecting that they will come back to me with some proposals which I asked them to make. In so far as I am concerned I also have proposals to make, but at this stage it is at the level of House leaders. If the hon. member is in a position to say that his House leader is not interested in discussing this matter with me—and he certainly did not mention that to me; on the contrary, he seemed very openminded—then I am in a position to discuss proposals with him or with other colleagues. At this stage I would prefer the matter to remain at the level of House leaders.

FORM OF PROPOSALS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there has been an agreement among House leaders to hold future meetings with respect to discussing some arrangement on parliamentary reform. Parliamentary reform is a matter for the entire House of Commons. What will be the form of the proposals of the President of the Privy Council? Will it be agreements among House leaders, a white paper, or something he will be tabling in the House of Commons so that all hon. Members of Parliament can see what is in mind, rather than it being part of House leaders' arrangements?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I certainly agree with the hon. member that if some changes were to be proposed and to be implemented in the short term, they should not be controversial and they should be accepted by a great majority of members on both sides of the House. But at this stage what I have indicated to my colleagues is that we are discussing not only the substance of the change but the procedure and process as well.

If I understand the question put by the former Tory House leader as a refusal by the present House leader of the Tory party, then I will change my approach. But at this stage I do not want the debate to be politicized, I want to discuss with the House leaders what kinds of changes would not be controversial, changes that were already recommended to the House in former reports of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. If we cannot agree to go to our respective caucuses with proposals that were already made by a committee of this House, then we will see what other proposals we can make.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It has been two years.

Mr. Pinard: Yes, it has been two years. But last year the Tory party was not interested in talking about parliamentary reform.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We are always interested.

Mr. Pinard: The Tory party was hijacking Parliament at the time. What we want to do at this stage is to try to come up with proposals that will meet a broad consensus in the House. I would not like the atmosphere of the talks spoiled just because the hon. member asks why we are discussing this at the House leaders' level.

CONCURRENCE IN EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Maurice A. FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the Order: Government Notices of Motions:

February 19, 1982—The Minister of Finance:

That the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be empowered to review the profit situation of the chartered banks.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could I be permitted to put a question to the government House leader on a matter that appears on the Order Paper? I was interested to note that the government has placed a notice of motion on the Order Paper today that flows from a discussion that took place between the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and myself early last week. The government has indicated that it is intending to move a reference as follows:

That the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be empowered to review the profit situation of the chartered banks.

I want to say that I have no objection. In fact, I welcome the opportunity to review the profit situation of the chartered banks. However, would the government House leader consider one of two things: either placing before the House some terms of reference that might reflect more adequately the concerns that are felt on all sides of the House with regard to the direction that such an inquiry might take, or consider appointing a committee between now and, say, the end of the week, representing the three parties in the House for the purpose of drawing up some terms of reference in order that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs is not saddled with the task of trying to determine what it was that the House of Commons would like to see studied.

The profit situation of the chartered banks may or may not take into account a number of the business practices in which the chartered banks currently engage. I would like to be sure when the reference comes through the House that the committee clearly understands what it is that we in the House of Commons want to see studied and what it is we hope the committee will be able to find. I would like to be sure that the committee is quite clearly given the power to hire expert staff, since it will be up against the wealthiest of wealthy institutions and the banks themselves will have done a considerable amount of homework in preparation for their appearances before the committee. I think it only fair that members of Parliament be given a similar kind of research assistance.

Therefore, will the government House leader consider meeting to discuss this matter further in order that we can get something clarified, or appointing a committee if need be in order to set up the terms of reference, or proposing some terms of reference himself so that we might discuss them in the House of Commons?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I certainly do not object to a meeting to discuss the terms of reference. The intent of this motion is to have the subject of the chartered banks' profits referred to the appropriate committee. We do not intend to put a motion on the Order Paper that would require debate at this time. I am much more interested in coming to an agreement with the opposition parties on the terms of reference of an appropriate motion.

Therefore, I have no objection, provided we have unanimous consent today, to having this motion stood instead of being referred to government orders. In the meantime, I will speak to my colleagues, the other House leaders, and try to come to some agreement on the terms of reference.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, since the motion as it now stands on the Order Paper, if I read it correctly, would allow the broadest possible inquiry into interest rate policies and interest rates in the country and is in keeping with the urgings that have been made from time to time by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), we see no reason why this kind of inquiry would not be most desirable indeed. In fact, it should be very beneficial in assisting the government to find its way out of the economic mess into which it has led the country. We would be prepared to consent to such a motion. Such an inquiry is long overdue.

AWARDING OF CONTRACT TO JAPANESE FIRM

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the question period, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) suggested to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that if members were to ask details about the Mitsubishi deal and Canadian companies he would provide the documents. He implied that no one had asked for details. I want to point out that last week the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) and I sent a letter to the minister asking those questions precisely. I will deliver the letter personally to him.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is debating instead of rising on a point of order. He knows very well that he should not use points of order to continue to debate a question. Unfortunately, the Chair has to wait for a few moments in order to determine what the hon. member is trying to put before the House. However, I would urge the hon. member, who knows exactly what he wants to do, to refrain from continuing debate on a matter arising out of the question period under the guise of a point of order.

OFFICIAL REPORT

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order which involves the censuring of Hansard. As reported on page 15140 of Hansard for February 18, 1982, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said:

—I know from which end of the bull his statement comes from, too.

I interjected by saying "At least it is not all over my face!" My statement was omitted from Hansard, while the minister's statement remained. Has the minister used his influence to have my interjection left out? What I want to know is, if it was not "you know what" all over his face, what was it? It certainly wasn't mustard.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member has made his representations. If those words were uttered in the House and not recorded in Hansard, it is obviously because the reporters on the floor did not catch that interjection. There is not much that I or anyone else can do about that. I guess it is in the record now, which I suppose satisfies the hon. member.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, when the blues came down it was certainly placed in there and returned immediately to Hansard. I therefore wonder why it was not published along with the rest.

Madam Speaker: I will inquire into that. If the hon. member is saying that he added it into the blues, well, that is a different matter. What I was just saying to the hon. member is that obviously the reporters did not catch that interjection, therefore they did their duty as best they could. However, the hon. member made his point.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

On the order: Government Notices of Motions:

February 19, 1982—The Minister of Finance:

That the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be empowered to review the profit situation of the chartered banks.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, just before we proceed to orders of the day, I had the impression that the government House leader was going to seek unanimous consent with respect to his motion referring to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs the situation of bank profits in the country. Is it his intention to seek that consent today?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, in answer to a question raised by the NDP House leader I indicated I was willing to discuss with him the terms of reference. I took it for granted he would not consent to the motion on the Order Paper. If there is unanimous consent to the motion on the Order Paper in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), sure, we agree to it. However, if there is not, I am willing to discuss the terms of reference of the motion.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, as I said a moment ago, we think the terms of reference are broad enough to include an in-depth inquiry into the interest rate policy in this country. I see the government House leader nodding affirmatively, and under those circumstances we are prepared to consent now.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I would love to give unanimous consent but I do not share the view of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that the terms of reference are sufficiently broad to conduct a study into interest rates. In fact, interest rates are not even mentioned in the terms of reference. Because of that—

Mr. Blenkarn: How do you think the banks got the profits without the interest rates?

Mr. Deans: —I therefore want to suggest that the terms of reference are sufficiently broad to allow not only the study, but to allow the study not to take place. I would like terms of reference which are a little more pointed than those currently on the Order Paper. I appreciate the government House leader's offer of consultations, and I intend to take him up on it.

Madam Speaker: There is no unanimous consent. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

LABOUR ADJUSTMENT BENEFITS ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Monday, February 15, consideration of Bill C-78, to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and Motion No. 13 (Mr. Caccia); and Motion No. 14 (Mr. Kristiansen).

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned debate we were dealing with Motion No. 13 and Motion No. 14 on Bill C-78. I was rising to speak on the recommendation put forward by the minister. As a member who worked hard on the committee, I spoke to my House leader expressing my concern in the hope the House leaders would be able to speed things up by suggesting that the word "shall" replace the word "may" in Clause 12(3)(1)(b), thereby making it a positive move on the minister's part.

We have heard comments from the other side suggesting that our House leader was not at the committee meetings. The reason our House leader asked the question is that he was trying to speed up the process here, and at this time I would like to have the minister agree to that very small change, and then we would not be dealing with our amendment.

So I say to the minister that we on this side would like to have the word "shall" placed in the clause so as to protect those who do not meet the requirements by reason of illness, disability, lay-off or any other good cause. I do not think that is too much to ask, Mr. Speaker, and I would ask the minister to make that small change so that we can get on with the next motion.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we dealt with this question in the concluding minutes of debate last week when I indicated the reason this matter could not be dealt with in the way the hon. member suggests. I do appreciate his desire to improve the legislation and provide drafting assistance, but as I indicated, if "may" were to be changed to "shall" in subsection (3), then all the other basic requirements laid out in Section 12(1)(a), (c), (d), (e) and (f) would be nullified in the case of a person who could make a claim in accordance with that subsection. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the totally unnecessary change being proposed would create a severe problem with the application of the rest of the section. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we cannot accede to this request.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on Motion No. 13. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 13 (Mr. Caccia) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question before the House is on Motion No. 14 standing in the name of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen).

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, on motion No. 14—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. If I may interrupt, these two motions, Nos. 13 and 14, were grouped for debate. The debate has taken place, and the only matter remaining is for the question to be put to the House. Shall Motion No. 14 carry? All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed, please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I declare the motion negatived on division.

An hon. Member: No, five!

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to Section (11) of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): moved:

Motion No. 15

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 15 (Mr. Caccia) agreed to.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour) moved:

Motion No. 16

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour) moved:

That Bill C-78, an act to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code, be amended in Clause 29 by striking out lines 35 to 42 at page 20 and substituting the following therefor:

"29.(1) The Minister shall, as soon as possible after March 31, June 30, September 30 and December 31 each year, prepare a report on the administration of this act during the preceding three months, including a statement showing the number, during the three months, of applications under Sections 10 and 12 and of persons to whom labour adjustment benefits were paid and the"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Shall Motion No. 18 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 18 (Mr. Caccia) agreed to.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West) moved:

Motion No. 19

That Bill C-78, an act to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code, be amended in Clause 30

"of a group of twenty employees or 10 per cent of the work force, whichever is the lesser"; and

"do so at least twenty-six weeks for 50 or less employees, or fifty-two weeks for more than 50 employees before the date".

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, we have proposed this amendment because we find that the clause is too restrictive. What we are addressing in the amendment is the problem occurring when there are larger lay-offs for longer periods of time. We feel that when the amount reaches as many as 50, there should be an extra length of time in which the bill could take effect and provide benefits. That is the provision in this amendment and is why we put it forward. We would ask for support of this amendment.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, we will not be supporting this particular amendment. I think it is very unfair that employers be asked to give a year's notice if 50 or more employees will be laid off, especially in the economic times we are now facing. I do not think it is right to ask an industry or a business of any type, whether a small business employing under 50 employees, which the NDP has termed as small business, or one which employs over 50 employees, to give a year's notice or to give a half year's notice. In this day and age, it is just completely unrealistic, and the Progressive Conservative Party cannot support that.

An hon. Member: That figures! To hell with people!

Mr. Blenkarn: Just try to run a business that way!

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, while those two opposition members are settling their quarrel, I would submit to Your Honour that the amendment which we are proposing which, in essence, focuses on 16 weeks is a reasonable step forward, and we would accordingly seek the support of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The question is on motion No. 19. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Negatived on division.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next two motions, Nos. 20 and 21, will be grouped for debate but will be voted on separately.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour) moved:

Motion No. 20

That Bill C-78, an act to provide for payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code, be amended in Clause 31 by striking out line 23 at page 25 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) In attain-".

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West) moved:

Motion No. 21

That Bill C-78, an act to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code, be amended in Clause 31 by striking out line 34 at page 25 and substituting the following therefor:

"program as expeditiously as possible, to achieve this end the committee shall have access to all relevant company information including financial statements and records."

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, in addressing Motions Nos. 20 and 21 together, as the Speaker has suggested, my first comment is a question. I quite frankly wonder why the amendment of the minister and the government party to the section under Motion No. 20 was undertaken. All that has been removed is "Subject to subsection (3)", which is found on page 25 of the bill. Subsection (3) states:

The members of a joint planning committee shall co-operate and make every reasonable effort to develop an adjustment program as expeditiously as possible.

I have been searching my mind—never mind smart comment; I was waiting for that!

Mr. Lewis: You have lots of time left!

Mr. Kristiansen: If you can find it, my friend, you are a better man than I am. I do not mean the mind; I mean the argument. However, I have been searching, as hard as I might, to try to find a reason why the subsection, which is basically a good faith subsection should have been removed. Subsection (2), as it would read, states:

—in attaining its object under subsection (1), a joint planning committee may, unless the members of the committee agree otherwise, deal only with such matters as are normally the subject matter of collective agreement in relation to termination of employment.

Perhaps at some point in the debate the minister will answer the question what is wrong with consideration being given to the expeditious development of an adjustment program. In the absence of being able to find a reason, one's imagination starts soaring. For the life of me, I cannot come up with a reasonable explanation why it should be deleted. Maybe it was simply sloppy in the first place. If that were the case, we could understand it. However, I would like some rationale from the government as to the reason for that particular amendment.

Dealing with Motion No. 21, the amendment is as follows:

That Bill C-78, an act to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code, be amended in Clause 31 by striking out line 34 at page 25 and substituting the following therefor:

"program as expeditiously as possible, to achieve this end the committee shall have access to all relevant company information including financial statements and records."

It is vitally necessary, if the joint committees are to act, as envisoned by the original bill and as further envisioned by the two amendments which stem from consideration in committee—one which allowed the joint committees established to look into matters of the broader social and economic consequences, and the second amendment which was a positive statement empowering the joint committees to make recommendations which might result in the cancellation or reduction of the number of terminations—that the committees have the right of access, and certainly the right to inquire as to the relevant company information, including financial statements and records.

If the government does not want this provision, is it suggesting that the joint committees established to give force to the expressed wishes of the bill are to operate in the dark? Is that what the government wants? The joint committees will, in effect, be a fraud? If so, there is no better way of doing it than by ensuring they will not have access or the right to inquire as to information they will surely need to do their job.

I ask the minister to reconsider in this case. In committee we eliminated the negative and accentuated the positive. All I ask is that the joint committees, and thus the government, be given the tools to do the job required of them as a result of everything in this legislation. Without those tools it is a rather useless and a very hollow echo of a propaganda bill, attempting to kid the public that the joint committees have real effect or that they are to be listened to.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the deletion of "Subject to subsection (3)" that we are proposing here is because these words are redundant. We have introduced in committee a measure that makes this reference unnecessary. Let me say that in Motion No. 21, which the hon. member is proposing, he is addressing himself to something quite different. We cannot support this amendment which the hon. member proposed in committee, which for very good reason the majority felt ought to be defeated, and it was defeated.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to elaborate a little more on why we want this amendment put forward. The minister well knows that in committee the example was given of Eldorado Nuclear at Uranium City. A month in advance it hired new employees, brought them to Uranium City to work and then gave notice of a total shutdown.

We feel these companies have a responsibility to the committee to answer questions as to why these lay-offs are necessary. The government is bringing in a bill to help alleviate the problems that this can bring about. It is imperative that this amendment we are suggesting be put in the bill. This committee which the government has authorized would have the authority not only to speak to laid-off workers to find the reasons for their lay-offs, the conditions and whether they qualify, but also to ensure that the company is dealing with them in a fair and frank way. That is what this amendment would do. We are not asking that it have any other authority than to be able to investigate a company once it has been designated, or if it is to be designated as a designated industry. I appeal to the minister to support this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question will be on the two motions which were debated together, but will be voted on separately. The first question is on motion No. 20 standing in the name of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 20 (Mr. Caccia) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The question is on Motion No. 21 in the name of Mr. Kristiansen. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West) moved:

Motion No. 22

That Bill C-78, an act to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code, be amended in Clause 33

(a) by striking out line 10 at page 30 and substituting the following therefor:

(b) by replacing the word "two" with the word "five" in line 11 at page 30; and

(c) by striking out lines 16 to 18 at page 30 and substituting the following therefor:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion, the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I declare the motion negatived on division.

Motion No. 22 (Mr. Kristiansen) negatived.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour) moved:

Motion No. 23

That Bill C-78, an act to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code, be amended in Clause 34

(a) by striking out line 6 at page 32 and substituting the following therefor:

"under this act;"; and

(b) by striking out line 12 at page 32 and substituting the following therefor:

(f) the initial amount of any pre-retirement benefits of a person as determined under the Clothing Worker Regulations or the Footwear Worker Regulations is deemed to be his initial amount of labour adjustment benefit as determined pursuant to subsection 15(1)."

He said: Allow me to explain Mr. Speaker. This amendment was urged by a number of committee members, particularly members from Montreal and the surrounding regions. They felt, and quite rightly so, that a grandfather clause ought to be introduced in this bill to protect workers who already benefit from this measure. The government looked at this proposal, found it to be reasonable and fair and this is why the amendment is now before the House. I strongly urge the House to adopt it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 23 (Mr. Caccia) agreed to.

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Motion No. 21 (Mr. Kristiansen) negatived.

[Translation]

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-78, an act to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code, be concurred in as amended.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have had consultations with my colleagues in the opposition parties. It seems there is unanimous consent to deal with third reading this afternoon.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that we proceed to third reading?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caccia moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Madam Speaker, at this point of third reading of Bill C-78, I would like to thank hon. members for their collaboration. The experience we had in committee where views were exchanged and constructive criticism given was a very valuable one. The result is a much improved labour adjustment benefits act. I think we can all be proud of our collective effort.

I hope this bill will get through the House today and will go on to speedy passage through the Senate so that older workers whom this bill is designed to help can begin to receive early retirement benefits without further delay. It is of the utmost importance that this bill be enacted as soon as possible because the burden of unemployment on older workers is too often more devastating than for younger workers. That is because alternatives such as relocation and retraining often are not solutions for the older worker.

As members who have been involved in the passage of this bill know, Bill C-78 is Labour Canada's contribution to the broader idea known as the industrial labour adjustment program. Bill C-78 provides a safety net for older workers in designated communities or industries suffering from industrial dislocation because of import competition, technological or structural change. In other words, it supports older workers who have not benefited from other programs promoting retraining, relocation and work sharing.

Bill C-78 also includes amendments to the Canada Labour Code. The general thrust of these amendments is to reduce the adverse effects of redundancies and lay-offs on employees by requiring employers to undertake more orderly manpower adjustments through negotiation and, if necessary, arbitration of lay-off plans, longer notification of terminations and improvements to severance pay benefits. Over all, these modifications to the Canada Labour Code place greater responsibility on employers for the protection of their employees in cases of redundancy and lay-off.

In conclusion, I am convinced that Bill C-78 will help these difficulties facing older workers affected by certain economic conditions and serve to supplement the extensive array of federal industrial assistance and labour market programs already in place.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I also rise to speak on this bill. We on this side of the House will support this bill in the belief that it is a step forward. It is a small recognition of a problem which exists in Canada but is a very progressive piece of legislation. Although this bill will affect only about 850 people at the present time, with the current economic conditions being experienced in Canada today we maintain that this number will expand.

As we reviewed this bill, the official opposition attempted to include technological change in the definition of industrial restructuring within the act. The majority of the witnesses who appeared before us in committee were concerned that technological change might not be included under industrial restructuring. For that reason we supported their representations and the government accepted them. We were therefore able to obtain a definition of technological change within the bill. We think that is a very positive step.

Another concern which we raised during the committee stage was the problem of duplication; first, an area is designated by orders in council, by the cabinet—which we support because cabinet must answer to the electorate—but then there must be a board or commission set up to which applications must be made to receive benefits and further applications have to be made to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. We strongly feel that the board could be eliminated and the entire process handled by the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

It is our understanding that the budget comes under the Department of Labour, which may be the reason the board is established there. We have not been convinced of the need for a board and have attempted to get an amendment. We have cautioned the minister and the people that this could be a bureaucratic nightmare when applying for these benefits. Since we do not want to see this happen—I know the minister does not want to see this happen—it is my hope that he would give a commitment to come back to the House to suggest some amendments to speed up the process if this were to happen. I believe we would support that commitment.

As I have mentioned, the board or commission causes us some concern. We suggested that either the Canadian Employment Commission or the adjustment board handle applications, but not both. We did not succeed in getting that amendment.

Another matter which I initially raised in committee was that of the board's authority to enter premises. The five-member board was to be made up of one employee representative, one employer representative and three representatives which could be politically appointed. This make-up was proposed by the NDP and supported by us. We feel it is an important step except that those three representatives who can be appointed by the minister could be political appointments, which has been a habit with the Liberal Party. Our concern relates to the fact that these three members of the board would have the power to enter private premises under the provisions of the act. We feel they should not have that power and we raised this concern. The government brought in an amendment and we thank the minister for that. The amendment assures the privacy of individuals and does not give the board that authority.

Briefly, we supported the membership of the labour adjustment review board being more representative, with one representative from employees and one representative from employers. We supported the more strict administration and the enforcement of the act, the broadening of the mandate of the joint planning committees and the clarification of the application procedure to obtain an arbitrator to resolve disputes in the joint planning committees.

We did not support what we were voting on today, which was the measure to lengthen the notice of termination from 16 weeks. I believe the present notice of termination is a standard which is fair and has been set for all employers across the board.

We did not support another NDP proposal to allow the board to designate areas or industries. We felt very strongly that this had to be done by the cabinet and orders in council. The reason for this is that the government must answer to the public while the bureaucrats do not. If cabinet makes poor decisions on designations, it will have to answer to the electorate. This is the proper procedure. For that reason we did not support that amendment.

I would like to illustrate some of the overlaps among many of these boards and commissions which give us concern about the board and UIC being involved. There is the industrial and labour adjustment program, the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board, the old DREE boards—wherever they are now—and the Textile and Clothing Board, which I assume will be brought under the umbrella of this act through the amendments. We now have the labour adjustment review board. We want to make sure those programs dovetail and are not in conflict with one another.

The people who appeared before the committee to discuss these programs appeared to be as confused about them as we were. They were not sure about how these programs functioned. These are some of the questions which concerned us and we are cautioning the government about them at this time.

One of the most significant problems which has been overcome in this bill was that it did not cover technological change. This appeared to be the greatest concern of the workers and all those who heard their representations in committee would admit that it was probably the main theme. Workers are concerned about losing their jobs as a result of technological change. This is especially true of those who are older and live in industry towns where they may not have the opportunity to sell their homes because no one is moving there and because of technological change they may not be able to switch employment. For example, in some small towns where new automatic equipment is being installed in paper mills, much employment is being eliminated. It is an understandable concern and with today's rapid advancement in technology we have no idea what will happen in five years or ten years from now.

Although we support this bill, we feel it is a small step in the right direction. It is a step which indicates that the government is willing to accept that there are certain areas of Canada which have unique problems. We are not all the same from coast to coast and must take care of some of those people who do not have the same opportunities as those who live in urban areas. I refer to diversity of industry and opportunity for employment.

Some members from my own party have expressed some concerns to me. For example, my colleague from Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) quite rightly asked, "What about a small industry in Moose Jaw where they have to close down because of economic conditions?". The industry there is not designated, but a few older workers there would fall within the category if the area was designated. That is a very real and genuine concern. It is something about which all members of the House are concerned, but our attitude is that at least we have taken the first step. The government has now at least admitted that there is a problem and is trying to do something to overcome it, although only some 850 workers will be affected.

My colleague, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain)—as a matter of fact, our party—supported the New Democratic Party amendment on which members of the New Democratic Party felt we should not vote. That amendment would have changed the terminology in the bill from "may" to "shall". Members of the NDP quite rightly argued—as did my colleague, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), in a very clear manner—that "may" should be "shall" once all the conditions are met. We agreed with that. The NDP did not force a vote on that change, but we would have supported the NDP on that proposal.

In closing, I would like to say a couple of kind words about the minister. Not many kind words are spoken about the government these days, and rightfully so. I do not argue about that at all. This government deserves to catch hell, and it is catching it throughout the country. However, when there is a bright light or a little glimmer like this, I think the minister should be congratulated, and I do so. The minister has been flexible. He has listened to the arguments and amended the legislation in certain areas where we felt it necessary, and I thank the minister for that.

The second thing for which I want to thank the minister is that he has seen this bill through. Often ministers disappear. They introduce bills, and someone at the back carries the bills through. I want to thank the minister for staying here and listening to all the representations. I understand and appreciate that at times it can be very boring, but I thank the minister for staying with us.

I want also to thank him for introducing such a bill as this. I hope he will continue to introduce such positive legislation. This is legislation we can get our teeth into and amend to make better. We on this side of the House will support this legislation.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

LABOUR ADJUSTMENT BENEFITS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Caccia that Bill C-78, to provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party to speak on Bill C-78, which would provide for the payment of benefits to laid-off employees and amend the Canada Labour Code.

I wish to start by saying that the title of the bill is, indeed, a fraud on the Canadian people. It certainly does not indicate the provisions which are in the bill. I think it is wrong that the bill should be entitled "an act to provide for payment of benefits to laid-off employees and to amend the Canada Labour Code" because there are many, many employees who will not qualify and who will not receive benefits under this bill.

Over and over again in committee we asked how many people would receive benefits, but we received no answer. Over and over again we asked how much money would be made available, but we received no answers. The Canadian Labour Congress came before the committee, as did the United Steelworkers of America, the communications workers of Canada, the Council of Regional Development, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Construction Association, the ministry of labour of the province of New Brunswick and the Railway Association of Canada. Each of them expressed concerns about the bill and about the number of people who would qualify under it.

Where is the labour critic of the Conservative Party? He knew on Thursday that this bill would come before the House today. Where was the Conservative Party with regard to amendments to this bill? Members of the Conservative Party heard representations time after time. The Canadian Labour Congress called it a death bill. This bill is not a prescription for aid but a prescription for death. Where was the Conservative Party when amendments were put forward to try to improve the bill? We in this party sought amendment after amendment.

Mr. McDermid: We accepted them.

Mr. Parker: Members of the Conservative Party accepted the proposals of the government but not programs which would provide employment. It is a band-aid solution we have before us today. Hon. members on the government side of the House signed a petition urging the government to put some employment programs before this House, not band-aid programs which would provide benefits only to some people.

We did receive some answers from the trade union movement. We were told in committee that in Schefferville only about 30 of the 900 laid-off workers were eligible for benefits. Mere basic mathematics will show what a phony piece of penny-ante window dressing this bill is. Under the best of circumstances the maximum which would be available under this bill would mean that only about 3,500 workers a year would receive benefits, and there are already 500 workers covered under the old clothing, textile and shoe and tanning legislation. That is the kind of information we tried to bring forward at the committee stage. We were told there could be an additional 350 now receiving benefits on top of that. That means this bill could cover a maximum of only approximately 3,000 workers a year. Three thousand workers a day were laid off in Ontario alone in the month of December.

Mr. McDermid: Some were put into early retirement, but not all.

Mr. Parker: That is what the bill is trying to suggest: early retirement and work sharing. The bill refers to designated areas. We had a discussion about that in committee and about how the cabinet or the Ministry of Labour would designate areas. It is no wonder that when the CLC appeared before the committee studying Bill C-78 it said only that half a loaf is better than none. The CLC did not ask for this bill. The CLC said this bill would better be compared to a dry crust of bread. The Canadian Labour Congress has been given little or no opportunity to help solve the problem the minister has identified. Time after time in committee hearing after committee hearing we were told this, but no real or constructive effort put forward was accepted by the minister.

The minister even admitted in the committee that the bill would not do very much, but that is not how the bill will be advertised throughout the country. It is a limited bill and will serve only a very limited number of people.

Mr. McDermid: Agreed.

Mr. Parker: There will be discrimination because some people in some areas will be designated and others will not. When the government begins to run short of funds, certain areas will not be designated. If that is not discrimination, I do not know what is. There is serious potential here for discrimination.

Then there are the Conservatives. Why did they not bring forward any amendments? This bill was before the House for a few days. The Conservative Party is the party which agrees with the Liberals about high interest rates. It is no wonder they do not have much to say about phony programs such as this one. One of the most disgusting things about the bill is that the government tried to fob it off as being the product of consultation. I ask the minister why the government did not consult with the labour organizations. They know the problems that face the workers and have to deal with them. When the bill was in committee we asked various witnesses if there had been such discussions. The CLC said there had not, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association said there had not and the New Brunswick labour department also said there had not. That is a funny kind of consultation, Mr. Speaker.

A presentation made by one employer group, the Railway Association, made the point that any worker who received a pension of $10,000 a year would probably never want to work again. Mr. Speaker, can anyone honestly claim in this age that anyone can live on $10,000 per year? Can anyone honestly say that some of those older workers would consider giving up their regular employment and letting the workers who have been laid off take their place for $10,000 per year? When an employee reaches the age of 54, that is when he starts paying contributions to the pension schemes in the various industries. They rely on their earnings for the last five years to determine the pension that they have worked and strived for and I do not think they are going to take a step backwards. Many will say that they have seniority and will keep on working, so the situation will not change, Mr. Speaker.

The fact is that the government does not have the will to reduce unemployment and it does not have the guts to face employees on the question of lay-offs. Our amendments have asked that not only the employees be investigated but also the employers. It is they who have a responsibility not only to employees in the community but to the community itself which will feel the effects of any lay-offs. While this patchwork legislation may help a few people, what will it do for those communities whose payroll is severely reduced? The ripple effect will be felt throughout the community, Mr. Speaker. It has become clear to many backbenchers of the Liberal Party—and to some on the front benches as well, I think—that a different approach must be taken to this kind of legislation and these programs.

I asked the Railway Association about the hours of work of its employees and I asked the truck drivers' association the same question. It seems that some truckers who drive across Canada do not have to keep a logbook now because the Department of Transport has done away with that requirement. That logbook was an important element of safety on the highway, Mr. Speaker. Drivers were required to enter the hours on the highway each day but that is not required any more. In committee we were told that some people drive as much as 260 hours per month. Surely, when there are over one million people unemployed in the country, that industry has a responsibility to pay its drivers a fair wage so that they can make a decent living by working a normal number of hours per month.

The railways are just as bad as the truckers, Mr. Speaker, because they require their employees to work 11 hours at a stretch. The government should bring in legislation governing hours of work as this is a very significant factor in any industry when it comes to the health and safety of the workers.

I should like to mention legislation which is planned by the government of Quebec, Mr. Speaker. This will demand full disclosure of the reasons for a lay-off. That is a good idea and I wonder why the bill before us does not contain such a measure.

Some people have expressed surprise that the president of the Canadian Labour Congress was impolite to cabinet ministers. But Mr. Speaker, how could a man representing working Canadians, many of whom have lost their jobs or stand to lose them, behave otherwise? This government treats working Canadians with complete contempt. First of all, it introduces economic policies that destroy hundreds of thousands of jobs, then it brings in a penny ante fraud piece of legislation like this one and pretends it is doing something about unemployment. Mr. McDermott has not been excessive, Mr. Speaker; the government has been excessive in the way it has treated Canadians.

I should like to express my appreciation to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) for being available to the committee on this his first piece of legislation, and for listening to the concerns of each group. I must also express disappointment, however, at the firmness of his opposition to even the simplest changes. We wanted to amend the legislation to read that the minister "shall" do certain things after an investigation. If an employee had less than 1,000 hours of work in a particular year because he happened to be laid off, or if he was sick and could prove it and had close to the 1,000 hours, as the legislation now reads the minister "may" allow him the average. We asked that the word "may" be amended to "shall". That is a simple change, Mr. Speaker. I as a trade unionist know and the deputy minister also knows that the word "may" is a very important word in union agreements.

Mr. Berger: You called it simple a few seconds ago.

Mr. Parker: It is simple for this reason, Mr. Speaker. We are dealing with one simple piece of legislation which governs hours of work—1,000 hours of work per year for ten years. We asked for a simple change, and the minister could have made it, which would have ensured that if one worker were sick and another was not, there would be no appearance of discrimination. If the word "may" is retained, then the minister may make a decision which one employee may regard as discriminating against him, so I am disappointed that the minister does not consent to change that word to "shall".

Mr. Caccia: You know it is not correct.

Mr. Parker: The minister says that I know it is not correct. I want to say to him that in committee we fought to have that portion of the bill changed to provide for an average of 1,000 hours per year during that ten-year period, but he would not accept the proposed change.

I admit that the minister's amendments did improve the bill but he did not give us the change that we wanted, the word "shall" instead of "may". I want to make that point very clear for the benefit of the Conservative Party critic who sat on the committee and heard representations from these various groups. He and the Conservative Party should be ashamed that he is not here to speak on the bill and to represent those people who appeared before the committee to express their concerns as to why they felt the bill was meaningless and limited.

Who is the official opposition in the House? There were four amendments upon which we voted this afternoon. Many more amendments were drafted and put before the committee. Some were ruled out because it was said that they dealt with money matters and could not be accepted. Where were Conservative Party members after hearing from these groups and companies which came forward? They did not have the courage to bring one amendment before the House of Commons. They did not have the courage to rise in the House to tell Canadians how limited and poorly drafted is the bill.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we will do what we can to ensure that the bill is disposed of prior to the end of the session this afternoon, so that we can move on to the other business. We have no intention or desire to delay unduly this piece of legislation. Although we regard it as inadequate, it will be of minimal benefit to some people at least.

In commencing my remarks this afternoon, let me say that nothing more than this debate exemplifies the feeling among many people in the work force across the country that there are too many academics, idealists and lawyers in the House of Commons. I am referring to those who are out of touch and floating on cloud nine and to the legal minds which think that because some wording is in a piece of legislation it will mean something. It will not mean a darn thing out on the factory floor or to the people who are used to dealing with bureaucracy. They are not accustomed to winning decisions where flexibility is the rule, in terms of awarding benefits to which they are properly entitled. They are uncertain as to whether these words will be interpreted to their benefit. While many people benefit from legislation, there are many others who should benefit from such and such a scheme if they fulfil this or that requirement. As long as the word "may" continues to creep into administrative tribunals with the interpretation often given it, there are people who find themselves left out in the cold, even though they have gone as far as they can in meeting various requirements.

I am not trying to suggest that blue collar or industrial workers are superior to others. The problem is that there is no balance either in this assembly or in any legislative assembly across the country. The suspicions and experiences of the workers on a factory floor indicate that what is in a contract does not mean a damn, unless they have the means to enforce it. They think that what is contained in legislation does not matter if the enforcers or the enforcement mechanisms are not in place to ensure that the legislation accomplishes its purposes.

I thank the minister once again, as I did in the earlier debate, for having demonstrated some reason and openness, particularly in committee. Many hon. members over here wish the bill were divided into two parts—one dealing with labour adjustment benefits, and the other dealing strictly with amendments to the Canada Labour Code. While there are some limitations to the Labour Code amendments in place, certainly one relates to the other. While there are some limitations to the progress made in these amendments, in substance they are forward-looking and will be of some benefit to people across the country, as distinct from those few people who may benefit from the labour adjustments clause of the bill.

There is something in the Labour Code amendments, not to mention the rest of the bill, which spells out a double standard that many of us find very upsetting—one law for the employee and one law for the employer. The specified powers of the board make it very clear that the government agency will have the power to snoop into the records of companies to find out the details of the lives of employees as they affect their work record and their eligibility for benefits.

But, when it comes to the question of joint committees, charged with the responsibility of developing adjustment programs to mitigate the effect of terminations, to reduce the number of terminations or perhaps to cancel terminations, they are expressly denied the authority or power to obtain the facts. In other words, they are being told to go out and do a job, but they are not given the tools with which to do it. That is manifestly stupid.

Clause 32 refers to Section 60 of the original act. It reads:

60.13(3) A joint planning committee may not

(a) review the decision of the employer to terminate the employment of the redundant employees; or

(b) delay the termination of employment of the redundant employees.

This was struck out in committee, for which we are all thankful. In order to take advantage of having eliminated the restriction on what joint committees could do, we expanded the object of a joint planning committee to indicate that it was its object:

—to develop an adjustment program to eliminate the necessity for the termination of employment or to minimize the impact of such termination on redundant employees and to assist those employees in obtaining other employment.

In some senses it was a very new and revolutionary concept. All parties within the committee—perhaps there were one or two individuals who objected to the change—agreed with the change and with this new concept in Canadian law.

The vote of a few minutes ago rejected an amendment which would allow joint committees access to information to develop adjustment programs in a realistic manner. We are leaving them to operate in the dark. Much has been said in the House from time to time about freedom of information. Again the double standard; apparently it is all right to have freedom of information with respect to the actions of the public sector and of government, but when it comes to the actions of the private corporate sector, which decisions have gross impact upon thousands if not hundreds of thousands of Canadians, there is no freedom of information. That is interference with free enterprise; "—the enterprise which really matters—" as I think one poet called it at one time.

If we want to let the sunshine into government decisions, why do we refuse to allow the sunshine into the dark corporate boardrooms where decisions are made, which result in the termination and the wrecking of lives of thousands of people? How do we justify that? Surely we have reached a point in the development of society and a modern economy where it is not too much to expect that representatives of employees, of governments and of communities, whether civic, regional or whatever, should be able to obtain information to allow them to fulfil their responsibilities to their various electorates.

The divine right of kings that still exists in the corporate sector has been allowed to go on for much too long. We seem to pretend that what they do is just part of some grand imperial design, that it really does not matter when it comes to laws, and that we should not have anything to say nor be able to do anything about it. Surely that day is over, Mr. Speaker. Surely the minister and other members of the committee, in fact, all other members of the House if they think about it and give it some consideration, would realize that that day is over. Just as the divine right of kings has been taken away, the divine right of corporate kings should also end, especially when their decisions have such horrific effect on so many people.

Once upon a time private employers in small communities had a sense of social responsibility. Many small private employers in small communities still show that social responsibility. But the multinational conglomerates, whose head offices are God knows where, do not have any of that kind of social responsibility that comes with living and working in a community with real people as neighbours. Surely it is about time that this government—that any government worthy of its name believing in democracy—recognized that, through some kind of institutionalization, through some reform in law, through the opening up of avenues of information, must begin to make up for that important socioeconomic change that has taken place over the last number of decades. We have to bring back some measure of social and community responsibility to the corporate sector.

There are problems in accountability when it comes to government. We all recognize that. As socialists, we perhaps feel the need to develop real accountability within public sector corporations more than others. But that responsibility still has to be instilled in both the private sector and the corporate sector, which is still the dominant force in this society making most of the decisions which affect people, whether for good or for evil.

I was stunned by the result of a vote taken in the House not long ago. The official opposition voted against each and every one of the four amendments which this party put forward, including the first motion that was put. What they did was totally contrary to the position which that party took in committee. If I may, I will read from the proceedings and evidence of the meeting of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and at page 19:4 for February 2, 1982, we find the following:

Mr. Kristiansen moved,—That Clause 3 be amended by striking out lines 37 to 40 on page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"trial restructuring; and"

Afer debate thereon, the question being put on the amendment, it was by a show of hands, negatived:

Yeas: 6; Nays: 8.

I am not aware that the NDP had six members on that committee and I do recall very clearly that the official opposition voted in favour of that amendment at that time. I wonder what happened to make them reverse their position so suddenly. But that sort of thing shows the same degree of inconsistency, I would suggest, as that party has shown on the question of interest rates and God knows how many other issues during the course of this session of Parliament to date. What they have done is totally irresponsible. it shows they are confused.

Mr. McDermid: How are you going to vote?

Mr. Kristiansen: We will be consistent, Mr. Speaker. We ask every member of the House of Commons to be consistent. If hon. members believe in freedom of information and believe in letting the sun shine in, then let us see some concept of that here. Let hon. members put their votes where their mouths are. If they believe in freedom, let them vote for it. If hon. members believe that important decisions ought to be made in some secret, dark corridor, let them do that too, but let us hear them announce it at the same time.

I commenced my remarks by saying that I wished this piece of legislation were two separate bills. We have achieved some progress since this bill has been in committee and by one or two of the amendments put forward by the government since it has been in the House. There is expanded notice for laid-off employees. The principle and the idea that representatives of employers and employees, and perhaps communities, may have some say is entertained. We think that is a welcome development. In fact, it is a revolutionary development. But having given the power, I would plead with the government to think again and, at some future point, to provide these joint committees and the communities with the tools to do the job that we all know has to be done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, February 11, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-89, to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was tingling with excitement earlier in the day when I was asked by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) to speak for a few moments on this bill. I thought first that I would speak to you and remind you, Sir, of the contribution made by the hon. member for St. John's East on housing. I think it important that the House and the country remember that in the period of time prior to 1979 it was the hon. member for St. John's East who headed the task force in our party that led to the ultimate introduction, during the period of the Clark government, of the property tax credit legislation, which unfortunately was not passed. I say unfortunately because there was a housing problem during that period of time in terms of interest rates that we were trying to meet and a problem in terms of supply as well. But that problem is nothing compared to the problem that we face today in this country. It is important that we remember that this bill calls for an infusion into the housing market of about $50 million—

Mr. Cosgrove: Rental housing.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The rental housing market. The contribution, which could have been made by our bill, thus far would have been worth about $3 billion to home ownership. It would have encouraged the construction of single family homes, made housing less expensive, freed up the rental housing vacancy rate and could have gone much further than does the minister's bill in terms of creating what this bill has as its objective, namely, some market for rental housing and some availability of stock for rental housing. I say that just to set the proper tone for the debate.

Now what does this bill do? In terms of rental housing it provides interest-free loans of $7,500 per unit to a maximum of 15,000 units. In terms of the larger centres and some smaller centres, Mr. Speaker, this bill is merely a blemish on the neck of an immense problem. According to CMHC, as many as 40,000 Canadian families may lose their homes this year because of high interest rates. On the average, a $45,000 a year income is needed for a person to be able to afford an average priced home in Canada. Members know this, but I am going to repeat it anyway, that serious shortages are developing in many centres. Housing starts in 1981, particularly in the last half, were barely one half the level needed to keep up with our housing requirements. The average vacancy rate across Canada last fall was 1.2 per cent. It was as low as zero in Oshawa, the home of the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), and about 0.3 per cent in Toronto, the home of the minister responsible for housing. That is the problem we have. It is more acute in other places. In Ottawa the vacancy rate has fallen from 4.2 per cent in April 1980, to 0.6 per cent in 1981. The major reason for that is the sharp decline in housing starts, that is clear. Why? Because of high interest rates. Surely there should be some substantial and meaningful program to meet the problem.

CMHC has told us, Mr. Speaker, that in the Ottawa-Hull area there is a need for 7,800 new units each year. In 1980, only 2,600 were built, and the data for the first ten months of 1981 would suggest that no more than 3,200 units will be built this year. Now the minister said earlier there were going to be 500 new units in this area. That would bring us up to 3,700, which is exactly half of the necessary requirement. That is the problem we face. What has the government done in the face of that? Well, the MURB program was cancelled in the budget, a program which increased our housing stock by approximately 25,000 units.

Mr. Cosgrove: We were following your example.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The minister says he was following our example. He speaks very well from his seat. The fact of the matter is, when we created that example the situation was not nearly as bad as it is today, and this is an indication of the lack of influence that he and other ministers had with the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in that the MURB provision was removed. The fact of the matter is there will be 5,000 fewer social housing units created this year over last year. That is the housing program of a country in trouble.

Now, Mr. Speaker, interest rates have raised the cost of rental housing. I have figures here which indicate that, at current interest rates, a landlord in the Ottawa-Carleton area would have to charge in excess of $800 per month for a new one-bedroom apartment just to break even. Until vacancy rates are either non-existent or rents go up, private-sector builders will not build, given the fact most people are unwilling to pay that much. At the same time, high interest rates affect the ability and desire of younger couples now renting to buy housing. The prospect of paying $1,000 a month on the mortgage is not an attractive one to a couple now paying $300 rent. Yet if that couple had purchased a home, their apartment would have been available to someone else. The reason the property tax credit was a good thing was that it encouraged home ownership. In the third quarter of 1981 the average cost of a home in Ottawa was $69,000, which means a family income of about $40,000 is needed for a person to be able to afford an average priced home here in Ottawa, given the 30 per cent income requirement.

What the $7,500 per unit in this bill would mean is that an $800 a month unit would be reduced to $700. That is no inducement to build and no answer to the housing requirements in this area. The 15,000 unit figure across the country does not attack the problem at all. That would not take care of metropolitan Toronto, and would not make a dent in the difficulties in metropolitan Vancouver. It would not even touch the problems in Montreal. So, Mr. Speaker, in terms of need, this is a baby step, a small move in the direction of addressing the problems affecting this country.

Finally, the mortgage deferral scheme means that what you do not pay today, you will pay tomorrow, with interest. Interest upon interest. When I was practising law we used to have professional bondsmen around the country who put up bail bonds for people at exorbitant interest rates. Before the people of this country look to this scheme as their salvation they should know what is going to happen. Interest upon interest.

The minister responsible for housing may be right when he says to himself, as I am sure he does when he shaves in the morning. "Well, I will not be here to see that." He is right, likely he will not be here to see what happens. But, that is what is going to happen, and many people who will get over this today by the deferral scheme, are going to see it added. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that this program is so totally inadequate for the problems facing Canadians that no minister and no member of Parliament could feel proud of having advanced it. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cosgrove: Complete nonsense.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the House rose at six o'clock for the dinner hour, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) had completed his remarks, I believe. The Chair will now recognize the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Thank you very much. That is very kind. It is always nice to have a cheering section. I have a little problem with my voice tonight as I have a bit of a cold, so I do not want to strain it too much. I would appreciate it if hon. members would not interject.

I do not intend to speak at any great length on the bill, but I did think it would be important to put on the record some thoughts that I have with regard to this legislation as it affects housing for people all across the country, simply because of the fact that over the course of the last week and a half, I have been given the responsibility to keep an eye on the ministry of housing, if not on the minister responsible for housing, to see whether they are fulfilling their mandate to the public of Canada.

I want to begin by saying that I have a very definite position with regard to accommodation. I have never been quite able to understand how it happened that the provision of accomodation became a matter which was viewed in almost the same way as luxuries are viewed. It was left to the whim of the marketplace, to the decisions of the individual private investor and, to a large extent, to the decisions of the financial community to decide whether people could or could not have housing at a price they could afford. I have never in my life been able to understand the rationale for putting housing in other than a priority position in terms of guaranteeing people from all walks of life the opportunity to have decent accommodation within their capacity to pay.

I remember the time when I was a younger man, not so many years ago, fairly recently married, and we were looking for a home. In those days we calculated that if we were to spend between 25 and 28 per cent of our income on accommodation costs, that was principal, interest and taxes included, that was considered by most to be the maximum we could afford. I am sure you, Mr. Speaker, and also the minister of housing went through a similar situation where you were likely the only breadwinner in the family, the only one working. I was the only one who was working. In my case, I had a wife and three small children at home. I was working in a fairly average kind of job earning what was an average wage. In fact, I will tell you, because it may interest you, why I feel so badly about what has occurred.

In 1963 we were not long married, maybe four years, and we had three small children. I recognize that that was no one's fault but our own, but nevertheless, that is one of the facts. We had those three small children and we were looking for a home.

After having looked at a fairly large number of homes, we struck upon a three-bedroom bungalow. It had 1,160 or 1,180 square feet. I am sure you know the kind I mean. A lot of them were built during that period. It was a white brick house, full basement, one-floor plan, single bathroom, small rooms, the usual kind.

When we bought it, it cost $14,880. We had managed to scrounge together, with the aid of my father, something in the order of $2,000. That left us with a mortgage of about $13,000. We took it on. In 1963, it cost us $88.60 per month for the principal and interest. In cost an additional $25 per month for taxes.

I was working in the fire department, earning $5,200 a year. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, the story has relevance. I had to go to the chief of the fire department to get a letter to prove that within a few short weeks I would actually get to the lofty heights of making $5,200 a year. I took on that responsibility, and I was the only person in that house who was working. Remember the figures, because they are quite important to my story. The house was worth $14,880, the principal and interest $88.60 a month, and I was earning $5,200 a year. I could afford it. Not only could I afford it, but every second week I could buy a 90 cent pizza and half a dozen beer.

I tell this story because if my older son, who would now be of age to work for the Hamilton fire department, were to go there and get a job today, he would earn about $28,000 a year. That would be five and a half times as much as I was earning.

We have lived in this house since he was a baby. We still own it. My family are still there. If he were to buy that house today, it would cost him between $50,000 and $60,000 to purchase it. What worries me is that today on that income he would not qualify for the mortgage on that same house.

I tell this story because it is with that as a backdrop that I want to speak about housing. What has happened in this country is that we have allowed housing to become a luxury. I could make comparisons in any situation, not only 1963 to 1982. We would find, almost without exception, that, taking average-income people in both periods of time and house prices in both periods of time, that they could afford to buy a house in 1963 on the income they were earning and cannot afford to buy a house in 1982 on the income they can earn doing the same job some 20 years later.

That is the major problem with the housing situation. We have allowed, for any number of reasons, none of them good in my opinion, housing to reach a point as far as cost is concerned where the average individual no longer has a fair shot at buying a home of his own within his ability to pay for it in his lifetime.

The house that I talk about which we bought will be paid off in a maximum 25 years. Sometime in 1988 that home will be fully paid. From 1988 on I will not have to pay anything. Even if my son were to assume responsibility for the mortgage, if he were able to raise the down payment to allow him to make the payments today, he would never pay it off. He would retire long before he ever reached the final payment.

I tell the story because I believe it is indicative of the problem which confronts many Canadians as they try to find a place to live. Rent controls may have been a problem for some people. However, it is only because of rent controls, at least in the province of Ontario, that rental accommodation has not skyrocketed in the same way as housing prices have. It is only because those controls were put in place.

It worries me every time I hear or read about the minister speaking about removing rent controls. You cannot remove rent controls until there is a sufficient number of units available to hold the price down by virtue of the ability of people to move from one place to another and leave where they are if the rent is too high. You cannot take off rent controls unless you are prepared to take those necessary steps.

I will get on to the situation as I see it. Inflation is a worldwide problem. The other day I questioned the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) about the possibility of some measures to deal specifically with mortgage interest rates. He responded by saying that he too was worried about it. I must confess I appreciated that. He went on to say we are facing a worldwide problem in terms of inflation. We could not really come to grips with the housing crisis because of world inflation. I put to you, Mr. Speaker, and to other interested members of the House that worldwide inflation has virtually no impact on housing or mortage rates. It need not have an impact and it does not have an impact.

There may be a few dollars but there is very little money that flows into Canada from outside which goes into mortgages. I admit that there is money that goes into the acquisition of property, but that is not what we are discussing. There is very little money which comes into Canada to be used for lending purposes for mortgages alone.

Bearing this in mind, it is quite clear to me that we could and, if we had the will, should direct those people who invest the public's money to invest it, or a reasonable portion of their portfolio capital, in mortgages at a predetermined interest rate which is within the ability of Canadians to pay. By "those people" I am talking about a number of different institutions ranging from life insurance companies to banks and credit unions, with all other forms of financial institutions in between, including the government. As a matter of course, those institutions should be required to invest in mortgages at a predetermined interest rate.

This does not begin to consider risk capital or investment for other purposes and the interest rates which may or may not be charged in that area. What it allows for is a blended return, or a blended interest rate in the end, if I may use the term. The interest rate which would come back from savings and investments would be, on balance, somewhat less than it is today. Nevertheless, it would be a blend of moneys loaned out for all other purposes and moneys which are required by law to be lent as mortgages for home ownership.

I suggest that there is nothing particularly wrong with that, but what worries me about today's market is that if I were to invest money, I could get a better return from a mortgage certificate which is absolutely guaranteed than I could if I were to invest in something with an element of risk attached to it. To me, there is something backwards about that system under which a person can obtain a better rate of return from a guaranteed investment situation than an investment in a risk-related situation.

I put forward that the first premise on which we start a housing policy is, first, that housing for people at an affordable price is a right and, second, that we must be able to raise the necessary capital from all those institutions, governments included, which are in the business of handling the public's funds. A significant proportion of that money must be made available to provide affordable mortgages for people all across the country.

We would be able to see the tremendous benefits which would result if we commenced on a premise such as that. If the government showed that kind of will, we could begin to build the required number of houses for people in every community where housing is needed. This does not involve just the construction of houses. I am probably not telling the minister anything he does not know. I am sure he is as familiar with housing, if not more, as I am and I am sure he knows that, according to almost all calculations, we need something in excess of 200,000 housing units per year for at least five years in order to meet the backlog in the present demand for housing if we were to start building in the price range which people can afford.

I am sure that the minister also knows that HUDAC recently reduced its estimate of housing needs from 220,000 a year to 200,000. The reason for this is not that there are fewer people who need accommodation but that there are fewer people who can afford it. The rationale of HUDAC is that it might as well build houses because people cannot afford them. I suggest, for that very bad reason, that we ignore the estimate of 220,000 and proceed with the estimate of 200,000 and start building those homes.

When we begin building those homes, every time we dig the foundation we begin a process which creates 2.2 man-years of work in Canada. If we build 220,000 housing units, we would create $2.2 \times 220{,}000$ housing units, which would equal approximately something over 400,000 man-years of work, without going into the calculation. Those 400,000 man-years of work do not only take into account the construction of a home. It includes the making of the copper pipes, ceramic tile, bathroom fixtures, the shingles for the roof, the windows and doors. These items would be manufactured in Canada from coast to coast, whether it be in the lumber industry in British Columbia, the manufacturing sector in Ontario or another portion of the manufacturing sector on the east coast. Every part of Canada would benefit from those approximately 460,000 man years of work, which would be created as a result of building the homes which people need.

I believe that if the provision of accommodation was the only reason for the construction of houses, that would be reason enough because it would be providing people with accommodation which is needed. However, at a time when we have unemployment, which is close to 1,500,000, and we consider the fact that we could create twice as many, or more, jobs than are now being created by meeting the housing need, I cannot understand why the government has steadfastly refused to go ahead with the development and construction of housing.

This does not only involve accommodation for home owners. Although it is part of the Canadian way that a person wishes to save in order ultimately to own his own home, which should be encouraged, we also have a responsibility to build rental accommodation at present. There is a serious accommodation problem in most metropolitan areas, of which I am sure the minister is well aware. I know he is well aware of this because from statistics in his own ministry it is quite plain to see. Whether we are speaking of Ottawa, which has a virtual zero percentage vacancy rate, or Hamilton, with a virtually zero percentage vacancy rate, or Vancouver, which again has a virtually zero percentage rate, there is an obvious need in almost every major metropolitan centre to build rental accommodation.

Some might argue that we cannot afford this, but we must realize that what we are talking about is an investment. It is not the purchase of something which will disappear over two or three years. It is not the acquisition or building of a product which will become obsolete. It is not like building a bomb that will blow up and be gone. It is building a home which will last for 50 or more years, and during the lifetime of that house every single year there will be a financial return in terms either of rental or of the repayment of the mortgage. What we are talking about is an investment now with a guaranteed return on that investment over a period of time. Every single dollar put into it comes back with interest. Every single dollar put into it creates jobs now and jobs in the future. Every single dollar put into it, as opposed to many other places where dollars might be put, creates not only the jobs we must have now in order to make the economy work again, but also an accommodation which will last not just for the family which moves into it when it is new but for a succession of other families which will ultimately live in that accommodation over many, many years.

I think we are being very shortsighted. I think it was last year we gave—and I am not suggesting the figures are particularly significant—to one company which wanted to locate in an area in eastern Canada something in the order of $60 million to locate there. It was going to locate there anyway, and we got nothing in return for the $60 million, but somehow or other, because that would create a couple hundred jobs—not even permanent jobs—we could find $60 million to give. In the case of the auto industry, together with the Ontario government we gave to Ford of Canada many millions of dollars, but did not get any jobs in return.

Mr. Pepin: We have not given them anything yet.

Mr. Deans: We gave a guarantee. We might as well have spent the money.

Mr. Pepin: You said we gave it to them.

Mr. Deans: The minister quite rightly points out that no money has changed hands, but we are committed to making a payment. We are committed already.

Mr. Pepin: I was just toning down the emphasis.

Mr. Deans: That is fine. I never mind an interjection as sensible as that. I think it was worthy of the minister to interject that because it allows me to point out the fallacy in the government's position. The government seems to feel that unless it is actually handing over a cheque, there is no commitment from the public treasury. Has the minister ever co-signed for a loan? No money changes hands, but if the other fellow does not pay, you have to come up with the bucks. The co-signer must have the capacity to produce that amount of capital at a given moment in time, and that is the same situation into which the federal and provincial governments have put themselves with regard to loan guarantees.

What I am really pointing out is that we seem to be able, for reasons I have never quite understood, to find ways to give money away without any guaranteed return, but here we have an opportunity to invest both for today's needs and for future needs, and we cannot find the money to do it.

Mr. Cosgrove: We have $350 million for 70,000 jobs, but you will not let us spend it.

Mr. Deans: I would be happy to let the minister spend $350 million. In fact, I made an offer to the minister the other day, and I know he can hardly wait to act on it. If he will guarantee that we will build the 70,000 housing units that make up the difference between the 140,000 to 150,000 which most experts agree will be built in this current year and the 220,000 that most people agree constitutes the need in Canada, and if the government will guarantee to undertake to begin the process of building those 70,000 additional housing units, at 8.36 the bill will pass and the minister will be able to spend the money.

Mr. Cosgrove: Would you half pass it for 30,000 units?

Mr. Deans: No, I will not half pass the bill for 30,000 units.

Mr. Cosgrove: So it is nothing or 70,000?

Mr. Deans: No, it is not nothing or 70,000. The minister must surely know that there can be no more compelling argument made than an argument for meeting an immediate and long-term need with regard to accommodation and meeting an immediate and long-term need with regard to job creation. There can be no more compelling argument than an argument for putting to work the raw materials which are in Canada for Canadian use and for mobilizing the financial resources of a very privileged financial sector in Canada for the use of Canadians over a long period of time. There can be no more compelling argument than an argument for living up to one of the few commitments the government surely must make if it is to be a government worth the name, and that commitment is to guarantee that, in addition to providing people with the opportunity to eat reasonably well, they be provided the opportunity to be sheltered in the same way.

Mr. Cosgrove: Perhaps the carpenters' union would appreciate 30,000 jobs.

Mr. Deans: Perhaps the carpenters' union would appreciate 30,000, although I am sure the minister knows—and then again perhaps he does not, and it is strange, but I suspect he probably does not because he lives in a somewhat cloistered world—that very few of the people who build houses are unionized. Most of the people who build houses are not unionized, so I am not arguing on behalf of a particular interest; I am arguing on behalf of people. Carpenters' unions, generally speaking, are not involved in the building of private accommodation.

Mr. Cosgrove: We are talking about rental accommodation.

Mr. Deans: That is fine. I am talking about rental accommodation too, and they are not even in that. It is a sad situation when the minister does not know that, but I will accept it as simply an oversight on his part.

Of all the things we have the ability to do in this country and of all the undertakings we have the ability to undertake, without any outside help at all, I suspect, we could, if we had to, feed ourselves, house ourselves and, if we wanted to, meet our energy requirements. Those are the things we have the ability to do in this country, and we have the ability to do them because this country is inherently rich in all of the necessities to provide for those three things.

There are many other things we can do, and I admit that. There are many other services we can provide. We can provide a better level of health care. We can provide a better level of education. We can do all those things, but in terms of the fundamental needs of people, we can heat them in the winter, we can house them year round and we can feed them year round, because in this country there is everything needed to do those things. A government which cannot mobilize those resources in such a way as to guarantee that the public of the country can have access to all three within their ability to pay does not deserve the name of a government. That is what I find so distressing about the attitude this government takes. That is what I find so upsetting about the attitude this government takes.

When I started out I told the story of how things have deteriorated from 1963 to 1982. I explained—I think in the most lucid terms—what has occurred in the country during that period. It is not that wages have not risen by a reasonable amount, because I think by any standard wages have risen—at least in the occupation I was speaking about—by far more than any single individual living and working in 1963 would have anticipated. However, the price of accommodation and the financial burden of carrying it have risen far beyond what anyone, no matter who, could ever have anticipated. They have risen far beyond what anyone in the country can afford, far beyond what anyone in the country should be asked to tolerate and far beyond what anyone in the House of Commons could ever explain to the electorate which sent him or her here.

My attitude in this matter is simple, and I will put it to the minister quite frankly. The bill he has put before us is another step along the way to a further deterioration of the housing situation in the country. It is another stopgap measure, another attempt to fill a hole with a small peg. It may stem the tide a little, it may keep the water back for a moment or two, but the problem is the government's fundamental attitude toward accommodation—its unwillingness to commit itself to accommodation for people at a price they can afford. There can only be one answer to that, Mr. Speaker, and it cannot possibly be that the banks reduce their interest rates from 19.5 per cent to 17.5 per cent over five years if they feel they will make enough money at that level. Dammit, man, no one should be asked to pay the price people are being asked to pay today by the financial institutions of this country!

At some point in the near future—and you can see it happening now; you do not have to be a mathematical genius either—the only people able to buy homes will be the very, very wealthy. As far as the rest of the population is concerned, it will mean doubling up, tripling up, quadrupling up—it will mean living in basements and attics. Those conditions existed years ago but were eliminated as a result of the systematic efforts of a large cross-section of the population. We built a better and more suitable society of communities where people could live with a sense that they were going to grow together, provide for their families, and have the amenities of social services, educational facilities and health care facilities. We built a society where people would be able to work and live together and acquire for themselves—for their old age, if you like—the security that they would not be required to earn at the level of their working years forever.

I say to any hon. member who cares to listen that it is very frightening to think that today a young person can buy a home, enter into an agreement and then, at the time of resigning the mortgage, find—as was the case with the Royal Bank—that the lender has brought in a scheme to reduce his payments to the point where, at the end of the year he owes more than he did at the beginning of the year. Yet the Minister of Finance had the gall to rise in his place and commend the bank for finding a way to put people even further into debt.

What possible hope is there for that young family, with the parents at age 26, 27 or 28, which decides to buy a home? When they reach about 70 years of age and no longer can find jobs, they will still owe half as much as they did when they first bought the home 40 years ago. How will they ever be able to set money aside for the time when they can no longer work? How will they ever be able to set aside the capital that will allow them to make the payments on the mortgage which are rising at the whim of the people in the financial institutions in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and other parts of the country? The more you think about it the more depressing it becomes, Mr. Speaker—the more agonizing it is and the more difficult it is to understand.

I say to the minister, and through you to the government, Mr. Speaker, that if there is one area in which they have a prime responsibility to act, this must surely be it. Can the minister not find it in his heart to understand that accommodation for people is not something to be played around with or left to the whim of a few investors and their advisers—that it is not something that can be left to chance? In a modern, sensitive, sophisticated society it is not only possible but necessary that government set the guidelines to guarantee that people will be able to find accommodation and pay for it in their working lifetime.

Mr. Benjamin: And not just to make a buck.

Mr. Deans: And not, as my colleague says, just to make a buck.

Investment in a home is the biggest investment a person ever makes. It takes more of an individual's income than any other single item. It becomes the cornerstone of his life. He buys it because he believes it gives him stability. The government has systematically eroded that belief, however. Over the past three or four years the government has allowed what was once a legitimate aspiration, attainable after a reasonable amount of hard work, to become nothing more than a dream, and in some cases a nightmare!

I want to suggest to the minister that of all the responsibilities he could have been given, this is the single most important responsibility in government today. The minister has an opportunity to rise above the stupidity of petty politics and show that he is capable of giving leadership. He can provide the people of Canada with some hope for the future; he can assume responsibility that neither he nor any predecessor has shown any willingness or ability to assume. He can state clearly that it is a principle of the government—which I think is supported by everyone in the House—that during the next 12 months we will find a way to return to the people of Canada the opportunity to acquire a home that they can afford and pay for during their lives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I am rather pleased to follow the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) whose oratory and humane views deserve great attention.

A dilemma faces the Canadian people, particularly new family units and people coming out of school, who are looking for work and dreaming of raising a family in the comfortable environs of a private home. All this is at stake in this debate.

I was fascinated by the hon. member's remarks. This past year I have spent many hours wondering why the way I want to see the problem solved is so different from the way members of the New Democratic Party want to solve it.

The more we go to a structure in our state; the more we remove the incentives and initiatives that are magic for making people work and dream and take risks, the more we become stuck in the swamps of inactivity and bureaucratic disinitiative. I think these are the things we are concerned with when we debate Bill C-89.

In his early remarks the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain spoke of his and his wife's early struggles to create a home for their three young children. I think most of us have a similar story to tell. Mine is rather different and it predates his by some years. I came out of the war married, with a child, and pretty soon there was another one. In those days things were hard. One had to finish an education to enable one to earn some level of income beyond that allowed by the Department of Veterans Affairs. In those days the government had some very desirable programs of which we seem to have lost sight. There was the Veterans' Land Act for returning veterans who were trying to resettle in private homes. In addition, the central mortgage and housing corporation was a Crown corporation of which every person could be proud.

Today, after a decade of total, arrogant mismanagement of the corporation and of the resources of Canadians, we are dealing with an absolute national disaster. The incentive has been removed from the system. Any desire or initiative to save or create for oneself has been removed from the system. Any fiscal policy which would allow a person to be self-reliant and proud of his own creation or of the fact that he acquired and built, in one way or another, a home on a piece of property, was able to afford it and to provide his spouse, family and himself with security and self-respect, is gone because of the fiscal policies the Liberal government has delivered to Canadians. Professor Flores of England made a statement which I think applies to the debate on this housing bill. After years of socialist and labour governments in Britain, he said that the private sector could be defined as the part of the economy which the government controls, and that the public sector is the part which nobody controls. This is the dilemma which Canada is in today. They mushroom our Crown corporations, take away tax points from the private sector and force everyone to come cap in hand to rows and rows of desks with bureaucrats sitting at them, to ask for permission to do this and to ask for a grant to do it.

Mr. Benjamin: And bank managers.

Mr. Huntington: If bank managers and the system were left alone, with the correct fiscal policies they can serve and deliver a degree of self-reliance which no government bureaucrat or government minister can deliver to anybody in any country anywhere at any time. The incentive system is the magic which makes people work. Hon. members shake their heads and shout "dinosaur". They just have to look at the history of Britain during the post-war years to see its dilemma. Its state-owned industries are collapsing. Most of them cannot even cover through revenues their wage costs. They have forgotten that the welfare state which they build and demand to have must come from the creation of wealth. We cannot sustain the very enviable social programs of this country very much longer unless we direct our efforts and our minds back to the creation of wealth so that we do not lose what we have. The pension system is not funded properly. It is at risk. Just about everything we have is at risk. We have a government which spends so much in non-wealth creating activities and in social programs that it has to borrow to pay interest on the loans it borrowed last year. It is like a cancer which grows and grows and destroys the spirit of the nation.

As the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain said, Bill C-89 is a stopgap measure. It does not resolve existing housing problems in Canada. It does not get to the heart of the problem. Canada needs some 220,000 new housing units each year, and we are discussing a bill which will give $7,500, interest free, for 15,000 units across the country. This will not even resolve the existing housing shortage problem in the city of Vancouver from which I come. In 1980, only 159,000 units were built under the government's policies. In 1981, only 178,000 units were built. The latest Conference Board forecast of November 1981 predicted that only 180,000 units will be built in 1982, and now it looks as though that goal will not be attained. The shortage is 143,000 units over a three-year period, and we are discussing a bill which talks about $7,500, interest free, per unit for 15,000 units in a nation which, as the previous speaker to me said, has close to zero vacancy rate across the land. Vacancy rates in most markets will approach zero by 1983 under the government's policies. This can only lead to a black market and to human tragedy and suffering on a scale which I never thought I would live to see.

Turning to the area of mortgage rates, I can remember back in the Thirtieth Parliament when the borrower's and depositor's bill was brought in. At that time the government tried to move term lending into medium-term lending. I remember the bill was withdrawn because we warned the government at that time that it was not matching things, that things had to have a match and a balance to sustain the system. We have seen a situation develop where the entire Canadian housing industry, the whole right to private property, was predicated on 25-year term money. This is what built it and gave everyone the right and the ability to afford homes. In the last five years that has been absolutely destroyed by the policies the government has allowed to creep into the system. Now the situation is such that employees, young people and middle-aged people across the land find themselves with a need to renew their mortgages every five years. Many of them are on a one-year basis, and some are on a three-year basis. The tragedy, worry and concern out there indeed are serious. I have had people come to me in our family business who are facing mortgage renewals and something like an additional $280 to $440 per month requirement from their income. Indeed this is serious. It is something that not even the business which provides their basic income can cover and handle. Yet there are innovative ways in which this dilemma could be resolved for the benefit of Canadians.

I should like to make a few remarks on interest rates. We are trapped in an inflationary condition, much of which is our own doing. Much of it also comes from elements offshore or cost-pushed elements offshore from Canada, but no one can tell me that the monetarist policies of the United States, as struck by the U.S. Federal reserve, to handle the interest rate, monetary and demand call problems of the United States, are the policies which we should be following in Canada; no way. The United States, through the Marshall plan following World War II, made a tremendous investment in Eurodollars into the reconstruction of Europe and of Japan. That foresightedness, which was predicted by John Maynard Keynes after World War I and was adopted in the Marshall plan after World War II, probably prevented another world clash as a result of the lack of ability to distribute equitably among the nations the raw materials and resources of the world. The monetarist policies of the United States, with its high interest rates, were designed for a United States need, not a Canadian need, yet the Bank of Canada and the Liberal federal government parrot that need, not understanding what is our problem in Canada.

Mr. Benjamin: But Wilson agrees with it.

Mr. Huntington: I hear from another economist in the NDP ranks who has all the answers. Perhaps the hon. member would be good enough to allow me to follow through with my thoughts because we might be able to make a breakthrough some day and resolve our Canadian dilemma without having to get into a lot of cheap shots and politics. The issue should be beyond any political barrier, it is that serious.

In Canada we do not have the call of the Eurodollar on our treasury. What we do have is mobility of money through our foreign exchange reserve account. Canadian government policies have been aggravating that mobility, maybe knowingly or unknowingly. Canada has been going through an unbelievable concentration of ownership. Since February, 1980, we have been moving into a high degree of nationalization because of an insane desire to own everything in this country. This nationalization is being done at the expense of creating meaningful jobs within the Canadian system. That is the tragedy and the delivery which the government is giving the people of Canada. That is the tragedy which all young people coming into the work force are facing in this hour. Nowhere do we find the megaprojects started. Nowhere do we find the modernization of the transportation system being started. Nowhere do we find a "starting-to-move" with any degree of realism on that marvellous heritage that was ours by luck, by birth and by geography. Here we are, all snarled up by inflation and an interest rate that is just strangling the country. I am searching and trying to create some awareness of what our dilemma and problem is.

I personally believe that we can have low interest rates in Canada if we were to cool the call or liquidity on our foreign exchange reserves. We have high interest rates because we think we are competing with interest rates in the U.S. European markets. If that follows, why is it that interest rates in Switzerland are so much lower than in any other country in the world? The reason is Switzerland controls the movement of money in and out of its country.

Over the last year, the nationalization programs of Petro-Canada buying Petrofina for $1.2 billion, Canadian Pacific Investments buying International Paper for over $1 billion, and of buying this in Europe and buying Husky Oil in the United States, all of this corporate concentration and desire to have the ownership in the hands of the state has placed a demand of about $20 billion and a call on our foreign exchange reserves account.

In Canada today we could have interest rates at or below the inflation rate with no liquidity in international movement if we addressed the problem of our international reserves. It would take something like $60 billion to do so, but if we had $60 billion added to our foreign reserve account, we could control our own destiny in Canada. From where are we going to get $60 billion? I think hon. members across the way have a right to frown. But all we have to do is to is to take the heat and the liquidity off the day to day demand call on our international reserve account. As I pointed out, we have created a $20 billion charge and deficit in that account through the nationalization program and the degree of corporate concentration that has taken place in Canada. Perhaps we could do something new, for instance, such as adopting a Canadian-made policy. We could say, "Look, we will take the demand off that call on our international reserve account by returning to a tax deduction." In the last year, somehow or other we have got away from the 15 per cent holdback. Suppose we removed the demand call on our international reserve account by increasing the tax holdback to, say, 30 per cent on anything under a 60-month call. We would immediately have all that demand paper move to a 60-month call or term.

I hear people say I am dreaming, but the idea comes from debates and arguments with people in the banking industry who have had experience in international banking and know how the Swiss system works. I have also been made aware of what happened in the United States. In order to take the demand off the U.S. system by all the Eurodollars, which were placing a demand and call on the U.S. treasury, the Americans went to Europe with a Roosa bond. They converted the demand call on a good percentage of the Eurodollars. They converted enough into term and futures so that the reserve board was relieved of this day to day pressure.

I have listened to formal economists. I have read books until I am almost blind and need another pair of glasses. I have been privileged to have been in Oxford, England, attending a conference dealing with the implications of low growth for the western world. I have listened to the debates and I have read debates between formal economists. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, they do not have the answers. They are a debating society. They are trying to score points one against the other. We, the politicians, are relying on them to come up with something. We in the political process seem to be waiting for a 1980 or a 1990 John Maynard Keynes who is just not there. Therefore, we will have to open up our minds and take ourselves out of the doctrinaire debate in which the western world is engaging, and start to act on our own to control the Canadian destiny.

I would suggest to the government that it is time it started to look at cooling the immediacy of the call on our foreign exchange reserves. It is time those who borrow heavily abroad were told to convert their call on the Canadian people to 60-month term in order to give us a breathing spell so as to lower interest rates, make the housing in Canada affordable again to the majority of its people, and get our industry working. Coupled with that, it is absolutely essential that somehow or other the people of Canada put enough pressure on the Liberal government to move away from its desire and ability to deliver everything from insulation in your home, to $7,500 interest free on a rental housing unit, to a grant to industry, the corporate bums who feed from this public trough, from this structure, and have control over the lives of people in our society. Let them cease to suffocate the magic that innovates, creates and allows people to win occasionally with a risk, this risk that creates the jobs and wealth and the ability to compete with other nations.

Until the government moves back to a fiscal policy that delivers rewards and incentives, until it stops spending all its research and development dollars inhouse with universities and the National Research Council, and until the government starts to loosen up and deliver some of that money into the private sector with enough of a tax incentive on incremental increases in research spending, this country will slowly retire, just like the ocean going out at a very low tide. My goodness, the things we were blessed with as we came back from World War II and built this country, the right to a home, to rear and to educate a family, a job if you wanted to work. However, slowly but surely self-reliance was removed from the individual, and government became more and more important in the minds of people who were no longer prepared to work that extra hour, walk that extra mile in order to acquire and protect their right to property. What a tragedy, Mr. Speaker. That is the heart of the housing dilemma in Canada today. The self-reliance of the Canadian people has been taken away by more and more cradle-to-grave care, and people do not discipline themselves to deliver that extra hour or shift of work in order to acquire things.

Another thing which has happened to Canada in this last decade and a half of Liberal rule is that it has lost its desire for excellence. At one time we had a high standard; our engineering was the best in the world. It might still be today. However, we could start from scratch and build ships, build an army and a navy. We could play our part in the world with our heads high and be proud of Canada. The feeling in our hearts, our minds, our spirit and our outlook was just go, go. Canada, over the last 12 years, has slowly but surely and methodically lost its standard of and desire for excellence. We have moved from a standard of living which was the envy of the world, Mr. Speaker. We used to be number three; we are now 13 and sliding fast. You can feel it every day. We changed a simple and basic taxation system, Mr. Speaker, into a complicated monster which threatens us with arbitrary interference in our lives by civil servants and bureaucrats. We have government interference, we have confusion. We have had the decision-making base removed from us in a budget, which was an absolute disaster for the country and the creative elements within it. It has all but removed any chance we had of swinging back and creating jobs. That was it; November 12 did it.

I guess the biggest mistake was when we let them start talking about tax points as being in the possession of the bureaucrat, Mr. Speaker, because now those tax points are theirs. They do not think they should be delivered out so that you and I and others working in widely diverse activities under the rule of law should have the right to take a chance and use that tax point to build wealth, create jobs and do something useful. They think that they, with their desks and their books, have a more divine right to that than I have, and as long as that attitude prevails, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this country is at risk because it will deliver us into social unrest.

Along with the regional tensions they have allowed to develop over the last decade and a half, the country is increasingly at risk because of our inability to manage one of the most blessed nations and peoples God ever gave this earth. We have thrown away one magnificient opportunity after another to become energy self-sufficient by 1990. All of this, Mr. Speaker, relates to the attitude and type of legislation we are debating in Bill C-89, which again gives more and more power to some faceless bureaucrat to say, "Yes, you may have $7,500 to build a rental unit here". Let them build one there, instead of just putting out something in law and policy which says to the entrepreneurs and the business sector of the country: "Go, make a buck". Let them provide housing for people within their means.

One day it is MURBs, and in the next budget, no MURBs. We have removed all the elements of fiscal policy which at one time encouraged a wide decision-making base in Canada, and now this November 12 budget attacks property and privacy. Was it any accident, Mr. Speaker, that the constitutional debate saw the right to property removed from the new Constitution we are about to receive. Why? Just look at what has happened since February, 1980. The National Energy Program has backed in with confiscation of rights and property. Not only that, we had the constitutional package, and now we have the November 12 budget along with the legislation in Bill C-89. All of this shows a pattern of interference with and suffocation of a free marketplace. When people lose that freedom of the marketplace, Mr. Speaker, freedom itself is at risk.

As I come to the end of my time, Mr. Speaker, let me return to this statement, "The private sector can be defined as the part of the economy that the government controls: the public sector is the part that nobody controls." At one time some years ago when CMHC was a corporation of which we were all proud and which was providing a wonderful mortgage service in the marketplace in a highly professional and skilled manner, it also went into the business of insuring mortgage risks. Over the years, Mr. Speaker, I think that program built up something like a $600 million reserve fund. Then along came this Liberal government with the AHOP program which, we all remember, was just a total disaster. It was the bureaucrat at his worst. That program, along with others, just totally wiped out the insurance fund which CMHC had built up over many years. At a recent committee meeting on May 19, 1981, I asked the deputy minister responsible for CMHC about the condition of that fund. He reported that it had projected future losses of $400 million due to the AHOP program. Well, in addition to wiping out that fund, CMHC had to go to the government to borrow another $231 million to cover their cash obligations under that insurance fund. That is the kind of thing which is happening to all of the assets under the control of our Crown corporations and this Liberal government. To me that is inexcusable and a scandal of some magnitude.

Let us look, Mr. Speaker, at one other recent program which this department is responsible for, the UFFI program. It is utterly amazing how that came about because scientists in the employ of this government at the NRC warned against the use of urea formaldehyde foam insulation. Here is what happens as a result of this incestuous ability to lobby the policy-making centres through our Crown corporations. I repeat: Incestuous, disgustingly incestuous. A company called Rapco Foam Incorporated was purchased. It was not successful at the urethane formaldehyde foam business. Therefore, it was purchased in 1976 by Innocan Investments, which was 37 per cent owned by Canada Development Corporation. As soon as it had control over this foam process, it claimed that the shrinkage problem had been solved and that the problem was over. In September of 1977, UFFI was approved by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation for use in its CHIP program. This was over the objections of the National Research Council, and of Dr. Richard Viau, acting head of the chemical and fire safety program of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who, in an interview, warned:

> People should think quite carefully before installing this product in their homes . . . Formaldehyde is a very irritating chemical and exposure can lead to headaches, allergies and a whole gamut of other problems.

Canada Mortgage and Housing, before it launched its CHIP program, was fully aware of the objections of the scientific community, inhouse, in government, and were fully aware of the recommendations of Dr. Viau in Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Yet the power of lobby through Crown corporations to the policy sector of CMHC overruled any common sense, and away went urea formaldehyde foam insulation to the benefit of Innocan and its shareholders, because its sales went up about 12 times a month.

That is the type of thing that is going on, and that is the type of thing that is in this warning. No one controls the public sector and, in Canada, it is totally out of control. That is why I stand here tonight with a rather poorly prepared presentation which, nevertheless, contains some original thought—

An hon. Member: Occasionally.

Mr. Huntington: —and put up with some smart remarks from a minister who obviously does not know what he is doing.

Mr. Cosgrove: What did you do with UFFI when you were in government?

Mr. Huntington: I have no apologies to make, Mr. Minister, for what I did in the short period I was in government, because I served the constituency I was appointed to serve very well. I have no apologies for what I did. Had some of the programs and plans which were in place been given just a chance to live, you guys would be over here for the next 30 years.

We are dealing with the heart of the young people and the emerging family units in Canada when we deal with legislation like this. They do not have a chance. This kind of legislation, with the policies that we have had for the last two years of this government, will deliver us into an egalitarian state, and will remove the most precious commodity we inherited, that is our freedom, as it removes freedom from the marketplace and delivers more and more control and arbitrary decisions to friendly people of the Liberal government and bureaucrats who interfere with our lives.

I would urge the government to pay attention to some of the suggestions that I have made tonight concerning interest rates, for somewhere there must be a solution crossing political boundaries that will deliver this country out of the nightmare it is facing. Productivity will resolve inflation, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has told us so many times. However, there has been no legislation in the last two budgets of this government which would give us the magic factor of creating the wealth and turning loose the energy which is lying dormant out there in Canada.

I say to hon. members opposite: Please, for goodness sake, back off from the approach you are taking before you remove completely any chance for this country to regain pride in itself, and give people the right to own their own homes and to rear their families there. Maybe that is at the heart of this kind of legislation. Maybe the government just does not want families to have roots.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is rare, indeed, that the House of Commons has the privilege of hearing two speeches, the likes of which we have just heard, one from the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) and the other from the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). These men were putting forward, in different ways, a common denominator that is true, I hope, for much of the world. I will be coming back to that common denominator almost immediately, but first I wanted to make a comment concerning this bill which would amend a long-standing piece of legislation, namely, the National Housing Act. I think it is the judgment of the House on all sides that this bill is inadequate to meet the needs to which we are all referring.

Mr. Cosgrove: Not on this side!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I deplore the interjection of the minister, because I was hoping he would accept the remarks I will make from an all-party, all-Canadian point of view. We have heard the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain speaking from a humanitarian point of view. He stated the case of almost 100 per cent of the Canadian people who instinctively, as well as from reason and logic, want to own their own homes. Then we heard the remarks of the hon. member for Capilano. Until the last few sentences, he was searching through all the cloud of doubt we have had in this country over the last ten or 15 years as to why we were going the way we were, and he was trying to come up with a carefully thought out type of direction. I will try to keep my remarks in the same mood.

It is my honest conviction that all parties in the House, regardless of any partisanship that may exist, accepted long ago that the right to own a home and raise a family in that home, along with all of the rights of that family, is now a mandatory right. I do not think there is a Liberal in this country who does not agree with that statement. I am sure that every Canadian agrees. If we can work from that premise, I would think that we should carefully consider the two speeches delivered tonight, and even my remarks, because this right to own property, to own one's own home, is a right which has been slowly accepted in the western world, a right which I am sure has been accepted in Canada and all of northern America for many years.

What we should be doing with this National Housing Act, is perfecting that right and making it work. We may quarrel over the way we approach it, but we should not quarrel on the fundamental purpose. At this stage of our development in the world, not only should a human being have the right to have food, but he should also have the right to have shelter of some reasonable variety, as the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain stated. If we can accept that principle, I think that the slightly partisan remarks which I will make can be taken in reasonably good grace.

It is my judgment, even though the minister has refused my judgment, that this minister really came into the House with a desire to help concerning the housing field. I have said this in the House before. However, when that terrible budget of November 12 came in, to use an expression which is now popular on national TV, at least in the United States, the minister was "hosed". There are other words I could use to describe what happened. The hon. member for Capilano stated it very clearly. A few people are going to get a little relief of a temporary nature from this bill. That relief takes the form of extending the period of their debt. Instead of being in debt for 20 years, they are now going to be in debt indefinitely. That is all it is. Without going into the details, that can be accepted.

The minister told us before the budget came out, "Just wait for the budget". The minister took some pains to see that the news about the housing policy in the budget was in the hands of the people the next day after the budgt was announced. He got into serious trouble with the customs of the House when his staff finally confessed to him they had done something that really was a little irregular.

Basically, this bill is inadequate in meeting this problem of providing shelter as a right. The fact is, and everyone admits it, that the government just does not have the money to provide all the things the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and the hon. member for Capilano suggest we should do. This bill is based on the precedent that much of the starting place of backing up these loans, which is the insurance principle, and even direct loans, is that the government is the source of the revenue to get these programs started.

I simply say that with the government, having gone out last fall and borrowed nearly $13 billion at 19½ per cent, cannot be blamed for not wanting to turn billions of that over to the housing industry, a billion to the farm industry, a bunch more to export industries and another couple of billion to the small businessmen of this country to go out and produce the wealth the hon. member for Capilano talked about. With the philosophy of this bill, the government cannot provide the money which starts the machine going.

Just to make certain that everyone in the country understands what I mean when I say that the minister got hosed, I am going to read to him, not from the bill before the House, Bill C-89, the National Housing Act, but rather I will read two sections in the previous bill, Bill C-88. I am going to read the first section rapidly because it is pretty well known and not relevant to the point I am making. Under Amendment 12 at page four of the bill, the Farm Credit Act, it reads:

At the request of the corporation the Minister of Finance may, with the approval of the governor in council, pay to the corporation, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, amounts not exceeding in the aggregate two hundred and twenty-five million dollars—

I will stop there. That is the capital structure of the Farm Credit Corporation. What is not mentioned is that once you give the extra $75 million, from $150 million up to $225 million, as capital into the Farm Credit Corporation, that corporation can turn around and lend to farmers 25 times the amount of capital it has. Therefore, the extra $75 million that is allowed under Bill C-88 in theory allows the Farm Credit Corporation to lend about $3.5 billion more to agriculture.

As I say, that is in theory. The fact is that the Farm Credit Corporation under the old terms of the act would have to get the money from the government. Since the government does not have it or cannot afford too much of that 19½ per cent money it borrowed, not much is going to go to the Farm Credit Corporation and, therefore, not very much to the farmers. That is the bad news.

I want the minister to listen to the next clause. It is almost revolutionary in Parliament. I quote Clause 13(1):

The corporation may, with the approval of the Minister of Finance, borrow money by any means, including issuing and selling bonds, debentures, notes and other evidences of indebtedness of the corporation.

Imagine the minister bringing into the House, not just the old bill which goes back to 1958, but bringing amendments that take him out of the dependence of government money or getting money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Parliament passed second reading of that bill and it is now before a committee. This minister can go out and, if the government cannot or will not give him money, he can raise unlimited amounts by any means.

I am suggesting that something we should do when the House goes into committee on this bill is to insist that the minister, if he is defending the housing industry, the people who want houses, homes and shelter, either ownership or rental, should ask for equal treatment from Parliament and give to the millions of people who live in the villages, towns and cities in every part of Canada equal rights to the farmer in getting access to all this money that is available in Canada.

When a clause reads "by any means" you can become almost independent from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. True, you have to get the consent of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), but no minister of finance, even one from Cape Breton, would turn down a minister who could get $100 million from sources other than the Consolidated Revenue Fund at no cost to the treasury. He could not get that type of stand accepted by any normal cabinet. You need to have a monster policing the cabinet to discriminate between one section of Canadians and another.

Since the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has this, with the support of every member on both sides of the House, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) owes it to himself, his party, and the people of Canada to get an equal right in this legislation. It will not work as simply under the National Housing Act because it does not have, as far as I know, a clause that allows it to lend more than it has.

Let me follow this up. Suppose the minister got into the housing bill, Bill C-89, in the committee reading stage, the same clause as exists in Bill C-88, and suppose he or the corporation could use the principle of the small business development bond. It was introduced originally in the Crosbie budget and has been restored year by year under the present Minister of Finance. There are many precedents for it, but if this principle was used, people who have money to invest could be encouraged perhaps to lend money to this corporation at 8 per cent. They could turn around and lend it at 9 per cent, which would give them 1 per cent to pay their costs.

I doubt if there is a member on the government side who does not support this amendment which we put through for farmers. Why should this same justice and equity not be given to people who should not only have the right to own their farm but to own or rent their own home? It is my suggestion that the minister, by simply amending each of those sections so people can get their money, could get out of the great dilemma, which the Minister of Finance is in, of only having money that he borrowed at 19½ per cent to spread out. He cannot distribute too much because he does not have it.

The minister can get him off the hook by telling people that if they lend money at 8 per cent to one of these agencies listed in the bill or the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation itself, he is prepared to put that money out at 9 per cent.

The gimmick of the small business development bond dates back to the First World War. Its principle was that when you do something for your country and your fellow citizens, the government occasionally gives you the incentive of not having to pay tax, just as in 1917 when people lent money to the Canadian government to fight the war. They did not have to pay income tax on these bonds.

Similarly, as it is applied to small business and farmers under the Small Business Development Bond, institutions which lend money under the Small Business Development Bond, that is mostly banks, credit unions and trust companies, do not have to pay tax on the amount of money they receive, that 8 per cent from the Farm Credit Corporation or the small business which borrows this money. To balance the scale, the man who borrows money at 8 per cent or 9 per cent loses the right to claim that interest as a deduction. What the government will lose on one hand, it will get back on the other. The government cannot claim that there is any change in the balance of ways and means.

This would make it reasonably and humanely possible for thousands of people to expand their farm and small business operations and, hopefully, through this bill, the right to own a home and purchase it at a reasonable rate of interest. This would dispel the allegation made again and again in the House that $45,000 a year is needed to be able to buy an average home. I believe that this proposal, with the precedent which has been set by the Minister of Agriculture when both opposition parties made a proposal almost a year ago, which the minister finally got in the bill, should be accepted by the minister of housing.

We offered the same proposal that we made to the minister of housing and to the export agency, to farmers. We see that the Minister of Agriculture introduced it, had it passed through cabinet and the House in second reading and, hopefully, it will survive the committee stage and, finally, third reading.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I have made a reasonable, objective and fair case for equity for people who live in homes to be treated as are those who have access to the Small Business Development Bond.

I know that the banks and credit unions are somewhat disturbed about the instability of this government and welsh on their responsibility under the Small Business Development Bond. However, they will certainly move into high speed action and real competition when the housing people lend money at 8 and 9 per cent, the Farm Credit Corporation lends money at 8 or 9 per cent and the export companies which lend at 8 or 9 per cent and are doing it for less in some cases, as we know.

The small businessman, exporter, farmer and those who want to live in their own homes, when given this incentive, will pay for their homes and put people to work. Taxes will be collected on it and the government will be better off. It will be able to achieve the objective of the Minister of Finance, not by reducing incentives or following an antique mythology such as the tax expenditure theory where a percentage of nothing is still nothing, but by an old-fashioned, simple way that achieves all our objectives.

I should also add that some of my colleagues hope to add amendments to the bill on the Farm Credit Corporation, not only using the principle of the Small Business Development Bond, but also to work out a plan under this "any means" wording to let people use capital gains for some relief as they used to have by putting it to worth-while social purposes. This relieves them of being taxed all in one year.

Those who want to retire and give a reasonable price to their sons to buy their businesses or farms can use this principle by putting their money into a useful social purpose and accepting half the interest rate because they will also be able to avoid the tremendous smashing which they were given by the November 12 budget when it took away the income averaging annuity, and so on.

In the time I have remaining I would like to try in a small way to match what the member for Capilano has been doing by discussing principles and philosophies. This bill, that is the national housing statute, has been in existence for approximately 50 years. Tremendously good work has been done with it but there have also been great mistakes. Not utilizing the land bank idea 50 years ago is one example. Other mistakes have been made, but it has been mostly a question of reorganization in such a complex way that nothing is accomplished. That has been the basic difficulty, as I see it.

The last speaker was much more brutal in his remarks. He put his finger directly on the difficulty of there being no clear line of responsibility. He called it the dictatorship of a few bureaucrats who have so often been organized and reorganized that there is no way an idea can evolve quickly. They have to spend 95 per cent of their time fighting for their territory within this complex organization. I will not give a political science talk. I am simply saying that I agree with the hon. member for Capilano. However, I believe we should go one step further, as he did, and that is to see what is happening behind the scenes. For the last 30 years it has become clear to those of us who had responsibility in government, as well as to people outside government, that something is dreadfully wrong in all our western governments.

I have said this before and I repeat it again, we have not had in Canada the opportunity to debate in the press, radio, television or in debates in the House, in any kind of forum, two fundamental subjects. One is the international monetary policy. We have shied away from that in the 30 years I have been aware of what happens here. We have very few debates on domestic monetary policy. We tried hard two years ago in the period of the Clark government when the rank and file of the party simply insisted that we accept the idea—which came from the Liberal side of the House, actually—for this matter to be put before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. All we asked of the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the then minister of finance was that they listen to us as laymen. We wanted to put forward questions to get at the facts. Second, as laymen we wanted the right to put forward practical and common sense ideas about how they could get around the difficulties facing them. Both those gentlemen, the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the then minister of finance, agreed to do that.

Our questions as laymen Members of Parliament brought from the Governor of the Bank of Canada the admission that the three reasons he had for a high interest rate policy were not achieving the results he had hoped for. He advanced three reasons, and I questioned him about them. I asked what evidence he had that his policies, which had been in effect since 1975, were working. In every case he said he did not have evidence that they were working. I think he knew I was sitting there with charts on my desk which showed they were not, but he said he could hope, and he prayed, his policies would be right.

That policy was the last gasp of the Keynesian consensus. We were asking questions and putting forward ideas, the like of which we have heard tonight from the hon. member for Capilano and me. We talked frankly about how we could get around the danger of the tremendous amount of floating money available in the world. It used to be $300 billion or $400 billion in Eurodollars; now it is $600 billion or $900 billion. We do not know how many Eurodollars and petrodollars. This money was described in the committee as the biggest crap game in the world, and little Canada, with a few billion dollars in the reserve account, just cannot cope with that type of crap game. These people are constantly searching to make a quick buck, and they hope to find some country out of line with the realities of its country's economics.

The floating dollar we fought so hard to get in 1960—we finally got it in 1961—was being endangered because the bank was coming in and playing with borrowed money to try to hold its account. There is no way enough money can be borrowed by one country to hold that amount of money in check. The hon. member for Capilano mentioned that we would have to have $60 billion to free us from this type of attack. I will not quarrel with that. I do not know how much we would need, but if we go back to that committee we would find that one of the suggestions was that we should make an alliance with all the countries in our commercial area of operation with which we share a certain amount of trust, such as Japan, the United States and Europe, and build up a big fund of $60 billion or $100 billion; we would all move to aid any country under attack by gambling and speculating groups, and then would be very reluctant to take on a $60 billion or $100 billion reserve which would move under one control.

Other ideas were put forward too. I think it would be a waste of time to repeat all those ideas which came out of that committee. I will just leave it this way: when that committee was in session for four months, interest rates did not move one iota. Terror must have existed among those people who dealt in financial theories going back 50 years to Keynes as they realized that there was an awakening and an intelligent type of criticism coming from common sense laymen—and that is how we can describe ourselves in the House. They did not want to face up to the public opinion we could command. We had the support of a man from Windsor who is now a minister in the government. We had the support of the New Democratic Party. One of our colleagues in the New Democratic Party has now gone on to higher things, to Ontario politics. And we certainly had the support of the Conservatives. Here was an all-party group freeing itself from partisanship and trying to get at the difficult question of domestic monetary policy.

I will not say anything more about that at this stage except to mention that when the government changed in 1980, we were refused the right in Parliament to carry out the idea—which had originally been proposed by a Liberal—that we have this committee offer its common sense to the Minister of Finance and to the Governor of the Bank of Canada. We Canadians have paid an awful price for not having that group of people asking simple and common sense questions, because interest rates have gone crazy this last year, and there has been tremendous suffering among every class of people.

My final point is that there has been a debate on international monetary matters in the world, and there has been a debate on domestic monetary and fiscal matters, but not in Canada. The place that is closest is the United States, and they now call this type of economics Reaganomics. It is not Reaganomics. The economics of that really belongs to a Canadian by the name of Robert Mundell, who tried for years to apply the common sense test of quantitative analysis to all the great truths Keynes put forward. Mundell was joined by a mathematician by the name of Arthur Laffer, and later on one of the editors of the Wall Street Journal, Jude Wanniski, picked it up and put it into language we could understand. More recently a man named Harold Gilder attempted it, and others have been trying. Why is there not this debate in Canada? Is it because the newspaper editors are frightened to touch something about which they know nothing? I do not know. They certainly touch upon many subjects about which they know nothing. Is it because the politicians are frightened to discuss it because it would show their ignorance? Once again I do not know, because there was quite a number of politicians in that committee putting forward ideas, and they did not seem to be too terrified.

Let us look at the act we are now amending as an opportunity to apply the common sense I talk about based upon some understanding, small though it may be, of the quantitative analysis of our international monetary situation and our domestic situation and see if we cannot, in isolated segments of the economy—farmers, home owners, small businessmen and the man who is trying to export—bring interest rates down to a more humane level without any cost to the government. If we did that, the situation would not be perfect, but at least it would show the people of Canada that there are some of us here—I hope all of us—who are a little tired of the low opinion people have of us. The people's opinion of the press, radio, television and politicians is just thumbs down, and the result is that we just turn ourselves over to demagogues who have nothing but destruction in their minds.

I hope the minister will take seriously the proposals I have made here tonight and amend this bill. I hope he will be equal to the Minister of Agriculture in cabinet. If he has any trouble, he can bring this matter back to the House, and we will certainly straighten it out for him. Every member of the Liberal party will back him. Every member on this side of the House will back him because it is not right that people should have to endure what they have to endure to get homes today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—(A) CONDITION OF ATLANTIC FISHING INDUSTRY (B) REPORTED PROPOSAL TO REDUCE NUMBER OF EXPORTERS (C) PRE-BUDGET DISCUSSIONS

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleagues will remember, on January 26, as reported at page 14319 of Hansard, I asked questions, first of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) and then of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) with respect to what was going to happen in the town of St. Anthony in Newfoundland in view of the closing of the plant which Fishery Products Limited said was unavoidable. It is common knowledge, Mr. Speaker, especially to members on the other side of the House from Newfoundland and Labrador, that the fishery industry is in very great difficulty, not just in Newfoundland but on the whole Atlantic coast.

When the news came that Fishery Products Limited would have to close the plant at St. Anthony, it was very bad news, indeed; not just to members of this House and people concerned about the situation in the Atlantic fishery, but, of course, to the people in St. Anthony.

In that small town the company employs 950 people at peak season and over the season buys from approximately 3,000 fishermen. The 950 people employed in the plant at peak season represent about one fifth of the population of the town. It goes without saying that all members of the House are and must be concerned about the situation.

When I put these questions in the House, first of all to the Minister of National Revenue in whose riding St. Anthony lies, he demurred that it was not a proper question to put to him. When I asked what he was going to do about it he said, and I quote:

> Madam Speaker, if you intend to allow that question I will simply say that I have represented St. Anthony for ten years and I do not intend to stand by and see the people of St. Anthony suffer in any way.

That is the retort of the minister to my question on January 26, 1982, about the future of the people of St. Anthony.

When I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans if he was going to solve the problem with money and, if so, how much he was going to spend and what his plans were, he said:

> Madam Speaker, the hon. member's rhetoric should remind the House that he has discovered Newfoundland in the last month.

That is a comment that the hon. minister could only make once; it would not be accepted twice. I have to ask if the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has discovered St. Anthony.

We are faced with a very serious situation. On January 30 the minister of fisheries for Newfoundland and Labrador was reported in the press as saying that the matter would be referred to Mr. Michael Kirby who is heading a task force to inquire into the difficulties on the Atlantic coast. Before that the Minister of National Revenue had said that some high level meetings would have to be held to see what could be done. How long can the people in St. Anthony—or any other place—wait for the government, which knew full well that the problems which now face the Atlantic fishery were on their way, to take action. As others have asked, well-intentioned though the terms of reference of Mr. Kirby's task force are, can he act in time?

Statements have been issued by officials of Fishery Products Limited to the effect that not only can the plant not continue for the winter months but it may not be able to open for the summer fishery. When I asked the question on January 26, I was not just indulging in political rhetoric, as the two ministers apparently believed. I asked a serious question; what will be done? I remind the House that the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans went on to say, after he had gone through the motions of rebuking me for having the nerve to ask what would happen to the people of St. Anthony, and after he spelled out a few things which had been done by way of vague promises with respect to other problems in Newfoundland:

> The matter of St. Anthony is more recent. We are looking at this subject, and I might tell the hon. member that he really should go to Newfoundland again. He might learn something else.

I see a distinguished member of the House from the province of Newfoundland here tonight. I want to say that I am still asking my question, and that I would like someone on the government side to tell us just exactly what is going on. Does the Kirby task force have this problem? Is it seized with the obligation to bring about an answer? Has the hon. Minister of National Revenue come up with an answer? Has the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans come up with an answer? If hon. members opposite tell us tonight that they have an answer, that these people will not be unemployed and that these fishermen will have a place to sell their fish, I will be the first to commend them. I think we are entitled to an answer, and we are entitled to an answer tonight.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, at the outset, and in reply to the questions of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), it is important that it be noted that the problems of St. Anthony did not evolve or develop in the last few months. I had an opportunity to speak to the president of the company. He informed me that we should take into account the cost of capital expenditure, which is the cost of improving or moving new technology into the plant over the past four or five years and add to it the net loss since 1977, giving us a total loss of nearly $10 million. This problem has not dropped out of nowhere, at the last second, as a result of any changes or lack of administration in the last few months, on the part of the Department of Fisheries. It involves a very fundamental investment decision and marketing approach by a company and the subsequent results. I say on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) and on behalf of a local member, Mr. Roberts, that these two gentlemen have been in consultation with the company, the union, the provincial government and the Department of Fisheries.

The hon. member opposite would no doubt agree, and I say this sincerely, that when a very large company with that kind of investment, with a web and network of processing plants around Newfoundland, announces out of the blue, without prior consultation with governments, or with anyone else, for that matter, that it plans to close down a fish plant, certainly we cannot be blamed. On the other hand, given the free enterprise system within which we live, the one that this party supports, we cannot expect, without consulting with all involved parties, to simply dictate a solution to the kind of drastic measure which was announced. All parties are very much involve in the process of consultation, with a view to doing everything possible, within reason. The key words are "responsibility" and "accountability" for taxpayers' dollars. We will ensure, within reason, that this plant and others in Newfoundland and elsewhere in Atlantic Canada are able to operate to full capacity in the year ahead.

Dr. Michael Kirby has been appointed to undertake a full review of the measures critical to ensuring the long-term viability of the fisheries. To this end he is consulting with all sectors of the industry; with the company, the union, fishermen, processors, traders and provincial governments. He will be presenting his recommendations some time in the early summer.

The hon. member across the way noted that the minister of fisheries for the province of Newfoundland asked that the question of St. Anthony be referred to the agenda of the task force. Notwithstanding the work of the task force, I assure the hon. member that the Government of Canada, through its Department of Fisheries and its minister, continues to be actively and intensively involved in the problems of the Atlantic fishery and that we seek solutions. We do not pretend for a second that these problems have not resulted in a poor market approach, or poor marketing generally. We have not been competitive. We have seen the example of companies undercutting each other in the market. The kinds of problems that have evolved from that kind of situation and others cannot be solved overnight. We recognize that this is very serious and we have a sober responsibility toward it. We intend to approach it from that point of view. We appreciate whatever advice and recommendations that come from members opposite. We only ask that the advice be given in good faith. If it is given in that way, I can assure the hon. member it will be received and considered in good faith.

AGRICULTURE—COST OF FUEL USED IN PRODUCTION OF FOOD

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, why is the fedreal Liberal government considered anti-farmer and anti-agriculture? The glib answer of the minister the other day illustrates some of the reasons why this is so. Interest costs to farmers since 1956 have increased about fivefold, but farmers' income have increased by only 10 per cent. High interest rates, the cost of machinery, the cost of help, increased costs of transportation and the cost of fuel are among the factors that worry farmers.

The federal government must certainly take the responsibility for high interest rates. The interest rate for Farm Credit Corporation loans was raised to 16.75 per cent by the federal government—these are loans, not grants. The Alberta government has been much more agricultural-minded. The agriculture development corporation of Alberta lends money at 12 per cent to farmers, 15 per cent to agricultural processors and I believe 6 per cent to young beginning farmers.

Machinery costs are another factor. These machinery costs were partially offset by the capital cost allowance, but the recent budget of November 12 even sliced this to one half for the year of purchase. A combine is used in the fall of the year and cutting the capital cost allowance is simply putting another financial burden, another unexpected expense on farmers. It is not reasonable or sensible to cut the allowance by one half or only for the three or four months during harvest. This is another increased cost on the production of food which farmers will have to pay. Farmers cannot pass this on, they have to absorb it.

Farm help is almost impossible to get. The employment branch of the federal government insists that there is help available among Canada's unemployed, but try to find it. Some applicants last one day, some a week. Many do not know a combine from a binder, let alone know how to drive either one. Some people want to be paid to do one thing all day and quit when they are required to do the multiple chores that have to be done. But will the government let farmers bring young farmers from Denmark, Norway, Sweden or Germany, those men and women who proved their worth through the international exchange program? No, it will not. The employment branch people say there are Canadians who can do the job. But when you ask people at the employment branch where these people are, they shrug their shoulders. This is the situation in spite of the fact that labour costs on farms have increased by probably 100 per cent during the last five years.

What about the federal government's claim that it is improving transportation for the farmers? There are boxcars lined up at the coast waiting to be unloaded and there are no boats available. The barley producers are unable to get producer cars on the prairies. The prairie farmers are paying demurrage because ships are waiting in lineups. I believe some $18 million last year was taken out of the pockets of the prairie producers via demurrage charges.

What about the abandonment program of the Department of Transport? On the average there are rail lines being abandoned which carry a half a million bushels of grain a year. The CPR, with concurrence from the Canadian Transport Commission, is refusing to give enough time to properly clean out the elevators. Every line abandoned means increased costs of hauling grain by truck to elevators farther away. But the Government of Canada and the CTC pay no attention to the increased costs to the farmers. However, both are very concerned about railway expenses and let the CPR off the hook with regard to gifts of land and resources given it when original contracts and agreements were made. The farmer pays.

The time allotted permits me to mention only one other area where the farmer, the producer of our food, gets the dirty end of the stick from this government. During the last federal election the Liberal Party promised farmers low prices for fuel used to produce food. During its two years in office, since the 1980 election, fuel prices have increased at least 67 per cent.

The Clark budget in 1979 provided a tax shelter in the form of a rebate to farmers on at least a portion of the gasoline taxes. The MacEachen budget makes no such provision and all the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) can say is, "Canadians farmers do not pay as much for their fuel as do United States farmers". With this general statement he sweeps the matter under the rug and makes no mention of other factors that U.S. farmers are not subjected to, such as imposed metric, demurrage charges, lack of boxcars, capital gains taxes, cancellation of IAACs, and the increased cost of machinery. This government would not even give consideration to helping the rural gas co-ops of Alberta to keep their administrative overhead down by increasing the number of days. Nor would it consider withholding or reducing taxes on natural gas used in the production of food.

The Progressive Conservative Party has urged that capital gains taxes be eliminated on land producing food; the Liberal government said no. The Progressive Conservative Party has urged that the capital cost allowance and income averaging annuity contracts be left as they were before November 12; so far the Liberals say no. This party asks for a rebate to food producers for high fuel costs and the Liberal minister's answer is something about being at the wrong end of a bull.

The farmers of Canada are becoming increasingly angry. They ask only for fair prices and fair treatment, and they are getting neither from this federal government.

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) I should like to point out that the massive program of upgrading the railway system in Canada is well known to most Canadians, and consequently we are looking forward to the best possible utilization of hopper cars and rail lines. However, I also want to point out that we have an excellent network of highways and roads across this country which can be used all year round by trucks and other vehicles in a better way than we can use some of our rail lines. In other words, the highways can be utilized in a much more diversified way.

The hon. member mentions the metric system. I suppose we should remind him that metric legislation was originally brought in back in 1871 by, I think, Sir John A. Macdonald. Now we have a Conservative complaining about it.

Mr. Taylor: It was voluntary then, not imposed.

Mr. Ferguson: I would also like to point out that in the 1980 campaign we said we would set a made-in-Canada energy pricing policy to secure adequate supplies at reasonable prices. We achieved this last September.

Mr. Taylor: And it went up 67 per cent.

Mr. Ferguson: The hon. member went on to point out that natural gas prices constitute a big component of the cost of producing food. I would like to point out to him that, under their budget, natural gas in 1984 would be $11 per thousand cubic feet. Under our agreement it will be $7.90, a saving to the farmer of $3.10.

Mr. Taylor: Nonsense.

Mr. Ferguson: Certainly that is substantial evidence of itself, when you consider that natural gas is a big component of nitrogen-based fertilizer. I think the Liberal government and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) have done extremely well in fulfilling the commitments made during those exciting days two years ago, and it was of extreme interest to me when my opponent in that election divorced himself from the budget put forward by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). He realized what it would have done to us. We had to set about to correct the situation, and I want to commend our government for doing so. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION—RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING SEXUAL HARASSMENT OF WOMEN

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to take a few moments to bring before all hon. members of this House a matter of very great concern to all Canadians, and particularly to millions of Canadian women. Recent studies have shown that, depending upon the job sector and the age grouping, some 70 per cent to 90 per cent of working women experience some form of sexual harassment on the job.

What is sexual harassment? It is difficult to define. It can range from sexual innuendo, perhaps in the guise of humour, to coerced sexual relations. It can include a variety of behaviour, such as verbal harassment or abuse, sexist jokes, subtle pressure for sexual activity, sexist remarks about a woman's clothing, body or sexual activities, unnecessary touching, patting or pinching, such as a casual pat on the backside, leering at a woman's body, constant brushing against a woman's body, demanding sexual favours accompanied by implied or overt threats concerning one's job, or physical assault. Ultimately, although it is very difficult to define, sexual harassment is a coercive relationship.

On April 8, last, I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) what action the Liberal government was prepared to take on the recommendations of the Canadian Human Rights Commission in its 1980 annual report, which stated:

—it has now become urgent for Parliament to make it clear that sexual harassment constitutes discrimination on the grounds of sex and will not be tolerated.—

The commission pointed out that public perception of sexual harassment, as a major barrier to equality of employment for women, has greatly increased. That was the second year in a row the Canadian Human Rights Commission made that important recommendation; but, to this date, the Liberal government has ignored any suggestions for change in this area.

The commission specifically recommended that a definition of sexual harassment be added to Section 20 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, specifying that the problem of sexual harassment and discrimination because of pregnancy should be included in the prohibition of discrimination based on sex. Since that recommendation there have been a number of developments outside the realm of the federal government which demonstrate the truth of this statement. I will give a few examples.

Last fall, the Ontario human rights code was passed with a variety of amendments, including provisions to protect students from advances by their professors, just as female workers are protected under the legislation from advances by their employers. Last summer, York University established a grievance procedure to handle student complaints of sexual harassment. In March, 1981, the Alberta human rights commission adopted new guidelines, including a definition of sexual harassment as unwanted sexual solicitation by an employer, landlord, a person in a position of authority, a co-worker or someone providing a service. If a complaint is confirmed, this commission has the power to order compensation for insult, pain and suffering, in addition to lost wages. In May of 1981, the Canadian Association of University Teachers agreed upon guidelines to deal with student charges of sexual harassment. The association defined sexual harassment as an incident when "conduct is made explicitly or implicitly a term or condition of an individual's employment, academic status or academic accreditation". The guidelines include a variety of behaviour by professors toward their students.

What has the federal government done? Last spring, the government stated it was considering new labour laws which would bar sexual harassment in the work place. The Women's Bureau of Labour of Canada produced some specific amendments which were approved by the federal Department of Labour as long ago as last April—almost a year. The bureau proposed a definition of sexual harassment which was very sweeping: "Any persistent conduct, comment, gesture or contact of a sexual nature which might reasonably be perceived by the employee as being a condition of a sexual nature on employment, or any persistent conduct, comment, gesture, display of literature or contact of a sexual natural which is likely to cause offence, embarrassment or humiliation to any employee".

At present, as the government knows, complaints of sexual harassment are referred to Labour Canada, trade unions or civil court. Under these proposed amendments, employers would be obliged to form an anti-harassment policy. There are a number of other provisions I will not elaborate upon concerning these particular proposed amendments to labour legislation at the federal level. However, suffice it to say that the federal government has taken no action, whatsoever.

These amendments would cover workers in federally regulated industries such as Bell Canada, Air Canada, CP, CN and the chartered banks. Unfortunately, there is still no protection for employees on Parliament Hill. I strongly urge that we extend collective bargaining rights to all employees on Parliament Hill, or, at the very least, that a grievance procedure be established. It is not good enough to tell employees of senators, Members of Parliament and cabinet ministers that they can appeal to the senator, to the Member of Parliament or to the cabinet minister in question if they believe they have been harassed. That is not good enough in this day and age. As I say, those provisions languish on the back burner. The proposals were well received by employers, unions and women's rights organizations after a long series of consultations. In particular, I wish to commend the National Union of Provincial Government Employees, representing 210,000 provincial government employees, particularly Susan Attenborough, for outstanding work in this area.

When is this government going to act? There has been no action taken on the recommendation of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. It sat on this issue for almost a year. All of the interested groups, organizations, and the Department of Labour itself, have approved of this reform. Naturally, individuals and unions must act as well. The country awaits the minister's decision. It is time the Minister of Justice and the Liberal government took seriously the recommendations of the Canadian Human Rights Commission on this important question of sexual harassment. Canadian women have waited far too long for this basic protection. Now is surely the time to act.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, in response to the question raised by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), who is a lawyer, he is quite aware that under the Canadian Human Rights Act discrimination on the basis of sex is prohibited. There are four different bodies of law and jurisprudence which have been brought to bear to define what discrimination based on sex means. Those four bodies of jurisprudence have indicated that discrimination based on sex also includes a prohibition against sexual harassment. I would like to quote those four provisions. The first is under provincial human rights codes.

The hon. member for Burnaby referred to the Ontario law, the Ontario human rights code. Under a law similar to what we have, in the case of Bell v. Ladas, in 1980, the Ontario Human Rights Commission ruled that sexual harassment was an offence under the provisions prohibiting discrimination based on sex.

Second, under U.S. jurisprudence, the equal employment opportunities commission in its final amendment to guidelines on discrimination because of sex has included a number of guidelines dealing with sexual harassment. Therefore, sexual harassment is included within the discrimination based on sex.

Third, the Canadian Human Rights Commission in its newsletter of autumn, 1981, has underlined that under Part VII it does have the ability to deal with sexual harassment. The commission used a page and a half to define what is sexual harassment, and it feels it has the power to deal with it.

Last, the opinion of the Department of Justice is and has been that sexual harassment is already prohibited under the Canadian Human Rights Code. Nevertheless, sexual harassment is abhorrent conduct. It is, unfortunately, too widespread. Women are the principal victims of this offence. We agree that they must be protected against it.

In addition, it must be realized there are other groups in our society who are protected by the human rights code against discrimination based on race, colour, religion, ethnic or national origin. The members of this government, like all right-thinking Canadians, are opposed to sexual and, indeed, to any form of harassment. That is why the Department of Justice is presently examining the impact of all forms of harassment. I expect that very soon its recommendations will go to cabinet making sexual harassment an explicit offence, as opposed to just an implicit offence, as it now is, even though it is still prohibited under the Canadian Human Rights Code. Making it explicit will create an even greater awareness on the part of all Canadians of this degrading, discriminatory offence against women.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to be adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE ECONOMY

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the Right Hon. Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) election promise to ensure that Canada would be self-sufficient in energy by 1990 will not be kept, and that starting in 1987, Canada will have to import nearly one-half million barrels of oil per day; whereas the budget deficit for each of the two past years has been $3 billion, in other words almost 30 per cent more than what it would have been under a Progressive Conservative government; whereas the Right Hon. Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) have lost control of the economy, I move, seconded by the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House unanimously condemn the government's economic policies, and that it adopt a motion to censure the Prime Minister for his abysmal economic performance.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion moved by the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DELAY IN PROCESSING APPLICATIONS FROM UNEMPLOYED IN ST. CATHARINES, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, almost 5,000 laid off auto workers in St. Catharines have been waiting since January 10 for their unemployment insurance cards of entitlement which must come from Belleville. Local unemployment insurance personnel are working 20 to 40 hours overtime per week trying to cope with a record number of applications. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration take immediate steps to eliminate this time delay by either adding sufficient staff to do the job required, or by eliminating this unnecessary bureaucratic bottleneck of requiring the applications processed in St. Catharines be routed through Belleville.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

APPLICATION TO CANADIAN FOOTBALL LEAGUE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, in view of a statement on CBC Radio by an official of the Metric Commission that metric is coming to Canadian football in five years' time, when the regulation Canadian Football League field will be transformed to 100 metres long by 40 metres wide, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the minister responsible for the Metric Commission issue a statement at once saying how and when the Metric Commission will touch down on Canada's football fields, and further, how this conversion will affect the records of Hamilton's Football Hall of Fame.

Mr. Nielsen: Metreball.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

POSITION OF MEMBER FOR ST. JOHN'S WEST ON HARVESTING OF HARP SEALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the House of Commons passed a unanimous resolution on February 9, 1982, confirming its support for the harvesting of harp seals in the province of Newfoundland, and furthermore, on Friday, February 19, 1982, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), in the company of other Canadian parliamentarians, had an opportunity to discuss, promote and defend the harvesting of harp seals by fishermen of Newfoundland before members of the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France, and that instead that hon. member and his Conservative colleagues chose to partake in blatant and partisan political mischief by secretly leaving their hotel rooms in the middle of the night—

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dingwall: —to return to Canada, thereby failing to stay and defend the seal hunters of Newfoundland, Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher):

That this House condemn such grade school behaviour, that the hon. member for St. John's West resign as external affairs critic for the Progressive Conservative Party—

An hon. Member: If you cannot stand the heat, get out of the kitchen.

Mr. Dingwall:

—and either apologize to the people of Newfoundland, particularly the fishermen, or tender his resignation forthwith.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS ON PUBLIC HIGHWAYS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of a recent accident in Kamloops, British Columbia, when a semi-trailer truck transporting sodium cyanide lost its brakes, killed one person, injured others, and threatened the lives of many more with cyanide gas when it overturned near a large hospital, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Heap):

That this House express its concern for the inadequacy of federal and provincial regulations governing the movement of dangerous goods on public highways, and calls for immediate action to prevent any similar accidents.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE

DEMAND FOR RESIGNATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, in the Toronto Star of February 22, with respect to transfer payments, the Secretary of State (Mr. Regan) is quoted as follows:

The question is whether Ontario's priority is education or operating an office so that Chinese girl can be in Paris. What's her name? Adrienne Clarkson.

• (1410)

The comments of the minister show him to be sexist, racist and dangerously ignorant of the importance of exports to Canada and to Ontario. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That the Prime Minister immediately demand the resignation of the Secretary of State, since his remarks show him to be very clearly unfit for his office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

BOATS LEASED BY NON-NATIVE FISHERMEN IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, whereas the government plans to purchase 287 fishing vessels from British Columbia Packers Limited for $10 million, and to give these vessels to the native bands of British Columbia in spite of the fact that one third of these boats have been leased for years by non-native fishermen who would lose their livelihood by this plan, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development immediately suspend any plan which would deny non-native fishermen, including many of Japanese ancestry, living in the Richmond-Delta area, the access to fishing boats which they have leased for many years, and that he assure these fishermen of their continued right to operate said vessels until their retirement.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE

CONDEMNATION OF MINISTER'S INVOLVEMENT IN ACFO AFFAIRS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the decision by the Department of the Secretary of State to no longer recognize the Association canadienne-française de l'Ontario as the main pressure group for cultural and economic development of Franco-Ontarians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson):

That this House condemn the Secretary of State for his interference and for the economic blackmail being used on the ACFO.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

POLITICAL PARTIES

CALL FOR EXPULSION OF MEMBER FOR WINNIPEG-ASSINIBOINE FROM PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE CAUCUS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Burghardt (London West): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the controversy surrounding recent remarks by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) continues to reflect adversely on the dignity and the honour of the House of Commons as a whole, and whereas there are reports of an occurence of a brawl at the member's constituency meeting last weekend and the riding association's president resigned, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand):

That the House call upon the hon. member to apologize for his racist remarks which lend support to the apartheid policies of South Africa, and failing that, that the Leader of the Opposition confirm his party's opposition to the policy of apartheid and expel the hon. member from the Progressive Conservative caucus.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mind your own business!

Mr. Andre: We will do that if you do the same thing about martial law in Poland!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, a front page story today in the Montreal Gazette quotes the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) as saying that he hopes to be remembered as "having won the economic Olympics for job creation".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jarvis: Say it ain't true!

Mr. Taylor: Canada today has some 1,096,000 unemployed, amounting to about 7.5 per cent, while the unemployment rate for Italy is 7.4 per cent; for the United Kingdom, 7 per cent; for the U.S.A., 6.3 per cent; and for France, 3.1 per cent; but, on the other hand, when the Prime Minister took over in 1969 the number of jobs in the Public Service was 369,000 and today it is 510,000.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Taylor: Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this House place the Olympic crown on the head of the Prime Minister for: (1) having more unemployed in Canada than any other industrial country; and, (2) for increasing the Public Service by some 140,000 jobs, more than most, if not all other prime ministers of Canada all added together; and for this terrible—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Go ahead!

Mr. Taylor: —I mean terrific record.

—the House presents the Prime Minister with a pair of celluloid shoe laces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

EFFECT OF SALES TAX PROPOSAL ON PRODUCTION OF BUSINESS CATALOGUES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister will realize that uncertainty is probably the greatest danger to business, particularly the uncertainty surrounding the sales tax provisions that were alluded to in the minister's budget of November 12. One particular company, for example, that normally produces a catalogue on July 1 must put that catalogue to bed for some 745 items. The items have to be quoted as tax included. Will the minister tell this House, and perhaps give that particular manufacturer some idea whether he should produce a catalogue including sales tax or not including sales tax. What should that particular manufacturer/distributor do?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe the hon. member would find it unusual for me to give advice to individual businessmen on the orders of the day. That has never been the purpose of the question period, nor has it ever been used in that way.

I would tell the hon. member that it is my intention, as I indicated in the budget speech, to release draft legislation on the sales tax, hopefully within a short period of time. At that time, as I indicated earlier to the hon. member for Edmonton who asked a similar question, I will indicate whether there will be a change in the implementation date. As was indicated on that occasion, quite a number of businessmen and persons potentially affected by the sales tax have asked for additional time to consider the provisions, and I will give careful consideration to those representations.

Mr. Clark: Cut and run MacEachen.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION DATE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, the minister knows that he has left the business community out to dry for over two and a half months with respect to this issue and a whole host of other issues. To suggest that he may make a change in the date only adds to the confusion. The rumours abound of September 1, January 1, maybe July 1 next year—

Madam Speaker: Order. I can see the hon. member is launching into a speech. I would like him to stick to a question.

Mr. Blenkarn: With due apology, Madam Speaker, I was as short as I could be. When is the minister going to come clean with the business community? He has left it hanging out to dry on July 1 perhaps, September 1 perhaps, January 1 perhaps. When is he going to come clean with this House? When is he going to say it is going to be January 1, or July 1, 1984, or what is he going to do? When is he going to do these things? He has promised them for weeks now. When is he going to come forward with an announcement?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member misstates the situation completely. There have been considerable consultations between businessmen and officials of the department. The business community has a much better understanding of the potential effect of these proposed changes than the hon. member would indicate in his question. When the draft legislation is made public, if at that time any change is made in the implementation date it will be to accommodate the request of the business community which would like more time. I am quite prepared to proceed, but I am ready to give consideration to legitimate requests along those lines.

QUERY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): The answers are not satisfactory, Madam Speaker, but we cannot account for that. The minister ought to know that the uncertainty, as well as the uncertainty in his answers today, are leading to a loss of jobs. When businessmen do not know what is going on with respect to taxes, they do not employ people and they do not expand. Yet the minister continues to make statements that he will some day do something, perhaps. When will the minister give us a date? Will he give us a date today, a week today, Friday, next Friday, a week Friday, or March 1, on which he will produce the legislation so that we know where we are going?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there is no doubt about the dates. The dates with respect to the implementation have been announced in the budget. That is the certainty that exists. If there has been any uncertainty brought into the situation it has been as a result of the question that was asked by a member of his own party, suggesting that there might be need for some delay in the implementation date.

I would suggest that hon. members on the other side get together and decide whether they want to assist certainty or create uncertainty.

Mr. Wilson: You have created it.

AIR SAFETY

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS IN DUBIN REPORT

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. It may very well have to do with uncertainty about a matter which is very vital and fundamental. I am sure the Prime Minister has not had a chance to assess and digest Mr. Justice Dubin's report on aviation safety which was filed yesterday, but since the matter involves aviation safety at airports now and there are important recommendations in that report on search and rescue changes to help consolidate and co-ordinate activity, would the Prime Minister assure the House in a very serious way that whenever the Minister of Transport comes back—because he will be out quite often as he charges across the country on issues that he has created—he will give top priority to the question of air safety affecting Canadians travelling in the air, and also to the search and rescue provisions so that the recommendations of Mr. Justice Dubin that do not require legislation can be acted upon immediately and those that do require legislation can be introduced before the Easter recess?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member, the Minister of Transport is taking the recommendations of Mr. Justice Dubin very seriously and has already acted on Volumes I and II and has already taken steps in proposed Volume III. When it comes to search and rescue, he has every intention of abiding by the recommendations. There is a task force already working at co-ordinating search and rescue to transport and they are studying this in the administration and will be coming forward with a report.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, that is an incredible answer from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport and reflects what little priority the Prime Minister has on something so fundamental like air safety and/or co-ordination of search and rescue facilities in Canada. I will calm down like the Prime Minister asks, Madam Speaker, when he takes an interest in aviation safety.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member simply must ask a question and not make speeches.

Mr. Nowlan: The fact of the matter is that it is very difficult to ask a short, succinct question when the Parliamentary Secretary has misstated the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh! Order!

Mr. Nowlan: My question, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: If the hon. member continues I will not recognize him for a supplementary question. Some order must exist in the House. When I feel questions are too long and make remarks to that effect, I would appreciate it if hon. members would co-operate.

An hon. Member: How about the answers?

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I think the record will show that you have been on your feet almost as long as I have during this question.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Comox-Powell River.

MANAGEMENT OF AVIATION SAFETY BOARD

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, maybe it is appropriate that the Minister of Transport is away today, but the important issue today is in terms of the Dubin report in which there are three important aspects. Could the Prime Minister pick up on a couple of these aspects? In terms of the departmental reorganization recommended by Mr. Justice Dubin, independent bodies have been recommended for departmental reorganization replacing search and rescue.

Is there any indication that as one of the procedures in departmental reorganization we will see the removal of the senior management of that department whom, I think, Mr. Justice Dubin identifies implicitly as part of the problem?

An hon. Member: Say yes.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport had reported earlier that he is preparing legislation to have an independent commission examine aviation safety and accidents. He is busy and he has submitted a compliance—

Mr. Crosbie: Don Quixote.

Mr. Bockstael: —an enforcement manual that has been published for safety in the air.

Mr. Crosbie: What about the radar? Never mind the manuals.

Mr. Bockstael: Emergency locators are being made mandatory by April 1, 1982. Radar systems are being upgraded in a program. Under search and rescue there is an interdepartmental task force—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Bockstael: —studying search and rescue. They abide by the recommendations and should be co-ordinated by transport.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

• (1425)

REQUEST FOR EARLY INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, we do need information on that Canadian aviation safety board and a new and vigorous enforcement procedure quickly.

There is a second aspect to this very important piece of legislation, and my question is directed to the Prime Minister once again, since ultimately, I suppose, he will direct the course of legislation in this House. Will there be very quick action on this and separate pieces of legislation implementing such recommendations as a Canadian aviation safety board and new delegated authority with respect to enforcement, or will we have to wait forever and a day until some comprehensive piece of legislation is developed in the future and brought before Parliament when the schedule permits?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Canadian aviation safety legislation is expected to be ready later in the spring.

Mr. Epp: Just pick it up and read it, Bob.

Mr. Bockstael: The enforcement manual and legislation are being developed under the Aeronautics Act and will be brought forward in the next session of Parliament.

FUNDS FOR EQUIPMENT AND FACILITIES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, in the desperate hope for a satisfactory answer I will ask one last question of the Prime Minister. It involves the tremendous financial implications for taxpayers, small aviation operators and the private aviation community, of the safety recommendations of Dubin. There will need to be very large increases in expenditures of capital funds, training programs and person-year allocations. Is the government prepared to move forward in order to right this system by allocating the resources necessary, and will the government provide us with some kind of plan for the next five years which shows that those expenditures are committed to this very important aspect of aviation safety?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport is committed to aviation safety and expending money for that purpose. In the next few weeks there will be tenders called for $217 million of expenditures to improve radar in Canada.

TAXABLE EMPLOYEE BENEFITS—REQUEST THAT MINISTER REVIEW BUDGET MEASURE

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Despite assurances to the contrary from the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism, the effect of the combined increase in taxable benefits for employees is not offset by the lower marginal tax rate. Figures show that the budget measures concerning taxable employee benefits have a progressively negative impact on employees earning less than $40,000. The lower and middle-income wage earners in the work force are the ones who are feeling the impact. Would the Minister of Finance give serious review to the taxable benefit issue in his budget and bring this measure into line with his stated objective of equity and fairness?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe the comments made by the Minister of State are fully justified. The total new liability on taxpayers as a result of the tax on these benefits in the range, for example, of the average industrial wage in Canada, is more than offset by the other tax benefits flowing from the budget, and I believe when we get into committee we will be able to demonstrate that to the satisfaction of the hon. member.

REQUEST THAT MEASURE BE REMOVED

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, the average industrial wage has nothing to do with the fairness and equity I am talking about with regard to employees who need their taxable benefits.

It will take a pay increase of at least 4 per cent to maintain the pre-November 12 spending power of employees affected by the taxable benefit rules in the minister's budget. At a time when the Prime Minister is asking us to restrain wages and tighten our belts, the Minister of Finance is forcing employees to demand more from employers. Will the Minister of Finance remove this inflationary and counterproductive measure which hits employees least able to afford it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has made another error in asserting that these particular benefits are applied basically to low-income employees. The fact of the matter is that the higher their income the greater will be the taxable benefit flowing from this particular provision of the tax system. The hon. member will have an opportunity to examine the details of this and other tax measures when they are dealt with in the ordinary way in the House of Commons.

IMPACT OF TAX ON SALESMEN

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue and it pertains to the increased taxation of employees who utilize a company car. The minister is aware that what is known as the standby charge, that is, the value of benefit added to a taxpayer's income, has increased by a whopping 150 per cent. For an Ontario salesman who earns $22,000 per year, will the minister confirm that it is going to mean about $1,000 in additional taxes for him?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, it is true that the standby charge was increased but for those people in that situation who feel that the benefit to them is less than the standby charge, there are alternative arrangements that can be made. My department has been working with the business community and a statement on that will be issued in the very near future. There are alternatives for people who feel that the standby charge is more than is their due.

REASONS FOR MEASURE

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister continues to exhibit his vast ignorance of the implications of this budget. Why does the Liberal government continue to punish the salesmen and women of this country with this disastrous tax measure?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the answer is partly, why does the opposition try to raise questions based on false premises?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: I repeat my answer, that for those businessmen who feel the standby charge is more than they should be paying, there are alternative arrangements that can be made with my department so that they can be treated fairly.

ENERGY

PROGRAM TO EXPAND DISTRIBUTION OF NATURAL GAS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it concerns government assistance for the extension of natural gas pipelines into communities that do not have this service now. This distribution system expansion program was to be launched early this year. Natural gas companies and municipalities are anxiously awaiting the announced beginning of the program for this much needed extension. Will the minister tell the House the exact date when this program will begin?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the utilities have already been advised of the amount of money that each would be entitled to and they are now in the process of examining which extension they would like to propose with the additional money that would be provided by the federal government. That program is due to start on April 1.

AMOUNT OF GOVERNMENT FUNDING

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. There was indication from the government last year, and the minister will be aware of this, that the amount set aside for this program was $300 million. Will the minister confirm that funds in that amount will be made available this year and, if not, will there be any reduction? There should be an increase because of inflation. If there is to be a reduction will it be significant?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would refer the hon. member to the National Energy Program in which we indicated that $300 million would be allocated for extension lines for gas consumers over the period of the National Energy Program, until 1986. That budget remains the same. I hope there will be enough demand from utilities to meet the budget that has been allocated for this particular purpose as this is quite useful.

DISASTERS

INVESTIGATION OF "OCEAN RANGER" SINKING

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on a matter which is of great concern to the country, that is, the disaster that took place with the Ocean Ranger. I think there is a great deal of sympathy all over the country for the people of Newfoundland. Perhaps the minister or even the Solicitor General could answer my question.

There have been reports from Newfoundland this morning that a man identifying himself as an RCMP officer has been investigating the disaster. Can either minister confirm that there is an RCMP investigation in progress and that it is of a criminal nature?

If the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources answers the question, could he give the House any information he may have about a report—a secret Mobil report, apparently—that the supply ship of the Ocean Ranger may have rammed one of the life boats which had live men inside it?

Could either minister answer the first part of the question, and could the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources give us any facts he might have on the second part?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have just checked with the Solicitor General and neither of us is aware of any investigation being carried on by the RCMP at the present time.

As far as the second point is concerned, I am sure many rumours will be circulating. Indeed, there have been plenty of rumours in the last week, and there will be more in the future.

I hope that the inquiry we are trying to set up jointly with Newfoundland will start very soon and that all those allegations will be fully investigated. In the meantime I do not intend to discuss or speculate on all the rumours that will be circulating in the days and weeks to come. I think the best way of resolving those issues is through the inquiry that we have set up. I hope it will be a joint inquiry by Newfoundland and Canada.

POSSIBILITY OF JOINT INQUIRY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I think there is great concern that a joint inquiry be set up and get under way soon. In a rather cooler manner than the shouting match that took place in the House yesterday, could the minister tell us what is happening in regard to that joint inquiry? When does he expect that it will be set up? This is a matter that falls under his responsibility, as he indicated when he tabled what I call those conservation reports made by his inspectors on the Ocean Ranger.

Could the minister also table a report on the safety meeting held on the deck of the Ocean Ranger on February 6? I brought this matter up in the House last week when he was away. I believe the minister is required to do this and that, under the oil and gas regulations, Mobil is required to file it.

Therefore, can the minister tell the House what stage arrangements for setting up the joint inquiry have reached and when he expects it to get under way? Also, is he prepared to table further reports under the oil and gas regulations?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the sermon given by the hon. member. I would also have appreciated it had he used cooler language in the House last week in my absence when he referred to criminal responsibility in this particular case. I welcome his more responsible attitude today and I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that I am ready to co-operate with him in all respects.

As far as the allegation about a possible report is concerned, I must say that all reports will be submitted to the inquiry and examined by it. Regarding the possibility of a joint inquiry, I have to inform the House that I sent a telex today to my colleague in Newfoundland indicating that the government welcomes the principle of a joint inquiry. We will try to work out an arrangement satisfactory to both governments in the shortest possible time. I would remind the hon. member, however, that in the meantime the two governments have set up commissions of investigation or commissions of inquiry. I hope they will be joint, and we should know about that very shortly.

ROLE OF HALIFAX AIR-SEA RESCUE CENTRE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. According to the same leaked Mobil report of the series of events on the radio transmissions, the rig Ocean Ranger was able to accept a helicopter at 2.55 a.m., almost two hours after the Mayday signal was received from the rig and more than an hour after evacuation. Furthermore, there is evidence that at 3.30 a.m. Mobil was giving instructions that the helicopter should not land on the Ocean Ranger.

Since the Mayday signal was received by the air-sea rescue unit in Halifax, and since at that time it was assumed to have taken responsibility for the air-sea rescue operation, why did it not take command of this rescue operation and all ships in the area? According to the evidence, instructions were being given by Mobil and not by the air-sea rescue unit in Halifax.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should know that the co-ordination of all air-sea rescue is done by our co-ordination centre in Halifax, by both the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence. As far as the detail of this particular incident is concerned, I think that the inquiry or the investigation will show who was wrong, and who was right, and only then will we have the answer to the hon. member's question.

LAY-OFFS IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. It concerns recent Canadian National lay-offs in the northern New Brunswick area that used to be known as the Chaleur area. Could the parliamentary secretary inform the House of any further moves? They have taken out the accounting division and now they are moving the engineering division to the Atlantic region office.

Could he also inform us as to the status of the replacement for the president of CN who indicated his resignation, and also of the retirement of the vice-president of the Atlantic region, Mr. David Blair, of Moncton? Could he give us some assurance that some decisions will be taken to protect jobs in northern New Brunswick and to protect the area, so that we will not see an even greater loss of jobs in Campbellton, New Brunswick?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I should like to tell the hon. member for Restigouche that I am certainly sympathetic to his question and to the employment of people by CNR in the maritimes. I will have the Ministry of Transport make inquiries of CNR as to its future plans in the maritimes.

PUBLIC SERVICE

FIRING OF KINGSTON CIVIL SERVANT—GROUNDS FOR DISMISSAL

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. A constituent of mine, Mr. Neil Fraser, of Revenue Canada in Kingston, has been fired after being harassed for several weeks by the federal government for speaking out against the mandatory introduction of the metric system. This is a serious matter of which Canadians should be made aware, when the muzzling of public employees takes away their freedom of speech, making them second-class citizens. On what grounds is an off-duty public servant being deprived of freedom of speech or rights which have been taken for granted by fellow Canadians?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, Mr. Fraser is a relatively senior official with the Department of National Revenue.

Some hon. Members: He was!

Mr. Rompkey: First of all, he publicly spoke against the metric system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: I hope, if hon. members opposite treat this matter seriously, that they will try to listen to my answer. He was suspended; he was counselled.

Mr. Clark: Counselled!

Mr. Rompkey: He persisted in his actions by then criticizing the Constitution and official bilingualism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: It is quite obvious that Mr. Fraser did not want to desist from that course of action. It seems to me, particularly in this department where we collect taxes which fund all government programs, that a particular sensitivity is required. It seems to be ironic that a man would collect taxes on the one hand, and criticize the programs on which those taxes are spent, on the other.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rompkey: It seems to me that there is a particular sensitivity to be maintained here. In view of that, Mr. Fraser was dismissed this morning.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Would you call him a traitor?

POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, my question does not concern the collection of taxes; it is a matter of freedom of speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Vankoughnet: I think this is a precedent which could reflect upon the rights of all public servants—federal, provincial, municipal, Crown corporations, people on government pensions such as the Canada pension, veterans and so on. Where does the government consider that it should draw the line?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, there is another principle to be remembered here, that is, the right of an employer to fire an employee who publicly speaks against the organization—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: What is the matter with you?

Mr. Rompkey: —whether that organization is public or private. There seems to be an adequate body of evidence in law to support that position. It was based on that position that Mr. Fraser was dismissed.

QUERY RESPECTING RIGHT TO FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister on this firing of a public servant. My first question concerns the answer just given by the Minister of National Revenue when he said that because an official of the Department of National Revenue is involved in collecting taxes, that official should be deprived of the right to criticize any program on which taxes are spent. Is that the position of government and, consequently, is every employee of the Department of National Revenue from this point forward to be deprived of his or her rights as a free Canadian citizen to express himself or herself on questions of national policy?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I must confess that I do not know the details of this particular case, but I certainly support the position the minister took in the House in his answer just now. It seems to me a pretty well-established principle of government that public servants working for that government are not free to espouse publicly a political situation which is contrary to government policy.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It had nothing to do with his job.

Mr. Crosbie: What about cabinet ministers? They can do it.

Mr. Trudeau: That is a well-established principle of democratic and parliamentary government, and we do not propose to change it.

QUERY RESPECTING ORGANIZATION'S RIGHT TO DISMISS EMPLOYEE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister has already changed it, because the rule has not been that a public servant was denied the right as a free citizen to speak on matters outside his responsibility as a public servant and to speak on his own time. The rules have already been changed, and democracy has suffered as a consequence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Minister of National Revenue just said that any organization, public or private, has the right to fire any individual who speaks publicly against that organization, including the Government of Canada. Is that the official position of the Government of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, just a few days ago the Leader of the Opposition was criticizing what he alleged to be division within cabinet. I believe he recognizes that cabinet government operates as a whole and that officials who work for a government—

An hon. Member: What about Monique?

Mr. Trudeau: —are not free to enter into political actions critical of established policy of that government.

Mr. Beatty: There are two standards—one for politicians and one for everyone else.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER TABLE RULES GOVERNING SPEAKING RIGHTS OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, this is a very important principle. We clearly have a double standard here—one which applies to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of State from Quebec who are able to criticize freely public policy and suffer no consequences, and the other which applies to at least one public servant, and perhaps to all public servants who, if they speak critically of a public policy outside their responsibilities, and on private time, will be fired from their jobs. That is the principle which has just been established and articulated by the Minister of National Revenue.

Will the Prime Minister of Canada interest himself in this case of public servants being fired for their private views? Will he table in the House a detailed statement of the rules which will henceforth govern the rights of public servants in their capacity as free and private citizens of the country to express their views on questions outside their official responsibilities as public servants?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would be happy to remind the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that these rules are established and are well known, particularly as they apply to the rule which permits officials during election periods to detach themselves from their roles as officials, to espouse contraviews to those of the government, and indeed to run for opposition parties. But apart from election periods I know of no rule which permits officials, particularly high ranking ones, to espouse positions which are contrary to those of the government they serve.

An hon. Member: What about freedom of speech?

EFFECT OF IMPORTS ON SHOE INDUSTRY

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In response to a question by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville last Friday, the minister stated words to the effect that because of the findings of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal our Canadian shoe industry is not seriously affected by imports from offshore countries. This position is directly opposed by the Canadian shoe industry which has come out publicly stating that indeed this policy is killing its industry and has directly contributed to the loss of some 6,400 jobs. How can the minister equate the claim that by raising the quotas of imported shoes and imposing no quota on others this is not adversely affecting our ailing Canadian shoe industry?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I believe I said last week that the policy announced by the government for the footwear industry was consistent with the findings of the Anti-Dumping Tribunal which concluded that our footwear industry was able to meet competition from developed countries, including state trading countries, these being the main source of imports of leather footwear. Therefore the government's policy was that the quota would not continue on footwear. The existing quota on non-leather footwear would continue, and we would extend that quota to cover the kinds of non-leather footwear that were not previously covered. In addition, we created a fund of $17 million to aid our industry to restructure and modernize. We are certainly concerned about the prospects of the industry and we are acting in a way that is intended to serve the best interests of the industry and its workers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

HEARINGS INTO ALLEGED DUMPING OF CANADIAN LUMBER IN UNITED STATES MARKET

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, although he may want to defer the answer to the Minister of State for International Trade. New and alarming developments in the United States international trade commission investigation into alleged dumping by Canadian lumber exporters constitute a serious and growing threat to our number one export industry.

Two U.S. forestry giants, International Pulp and Paper, and Louisiana Pacific, have now joined the list of western politicians and independent companies arraigned against us at the ITC hearings which are slated for one week from tomorrow in Portland, Oregon. Is the minister, on behalf of the government, planning to intervene in these hearings, or will the minister make direct representations to Washington in view of the escalating danger of the situation?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, we have already made representations to Washington with respect to this situation. We also made representations to the state governments on the west coast. I have personally visited the state of Washington, because the west coasts of Canada and the United States are experiencing similar problems in the forest industry and we do not think resorting to protectionist measures is in the best interests of the forest products industry in North America, either in Canada or in the United States.

Mr. Kristiansen: Madam Speaker, I know that was the prevailing view, but the rules of the game have now changed since the intervention of two of the majors in the international industry. Now anything goes.

Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian forest service. Would the minister give a short lesson to his colleagues in the Department of External Affairs on the impact on the Canadian lumber industry if tariffs were to be imposed as a result of next week's hearings in Portland, Oregon, and the possible loss of Canadian lumber exports, or a large portion of them, to the United States which would flow from such a regrettable step and which we hope will not be the decision to which they will come.

To clarify perhaps, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I would be happy to have the question clarified, but I can report to the hon. gentleman that we will be following these meetings very closely which will take place next week. There will be observers from the Canadian forestry service at those hearings, so we will be fully informed as to what is said. We will take appropriate action to support the representations being made by the lumber industry.

THE ECONOMY

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL MEET PROVINCIAL MINISTERS TO ESTABLISH PROGRAM TO STIMULATE ECONOMIC RECOVERY

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the economic situation in Quebec, a situation that has become alarming in the areas of job creation and investment, and in view of the unwillingness of the sovereignist government to take advantage of various federal programs, and its habit of boycotting federal-provincial conferences since November 5 and of referring to sovereignty as its priority since the Parti Québécois' referendum—although the House is aware that Quebecers much prefer to discuss jobs and investment instead of sovereignty—my question is as follows: Does the minister intend to meet with his provincial colleagues in order to establish an economic recovery program as soon as possible, so as to meet the objectives of Quebecers which centre on getting the Quebec economy out of its recession?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to inform the House that I intend to go to Quebec next Monday with my colleagues, the Minister of Industry and the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism), for meetings with some of our provincial counterparts, and we intend to discuss various ways of working together to help stimulate the province's economy. We in the federal government have a real interest in assisting this recovery and in creating more jobs for workers in the province of Quebec.

INDUSTRY

FOOTWEAR—INCLUSION OF LEATHER FOOTWEAR IN OPEN MARKET

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, after listening to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who is prepared to go to Quebec next week, my question deals with the footwear industry. Industry representatives have made a very clear recommendation—I feel that the minister's answer should be at least as clear—the association recommends that leather footwear be included in the over-all quota. In view of the fact that the association has proved that his policy is incapable of correcting the present situation, is the minister prepared to reassess his decision and to include leather footwear in the over-all quota?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, our policy is the result of a government decision which I announced a few months ago. My colleagues from Quebec, in caucus and in the cabinet, have had very useful discussions with spokesmen for the footwear industry, and I shall be happy to receive their advice on this matter, to find out whether it will be helpful in implementing the policy we announced a few months ago.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary. It is of course very useful to know that the association met with ministers and members from Quebec, but I doubt their recommendations will be made public after our recent experience; can the minister give us the assurance today that he will make public the recommendations made by the Quebec caucus, and once again, is he himself willing to reassess his decision, in other words, to include leather footwear in the over-all quota? The association is anxious to know whether or not the minister is prepared to negotiate reinclusion of this item.

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, of course we can consider the suggestions made by the footwear industry, but I have no policy announcement to make in this regard today.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON COMPENSATION TO HOME OWNERS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, last night the United States government issued a nation-wide ban on urea formaldehyde foam insulation, which raises anew the health concerns of UFFI home owners in this country. My question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who said in Montreal on the weekend that UFFI victims have not heard the last word from the federal government in terms of compensation. Will the minister be specific on what this means in dollars and cents terms of compensation, or is the minister still simply trying to pry money out of the provinces? Is compensation dependent upon the minister and the federal government getting the provinces to agree to compensation?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, clearly the decision made yesterday by the American authorities shows that the Canadian government acted wisely in prohibiting sales here in Canada a few months ago before any other country did so. It is true that I announced yesterday that we were awaiting recommendations from the Canadian Review Board before considering other alternatives for providing more direct assistance to home owners and victims of this product. I wish to emphasize today the importance of greater co-operation and more generous assistance by the provinces. I hope that the provincial authorities will show as much concern for assisting UFFI victims as the federal government has done by announcing a program with a budget of over $110 million for UFFI victims.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, last Thursday the government House leader announced the business of the House up until today and made passing reference to the possibility of an allotted day on Thursday or Friday. Would he tell us what the business of the House will be for tomorrow, Thursday and Friday of this week, please?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, it will all depend on the progress we make later today on the National Housing Act. Whether or not we vote today on second reading of that bill will influence the order of business for the remainder of the week. In any case, I intend to invite the House leaders to a meeting tomorrow or Thursday to discuss the calendar of business for the coming days and weeks.

On the order: Government Notices of Motions:

February 19, 1982—The Minister of Finance:

That the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be empowered to review the profit situation of the chartered banks.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I might return to a question I asked yesterday. I provided the government and opposition House leaders with the terms of reference which we felt would be more appropriate for the reference of the question of bank profits to the standing committee. Contained within those terms are a number of standard clauses which will guarantee that the committee will be able to pursue its work both diligently and expeditiously.

I wonder if the two House leaders might be in a position to indicate whether those terms of reference would be acceptable. If they are, I would be quite happy to give the necessary unanimous consent to proceed with the establishing of the committee and reference of the subject matter.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I think it might be best to leave that for the meeting of House leaders which the government House leader has indicated he is prepared to have. I might indicate to my friend that some of the matters he has listed in his suggested terms of reference are not necessary because they are already in the Standing Orders. Those matters can be straightened out at the House leaders' meeting.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Under the circumstances, Madam Speaker, since there is a notice of motion on the Order Paper we will ask that it be stood until we have our meeting, probably on Thursday. I agree with the opposition House leader that we should discuss that in our meeting because most of what is proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) is already provided for in Standing Orders and is covered by the broad terms which appear in the motion, notice of which we have put on the Order Paper, except for the right to travel. I do not see why the committee should travel, but I have an open mind on the matter and we will discuss it.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. DOMM—METRIC CONVERSION—REQUEST FOR RETRACTION OF STATEMENT BY MR. OUELLET

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of question period on February 1, 1982. I would appreciate it very much if you would consider asking for a retraction of the statement made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) on page 14505, where he said that I have:

—apparently urged Canadians to disobey the law.

This concerned the implementation of the metric system.

Madam Speaker: No, I am afraid I cannot oblige the hon. member. The Speaker has no authority and no desire to ask any member in this House to retract a statement. Hon. members have to stand by their statements and are responsible for them.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1982-83

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1983 was presented by Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Madam Speaker to the House.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I would also like to table on behalf of my colleagues and in support of the estimates, Part I of the government expenditure plan, ten booklets on Part III, and a "Guide to the Estimates" of the Government of Canada.

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, as hon. members are aware, the review and scrutiny by Parliament of the government's expenditure plans is one of the fundamental responsibilities of the parliamentary system. Thus, as the plans which are being tabled, and for which authorization is requested, are within the expenditure framework tabled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in his budget of November 12, I invite all hon. members to devote their efforts to a full and complete examination of these estimates.

Before highlighting some of the content of this year's estimates I would like to say a few words about the presentation itself.

Last year this government tabled for the first time a Part I to the estimates to provide hon. members with a context for reviewing the estimates, or Blue Book, which contains both the statutory expenditures and the voted items for which parliamentary authority is sought for expenditures to be incurred during the coming fiscal year. It has been agreed by all concerned, I believe, that Part I serves a very useful purpose as it allows for an explanation of forward multiyear plans which could not be incorporated in the Blue Book, and provides a variety of analysis and explanation in a form which is more easily assimilated than that of the formal estimates.

I am tabling Part I, the government expenditure plan, again this year. This volume shows the five-year expenditure plan of the government, including the breakdown by ten "spending envelopes". In addition, considerable analysis and explanation is provided to give members a better understanding of the content of the plan and the 1982-83 estimates.

Further, as part of my project to improve reporting to parliament, I am pleased to table, on behalf of the responsible ministers, ten program expenditure plans, or separate volumes of a new Part III of the Estimates. Members will recall that it was my intention to table nine such plans this year, but in fact ten are available. This is the first time that these program expenditure plans have been tabled with the Main Estimates, although last year I tabled a number of pilot projects based on the Estimates for 1980-81, simply to serve as examples and to invite comment from members. The purpose of the Part III booklets is to provide members with a much more detailed explanation of the management plans and systems of individual departments than is presented in the Blue Book. These program expenditure plans are prepared by and are the responsibility of the individual departments and are intended to provide members with additional assistance in their scrutiny of individual programs. The tables repeated in these volumes from the Blue Book have been verified by the Treasury Board Secretariat. I am working to a schedule which will see all departments submit their expenditure plans for the year 1985-86; in the interim, there will be an increase in the number tabled each year.

There has been considerable discussion in this House and in committees of the difficulties that members have in understanding the expenditure proposals of the government through reviews of the content of the Blue Book. As a former member of the Public Accounts Committee, I fully appreciate the problems involved. The Public Accounts Committee has conducted a thorough review of the government's proposals on the Estimates. As well, discussions on these documents took place with some 25 individual Members of Parliament. The recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee and the members have resulted in a number of changes to enable these expenditure plans to better meet Parliament's needs. In addition to these consultations and recommendations three distinguished former parliamentarians, the Hon. Otto Lang, James Gillies and Douglas Fisher, were invited to review last year's pilot projects and to offer their comments. I am most grateful for their co-operation. I would also like to thank all members of the House and others who have made such a constructive contribution to the development of these departmental expenditure plans. The tabling of the first ten plans today is indeed a landmark in the evolution of the accountability of government to Parliament, and as members will know, in keeping with the recommendations of the Lambert commission and the Auditor General, as well as the Public Accounts Committee itself. I believe that these program expenditure plans go far toward fulfilling the information needs of Parliament. As a cautionary point, it is also important that Members of Parliament recognize that additional improvements in the expenditure plans will occur over time. This is a major undertaking by individual departments, and thus will be developed over the next few years as underlying information systems and procedures are expanded or improved.

In the context of our consultation with hon. members, other options were explored for providing additional assistance in reviewing the estimates. Therefore, today I have also made available to hon. members a short "Guide to the Estimates". This document explains the nature of the current revisions to the estimates and briefly outlines the manner in which hon. members can obtain information through the various estimates documents.

I do want to emphasize the importance which this government attaches to the project being managed by the Comptroller General to improve the presentation of estimates to Parliament. This will help each and every hon. member of this House to carry out his or her fundamental and democratic responsibility of ensuring that taxes paid by Canadians will be used for the benefit of all Canadians. The preparation and tabling of Part I and a further stage of Part III, plus the "Guide to the Estimates", I believe, is tangible evidence of the effort this government is making to facilitate the carrying out of our parliamentary responsibilities. Our purpose is to provide full disclosure and to encourage rigorous scrutiny by all hon. members on behalf of the people of Canada.

I would now like to describe certain specific aspects of the information in these documents. First of all, may I point out that the updated expenditure plan to 1985-86, set out in Part I of the estimates, provides for the same total spending level in 1982-83 and future years as was envisaged by my colleague the Minister of Finance when he tabled his budget on November 12 last year. In other words, the estimates are entirely compatible with the information tabled by the Minister of Finance. The numbers set forth in the estimates are destined and designed to proceed upon the presumptions underlying that budget.

I would like to draw the attention of hon. members to two adjustments which must be made in reconciling the total estimates to the planned total spending level of $76.3 billion as set forth in the material of the Minister of Finance; that is to say, as set forth in the budget.

First, total estimates must be adjusted downward for repayment of loans from previous years which are not offset by new loans. The current estimate of these repayments is $480 million.

Second, since the government cannot legally spend more money than Parliament authorizes, and in fact always spends less, an adjustment for this lapse of expenditure authority must be made. The current projection of the lapse for the year 1982-83 is $1.23 billion.

I wish to emphasize to members that the expenditure plan reflects our intention to continue imposing a high degree of restraint on spending for the currently approved programs of the government. While recognizing the difficulties involved in making precise forecasts of costs for more than a year ahead, the Treasury Board's most recent review tends to indicate that it will take careful planning and determined management by all ministers and departments to carry out the operations of government within the limits of these envelopes. My colleagues are aware of the need for continued prudence and restraint in light of the particular difficulties and uncertainties facing us in the planning years beyond 1982-83.

And now, Madam Speaker, I would like to comment on the result of the $100 million reduction in overhead expenses of the government which was included as an item in the November budget. As part of the review leading up to these Main Estimates, every program of government was required to substantiate the price increases it has experienced over the past year. In many cases, these numbers were based on actual invoices or contracts for the provision of goods and services. However, it was felt that the operating costs of government should not be fully protected from the effects of inflation, and as a result, the price increases included in these Estimates have been substantially reduced from the levels that would otherwise have been allocated to departments. These reductions were applied to virtually all programs of government in order to effect savings in areas such as transportation and communication expenditures and in the purchase of materials and supplies. While these savings may not be significant in terms of total government spending, they are substantial in relation to those expenditures related to the overhead of government and reflect one additional measure in the continued struggle for efficiency and restraint.

[English]

The creation of the Canada Post Corporation has also had a significant impact on the level of resources that are being requested in the 1982-83 Main Estimates. As a department, the post office required appropriations in order to finance all of its operating and capital requirements with most of its revenue not being used to offset its expenditures. The 1981-82 Main Estimates included over $1.7 billion for this purpose. The government is only required to provide for Canada Post's net operating deficit, now that it is a Crown corporation and retains the postal revenues, and consequently no appropriation requirements are included in the 1982-83 Main Estimates. However, the total spending levels for 1982-83 included in the budget have a provision for a $400 million deficit, and Parliament will be asked to approve an item for this purpose through a supplementary estimate in 1982-83.

The comparisons between fiscal years included in Part I of the estimates have been adjusted to treat Canada Post as if it had always been a Crown corporation. The conversion to a Crown corporation has also had an effect on other aspects of the Main Estimates. As a Crown corporation, Canada Post is now required to pay for certain services which were previously provided without charge by other departments and, conversely, departmental appropriations must now include provision for services provided by the new corporation. The most significant example of this arrangement is the inclusion of $220 million in the arts and culture program of the Department of Communications for postal subsidies on cultural-related mailings that were previously calculated as part of the operating requirements of the old post office department.

In addition, the size of the public service has come to be measured by the number of person-years subject to Treasury Board control, and with the conversion to Crown corporation status the person-years of Canada Post are no longer considered in this category.

I would like to turn for a moment to this question of person-years. After making the adjustment for Canada Post and another similar technical modification, I am once again pleased to announce that, despite the continued pressure in the system for the provision of more and more services, growth in the size of the public service has been kept to less than 1 per cent. The 1982-83 Main Estimates provide for 255,322 person-years, which represents an increase of 2,152 or .8 per cent over the comparable figure for 1981-82.

One important perspective related to the growth in person-years that is often overlooked involves the fact that many of the government's services provided to the public are actually cost-recovered. The total direct costs associated with over 19,000 person-years are completely paid for by fees and charges resulting from activities provided to the public. Obviously, increased resources, including person-years, for services that are essentially cost-recoverable, should be treated differently from those that merely increase the general overhead of the government. In fact, a significant portion of some of the largest cost increases over the 1981-82 levels is recovered through the provision of services. Many of the 434 additional person-years for the RCMP will be used for policing at the detachment level which is recoverable through the recently renegotiated contracts with the provinces and municipalities. In the Department of Transport, almost one half of its total increase of 375 person-years will be used for air traffic control and systems that derive revenues from various sources related to the use of airports and Canada's airways.

It should also be pointed out that all operating and personnel costs are recovered for a further 20,000 person-years related to the administration of the Unemployment Insurance and the Canada Pension Plan programs.

[English]

Finally, I would like to point out that the 1982-83 Main Estimates do not reflect the recently announced reorganization which primarily affected the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Regional Economic Expansion and External Affairs. Quite simply, there has not been sufficient time to work out all of the adjustments that will be necessary. Once the details of the resource reallocations of the new department of regional industrial expansion, the enlarged responsibilities for External Affairs and the other adjustments have been finalized, Parliament will then be provided with an opportunity to review these proposals through a special 1982-83 supplementary estimate.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have talked to some of my colleagues on the other side and it seems there would be unanimous consent to allow me to deal with two procedural matters at this time. I thank my hon. colleague from Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the House leader from the Tory party who have agreed. I suppose my colleagues will have no objection. I will be very short.

If I am allowed, I would like to move the usual motion to refer to the appropriate standing committees the different estimates that were tabled today. I have circulated and given to the House leaders of the two parties copies of that long motion. There is a small correction. There is a vote, which is Public Works Vote L85, which had been omitted. It has now been added to this list.

Mr. Nielsen: Page?

Mr. Pinard: See "Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works". It should be on page three, the middle of the page; to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, just add "L85". That was a pure omission.

Therefore I would, pursuant to Standing Orders 58(14) and 59, move, seconded by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston):

That the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983, tabled earlier this day, be referred to the several Standing Committees of the House as follows:

I would ask that we dispense reading the long enumeration since the motion has been circulated.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): I have another point, Madam Speaker. In accordance with Standing Order 60(1), I wish to table a Notice of Ways and Means Motion to amend the Petroleum Administration Act.

In accordance with Standing Order 60(2), I also ask you to designate the order of the day necessary for the consideration of this ways and means motion.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, this is a very interesting day. I want to delve back into history just a little bit, if I might. The last estimates that were presented in this House of Commons by the Diefenbaker government in 1963 totalled $7 billion. At the beginning of the reign of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the estimates, which I have here in this little slim volume for 1968-69, totalled only $12.4 billion.

The estimates that we are dealing with today for the year 1982-83 which come in this large volume, which takes a healthy, well-fit man to carry around for more than twice the length of the Parliament Buildings, and that includes me, amount in total to $74.2 billion. That is a 500 per cent increase in government expenditures in that period of time, or an increase of approximately six times.

That ought to strike fear into the hearts of those who look at the state of the economy, the height of the interest rates and a host of other things in considering the government's record. The only people who can feel joyful and happy about that kind of increase are those who do not fear continuous government intervention in the economy. I would be the last to suggest that it could cease, but I would be the first to suggest that there has not been the appropriate watch placed on it, the pragmatic approach to government. As time goes on, given the policies of this government, I think one will see the continuation of that kind of increase in an equally short period of time.

I would like to pay tribute to my friend, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). It was the hon. member for York-Peel who, when he was president of the Treasury Board during the Clark government, brought into play in terms of government expenditures the envelope system for expenditure. It was something quite new in terms of expenditures.

What that system managed to do was to place responsibility for finding the wherewithal to fund government programs on ministers and departments which came up with those programs. That is putting it very simply, but I think very clearly. I am very pleased to see that that system is being carried on by the present government because it is sound. It is important that the public know where it began. It did not begin with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) who has just finished speaking. It began under the leadership in Treasury Board of the hon. member for York-Peel.

The second point that is important to remember is that all of these programs, the program expenditure plans of government, those ten programs which the President of Treasury Board referred to, came out of the work of the Public Accounts

Committee, chaired from time to time by members of the opposition parties. It was chaired for a period of time by the President of the Treasury Board, the member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), the member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) and a host of other people who brought forward those plans, drawing upon the learning and experience of Mr. Lambert and the fresh view of controlling expenditures which he and others like him have brought into government.

I am concerned about one aspect of the minister's statement, and I think it important that we set the record straight. If one takes the minister's statement, which I have in front of me, at face value, he said at page three:

> Based on the assumptions of the November budget, total forecast spending of $76.3 billion in 1982-83 is 11.7 per cent higher than the forecast for 1981-82.

That is dealing with forecasts, Madam Speaker. Those forecasts are wrong. In fact, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has refused to table forecasts or give any credence to forecasts—even the ones he has given in his own budget.

If anyone in the country believes that the total government expenditure in Canada will increase by only 11.7 per cent from the previous year, I suggest that they are wrong. The only solid basis on which to chart the increase in government expenditures is to go from Main Estimates to Main Estimates. If we take the figures from the Main Estimates we have just seen and relate them to the Main Estimates for the previous year, we find that the government expenditures in that area do not increase by only 11.7 per cent, they increase by 15 per cent. That is the first statement I would like to make.

The second matter I would like to point out is that from time to time the government has said that it would keep its rate of increase in government spending below the rate of inflation. That has not happened because although the rate of inflation is high enough in Canada, it is not 15 per cent. In that respect the estimates which have been tabled today do not fall within the content of former statements or statements of purpose. They fall by the wayside like so many other statements made by this government.

I will deal briefly with some items which I think people should know about. First is the item of advertising. The advertising program is up by 14 per cent from the previous year. It amounts to approximately $70 million. There is $1 billion yet to come in supplementary estimates to be tabled some time in March. Salaries and wages for public servants will have to be examined very closely because the numbers do not coincide with existing contracts or probable inflation. After adjusting for the post office changes, the total salaries from last year's Main Estimates to this year's Main Estimates are up only by 7 per cent in spite of an increase in the size of the public service. These figures do not add up. Inquiries will have to be made into that aspect.

According to these estimates, public debt charges are up by 14 per cent this year. Government borrowing accounted for 44 per cent of the money raised in the financial markets last year. Imagine the impact on interest rates if the government would reduce its level of borrowing. Can you imagine that impact, Madam Speaker, and what it would mean for home owners and small business people?

There has been no change in the estimated cost of servicing the public debt since the November budget. The government surely must know by now that its revenues will be less than it expects which will result in a larger debt and a larger debt service cost.

The figure for equalization in the estimates reveals quite a substantial increase over the 1981-82 figure. However, during today's briefing government officials told our officials that this represented a continuation of the existing formula, not the new Ontario standard which was proposed in the budget or the five provinces standard which was proposed during the first ministers' meetings. Also, the estimates for transfers to the provinces do not take into account the census estimates of revised population which may result in pay-backs for previous years for some provinces to Ottawa. So it becomes evident that there are many concerns.

I would like to remind the House of what Ray Buxton, President of the Canadian Real Estate Association, said in a statement on February 15 about the size of the government's borrowing and its impact upon interest rates. He said:

> The federal government could open the gates to more widespread home ownership if it reduced its heavy borrowings.

He estimated that this would reduce interest rates by 1½ per cent to 2 per cent:

> —thereby increasing the number of families who would qualify for mortgages.

There is nothing in the estimates, Madam Speaker, to attack the great problem of housing in Canada.

I do not want to be unkind to the minister but I do want to be truthful with him. There is a great deal of skepticism in Canada about the ability, and indeed the will, of the government to control its expenditures and act in a businesslike fashion. Recently the member for York-Peel brought a document to the public's attention which detailed improvidence in the government in the great computer caper. Improvidence in the government, Madam Speaker. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Gray) said that the government learned a lesson. They sure did and we sure paid for that lesson!

If we review the estimates, we see that the estimated cost of the Guy Favreau project in Montreal has jumped from $44 million to $83 million. Perhaps the President of the Treasury Board can indicate why there is such a leap. There has been a history of understating and overstating the estimates and the truth with regard to estimating programs, which has been, as far as Canadians are concerned, something completely different from the statement by the minister, whatever sugary language he manages to use.

You will remember that I raised in the House the report of the Auditor General. His report indicated that the net debt of the government is understated by $9 billion. For the first time in Canada's history there had to be a qualified certificate on the operations of the Canadian government. That is why we are somewhat skeptical about these pronouncements.

There have been some incredible examples revealed to us about the government's inability to manage the public's money. I have a couple of examples to illustrate our skepticism and wonder about these estimates, which make us want to examine them very, very closely. For example, there was $110,000 paid for metric cooking lessons. Two television chefs, Bruno Gerussi and Madame Benoit, have been given a six-week television contract worth $110,000 to promote metric cooking.

There is the case of interest free loans to Michael Phelps, the executive assistant to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). He has received two interest-free mortgages from Petro-Canada totalling $35,000. At current interest rates, the annual cost of these mortgages to taxpayers would be in the range of $6,000 to $7,000, even if they are justified or authorized in the first place. Another example are the cost overruns at Place du Portage, the C.D. Howe Building and the Montreal postal plant.

Do hon. members remember the JetStars? This is what makes me wonder about the government's honest intention to control expenditures.

Mr. Smith: The pilots live in Nepean-Carleton.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They do. That is how I heard about it. We could not believe that three ministers would fly in formation in three government JetStars to Winnipeg. It is a rerun of "The Captain of the Clouds" except it is no longer James Cagney in the starring role; it is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, with two other supporting roles. Is it any wonder there is some question about the whole process with which we are dealing?

However, I commend the government, and I believe the Public Accounts Committee did well. The Lambert commission on accountability did well in bringing about some changes in the process, but we are just half way there.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the minister took about 20 minutes, and I think I should have at least equal time.

Madam Speaker: I will give the hon. member equal time. The minister spoke for 17 minutes and I am willing to allow the hon. member 20, but that would be all. I am just signalling that the hon. member has three minutes left, if I do not give him 20 minutes.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I appreciate your consideration.

This minister is the same minister who is charged with the responsibility of bringing in legislation with respect to Crown corporations and accountability. The House has not seen that legislation yet. Two years ago the minister said he would be the master of regulatory reform. We have not seen any processes for regulatory reform. I know regulatory reform is being worked at by the bureaucracy, but it is not out here in public.

This is the government which two years ago said it was committed to openness of government so that people would know. Freedom of information was the watchword. Just a few days ago the round-heeled Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) was blown over by a blast of wind from the attorneys general. We are not likely to see freedom of information.

Let us look at the unanswered questions on the Order Paper with respect to government expenditures. The whole process of accountability will not work if it is the view of the government that the senior people in Crown corporations will not even have their salaries revealed. How can we judge their accountability? These are the things Mr. Lambert talked about, and if we are going to close the ring on expenditure management in government, we have to have some parliamentary reform. That was another watchword of the government two years ago, but there has not been one proposal.

When the minister is musing over the Blue Book, as thick as it has become, he should reread the last section of the Lambert report, which talks about improving the processes in Parliament so that the people of Canada, through their elected representatives, can find out what goes on within government. Until that is done no member of this House of Commons ought to be content with bland statements by the government or mere changes in the Blue Book process, as far-reaching as they are.

I urge the President of the Treasury Board to do his duty, light a fire under the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) and get him going, because we have a long way to go in order to complete the ring of accountability Mr. Lambert spoke about in his report.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to respond on behalf of the New Democratic Party as our Treasury Board critic and as a member of the Public Accounts Committee.

The revised form of the estimates has changed the package quite substantially since I became a Member of Parliament some two years ago. Originally the Blue Book was a very difficult document to understand. It was difficult for the Parliament of Canada to get a grasp on accountability for expenditures by the government, and I would like to compliment the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) and the office of the Comptroller General for making this package of documents much more understandable. It is now easier to get a grip on the expenditures of government or at least what its plans are.

I would not want the government to be satisfied with that, however. There are other improvements I think need to be made. An example which comes to mind is that the information on the plans and objectives of the government and the objectives of the different departments, the Blue Book and the guide with which to use it which make up the four parts of the revised form of estimates, must be consistent with the public accounts at the end of the year so that we can actually compare the results of the year's spending with the projections put out in the revised form of the estimates.

In talking about the estimates this year I have some confusion yet as to what the actual amount of the expenditures have been. According to fact sheet No. 1:

> Total forecast spending of $76.3 billion in 1982-83 is 11.7 per cent higher than the forecast for 1981-82.

According to fact sheet No. 4:

> The 1982-83 Main Estimates tabled today provide for $72,935 million in budgetary expenditures, an increase of $9,503 million or 15 per cent over the 1981-82 Main Estimates.

I suppose in terms of actual dollars, we are talking only about $4 billion, which may not be much in terms of federal government expenditures, but many Members of Parliament have a hard time grasping what is actually happening when there are contradictions like that. The information has to flow in a way which is a bit more fluid and consistent than has been the case up to this point in time.

As I say, progress has been made by the office of the Comptroller General under the direction of the President of the Treasury Board. It has been good up until now, but it must continue.

I am very concerned about the amount of spending which is being undertaken to service the public debt. The public debt accounts for some 23 per cent of the total expenditures placed before us today, and that is a phenomenal amount of money. I think about one dollar of every five raised in revenue goes back to servicing the public debt. I think repayment of the public debt is of great importance to Members of Parliament, but the government goes about the repayment of that debt in a strange way. I am concerned that responsibility for that public debt is being placed on the backs of provincial and municipal governments.

The total accumulated public debt brought about by this government is now about $81 billion, and this government is going to address the reduction of that debt by transferring certain responsibilities to provincial and municipal governments. Established programs financing comes to mind. Over the next five years those transfers to the provinces will be reduced by some $5.7 billion. There is evidence of the transfer of that responsibility. The community services contribution program was cut some 18 months ago, and that created a real hardship for many municipal governments across the country. With respect to policing costs, a heavier burden was placed on provincial and municipal governments, and that put the federal government in a better-looking financial position. Another part of this is that the federal government is trying to get away from statutory payments associated with the Crow rate.

The situation in relation to person-years is somewhat deceiving. The reduction of federal government person-years appears to be large. Some 60,000 or more jobs have been removed from the authority of the Treasury Board and transferred to Crown corporations, and this raises the very serious point to which the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) referred. There is a need for a Crown corporations act because more and more responsibility is being transferred from the authority of Parliament, and even away from the authority of the government to some extent. That responsibility is being assumed by Crown corporations. As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, the last I heard was that there were some 464 federal Crown corporations under the four different schedules A, B, C and D. This number is growing all the time.

Mr. Nielsen: We do not know how many there are.

Mr. Anguish: I suppose some of these might be called agencies which are set up in such a way that the federal government is a shareholder, but these agencies do not appear as Crown corporations and there is a real need for a Crown corporations act. We must establish whether Crown corporations are instruments of public policy. Do they reflect the wishes of the government and the wishes of Parliament, and how do we as parliamentarians scrutinize the activities of a large number of federal Crown corporations? More are being created all the time. Two new Crown corporations are being formed for the post office and the museums. It has been announced that $185 million will be spent on creating two new museums in order that artifacts which are presently deteriorating can be preserved. In fact, some reporters have called the museums a national disgrace.

I would not want to make a judgment on whether Crown corporations will be good or bad; time will tell. They will certainly not be accountable to the public, however, if the government keeps on the course it is embarked upon now.

I was shocked when the new chief executive officer of Canada Post appeared before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at a time when the Auditor General was also present. Testimony revealed that the Auditor General, along with a private firm, will be co-auditor of that particular Crown corporation for a two-year period. It also came out in evidence that a letter had been sent to the Auditor General by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I am paraphrasing somewhat but it was to the effect that the Auditor General should not expect to be reappointed as co-auditor to Canada Post when his two-year appointment expires.

I think that demonstrates that the government is interfering in the responsibility that parliamentarians have toward the great expenditures made on behalf of the Canadian taxpayer. There is provision for scrutiny of such expenditure by a Crown corporation. It makes the person-years of the government look good and it makes government expenditures look good, but we as parliamentarians do not know what is happening in many of the Crown corporations. We do not know whether they are instruments of public policy or whether they are embarked upon some course of their own. They may be doing a good job but then they may not, and we do not have access to the information that would allow us to make that judgment.

I urge the President of the Treasury Board to address the problem of the accessibility of information from Crown corporations. There should be an improvement in the amount of information that is available to parliamentarians so that they do not have to wrestle with the estimates, although I do agree that the package has been improved. The expenditure plans submitted by each department will be a great help. Until now opposition critics for certain departments or agencies of government only had the Blue Book to go by, but now an analysis is submitted by each department of its ojectives and goals for the coming year. That information will be very useful to the critics in the official opposition and in the New Democratic Party.

I would ask the President of the Treasury Board to consider well the comments and recommendations made by Members of Parliament. I hope that in days to come we will not be deceived by the information we receive. Perhaps I can hope for a Crown corporations act so that the Auditor General, who is really an officer of Parliament, can act on our behalf and give us information on money being spent out of the public purse. I do not believe we have full control of the public purse yet but the more information we have, the better chance we have of getting it under control.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I gather that the convention is that Members of Parliament with questions for the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) are entitled to ask them following the statements.

I have a question for the minister regarding the information he tabled in the House about the advertising management service. I am perplexed by the figures which indicate that in the fiscal year 1979-80 the government spent roughly $35 million on advertising and that this will grow to roughly $70 million this year which, according to the minister, is an increase of some 14.8 per cent over last year.

When I had responsibility for Treasury Board my information indicated that in 1979-80 the government spent between $64 million and $65 million. Is the minister prepared to table a breakdown of both the $35 million figure for 1979-80 and the $70 million figure for this year? It is more likely that the figure will be over $100 million if the same criteria are used.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I do not have that information for the House at the moment. In any event, the hon. member will have ample opportunity in committee to examine any number of issues which arise in the estimates. Specific departments can be dealt with in detail.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister is aware that questions about government expenditures on advertising have been on the Order Paper in my name for over a year and a half. To date they have not been answered. As well, I wonder if the minister is aware that last fall when I put questions to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) on his estimates in committee requesting a breakdown of the advertising budget, the information was promised but has not been forthcoming. If we cannot get it in that context, then will the President of the Treasury Board undertake to provide Parliament with the information that is requested?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, it is not the function of the President of the Treasury Board to answer all questions with respect to the spending of various departments, whether they are questions on the Order Paper or are questions asked in committee. I will be pleased to raise the hon. member's question with the Minister of Supply and Services.

Mr. Beatty: I should like to ask the minister about another aspect of his responsibilities. My colleague, the critic for Treasury Board, noted that for two years the minister has been incapable of coming to Parliament for legislation to improve the financial control and accountability of Crown corporations, notwithstanding the fact that in the brief nine months the Clark government was in office such legislation was tabled in the House. On numerous occasions the minister had indicated that he intended to take urgent action to present such legislastion to Parliament. This relates directly to his responsibility and to control of expenditures in the estimates for those Crown corporations. Can he tell the House why he has failed so dismally to keep the commitment that he made to the House, and will he indicate when he will keep it?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's interest in Crown corporations. I share with him and with all hon. members a concern about the accountability of what has grown to be a very large part of the public sector. Bill C-27 was tabled, as you will recall. I have stated in the House a number of times that it contained a number of defects which were pointed out by heads of Crown corporations, officials in departments, people outside government, the audit community and others. As a result, we have undertaken a very extensive review of the legislation with a view to better achieving accountability, direction and control of Crown corporations.

Because of the assets involved, however, and because of the ongoing impact of this legislation or the reorganization that we may introduce to accomplish the specific purposes which I am sure we all share, I have not been able to put every matter to rest. I can assure the hon. member, however, that a great deal of progress has been made and I hope that in the near term action will be taken with respect to the whole area of control, direction and accountability of Crown corporations. I know this matter is of great concern to him, as it is to me.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, it is two years since the minister was appointed and he has given those assurances on several occasions during the time. I wonder if he could give us a time frame today—to the nearest month even—on when he will introduce that legislation.

I wonder if the minister would also confirm to the House that he was called by the Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Michael Pitfield, last fall and instructed that the project was dead and that it was only after that, in discussions with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that he was able to resurrect it.

Can he pin down to the nearest month when he will introduce that legislation, and will he keep the commitment this time?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, usually the hon. member's information, via brown envelopes or otherwise, is somewhat more accurate than the ridiculous declaration he has made to the House. The project is far from dead. It is one of continuing and great concern to the Prime Minister. After all, back in 1976 it was the Privy Council that developed what I believe was called the blue paper at that time with respect to Crown corporations. Everything I have said in the past stands; the commitments stand, the concern stands and action is being taken.

I would expect hon. members to recognize, however, that this House has had a fairly heavily charged scheduled of activity in the past year that I have been in this portfolio. That does not detract in any way from the importance of the Crown corporation legislation. Great progress had been made and I hope that when action is taken I will have the full co-operation of the hon. member to put through the House the legislation that is necessary to establish the direction, accountability and control that we all want.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, let me in my last question ask the minister, if he will not pin it down to the nearest month, whether he will commit himself to the House to introduce that legislation before summer. If he will not do so, will he give the House the commitment that the legislation will be introduced this year, in 1982?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, commitments can only be as effective as is the House in dealing with legislation when it is brought down. The most I can say to the hon. member today is that I am anxious to proceed with this matter as soon as possible. If it is within a month I would be delighted; if it is within several months I would still be delighted. I certainly hope it is within the time frame of which the hon. member is speaking, but I refuse to stand in the House at this point to say that we will have this legislation by June 1, July 1 or April 1. The fact is that we are moving ahead steadily with it, and I hope to have further announcements to make in the very near term.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have great difficulty understanding how a minister can rise in his place and give an answer such as the one the President of the Treasury Board just gave respecting a matter which has been outstanding for two years.

Also the government indicated that it is generally in favour of the report of the Lambert commission on accountability of government. In that report there are provisions whereby Mr. Lambert and his colleagues recommended that committees of the House of Commons have tabled before them on an automatic basis the reports of all Crown corporations, agencies and departments of government, that they be given complete scope in order to examine the operations of government, and that it would be an appropriate arrangement for parliamentary reform.

As the minister responsible for the Lambert report, what is his view with respect to that provision? What advice is he giving to the President of the Privy Council, if he can tell me, respecting the parliamentary reform package which was promised for an equally long time by the government and has yet to see the light of day?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, let me clarify my mandate. I am the minister responsible for co-ordinating the government's response to the report of the Lambert commission. I have already tabled in the House a publication entitled "Accountable Management", with respect to which I received some very complimentary comments from the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, for which I thank him. I know he recognizes that we have made enormous progress in a wide variety of areas across government in achieving the kind of accountability which Mr. Lambert and commission members suggested and recommended. We have also moved ahead in the personnel field or in the area of human resource management pursuant to the report of the D'Avignon Committee. All of this was pulled together in the publication "Accountable Management", with which the hon. member is familiar.

In addition, during my budget speech back in November I updated the House on where we were with respect to various outstanding issues concerning the responses to Lambert and D'Avignon. I agree with the hon. member that there is a further area which must be addressed. I look forward to hearing his contributions in the House with respect to the issue of parliamentary reform which is within the jurisdiction of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). He and I have discussed the issue of parliamentary reform and will continue to discuss it. I believe the minister indicated the other day that he would be bringing forward some proposals and that he had already undertaken some discussions with the other House leaders respecting the question of parliamentary reform. I share the desire of the hon. member to close the loop of accountability which he mentioned earlier this afternoon.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have one further question. As co-ordinating minister, would he tell the House what advice he tendered to the President of the Privy Council concerning the questions of closing the loop and changes in parliamentary practice which were envisaged by Lambert and many others? As the minister knows, I have filed a paper which dealt with the question of committee reform. What is his attitude, as a member of government, to the recommendations of the Lambert commission? What is he doing about them as the co-ordinating minister in terms of the advice he is tendering to his colleage?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, cabinet colleagues give each other advice on a daily basis, which clearly is not a matter for public debate. Exchanges between privy councillors and cabinet are not something which I am about to reveal or declare in the House of Commons. I am certain the President of the Privy Council will be coming forward, in due course, with an expression of his views and the views of government on the subject.

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board concerning the $5.7 billion reduction in the established programs financing to provincial governments over the next five years. The 1982 report of the Economic Council of Canada entitled "Financing Confederation" indicated that the council sees little merit in reductions in federal-provincial transfers which would, in effect, merely shift part of the burden of a declining federal deficit to less fortunate provincial governments.

Also I should like to refer to the report of the task force on federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, which reads in part:

> We are agreed that the programs examined in the course of our work are serving vital social needs and merit undiminished support. Over-all funding of these programs should, in our view, be maintained at no less than current levels.

Did the President of the Treasury Board take any of this information under advisement before giving approval to the estimates for this year and the coming year? It seems as if he has totally looked away from it.

Also I should like to refer to the report of the task force on regulatory reform. I sat as a member of the task force and we have heard nothing about its recommendations. What does the minister do with the information recommended to Treasury Board? He so often overlooks it or seemingly does nothing with it.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I take any advice we receive in Treasury Board, which falls within matters of my jurisdiction, most seriously. I hope hon. members recognize the extent to which Treasury Board has responded by preparing a new form of the estimates, and a guide for the estimates, in tabling "Accountable Management", and in keeping members informed of the wide variety of reforms which have taken place across government over the last several years.

With respect to established program financing, the estimates are designed to reflect the policy and financial requirements stated by the Minister of Finance when he tabled the budget on November 12, 1981. It is not for the estimates to change the policy established by the Department of Finance. The estimates simply reflect the policy for 1982, 1983 and ongoing years.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) concerning the western development fund. Almost a year ago when he tabled his estimates, I had an opportunity to ask him what moneys were allocated in the estimates for the fund and, without becoming specific, what kinds of programs we could look forward to if there were supplementary estimates to take care of moneys allocated under the fund. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) referred to it. Recently the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) announced in Winnipeg that some $1.35 billion would be made available over the next four years to finance some additional rail capacity. Could the minister give us some idea whether that money will be made available from the western development fund? What other programs can we look forward to and advise our constituents of, so that they may apply and make use of the western development fund?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, again that is not an appropriate subject for me to respond to in tabling the Main Estimates of the government for the year 1982-83. The expenditure plan in Part I sets forth various envelope levels. It is clear that there are policy reserves in each of the ongoing years, but the hon. member will simply have to await announcements by responsible ministers as time evolves.

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a more general question. A year ago he replied to me by saying that $2 billion in total over a period of three years to 1983-84 would be made available under the western development fund. Also a year ago he mentioned that $350 million will be brought forward through supplementary estimates. Could he give figures this year similar to the ones he provided last year, so that we have some idea what level of expenditure the government plans on using through the western development fund and at least some idea of the broad-brush expenditures the government plans as far as the western development fund is concerned?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I repeat my earlier answer. I think this is a matter which should be addressed by the responsible minister. The hon. member will have ample opportunity to question the responsible minister both in committee and in the House, whether it be the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) or the other ministers who are charged with these areas within their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, I have another general question. First, has the minister allowed for any expenditures in his estimates as far as the western development fund is concerned? Could the minister also give us some idea which ministers will be bringing forward supplementary estimates which would provide for the expenditure of funds under the western development fund, if in fact such a fund exists?

[Translation]

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I cannot go on repeating myself all afternoon. It seems to me it is obvious that there are ministers with responsibility for other economic sectors and, therefore, I have no intention of giving a detailed analysis of expenditures in areas that fall under the jurisdiction of my colleagues.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have two questions for the minister. Having taken a quick glance through the estimates which have just been tabled, I notice that there are a number of references to items referring to accommodation provided by the Department of Public Works. How far into the revenue dependency plan is the government? Is the plan wholly implemented as yet? If not, how far along the road has the government proceeded? When might we see the completion of the full implementation of revenue dependency so that we will see reflected in the estimates the cost of accommodation provided to the various departments of government by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I can understand the hon. member's interest, being a former minister of public works. I trust and hope that he is supportive of the principle of revenue dependency. As hon. members will recall, my colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) and I announced last year the experiment in revenue dependency in the Department of Public Works, which was a simulated model. In order to establish a means whereby revenue dependency could be made to work in the area of the Department of Public Works accommodation, a simulated model was established opposite the other departments. I understand from my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, that we would hope to see the results of that simulated model some time in spring, 1982.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, the minister may be assured that I am indeed an ardent supporter of the theory of revenue dependency. I would like to see it implemented as quickly as possible because it will do nothing but increase efficiency in government and effect cost savings.

My second question has to do with the retionalization of real property services, which is a matter fairly closely allied to the first question. As the President of the Treasury Board is aware—and I see his colleague the Minister of Public Works sitting beside him—Canada's Department of Public Works is probably the biggest landlord in the world with well over $40 billion of property, real and other, in its list of assets. Indeed, I always thought it rather disgraceful that the Government of Canada was not able to ascertain with any accuracy just what the precise value was of the property it did own.

When is it anticipated, if at all, that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) will be submitting a proposal to cabinet, which would at least commence an experiment in or bring about a program for the rationalization of real property services in the Government of Canada?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. member that again he has touched upon a matter that we regard as a very high priority in terms of the management of government assets. Proposals have been brought forward for cabinet consideration in that area. I am also advised that if the government could obtain some co-operation from the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), as opposition House leader, with respect to Bill C-91, which facilitates the use by the government of certain techniques in terms of asset management, such as lease purchase agreements and so on, which in many instances are in the interests of Canadian taxpayers at large, that, in turn, would give a real boost to our efforts in that direction, and we look forward to his co-operation.

Mr. Cosgrove: We must have his agreement.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, the minister will certainly get all the co-operation he deserves, certainly as much co-operation that he and his colleagues provided us during the closing months of 1979 when they took seven and a half days to debate the mortgage interest credit legislation that we put forward. I believe we have been on Bill C-78 for three or three and a half days now. Certainly the minister will get that kind of co-operation. If I can have the attention of the President of the Treasury Board for a moment, he said, if I heard him correctly, that such a proposal for the rationalization of real property was being put forward or was being considered. Am I to understand it is in fact being considered at cabinet level at this time?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, a great deal of work has been done in the area. It has been considered by cabinet colleagues.

Mr. Nielsen: It has or has not?

Mr. Johnston: It has been considered by cabinet colleagues. It is a matter that affects not only the Department of Public Works, as the hon. member knows, but also a large number of real property assets which are held in departments other than the Department of Public Works. I am sure the hon. member for Yukon is aware of assets that are held in such departments as the Department of National Defence, for example. I can assure this House that we are very much cognizant of the necessity for and the desirability of having better asset management across government and better utilization of those resources.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I have one brief comment. As the Minister of Public Works will know, I would assure the President of the Treasury Board of the full support of this party in the implementation of that kind of program, which might perhaps fill the great gap that is left in the Department of Public Works now that the post office has left under the aegis of a new Crown corporation. It would give the department a challenge and keep them busy as nothing else would.

Madam Speaker: This question period has gone on for quite a while. I will recognize two members who have not yet had a chance to put a question. I would ask the hon. members not to go beyond two questions because this session is really being prolonged.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I want to follow along on the questions asked by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) regarding the western development fund. My understanding is that the estimates are indicative of all the money being spent by the government in this particular year. I have looked in vain for any mention of the western development fund. Could the minister please advise me where I might find the western development fund in the estimates right now?

Mr. Waddell: Dire straits.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) will not find any specific item in the Main Estimates entitled western development fund. Perhaps I could take a moment to explain how these estimates are made up as against the expenditure plan.

Mr. Waddell: Tell us about the western development fund.

Mr. Johnston: If one looks at the chart on page 7 in Part I of the government expenditure plan, one will see that the total outlays predicted for 1982-1983 are $76.3 billion. On the other hand, total estimates, in other words the estimates that appear in the book, are considerably less than that, namely $74.1 billion. This number of $76.3 billion is the estimated total outward expenditure after providing for reserves and for the customary lapse, which, as I recall, is estimated in 1982-83 to be something in the neighbourhood of $1.23 billion. So there is an area in there, Madam Speaker, with respect to policy reserves. When programs are brought forward and announced by ministers which do not appear in the Main Estimates, I will be bringing forward on their behalf, supplementary estimates detailing the appropriations required to support those programs.

Mr. Hovdebo: That is very much a smokescreen, Madam Speaker. The western development fund is a mirage. The minister's officials explained very carefully to us exactly what the extra reserves were for. They are not for long-budgeted items such as the western development fund, so that smokescreen type of explanation does not follow the minister's officials' position.

I would like to know whether it is possible to move moneys into the western development fund. Is that the process, or is it just a mirage? Could he tell us exactly what the western development fund is since it was budgeted so long ago?

[Translation]

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, there is not much that I would add to the answers I have already given on the subject. Obviously there is a margin, there is a reserve, there are programs that will be tabled here in the House by our colleagues—I am here today to answer questions on the estimates. I have not mentioned the western development fund in my speech nor in my comments nor in the analysis I have given in the House today. I should like such questions to be put to my colleagues who are responsible for such matters.

[English]

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I have listened to my colleague the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) trying to find out about a matter which has been touted and promised by the Liberal government ever since the last Speech from the Throne. To then find out that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) does not even know what the western development fund is all about is a matter which causes a lot of concern and chagrin to those of us in western Canada.

The only question I want to ask the minister is if he would confirm—this will, of course, get a great laugh across western Canada—that there is nothing in the current estimates dealing with the western development fund as such.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, it is not a question of confirming that there is nothing in the current estimates regarding that fund. The estimates are there for programs and for the ongoing operations of the government. They are divided into the voted programs and statutory programs. The Main Estimates are deposited to be referred to committee and will subsequently be the subject of an appropriation bill in this House. The hon. member will have ample opportunity to examine those programs in committee.

As I pointed out, the estimates are only part of the over-all expenditure plan which provides for reserves, for programs such as the western development fund, which programs, whatever the details may be, will be announced in due course by the responsible ministers. They will be the subject of supplementary estimates, and the hon. member, who has been in this House a great deal longer than I have, will then know that he can in turn go back to the responsible minister, examine him in committee, and in turn the programs will be the subject of further appropriation bills in this House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What concerns me, Madam Speaker, is that the last time the minister tabled the Main Estimates there was a provision for $350 million for the western development fund. That has evaporated. Yet we have had statements by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) that this in fact will be forthcoming and is a firm commitment of the government.

I would simply make the comment that the government has again failed western Canada and it is no wonder the Liberals are doing so poorly politically out there.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I can understand the hon. member playing politics when the President of the Treasury Board responds to questions on the estimates, but surely any objective assessment of the programs committed to during the last two years by this government to western Canada development is enough to allay the fears of any westerner that the government is not committed to western programs.

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following question will be answered today: No. 3,483.

[Text]

STUDIES OF MARINE MAMMAL POPULATION

Were any studies done which established a scientific basis for the contention that an increase in marine mammal population would damage over-all fish production and, if so, what were the names and who were the authors of the studies?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): A scientific consultation on marine mammals convened by the United Nations Environment Program (UNEP) and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) in Bergen, Norway in 1976 agreed that interactions of various kinds between marine mammals and fisheries were significantly affecting some sea fisheries; mostly adversely, apparently. A subsequent review of this matter by the IUCN interim committee on marine mammals led to the holding of a workshop on marine mammal/fishery interactions held at La Jolla, California in 1981.

This workshop, attended by eminent specialists from the U.S.A., Canada, Great Britain, Italy, Australia, Norway and the U.S.S.R., considered several aspects of the biotic and other interactions between marine mammals and fisheries, with emphasis on fisheries of commercial importance.

Studies and case histories considered under those aspects which would result in damage to over-all fish production are listed below:

Loss of fish production through damage to the catch, to gear, or through interference with the catching efficiency of fishing gear:

Losses to Canadian Atlantic herring and cod production attributable to whales, were reported on by E. D. Mitchell, P. F. Brodie, J. Lien, B. R. Mate, also in: Mate, Bruce R. 1980.—NTIS report to the Marine Mammal Commission PB80-175144, 48pp.

Losses and net damage on the west coast due to sea lions were reported in:

Matkin and Fay. 1980. Report to the Marine Mammal Commission 78/07. 71 pp.

Losses and gear damage attributable to harbour seals, harp seals and grey seals on the American west coast and on both sides of the Atlantic were reported on by:

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Smith: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I want to raise a point of order concerning the answering of questions on the Order Paper. Some questions have been on the Order Paper for eight to ten months, with a great many having been there longer than six months. Some of them are quite simple and could be answered with little or no effort. It is obvious to me, in looking at the Order Paper, that there are a great many questions which the government has made no effort to obtain answers to. In my submission this can only be by deliberate intention since in the normal course they would be answered automatically.

My colleague the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) referred to the difficulty opposition members have in getting information out of the government. The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) referred to his inability to get information from officials in committee and ministers in the House. The result is, Madam Speaker, that the practice of putting questions on the Order Paper is rapidly becoming a time consuming and rather pointless exercise. The fact is that there are close to 250 pages of unanswered questions on the Order Paper after a session which has gone on for more than 280 days. In fact, there has only been one session longer than this one. It is an indication and an indictment of the government's indifference and arrogance with regard to this institution and the rights and privileges of its members.

If the government, Madam Speaker, does not intend to answer questions on the Order Paper, such as the one the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) has had on for five years and God knows how many weeks and days, if it intends to treat Parliament with such indifference and contempt, then there is little point in putting questions on an Order Paper which grows every Monday.

In my submission, this is something, which hon. members will have to take under advisement. I am not quite sure what the government is trying to do here. Many Canadians are wondering about that. I know we are not here to go through futile exercises at the behest of a government which is in one of its longest sessions on record and has very little to show for the time that it has spent.

I make the point that if it is the government's policy not to answer questions on the Order Paper, or only to answer the ones with which it is comfortable and which will not embarrass it, then there is little or no point in carrying on with the practice. Perhaps it will be necessary that we have recourse through orders of the House for everything we get. These have already reached an unprecedented number of unfilled orders. If we continue in that way, we may have to seek an opinion from the House on this government's laxity and its contemp of the institution.

It is not surprising that a government which cannot bring down a budget cannot answer questions. That does not surprise me at all. The House is entitled to know whether or not this policy of inaction is a deliberate policy, whether it will continue, or whether hon. members can look forward to receiving answers within a reasonable time limit of a week or two instead of six or seven months or, indeed more than five years.

There was a time when hon. members could indicate the importance of a question by placing an asterisk beside it, a starred question. That practice has fallen into disuse, because it is being ignored by the government. Hon. members placed a star beside a question to indicate its urgency and to require an oral answer. At one time that was a respected practice of this House.

It does no good for the parliamentary secretary to tell us how well he has done in answering over 2,000 questions. The fact is that since this practice commenced, the number of hon. members of this House has substantially grown. That is one of the reasons more questions are being asked.

Another reason more questions are being asked is this government's obsession with secrecy and its resistance to providing information of any kind to hon. members. If this continues much longer, we in the opposition will have no recourse but to ask that Your Honour exercise your discretion in favour of upholding the rights of hon. members, and to entertain with favour a question of privilege which will have to be posed if we are to be continually refused by the governement. The whole matter will have to be referred either to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, or to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, because the logjam must be broken. The government must change its attitude and adopt one of providing information to the people of Canada, through their representatives on all sides of this House, to which they are entitled.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I happen to think that the alleged point of order which the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has just raised is totally spurious.

A couple of facts should be pointed out. First of all, as of today the government has answered over 2,793 questions, taking considerable time and at considerable expense to the government. For example, today the answers to two questions were made orders for returns because the answers were so voluminous that they were each about one and one half inches thick. The compilation of the answers took a considerable amount of time, and all of those questions were placed by members of the official opposition.

The hon. member said that the practice of answering starred questions in the House has fallen into disuse. That is not correct. Since the House returned from the recess, a couple of questions have been answered—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Smith: —which were starred.

Mr. Nielsen: At least two!

Mr. Smith: Well, we only answer ones which are starred, to begin with.

With regard to the hon. member's comments as to what constitutes a reasonable period of time, of course, the previous government, the Clark government, was in office for over nine months. With regard to the question placed on the Order Paper, I believe No. 30, standing in the name of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt), that question was not answered by the Tory government either, even though it was in office for a period of nine months.

Mr. Nielsen: This government has been in for two years.

Mr. Smith: Therefore, I suppose it is a rhetorical question to ask what is a reasonable period of time. It depends on the nature and complexity of the question asked.

Madam Speaker: Before the hon. member raises a question of privilege on this particular question, I will read a quotation from Beauchesne's fifth edition, Citation 363, whereby it is very clearly stated that in no way can the Chair oblige a minister to answer a question. That also applies, of course, to the questions on the Order Paper. Citation 363 states:

(1) A minister may decline to answer a question without stating the reason for his refusal, and insistence on an answer is out of order, with no debate being allowed. A refusal to answer cannot be raised as a question of privilege, nor is it regular to comment upon such a refusal. A member may put a question but has no right to insist upon an answer.

That is quite clear. Answers to questions are left to the initiative of ministers and the government, and the Chair can in no way help the hon. member to insist upon a reply.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, let me make it quite clear. I was not, I repeat not, asking the Chair to insist on an answer to a question being given. I was not asking that at all; nor was I insisting that members have a right to have ministers reply. I was merely raising the point to focus attention on the abuse—

Mr. Smith: Abuse?

Mr. Nielsen: —which has been the long-standing practice in the House with respect to the answering of written questions which, I submit, are treated quite differently from oral questions.

I simply flag the matter now. It may well be, Madam Speaker, that it will meet with your pleasure if I can frame a motion in such a way that the matter could be examined by one of the standing committees. Because if we are not going to receive answers to these questions, why should we burden the taxpayer with the expense of printing a huge Order Paper comprising several hundred pages every Monday when we could at least save this cost? All the government has to do is to come clean and say that it will not answer questions which tend to be embarrassing to it or to any members of the cabinet, if that is to be the government's policy.

Madam Speaker: Just in case the hon. member does pursue what he announced in his statement, that is to say, that he might raise a question of privilege concerning this matter, I just warn the hon. member this may not be the subject of a question of privilege.

Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

The House resumed from Monday, February 22, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-89, to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, last evening I put forward what I considered to be a fundamental proposal to the minister that treatment be given to people who want to own homes or those who rent which is equal in benefit to what I think the farmers will get under a previous bill. I say, by way of background to what I said last night, that what we are really discussing is interest rates. It is my view, I believe I can substantiate on a quantitative basis, that the biggest cost-push inflation today is the long-term interest rate. This primarily applies to housing, for probably several hundred million dollars are out at any given time. Actually, it amounts to billions. I would like to repeat what I said yesterday so that it is absolutely clear to the whole House and, hopefully, to the country, namely, that there is a way out of this problem.

We should put ourselves into the shoes of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. For a year he has been pleading with the federal government to do something on the fiscal side on interest rates, because he knows that those interest rates are destroying the very industrial and economic fabric of the country. The human suffering is uncountable. However, he feels constrained by the fact that he is trying to play the game of international monetary matters in order to protect Canada as well as he can. Therefore, he must ask the government to take the lead.

A year ago people on this side of the House put forward a series of proposals as to how this could be done without costing the government anything. We put these proposals forward in connection with the Farm Credit Corporation, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation on housing, the export agency and the small business agency. It we took those sectors of our economy and used the principles of the Small Business Development Bond and other principles, we could get interest rates down on these long-term ventures that we need for the development of our country to about half without any cost to the Government of Canada and without interfering with the Governor of the Bank of Canada in the international monetary crap game that he is in.

I want to conclude by saying that Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, although as I mentioned last night it has made a lot of mistakes, has a distinguished record of accomplishments on the research side and in providing help to get a lot of types of homes and shelters for the people of Canada. I want this agency to have the same privileges under this government that this Parliament is giving to agriculture.

I want to repeat this again for the sake of those members who were not here last night. In Bill C-88, which precedes Bill C-89, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was able to get in this clause with the consent of cabinet. Parliament approved it and it is now in committee. I will read it again. Referring to the Farm Credit Corporation, Clause 13(1) reads:

> The corporation may, with the approval of the Minister of Finance, borrow money by any means, including issuing and selling bonds, debentures, notes and other evidences of indebtedness of the Corporation.

In addition, I am going to read the third section under this amendment in Clause 8, Section 13(3):

> The aggregate amount outstanding of the principal of amounts borrowed by the corporation pursuant to Subsection (1) and the principal of loans made to the corporation under subsection (2) shall not at any time exceed twenty-five times the capital of the corporation.

I say to the minister, in God's name stand up and fight for these people who want shelter, give them the same rights to get it as we are putting into the hands of the Farm Credit Corporation, and put that under Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I know that in agriculture we have constitutional rights in all parts of Canada that we do not have in housing; but under this legislation now before us, Bill C-89, Canada Mortgage and Housing can deal as a corporation with provincial agencies, municipalities and local groups. They are smart enough in that corporation to realize that they, too, can become just like a bank, credit union or trust company and get money into the hands of those who need it at half interest rates and no one loses. We do not interefere with any other policy.

I think I have made my point as clearly as I possibly can. The opportunity is there. We cannot move the amendment at second reading, but the minister or any person can move word for word this whole section that we have in the previous bill and then leave it to Canada Mortgage and Housing to figure out how this "by any means" can be accomplished.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester): Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat unique that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) who just resumed his seat and I both entered this chamber in 1957.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A vintage year.

Mr. Coates: During that 25 years, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain has come up with many ingenious schemes which have stimulated his chosen field of agriculture in particular and have been of tremendous benefit to the farming community of Canada and the nation as a whole. When he makes suggestions to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) relating to ways and means of assisting individual Canadians to own a home at reasonable mortgage rates, he is putting forward a scheme that has been tried and proven to be effective, especially in the United States.

I know that in the state of New York, the power authority of the state of New York has been raising money since the days of Franklin Delano Roosevelt through bonds that provide interest rates which are non-taxable. This has proven a godsend to that authority and to those people living in the state of New York. They have been able to enjoy the benefits of power at rates probably better than anywhere else in that country as a result of this special type of scheme.

When we look at our country today, we think of the terrible calamity that has fallen upon people because governments, certainly since World War II, have attempted to make Canadians believe they have a right to own a home. It was a right, not a special privilege. It was part of what we knew after World War II as the reawakening and rebuilding of our country, its coming into its own.

The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) pointed out in his speech last night that for a very significant period after World War II Canadians could point to the way we were moving up in the world and what was available to us in material wealth. It was the envy of the whole world. It is one reason we became so attractive to many people who came to our shores from other parts of the world. They chose Canada as their land for today and tomorrow. They saw here potential opportunities that did not exist anywhere else in the world, including the United States, so they came here.

Government after government convinced those people as they went out, worked and earned their living that they had a right to a home, a right to expect that governments would put into place the infrastructure to allow them to own homes. I can think of a number of times over the past 25 years that governments in this country have used the housing industry by convincing Canadians with one scheme or another to invest their savings in a home for the future. To get them to invest their savings, they came up with all kinds of special deals, including the most recent AHOP program, one of the worst travesties that could have been imposed on individual Canadians. We led them right down the garden path.

At that time we wanted to meet the required number of building starts to keep our economy functioning. What we did to individual Canadians, we are reaping a whirlwind from today. I do not blame this Minister of Public Works or this government. I am blaming the philosophy that Canadians have a right to a home, a right which has been perpetuated among Canadians.

Suddenly we are withdrawing that philosophy and telling Canadians that they do not have a right to own a home. The government is telling them that it is too bad if they have overinvested in a home which its policy five years ago convinced them to buy. It is part of the malaise which exists in Canada today.

Today, people are trying to understand what Canada is about. They are realizing that it is not the country which it was five or ten years ago. I like to use the year 1967 as an example because it was our centennial. It was a time when the nation was becoming united and working together to feel pride in Canada. I would like to believe that Canadians had a cocky confidence about Canada in 1967 and its future. At that time Canadians thought of the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he said that the second half of the twentieth century belonged to Canada.

Well, it is not the same Canada as it was in 1967. Canada has a sickness and I think the personification of that sickness lies in programs such as our present housing policy. The fact that the government and we, as politicians, are not able to solve a problem which we have brought upon ourselves, a problem which we caused when Canadians were told they had a right to own a home and a right to earn an income which would make houses affordable for future generations to own, forces us to solve that problem now. We cannot do it in a partisan or petty way or through the government developing a program which will only prolong a person's ability to pay only the interest on his mortgage without obtaining any equity, which is often the case now.

We not only have to design a policy for Canadians who are now committed to pay mortgages for the next ten years and are about to lose their homes; we must work out a system which will encourage young Canadians to purchase homes with the expectation of owning them without a fear of losing them in 40 years. Unfortunately, this legislation will not be the answer to any of these problems. Perhaps it is a small aid to a very limited number of people who are in trouble.

I recall the fall of 1979 when we were debating a bill which would have been a godsend to most Canadians who are in financial trouble today because of their mortgages. The New Democratic Party was opposed to this bill and the government was opposed to it. The only people who were not opposed to it were ordinary Canadians, the home owners and potential home owners of the future.

Mr. Waddell: It was a subsidy to the rich.

Mr. Coates: I am told by an hon. member from the NDP that it was a subsidy to the rich.

Mr. Waddell: You know that.

Mr. Coates: I will tell you what it was, Mr. Speaker. It was relief to those who need relief today and it would have provided the opportunity for today's Canadians to own a home tomorrow. That is what it was, no matter what garbage the NDP tries to put forward or pump out. The ordinary Canadian perceived that mortgage tax credit plan as just that, the hope to be able to own a home in the future.

As a politician, I am committed to this ideal. If Canada is to begin progressing again, we must first convince Canadians that they have a reason to invest in Canada. The best way to invest is to assure Canadians that they will be able to own a property or a home, because that is the backbone of Canada. The fact that Canadians who now own homes have little hope of retaining them and those who do not own homes have no hope of ever owning one is causing the sickness which is evident in Canada today.

Another very real problem Canada is saddled with today, which is also causing its sickness, is the breakup of the family unit. A great many of those divorces can be directly related to the interest rates being imposed on people who have mortgages. The entire scheme of mortgages has changed before their very eyes. Years ago when people bought homes, they knew they would be able to get a mortgage for 20 years. It was assumed that you would not buy a home until you knew that the payments were affordable and you could own it in 20 years. However, as government programs developed, those 20 years became 30 and the 30 years became 40 and then up to 50 years. There are no 20-year mortgages, 30-year mortgages or 50-year mortgages any more. The average Canadian home owner today must be able to keep their mortgage afloat for one year. At the end of that year they wonder if the mortgage company will alow them to renegotiate at an interest rate which is unknown to them.

In addition, these home owners are faced with having to pay a larger portion of their total income for the mortgage. You are at home talking to your wife—if you are talking—trying to figure out if you will make the car payment, the mortgage payment, buy food, or if you are able to do all three or any part of those three. Not only are people getting frustrated, they are becoming mentally sick. Now the government tells Canadians that it will freeze their wages, which will limit their income, while interest rates continue to rise—which the government will allow to happen—and the cost of living along with everything else will increase.

Married couples are breaking up because of the stress caused by the difficult economic situations in their homes. It is a sad event and in my view the only ones who are benefiting from this are the drug companies. More tranquilizers are being consumed. It is a sad, sad event. The only people I know of who are benefiting from all this are the drug companies. Probably more tranquilizers are being sold in this nation today than ever before and probably more booze is being sold in this nation than ever before, because all the sicknesses which go with a society which is in deep, deep trouble relate to the purchase of those kinds of commodities.

We parliamentarians are charged with a special responsibility to produce some stability in this country again. There is none right now, and while this bill will help some people and while I am quite willing to support it for whatever help it does provide, it is just a drop in the Atlantic Ocean. It will not really bring much solace to anyone, including those who will qualify under it, because a great many businessmen who have been good businessmen all their lives and have proved themselves to be good businessmen are finding that their backs are to the wall and they are facing either closing their doors, or bankruptcy if they keep them open. This is not because of anything they are doing but because of the interest rate problem. They can no longer deal with it and they can no longer survive.

I have before me a chart showing average conventional mortgage interest rates. They have escalated since January, 1978, when the interest rate was 10.32 per cent, to 21.46 per cent in, for instance, September, 1981. We cannot expect people to move forward or even to have any confidence about paying next month's mortgage bills if they know they will lose their homes in five months' time regardless of what they do.

Somehow we must develop a method by which Canadians can see a light at the end of the tunnel. Canadians are not expecting us to produce all the solutions tomorrow, but they are expecting us to give them some realistic leadership and direction to get them out of the mess into which we put them in the first place. I do not see very much coming before us in this session of Parliament which would achieve that objective.

I have great personal respect for the Minister of Public works. During the critical period when all of a sudden people saw for the first time the terrible personal tragedies they were facing in renewing mortgages at probably double the rate of interest they had formerly been paying, I think the minister attempted in his own way to be of some assistance. However, he is a very small cog in a very big wheel and, unfortunately, I must say that this bill is an indication of just how small the cog in that big wheel is.

We must get a great deal more from this government, and we must do it for many basic reasons. We must allow individual Canadians to feel that there is some hope for tomorrow and that we have policies which will meet their hopes and aspirations.

Second, we must try to achieve something here so that we can eliminate, as much as we possibly can, the marriage breakdown syndrome which is developing in this country because of high interest rates and because people are losing material gains they have built up during their married lives. All of a sudden they see them disappearing, and after they finish blaming this government they end up blaming themselves for some of the unfortunate mistakes which, in all too many ways, are not at all their responsibility. We must do this because we want a better Canada tomorrow, but we will have not a better Canada unless we start doing some of the things which were done yesterday and which are not being done today.

I listened to some of the criticisms of the estimates. One of the things I see happening is a restructuring of our country. This government is attempting to withdraw from every federal-provincial program it can and restructure Canada so that the federal government has total command and the provinces will become little more than municipalities. I see no more equal status between premiers and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) except, perhaps, for the premiers of a couple of provinces which happen to be blessed with the largesse which comes from natural resources. Even in those cases I suppose the federal government will try to take that largesse in one way or another. In the end the federal government will place the provinces in such a position that they will be little more than supplicants coming to Ottawa to see what crumbs they can get off the federal table. That is the way it is happening at this time.

There can only be a better tomorrow for Canadians if there is co-operation between the various levels of government, understanding and a common determination to achieve the greatness Canada has the potential to achieve. We will not achieve that greatness if we fight among ourselves all the time, which is the case right now. The ordinary individual Canadian watches these battles taking place, he sits down at home and looks at the problems he is facing and wonders if it is not better to go somewhere else.

Mr. Cullen: Not for long.

Mr. Coates: Why hang around here?

Mr. Cullen: Not for long.

Mr. Coates: I hope the hon. member is right. I hope it will not be for long. I hope we as parliamentarians working together can give Canadians the feeling that this still is the best country on earth and that this is the place to live and work together.

Mr. Daudlin: Now you are getting there, Bob.

Mr. Coates: I think the first thing we must do is give the assurance to the individual Canadian that he has the right—not the hope but the right—to look forward to owning a home if he involves himself in an industrious way in the building of this country. That is something I do not see at the moment. That is something that is not in the minds of most Canadians at the moment. At the moment Canadians are working like the devil to bail themselves out of debt they never should have allowed themselves to accumulate but in which we, by federal programs more than anything else, have convinced them they should become involved.

I remember that at one stage of the game in Nova Scotia we had programs, which were sponsored by our electric utilities, designed to convince everyone to switch to electric heat. Night after night on our television screens we saw people telling us what a smart idea it would be to switch from oil, gas, coal or whatever we were using to electric heat. A great many people opted for that but then the government of Nova Scotia increased the cost of power by something like 150 per cent. All of a sudden those people who had enlisted in government programs for electric heat discovered that it was costing them more per month than their mortgage.

On the federal level we are in almost the same position. Through central mortgage and housing, which is now Canada Mortgage and Housing, we convinced Canadians to invest their money in homes for 40 or 50 years. We also convinced them to build bigger and better homes. The result is that today the average price of a home is out of all proportion to the incomes of most people. We must help them out because we created the situation. While this program may touch a few thousand people in the country, we must work to find a different program that will touch everyone who is in trouble. Until we do we will not really have lived up to our commitment.

The alternative is the type of frustration that results in a separatist being elected to the Alberta legislature. It is one thing to hear of separatists being elected in the province of Quebec; but it is another when a situation develops in western Canada whereby, because of such personal frustrations as high interest rates, someone is elected to the Alberta legislature, with the same objectives but for different reasons, as the separatists elected in the province of Quebec.

That is but another example of the sickness that is in the nation today, Mr. Speaker. We are charged with the responsibility of eliminating that sickness wherever it exists. We can do that only by introducing programs that relate to the problems of the people. It cannot be done by firing a civil servant who happens to speak out because he is frustrated by the introduction of the metric system. That is not the answer to any problem in the country. The principle of freedom of speech must be preserved. A man must have the freedom to speak out on something he does not believe in and must not be under threat of dismissal because he has the courage of his convictions.

If we want to make this institution work and if we want people to have respect for us, we must introduce programs that show we understand the problems and are working to solve them. I do not see that view in this legislation. It will be helpful to a few and I will support it for the value it has for the people it will touch; but, Mr. Speaker, it will not touch many people in the country. We need something much better if we are to grapple with the major problems that face Canadians today. It is time we faced the reality of the situation. When we do that, perhaps there will be some hope for a good tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-89, to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin my speech by quoting the latest news report issued by Canadian Press which appeared in today's newspapers. It starts out as follows:

> High interest rates will cause housing starts to fall nationally by 9 per cent and will make 1982 another bad year for the housing industry, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp. says in its latest quarterly forecast.

Later the article goes on to say:

Builders have seen their industry go sharply downhill between 1976 and 1980. Housing starts reached a record 273,203 units in 1976 but were down to a mere 158,601 units in 1980.

A further paragraph in the article reads as follows:

For 1982, the corporation predicts starts on single-detached houses will drop to 83,000 and starts on apartments, duplexes and row houses are likely to be down to 79,000 units.

That article reminds me of a line from one of John Lennon's songs—"I heard the news today. Oh boy!" We have heard the news today and it is bad!

The views on housing reflected in that news report are of interest to the constituents of Vancouver-Kingsway, Mr. Speaker. I want to try to do something a little different today. Rather than giving general views I want to devote a good part of my remarks to quoting the exact words of people in my riding. Vancouver-Kingsway is in the southeast part of the city of Vancouver. It comprises mainly single dwellings occupied by working people, many of whom are new Canadians and others who have been in the area for generations. It is a stable area of hard working, good people.

I received hundreds of replies to a questionnaire which I included with a householder and some of them are quite detailed. I should like to take this opportunity to show the minister the pattern that emerges from these replies. The first is from a woman on St. Margarets Street. This is a fairly typical street in the riding. She writes:

Starting Dec. 1st, 1981, we had to change homes. Two small bedrooms for 2 adult and 3 children was just too much. We now are renting 3 bedroom main floor of duplex for $675 per month. We can just scrape this payment per month. My husband and myself both work, to try and get our own home. With this monthly rent, plus high down payments, and mortgage rates out of sight, it is just impossible. It is very discouraging. We are both in our late twenties, with three small children. We have never collected unemployment, welfare or been in trouble with the law. We were raised to be good Canadian citizens. I wish there was something to give us a little hope.

Another constituent replied:

We rent because we cannot afford to buy; we can just afford the rent. I was born in Vancouver and it makes me very angry that I am being forced out of my own city by real estate people and land owners.

Another one writes:

As a single working parent the fall out of the interest rates has a dramatic effect on myself from $375 per month to $525 is unbelievable.

I asked people about their increase in rent or mortgage payments in their case and this woman writes that her increase in rent is $150 per month.

• (1720)

Another woman replied:

With nowhere to move, I face the choice of giving up my child or moving into the Parliament Buildings which are usually vacant.

Another person said:

I believe everyone should have a right to his own house but feel the answer is in more rental accommodation. The government should make available housing for rent at a realistic rate. This would give tenants a chance to save for a house of their own. When they move out it would be available for someone else to do the same. Also speculators, etc. who are asking exorbitant rents to cover their mortgage payments would have to reduce rents to compete. (New Canadian)

I just want to pause here. I see the minister across the way. I should like to refer to what he said about housing which was quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) when she spoke on the matter of housing on this bill the other night. He said that, "Governments do not build houses and that the dynamic force which has made Canadians among the best house people in the world have been the private construction industry and financial institutions." This is a myth. In fact the government agency, CMHC, has been responsible, either directly or indirectly, for the construction of over 50 per cent of the housing stock produced in the country since 1945. When that new Canadian in my riding writes and says that the government should make available some housing, there is some foundation for it. I will write back and say, "Do not believe the myth which the minister is perpetuating".

I can remember coming to Canada as a new Canadian from Scotland in 1947. We moved into a house which I hesitate to say was in Toronto. We had CMHC funding for my parents to get started in a starter home. The minister should not perpetuate the myth that his friends, free enterprise, built everything. There was much assistance from CMHC, and we want this assistance to continue.

Mr. Cosgrove: Why are you holding up 30,000 units by speaking on the bill?

Mr. Waddell: I am not holding up 30,000 homes.

Mr. Cosgrove: You are.

Mr. Waddell: The bill will be through tonight or tomorrow. If the minister will listen to my remarks, he will know all about the housing situation.

Mr. Cosgrove: I heard those remarks in July last year.

Mr. Waddell: If the minister will not listen to the people of Vancouver-Kingsway, there is not much we can do.

Mr. Cosgrove: I listened to them last year.

Mr. Waddell: The minister is not listening; he is shouting at me. He should listen to what the people have to say. The Liberal philosophy is to do nothing in halves which can be done in quarters, which is what the bill does. I will make some concrete suggestions for the minister, to which he should listen, but let me return to the replies of the people of Vancouver. Another woman wrote:

Although my husband and I are not affected by the current situation—we have our house paid for—nevertheless we are still very concerned for all the people who are being hurt by this shameful situation. We think the government should do something quickly to correct things and create more affordable housing.

Another man wrote:

We cannot afford to buy what we will eat if we try to pay this present high mortgage rate.

In the questionnaire I asked:

By how much did your monthly payments increase?

The answer in this reply was "$450" per month. He continued:

We can't buy school supplies for our four children.

This is not opposition rhetoric; it is written in black and white on the questionnaire. Another person indicated:

We renewed last June at 18.5 up from an 11.75 per cent mortgage we had. Feel banks are totally irresponsible and greedy. Whatever happened to 25-year terms, instead of this headache every one, three or five years.

I ask the minister, whatever happened to 25-year terms? The reply continued:

I think the government will see a "little peoples" revolt soon over this. These high rates are forcing mothers back to work and I feel it's a main contributing factor in the breakdown of the family unit. Let's see 12 or 13 per cent mortgages again! The high fuel costs are very frustrating . . . Hang in there—

Another person said:

How can our so-called leaders, whom we have elected, tolerate this ridiculous situation where banks are allowed to reap their enormous profits and we the people . . . lose our homes. We must be fools to tolerate this—

Another one indicated:

As a single parent, I feel trapped. I'm sick of hearing about home owners when a lot of us are stuck paying rent seemingly forever and can't even save.

This single parent went on to indicate the difficulties in renting. Another constituent indicated:

Next increase we won't be under rent controls.

We must remember that the minister has been going around the country attempting to get people out of rent controls. This person went on to indicate:

I think the price limit for rent controls needs to be raised—nearly everyone must have outgrown it by now, soon we'll all be at the landlords' mercy! How can any of us have a sense of security or plan for the future?

Another questionnaire indicated that the writers had shared their house with another couple for six months and finally were able to instal, although admittedly illegal, a suite downstairs in order to meet the huge increase in payments. It went on to indicate that the renovations were costly, and without the benefit of personal family loans would have necessitated a second mortgage. What about people who cannot instal suites or do not have families to help them? They also indicated that their increase was from $452 to $809, and there was a notation that it amounted to 50 per cent of their monthly wage.

This is not opposition rhetoric; the minister cannot dismiss it. These are direct quotations of the people. Another indicated that he had been renting his present home since the summer and that he had had no rent increases. He said that it was very difficult procuring his place with two small children and one cat, but that he was one of the lucky ones who found a place in which to live. He said, "The housing situation—words are inadequate; let us see some action". One couple indicated that they owned their own home and that their 25-year mortgage was finished at last, but that their children would be seeking homes or rental units in the near future and thus they knew that high interest rates are a serious problem about which something must be done.

Another concern was expressed that with high mortgage rates their three sons have no hope of owning homes. Another person indicated that he purchased a one-bedroom apartment approximately 18 months ago with a payment of $290 per month. He indicated that with his renewal for one year his payment went to $540 per month in December and he was told the mortgage would go to over $800 per month. This person also has to pay $100 per month for the manager's fee which has risen, but his wages have never risen to cover such high mortgage costs.

Someone suggested that if economists started making more hopeful predictions they could have a psychological effect upon the public. Another couple indicated that their payment would have increased by $150 if it had not been for a family friend who owed them some money, but that they knew of other people who were in trouble. Another person indicated that he found it absurd, although he had few debts and could qualify for a large mortgage, that he could not meet the monthly payments and thus could not purchase a home. He asked, "What are you going to do for me aside from raising taxes and decreasing deductions?" There is great cynicism out there about politicians, as well as about political and government processes.

Someone else indicated that he lived in co-operative housing, which is the answer to affordable housing for both the young and middle-aged. Another letter on co-operative housing indicated that the writer would like to see lower interest rates and more co-ops for people on lower incomes. Another indicated that he wished the Liberals would unplug their ears and listen carefully to the problems facing the Canadian economy today and deal with them accordingly. Another constituent indicated that he would like very much to own his own home but doubted he ever would because of high interest rates. A couple indicated that they rented because they could not afford to purchase and that these usurious rates must be reduced soon by whatever means necessary. The final questionnaire to which I will refer indicated that something must be done about interest rates. This couple wanted to purchase a home but could not because of interest rates. They said, "Help, do something!"

These were comments of people in my riding which I think display a pattern. I should like to sum them up by referring to the pattern and inviting the minister to listen. The first point is that clearly there are increases in costs and people are paying more for housing. I suppose this is obvious, but these questionnaires give exact details of the increases. I would be glad to provide the minister with these questionnaires after my speech, but first let me indicate that people are continuing to rent because they cannot afford home ownership.

I should like to refer to the statistics about which people are unaware. The average family income in British Columbia is $29,639, which is fairly high when compared with some other parts of the country. If one takes 25 per cent of that income, $617.48 a month is the affordable amount for shelter. If you assume a payment of 25 per cent of the income, ignore all costs of ownership and taxes and assume a 16 per cent mortgage interest rate, which is on the low scale, people can buy a home valued at $46,780. But there are no houses in Vancouver for that price. I have a copy of today's Vancouver Sun. I am turning to the real estate ads for the east side of Vancouver. The average price for a home in greater Vancouver is $140,000. There is a relatively cheap house for sale in my riding. It is situated on a street just about in the middle of my riding. It is a two-bedroom home on a 33-foot lot. It is 24 years old and it is for sale at $112,000. But these people can only afford a home costing $46,780. There are none at that price. Let me make that clear.

The third point which becomes clear from these questionnaires is that there is going to be a squeeze on rents and that rents will increase. People are afraid that rent controls will be removed. The minister is travelling across the country telling people that they may not be able to have two garages and two cars. But it is not a question of two garages or two cars; it is a question of being able to afford to stay in your own home. The minister has been talking about getting rid of rent controls. But these people who wrote to me certainly do not want that to happen.

Fourth, it is clear that wages are not increasing sufficiently to cover the increased cost of shelter. Is it any wonder that people are frightened when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) muses about whether he should or should not impose wage controls? People are afraid.

Fifth, people made reference to bank profits. Bank profits are enormous. Bank profits last year amounted to $1.6 billion. People wonder about these vast profits and wonder what would happen if they were channelled back into affordable housing.

Sixth, the people in my riding, as reflected by some of the statements in these questionnaires, tend to think about other people. There are some very good-hearted statements is response to that questionnaire. It shows up in the responses of people who have paid for their houses, yet they are still worried about the housing needs of others and they are worried about their children. The minister should be worried about these things too.

Seventh, there is a sense of urgency, as evidenced in these questionnaires. I have stacks of these questionnaires which I can send to the minister. People are asking for something to be done now. But what do we get? We only get this inadequate bill.

There are two other concerns that showed up in these questionnaires. I have not quoted them. There have been increased tax assessments in Vancouver. The Social Credit government of British Columbia has really put it to the people on tax assessments. People know their taxes are rising very quickly. There is almost a tax revolt. The cost of fuel is also rising. That, too, was mentioned in the questionnaires. The consumer price index indicated that from January of last year to January of this year the price of energy rose 24 per cent. The price of fuel is continuing to rise. In a letter dated February 5, 1982, Dave Barrett, the leader of the provincial New Democratic Party wrote:

> That additional charge will raise individual customer bills between 8 and 12 per cent, depending on usage and rate categories, this year alone. It means that this province's one million residential customers will pay an average of $28 extra this year to finance minister Hugh Curtis through their hydro bills.

People in my riding are feeling the squeeze with the cost of fuel. It is evidenced at the gas pump because of the National Energy Program and the deal that was made with the province of Alberta, as well as the increase in hydro bills and so on. There was no effort on the part of the provincial government of British Columbia to lessen the impact of these bills. There was no effort on the part of the federal Liberal government and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) to redistribute some of the money received from Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia through higher oil prices.

It is often said, "It is all right for you guys to get up and scream about the situation. We know it is bad enough even though it is documented in a new way. What are you going to do about it?" Let me suggest that something could be done about it. We could lower interest rates including a significant lowering of mortgage rates. We could get out of monetarism. We could have a "made-in-Canada" interest policy. We have already laid that before the House. We can require banks to set aside a specific portion of their lending portfolios for long-term mortgages at lower interest rates, primarily for first time buyers. That would help some of the rentalers also. We could restore the presence of CMHC in the housing sector by an infusion of $500 million to the capital budget for social housing. This would provide the needed non-profit co-operative and rental accommodation. From where would we get the money? We would get it from bank profits. We would apply a 100 per cent capital gains tax against property sales, except on principal residences and farm lands sold for residential purposes. Finally, we could make Crown land available on a leasehold basis for affordable housing. Those things could be done. If the minister brought forward a bill with those provisions in it, this party would pass it in a flash. He does not have to look over and say "Please pass a Mickey Mouse bill".

Mr. Cosgrove: Are 70,000 jobs Mickey Mouse?

Mr. Waddell: If the minister would listen to what needs to be done, and if he would read what the mayor of Vancouver has been writing to him, he would know that in greater Vancouver we need 70,000 affordable housing units over the next five years. The city of Vancouver itself needs an additional 5,000 units per year just to keep up with growth projections. Vancouver is going to trade with the Pacific Rim countries. We hope to be the city that will open up that trade, which will be a jewel on the west coast. We need 20,000 units just to catch up, but I am told that the minister has cut them back by 2,000 this year.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the caucus of the New Democratic Party set up a committee on economic development which travelled across Canada. For instance, we visited Montreal, where we heard private citizens and groups express their views on housing. One tenants' association talked to us about rental organizations, buildings that were being demolished, and their fears that rent controls would be lifted. They wanted a policy on interest rates that would not be tied to that of the United States. They wanted lower rates, made in Canada. They wanted the government to set up new co-operative housing projects. The Ligue des propriétaires de Montréal told us that Quebec was different from other provinces because 62 per cent of the population lived in rental accommodation. In Montreal, most landlords have low-rise buildings, and they are paralysed by the changes in the tax system.

[English]

We have travelled across the country listening to people. In Montreal I heard people mention their fear that rent contrls will be removed. There are a great number of renters in the province of Quebec. It is a rather unusual situation when one compares it with other parts of the country. The people there demanded a "made-in-Canada" interest policy.

If the minister really wanted to do something about housing, and we all know what it is, what he should do is to lower interest rates, and that would really move the market.

I want now to say something about co-operative housing, Mr. Speaker, because it seems to me we could make some progress there, as we have done until recently. I spoke personally with Shirley Schmidt, the director of Columbia Housing, a co-operative housing group in my riding. They have been holding orientation meetings for people interested in joining a co-op as one way of getting affordable accommodation. They have had four of these meetings since January in a hall which holds about 250 people. On February 22, last night, they had another meeting which was attended by 350 people. They could not squeeze them into the hall. I am told that there is no chance that any of these people will get into a co-op before at least 1984 or 1985, if they get in at all. The only way we can change this is for Columbia to be given funds to build to their potential. I am told they could build a minimum of 600 units in order to do what needs to be done. If they had 900 units, they could fill them all.

In Vancouver, Columbia Housing alone has 174 units, one of which is in my riding, and they have had to put on hold 252 units which could go into construction in May. They have had to put them on hold. Mrs. Schmidt was almost crying when she told me that. This is in the province of British Columbia, with its huge forest industry and one third of its work force out of work. We have the trees, the labour, the people and the demand. We know how to do it.

Mr. Cosgrove: And no provincial plan for housing.

Mr. Waddell: What are you waiting for, Mr. Minister? Oh, you will say it is the provinces.

Mr. Cosgrove: Three thousand units in the plan in front of you.

Mr. Waddell: The minister says it is the provinces. There is a potential for 150 units in Richmond, a suburb of Vancouver right next to my riding, but Columbia has never been able to get any funding for Richmond. We also found that the B.C. government is withdrawing from the assisted rental program, which will affect senior citizens. We have found that there are 420 co-op units on hold in the lower mainland of British Columbia. This represents 534,822 man hours of work, or 14,263 person weeks. I thought I would put something in, Mr. Speaker, that the bureaucrats in Ottawa could understand. That is 274 person-years of work, as they say in Ottawa.

What it really means, Mr. Speaker, is that it gives 274 people a year of work, or twice that number six months of work. The total value would be $21 million. There would be four million board feet of lumber used. There are 74 co-op units in Fort St. John, and more needed, for which there is no funding. We had a call from Prince Rupert where they want units but none have been allocated. The demand is there but there is no funding. We would support a bill tomorrow, or even tonight. We will stay all night if the minister wants to bring in a bill to supply funding for those units. No debate, we will support it.

I talked to Glen Hadrill of the Co-operative Housing Foundation and he tells me that across Canada there is a producible demand for 10,000 co-op units. The real demand is far above that. Last year 5,400 units were allocated across Canada. This year it has been reduced to 5,000 units. Mr. Hadrill said that in British Columbia there is a producible demand for 2,000 units. Last year 1,025 units were allocated to British Columbia. It has been reduced this year to 898 units.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have quoted people from my riding. I will not prolong this because the facts are there. I have tried to set out some of the things that could be done. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) spoke on the details of this bill and suggested that we should be expanding CMHC, not contracting it. This insurance plan does not really do ordinary people much good, it simply helps the lenders. We heard from the Conservative Party that the answer is mortgage interest deductibility. That is just a subsidy to the rich, Mr. Speaker. You get it, go out and double your mortgage and reinvest the money. It will bankrupt the treasury and it will not help the low and middle-income people. It will help the bankers, but they are not the people who need the help. The people who need the help are the ordinary Canadians whom I have quoted extensively today. I have suggested some concrete solutions. I have given the minister some information about co-ops and how he could advance that aspect of the industry, and I have set out the general situation in Vancouver.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the difference between us on this side of the House and the minister over there is that we believe housing is a social right and we are not going to bring in crumbs for people. We would bring in a bill which would put the housing industry back to work and which would, in fact, build affordable housing for those people, ordinary Canadians, whom I have quoted in the House today.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of participating in this debate. I listened with close attention to the last speaker, speaking as he does for the New Democratic Party on almost every issue which comes before the House in debate. I did so because I remember that he was sitting in his place—

Mr. Waddell: I would do it again.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —during the time we were in government, at which time he showed his true colours. He speaks now of what the NDP would do to assist the home owner. Well, he had the opportunity to support some very progressive legislation presented by our government which directed itself very much toward helping home owners in Canada, but when the time came, he carried on the great tradition of supporting the Liberals in everything they do on major issues.

So I find it rather interesting to have him now stand up and rail away at the minister responsible for housing, saying that he is in opposition to the policies being brought forward. The fact is the member has demonstrated, as has his party, that they support this government. At all important times the NDP can be counted on to say: "Ready, aye ready. Whatever the Liberals say, we are prepared to follow along." I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that made me wonder about the credibility which can be attached to the speech we heard in the last 40 minutes.

However, Mr. Speaker, I was more interested in listening to a couple of my colleagues who have spoken in this debate, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester (Mr. Coates) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). Those members have been here since 1957, the days of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker's election as Prime Minister. I say this because I want to give some historical perspective to the commitments of the parties in the House with respect to the right to own and live in single homes in Canada. I was very much taken by the wisdom shown by those two members, and I think it is important for us to listen to people who have been here for some time, because experience is a very important commodity in politics, as in everything else. I recall that at that particular time the Conservative government brought forward a new emphasis to home construction. At that time they resurrected what was a dormant national housing act which had been given very little support by the Liberal government which preceded Mr. Diefenbaker's government. I recall the enormous acivity and the commitment given by the government as a whole with respect to home construction which took place during the late 1950s and the early 1960s. I am very proud to be associated with this party which has had the tradition of encouraging and taking positive initiatives on behalf of the home owners of Canada, those who want to become home owners, and those who want adequate and reasonable accommodation in our country. I agree with the hon. member who spoke previously to the extent that I believe the right of home ownership should be a part of the objectives of any political party worth its salt in this country.

When we were in government, we made a number of proposals which, I suggest to Your Honour, were very much in the tradition of the policies brought forward by Mr. Diefenbaker. They involved a recognition of the growing burden placed on home owners of this country by virtue of a situation where inflation had risen to unacceptable levels, and where the expenses involved in home ownership were indeed cumbersome for the average citizen, the average couple, the unmarried couple, and the lower and middle-income earners of our country. I look back on that particular initiative which we took, and I commend the kind of thrust we took as a government to the minister responsible for housing.

I am glad to say and happy to report that the minister is in the House now and is sitting through this debate, which I appreciate. As I direct my remarks today to the effectiveness of the current government policies, I want the minister to know that I appreciate the fact that he has tried to bring forward the proper emphasis and the proper policies with respect to housing in this country, but that he has been fought on every level by his own party, and more particularly, by the government of which he is a member and by his colleagues in the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: What I have to say to the minister today is said more out of a sense of sadness than out of any personal vindictiveness toward the minister, who is trying to do his job.

We look at the situation today. What is happening economically? It is reflected in what has happened to our dollar today. We find today that the dollar has fallen below 82 cents. It is on a downward trajectory. It is a reflection of our present economic circumstances. I feel very uncomfortable, as do most Canadians, with respect to our economic prospects. I look at some of the additional costs which are now being placed on the home owner. In the province from which I come, Saskatchewan, the Saskatchewan Power Corporation rates have been going up to unprecedented levels. I am in receipt of letters from my constituents, from elderly senior women living alone in my riding and from young couples, people who have a hard time making ends meet. They have told me that their heating bills are now putting additional pressure on them with respect to carrying on private ownership. For example, in the province of Saskatchewan, power and heating costs will be increased by 18 per cent this month. When we look at what has happened as a result of the amount of interest which is being paid by the home owner, we can imagine the additional encumbrance resulting from payments of high fuel bills in a winter which has been one of the traditional Saskatchewan winters, as I recall them some years ago, a very cold winter. It has meant an enormous increase in the heating bill to the average citizen in my province. Interest rates are at unprecedented levels. Inflation is reaching record proportions with respect to the costs of home maintenance.

That is the general situation in which we find ourselves today. That is the atmosphere in which we must address this particular piece of legislation. I say to the minister that over the course of the last few months I followed the pre-budget pronouncements of the minister with some interest. Many people were wondering, as it is obvious Members of Parliament and members of the Press Gallery were also wondering, exactly what we might expect from this government in terms of relief and assistance to home owners. It would be interesting to see whether the minister would come forward with policies which would be of true and legitimate assistance to these people in times of very heavy financial pressure. Therefore, we asked ourselves whether this government would do something to alleviate the pressure of high interest rates and high property taxes imposed by municipalities. We wondered whether the government, in effect, would reconsider its previous position and support a policy we brought forward whereby the home owner could, in fact, receive some advantage by deducting interest paid on mortgages and municipal property taxes. I think these questions were legitimate. In budgetary terms, we wondered whether the government would bring forward provisions, as we did, which would allow the poor and the low and middle-income earners to receive some assistance from this government to help pay the increased costs of owning a home, similar to the energy tax provisions contained in our budget which would have given assistance to families. Under this government, increased costs of energy are rising far higher and to a more substantial degree than would have been the case under the energy agreement which we arranged with the province of Alberta. We found that the answer to our questions was "no". We waited for these answers, and we waited for pronouncements on the part of those ministers responsible in this administration, as to what we might expect concerning initiatives.

I must say that I took a random sampling of some of the press reports which have covered the pronouncements of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) who is responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation in particular. I do not have to go back very far. I can go back to September 9, 1981, when the headline of the Toronto Star stated, "Mortgage Relief Package is Coming, Cosgrove Predicts". I just want to quote this article, because this was a statement of the minister responsible for the housing policy in this administration, and one which I think we were entitled to take seriously, because we expect that when there are pronouncements by a minister responsible for housing of any government, we can find action which would follow those pronouncements. I will quote from the article as reported by Pat McNenly.

Mr. Cosgrove: Quote it all. Read it all.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I only have 40 minutes in which to speak, and I do not want to embarrass the minister too much by quoting what he said in September, and then by finding that he reversed himself in October. I just want to make a point for the minister. I see a fleeting tinge of embarrassment cross his face, and the redness in his face is increasing. I will be kind and polite and just quote a—

Mr. Cosgrove: Do your worst! Just read it all.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —dispassionate and non-partisan extract from this particular article so the minister can understand—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Just before the dinner hour.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —the expectations we had of him.

I see the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms is coming because he is hungry, so I will call it six o'clock and we can start again at eight o'clock. I hope the minister will be present to hear my remarks.

Mr. Cosgrove: I want to hear it all!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In appreciation of the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn), and in view of the fact that the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms is hungry, I do now call it six o'clock p.m. The House will rise until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When the House rose at six o'clock, the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) had the floor.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, just before the supper hour, I had started to make reference to the fact that a lot of us in the House of Commons and people across Canada are very much interested and concerned about the direction in which the government is going with respect to its housing policy. It is as a result of a number of things that this has happened. I mentioned these factors. We had unprecedented interest rates which went over the 20 per cent mark, absolutely incredible, usurious interest rates. I was moved to observe at the time that the level of interest rates in this country was the rate which the criminal element used to extend to its least desirable clients, 22 or 23 per cent. That is an absolutely untoward, unbearable burden to place on the people of this country.

Also, we are facing an unprecedented rate of inflation. Items of repair, costs with respect to home ownership, the cost of equipping a modest home, are an additional burden to the average Canadian, especially those living on limited means such as senior citizens and young people starting off in life.

Quite apart from everything else, we are also facing a situation where in the context of inflation this government entered into an energy policy for this country which allowed an acceleration in price to the home owner which was absolutely unthinkable just a few months ago. This energy policy extended the energy costs to the home heating fuel of the average Canadian in a way that the government of which I was a member would have no part.

I know the minister is very sensitive about housing matters in this country, that he is attempting to prevail among his cabinet colleagues. I say to him in that context and in that battle he is waging with his colleagues and cabinet, that he has the support of most people on this side of the House. We in this party think that housing is a priority item.

As you listened raptly to me before the dinner hour, Mr. Speaker, I was outlining some of the statements made by the minister with respect to his anticipation and expectations about policies to be brought forward by the government in the budget. I was referring to an article in the September 9, 1981 edition of the Toronto Star headed "Mortgage relief package is coming, Cosgrove predicts". I was going to try to quote from it in a dispassionate way. The salient parts of that article and the quotations of the minister should give some idea of the expectations that Canadians have of this government as to what it is prepared to do in the context that I set out at the beginning of my remarks.

The article says:

Federal Housing Minister Paul Cosgrove won't say what his short-term proposals for relief from record mortgage rates are but he is confident the federal cabinet will adopt them because a near shutdown of the multi-billion housing industry is their only alternative.

"The interest rates, where they are now, are a very poor omen for the construction industry," Cosgrove (L-York-Scarborough) said in an interview yesterday.

He went on to say:

. . . and if the high rates continue without relief from Ottawa, Cosgrove forecast: "people will not buy, people will not build. The industry tells me that. I believe it."

The article went on to point out:

Cosgrove isn't deterred by Finance Minister Allen MacEachen's recent statement that alleviating high interest rates was not a government priority.

The minister went on. The response was positive. The minister was taking this firm position on behalf of the government, and I think that many of us on this side of the House thought the man was trying to do something for Canada and we should support him if we could. We thought we should look forward to the provisions of his new policy which was coming forward.

A headline in The Ottawa Citizen dated September 17, 1981, stated: "Rental building may get boost in next budget". It is an article by Jim Robb, a Citizen staff writer in which he says:

Major new measures to boost construction of rental accommodation could form part of Finance Minister Allan MacEachen's upcoming budget, a number of federal officials said Wednesday.

Housing Minister Paul Cosgrove emphasized Wednesday that when the government says it will help only the hardest-pressed home owners, it means exactly that.

"The vast majority of Canadians will not be assisted," Cosgrove told reporters after the cabinet's day-long economic planning session at the government's Meach Lake retreat.

You can believe it, Mr. Speaker. That was only September 9 to September 17, a matter of eight days after the minister's first statement. What happened was that the minister considered where he was headed after his very impressive opening statement with respect to what the government would do.

On October 23, 1981, after a month to think about this, he decided to take a new tack and a new initiative. An article in The Ottawa Citizen dated October 23 had the headline "Cosgrove vows personal aid if home in jeopardy". This is an article by Don Butler, Citizen staff writer. He wrote:

Housing Minister Paul Cosgrove offered Thursday to intervene personally if there is "genuine concern" that a home owner may lose his house because of high mortgage interest rates.

That is a long way down from the impressive statement about the government's intentions which he enunciated a month earlier.

On October 24, 1981, the minister decided he should start again and try to petition more impressive aid for homeowners in Canada. An article in The Ottawa Citizen dated October 24, 1981, with the headline "Cosgrove wants emergency mortgage aid" stated:

Housing Minister Paul Cosgrove said Friday he wants the budget to contain even more emergency help for low-income home owners than they now get from Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

The article also went on to say:

The Housing minister told the Commons Thrusday he is prepared to deal personally with hardship cases betwen now and the time the budget comes down if individual MPs can't persuade banks and trust companies to accommodate home owners in danger of foreclosure.

But he admitted to reporters Friday he doesn't really have much clout beyond the moral suasion that his ministerial rank can bring to impress hardnosed bankers and other lenders.

Here is another retreat, Mr. Speaker. If the situation were not so tragic, it would become almost laughable. An article in the Toronto Star on the same day, October 24, 1981, contained the headline "I can't guarantee anything, Cosgrove now tells home owners". It is an article by David Vienneau, the Ottawa correspondant. He wrote:

Housing Minister Paul Cosgrove says he can't guarantee that even his personal intervention in mortgage interest disputes . . .

[Translation]

Mr. Cousineau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau), on a point of order.

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker, in the House it is customary to refer to someone by his department or constituency, but never by that person's name. I would refer you to what was said by Madam Speaker, as reported on page 8396 of Hansard, March 18, 1981, the gist of which is that a word that is unparliamentary may not be used even if it is being quoted from a newspaper article or—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.I do not think the Chair needs to have those explanations. The hon. member may have referred to another hon. member by name, but I have been aware of his contribution to the debate prior to six o'clock and since eight o'clock and there is so little that is objectionable in terms of referring to hon. members by name that I could not find anything disagreeable whatsoever.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I understand the concern expressed by the deputy whip with respect to the decorum of the House. Let me say that I agree with the principle of not referring to hon. members by name during debate except that I think it is a well-established principle that when one is quoting from articles in which the name is used, one can quote exactly. Therefore, I was not using the name, quite apart from reading directly from those newspaper articles in which the minister was reported.

I hope I did not offend the rules of the House, which I understand indicate that we do not refer to ministers or colleagues by name. However, when quoting from newspaper articles, I think the rule is that we can use the name when they are quoted exactly. Otherwise, with the responsibility which the minister has it would take me too long, and I only have 40 minutes, to convey a number of messages which I want to get across to the minister.

I will carry on and quote from this article and I will make sure that I am quoting the article exactly. I will send a copy to the Chair if it wants to verify the article. The article went on:

Cosgrove said he was doing exactly these things for five of his own constituents . . .

[Translation]

Mr. Cousineau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to appeal your ruling, but I think—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Gatineau, on a point of order.

Mr. Cousineau: I am not appealing your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I referred you to a comment made by the Speaker of the House on March 18, 1981, which made it quite clear that even a quote from a newspaper article was not acceptable.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Certainly the principle to which the hon. member refers is perfectly accurate. There is no problem in that respect. However, what is happening is that the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is referring to certain written articles, and while in the process of reading those articles he is referring to certain members of the House. That is perfectly in order and there is no problem with that either.

I do not think it is a system which ought to be abused, but I also believe the hon. member for Saskatoon West is not abusing that principle. I think that we should hear him.

If he continues to a degree that the hon. member finds some difficulty with, I will listen again. For the moment, a reference to a newspaper article in which an hon. member's name is mentioned is not out of order under the Standing Orders of the House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I have such great respect for the deputy whip who made the interjection that I will try not to offend him by referring to the Minister of Public Works by name. If he does not like to hear the minister's name during the course of debate, I can understand that and I will simply say that whenever I intend to talk about the minister, I will just say the "unmentionable minister".

Mr. Cousineau: You are abusing the rules.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: To go back to the article, he said:

. . . he was doing exactly these things for five of his own constituents— including phoning local bank managers. He refused to identify the people he was attempting to help.

What I am saying is that unfortunately the minister is now deteriorating from saving the entire housing industry in Canada to helping five members of his constituency. But he will not identify those five.

I say to the minister that the history has been sad and unfortunate and leads us to the situation we have today. I have before me a Canadian Press article published in the Montreal Gazette today. Under the headline "House-starts outlook bad, CMHC says" the article reads in part as follows:

The federal Crown corporation predicts little change in mortgage rates during the first half of this year and perhaps slightly higher rates in the second half. As a result, housing starts in Canada are expected to drop to some 162,000 units from 177,973 in 1981.

CMHC's predictions of housing starts by province this year, with actual 1981 starts in brackets: Newfoundland 3,500 (3,210), Prince Edward Island 300 (203), Nova Scotia 3,500 (3,715), New Brunswick 2,500 (2,188), Quebec 31,000 (29,645), Ontario 45,000 (50,161), Manitoba 3,000 (2,824), Saskatchewan 6,000 (5,972), Alberta 33,000 (38,470) and B.C. 34,000 (41,585).

That is the history of the expectation we in this House and the people across Canada have had of this minister responsible for housing.

I face today the dismal duty of commenting on the government's housing policy and this particular piece of legislation, which appears to be the response of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the government after a dismal future was anticipated by the minister, following reports received by him and his department. Never before have the home owners of this country faced such incredible obstacles in obtaining and keeping one of the essentials of life, namely, the shelter of a family home.

As I have pointed out, the people of Canada have faced inexcusably high mortgage interest rates. They have had to deal with the minister responsible, who has not had the ability to deliver on the promises he made to the people of Canada.

In terms of housing possibilities in this country and the extent to which the federal government could influence housing policy, it has been demonstrated that the government has no commitment to deal with the real home ownership problems faced by families in our country. The minister has been well aware of the gravity of the problem. His own department has given him position papers. A report given to him has been made public, and it states:

It can no longer be argued that the number of households facing hardship in renewing mortgages is minimal. During the next year more than 100,000 households will exceed a GDS of 30 per cent after renewing their mortgages.

The majority of households up for mortgage renewal have sufficient equity in their houses to allow them to take steps to reduce the substantial increases in their payments on 21 per cent mortgages. Even so, these households, on average, face increases in the order of $300 to $350 per month. These higher payments will force significant realignments in household budgets.

These householders will manage but will be angry about having their standard of living set back by something totally beyond their control.

For the remaining, from 100,000 to 110,000 households, the increased payments beyond 30 per cent of income will place unmanageable burdens on household budgets. They are already paying a high proportion of income for housing and have little equity. For these households hardship results. Their major asset, their homes, will be lost because of the luck of the draw as determined by the timing of their mortgage renewals.

That quotation is taken directly from the government's position paper, prepared by officials in the minister's own department, with respect to the severity of the housing problem in Canada today. This was a pre-budget forecast of the difficulty to be faced by Canadians, and the minister initially set out to say that he was prepared to meet the challenge, but it did not take long after a few cabinet meetings with his colleagues before his horizons were lowered to the point where all he could offer Canadians was to try to use his office to exert what he called moral persuasion on the banks of Canada, in the hope that they would go a little softly in terms of foreclosure proceedings against real and living people in Canada.

Mr. Cosgrove: Plus $350 million.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the minister's imagination in terms of his contribution always amazes me.

I want to speak about rentals because a prospect was held out for renters in this country. The forecast in the government's own position paper was equally bleak.

Rental investment will thus dry up in most markets and vacancy rates in most markets will approach zero by 1983.

A black market will develop with the phenomenon of "key money" becoming prevalent.

You know, Mr. Speaker, what key money is. It is payment. It is a black market arrangement by which people are able to get access to accommodation in spite of the lack of suitable rental accommodation there is in Canada. I am not talking about the Soviet Union or Moscow. I am talking about Canada where it is getting ever so difficult to get suitable rental accommodation for those who cannot afford their own private home accommodation. Again I quote from the minister's own departmental papers:

Tight markets will produce waiting lists for rental units and force doubling up with family and friends. We will witness a substantial regression in housing conditions following 35 years of gradual improvement.

Those were the forecasts the government, the Minister of Finance and certainly the minister responsible for housing knew well prior to the budget. Indeed, the minister responsible for housing put his seat on the line by saying if there was not help in the budget for the home owners of Canada, he would resign. That is an honourable position for the minister to take, a minister who is sincere and determined to help home owners in Canada, and I applaud the minister for taking that position—

An hon. Member: But!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —but after the expectation about assistance in that budget was raised by the minister, the minister was clearly undercut by his cabinet colleagues.

As we are well aware, the budget upset the plans of home owners and renters across the nation. What is remarkable about the budgetary proposals is how they could be drawn up with so little regard for their practical application and probable repercussion. We have seen this demonstrated with respect to the myriad of issues which come up in the question period day after day. My colleagues have asked questions as to what the Minister of Finance meant by certain budgetary proposals. Why were certain other provisions not made? In this particular context, why have the home owners of Canada been let down so severely? The answer of the government was to provide $50 million this year either to guarantee to repay deferred interest up to $3,000 if a home owner has substantial equity or to pay all or part of the interest deferred to a maximum of $3,000 in cases where the home owner has little equity. This funding covers mortgages renewed between September 1, 1981, and November 12, 1982, a period which does not take into consideration the record high rates on renewals during this past summer. As a result, even though there are 920,000 home owners renewing their mortgages in the applicable period, a relatively small number of those will qualify, and all those home owners who had renewals during the summer are left high and dry.

What did the budget do for renters, Mr. Speaker? As the minister prophesied, unless something is done in terms of providing rental accommodation, the housing industry will be decimated by the budget. By tying the deduction of interest expense to investment income, the industry loses a major incentive to expand. The provision doing away with the deduction of soft costs for MURBs has the same effect. It makes for stagnation in the industry at a time of unprecedented demand and shortage of supply. The 15,000 units that the Minister of Finance promised will not begin to fill the gap that these tax measures opened. With a little incentive, private industry could have done the job itself. Perhaps, after having had to battle with his colleagues in cabinet the minister will now understand that the government has little regard for the private sector of the economy.

The net effect of the budget will probably be a reduction in housing starts. The MURB program has been cancelled. We should remember that it is a program that was responsible for the construction of some 25,000 rental units last year, which is 10,000 more than the 15,000 units the government expects will be built under the program provided for in Bill C-89. Meanwhile, the government will reduce its commitment to subsidizing social housing in 1982 from 30,000 to 25,000—a drop of 5,000.

I wanted to go into more detail on this, Mr. Speaker, but I am sorry that I do not have the time. The minister has been under attack from many sources. I should like him to know that I sympathize with him because I believe he is trying to do a good job. However, he has a responsibility to Canadians to demonstrate that when he said he would resign if he were not able to deliver, he will take the honourable course and do so. If he is an honourable man, and I believe he is, then in the interests of Canadians and in order to get this government on the right course, he will tender his resignation in light of the abysmal failure of the budget to deal with the housing problems in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to contribute to the debate on Bill C-89. This was intended to be a very important piece of legislation. It is one that home owners have been waiting for with some anticipation but it offers much too little much too late to those who have already lost their homes or have resigned themselves to losing their homes.

The very desperate situation that home owners and renters find themselves in today is the result of the government's refusal to change its high interest rate policy and its refusal to tackle the housing industry problem head on in a responsible and equitable way.

There is no question that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) who is responsible for housing, missed an excellent opportunity to bring in legislation that would deal with the housing and high mortgage rates in a meaningful way. Instead, he and his colleagues in cabinet, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) needlessly chose to raise the expectation of home owners about the kind of relief the government would offer. Those expectations soon turned to bitter disappointment. Even under very heavy pressure by members of the House and Canadians everywhere, the minister only responded by making several public statements to the effect that a major relief package was on the way if people would only hold on until the November 12 budget. By then, he said, Canadians would be offered relief. His colleagues thought that in this way the heat would be taken off the subject.

Just days before the budget was brought down, the minister denied that he had made any previous promises to the effect that the government had a comprehensive scheme in mind to help Canadians. There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that the aftermath of this was that the minister was heavily criticized in cabinet for supposedly giving budget secrets away.

The bill before us proves that the government's plans for relief for home owners, renters and the housing industry, should not be taken too seriously. It is very obvious that the government hopes to get away with paying token service to this ever-present problem by offering minor, short-term relief, all the while content to cross its fingers in the hope that inflation and interest rates will soon drop and that it can claim success.

When we look at the current problems facing the housing sector and the way the government has addressed them, it is clear that it is waiting for the storm to pass while refusing to deal with the problem itself.

There is no question that affordability and availability of houses in Canada are the two main areas where very serious problems have developed in the last few years.

In terms of availability of homes, it is quite clear that new housing starts are dropping far behind current demand and that this is resulting in increasing shortages. It has been estimated by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and by the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada that on average, Canada needs well over 200,000 new homes each year just to keep up with consumer demand. Yet, over the past four or five years, housing starts have consistently fallen far behind.

In 1977 we needed 256,000 units but 245,000 were constructed. The figures are worse each year. In 1978 we required 259,000 units but only 227,000 units were built. This trend continues today, Mr. Speaker. In 1981 we needed 265,000 units but only 170,000 units were produced. It is predicted that in 1982, housing starts will number about 135,000 while the actual need will be about 261,000 units. As you can readily see, Mr. Speaker, the situation is deteriorating very rapidly.

Availability in the rental or apartment sector is not much better. From the government's own figures and predictions as revealed in the CMHC document leaked last fall, it is clear how serious the problem is. The government predicts that by 1983, we will have a zero vacancy rate right across the country. However, if current trends continue we could well reach that by next summer. The national vacancy rate fell from 2.8 per cent in 1980 to 1.2 per cent in October, 1981. In some metropolitan areas the vacancy rate already stands at zero per cent. It is evident from all this that the situation continues to deteriorate at a very rapid pace.

The government has estimated that about 90,000 rental units per year are needed to meet our rental requirements, yet it seems unable to assist in a meaningful way any rental construction, outside government assisted rental housing projects. At least this appears to be the case, given the government's continued support of a high interest rate policy and a budget filled with disincentives for private investment to move into rental construction.

An example of this disincentive is the cancellation of the multiple residential building program. By killing this plan it is estimated that 20,000 fewer units will be started this year.

In place of this very sensible program, the government introduced interest free loans of $7,500 for each of the 15,000 units to be built in various areas of the country. This program does not even begin to meet the strong demand for rental housing in Canada, and the leaked CMHC document admitted that the rental market is drying up very quickly. The MURB program served rental construction needs much better than the government's replacement, given the fact that its goal of 15,000 units does not come close to meeting current or future demands.

When we turn to affordability of housing, it is quite clear that the dream of owning a home is becoming a genuine nightmare. In the last three months of 1981 the average cost of a home sold in Canada was $77,900. If we assume a 10 per cent down payment and, $1,000 in property taxes and accept the general principle that payments of principal, interest and taxes should not exceed 30 per cent of the gross income of a home owner, an annual family income of $44,500 is needed to purchase an average priced home. How many Canadians who face mortgage renewals make this amount of money? With prices so high, who can really afford to purchase a home today? Real estate agents tell us how depressed their business is because very few people can cope with the high asking prices for homes, to say nothing of the unreasonable and very high interest rates involved in assuming a mortgage.

Unfortunately, there is another great segment of our home owner population who have already purchased homes and are now at the mercy of high interest rates because they are required to renew their mortgages. Over the next two years approximately 1,200,000 families will find themselves in such an impossible situation. CMHC admitted that some 40,000 Canadians may well lose their homes because of continued high interest rates, yet the government refuses to extend any meaningful aid to home owners, no matter how many Canadians lose their homes or their life savings.

Removal of building subsidies in the rental industry is putting increased pressure upon monthly rental levels. The Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada estimated that removal of federal subsidies in terms of investor returns can only be replaced by rent increases of some 60 per cent or more. Because this situation is impractical and unrealistic, it is quite clear that potential investors are staying away from this area. Therefore, the government is killing this very important industry which it says it is trying to help with the bill. The result will be massive unemployment, not to mention a stagnant industry incapable of meeting necessary consumer demands.

I should like to take a brief look at what the government offers Canadians in this bill to show that their sense of outrage and criticism is completely justified. Canadian home owners, collectively, will not be better off because of the bill. To save face, the government will be extending some band-aid assistance to two groups of home owners facing mortgage renewals. The first group, estimated by CMHC to be about 12,500 in number, will receive a once-in-a-lifetime grant of some $3,000. This grant is designed for those people who have too little equity in their homes to support any interest deferral scheme. The second group, estimated to be about 37,500 in number, face monthly mortgage payments of over 30 per cent of their gross income. They will receive government guarantees of up to $3,000 which are designed to convince lenders to allow home owners to fend off some of the high interest rates. However, this scheme applies only to those home owners who renewed their mortgages between September 1, 1981 and November 12, 1982, and to those who pay over 30 per cent of their gross income on mortgage payments. The grant and loan plans will only help 50,000 people out of an estimated 920,000 home owners who renew their mortgages during the prescribed time. Of the 900,000 Canadians who will renew their mortgages, 100,000 face the very real possibility of losing their homes, yet the government will only help directly 12,500 home owners with $3,000 grants. Canadians left in the cold face the bleak prospect of renewed mortgage rates of approximately 20 per cent or so. It is not something to which one looks forward.

Another disturbing aspect of the bill is that aid offered to home owners in a mortgage deferral program merely puts them deeper and deeper into debt. The leaked government document admitted that interest deferral schemes appeared unlikely to cure the problem faced by Canadians renewing their mortgages. In spite of the leaked CMHC document, the cabinet chose cosmetic relief. It is hoping that lending institutions will agree to provide interest free deferrals with the encouragement of guarantees.

As mentioned earlier in terms of assistance in the area of rental, the government announced a very feeble program to encourage construction of 15,000 rental units costing some $125 million in low vacancy areas. The program offers free loans of up to $7,500 per unit. What is really needed to protect Canadians from crippling mortgage interest rates and to prevent them from losing their homes is a mortgage interest and property tax credit similar to the one introduced by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) when he was minister of finance. If this program were in place today, home owners would enjoy tax credits of $1,125 for 1981 and $1,500 for 1982. The program would have made over $2 billion of relief available to home owners. At that time we offered $2.3 billion in relief, while the government only offered $50 million for this year.

Once again home owners who are on the short end of the stick when dealing with the government are those who insulated their homes with urea formaldehyde foam insulation on the advice and financial backing of the federal government. Anyone who is currently trying to sell or renew the mortgage on their homes with this insulation knows all about UFFI. Their homes are worthless and hazardous to the health and wellbeing of the occupants, yet it took the government over a year, after it banned the use of UFFI from the market, to bring in a relief program to help clean up a very messy situation which it created. The government is taking its sweet time to begin processing applications, obviously wanting Canadians to shoulder the financial burden themselves at a cost which can easily run into thousands of dollars per household. If the government had acted quicker, it would not be faced with so many angry Canadians, not to mention the problem of removing the foam. There is no question that the government has a responsibility to help remove UFFI because it pushed Canadians to use it. It is clear that the most common sense approach would be for the government to own up to its responsibility, to recognize a mistake was indeed made, to stop dragging its feet, and to pay full compensation to home owners involved in this government-sponsored mess.

I believe, as do most Canadians, that shelter is one of our basic rights. Everyone is or should be entitled to a home. However, while it may be a recognized right, we are slowly losing our ability to obtain shelter. Yet the government has little or nothing to offer thousands of Canadians who are facing the immediate threat of losing their homes.

Bill C-89 hardly even addresses the deep financial problem facing home owners or the housing industry itself. The bill is totally inadequate. If the government had listened to Canadians and found out what they really need, we would have had a better financed more wide-ranging and comprehensive piece of legislation before us today. We can only hope the government will accept some of the amendments and change the bill before it passes the House. I will not hold my breath that such changes will take place. I have come to learn during the ten years that I have been a member of the House that the most uncommon thing to find on the other side is common sense. It is truly unfortunate and tragic that this place is just one more place where theory and theoretical ideas always take precedence over practical ideas which actually work better both in terms of application and in lower costs to the taxpayers in the long run. It is no wonder that our farmers and our producers are the most efficient people to be found anywhere in the world. They are practical people with little time for nonsensical theories and ideas that usually do not have a firm foundation to stand the test of practicality.

Whoever coined the expression that there is no experience like practical experience never spoke a truer word. It is too bad that many people who should know better chose to ignore these words of true wisdom.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to stand up in the House since last Wednesday, which was a fateful day in the history of the province of Alberta. Last Wednesday was the day when the first separatist was elected to our provincal legislature, the first separatist who ever ran for office. That brought memories of some ten or 12 years ago when there were no separatists elected to public office anywhere in Canada.

As I stand here today, February 23, 1982, I stand with some sense of impending doom, and with a great deal of impending sadness. I look at Bill C-89, an act to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and I ask myself why am I standing here this evening debating a bill of this kind. As I reach out and look for the answer, I find that it is because this country is in crisis. But in a time of crisis, I would hope to see a piece of legislation that might help us overcome that crisis. When I look at Bill C-89, I do not see in this legislation any sense of real hope for average Canadians. I see once again a piece of legislation which is taking the time of the House because the government has decided to engage once more in a piece of public relations chicanery, another piece of public relations trickery.

When there is a problem in Canada and it is identifiable, the government is quick off the mark to say that it will solve the problem. That story lasts three, four or five days or for as much mileage as hon. members of the Liberal Party can get out of it. Sooner or later in the Parliament of Canada we see the piece of legislation which is supposed to be the solution to the problem. As we read it carefully, we find inevitably that it fails to address the real problem. It simply provides language which is designed to confuse and convince Canadians that the problem is being worked on and being addressed.

If the Clark government had been allowed by the New Democratic Party, the Liberal Party west, to pass the legislation which was before the House in December, 1979, that legislation on mortgage deductibility for home owners in the budget presented by the hon. minister from Newfoundland, which has been judged by those who are experts in their society as the fairest budget in the decade of the 1980s and by the poorest segment of Canadian society—

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is just a matter of clarification of fact. The people of Canada judged that it was not one of the finest pieces of legislation in Canada and turfed out that government.

Mr. Hawkes: The Liberal Party west, the NDP, got sucked in by the so-called experts on the other side. They told them what it said and they did not bother to read it. I tell hon. members to find out what it said and learn what it could have done for Canadians. But they went out like loyal soldiers and sold Canadians a wrong bill of goods.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: That budget, Mr. Speaker, dealt with the housing issue in the following fashion. It provided tax relief for every home owner in this country who paid municipal taxes. The Liberal members and the NDP members shot it down, and Canadians do not have that relief today. It was a budget that provided relief for every Canadian who owned a home. They were to get tax relief on the interest payments on their mortgage. Members of the NDP stood and moved a motion in this House, supported by the Liberals, and said to Canadians that they could not have mortgage relief or tax relief for municipal taxes because they did not need it. The NDP said that they would put the Liberals back in office. But two years later anyone who held a $70,000 mortgage in 1979 at 12 per cent and paid $720 a month is now paying $1,130 a month. We must not forget that municipal taxes have gone up also. The NDP said that was the kind of program they wanted, and they will put the Liberals in so they can deliver that program to Canadians, and that is what they did.

As if that were not bad enough—because people pay their mortgages and municipal taxes from after tax income, that is the amount of money in pay cheques, the money that is used to make those payments—they elected a government full of deceit and trickery that has doubled the indirect taxes in this country. Do the NDP, the Liberal Party west, and the members opposite, and all the backbenchers, understand that indirect taxes under the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) have moved from $10 billion to $20 billion? Do those people understand what that means to a working man and a man on pension?

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member entertain a question?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I will just proceed. It is so seldom that the hon. member is in the House that I am not used to his voice and I cannot quite understand what he is saying.

I was talking about indirect taxes and the burden placed on Canadian home owners from those indirect taxes. I pointed out that those taxes have risen under the present Minister of Finance, from $10 billion to $20 billion, and the NDP put him in. What does that mean? It means that indirect taxes, those are the taxes a person pays out of his take-home pay, have risen since the change in government in 1980 more than $100 per month per household on average. Whether you are rich or poor—

An hon. Member: It is those guys.

Mr. Hawkes: It is not those guys, it is the New Democratic Party which decided that the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) was no good in transport and we should have the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). The Liberal Party west made that trade. That is worse than a Toronto Blue Jay trade.

That extra $100 a month, Mr. Speaker, in indirect taxes coming out of your take-home pay, when added to the extra $408 a month because of high interest rates, comes to $508 a month which Canadians are paying extra. What are they getting for it? They are still in the same house, still driving the same car, using the same heater in their home. They get nothing extra for that, except for the privilege of paying taxes to the Liberal and New Democratic parties. They have the privilege of paying all that extra money to advance causes which are designed not to help Canadians, Mr. Speaker, but to bamboozle them. A $100 million for advertising. How much better would this country be if that money were given to Canadians to reduce their monthly mortgage payments!

One of the purposes of the December, 1979 budget was to reduce federal borrowing. Of what significance is that to Canadians? Well, when this government was elected, 19 cents out of every tax dollar went to pay interest on the public debt. This morning we discovered that two short years later 23 cents out of every tax dollar collected goes to pay interest on the public debt. An increase of almost 20 per cent, Mr. Speaker. That is what public debt is all about. It is spending money today so that your children and your grandchildren can pay for it. I looked at those figures this morning, and I found that interest on the public debt is getting very close to the sum total of all indirect taxes taken from Canadians in a year. It amounts to $200 per month per household to pay interest on the public debt. Instead of paying that against a mortgage, Canadians are forced to pay that to the bankers in Switzerland, in New York and Canada simply to pay interest on the public debt.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in case some of the Liberal backbenchers or some of the NDP think that is a good thing, there is something else to remember. There is a limited amount of money in the world and it is sold to people at a kind of auction based on interest rates. Every Canadian who has to go out and borrow money to buy a home or expand a small business has to go into that auction market and compete for the money. They can go and say, "If you will loan me that money, I will give you 16 per cent". But in the auction market somebody else says, "I will give you 16½". Someone else says, "I will give you 17", or it could be 17½, 18, 18½ or 19 per cent. Then the bidding stops and you get the money for 19 per cent. And if you get that today, you are lucky. Well, do you know who was bidding against you? The federal government. They were out there trying to borrow the same money you are trying to borrow for your home. And they, through that auction market, are driving up the cost of money.

Now, here we have a piece of legislation which will affect very few Canadians but which bears a title that suggests it is a panacea, the help that Canadians need. It says, focus your eye on it, the government is doing something. They have already spent an unknown amount of money advertising this program before Parliament even dealt with it. They drew the attention of Canadians to the fact that this piece of legislation was here, and said it would help. But each day that advertising campaign was going on, each day we stand here and debate the bill, that same government is out there borrowing money and driving up interest rates, thereby causing Canadians to pay a higher amount of money to borrow than would be true had we had a government in the last decade with any sense of fiscal responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, if we were not today paying 23 cents out of every tax dollar to pay interest on borrowed money, we could increase by 50 per cent the amount of money we spend on hospital care, social services and old age pensions, all of which touch the hearts of most of the members who sit in this chamber. It is help to those who need it most. But instead we send money off to the bankers in other parts of the world, 23 cents out of every dollar, $16.5 billion in total.

Last fall this government asked Canadians to buy Canada savings bonds at 19½ per cent. The minute they did that, Mr. Speaker, people had to pay 20, 20.5, 21 or 22 per cent to borrow money on a mortgage. The government was out there trying to get it at 19½ per cent, but if it is for your home, you have to go higher. And here we sit in this chamber tonight addressing ourselves to legislation which has been advertised with your tax dollars to distract your attention away from the fact that the primary reason that Canadians are losing sleep worrying about losing their homes, or in fact losing their homes, is this government's policies. Canadians are worried about what is going to happen in the next three or four months when their mortgages come up for renewal. Their health is suffering, the tension is there, but the advertising says: Do not worry, we will bail you out. The legislation gives the lie to that ad, but in the meantime Canadians are not supposed to recognize the fact that it is the government and its lack of a sense of responsibility which has created, over the last ten or 12 years, this situation of high interest rates that Canadians are trying to live with.

They do not only affect housing. When we build a house, we affect our society pretty dramatically. I will just read something into the record from an Informetrica study in April, 1980. It showed that for every additional 1,000 housing starts during a given year, 1,635 man-years of employment are created over the course of two years. For each 1,000 houses, 1,635 jobs are created, 460 of which go right into the construction industry. However, the remainder of those jobs are primarily generated in those sectors of the economy which supply material inputs and services to the construction industry. Five hundred and ten man-years of employment for 1,000 housing starts are generated in manufacturing. Hon. members of this chamber who come from Ontario and Quebec, particularly the southern parts, can look at their local newspapers, listen to the local radio stations, and watch the television news, and they can see all the examples of plant closures and people who are being put out of work as a result of lay-offs. I wonder if they remember those nine months of the Clark government in which a sense of direction was clearly signalled to this country, a sense of a government and a party which valued ownership. People believed and started to act on that sense of direction, and over that nine-month period an average of 35,000 jobs per month were created. In the public sector, tax spending jobs went down. However, in the private sector, tax generating jobs and the provision of goods and services went up throughout that entire nine-month period.

Then the Liberal Party, which consulted the NDP, decided that too much prosperity was not good for Canadians.

Mr. Gustafson: Right on.

Mr. Hawkes: They thought it was best to have many people unemployed so that the government could appeal to them politically. They would not be happy to have everyone working, satisfied and feeling productive. They said they would put the other guys back in. &ed3955;-1

I stand here in this House tonight, some two years later, and I find the exact opposite has happened. In the last year, Canadians have lost jobs at the rate of 35,000 a month. Two years ago, we were creating them at the rate of 35,000 a month. The NDP decided to put these guys on the other side back into power so we could lose 35,000 jobs a month.

Mr. Gustafson: Thanks to the NDP!

Mr. Hawkes: In all of the history of this nation since it started to keep statistics on employment, this was the first time when there were less jobs in the Canadian economy at the end of the year than there were at the beginning. I ask Your Honour, is that a consequence of the nine months of the Clark government, its policy and its legislation? Most Canadians may not realize it, but because of the filibuster of the NDP and the Liberal Party, we did not pass any legislation. They blocked the House. They filibustered. They would not let anything go through. However, the amount of jobs still went up because people sensed that there was an honest government which cared and which would attempt to keep its commitments.

What is wrong in Canada today? it is not necessarily the legislation. It is predominantly that sense of certitude here in this land that the group in charge in Ottawa is interested in public relations, in chicanery and, in deceit, but not in proposing honest policies which can be believed. In that climate, the people, the money and the equipment tend to drift, tend to be driven toward a political climate which investors view as more trustworthy. They want a sense of certitude. The tragedy in Canada is that they have a sense of certitude that they cannot trust and they cannot believe in the government.

If every Canadian could read those newspaper ads and the budget speech of the Minister of Finance and then look at the piece of the legislation before us tonight, Bill C-89, they would know that this piece of legislation is a piece of chicanery, a piece of trickery. It falls so far short of the promises of that budget speech and the tone of that advertising campaign that it becomes one more piece of concrete evidence that we have a cabinet in Canada whose members cannot be trusted. One cannot listen to what they say with belief. One simply cannot. Canadians now have such a sense of certitude in that respect that they do not follow up the details. They just think the first thought that comes to their minds. Each time the backbenchers on the opposite side and the New Democratic Party support that kind of chicanery, they undermine the long-term health of our entire parliamentary system.

Mr. Fulton: Point of order. Mr. Speaker, I would just like to point out to the Tories that they are voting two to one with the Liberals. As a matter of fact, they voted four times—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That does not constitute a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the hon. members in the NDP keep rising, and they do not like it to be known that there was a vote of confidence in this government last Friday, and that eight of their 33 members were missing. Twenty-five per cent would not even show up in this chamber in an effort to defeat this rotten government. Their new marvellous leader in the province of Ontario, drawing a public salary from this chamber, was sitting on a beach in Florida.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Hawkes: Now they stand and quote a voting record. Did they tell Your Honour what we voted for and what we vote against?

Mr. Epp: He didn't even come home from Strasbourg.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, I call to his attention the fact that the item before the House is a bill respecting housing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I should probably direct my attention to public housing of a particular kind.

Mr. Friesen: This is public housing.

Mr. Hawkes: Like a jail is a kind of public housing.

Mr. Fulton: Good place for Tories!

Mr. Hawkes: Sometimes I think our priorities of what is a danger to our society are a little mixed up.

Mr. Friesen: Cuba has public housing.

Mr. Hawkes: We let the wrong people out on the streets sometimes because they do not know what it is that they are doing. Any group of hon. members sitting down at the far end of this Chamber who would have chosen the budget which we are now debating over the budget of 1979 either did not do their homework or had no sense of integrity—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hawkes: —about what is right in this society. They did not read it, or they did not understand it, or they had no integrity. However, Canadians remember that 18-cent increase for a gallon of gas was too much. Two years later it is 86 cents. In my election campaign, I said to the people in my riding, "Remember wage and price controls—90 days is too much and we got more than ten times that much." I said that if they tell you 18 cents is too much, ten times 18 is $1.80.

• (2120)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, the Chair is listening with interest but having difficulty relating it to the subject before us.

Mr. Hawkes: When you have to increase the price of gasoline by $1.80 a gallon, you have no money left to pay the mortgage on your house. It is a very simple situation.

If you really want to make it relevant, the then finance minister from Newfoundland stood in the House and told Canadians that they had a choice as to whether or not to drive their cars. He said that we were going to raise the price of gasoline 18 cents a gallon, but if they did not drive their cars they would not have to put that 18 cents in the public till. However, because they had to heat their houses, he said there would not be any tax on home heating oil. He said we would put the tax where there is a choice as to whether to spend it, but there is no choice as to whether to heat your home, so we will not put a tax there.

The New Democratic Party, the Liberal Party west, joined with their partners across the way and said "That is not a good deal. We will kick you out, put the other guys in and increase taxes on home heating oil". They agreed to an indirect tax of $100 per month, and mortgage rates rising 8 per cent. They said now we will have equity. Do you know the purest form of equity, the easiest thing in the world to divide into equal shares? It is nothing.

If all of us cease to work and farmers cease to produce, we will come to a perfect state of equity. However, we value a society where those who want a little more, such as a little better home, car and better food, are willing to work a little harder to get it, they produce.

If the million unemployed Canadians could find useful work to do, we would be a nation engaged in the production of wealth. The harder we work, the more we produce, the better our health care systems, pensions for our senior citizens and those with physical handicaps.

That is the kind of vision that this party had and has. The Liberals and the New Democratic Party decided that our desire to provide tax relief to those who have to pay municipal taxes and make mortgage payments was not fair. They said all Canadians should not get some tax relief for owning a piece of property, a home.

Tonight, two years later, we stand in the House with a piece of legislation that will provide increased indebtedness to a segment of our society that is already in debt over its head, not able to make mortgage payments on their homes. This government says it will provide some insurance which will allow these people to borrow more money to go further into debt to delay the day of reckoning for two or three years. This legislation encourages a poorer segment of society to go deeper into debt and to postpone the day of reckoning for two years.

I ask members opposite whether they wish that back in December 1979 they had put in place the proposed scheme which would have provided tax relief for municipal taxes and interest payments on the mortgages of all Canadians who own a home. I ask the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party whether they feel that if that legislation had passed there would be today more construction, more jobs, more production in the factories of Ontario and Quebec of stoves, refrigerators, vacuum cleaners and carpets, and whether the demands for unemployment insurance and other social payments of that kind would be down because a higher portion of our population would be working. I ask hon. members to consider that.

I stand here tonight to accuse the New Democratic Party of causing this situation. That is who caused the opportunity system to put in a government that is unbelievable, cannot be trusted and is exceedingly destructive. I do so tonight as a Member of Parliament from the city of Calgary with the certain knowledge that some 25 miles from my home the voters last week elected a separatist. The reason they elected a separatist is that they do not trust, and they are looking for a way out. They are angry. They come from a part of this country where government policy, and government policy alone, has killed close to 50 per cent of the jobs in the exploration and service part of the oil industry. Government policy and government policy alone has decided to send the money to Mexico, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela and Libya instead of investing it in drilling rigs and in Canadians to drill for oil and gas, to refine and deliver. It is a government that has chosen to export jobs from my region of the country, and the people do not like it.

It is the government, supported by its backbenchers and the New Democratic Party which at one point said the first Constitution was marvellous, the people of Ontario and Quebec would be first-class citizens, each province with a veto, compounded by a veto in the House of Commons, because of their population majority. Those who live in the other eight provinces of Canada were to be satisfied with one third of the veto. We were one third as important. The NDP, most of its members from the west, said that was marvellous. They stood up in this chamber and voted for it. Several times they made speeches in praise of it. Gradually the people of western Canada began to find out about it. The anger lives on.

An hon. Member: Dishonest Tory drivel.

Mr. Hawkes: It is a region of the country where I was born and raised. It has some of the most generous people in the world. They are the kind of people who will give you the shirt off their back. They come from a pioneer tradition which says that you cannot take anything. If you ask for a gift, you will get it but if you try force, you will be resisted.

Day after day these people have to face a government which does not seem to comprehend the importance of this principle. It is a region of Canada where a handshake is worth more than a legal document. These westerners can look each other in the eye and say, "We agree". That is binding upon them. They cannot understand a government which says one thing and does another. They cannot understand why a piece of legislation is touted as helping to solve the housing problem when, in fact, it does nothing.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) knows that it does not solve the housing problem. I have respect for the President of the Treasury Board and I do not think he would stand on any platform to say that this legislation does. I hope I am right.

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my speech tonight on the housing bill I will say that I found it tragic to see western members of the other opposition party in the House laughing when a member from Calgary tried to deal with the separatist problem which was espoused in a byelection last week. I say this advisedly but I have become used to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) sneering at the views of those who try to express their feelings for the federal government. However, I was not expecting to see those sneers from the New Democratic Party. I was suprised to hear a reference to that tonight. In any event, tonight is not the occasion on which to debate that, but it will be a matter we will be debating in the future, because there are real problems to be solved in the west.

The member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) was correct in raising it tonight in connection with this legislation. This bill represents yet another attack on the dreams of all Canadians, wherever they come from. It represents the conclusion to a string of reductions of federal government commitments to private sector housing which goes back nearly 25 years, and most recently from the last election.

The member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) earlier gave a list of the litany of claims by the current minister responsible for housing with regard to this matter. Therefore, I will not go into them now. I happen to know the minister well from our days together on council in metropolitan Toronto. Therefore, I knew exactly what he meant and I am sure he chose his words well when he said, in introducing this bill, "The bill before the House for second reading is a response to the serious difficulty which faces Canadians." I know that the minister chooses his words well. He did not say "a significant response" or "an important response" or "an effective response". He is honest enough to know that it is only "a response". We hear consistently throughout this debate that the mortgage assistance proposal is for $50 million and the multiple unit assistance proposal in the bill is for $350 million over two years. That is $400 million over two years for the total program, if you like.

To most Canadians that may sound like a great deal of money. It is if it is viewed in absolute terms. Perhaps we should try to put the government's housing priorities into context. The government is to provide $50 million in an attempt to deal with the problems of 920,000 Canadians who will face mortgage renewals during the lifetime of this program; of whom 50,000 fewer will even get help, we are told. What does this $50 million represent? It represents what we gave to the Algerian government to build a monument. In other words, this government's housing priority is just as important as a 434 foot monument in Algeria.

The government intends to provide $350 million over two years, or $175 million per year, to help those in need of rental housing in Canada. This also sounds like a lot of money. Rental housing is no more critical than in my home town where our vacancy rate is approximately 0.03 per cent. But $175 million per year represents exactly twice what the government wastes on its advertising budget. I will put it in a context which will make great sense to the House. Although we do not have all the details, we have discovered that the government has made a commitment to assist the Soviet Union in the construction of a gas pipeline. It is to be financed, we are told, through the Export Development Corporation guarantee, and although the figures are not confirmed, that guarantee is for approximately $600 million. Of that $600 million, approximately $275 million will be spent in Canada and the interest on that money, since we are guaranteeing the reduction of the rate from 16 per cent to 10 per cent, we are told, will effectively be a gift costing the Canadian taxpayer approximately $125 million. When those figures are added up, we will give away $125 million and lose in terms of the support, since the money will not be spent in Canada, somewhere between $200 million and $350 million.

In other words, building the Russian gas pipeline is somewhere between two or three times more important to the government than housing for tenants in Canada. If we review it in that context, of a government which came into office promising to lower energy prices and then raping western Canada for $52 billion, perhaps if we look at it in the context of a government which is stealing $52 billion from the private sector in the oil and resource development area, and understand that what they are prepared to put back into housing is less than they will give the Russians, maybe it will clarify for Canadians the government's view on housing.

During my lifetime, which is not that long, and for years before, the single greatest support has been shelter, not just for old age when people come to need it but for their sense of wellbeing and feeling of independence. In my city, the number of tenants has increased from 20 per cent to 60 per cent since the war. There is a very valid reason why we built a lot of rental housing. We built—incidentally, the government did not build, the private investors built it—the housing in response to the household formation change which we sometimes call, in demographic terms, the baby boom. At the same time that we were doing this, we built a great deal of ownership housing in Toronto because we could see the time coming when those born during the baby boom grew up to their present age. When the CMHC documents predicted the majority demand would be for ownership housing, we knew it was necessary to have a stock to serve that demand in Toronto as well as across Canada.

Today we face interest rates which make it impossible for that baby boom generation of Canadians who are on the verge of being able to achieve what they thought was their dream and that of their parents; to own their own home. We now face policies which have made it impossible for them to do that.

As a party we argued in the last election campaign that home ownership is so important to the nation and to Canadians that it is well past the time we understood that it is simply unjust to say that Canadians should have to pay municipal tax out of after-tax income. They ought to be able to deduct their municipal tax from their federal tax. It is well past the time for us to understand that it is unjust to say that once a person has bought his house he may, through the tax system, reborrow money to make other investments and be able to deduct the interest then but not, at the same time, be able to deduct the interest to buy the house in the first place. That was the tax equity which was represented by our party's mortgage tax credit plan.

The government finally, having said throughout the election campaign that it did not understand or did not accept that there was a tax equity argument, recognized in the November budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen)—if I can be cynical—the argument that there is a question of equity in tax treatment. Did the government consider bringing in the only sensible policy to correct that inequity and make it possible for people who cannot afford homes and who are faced with monstrous increases in their mortgage interest rates to deduct? No, and this is not really perhaps as widely understood as I would like it to be. The government's sense of equity was not to make it possible for people to deduct the interest when they first get a home; the government made it impossible for anybody else to deduct interest. In other words, rather than creating an incentive to help people build homes and help people buy them, in the budget the government took away the right of other people to deduct interest for other investments.

It is fundamental to an understanding of the philosophy behind this pittance of a housing bill to understand that it is not separate from the context of the economic philosophy of the government opposite. There are several reasons why, for example, we have a vacancy shortage of the kind we do in rental housing. The most significant point is that the rental housing market, which is where people start in the system when they come out of school or form their first household while they build up some equity to buy a home, was killed by the government opposite. It was killed when the government opposite some years ago took away the incentive for small investors to invest directly in rental property. It used to be in Canada that if a person had a little extra money and wanted to buy or build a duplex or a little apartment building or if a person had a loss or the depreciation of a building created a loss, he could carry that in his personal income, and it was a stimulation for those who wanted to help support their old age by having a little building with three to four units or a couple of units. Let us look at how apartments were created originally in Canada. In Montreal, for instance, nearly 50 per cent of the apartments were created using that system. This government started there. It killed that right to deduct, and it has done so persistently throughout its economic policy. This government regards this as some kind of tax loophole. It killed the right to get tax relief if a person is willing to invest in his country.

Mr. MacKay: They do not want you to own anything.

Mr. Bosley: It shows up again here where, having promised relief to home owners in order to get votes in the last election, the government now comes along and says that the only people who will get any help from the government are those who have no equity left because the economic policies of the government have destroyed home values. I can refer to case after case in my riding in which house values have dropped 35 per cent or more in the last year, which means there will be no equity left. In such a case, if a person is now bankrupt in house value, he will get a grant from the government. If he has not yet made it to that point under this program, the proposal before us is that he be allowed to borrow what little he has left as an interest deferral so that the government can take it from him next year when the program expires.

The government tried this in relation to AHOP and ARP. The government has slowly but surely eroded the ability to own by taking away the incentives for people to invest in mortgages and by taking away the incentive for people to build affordable rental housing, and the litany goes on and on.

The scariest part of the budget is not this statement of budget policy on housing assistance. The scariest part is when this policy gets to its final logical conclusion. I refer to the policy of the last 25 years of changes to the National Housing Act, changes to CMCH provisions and changes respecting who can invest in this country. The final change is on the tax expenditure side of the budget document. If Canadians will look, they will find a statement that, according to the mandarins in the Department of Finance, we can look forward to the day when Canadians will have rent imputed to them on houses they own. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) looks askance. He knows full well where this is in the document. If he has not read it yet, I find that difficult to believe. If he reads it, he will find the proposal to impute rent on an owned home one lives in and has paid for. That imputed rent would be added to taxable income.

Mr. MacKay: It is called confiscation.

Mr. Bosley: In other words, if the government cannot drive people out with interest rates, it will do so with tax burdens. To anyone who follows the history of the fiscal policy of the government in relation to housing the conclusion of this policy should come as no surprise. Its conclusion is in the statement on the tax expenditure side of the budget document because that is the direction in which we have been going all this time. There seems somehow to be no awareness on the part of hon. members opposite that housing expenditures have been the most important expenditures Canadians make. Housing expenditures form some 30 per cent of the consumer price index. They have formed anywhere from 6 per cent to 8 per cent—in good years—of our gross national product. They have also been the underpinning of much of our society's economy through all their spin-off effects. Every time a house is built, bricklayers are put to work, electricians are put to work and plumbers are put to work. People who build roads are put to work building roads to that house. People who build furniture are put to work to provide furniture for that house. People who make carpets are put to work to provide carpets for that house. People who make windows are put to work to make windows for that house. We do not need a policy which will result, as this policy confirms, in a drop in housing starts of 30 per cent in one year. Projections in the government's own documents are just crazy. Last year we were getting projections from CMHC, and now we are falling short of those projections. I suspect next year the results will be even below this year's projections from the CMHC, not just because there is a fundamental lack of investor confidence in the policies of this government—

Mr. Cosgrove: Check the facts.

Mr. Bosley: The minister responsible for housing says I should check the facts. I suggest that the minister responsible for housing check his back because he will find that the pride the people of Scarborough felt for him when he was mayor will not reward him with a return to this House.

Mr. MacKay: Johnny one-time.

Mr. Cosgrove: Check the facts.

Mr. Bosley: The minister responsible for housing keeps yelling, "Check the facts". The facts are that the minister promised Canadians mortgage relief, not 50,000 of 920,000, which is a pittance. If that is what he means by a fact, he should check his facts. I think the minister knows that full well.

Mr. Epp: He is just uncomfortable.

Mr. Bosley: Let me refer again to the minister's comments, since he has interjected, because it will perhaps make the point as well as it can be made. The minister speaks of facts. This is the government's philosophy on rental accommodation: "The fact is that without government support the construction of rental accommodation in this country is simply not a viable business". That is true, Mr. Speaker, because of the policies of the government opposite over the last 15 or 20 years. It seems to permeate every policy that comes from the other side. There seems to be a sense that the only way to get the economy going again is through some form of government support. Yet that will drive the country into fiscal bankruptcy, if it has not already.

There seems to be a sense that the way to get a rental housing policy is to take away all incentive to invest and then to tell people to come cap in hand, and they will get a $7,500 interest free loan. That is what we have as a rental housing policy.

The argument goes like this, Mr. Speaker. Last year's policy, MURB, under which 25,000 units were built, is no good; that what we need is to get rid of that and instead have a policy that will build 15,000 units over two years through interest free loans. People are supposed to believe that that is a better and more productive policy than encouraging them to build through MURBs and all the other incentives that are now gone, such as the capital cost allowance, depreciation or write-offs into personal income. According to the Liberal government, none of that worked but in fact, Mr. Speaker, those policies built the houses that Canadians live in today.

People were operating at a profit, however. Some people paid lower rents than they do today. The market vacancy rate was 5 per cent or 6 per cent and, as a result, rents were held down. So the government got rid of all those things and created a system based on the belief that without government support the construction of rental accommodation is simply not a viable business in this country.

Why does the government believe that is a necessary policy, Mr. Speaker? The answer is quite simple. It is the same answer as that which was given by the government in the National Energy Program. In effect, the government says that we cannot afford to let private individuals in this country develop oil and gas. The government will do it. It will levy taxes and confiscate as well. This government does not believe that it can afford to let private individuals accomplish things in this country. That is evident in this bill and it is evident in the National Energy Program. I see the minister who is responsible for the Kent commission is in the House. This shows up in the policy that says that we cannot trust newspapers in this country either, and that we had better have people interfere with them. This is the consistent view that runs through Liberal policy today.

All the budget does, through this bill and all the other programs, is to take the trend line of the last 12 years of Liberal management of the country and because the existing political leadership of the Liberal Party is not going to be here after the next election, one way or the other—either they will honour their promises to quit or we will beat them—they have decided not to wait 12 years but to accomplish everything in four. The only accomplishment of the budget is to accelerate the idea that there is some sort of free lunch and that Canadians will understand that and vote accordingly. It promotes the idea that the way to get a house in this country is to become broke. In that case, the government will offer assistance. That is the way people can get shelter they can afford—not because they go out and earn the money to make a downpayment. We believe that taxpayers ought to be able to deduct the borrowing cost of that asset from their taxes, because a house is the single asset that is a protection against inflation. No matter what happens in the rest of the world, every Canadian who owns a home and has paid off the mortgage knows that he or she is about as well protected from the ravages of inflation as is possible.

Apparently the government does not believe we can afford that; it does not believe that we can afford to have independent thinking Canadians, and so it proposes to take away the sense of security that comes from having made an investment in a home. The government wants to make everybody dependent.

I do not say that lightly, Mr. Speaker. When I was outside politics it took me a long time to see the trend line emerge and to come to the realization that the socialism represented in the housing policies of the government is endemic to everything it does.

We must establish that this policy is not independent of the rest of the government's policies. On that score I should like to deal with some information which was available to the government in a document issued by CMHC planners in July, 1981, entitled "The Demographic Future: Impacts on the Demand for Housing in Canada, 1981-2001." It was produced by Philip W. Brown of Market Forecasts and Analysis Division, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and was prepared for a symposium held at the University of British Columbia. The document laid out very clearly what was going to happen to housing trends in the country. It forecast that the major problem of 1980s and 1990s will almost certainly be the rental market.

That should not come as a surprise to those of us who follow this issue in the urban centres of this country, Mr. Speaker. Did we see stimulus through MURBs or stimulus for people who would build any form of rental housing? We did not. What we got was an argument from the government that it believed that 15,000 units of accommodation provided by the private sector over two years is all the government help that is needed. We see an indication that the social housing side, which I admit is important, is more important to the government than simply getting people to invest in housing in this country.

The author makes the following point about the expectations of the baby boom generation. Members of that generation are now at the age when they are just about to buy a house, but he points out that this will not be possible for them. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the suggestion in the budget that a whole generation of Canadians should not be able to afford a home was already known to the minister and to Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. He suggests that there is more here than a simple failure to understand the rest of the world; that there is in fact a cynical attempt to prevent people from owning homes. On page 25 there appears the statement, "The whole question of expectation levels, for example, is critical". In the last paragraph he writes:

> Realization that erosion of expectations is imminent or threatened may result in a search for further alternatives to curtail household expenditures besides the usual steps to increase income.

He goes on to indicate that the only solution for those who may want to own a home in this country may be to resort to some form of co-operative housing.

I appreciate that my time is about up, Mr. Speaker, but I want to say that if the only answer to the problem in this country is co-operative housing, if we have seen the end of the private home in this country, then I for one fear greatly about what will happen to my country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House deemed to have been moved.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—(A) INQUIRY RESPECTING INVESTIGATION OF CONVICTED MURDERER CLIFFORD OLSON; (B) STATEMENT MADE BY PROSECUTOR

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I rose in the House to ask some questions of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) regarding the last four days of July, the activities of Clifford Olson and the manner in which the RCMP handled that particular problem. I do not like to ask those kinds of questions. I have a great deal of admiration for the RCMP. I admire its work and I have total confidence in it, yet it appears something has gone wrong in the handling of the affairs of Clifford Olson. The fact that the government is keeping a lid on this is keeping line officers of the RCMP from doing their very best and maintaining their reputation.

I should like to cite one simple example. A resident of an Edmonton suburb came to me a year ago and told me about an event in that community. Some young people were having a private party. In the midst of it, a gang of 60 or more young people came from the city of Edmonton to disrupt that very quiet and peaceful party. The parents then called on the RCMP in the community to come and take care of the disturbance. Two constables came out, handled the situation with dispatch and great efficiency, quelled the uprising if it can be called that, and the parents were supremely happy. The next or the following day the staff sergeant of the detachment wanted to discipline the two constables because they had not quite followed the book in the way they handled the affair.

This is what bothers me. It seems the staff sergeant was much more concerned about public image, public reputation and fear that public questions might be asked and, therefore, wanted to discipline the officers rather than commend them. It seems that in the Edmonton case the staff sergeant, middle management, wanted success to look life failure, and in the Olson case it looks to me like middle and upper management of the RCMP wanted failure to look like success. In both cases I believe the officers have done their work and have done it well, but somewhere in the Olson case, upper and middle management have made a series of errors and have frustrated the work of line officers. We need to know what has gone wrong in the decision-making level of the RCMP in this particular case.

Let me cite the sequence. On July 27 Burnaby RCMP were briefed by one of the officers on Olson as a prime suspect. He outlined the 92 convictions and the kinds of convictions which comprised the career of Clifford Olson. On the same day Surrey RCMP issued a warrant for Olson on a charge of indecent assault, and the police were commanded to arrest him forthwith. On July 28, the next day, eight cars of officers were involved in apprehending Olson and taking him into custody. Eight cars of officers were involved; I presume that would be 16 officers. On July 29 Olson walked out of jail in Surrey; he walked out of custody and surveillance of him was dropped. In the process the serious crimes division of the RCMP indicated that it wanted the warrant "taken care of", whatever that means.

On July 30, the following day, Olson spent the best part of the morning in a coffee shop with some RCMP officers discussing the offences of other criminals; there was a warrant outstanding on him but he was not arrested. On July 31 the special "O" unit of the RCMP asked for surveillance again. In the meantime, Olson had killed his eleventh and, presumably, his final victim. Again on July 31, the same day as the special "O" unit asked for surveillance to be dropped, the prosecutor asked that the "warrant be vacated". On the one hand the special unit wants surveillance, on the other hand there is an application to vacate the warrant.

There are some serious questions, and I want to enumerate them in the two or three minutes I have left. First, why was the warrant issued four days previously and then vacated? In four days it was vacated. Second, why did the prosecutor on July 31 say, "I didn't get feedback from the police."? Four days previously Olson had been named a prime suspect and 16 officers were involved in his apprehension. Third, why could officers spend all morning with him and not arrest him when they knew there was a warrant out for him? Fourth, who authorized Olson's release?

Why will the assistant commissioner Don Wilson and the Solicitor General not answer these questions? Why do they choose to stonewall? I can say with assurance that these questions will not go away. They will be answered one way or the other. The Solicitor General says he wants to maintain the integrity of the RCMP. The only way he can do that is to be open and honest, and free them from the pall of universal guilt they are sharing because several people have apparently made some wrong decisions. The Solicitor General has not come clean on that.

I am again asking for a full and independent inquiry into the affairs of this case.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to indicate that I agree with my colleague when he says that he admires the RCMP. I believe that most Canadians appreciate the job they do. I would suggest to the hon. member who intends to repeat the same questions again that, rather than making political mileage out of tragic events which occurred in British Columbia, he should tell the population that the administration of justice is exclusively a provincial matter, and I would also advise him to provide accurate information.

[English]

On February 19 last, the hon. member asked questions of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) pertaining to details of the police investigation of Clifford Olson. The Solicitor General then answered that the attorney general of British Columbia had answered these questions previously. As well, they were the subject of a press conference held by the RCMP in Vancouver. It is always better to have the facts of an investigation explained by those close to the scene and this has been done in this case. Answers have been provided and can continue to be provided by those who were involved in the investigation, namely, the local RCMP and the attorney general of British Columbia.

With respect to the hon. member's second question, the Solicitor General has asked the attorney general of British Columbia if he was satisfied with the police conduct of the investigation, and I am sure that if the prosecutor had not been properly briefed by the police, the attorney general of British Columbia would have mentioned this to the minister. He did not do so.

Adjournment Debate

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—(A) CONSTRUCTION OF MONUMENT IN ALGERIA; (B) USE OF CORPORATION RESOURCES

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, the question I raised on February 11, 1982, regarding the appropriateness of Canadians financing the construction of a large edifice for Algeria, to the extent of $50 million, is fairly complex. My colleague across the aisle will tonight probably be attempting, as well as he can, to justify this particular course of action. I will leave that to him. Obviously there are certain benefits for Canadian business, shipping and other elements, that will to some extent justify, at least in the minds of the government, this rather unusual exercise on behalf of the Export Development Corporation. On the other hand, I feel there are higher and better priorities for the Export Development Corporation. The answer given by the minister on February 11, reads as follows:

Madam Speaker, this is not at all unusual. It is an ordinary export financing operation of the EDC.

That, Mr. Speaker, is manifestly stretching the point.

I do not know how many other projects we are financing around the world which involve building a monument to a revolution in a country where the money could probably be very much better utilized for some other purpose. I do not know if there are any other countries building similar monuments. If there are, perhaps the minister's answer may be factually correct, but I would sure like to hear about them tonight.

In addition, as a matter of principle, I and many other Canadians would like to know the reason for the secrecy surrounding the interest and repayment terms. I suppose it will be contended, as it often is, that commercial necessity or confidentiality is the criterion. In my view, Sir, this is utter nonsense. Canadian taxpayers are entitled to know what their government agencies are doing, on what basis and for what purpose. But this government, Sir, has never believed that, and it is unrealistic for me, I suppose, to expect any answer on that score tonight.

My feelings are not unique, and I am getting quite a bit of mail on this matter. One letter which came in today from a Toronto businessman pretty well sums up the feelings, I think, of many Canadians when they read about these subsidized projects involving gas projects in the Soviet Union, which are of doubtful strategic value and cost Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars in subsidies, or Algerian monuments. This letter is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). It bears a fairly recent postmark, although we cannot expect too much from the mail these days. As you know, Mr. Speaker, it costs 30 cents to mail a letter, which works out to about one cent a day in delivery time. The letter reads:

The attached newspaper item was published on the same page as the obituaries and rightly so, as it represents what is surely the death of reason! May I, as a poor slob of a taxpayer—

And this is the way the man feels:

—please have explained to me, how $46,700,000 can be justified to the benefit of my fellow Canadians, with the exception of Messrs Lavalin International of Montreal, Quebec.

I should say at this point, Mr. Speaker, that company is only doing its job as an aggressive Canadian corporation. I have no quarrel with it; the priorities are what bother me. The letter goes on to say:

I am told that we (the public) must use restraint and conserve our monetary resources, and not buy unnecessary things like homes, automobiles, appliances, or anything that might improve the employment problems, directly involved. And yet you have authorized the outrageous amount to build a bloody monument—

I know that you don't give a damn what people like me think, but perhaps you could make an exception in this case and explain to me the following:

Now, this is a Canadian taxpayer and businessman speaking. He says:

If you feel that you have to waste these funds anyway, why not on a hospital, school, factory, or something useful.

My sentiments, exactly, Sir. He goes on:

What are the terms of the loan and what interest?

Do you really think we will get an answer to that? I do not think so, Sir. It goes on:

How many Canadians are going to benefit from the actual construction and from the effects, after the . . . thing is finished.

In fairness, there are jobs being created there now. As I said, it is not all on the down side. However, that is a good point. Next June, when this accelerated project is over and the people of Algeria have their monument, what lasting good is it going to do for the people of either Canada or Algeria? The letter goes on:

How much (dollars) business did Canada do with Algeria in 1981, that the Algerians actually paid for, and I don't mean a Third World grant.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, there is a real problem, as far as our taxpayers are concerned, in using our Export Development Corporation to finance a project like this. Despite Canadian content, despite the good things that may be said in terms of making a breakthrough in Algeria with Canadian technology—if this occurs it is not all on the down side—the problem is compounded greatly, Sir, by the persistent lack of information and co-operation which agencies like the Export Development Corporation put in the way of taxpayers like this man who wants to know what the heck is going on. Many Canadians do not mind helping the Third World, either through an Export Development Corporation loan, or through CIDA, as far as that goes. That is an entirely different matter, but even in this regard we cannot find out what is going on.

As members opposite may know, we are presently negotiating to spend about $200 million in Trinidad and Tobago to construct two airports and a prison. I do not know whether this is a good thing, but it is a sure thing. We could certainly use money like that, and like the money provided through the EDC alone to Algeria, here in Canada.

I have recently written to the minister in charge of economic development about industries in Nova Scotia which have a high export potential, such as Sydney Steel and Hawker Siddeley Canada Ltd. in Trenton, Nova Scotia. We would love to see the Canadian Export Development Corporation financing steel rails or railway rolling stock which would be useful to Third World countries and would protect the jobs of thousands of Nova Scotians.

I see that my allotted time has just about expired.

However, instead of that, we have a priority, through a very potentially useful export development agency which is utilized by a Third World country, to build a monument, financed to some extent by the people of Canada on a subsidized basis. We do not know the terms. We do not know, in fact, if it is a soft loan or if we will ever get it back. I am sure none of us in this chamber, including my hon. friend opposite who will be very ably defending this transaction, really believes that this was the purpose for which the Export Development Corporation was founded or that this is the highest and best use of this kind of credit. Much as this may appeal to the nationalistic and historical tendencies of the Algerian people who want to build a monument, I think there are quite a few other things they could build first.

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to give some clarification to the hon. member.

In December, the Export Development Corporation agreed to provide $47.6 million or 85 per cent of the value of a contract awarded to Lavalin International for the first phase of an important project in Algeria. This contract includes design, engineering, services, construction management and the provision of Canadian goods and services. All this, Mr. Speaker, means providing 3,000 man-years of employment in Canada.

This project, the main purpose of which is to commemorate the twentieth anniversary of Algerian independence, includes the building of facilities and public works. In fact, the monument to the martyrs will be built within the context of a vast development project including the building of public facilities such as museums, shops, etc. The financing provided for this project is part of a credit margin of $1.2 billion agreed upon in 1980 between the Export Development Corporation and the Algerian Development Bank. Therefore, the financing of this project is normal for the provision of Canadian goods and services and is similar to the type of export financing granted by the EDC to other countries.

This is neither a subsidy nor a loan, but straight financing. Moreover, there are ongoing trade negotiations between the Lavalin Corporation and the Algerian authorities regarding another contract for the provision of goods and services within the same project. However, it would not be proper at this time to comment on the terms and conditions of this potential contract as long as the negotiations with the foreign customers have not been completed. Hon. members surely realize that in this case, the client's motive and sensitivity will not allow us to discuss this matter as long as the trade and financial arrangements have not been finalized. All further arrangements would be subject to the same terms and conditions as the present contract. However, consistent with a long-established policy in the area of export financing, interest rates are never made public, as they are negotiated in each case and their disclosure could jeopardize future transactions. I repeat that this is not a new approach which would apply to Algeria alone, but is the current policy of the EDC.

AIR SAFETY—MANAGEMENT OF AVIATION SAFETY BOARD

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, this evening I would like to pursue, in more depth, a question I raised today in the House. Unfortunately, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) was not available to comment on it. This was unfortunate because it concerned the third and final report of Justice Dubin on air safety in Canada and the combination of roughly 247 extremely well-founded recommendations for improving the safety of the entire air transportation system in this country.

Within that report there were three key aspects to implementing the recommendations Justice Dubin laid out. Those three key areas involve reorganization of the department, a legislative process that would give force and effect to the recommendations that were proposed and, finally, a financial commitment that would see those recommendations put in place in an effective manner.

The first question related to the matter of reorganizing the department. What is basically needed here is a concept paper or a background paper that would allow the individuals in this country involved in the system to understand where the government is going and to learn of its commitment. There is also a question involving the Canadian aviation safety board, its structure and operation, its relationship to other federal departments and provincial authorities such as coroners and the Workmen's Compensation Board which, because of reneging on the federal air transport administration, has wound up involved in the air safety business. There is also the question regarding the enforcement branch, its structure and operation.

Canada has had some fairly effective laws and committed individuals in the field. Because of problems and a lack of resolve in the whole area of enforcement, our system has collapsed at least to the point where the government of the day and the population are seriously concerned about air safety and the need to strengthen this enforcement arm. Had enforcement been more rigourous at the senior levels, we would probably not have this problem before us in its present scope.

A very important part of reorganization is the placing of search and rescue under the aegis of the Ministry of Transport.

This is a very significant and important role. We need information, whether it is a concept paper or some kind of a background information, to know where the government is going in this direction and to learn of its commitment.

The second point the government might consider in the development of such a paper is the idea of explaining the legislative process which will be used to implement the recommendations to the people of Canada. The group task force on the Aeronautics Act has been struggling valiantly for years with this project. I suppose we will not see the fruits of their labours in the term of this Parliament. If we wait too long for a finished piece of legislation which encompasses everything in the Dubin report, we will probably never have it during this Parliament. This will pass on as a temporary embarrassment, and the government will forget about it.

On the other hand, it would be interesting to learn from the government what its intentions are in terms of providing us with the legislative program to implement the Canadian aviation safety board, the delegation of authority to the enforcement branch, the strengthening of airworthiness and personnel licensing.

My last request, and this would be extremely interesting, is to have the government's intentions outlined in the form of the background paper on the financial commitment that will be required to put this entire report and its recommendations, which the minister has already endorsed, in place. This will all require capital investment for airport improvements, navigation system improvements, communications, and financial commitments for radar.

The parliamentary secretary today again announced, and this has been announced I do not know how many times, the $217 million ramp program. I do not know how many times we have heard about this. We know the program will be phased in over ten years. There are some very serious questions about it. We need information, information that should be made public. The program should be accelerated, and it must ensure that the equipment is the top state of the art. We need a concept or white paper to tell us what are the intentions of the government. Financial commitments for training programs are extremely important. Who will bear this burden? Will it be the taxpayers? What will be the effect on small carriers? How will these costs be passed through to private aviation? These are all questions in terms of the financial commitment of the government on which we need some information.

There has to be a solid commitment on the part of the government; a sharing of information; a commitment of financial and human resources to put the recommendations of the Dubin report in place. I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to shed some light on these matters.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since the tabling of the first volume of the Commission of Inquiry on Aviation Safety, the minister has made a continual effort to respond quickly and positively to Judge Dubin's recommendations.

Legislation to establish a Canadian aviation safety board, as recommended in Volume I of the report, is well advanced and should be ready for tabling in Parliament late this spring. As recently announced, a newly published compliance and enforcement manual gives effect to recommendations in Volume II, that a more vigorous enforcement policy be adopted. Amendments to the Aeronautics Act, also recommended in Volume II, are being developed and a bill will be brought before Parliament at the earliest practicable date.

The third and final volume is highly technical and requires some study. However, the minister will give it high priority and the hon. member should have confidence that the minister will respond to it in the same positive manner as he responded to the previous volumes.

Action has already been taken in some areas identified by Judge Dubin in Volume III. For example, emergency locator transmitters, conforming to new standards, will again become mandatory as of April 1, 1982. As for upgrading radar, tendering for a new radar system, expected to cost over $217 million, will begin in a few weeks.

On previous occasions the hon. member has called for the removal of the senior management of the air administration. The minister has asked for co-operation and open-mindedness on the part of his officials in responding to Judge Dubin's fundamental reassessment of the civil aviation system. The positive action taken on Volumes I and II demonstrates that he has so far received it. The minister fully expects that he will continue to enjoy the support of his officials in promoting and maintaining the safest possible civil aviation system.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 10.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

BALTIC EVENING

TENTH ANNUAL FUNCTION ON PARLIAMENT HILL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I move under the provisions of Standing Order 43 a motion which I hope will have the unanimous consent of the House. Having regard to the function which is to take place on Parliament Hill this evening I move, seconded by the hon. member for London West (Mr. Burghardt), and also seconded, if the rules permit it, by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky):

That this House, in recognition of the contribution to Canada of Canadians of Latvian, Lithuanian and Estonian descent, welcome their honorary consul and representatives of the respective communities to the tenth annual Baltic Evening on Parliament Hill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ADMINISTRATION

CALL FOR FIRING OF TWO MINISTERS AND EIGHT QUEBEC MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, yesterday in this House the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) endorsed the firing of civil servant Neil Fraser for objecting to government policy procedures such as metrication. In light of the double standard which this implies for Canadians in that it is a denial of basic civil liberties for some, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House call upon the Prime Minister to fire his two cabinet ministers and eight Quebec Liberal MPs who, in writing, publicly denounced the government's economic and high interest rate policies.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE SOUGHT FOR INDUSTRIES IN NOVA SCOTIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my motion under Standing Order 43 is pursuant to serious unemployment in Nova Scotia. Hawker Siddeley Canada Ltd. desperately requires orders, domestic or export, for its work force which forms the main industry for the town of Trenton, Nova Scotia. It is a key employer for the region. As I have had no substantive response from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) in nearly three weeks to a request for assistance for this industry and for increased rail orders for Sydney Steel, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That in addition to financing projects like Algerian monuments through the Export Development Corporation, and preparing to undertake a $200 million CIDA program for Trinidad and Tobago, to construct two airports and a prison, some comparable effort be made to assist industries like the ones I have mentioned which are terribly important to Canadians, on the basis that there is some substance to the saying that charity begins at home.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In its latest quarterly report the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation predicts that housing starts in Canada will drop by 9 per cent this year as a direct result of the government's high interest rate policy. The CMHC also predicts that British Columbia will suffer a greater decline in housing starts than any other province, further adding to the unacceptably high shelter costs of British Columbia presently being aggravated by a 35 per cent cut in federal mortgage assistance for social housing projects in my province. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this government direct a substantial part of the more than $1 billion of unallocated funds in the new estimates to give a shot in the arm to the housing industry to help out Canadian forestry and construction workers, supporting industries, home owners and renters alike.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

REQUEST THAT LEATHER FOOTWEAR CATEGORY BE INCLUDED IN GLOBAL QUOTA—MOTION UNDER S.O 43

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, particularly where Quebec and Ontario are concerned, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the footwear industry policy announced recently by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) excluded leather footwear from the over-all quota; whereas according to industry experts, there is no doubt that survival of the footwear industry depends on the inclusion of leather footwear in the quota system; I move, seconded by the member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges):

That the House unanimously urge the minister responsible to have leather footwear included forthwith in the over-all quota, that being the only way to prevent the loss of thousands of jobs for thousands of Canadians, especially in Quebec and Ontario.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion presented by the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

POLITICAL PARTIES

LIBERAL PARTY—SPEECH MADE BY MEMBER FOR LAC-SAINT-JEAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, as a Canadian who has always wondered what the basic tenets of the Liberal Party really are, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson):

That the House heartily congratulate the member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) for neatly stating what a Liberal really stands for as clearly articulated in his speech in this House on January 29 when he said, "If in order to promote our development the Liberal Party thinks we have to be communistic, we shall be communistic. This is what it is all about to be a Liberal. To be a Liberal is to be open to all ideas", and when he further said, "To be a Liberal does not mean to fight for a province called Quebec, or a country called Canada, to fight for NATO or the Warsaw Pact. To be a Liberal is first and foremost to be an elected representative. In such a situation, anything can be justified".

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43. Equalization payments to poorer provinces so that Canadians, no matter where they live, all have reasonably comparable levels of public service, were thought to be so intrinsic to the nature of Canada that they are provided for in the new Constitution. The federal government must not compound its already tragic abandonment of co-operative federalism by adding to its attack on the funding for health care and post-secondary education the unilateral imposition of an equalization formula after only a short period of negotiations with the provinces. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the federal government withdraw its ultimatum to the provinces, restore funding for established programs financing to its full level, and look for an equalization formula that would more fully protect Canadians in have-not provinces from deterioration of public services.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, the Farm Credit Corporation has stated that its budget for loans to qualified farmers has been depleted and that it can no longer accept new applications or process those already on hand, which means that many more farmers who have depended on receiving loans from the corporation to keep solvent will now go bankrupt. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the government take immediate steps to provide emergency funding to the Farm Credit Corporation in order to prevent any further bankruptcies in the farming industry, which could reach as high as 3,000 by spring.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HEALTH

GOVERNMENT HEALTH CARE POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Dantzer):

That this House ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to reconsider her headlong rush toward proposing health care policies that will promote the spending of taxpayer dollars on expensive programs to the detriment of equally effective but less costly health care programs. Home care is less costly than hospital care and a sensible health care policy would recognize the reality of that and similar facts.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SMALL BUSINESS

CALL FOR REDUCTION IN MINISTER'S SALARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, three years have passed since the small business financing review was initiated, and there is still no report. The Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Lapointe) has started two more studies, "Small business and the federal macroeconomic policy" and, would you believe, a study analysing the characteristics of a successful small business. It is now obvious that this minister does not have the slightest comprehension of his portfolio and, given that the November 12 budget has wiped out the five years of work and accomplishment of the secretariat for small business I move, under Standing Order 43, seconded by my colleague, the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the minister's competence be now recognized and his salary reduced to one dollar a year.

Some hon. Members: Too much.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS CHEMICALS IN MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgency and importance to CN workers and residents in northern Manitoba. The material from a chemical spill at Austin, Manitoba, is being transported in open, uncovered cars by rail to Lynn Lake, Manitoba. These cars are stopped in transit on sidings within the town limits of the The Pas, Manitoba, raising concerns from the community about the danger of the chemicals to CN workers and people living in the vicinity.

Given the fact that workers were given no warning about the hazardous material they were handling—I wish the Conservatives cared about this—given the fact that the workers were given no warning about the hazardous material they were handling and were not wearing protective clothing, despite a previous telex from CN which promised that the chemicals would be covered and that protective gear would be provided to workers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky):

That there be an immediate investigation into this incident and into CN's overall procedures in the handling of dangerous chemicals, and further that the Minister of Labour stop stalling and immediately introduce amendments to Part IV of the Canada Labour Code which pertains to occupational health and safety.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, in last year's blue book estimates the transfers for hospital insurance, medicare and extended health care were $4.6 billion. This year the government is paying $4 billion for these programs. Last year the estimates called for spending on post-secondary education of $1.8 billion. This year the government plans to spend $1.5 billion. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble):

• (1415)

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Secretary of State on motions today explain to this House how they could promise this House an increase in expenditures for these established programs and at the same time cut expenditures from last year by over $900 million, notwithstanding inflation.

EMERGENCY MEASURES

PASSAGE OF ORDER IN COUNCIL

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is aware that in May of 1981 cabinet passed a prerogative order with respect to peacetime and wartime emergency planning. This particular order involves a severe limitation of civil liberties. In fact, the cabinet order contains an extremely wide definition of "emergency" as determined by this cabinet.

Since this has never been debated by Parliament, I want to tell the Prime Minister that even the McDonald commission has strongly recommended that such emergency regulations be presented and tabled in Parliament and approved by Parliament prior to implementation.

I want to ask the Prime Minister under these circumstances, why was this particular order passed, particularly when there is no emergency legislation in place aside from implementation and invocation of the War Measures Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers to an order of May, 1981. I will have to refresh my memory on those parts of that order which the hon. member may find offensive. I do recollect that it was part of an exercise to update all emergency action which is provided for in case of floods, in case of any natural disasters, in case of insurrection or invasion. It covers the gamut.

The intention of the legislation is that there be a possibility in times of emergency, however defined, for Canadian authorities, including federal, provincial and municipal, to respond in a co-ordinated way. I am willing to take further questions indicating what particular aspect of the order the hon. member would find offensive and not consistent with the need for the government to foresee co-ordinated action in terms of emergencies.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, what is disconcerting is that the Prime Minister does not fully appreciate the fact that Parliament has not been seized with this particular matter. We have not had an opportunity to determine what the limitation of civil liberties will mean under this particular order, as well as its implications.

The Prime Minister has had a letter from the Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments for over two months now and has not responded to some very pointed questions from the committee, representing all parties, forwarded in a letter signed by Senator Godfrey, the hon. member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore, and the member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe.

The President of the Privy Council, when speaking to the joint federal-provincial conference on emergency planning, said last summer, as reported in the Emergency Planning Digest of July-September, 1981, that under certain circumstances if an emergency now took place the government would have no option but to act extra-legally, that is, outside the law. Is it now the policy of this government that the rule of law does not apply and should be ignored under certain circumstances of emergency in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Madam Speaker, under no circumstances should that be the case.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I would then suggest that the Prime Minister instruct the President of the Privy Council to have this matter rescinded and brought before Parliament before it is implemented.

QUERY RESPECTING NATIONAL INFORMATION SERVICES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): The Prime Minister asked for an example in this particular order. The Prime Minister himself is mandated to manage and co-ordinate the national information services. Could the Prime Minister explain to the House what plans he has made, through his office, to manage and co-ordinate the so-called national information services? Could he also explain what is meant by the term "national information services"?

• (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Madam Speaker, I know of no such plans. I would imagine that in order to answer the question one would have to refer to the type of action which was taken by the Canadian government—I believe with the support of all parties in the House—during the Second World War—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This is peacetime.

Mr. Trudeau: —to exercise certain measures of censorship and so forth. That was during the war. I imagine this kind of monitoring of information would be necessary again in the event of a third world war.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In peacetime?

CIVILIAN INTERNMENT CAMPS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Under this cabinet order respecting emergencies in both peacetime and wartime, is the Solicitor General in charge of the establishment and operation of civilian internment camps and, if so, where are they, how many are there, and who will be subject to internment?

Mr. Crosbie: Apart from us.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, it has often been alleged that during World War II Canada was very unjust to minority groups, and particularly to Japanese Canadians, in the way these groups were treated. One of the reasons was that no planning had been done in advance to prepare our country and to prepare the government to deal with an invasion or the possibility of an invasion, war, or other major catastrophies in the event of which Canadians could rightly look to their government to be prepared to deal with emergencies.

Mr. Crosbie: Who is next?

Mr. Kaplan: I can confirm to the hon. member that I have been asked—and the order has been made public—to begin planning for the eventuality he described, but I have not yet begun to look at any plans, and I am not yet in a position to give any concrete details because none have yet been developed, beyond regulations which were created many years ago and which are sitting on the shelf and available for any member of the public to see.

QUERY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Because there are no safeguards of any type relating to civil or political rights in this cabinet order, which is broad enough to cover both peacetime problems as well as wartime problems—and certainly there are no safeguards inserted in the antiquated and sole piece of legislation we have, and there have been none inserted in the War Measures Act since the FLQ crisis 11 years ago—why has new emergency legislation not been brought forward to this House as promised by the Prime Minister many times before now, and when will we see that new legislation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is, of course, nonsense to suggest that there are no safeguards. The bill of rights which has been adopted by this House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members opposite seem to make light of it. If they are not satisfied and if they want to ridicule the bill of rights, I cannot imagine any form of safeguards which would satisfy them.

Mr. Epp: You would suspend it.

HOUSING

USE OF CONTINGENCY FUNDS

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, yesterday in the House of Commons the President of the Treasury Board tabled the 1982-83 estimates and said that the planned total spending level would be $76.3 billion as set forth in the material of the Minister of Finance in the budget. My question would have been to the Minister of Finance had he been here—and the parliamentary secretary is not here either—so my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works who is the minister in charge of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

My question concerns the $1.37 billion uncommited reserve within the $3.9 billion contingency. Two critical areas have not been addressed either in the estimates or in the budget, and those are housing and employment. In fact the budget for CMHC has been cut by some 14 per cent, and we know there has not been—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I reviewed the question period yesterday and found that all the questions were longer than all the answers. The situation is upside down. Hon. members really must cut down their questions. And, as hon. members know, a supplementary question should not even have the slightest preamble. I ask the hon. member to ask a question.

Mr. Clark: What do you mean it is upside down?

Mr. Anguish: Madam Speaker, my question to the Minister of Public Works concerns the housing forecast which is 70,000 units fewer than the number needed. I want to know if the minister will pursue actively, along with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, using the $1.37 billion in the reserve to create new jobs and to produce housing, since 2.2 jobs are created with every housing start.

• (1425)

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his question dealing with the very important areas of job creation, building, and also the proper administration of public funds by the Government of Canada. I know hon. members are aware that for the last three weeks the government has been prevented by the opposition from the expenditure of $350 million, in addition to those amounts reflected in the estimates that would create 70,000 new jobs, 30,000 housing units, and savings to the taxpayer. The hon. member's question is therefore cynical, hypocritical, and small-minded.

ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I will put my supplementary question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Since the government has said that there would not be a cutback in funding to the provinces for health care and education, will the Prime Minister now come clean with us since it is reflected that there will be a cut in the established programs financing, and tell us how much the funds to the provinces will be cut back under established programs financing?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the ministers have repeated again and again there will be no cutback, but that there will be a continued increase in established programs financing. What is being cut off completely is the revenue guarantee which was instituted in 1972—

Mr. Anguish: But you always included that in your figures, and you know it.

Mr. Trudeau: —to permit a temporary transition period. That was renewed in 1977, and it is being discontinued now. We figure that ten years is enough time for the provinces to have been able to adapt their taxation systems to the new system introduced in the early 1970s.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

INQUIRY RESPECTING STATUS

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister concerning the original $4 billion Western Development Fund. Yesterday the President of the Treasury Board said that he could not answer my question and that it would be more appropriate to put it to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. Can the Prime Minister tell the House how much is in the Western Development Fund, where it is reflected in the estimates, if anywhere, and who is in charge of it, so that we may ask the appropriate questions in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as moneys are disbursed for certain purposes, as is the case with western transportation, they will be drawn from that fund. We will make this clear in each particular case.

DISMISSAL OF KINGSTON PUBLIC SERVANT—REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday the Prime Minister arrogantly dismissed the objections raised to the dismissal of public servant, Mr. Neil Fraser. Would the President of the Treasury Board, who in fact represents the employer in this matter and who is responsible for the public service, intervene forthwith to suspend the dismissal, given the fact that there is nothing in the Public Service Employment Act which prohibits Mr. Fraser from speaking as he did or in the circumstances that he did and that, indeed, there are precedents to the contrary?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the conduct of public servants is determined by the rules of conduct that prevail in particular departments, and this is the responsibility of deputy ministers. Contrary to what the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton has said, there are indeed precedents. Mr. Fraser has every right to launch a grievance and go before the Public Service Staff Relations Board and let the board make a determination of whether or not he has received treatment which was not appropriate.

SPEECH MADE BY MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am rather surprised at this answer and the inconsistency of the government. I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. Is he aware that his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, speaking for the government in Halifax said, and I quote:

"I've been urging civil servants to go out and advocate, to market their programs, and as to those who may say this is partisan politics, I say baloney"

How can the Government of Canada have two standards, one with respect to comments it likes and the other with respect to comments it does not like? That is the kind of inconsistency I am concerned about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton is attempting to place an interpretation on the events surrounding the dismissal of Mr. Fraser which is a complete distortion of the relationship which exists between employer and employee. Yesterday the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition spoke in terms of freedom of speech. It has nothing to do with freedom of speech, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: Muzzle him.

• (1430)

Mr. Johnston: If a senior officer of a corporation in the private sector steps out in his off-duty time and leads a rally saying that the product of the company is inappropriate or whatever, or denigrates it in any way, basically he is in breach of the relationship between employer and employee. That is what we are talking about. The Department of National Revenue determined that the conduct of Mr. Fraser was inappropriate. As I mentioned a moment ago, Mr. Fraser has a perfect right to file his grievance and to appear before the Public Service Staff Relations Board, which I understand he will do. It seems to me that that is completely at odds with the statement—not at odds but compatible with, I should say—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You were right the first time.

Mr. Johnston: —made by the Minister of Supply and Services, who pointed out that employees are also expected to support their employers. This is as true in the private sector as it is in the public sector. This is as true of paid members of the Progressive Conservative Party as of any other employee in the country.

ENERGY

CUTBACK IN PRODUCTION OF HEAVY CRUDE OIL

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and concerns the plight of Canadian heavy oil producers. As the minister knows, at least partly due to the import compensation program, refiners in Montreal are using subsidized imported heavy crude oil, while Canadian producers of heavy crude are severely cut back. The result is an unneeded extra cost to consumers, an unneeded extra current account drain, and an unneeded loss of income and thus of jobs to Canadian producers. What is the minister doing about this situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, there are indeed circumstances where, because of a drop in the price of oil on the international market and especially on-the-spot market, refiners are able to obtain certain products, on a short-term basis, at prices that are lower than they would be paying if they were buying Canadian crude oil. Such cases are, however, very limited in number. We are following developments very closely.

I may also point out to the hon. member that in several cases, as a result of the cuts imposed by Alberta last year, companies have had to conclude medium and long-term contracts. They are very hesitant to break these contracts now, considering the present situation. More specifically, they are afraid they will be needing foreign oil in a few months, and they want to avoid jeopardizing trade relations with the parties with whom they signed contracts in good faith. It is a matter of concern, we are looking into it, and if any action should be taken, I shall be informing the House accordingly.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER UNDERTAKE ACTION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, the present situation is absolutely ridiculous. We are importing and subsidizing imports while Canadian producers are severely cut back. Surely the minister will do something about the situation. If refiners were using Canadian heavy crude oil rather than subsidized imports, some of the jobs lost as a result of the National Energy Program would be restored, our trade balance would be improved, and consumers would pay less for the gasoline and heating oil they use. Surely those are three good reasons for doing something about it right now.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, one of our problems is the result of a drop in demand in the United States for a certain kind of oil which we export to that country, which we have exported in the past and are still exporting at the present time. I am sure the hon. member is not suggesting that I order these private companies to break contracts signed with other parties in good faith and in circumstances that were different from those we know today. I have pointed out to the hon. member that it is a matter of concern and we are following developments closely, and if anything can be done to improve the situation, we shall do so.

AGRICULTURE

COST OF WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, because he has long been an advocate of producers paying more for the movement of grain in western Canada. In several cabinet memoranda from November 13, 1981, to January 12, 1982, it is stated that, "the leadership of the three prairie wheat pools and other agricultural groups stated privately that they are prepared, if acceptable, to sell the government proposal for western grain transportation to their members." In a further memorandum the cabinet's ideal solution to the transportation of western grain would be to have producers pay all inflationary costs after 1982. Was the leadership of the prairie pools and other agricultural groups made aware that the cabinet's ideal solution was to have producers pay all the inflationary costs after 1982?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is speaking about a document which I am not sure I remember that well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I know the discussions I had with different farm representatives and leaders in western Canada. They are ready to discuss and ready to negotiate what they feel is a fair deal for transporting their grain. The impression I received from them was that if we can devise a transportation system and obtain the kind of guarantees we need from the railways to move the grain, they were willing to pay more for it. The figures of the hon. member are purely figures that are up for negotiation, etc., and this type of thing. It will be up to the negotiator, when he has those kinds of discussions with them, to work out a proper program to improve the transportation system.

Yes, I have been an advocate for a long time that farmers should pay a bigger share of the cost of transporting their grain. I make no secret of that whatsoever. As the hon. member knows, when he was on this side of the House for a short while, his minister of transport was about ready to propose the very same thing.

ROLE OF SASKATCHEWAN PREMIER

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns the movement of western grain under statutory rates. In view of the statements of Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan that he is willing to negotiate a statutory framework for the movement of grain in western Canada, and in view of his interview in Business Life magazine in January, 1982, could the Prime Minister tell the House what role he sees the Premier of the province of Saskatchewan playing in the negotiations which will come forward?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot forecast the conduct of Premier Blakeney in this particular matter.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

NECESSITY FOR NEW AGREEMENT ON IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE MANUFACTURED VEHICLES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the charismatic Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, my question is directed to the Minister of State for International Trade. It concerns the fact that the agreement with the Japanese on the importation of Japanese cars will expire on March 31. No doubt the minister is aware of the problems of unemployment in our country and knows that now about 20 per cent of our market is comprised of Japanese cars. Can he guarantee that there will be a new agreement in place by the end of March of this year, which is so important to the consumers and producers of the country? Also can he guarantee that the agreement will cover not only cars but also trucks and other vehicles produced by the Japanese?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, when I go to Japan in two weeks my counterpart, the Minister of International Trade for Japan and I will be undertaking negotiations. We are very confident that we will arrive at a satisfactory agreement. I have already indicated to them that we expect and will accept nothing less than the Japanese have negotiated with the United States.

MANUFACTURE OF PARTS IN CANADA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, could the minister assure us that the new agreement will cover not only cars but the importation of Japanese trucks, which has risen by 300 per cent in the last two years? Will he also guarantee that he will be negotiating Canadian content into the new agreement, so that there will be an agreement to produce in Canada in dollar value what the Japanese sell in this country? In other words, if the Japanese sell $1 million worth of cars in Canada, will we have plants which will produce $1 million worth of cars or parts in this country?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, with respect to trucks, I think the hon. member knows that trucks are not covered under the agreement between Japan and the United States of America. The Americans increased the tariff on trucks last year because of a different set of arrangements. We will be discussing with the Japanese more sourcing of auto parts in Canada, hopefully in some kind of proportion to the sourcing from Japan. With respect to content, we will be initiating discussions on a content proposal.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REQUEST THAT CASH ADVANCE LIMIT BE INCREASED

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. I hope he will be able to answer on behalf of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. The minister knows that because of very low grain prices producers this fall, for all intents and purposes, will be in a desperate situation for cash at harvest time. At the present time, a cash advance given to a producer, which is the producer's own money, is in the neighbourhood of $15,000. Is the government, in conjunction with the Canadian Wheat Board, giving very serious consideration to increasing that cash advance to $50,000 because, with the low grain prices, producers will be very hard pressed for funds this fall?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that there are two programs, one for grain farmers and another smaller program which affects other farmers that are not under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. Those two programs have loaned out interest free in total, I believe, close to $500 million in the current crop year. We are aware of the need for extra money. Farmers have made representations, and yes, the matter is being considered.

TIMING OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, can the Minister of Agriculture give an indication to the House as to the time frame the consideration will take? The minister knows, for example, that right now grain is selling, and it is projected to sell, at about $1 to $1.50 below last year's prices. By this fall, August, September or October, there will not be any cash flow on the prairies whatever. This is my main concern. Will the minister give top priority to that matter and give us some indication of when an announcement will be made?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has used some other facts concerning grain and why farmers need extra money. But when one checks, world stocks of grain are the lowest they have been in 22 years, so there is really no need for the prices to be $1 a bushel less than they were last year. If the marketing system functions the way it should, the prices should increase more than $1. We are very concerned that the farmers who cannot deliver their produce have money to pay their bills. We think the programs that we have are very good.

I cannot say at this time when the increase will be announced. We do know from talking to farm suppliers that in some instances farmers have not bought their normal supply of chemicals, fertilizers and those types of things. Suppliers are worried about that and we are worried because production can drop if farmers do not go ahead and buy the products with which to be most productive.

REQUEST THAT INTEREST RATES BE LOWERED

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister given consideration to my suggestion, as he assured me he would do two weeks ago, that in order to pull the economy out of the present slump, interest rates should be lowered to slightly above the rate of inflation, and the resultant drop in the value of the dollar be used, first, to stimulate exports, particularly manufactured products, because they are the ones that produce the jobs; second, to encourage Canadians to spend their holidays in this country, and Americans to vacation here, to bolster sagging consumer product sales which have fallen so drastically in the last few months and, third, to make possible the production in Canada of many new products to replace imports which will become less and less competitive as the dollar falls, and which can be produced in Canada just as easily as in foreign countries if the right leadership is given? What has the result been of the Prime Minister's consideration of such a program, which was very beneficial to the economy in the past, as in 1962, when it was instrumental in pulling the country out of a slump at that time, and starting ten years of great prosperity and high employment?

Mr. Lawrence: Yes or no.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, when I answered a question along those lines put by the hon. member two weeks ago, I indicated that I believed several of his suggestions were worthy of study and perhaps even implementation. I have asked the minister responsible for trade to consider the valuable suggestions put forward by the hon. member.

EMPLOYMENT

DIFFICULTIES FACING APPLICANTS FOR SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, Mr. Manpower. I am sure the minister is aware of the very serious situation that exists, particularly in his province where many people, especially those of native ancestry, are having difficulty obtaining social insurance numbers. It is estimated that roughly 100,000 Canadians do not have social insurance numbers some of whom are having difficulty obtaining a SIN because they do not know what is their date of birth. By not having this number, people are experiencing difficulty getting pensions, applying for jobs and, indeed, getting welfare when there is that need. This matter has been brought to the minister's attention on several occasions. Can he report what he is doing in his department to overcome this serious situation?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member states, there are many individuals who do encounter difficulty obtaining a social insurance number because of lack of supporting evidence and documentation. I have asked the department to review the recommendations to see if they can find some other way of verifying statements, of developing authenticated documents or support that would allow people to make an application for a social insurance number without the kinds of difficulties encountered in the past. I will be very happy to report to the hon. member when those reviews are completed and we will be instituting whatever steps are necessary.

Oral Questions

KENT ROYAL COMMISSION

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. What is the government's policy on Tom Kent's proposal for controlling the press in Canada?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I hope that within a matter of weeks cabinet will have considered the matter and reached conclusions. We will announce them at that time.

LENGTH OF STUDY

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that this is probably the most dangerous attack on freedom of the press in Canada in most of our lifetimes, in view of the fact that the report was released last September and since that time the minister has commissioned two public service studies of Tom Kent's study, and he is now studying those two studies, how much longer does the minister need to make up his mind?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, every day we hear from the opposition about other important issues with which the government is dealing, but this is the first question I have had on the Kent commission in months, I believe, so the opposition has not been very preoccupied with the matter. I should make it clear that the hon. member suggested that it was an effort to control the press. That is certainly not the case at all. Mr. Kent headed a royal commission. A set of recommendations have been delivered. We will determine what policy should be followed by the government and that I hope will come, as I said, shortly. I think it is very dangerous for the opposition to suggest that this government has any intention of controlling the press.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: I think it is exactly the opposite.

An hon. Member: Pierre is smiling.

Mr. Fleming: The danger is that the Canadian public hear so much rhetoric from the opposition that they do not consider the real question, which is concentration of control by any power, private or public, over the press.

INDUSTRY

CONSOLIDATED COMPUTER INCORPORATED—SHARE HELD IN TRUST FOR HOSPITALS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. During the minister's investigation of the Consolidated Computer caper, did he notice that the one share issued with respect to the company known as Financeco Limited was issued in the name of the National Trust Company which, in turn, held it beneficially for St. Michael's Hospital in Toronto, Mount Sinai Hospital, and the Hospital for Sick Children? If the President of the Treasury Board did notice that, would he inform the House why it was seen fit to give those three hospitals the benefit of that share?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to comment on leaked documents.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: But in the history of Consolidated Computer, or CCI, there is one thing I did notice, and that is that the hon. member for York-Peel did not do anything about Consolidated Computer Inc. to resolve those problems when he did not have to depend upon brown envelopes but had the files right in front of him. I am surprised that he has——the nerve to get up and ask a question like that.

[English]

TRANSFER OF SHARE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, if the President of the Treasury Board had informed the House fully, he would have pointed out that we had Consolidated Computer high on the privatization list for our government. Would the minister at least explain to the House why it was subsequently seen fit to cause the share to be transferred from the beneficial ownership of those three hospitals, and in particular would he indicate if full notice was given to the three hospitals of the benefit being transferred away from them by redirecting the share to the Nabu Manufacturing Company, as contemplated in the November 26, 1981, agreement?

• (1450)

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am not sure the hon. member understood my answer to the first part of his question. I gather he is relying upon leaked documents. It is not our policy to comment upon what may or may not be in the brown envelope which was delivered to him.

Mr. Stevens: We got the agreement.

Mr. Johnston: I must say it is somewhat amusing to listen to him talking about it being high on his privatization list. Perhaps he would tell the House how many companies he succeeded in privatizing while he was President of the Treasury Board.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—NECESSITY FOR NEGOTIATED SETTLEMENT—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister concerning the serious and tragic situation in El Salvador. By refusing the invitation Canada has recently, and appropriately, joined more than 50 of 60 nations which were invited to witness the so-called democratic elections in that country. Will the government now follow this up by joining with President Lopez Portillo of Mexico in urging the necessity of a negotiated settlement taking place before any democratic election?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, by indicating that we did not want to be officially accredited as observers to that election if we were not free to observe it in a way which would permit our judgment to be entirely valid, this did not mean that we do not think the election should not take place. It means we are viewing it with more caution than if we had been put in the position to be observers in the sense that we were observers of the election process in Zimbabwe and Uganda.

At this stage, Madam Speaker, there is no change in the government's policy in that the election to be held is, in our view, a priori, better than not having an election. We will have to make what judgment we can after the election has taken place to see whether indeed it has increased the legitimacy of the government or the constitutional process which is envisaged in the election.

POSSIBILITY OF UNITED STATES MILITARY INVOLVEMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister knows or should know that the bishops of the Catholic Church in the United States, almost every civil liberty group around the world, most of the countries in western Europe, and committees of this Parliament have all said that the so-called democratic elections in El Salvador are anything but democratic. Most groups who believe in civil liberties are in fact not even taking part in the election.

My question to the Prime Minister is, knowing this, and knowing that the civil war will certainly continue after the election takes place—

Mr. Stevens: Tell us about the free elections in Cuba.

Mr. Broadbent: —does he not agree that the United States can use these elections somehow to warrant additional military involvement? If he agrees with that possibility, does he not think it makes sense to join with people like President Lopez Portillo in proposing a serious negotiated settlement which could bring an end to the bloodshed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is quoting the authority of the bishops of the United States, but my recollection is that the bishops of El Salvador themselves were taking a contrary view.

Mr. Broadbent: Just some.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, some, yes. Some bishops, like some bishops in the United States—

Mr. Broadbent: The vast majority.

Mr. Trudeau: —are of one view and some are of another. Or like some bishops in Canada are of one view, and some are of another. In so far as President Portillo's initiative is concerned, Madam Speaker, the hon. member will recall it was an initiative which was supported by only two other countries in the whole of Latin America, whereas the overwhelming majority of the countries did not support that initiative.

Mr. Broadbent: Non-democratic as well.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I do not know if the hon. member is arguing that the countries which did support it were very democratic, like—

Mr. Broadbent: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I would like the hon. member to tell me how recently has Grenada had elections?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FIRING OF KINGSTON PUBLIC SERVANT—NATURE OF OFFENCE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have two questions for the Minister of National Revenue. Would he tell us under what specific legal authority Mr. Neil Fraser was fired? Then, in light of the statement in the letter to Mr. Fraser that "you caused media coverage of your criticism of government policies, programs and political leaders", because that was one of the reasons given, will the minister tell us whether Mr. Fraser's offence was that he spoke, or was it that he was reported by a free press?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I think that matter was adequately dealt with yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rompkey: I stated exactly why Mr. Fraser was dismissed. The Prime Minister has covered that, and the President of the Treasury Board covered other aspects of it in his answer today. I think the matter has been adequately dealt with, Madam Speaker. It is under grievance now. Mr. Fraser has recourse to that action and is taking it.

Oral Questions

PERMISSIBLE TOPICS FOR PUBLIC SERVANTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister is unable to cite a legal authority on which he dismissed a public servant for speaking his views.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: There is a great deal of nervousness on the Liberal side, and I can understand that on this day of internment camps, and action against a free press and public servants in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister in Parliament yesterday approved the statement by the Minister of National Revenue when he said:

> It seems to be ironic that a man would collect taxes on the one hand, and criticize the programs on which those taxes are spent, on the other.

That was the minister's statement, approved by the Prime Minister. Now, in an age in which government has grown to the extent that government programs touch everything from daycare to internment camps, will the Prime Minister tell the House of Commons on just what topics can public servants speak in their private capacity?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, what I indicated yesterday without, as I said, having had the benefit of looking at the file very closely was that I agreed with the position of the minister who, after several warnings, took certain disciplinary action. The person who claims to be aggrieved has a right to contest that action, to debate and to appeal to his deputy minister, as I understand he has, as to whether the disciplinary action was justified or not. There are some clear cases in which a civil servant cannot engage in criticism of a government. These cases are easy to define. There are others which are more difficult, which is why we are anxious to see this process of appeal take place and perhaps have certain criteria defined by the PSSRB which we could discuss and find helpful.

Certainly the principles put forward by the minister and the President of the Treasury Board seem to be unimpeachable in theory. It is certain that in practice it is probably difficult in some cases to decide how far freedom of speech should permit any citizen of this country to criticize his employer. I think the President of the Treasury Board was perfectly justified in giving an example, perhaps, of a member of the Progressive Conservative caucus research group. If one member of that group were to criticize consistently the policies put forward by the Leader of the Opposition I suppose some disciplinary action would be taken. Now, would this be destroying freedom of speech in this country? I doubt it. It is a very difficult subject, Madam Speaker.

An hon. Member: Especially if they are your policies.

APPLICATION OF GOVERNMENT STANDARD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, public servants in Canada are not employees of the Liberal Party of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The principle established yesterday by the Minister of National Revenue and approved by the Prime Minister was that public servants, in their private capacities, cannot speak on any topic touched by a federal government program. If that is the standard, I ask the Prime Minister is there any topic on which a public servant may speak in his or her private capacity? If so, would the Prime Minister name it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Leader of the Opposition is deliberately twisting my words.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Who said the public servants were employees of the Liberal Party of Canada?

An hon. Member: You do!

Mr. Trudeau: When did I say that, Madam Speaker? I wish the Leader of the Opposition would answer my question.

Mr. Clark: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: I am doing that. No, Madam Speaker, these are—

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Trudeau: —allegations, these are prefaces to a question made, I dare say, with a minimum of good faith. They have nothing to do with the subject.

The employees of the Public Service of Canada are employees of the Government of Canada. The Government of Canada—

Mr. Crosbie: Is Liberal!

Mr. Trudeau: —has, as its first duty, the duty to govern. The first duty of the Public Service of Canada is to assist in the governing of the country of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: These are principles which I believe are just as unimpeachable as saying that the duties of the employees of the Conservative caucus are to assist in the research of the Conservative Party. These are clear parallels, and it seems to me that it is not easy—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. members opposite do not agree with these premises, then all I can say is let us see the example of that in the way they governed when they were in power. They obviously failed to govern because they did not believe that the first duty of the government is to govern.

Madam Speaker: I will allow a brief supplementary question.

An hon. Member: Three o'clock!

NAMING OF PERMISSIBLE TOPIC

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): On what topic is a public servant in Canada free to speak in his or her private capacity, given the standard enunciated by the Minister of National Revenue and approved by the Prime Minister?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I could not enumerate all the topics.

Mr. Crombie: How about one?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I am asked for one. Philosophy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crombie: Good.

Mr. Trudeau: Two—

Mr. Lawrence: Steer away from history, though, eh?

Madam Speaker: Order, I believe it is time to put an end to the question period.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DOMM—ALLEGED CONTEMPTUOUS COMMENTS MADE BY PUBLIC SERVANT

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a particularly timely point of privilege which relates to the Metric Commission—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Domm: —and my ability as an elected member of this Parliament to fulfil and properly discharge my duties. I will show Your Honour how, in fact, this ability as a Member of Parliament has been seriously impaired by my having been referred to contemptuously and in an insulting manner by one in the employ of the Public Service of Canada. What is more, these remarks were not made by that person privately, not made by him as a citizen, but made in a professional capacity on behalf of his employer, the Metric Commission of Canada, and directly to a representative of the press.

No one more than I values and cherishes the right of every citizen freely to criticize the government in any one of its varied and broad aspects and programs. Indeed, I could not agree more with the judgment of a former speaker of the House of Commons who, when speaking to a similar question of privilege on June 23, 1977, as reported at page 7044 of Hansard, noted, in citing a study by a committee of the U.K. parliament, that:

> —the House should be slow and reluctant to use its penal powers to stifle criticism or even abuse, whether of the machinery of the House, of a member or of an identifiable group of members, however strongly the criticism may be expressed and however unjustifiable it may appear.
> Your committee regard such criticism as the lifeblood of democracy. In their view, the sensible politician expects and even welcomes criticism of this nature.

I entirely endorse this view and gladly subscribe to it. My purpose is not to complain about some private or even corporate remark made by an individual on behalf of himself, his firm, or his organization which impugns my reputation and which happens by accident or design to be picked up and reported in the press. On the contrary, this I would consider to be fair game and part of political life, which must be taken along with the more favourable reports of one's efforts here in the House of Commons, in one's riding, and in the country generally.

My purpose is to bring to the attention of the Chair and of the House of Commons a situation which is quite outside the normal purview of democratic licence and of the constitutional exercise of freedom of speech soon to be adopted. It concerns the on the record, gratuitous and deliberate abuse of an incumbent Member of Parliament by one who is in the employ of, and speaks for, an agency or department of government.

We know what happens when a public servant presumes to recognize his ancient mandate within our democratic tradition by criticizing the government non-abusively, without rancour, and on matters totally beyond his area and field of employment. He is fired with little fanfare and less ceremony, ruthlessly, deliberately, and without hesitation or the least application of enlightened principle. Mr. Neil Fraser of Revenue Canada in Kingston, Ontario, a senior official with 11 years experience and a salary range in excess of $40,000 a year, recently suffered this gross indignity. But we do not know what happens when an individual employed by the federal government to further an official program of that government and speaking in this professional capacity presumes not just to criticize the point of view, but also the attitudes and actions of a sitting Member of Parliament, actions which the member considers to be dutiful and in keeping with his place in the Government of Canada, for indeed the House is where the Government of Canada ultimately resides.

Now while I can fully support the opinion of the U.K. committee as cited by the previous speaker in 1977, I would now draw Your Honour's attention to a further remark from the same source and likewise cited:

> Nevertheless, a point may be reached at which conduct ceases to be merely intemperate criticism and abuse and becomes or is liable to become an improper obstruction of the functions of Parliament. For such cases, however rare, the penal powers must be preserved and the House must be prepared to exercise them.

On November 25, 1981, an individual employed by the Metric Commission, a Mr. Bob Mellor, was interviewed by Ms. Judy Creighton, a reporter for the Canadian Press. Subsequently, Ms. Creighton's report went out nationally, and in it Mr. Mellor is directly quoted as having referred to me as "the anti-metric red-neck from Peterborough".

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, with your indulgence, I will first put this remark in a general context according to the standard references, and then in a more specific context which reflects a more contemporary point of view. Both, I believe, are germane.

First, the House will know of the guidance offered by Erskine May at Chapter X, pages 152 and 153 where it is noted that:

> 'Written imputations, as affecting a Member of Parliament, may amount to breach of privilege, without perhaps, being libels at common law' (b), but to constitute a breach of privilege a libel upon a member must concern the character or conduct of the member in that capacity (c).

Continuing on to page 153, it is stated that:

> Both Houses will punish not only contempts arising out of facts of which the ordinary courts will take cognizance, but those of which they cannot, such as contemptuous insults, gross calumny or foul epithets by word of mouth not within the category of actionable slander or threat of bodily injury.

Going on, I submit that in the first instance my question of privilege fulfils these terms. If you see fit, I would suggest the following motion, which I have submitted to you, under Standing Order 17, which was found to be acceptable as reported at page 7044 of Hansard for June 23, 1977, at which time the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence) presented a number of motions and they were accepted to be in order:

> That this House do recognize that contemptuous insults have been directed toward me by officials of the government and as reported in the national press, that these contemptuous insults reflect upon my conduct as a Member of Parliament, and that the full penal jurisdiction of this House of Commons be applied to the extent that this high violation of the rights and privileges of the House are repaired.

I use as my authority for that language in the motion Erskine May, page 152 and part of page 153. Some members may not consider that term "red-neck" particularly contemptuous or insulting. For their information, I refer to the Oxford American dictionary which at the entry for "red-neck" has in parenthesis the word "contemptuous". That is the key to my question of privilege. The definition follows as "a member of the white, rural working class of the southern United States". That is hardly an accurate description of me and, needless to say, one which I strongly resent.

The more specific context within which these remarks fall deals with the citizen's prima facie right to make a fair comment "upon such activity of a member as a matter of public interest." As the committee said, and as was repeated by the then Speaker in 1977, "His right is even stronger to speak and publish the truth of a member's conduct".

We know, as I have said, what will happen to a citizen who speaks against the conduct of members for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau) and Papineau (Mr. Ouellet). The former heads the present government; the latter is responsible for the Metric Commission. When Mr. Neil Fraser of Kingston questioned their conduct with regard to the metrication of Canada, he was fired. The famous and justly faceless official of Revenue Canada answered for his political leaders in the press by saying "It is a standard condition of federal government employment that an employee may not make any public criticism of government policy or its political leaders."

Does this not seem to contradict the judgment of the parliamentary committee and of the Speaker of the House who said in 1977 that "these rights of free speech should not in the normal way be defeated"? Does it not contradict the Speaker's judgment that criticism is the "lifeblood of democracy"? Does it not contradict the Speaker's judgment that "as elected people", for we are all elected people, even the members for Mount Royal and Papineau, "we can and do expect to be the targets of attack"? At any rate, Mr. Fraser's lamentable case applies to my question of privilege by illuminating through comparison.

The person who criticized me, or rather was responsible for directing a contemptuous insult toward me, to use May's phrase, was not speaking as a private citizen. He spoke as an employee of the government. We have seen what has happened to another employee of the government who levelled what in comparison must be seen to be the gentlest criticism at the government.

How will my grievance be redressed as a member of this government in opposition—for surely Parliament, all of Parliament, is an integral part of the Government of Canada—as a consequence of my being not only criticized, but abused by this gross and contemptuous insult? I ask then that my question be taken under advisement with a view toward applying the statutory penal jurisdiction of the House of Commons.

Before placing the motion, I would like to add some brief comments. I am now going to show the House that the acting executive director of the Metric Commission needs to be immediately fired from his job, the same as Mr. Neil Fraser was fired.

Mr. Ganapathy, the acting executive director of the Metric Commission, referred to me in a contemptuous and insulting manner on the CBC program "Platform". Everyone knows that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, with the blessing of the Metric Commission, forced retail grocers out of business when they refused to use metric weigh scales in Peterborough.

I regret to inform the House that Mr. Ganapathy went on the CBC program "Platform" and refuted this statement, and he did not just refute this statement made by me as a Member of Parliament in opposition, but said, "That is a lot of nonsense what the member for Peterborough is saying, and that is not true."

How can a responsible civil servant get away with calling a Member of Parliament, a member of the opposition, a liar and hold his job when at the same time Mr. Neil Fraser, who said, "The white paper of 1970 on metric conversion was to bring metric in voluntarily and the government has now decided to break its promise and bring it in by force," loses his job, and yet Mr. Ganapathy who calls me a liar, a gentleman who has never been to Peterborough, as he admitted over national television, does not know the merchants I am talking about, knows better than I do as the Member of Parliament for Peterborough that my businesses were forced out of business because they would not buy a metric weigh scale? As acting executive director of the Metric Commission, he must be fired.

Second, I think I have already shown that we have allowed two categories of MPs to be created in the House. Knowingly or not, our present government, the members sitting opposite, have created a situation where a civil servant is allowed to make contemptuous, insulting statements against a Member of Parliament, provided that member is a member of the opposition and not on the government side of the House.

I am going to name that civil servant, which I have already done, and I will name him again, because that civil servant should no longer be on the payroll of the Government of Canada and going around this country telling people that Members of Parliament in opposition are red-necks. If he does not know what the word means, somebody should tell him. If he does know what it means, he has no business being in the job he is, criticizing a Member of Parliament in a contemptuous way, according to the Oxford dictionary, which is the best authority I can find on the term "red-neck".

Having named that civil servant, Mr. Ganapathy, the acting executive director of the Metric Commission for Canada, is not better. How can the House of Commons condone a situation whereby it allows willingly that any civil servant who criticizes the government in power is out of a job and any civil servant who criticizes the opposition maintains a secure job because he is doing the job for the government, not for the people? I maintain that is not right. Therefore I move, under Standing Order 17:

> That this House do recognize that contemptuous insults have been directed toward me by officials of the government and as reported in the national press and on the CBC program "Platform", that these contemptuous insults reflect upon my conduct as a Member of Parliament and that the full penal jurisdiction of this House of Commons be applied to the extent that this high violation of the rights and privileges of the House are immediately repaired.

With all due respect, Madam Speaker, this matter should be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for a full parliamentary investigation into who civil servants represent. Do they work for the government or do they work for the Parliament of Canada and the people? I maintain that it is time civil servants were allowed to speak out of their jurisdiction in the private sector, before municipal councils as ratepayers in those communities on behalf of their rights when they have invested in property in their communities. Since they have the right to vote municipally, they certainly must have the right to say what they think about matters that they are not even directly connected with in the government's business of the day. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the alleged question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) in trying to figure out what it was. I have not yet figured it out.

It seems to me that his proposition was based somehow on a statement which he made, and I found it difficult to believe. I believe he made the statement, and it can be verified on the record, of course. He said that Parliament was a part of the Government of Canada. Of course, Parliament is not a part of the Government of Canada.

An hon. Member: You are right.

Mr. Smith: An employee of Parliament is very different from an employee of the Government of Canada. If my hon. friend from Peterborough does not yet understand that, I suggest that he go to the library and obtain a first-year text on political science in Canada.

I believe that we are basically talking about a statement made by an employee of the Government of Canada. If you refer to Beauchesne, fifth edition, at page 12, section 19(1), it says:

> A dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

It seems to me even clearer that a dispute arising between a Member of Parliament and a citizen as to an allegation of fact is even less a question of privilege. Surely that is the situation which exists here.

I do not believe that the hon. member for Peterborough suggested that this particular civil servant called him a liar or any such name. There seems to be a dispute as to facts. There seems to be a dispute as to the question of fact, and that does not, Madam Speaker, in any way raise a question of privilege, to my understanding.

The hon. member also quoted from Erskine May. I have read those quotations. It says at page 152, " . . . but to constitute a breach of privilege, a libel upon a member must concern the character or conduct of the member in that capacity." I do not recall hearing anything which constituted anything other than a dispute as to facts, not something which was an imputation concerning the character or conduct of the member. Therefore, I would suggest that what we are dealing with here is a dispute as to facts between a member of the House and a private citizen, and that certainly does not raise a question of privilege in the House.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I will be brief. The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) raises a very interesting and rare question of privilege which is deserving of very careful consideration by you.

I was surprised to hear the interjection by the parliamentary secretary. I had occasion to study this matter very carefully a few months ago when remarks which I felt at the time to be extremely contemptuous, were made in the French press in Quebec where a list of names of all the Liberal Members of Parliament appeared and, if I remember correctly, I believe they were described as despicable traitors. I fully expected that one or more of those members would have raised a question of privilege at that time based precisely on the argument made by the hon. member for Peterborough today. I do not think there is a member of the House who would not have been sympathetic to such a question had it been raised. However, that was the purpose of my studying the matter a few months ago.

This relates very directly to the question raised by the hon. member for Peterborough under several references to Erskine May as to what amounts to contempt. I submit that the hon. member for Peterborough does have a good case. The words which were used were contemptuous of the conduct of the hon. member in his capacity as a Member of Parliament and member of the House of Commons.

I am sure that the Chair is aware of the rarity of questions of this nature being raised in this place. I fear that perhaps the Chair might come to the conclusion that it should not be called upon to make a decision as to whether or not the offender should continue his employment because of one of the remarks made by the hon. member for Peterborough. I suggest that the Chair would be perfectly correct in coming to the conclusion that it has no business interfering in that area. However, the remedy which seemed to emerge from my studies of the question when I was considering whether or not the remarks of the French press against the Liberal members concerned would be contemptuous, was that the proper recourse—and certainly the power exists in the Chair acting on behalf of all members of the House—was to have the offender appear before the bar of the House.

I believe the last time that happened was so long ago that the official record of the House of Commons, Hansard, was not even an established institution of this place but was still being published in local newspapers. I had to go back to those newspapers to dig out the precedents. However, the precedents are there, and I think that the offender in that case was from the city of Winnipeg.

The House, then, has the power indeed to go as far as to impose a jail term on an offender unless other solutions are found.

I would suggest that there is a serious substance to the question which has been placed before you. It is sufficiently serious, I submit, to cause you to defer your decision on the matter until a study of this very rare procedure might be made by the Chair and its assistants in some depth.

Once again, I can only relate back to those rather shoddy newspaper advertisements which I noticed when I was studying the matter and say that had the question been raised by one or more of the Liberal members at that time, they would have found support from this side of the House for their position alleging contempt for their rights as members. I ask for that same support from that side now when the same contemptuous remarks have been made with respect to the conduct of a member on this side of the House while carrying out his duties as a Member of Parliament.

A person employed by the government has no right to make public criticisms of a contemptuous nature. That distinction must be drawn. What the hon. member for Peterborough said about the right of free speech is absolutely correct, but there are limits on anyone's free speech. That is the reason for the law of libel and slander in this and any other civilized country. Those limits were exceeded in the remarks made by this government employee when he referred to the hon. member for Peterborough as a red-neck, particularly knowing that the hon. member has specialized in being the chief critic for our party of forced metrication.

I do urge that you defer your decision, Madam Speaker, and study the matter. It will be my submission that you find in favour of the member for Peterborough, and either exercise the always undisturbed jurisdiction of the House and have the offender appear before the bar of the House or perhaps, as the hon. member for Peterborough suggested, refer the subject matter of his question to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I do not know how you will ever rule on a matter such as this. The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) makes an interesting case about being offended by the remarks of a public servant. I hope, however—and I say this in all fairness—that we in the House would never attempt to invoke privilege to prevent any citizen from commenting on the appropriateness or inappropriateness of anything we as Members of Parliament might say.

I think it unfortunate that the hon. member tied his comments to the most recent firing which has taken place over comments made by an employee of the Department of National Revenue inasmuch as I hoped, as I listened to his argument, he would agree with me that the firing of the gentleman from the Department of National Revenue was inappropriate and that that particular gentleman form the Department of National Revenue, who is now in the process of appealing his dismissal, will have his appeal upheld. The right of every single citizen in Canada to express his or her opinion about the actions not only of the government but also of Parliament as a whole and individual Members of Parliament should in no way be impeded by an action taken by the House.

I can appreciate that the hon. member for Peterborough believes in good faith that he was perhaps maligned in one way or another and that the person making the comments about the truthfulness or otherwise of the statements of the hon. member for Peterborough may have spoken out of turn. It may well be that in the normal relationship between citizens and their elected members this particular citizen stated his point of view a little more forcefully than might have been required in the circumstance. However, I put it to the Chair that there are many things said in the House of Commons which are much worse than calling a member of the Conservative Party a red-neck. In fact, for some that might even be a compliment.

I therefore hope that in viewing this matter Your Honour will find that we ought not to interfere with the rights of citizens to express their opinions, no matter for whom they work and no matter in what ministry they are employed.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I want briefly to supplement the remarks of my House leader and say that it was with considerable astonishment that I heard the remarks—and I listened with great care—of the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm). His party was championing the right of freedom of speech only an hour earlier on behalf of public servants and was bitterly decrying—in my view quite properly—the firing of Neil Fraser in Kingston because Mr. Fraser was speaking on a matter of public policy.

Mr. Nielsen: Not contemptuously.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Following this attack, an attack with which this party agrees, what did a member of the Conservative Party do? He stood up and suggested that because he has been attacked as being a red-neck—

Mr. Nielsen: Libeled.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): —what we should do is to haul this public servant before the bar of Parliament and perhaps throw him in jail. What unbridled hypocrisy on the part of the Conservative Party in this Parliament! What unbridled hypocrisy!

Members of the Conservative Party proclaim the right to freedom of speech on behalf of all Canadians, but if they themselves are attacked in their role as Members of Parliament, do they allow that freedom of speech? No. What they suggest under those circumstances is that we bring that person before Parliament and perhaps throw him in jail because we cannot legally take his job away. Members of the Conservative party speak on the one hand of freedom of speech for public servants, if those public servants happen to espouse the policies they believe in, but if those public servants happen to criticize the policies they support, then it is a very different story, and they take great offence.

Well, Madam Speaker, we do not accept that. We support the right of Neil Fraser to speak out on matters of public policy, and we insist upon his rehiring, if freedom of speech in this country is to mean anything and if the right accorded under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to freedom of speech is to mean anything.

However, we go further and say that we as Members of Parliament should not be immune to that kind of criticism. To suggest that because we are criticized, whether rightly or wrongly—and I make no comment on the colour of the hon. member's neck—for the job we do or the policies we espouse, somehow that individual should be brought before Parliament and thrown in some sort of medieval parliamentary jail is utter hypocrisy, and I call upon the Chair to reject it, and to reject it now.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I hope in your ruling you will stick to the point at issue, which is whether a federal civil servant has the right to make derogatory and libellous remarks about a Member of Parliament. If the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) felt so strongly about freedom of speech, where were he and his party during question period? We heard not a peep from them during question period about freedom of speech for federal civil servants. We heard not a thing.

I ask you, Madam Speaker, to ignore the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby, to look at this issue and not to pay any attention to the cheap political rhetoric of the hon. member for Burnaby.

Madam Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) for submitting this question of privilege. He gave me proper notice, and he has quoted the relevant citation from Erskine May, which I would like to consider at length against the arguments and facts he has brought forward.

I am just a little wary about the fact that this incident took place, I believe, on November 25, 1981. When questions of privilege are raised in the House, every other proceeding must be stopped, the implication being that if they are not dealt with immediately the proceedings of the House may not continue. However, I will take this question of privilege under advisement.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, if I may draw something out which perhaps was not brought out in the argument, the question of privilege which—

Madam Speaker: No. I have said I will take the matter under advisement. The hon. member has spoken once on this question of privilege. He knows I am in the habit of allowing only one intervention from an hon. member on a question of privilege. I have heard the hon. member. I will take his arguments into consideration. I have said that I have heard sufficient argument. I said that precisely because no other hon. member rose, and I decided to take this matter under advisement, so the matter should be left at that.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. YURKO—REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN ORDER PAPER

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, in the last couple of weeks I have been called some juicy names by civil servants at all three levels of government.

I rise on a point of order to request a change in the Order Paper. The Order Paper lists under "notices of motions" two motions standing in my name. They are Motion No. 13 and Motion No. 66. Without affecting the privileges of any other members of the House, I ask the consent of this assembly to substitute Motion No. 66 for Motion No. 13, and vice-versa.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree?

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I have not had the time to read those motions. I do not know what they say. No doubt our consent would be forthcoming, but it would be forthcoming tomorrow after I have had an opportunity to read the text of both motions.

MR. MAZANKOWSKI—REQUEST FOR CONSTRUCTION OF POSTAL FACILITY IN TOFIELD, ALTA.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I ask leave to present a petition on behalf of 224 residents of Tofield and its surrounding area in the province of Alberta. The petition respectfully requests that urgent consideration be given to the construction of a new postal facility in the community of Tofield to meet the increased service requirements caused by the extensive growth in the rural and urban areas of this community. Present facilities are grossly inadequate both for general delivery and box delivery, resulting in postal services being well below an acceptable level.

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER BILL C-89 ON SECOND READING

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I wish to inform the House that there have been consultations among the representatives of the parties but it has not been possible to reach an agreement under the provisions of Standing Order 75A or 75B with respect to the proceedings at second reading stage on Bill C-89, an act to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act.

I wish to give notice that at the next sitting of the House I shall propose a motion pursuant to Standing Order 75C to allocate one additional sitting day to the said stage of the said bill.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 3,516, 3,527, 3,559, 3,682 and 3,724.

HERD MAINTENANCE ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 3,516—Mr. Neil:

1. By province, how many livestock producers qualified for payments under the herd maintenance assistance program and, in each case, what was the total amount paid?

2. By province (a) how many producers' applications were rejected (b) how many producers appealed from an original rejection and how many such appeals were allowed?

3. What were the criteria used by the appeal board?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by Agriculture Canada and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as follows:

1. By province, the total number of applicants who qualified for herd maintenance assistance payment and the total payment to producers in each province were as follows:

Province	Number of Applicants Qualified	Total Payment (by province)
Alberta	1,349	$ 3,248,576
Saskatchewan	15,035	24,626,593
Manitoba	8,961	16,004,944
Northern Ontario	362	759,761

2. (a) By province the following number of applications were ultimately rejected for assistance under the program:

Province	Number of Producers Ultimately Rejected
Alberta	1,445
Northern Ontario	16

(b) By province the following number of producers appealed their original rejection and had their appeals allowed:

Province	Number of Producers Who Appealed	Number of Appeals Allowed
Alberta	301	179

3. The herd maintenance assistance program review board was charged with two principal tasks. The first task was the review of decisions by the program administrators on eligibility of individual producers. For these reviews, the original program criteria utilized by the board was:

Basic breeding herd on farm as of December 31, 1979.
Less than 60 per cent normal precipitation.
Less than 80 per cent normal crop yield.
Any special circumstances which could result in an inequity to the appellant.

The second task was the preparation of recommendations to ministers for changes in the program criteria or the consideration of special circumstances. The recommendations put forward by the board were general and applied to all applicants for each recommendation, but did not indicate that any specific criteria were utilized.

DISTRIBUTION RIGHTS IN EUROPE FOR NUMISMATIC MATERIALS

Question No. 3,527—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does a firm known as Numarco, which is based in Brussels, Belgium, have any type of government contract for distribution rights in Europe of Canadian numismatic materials and, if so, what was the date the contract came into effect and has it been in effect for approximately six years?

2. Is a Mr. André Morin the president of Numarco?

3. Were the distribution rights given to Numarco during the tenure in office of Mr. Yvon Gariepy, former Master of the Royal Canadian Mint?

4. What was the date the contract was signed or renewed?

5. In each year that Numarco had the contract, what was the total commission received by the firm from the Mint and what was the total for the entire period?

6. Was or is the government involved in the occupancy by Mr. Gariepy of a cottage at Ste-Adèle, Quebec owned by Mr. Morin and, if so, what are all the details?

7. Does the government condone heads of Crown corporations receiving cottages rent free or at reduced rents from firms doing business with such corporations?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. No, Numarco has no type of government contract for distribution rights in Europe or elsewhere for Canadian numismatic materials. However the Royal Canadian Mint did have an agreement with Comarex AG to administer the sales of numismatic coins in Europe. Comarex in turn had a contract with Numarco. The agreement between Comarex and the Royal Canadian Mint was effective January 1, 1977, and was terminated as of December 31, 1981.

2. We are informed that Mr. Morin is "Administrateur délégué" of Numarco.

3. No, distribution rights were never given to Numarco before, during or after tenure in office of Mr. Yvon Gariépy.

4. No contract was signed and therefore no date of signing could be provided.

5. Numarco has not had any contract with the Royal Canadian Mint and no payment of any kind or commission has ever been advanced by the latter or the former.

6. No, the government has never been involved in the occupancy by Mr. Gariépy of a cottage at Ste-Adèle.

7. No, the government does not condone the heads of Crown corporations receiving cottages rent free or at reduced rents from firms doing business with such corporations and has no knowledge of any such occurrence.

VISAS ISSUED TO SOVIET CITIZENS

During the past 12 months, how many tourist or visitor visas were issued to Soviet citizens by the Department of External Affairs and, in each case, what was his/her name, address, profession and reason for coming to Canada?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): From December, 1980, to the end of November, 1981, a total of 469 visitors' visas were issued to Soviet citizens. The additional information requested in the question is not readily available and would require a great deal of manual research for which the commission/department does not have the necessary resources.

DEPENDENT CARE ALLOWANCE

What amount is paid per week by the Department of Employment and Immigration for babysitting services for those persons who are accepted for training courses and who have young children?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The department does not pay for babysitting services as such. It provides a dependant care allowance for pre-school age children to trainees referred under the Canada Manpower training program. The allowance is intended to assist trainees with the costs of caring for dependants who require it, not to cover the full cost of services. The current rates are:

One dependant	$20 per week
Two dependants	$35 per week
Three dependants	$50 per week
Four or more dependants	$65 per week

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

What percentage of public servants working in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in Quebec indicate English as their first official language?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: of all the department's public servants working in Québec, 7.5 per cent indicate English as their first official language.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 2,214 standing in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately. I might point out for the edification of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that it weighs about ten pounds.

Madam Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers Nos. 36, 37 and 49.

COMMUNICATIONS RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL RESEARCH DEVELOPMENT CENTRE

Motion No. 36—Mr. Stewart:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House, copies of all communications, transcripts or notes of interviews, memos, notes of telephone conversations, applications for grants, bursaries and fellowships between the government through the International Research Development Centre and any other person or group requesting or being considered for financial grants from the International Research Development Centre, particularly fellowships or financial sponsorship to individuals who hold or held elected or appointed office in governments of other countries or who were or are members of recognized political parties in other foreign nations.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The International Development Research Centre has been considering applications for grants, bursaries, and fellowships for over ten years.

Successful applications alone number in excess of 3,000. There is an even greater number of unsuccessful and pending applications.

Extensive files exist on the vast majority of these applications. Therefore, it would be impractical to lay before the House copies of all communications, transcripts or notes of interviews, memos, notes of telephone conversations, applications for grants, bursaries and fellowships between IDRC and any other person or group requesting or being considered for financial grants.

Furthermore, Madam Speaker, IDRC records will not indicate whether applicants are members of political parties. Neither are records indexed according to whether applicants hold or held elected or appointed office in governments of other countries.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I would ask that this motion be withdrawn.

Mr. Stewart: Transfer for debate.

Madam Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Motions Nos. 37 and 49 are stood.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (for Mr. Lalonde) moved that a Ways and Means Motion about a bill to amend, among other things, the Petroleum Administration Act, laid upon the Table of the House on Tuesday, February 23, 1982, be concurred in.

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 23, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-89, to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on second reading of this legislation. Today notice has been given of a motion to impose closure on debate. I do not know why hon. members opposite want to impose closure on a piece of legislation which is such a feeble effort to overcome the housing crisis in the country.

First of all I should like to speak about the need for housing in Canada today—

Mr. Garant: Speak about your trip.

Mr. Crosbie: I will deal with my last trip when I come to it but I am not going to the great roundup for a while yet!

I want to deal first with the need that exists, and then with how these needs were viewed by the Liberal party several years ago. I will go on to deal with the solutions that the governmet proposes and their inadequacy. After that I will outline what we proposed and point out how the people of Canada would have been helped had we not been stopped by the NDP-Liberal conspiracy to restrain justice in Canada in December, 1979. I will then go on to make some suggestions about what should be done to help the people of Canada.

First of all, we must ask ourselves what some of the needs for action are in the housing field today. We only have to consult the latest CMHC report to see what the need is. A report published yesterday by the Canadian Press reads in part as follows:

High interest rates will cause housing starts to fall by 9 per cent and will make 1982 another bad year for the housing industry—

Referring of CMHC, the second paragraph reads as follows:

The federal Crown corporation predicts little change in mortgage rates during the first half of this year and perhaps slightly higher rates in the second half.

Mortgage rates are now running at about 19 per cent, Mr. Speaker, and the government's own agency, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, expects the rates to be higher in the second half of the year. The article states that housing starts are expected to drop to about 162,000 units this year compared to 177,973 units last year.

I might point out that in 1976, the best year the country has had for housing starts, 273,203 units were built. This year it is expected that 100,000 fewer will be constructed. Has the population of Canada somehow declined or vanished if we need 100,000 fewer housing starts this year than in 1976? Of course it has not.

The article goes on to say that corporation predicts that this year starts on single-detached houses will drop to 83,000. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, in this whole gigantic country from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Vancouver Island, there will be 83,000 starts on single detached homes in 1982. This is the marvellous record of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have been in office for two years and whose record is so shameful that one would expect them to leave quietly without even calling an election. They should vanish from the country in shame at such a record.

CMHC forecast that for my own province of Newfoundland there will be 3,500 housing starts this year, Madam Speaker.

That is a pitiful number. In the highest and best year for housing starts, over 5,000 were built in that province. I do not have the figures in front of me but as I recollect, the figure is 3,500 as compared to 2,000 more in 1978, which was the year with the highest number of starts in Newfoundland.

For evidence of just how bad the situation is I refer to a report which appeared in The Globe and Mail on May 27, 1981. It quotes Mr. Richard Shiff, Chairman of Bramalea Ltd. of Brampton as follows:

> What we are witnessing is a financial crisis that has squeezed low and middle-income families out of the market.

He says it will squeeze them out of the market. Well, Mr. Speaker, he should know; that is his company's business. The article goes on to say:

> He estimated that an Ontario family would have to have a combined income of $46,000 this year to afford a $70,000 mortgage, representing a 40 per cent cost increase in the past year.

He said:

> Less than 10 per cent of Canadian families, who are currently renting, earn this level of income.

In other words, less than 10 per cent of Canadian families can expect today ever to own their own homes or ever to have the opportunity of owning their own homes. Of course he ascribed a great deal of blame to government housing policies and to the high interest rate situation of today, which he said has reached the outrageous height of 19.5 per cent. One of his recommendations was to permit home owners to deduct from income for tax purposes mortgage interest expenses above a realistic mortgage rate of about 13 per cent. He estimated that it would cost the government about $500 million in 1981 alone.

This reminds me of the solution we put forward in the House in December 1979 which was defeated—and I will come to that in more detail in a few minutes—by a combination of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party, which cared not a whit about helping home owners of Canada or those who might want to become home owners when they have that opportunity.

What other evidence about the need for action in housing do we require? I am looking now at a column by Dian Cohen which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on November 3. Her calculation was that from 85,000 to 100,000 people could lose their homes in Canada in the next year. She quoted Mr. Claude Renaud, vice-president of the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada, who estimated that 70,000 home owners will have nothing to fall back on when they renegotiate their loans as they come due during the present year. There we have 70,000 to 100,000 home owners with mortgages who, as Dian Cohen, the economist, and Mr. Renaud, vice-president of the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada, say, will not be able to renegotiate their mortgage renewals this year and will lose their homes. Somebody on the opposite side might start croaking, "What evidence do you have that anybody is losing his or her home?"

Just in my district of St. John's West, Newfoundland, I have more than sufficient evidence. I should like to refer to a letter that was sent to me just this week. It is a letter from Judith Murphy of 228 Mundy Pond Road in St. John's West. Mrs. Murphy herself is in dire straits, as the government likes to call it. She wrote a letter to the newspaper on September 12, 1981. She sent a copy of the letter she had written to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in which she pointed out how, after being married 11 years, her husband and she now have to do battle with double mortgage payments. Three years ago they managed to purchase a new home of their own. Now they are faced with the prospect of losing it because of high interest rates. She asked the Pime Minister to do something about it, to help her keep her home so that her two children will have the benefit of growing up in their own home and not in tenement housing. In the letter she said:

> There are no words to describe to you how it feels to be on the threshold of losing the security which one dreams of having in being a home owner.
> I must confess to you that there is possibly one way to hold on to my home, that is if we really cut back, and what I mean by cutting back, more so than I already have, is to stop buying food.

> I have two children, they don't get to travel to faraway places on vacation, they enjoy the back garden.

They do not go to Morocco, they do not go to Kenya, and they do not go on summer vacations to North Africa with papa because papa does not have the Government of Canada and its huge exchequer behind him to send him and his children to these exotic countries of the world. No, this woman has only her own backyard for those two children to travel to during the summer, so she realizes that the Prime Minister will not understand how it feels to her. She said:

> This is not a crank letter—I am sure I have voiced the thoughts of thousands more like me.

She wanted a reply from the Prime Minister by return mail as to what he could do. Of course she did not receive any reply from the Prime Minister as to what she could do, but she received a reply from me as to what she could do. I told her that there was very little she could do as long as the government was in power—this government which does not care, this government which will deceive and use deceit to get into power and then will just forget every promise or obligation it made during the few months it was out of power.

Also, Mrs. Judith Murphy sent me the advertisements in the St. John's newspaper of foreclosures and forced sales of houses under mortgages in just one week. In my district of St. John's West, there were 17 sales under mortgages in that particular week which she clipped from the paper. These are the notices of sales under the power of sale, all in my district. With the exception of one sale in Chamberlain and one sale in Gander, the other 15 are from St. John's West. All of those homes were held under mortgages. Here is one on 81 Munden Drive, Mount Pearl, it was sold on Monday, February 22. This is a person in dire straits who had his home sold just on Monday. If anyone is looking for bargains, I can give them other addresses in Mount Pearl and throughout St. John's West—Ferryland, St. Vincent's and Colinet in my district. These houses all went up for sale under powers of sale this month. This shows the need. The government should not tell us that there is no need.

Also, I have a petition from Mrs. Murphy with 38 names of people who are in dire straits or in this perilous situation themselves. Now, if a person has a $30,000 mortgage and has to pay 19 per cent interest on it this year, it will cost $5,700 in interest alone. A $30,000 mortgage is not a large mortgage. The average small three-bedroom home in Newfoundland today costs at least $60,000. A piece of land in St. John's, now serviced to build on, costs $30,000. One cannot get it for under $30,000, but a $30,000 mortgage at 19 per cent costs $5,700 per year.

What about Mrs. Murphy? On February 9 she wrote that her husband's gross salary in 1981 was $15,600 and that her gross salary was $9,000. These are not lazy people, they have two children and they are both working. She wrote:

How would Mr. Trudeau like to feed and clothe and house his children on that?

He has been cuddled into the bosom of government for years, since 1968, paying for nothing. He has been over at 24 Sussex Drive and at Harrington Lake. He does not have to worry about salaries of $15,600 or $9,000. He has a staff to look after his children, nannies, nursemaids, and everything under the sun, but Mrs. Murphy has to. She said that they got into their home three years ago under the assisted home ownership program at a lower interest rate. Now she faces a renewal, and God knows what she will have to renew her mortgage at. If it is at a 19 per cent interest rate or anything over 12 per cent or 13 per cent, they are finished; they will lose their home.

What else is evident in these? I have another clipping from the Montreal Gazette on January 26, 1982 which reads:

There were almost three million Canadians living in poverty in 1980, about 200,000 more than in 1979—

After all the promises and protestations of the "marvellous" Prime Minister which the country has had since 1968 about the just society, we see three million Canadians were living in poverty in 1980, which was 200,000 more than the year before. The article continued:

—639,000 families and 826,000 single people were poor in 1980—

That is 10.4 per cent of all families and 31.4 per cent of all singles in Canada in 1980—

This was a study carried out by the National Council of Welfare. There can be no doubt of the need for relief of home owners from high interest rates. I will come to what they are offered in this legislation in a few minutes.

By the way, the starts in Newfoundland in 1976 were 5,709. In 1978 they went down to 2,865. In 1981 they were 3,210, down 2,492 from the peak year of 1976. This year they estimate that it will be 3,500. What are the interest rates today compared with a year or so ago? Wait until I find my note; if I am unable to do so, I will give the interest rates from memory.

An hon. Member: That will never do.

Mr. Crosbie: I have a fantastic memory, so I will do it from memory. The interest rates in December 1979 and in March 1980 when the government took over were 14 per cent at the Bank of Canada; that was the bank rate. Mortgage rates were down around 12 per cent or 13 per cent. The interest rates at the bank, at the highest, had gone to 15 per cent when we were in power for a few short months. We were bearing the consequences of the ten or 12 years of neglect which we had behind us when the Liberals had been in power. As usual, a Tory government was following a Liberal government, and they were getting ready to say, "Tory times are hard times." Then the darned fools forgot themselves and they defeated us; the Liberal Party followed the Liberal Party and now we hear, "Liberal times are bad times." The people of Canada really know what causes bad times. It is the Liberal Party and Liberal policies that cause bad times. The Liberals are facing responsibility now for their own 12 years of neglect. So Liberal times are hard times, and the old slogan about Tory times being hard times are a result of the Tory party having to follow the Liberal Party in power every so often. But now the Liberals are in power and they are squirming and squealing. They are doing nothing. They are like a group of stuck pigs under a fence wondering how to get out from under it.

Let us hone in. What did the Liberal Party members say they were going to do when they were out of power? Here is what was said by the present Minister of DREE (Mr. Gray) before the commons committee on finance on October 30, 1979. He attacked the 14 per cent interest rate by saying:

—it will mean the loss of thousands of jobs; it will mean increases in the cost of living. It will probably bring the housing and construction industry to a halt—

It will put housing beyond the reach of most middle and lower-income Canadians. It will hurt small business—

—It will hurt farmers—and will add, therefore, to the cost of food.

That is what the minister said in October, 1979, when interest rates were 14 per cent. Today he is a member of the Government of Canada. Interest rates are far higher, but he does not think any longer about putting housing beyond the reach of most middle and low-income Canadians. He does not think any longer about bringing the housing industry to a halt. He does not care. He does not give a darn. He cares not a twit because he is in the warm embrace of the governmental bosom and could not care less for the next two or three years. He has cared less for the two years that have just passed. But that is what the minister said when he was in opposition.

What did the government's housing critic say when he was in opposition? He is now the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). He is now the man responsible for the over one million unemployed that we have. He is just as sincere and dedicated now as he had been then. He was then the housing critic. On October 29, 1979, he said that if there is a requirement to raise interest rates, there is an equal requirement to help those people who are hurt by those interest rate increases. That was the great Liberal principle when they were out of power. If interest rates have to rise, there is a requirement to help the people who are hurt by those interest rate increases. That was the great humanitarian Liberal principle of October, 1979. That minister, who has since become the hero of Canadian womanhood, announced what was the Liberal principle when the Liberals were in opposition.

What else did the Liberals say in those days? When it came to the election campaign, here is what the Prime Minister said about interest rates, as reported in the Toronto Star on February 10, 1980:

> I would want to manage the economy in such a way that interest rates would in fact come down—because the economy would be administered in a sounder way.

That is something to laugh about, Mr. Speaker, that interest rates would come down because of the way this Prime Minister would manage the economy. The hypocrite has not attempted to manage the economy. When he did attempt to do so in the last month or two, it has been a disaster. Again, during the election campaign, as reported in The Toronto Sun for February 4, 1980, we read:

> It is my belief we can manage the economy in a way that would allow us to have lower interest rates than we have now and I think we can have greater independence in interest rate policy.

If the Prime Minister thought that the economy could be administered in a sounder way than by bringing down interest rates, what has happened to him since? We know that he has visited practically every country in the world. But he has forgotten all about interest rates and how he was going to manage the economy and bring them down.

Here is what the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) said on October 25, 1979, in this chamber:

> I deplore high interest rates. The minister has made the decision to impose high interest rates. I am not prepared to say at this point that it was the right decision.

That was the President of the Treasury Board. But now what is he prepared to say? He was not prepared at that point to say it was the right decision when interest rates were 14 per cent, but he has been there since when interest rates were 19 per cent and went up to 21.5 per cent. Now he is prepared to say that it was the right decision, now that he is in power himself. The President of the Treasury Board finds that it was the right decision. He does not mind 21 per cent and 22 per cent interest rates. He only deplores 14 per cent interest rates when there is someone else in the government. He does not deplore them when he himself is in the government and could do something about them. This chamber stinks. It is rife with the hypocrisy of the people who spoke like that when they were out of power. They have done nothing to follow up on what they said when they were out of power since they have been in power.

What was the Liberals' housing program in the last election? They are too shamefaced over there to even bawl, cackle or howl. They are quietly shamefaced as they listen to this recital of their treachery. The Liberals' housing policy for 1979-1980 was:

> Our policy is guided by the basic principles of assisting low-income people to secure proper housing, and of increasing the affordability of ownership so more Canadians can choose between renting and owning.

That was the great principle the minister responsible for housing had when he was out of power. Now that he is in power, he does not give a darn about helping low-income people secure proper housing or increasing the affordability of ownership. All he has done is to bring this weak-kneed, spineless bill before the House on which he is now imposing closure to force it through. It is a pitiful rump of a bill that he has brought forward.

What else was said by this gentleman? I will not go too much further into this because it is too painful. In Toronto on January 12, 1980, the Prime Minister was giving his economic program to the people of Canada. He said:

> This party will not simply stand by and let the recession come. We will fight it and overcome it.

That was the great Liberal principle on January 12, 1980. The Liberals would not stand by and let the recession come. They were going to fight it and overcome it. Has anybody seen a recession that has been fought and overcome lately? Has anyone seen a recession fought and overcome since the government got back in power in March, 1980? All I have seen is a bunch of pantywaist people falling on their faces in front of a recession, afraid to do anything. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) brought in a budget that was the worst ever brought into this chamber that did exactly nothing to fight a recession but instead made it ten times worse.

What did the Liberals say after they got back into power? I will do this very quickly because I do not like inflicting this kind of punishment on the poor, dumb brutes opposite. Here is what they have said since they got back into power. The Minister of Finance said, as reported in the Montreal Gazette for March 19, 1980:

> Mortgage interest relief for Canada's home owners depends in part on the oil deal Ottawa gets with Alberta, says federal Finance Minister Allan MacEachen.

He said mortgage interest relief depends on the deal Ottawa gets with Alberta. That was when he was just beginning his career as this sliven, a sliven to top all slivens in the portfolio of the Minister of Finance. In the fall of 1981 Canada got an oil deal with Alberta which is giving the minister billions and billions of additional revenue. Indirect taxation is up 54 per cent this year. Indirect taxes are up $8 billion. The Minister of Finance has got the money. Why does he not carry out that program of mortgage interest relief that he said depended upon the negotiations? He tried to blame Alberta about mortgage interest relief. Then the minister went to Halifax and on September 9, 1980, he said "it was to create jobs, improve living standards and promote greater equity that I took on the position of Minister of Finance." Never have more boastful words been uttered by a man who did less to carry them out. He took on the position to create jobs, improve living standards and promote greater equity. What a laugh. What a disappointment that the man does not resign his portfolio today. If he had any backbone, gumption or any streak of honesty at all in him, he would swallow those words, he would eat them right in front of us in this chamber the way he has failed after making those boastful remarks in Halifax, Nova Scotia, on September 9, 1980. Then a few months later, on November 21, 1980, Canadian Press reported:

> Canadians will have to accept a lower standard of living to adjust to higher energy prices, Finance Minister Allan MacEachen says.

Who said that? It was the Minister of Finance, the man who a few months before said that he would create jobs, improve living standards and promote greater equity. He said that in September, but in November he said that Canadians will have to accept a lower standard of living to adjust to higher energy prices. He said also:

> We just can't as a country escape some adjustments in our standards of living for a time. That's a hard message but I think it just has to be put across.

If that is not hyprocrisy, if that is not the lowest of the low, if that is not twisting and turning because he could not see any way out, what is it? We have to get used to lower standards. We are not going to get used to more equity. We are not going to get used to more jobs. We are not going to get used to improved living standards for which he said he became Minister of Finance. But no, now his message is to get used to a lower living standard. That was never mentioned when the Liberals were seeking power.

Let us go on to the next month, Mr. Speaker, December 6, 1980. What did the Prime Minister say? The Prime Minister who told us what a wonderful job he was going to do on interest rates said that Canadians should change their spending priorities to maintain the same level of food on their tables while reducing spending in other areas. He said:

> They don't have to accept less on their tables, but they might want to switch priorities and spend more on food than they are on other things.

That is the Prime Minister's theme in December 1980, after telling us how they were going to do such wonderful things for the Canadian people. Are they going to go to the electorate in the next election with the great slogan: Come, shorten your belt, tighten your belt, change your priorities, accept less on your tables, spend more on food than on other things? Is that the slogan for the next election? Are they going to promise Canadians dire straits in the next election? "Vote Liberal and we will make sure you are in dire straits." That should be their slogan in the next election.

On May 9, 1981, interest rates have gone berserk. The Ottawa Citizen says "Mortgages soar—we're on our own". This is what the Minister of Finance said:

> It would be wrong for me to give advice to particular individuals as to how they are to manage their affairs.

He did not mind advising them what to do in the election. He said, "Vote Liberal and prices will come down". He gave them advice then, but now he is the powerful Minister of Finance of Canada, this sensitive man from Cape Breton, and he says:

> It would be wrong for me to give advice to particular individuals as to how they are to manage their affairs.

This Uriah Heep of all Uriah Heeps would not advise individual Canadians. He said the government would not bail out individuals facing a mortgage renewal or first-time home buyers trapped by circumstances. The article says:

> The minister noted that an analysis last year found most home owners could handle the payments resulting from higher rates.

This minister had the audacity to say that his analysis showed most home owners could handle the payments resulting from higher rates. Home owners of Canada out there looking on, the thousands of you, do you realize that you can handle these higher rates? Eighteen per cent, 19, 20, 21, 22? Don't be bothered by it; the Minister of Finance, Mr. MacEachen, says his analysis has found most of you can handle the payments resulting from higher rates. Can you hear that, Mrs. Judith Murphy down in my district of St. John's West? Don't worry, you are going to lose your home. Can you hear that, the 17 people whose homes are up for sale in my district? Just hear this: You are foolish, you should not have your house up for sale, you should not have allowed them to take your house from you. Why, you can handle the payments resulting from higher interest rates, according to that Minister of Finance of Canada, Mr. MacEachen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. On a couple of occasions the hon. member has taken the liberty of referring to hon. members by their surnames. He should refer to them by the riding they represent.

Mr. Crosbie: I agree with you, Mr. Speaker. I can well understand why the Minister of Finance does not want anyone to know his name. If I were him, I would not want them to know my name either. So I agree with you completely.

Now I come to my final selection, of September 11, 1981. What have the great promises come to now? They are down in Ingonish pondering what they can do about interest rates, and the Prime Minister says he has no plans to offer general relief from record high mortgages and mounting energy prices. Any help will only be for those in, and I quote him, "absolute dire straits." That was not his economic program in 1979-80. You are only going to get help if you are in absolute dire straits. What is "absolute dire straits"? Well, one analogy I like to make is this. You are lying out there at the side of the road in winter, Mr. Speaker, without a stitch on. You do not have a home to go to or shed to crawl into. I would say that puts you in absolutely dire straits. What is this government's solution? If we look at the bill before us now, why, the minister responsible for housing and the Prime Minister are driving along in their big chauffeured Cadillac, or whatever it is, and they see this naked body at the side of the road. They stop. They are Liberals, they are very concerned when they see a naked figure at the side of the road in winter. They get out of the car, the Prime Minister takes the hands, the minister responsible for housing takes the feet and they move him off the road behind the trees so no one can see him. Now they have looked after your dire straits. That is the policy of this government, a policy which the people of Canada are not going to forget. They will never forget and never forgive you for leaving them in absolute dire straits, believe me.

What about the minister responsible for housing? A delegation of middle-class people in distress came here to Ottawa to see him. After getting the RCMP riot squad around him to make sure there would be no rough treatment, he met them and told them that something had to be done. These people are going to lose their homes and everything they have. He said, "Something has to be done and we will do something, I can tell you that." A positively Churchillian response to those people in their misery. After being in office for a year and a half, having defeated a government that was attempting to do something, he told them something has to be done and we will do something. The "something" he has done is in this pitiful piece of legislation before the House. What are they going to do? Well, there are 920,000 mortgage holders in the last half of 1981 and the first half of 1982 who had to renew their mortgages, most of them in trouble. The government is providing $38 million to help those 920,000 mortgage holders. Perhaps 12,000 will get some help. How do you get the help? If you are spending over 30 per cent of your income on mortgage payments, they will then give you assistance. If you have any equity in your home, they are going to give you another loan to add to the rest of your loans to meet higher interest payments. That is supposed to be help, and you have to pay it back some day. But if you have no equity left and you are paying over 30 per cent of your income on mortgage payments, then they are going to give you a grant of $3,000 to help meet the additional interest costs. That is the great program the minister referred to when he said something has to be done, and he will do something. He has done nothing, he has done less than nothing. He has shamed his government and his country, if this was all he could come up with.

Then there is the $112 million to help build 15,000 rental units. He has done nothing for tenants. There is no shelter allowance here. Mr. Speaker, when we presented our proposal to the House back in the fall of 1979 the Liberals and the NDP opposed it. They said, "This is no good, we want a shelter allowance to help the low-income home owner and tenant." Where is the shelter allowance? They have been there now for two years. They have increased taxes by many billions of dollars, 54 per cent in indirect taxes alone. A 31 per cent increase in revenues this year compared to last year. Where is the shelter allowance for tenants? There is nothing for tenants and home owners, nothing for anyone in this legislation on which the minister puts closure. He has the effrontery, the gall to come into this House and say we should rush through this pitiful piece of legislation. That is the best he can come up with for the people of Canada like my Mrs. Judith Murphy and the other people who are losing their homes down in Newfoundland this week under powers of sale. This is the best he can do for them. And the hypocritical Minister of Finance says to them that his surveys have shown that they can meet these higher costs, this doubling of interest rates. Disgusting hypocrisy, and the people of Canada are not going to forget it. They are not going to forget the members of the NDP who put them in the position where they could wreak this damage on the Canadian people, the same party which opposed the program we brought in to help the Canadian people. Well, what was that program? It was a program of mortgage interest and property tax deductibility. It represented a major effort to help the Canadian people. It would have, in the year 1982, put $2,800 million in the pockets of home owners in Canada, whether they had a mortgage or not. Part of the program related to mortgage interest, and part to property taxes. That would have been the result had the legislation passed, had the NDP and Liberals not stopped us in their vicious desire to get back into power. Although they had been there for most of this century, they could not stand being out longer than seven months.

The government might have forgotten that. The government should have acted for the good of the people of this country and should not have stopped this legislation which would have provided $2.8 billion. Home owners paying $5,000 a year for mortgage interest would have received the maximum relief, amounting to $1,250, and would have received another $250 in relief from their property taxes. That was the maximum assistance they would have received under the program, implemented over four years. They would have received a quarter of the benefit in 1979, half of the benefit in 1980, three-quarters of the benefit in 1981, and the benefit of the full program this year, 1982. I believe $2,850 million was the total amount.

That was what we offered and what we wanted to put before the people of Canada. How would that help home owners with their mortgages? The average amount of assistance under our program to Canadian home-owning families this year would have amounted to $590 per family. I say to the ladies and gentlemen of Canada who are out there looking on that that would have helped them with their increased interest rates. That would have helped them to a considerable extent, and they would not have this kind of ruinous interest rate because the interest rates would have been considerably lower had we been left here unobstructed and had our policies gone into effect over the last two years, and had the tar sands gone ahead. We would not be hearing this anti-U.S. and anti-private sector rhetoric. There would not be these vicious attacks on the Canadian dollar by the government, which leaves this government with nothing with which to defend the dollar but high, high, crucifying interest rates. No, the home owners of Canada would have had tremendous assistance had we been left there.

I will discuss further details of that program which was introduced in the House in December of 1979. It was to be phased in because we were fiscally responsible. It would have been phased in over four years with the full benefit in the 1982 tax year. It would have provided $2.8 billion. This year home owners would have received also another $1 billion from the energy tax credit, whether they paid income tax or not. You Canadians out there who are now looking on this chamber would have been receiving another $1 billion, amounting to a total of $3.8 billion to help you in your costs of meeting energy increases. Each family of four would have received $220. You would get the maximum if you had a maximum income of $25,000. It was a program to help lower-income people.

That was stopped by the Liberal Party. That was stopped by the hon. members of the New Democratic Party. That is the party whose leader goes across this country, the galloping Uriah Heep of Canadian politics, twisting his hands, telling people how badly off they are and how his heart bleeds for the Canadian people who are paying such high interest rates and paying so much on their houses, and paying so much on their mortgages, and paying so much to the banks. He rubs his hands and tells them how sympathetic he is concerning their situation when he is the one who put them in the position of dire straits. He is the one who put them back under the tutelage of the Liberal Party of Canada. That gentleman should also take a hint and resign, if he is worried about the people of Canada and what they are suffering from today. He is the one who is in bed with the government and its economic policies and in bed with the government and its constitutional policies. He could not wait to get into bed with all of those policies.

An hon. Member: You were in bed with the oil companies.

Mr. Crosbie: Pardon?

An hon. Member: You were in bed with the oil companies.

Mr. Crosbie: The only person with whom I go to bed—I will not mention her name in this chamber. I am not in bed with anyone, except occasionally.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Where does this lead us to? Here we have this piece of legislation, Bill C-89. The minister who puts his name to this piece of legislation will go down in Canadian history as—what is the name of the meanest character Charles Dickens ever invented?

An hon. Member: John Crosbie!

Mrs. Mitchell: Uriah Heep!

Mr. Crosbie: Uriah Heep, Fagin—he will go down as the most miserly housing minister in Canadian history. If the minister responsible for housing could not do better with the Minister of Finance than he did, he should resign. He should quote, to the Minister of Finance, some of these quotations that I found without any trouble at all. He should quote to the minister. Do hon. members know what the Minister of Finance said? He said his budget had three themes: restraint, equity and economic renewal. He should start to ask the Minister of Finance, "Where is the equity in your budget, minister? You are giving me $38 million to meet the needs of the 950,000 mortgage holders, or whatever the number may be, whose mortgages are coming due this year."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order!

An hon. Member: Time!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: No, Mr. Speaker, I am just starting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): According to the time allotted by our rules, the hon. member has finished his intervention.

Mr. Crosbie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it is far from the first time that I have risen to debate this sort of bill in the House. Notable times which occur to me were in 1973, 1975, concerning two bills of this sort, and in 1979, to name a few that I can recall. The first time, in 1973, I had some advice for the government which essentially boiled down to two words, which were to "get out" of the housing field if it wanted to help matters for Canadian people.

Mrs. Mitchell: That is what they are doing!

Mr. Clarke: That is what the government has not done over the nine years since I first made those remarks. However, the minister of the day, the Hon. Ron Basford, did take my advice in that he got out. First of all, he got out of the housing and urban affairs ministry; a few years later, he got out of the justice ministry; and a few years ago, he got out of Parliament altogether and set himself up as a private citizen in Vancouver. Maybe at the time of the next election, whenever it comes, hon. members opposite will find that they are getting out of this House too, or at least out of this government, so that the enterprise sector of our country can start to provide some housing which is so badly needed by everyone in Canada.

However, did they get out? Did they do anything about trying to encourage the enterprise system? I refer the House to the public accounts of 1981, Volume III, the financial statements of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation which indicates that the No. 1 liability of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is borrowings from the Government of Canada which amount to over $10 billion. It has borrowed $10,085 million from the Government of Canada.

We know where that money came from, do we not, Mr. Speaker? It came from the taxpayers of Canada who are out there struggling, trying to provide themselves with housing while this burden of taxation is around their necks. Not only has $10 billion been borrowed from the taxpayers of Canada and put into the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation for whatever purposes the minister may have had in mind, but there is also an item in the public accounts showing grants, contributions and subsidies on behalf of the minister for the year ending December 31, 1980, and the total charged to the minister, as per Schedule 5 in those public accounts, is $997 million. Three million short of $1 billion has been charged off in the current fiscal year to the minister for grants, contributions and subsidies. That is a trend which started in 1979 with $840 million, amounting, as I say, to $997 million in 1980. The current estimates cut that slightly, but it is still well around the $900 million mark for the current fiscal year for the minister's discretionary expenditures on housing.

I want to refer back to 1975 for a moment, which is seven years ago, after all. In the debate at that time, I quoted an excerpt from The Vancouver Province of September, 1974. The editorial in The Vancouver Province observed that:

'—our housing difficulties, particularly in the rental field, compose a classic case of problem creation by government.

We did not begin to experience real rental shortages in this country until the federal government removed the tax incentives that channelled a lot of private money into rental accommodation.'

Do we remember what things were like prior to 1971 when this government changed accounting principles, changed the taxation principles, and drove out large segments of the enterprise sector from the housing field? All of a sudden, the government changed the rules for accounting and said, "Yes, if you manufacture something, or if you have a big industrial plant, you can deduct the capital cost allowance, the depreciation, from your plant and machinery and from your building". However, it also said, "If you are providing housing for Canadians who cannot afford to buy or build their own, if you are building rental housing in Canada, you will not be able to deduct a loss created by depreciation, by capital cost allowance, from other income".

Having completely destroyed or perverted the accounting principles that had been accepted in this country for a hundred years and more, the result was predictable. High income Canadians, those in the position to invest in housing, have to protect themselves and invest their funds somewhere. However, those whom we want to encourage to provide housing and invest in Canada were driven out of the housing business. That is when the shortages started.

I have often said here and in other places that we have no housing shortage in Canada. The minister should know that; he need only count up the unsold, speculatively built units that are found across this country. There is no housing shortage in Canada. What we have is a money shortage among certain people who cannot find housing they can afford. This is the affordable housing that we on this side of the House talk about. We talk about it all the time. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) talks about affordable housing. This is the problem.

If you have enough money, you can go anywhere in Canada, even in Point Grey, as the member for Vancouver East says, or in my riding of Vancouver Quadra, and buy a single family lot for $500,000 cash, if you have it. Then you can build a house. Or you can do what others are doing in Vancouver and buy a run down house for $245,000, tear it down and build a new one.

There is no housing shortage in this country. What we have is a money shortage. This government has taken the money, splattered it all over the map and has not hit the target of where the money is needed.

The hon. member for Vancouver East sometimes thinks my housing policies are strange. However, I find support for my policies from unexpected sources. The Canadian Organization of Public Housing Tenants may seem a strange outfit for me to call on for support. It turns out they realize the same problems that I have seen and which this government has presented to them. They wrote the following in their official newsletter, "The Raised Roof". I quote from a 1979 speech that I made in this House. I find I am the greatest quoter of my own speeches in this House. The first page of this "Raised Roof" newsletter is headlined "The problem is not really housing". In their lead editorial they say, and I quote:

The group has tried to show members of government, housing corporations and authorities that the problem in housing is not really housing, but the entire economic question, of which housing is merely one part.

That is what I have been saying for a long time. I have heard others on this side of the House say the same, but the government cannot see that there are individuals with problems. They seem to think there is a housing problem. What do we have now in Canada? We have a great underutilized private sector that wants to provide housing, but they are unable to do that because of the whole economic climate that the minister's colleagues have imposed upon us.

These remarks that I am referring to were made seven years ago, but nothing has improved. I will not say nothing has changed, but nothing has improved. We might ask ourselves what went wrong.

I mentioned 1971 when the government changed the basic accounting policies and said that losses created by capital cost allowance depreciation could no longer be deducted. I compared that with the fact that one can deduct capital cost allowance depreciation on machinery or a factory building. It is absolute nonsense when you compare the merits of the two cases.

What happened? Why did we get into this terrible situation in which we now find ourselves? Why has it become so much worse over the past three, seven or ten years? We saw that high-income individuals had stopped investing in rental housing because the climate had been made so bad for them. It started off with the policies of this government. This government tends to produce ministers of finance who have strange attitudes when it comes to economic policies that create problems for all Canadians.

The minister of finance seven years ago was one named John Turner. He was the first to sound the idea of taxing the imputed value of home ownership to see whether the government could raise more money. After all, those who owned their own homes and had equity in their homes, whether it was clear title or just an equity, did not pay any taxes on that income. I do not know whether it was that idea or one of his other ideas that caused him to get out of the finance portfolio. In any event, he is gone.

There has been a succession of others who have not really done anything other than to pay lip service to the economic problems we have in Canada today. Talk about strange things. We now have a Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) who wants to tax income before it is received. I am referring to the life insurance situation. He not only wants to tax income before it is received, but tax income that may never be received. On deferred income securities, the Minister of Finance wants to accrue income for tax purposes.

The minister has made a broadside attack in his current budget on the institution of marriage by denying married people the same tax benefits as two single people who live together are entitled to. I refer here to the exemption of capital gains tax on a second residence. The married couple will be denied that even though two single people will be entitled to it. If a widow and a widower should happen to get together and want to marry, this government will impose a terrible penalty on them. The pension benefits of the widow and widower would be taken away from both of them whereas they would continue if they stayed single.

The Minister of Finance says that a businessman can deduct the wages of those who help him earn his income, such as a secretary, stock clerk or shop clerk, but a working mother who must have an attendant or some other child care expense can only deduct $1,000 for tax purposes, even though she may have a nanny living in the house whom she pays $7,000 for that service. If she takes advantage of a child care service, even the one that will be offered by the House of Commons this year, it will cost about $4,000. The Minister of Finance says, however, that only $1,000 can be deducted.

The Minister of Finance is supposed to be encouraging people to work in Canada and to pay taxes. These women are working because they want to or need to, or both, yet they are being denied the proper deductions to which they should be entitled.

The Minister of Finance says that interest expenses on certain investments in Canadian businesses will not be deductible, another departure from generally accepted accounting principles. It has always been accepted that if money, particularly interest, was laid out for the purpose of earning income, even if not this year's income, it would be a deductible expense.

Many Canadians invest in Canadian businesses, not with the prospect of immediate profit. They may be willing to wait one, two, three or five years. Sometimes they do not know. The Minister of Finance, who is creating this bad economic climate for the housing industry, is also creating this bad economic climate for all Canadians who want to invest in Canada.

It is not only the federal government that is creating these problems and has created the problems in the housing field. The provincial governments have also got into the act. Rent controls have been in existence in a number of provinces. These have prevented economic rents being charged and new buildings were therefore not built. Housing was not provided where it was needed.

New buildings were exempted from rent controls after a few years because provincial governments realized that there was no new construction. They indicated that if new buildings were rented they would relax the rent controls. Of course, the predictable happened although those governments did not see it. Older buildings which were still under rent control became uneconomic units. They were torn down and replaced with new, more expensive housing which just created more problems for those people this minister responsible for housing is trying to help through this feeble bill which is before us today.

It is no wonder that there was not a flood of new units once the others were freed from rent controls. Investors were nervous about entering the market with brand-new, expensive units while many units were already on the market under rent control, resulting in severe competition to the newly-built units.

What else has the federal government tried to do during the last decade? We have had an alphabet soup of programs and one which comes to mind now is ARP, the assisted rental program. This was a scheme whereby a monthly subsidy was paid to developers to provide new units at a rent less than the economic rent. It did not have anything to do with the tenants. All that tenants knew was that they were getting a good deal on their rent. This scheme depended entirely on continuing high inflation for its success. Not one minister responsible for housing who would dream up an assisted rental program such as this could have expected it to work unless he had the collaboration—and even the collusion—of the Minister of Finance, who would guarantee that inflation would continue at a good high rate. If that were not the case the building owner would ultimately go bankrupt because his debt was ever mounting and his interest liability would eventually begin.

Did all this government intervention help? Did it result in more housing units? Apparently not enough, according to the minister. My colleague from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has quoted some figures on the shortfall of current housing starts to meet the needs of Canadians.

What did the government then decide to do? It gave us more alphabet soup. It introduced MURBs, a program designed to encourage multiple unit residential buildings. That program was introduced around 1976. It was only a restoration of the principles which were in effect in 1971. But did the program admit that it was wrong in cutting off this very valuable and efficient source of housing in 1971? No; it brought in a new portion of the alphabet which it called MURBs. It would not want to admit that it was wrong by restoring the old policy.

I suppose the MURB program was designed to confuse the industry and it certainly did that, along with the rest of Canadians. The plan was then to have the program expire at a specified date. The industry did not know when this date would be or whether it would expire at all. The industry put pressure on the government, which responded that it might be continued or it might not be. The industry did not know what to do.

This illustrates how the enterprise system has demonstrated time and again that it can tolerate any set of rules which the government may wish to impose upon it but cannot tolerate unknown rules and sudden changes to the rules. This uncertainty upsets all industrial planning. The government has not realized that fact yet.

As a result of this uncertainty, the housing industry was upset. It was continually turned off, then turned on, to the point that it did not know whether it was coming or going. The industry hoped that the MURB program would be renewed, which it was on numerous occasions, but always at the last moment. Finally, last December the MURB program was allowed to die. Whether it is a final death, only time will tell. Perhaps the housing minister will be able to resurrect it, but I am sure he will not get help from the Minister of Finance.

What was the result of the MURB program being finished in December? It created a panic in the housing industry which in its plans for 1982 it had laid on all this land, and which would not qualify for a MURB if it did not dig the foundations and instal the footings by the end of December. The predictable result of that was that jobs had to be done at overtime rates with high rentals on equipment which eventually resulted in added costs to construction. This will result in higher rents for those who occupy those MURBs.

I have talked enough about the government's programs. I would like to talk now about interest rates. Do interest rates not have something to do with the housing industry? If they do, the minister does not seem to confer with the Minister of Finance in order to do anything about it. The House will recall that one of the first acts of the Clark government in 1979 was to refer the problem of interest rates which were already too high at that time to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I had the honour to be the chairman of that standing committee during the Thirty-first Parliament. It was a serious study which was conducted by members of the House. Economists, those knowledgeable about interest rates, consultants and professors were summoned from all across the country to try to advise the Standing Committee on Finance. Trade and Economic Affairs on how to resolve the problems created by high interest rates and show what avenues were open to the government at the time.

It is curious that the finance critic for the Liberal Party at that time who was a member of that committee, the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), who is the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, referring in his remarks to the hon. member for St. John's West who was then minister of finance, said to the Commons finance committee on October 30, 1979, that:

> Your high interest rate policy would slow down the economy: it will mean the loss of thousands of jobs; it will mean increases in the cost of living. It will probably bring the housing and construction industry to a halt, with thousands of jobs being lost in those sectors.
> It will put housing beyond the reach of most middle and lower-income Canadians. It will hurt small business, which depends on bank borrowing to operate. It will hurt farmers, who have the same dependency on bank borrowing and will add, therefore, to the cost of food.

That remark was attributed to the member for Windsor West in the Commons finance committee, October 30, 1979.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, an election ensued not too many months after that statement. During that election campaign and afterwards, that same member who is now the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion promised the House, his electors and the people of Canada that if interest rates did not stay down or could not be brought down he would resign. I will give a comparison between what the interest rates were and what they are now.

Before I do that, I would like to recall some remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who, during the election campaign in Toronto, on February 10, 1980, promised that he would manage the economy in such a way that interest rates would, in fact, come down because the economy would be administered in a sounder way. The government may be trying to administer the economy in some way but it certainly is not in a sounder way. If I were in the Liberal government and administering the economy with the result it has achieved, I would not want to admit it.

Where were the interest rates then and what are they now? The interest rates which were causing the hon. member for Windsor West such panic at that time, in the 1980 election, were as follows: the Bank of Canada rate was 14 per cent, the average mortgage rate was 13.5 per cent and the chartered bank prime rate was 15 per cent. By August, 1981, the bank rate had climbed to a record 21.24 per cent; the chartered bank prime rate was 22.75 per cent. Some lenders were charging in excess of 22 per cent for first mortgages.

The government opposite has had a bit of luck since then—I do not think it could be attributed to good planning or to anything but good luck—and mortgage rates are currently closer to 19 per cent than the 22 per cent rate. However, that is a far cry from the mortgage rate of 15 per cent about which the Liberal opposition was complaining.

We know what this government has done. An hon. member who is now a minister threatened to resign. The government has done nothing about interest rates or, at least, nothing which has had any effect.

During the Thirty-first Parliament our government put forward a proposal which was, I think, one day away from passage, the so-called mortgage interest and property tax deductibility scheme. Some members of the Liberal opposition were ready to stand up for it. Some had voted for it at earlier stages. That bill was debated for about seven days when finally the axe fell on it. This bill has been debated four and a half days, and the minister stood up today and told us that that is enough. He told us he has to get this puny bill through in a hurry. I will talk about the bill more in a moment. The minister is giving us notice that tomorrow the provisions of Standing Order 75C will come into play, and we will have a debate about that.

The mortgage interest and tax deductibility scheme we introduced in the Thirty-first Parliament would have helped every one of those Canadians who are having trouble now because of the economic policies of this government. Even prior to the introduction of our bill anyone with some money and some good tax advice could have arranged his affairs to have his interest made deductible in any event. The bill we introduced was simply an attempt to bring all Canadians onto an equitable footing so that all Canadians could deduct interest—and property taxes too—paid on their principal residences.

Because of the inaction of this government with respect to that particular scheme, the situation which has developed is ludicrous. With the markets we have people are forced to take back second mortgages on the sale of their homes, and the interest on those mortgages taken back is treated as income for tax purposes. This is a regime enforced by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey). At the same time, when an individual goes and buys another home—just a replacement home, nothing special or different—and has to borrow because he does not have all his money out of his former home, he is not allowed, under the rules of this government, to deduct the interest on the new mortgage in calculating his taxable income. The government has imposed a double jeopardy on people like this who want to change homes for whatever reason. These moves might be required because of jobs, family reasons or whatever.

What we might question at this point is what this bill is all about. Bill C-89, which has been before us for these few days and on which the government opposite is imposing closure, will provide an "opportunity" for Canadians to go deeper into debt. Is that not a great favour from the government? It is encouraging Canadians to go deeper into debt. I have always felt that government should encourage people to become self-sufficient and retire their debts. But no, this plan allows individuals who are faced with higher mortgage payments to borrow more money and to go deeper into debt. Of course, the government will provide insurance so that lenders will not be jeopardized; they will be assured of getting their money back.

This bill also proposes to provide legislative authority for interest-free loans of up to $7,500 per unit to landlords constructing new buildings, as outlined in the budget. Seventy-five hundred dollars a unit might be all right in some cities such as Ottawa; perhaps the land cost per rental unit in Ottawa might be $10,000 up to $20,000. But in cities like Calgary and Vancouver $7,500 per unit would be absolutely worthless. Land costs in those areas are such that this bill would not encourage the construction of a single unit. Even if landlords get $7,500 loans, they will have to repay the loans, and rents will have to reflect the amortization of those loans from the government.

There are a couple of other things this bill proposes which are more serious and prehaps even more dangerous. The rate of interest payable on loans issued by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation would be determined by the corporation and not by the governor in council. This Parliament is supposed to make decisions dealing with taxpayers' money. As I said earlier, $10 billion is a lot of taxpayers' money for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to be dealing with. The government likes to take responsibility for taking decisions away from Parliament and making such decisions through the governor in council. I do not think we should forget that there were some 3,500 orders in council in the last fiscal year. However, this responsibility is being taken away not only from Parliament but also from the governor in council—the cabinet—and it is being given to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That is a very serious transfer of power away from elected representatives. I hope the minister is paying attention to this because he is losing control as much as all other Members of Parliament.

Another aspect of this bill is an observance of the fact that as many as 40,000 Canadian families may lose their homes because of the current high interest rates. A family income of $45,000 is now needed to afford an average-priced home in Canada. Hon. members do not need to be reminded of the mail they received from their constituents with respect to the current salary for a Member of Parliament of $48,000, which is only $3,000 more than the basic $45,000 needed to afford an average home in Canada. The salary of a Member of Parliament is not considered to be an average salary, it is considered to be a high salary, so where does that leave the average Canadian who earns less than $45,000 when he wants to buy a home?

Serious shortages are developing in many centres, and the number of housing starts in the last half of 1981 was barely half the number needed to keep pace with housing requirements.

I think I have said enough for this kind of bill. In closing, I just want to say that for over ten years the housing issue has been tossed around by this government. I referred earlier to the Hon. Ron Basford, who had this responsibility when he was minister of state for urban affairs. Not only has that minister come and gone but the ministry of state for urban affairs has also come and gone. I cannot remember who had responsibilty for housing in the meantime, but now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) is responsible for housing in this country, and I can only remark that this indicates the lack of importance this government attaches to the housing issue. Housing is a very important field, but it is a responsibility of the minister responsible for public works, a subject which is also very important.

We on this side of the House say that this bill is totally inadequate and misguided. The government should give the enterprisers of this country who are just waiting to get out there and build houses the opportunity to provide the housing Canadians need. They would provide it at rates which are suitable to the market, and they would sell their housing. This government should concern itself with making sure that there is no shortage of money for those who need affordable housing and making sure there is no shortage of policies which would provide economic soundness to this country.

We know what the unemployment situation is. We hear about it every day in the House. There are over one million unemployed. That number could be reduced by 10 per cent. One hundred thousand jobs could be found immediately in the housing industry if this government would give some encouragement to the enterprise sector which wants to build housing for Canadians.

Mr. Tousignant: Madam Speaker, the hon. member mentioned that the salary of a Member of Parliament is $48,000. I do not want him to mislead people. Anyone who works 15 or 16 hours a day, seven days a week, can make that salary anywhere else in Canada.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate on Bill C-89 which proposes certain amendments to the National Housing Act, recognizing that it is one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before Parliament for some time.

There is a very serious housing crisis in Canada today. As Members of Parliament we had a right to expect that the government would come forward with serious and responsible solutions to that crisis, but I regret to say that Bill C-89 fails completely to address the concerns of my constituents in the municipality of Burnaby and of Canadians generally. I say that not only from the perspective of the provision of rental housing and ensuring that Canadians have sufficient funds to be able to afford adequate housing, but as the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) indicated, also from the perspective of employment and jobs. I mean the jobs that thousands and thousands of Canadians could be filling if the government would only respond to the crisis that faces the people of Canada.

Some people may ask on what basis I identify the situation as a crisis. Mr. Speaker, in the last several months I have listened very carefully to the people of Burnaby. In response to a questionnaire which I circulated with a newsletter, 700 constituents have told me how they are affected by the housing policies of the Liberal government. I have also received many letters from constituents outlining their concerns about the housing situation in Burnaby and in British Columbia generally. I have received phone calls and many people have come to my constituency office to explain—not in alarmist tones but often in tones of sadness, despair and with a lack of hope for the future—how they are affected by the housing crisis.

In some instances several generations are involved—the children of my constituents, the young people faced with the tragedy of knowing that there is virtually no possibility of obtaining their own home in their lifetime under the policies of the present government, their parents, senior citizens who are in very serious difficulty. There are long waiting lists for affordable accommodation for senior citizens. This is a very serious concern that the government has failed to address.

Finally, I heard from my constituents at a large housing rally held in a school in my constituency in November last year. At that time men and women, young and old, came from all parts of Burnaby to express their concern and anger about the failure of the government to act on what must surely be recognized as a fundamental social right in a democratic and civilized society—the right to warm, clean and affordable housing.

As I said, my constituents are concerned and they are angry. I am here today to take part in the debate on Bill C-89 in order to express, on their behalf, their demand that the government take responsible, tough and effective action now—not in the future—to deal with the housing crisis in Canada.

I mentioned the questionnaire which I circulated in my constituency. I do not want to take the time of the House to read all the responses, but I think the minister and the House should hear how my constituents and their families are affected by the government's failure to respond to the housing crisis. A renter in Burnaby replied:

> We, a family of 4, have had to move several times to be able to afford the place we live. Still where we live now we are having a very hard time, but we cannot find a cheaper place.
> At this rate we will never own our own home and if rents go any higher we won't be able to rent—

A Burnaby home owner who lives on Ewart Street in South Burnaby wrote:

> Our payments have jumped from $511.00 to $818.00 per month, almost half our income per month.

They added that extras or home improvements are out of the question for them. Their interest rate went from 10.75 per cent to 21 per cent. Another Burnaby home owner replied:

> Both husband and wife must work to maintain home, plus we rent part of our house to a couple to help cover the mortgage, and help the other couple too—

Having a family is out of the question, Mr. Speaker. What kind of sociological impact will the policies of this government have upon Canadian society today? Another Burnaby renter writes:

> The chances of my owning a home seem remote. I don't feel the government should deny me this opportunity with their present policies—

Another Burnaby renter from Forest Grove Drive replied:

> Can't afford a house as rent etc. has gone up so much in B.C. We have filed for bankruptcy—

A resident of Saturna Drive wrote:

> Yes, as a young professional it is impossible for me to expect to be a home owner, given the mortgage rates, despite a reasonably good income—

A home owner on Portland Street in south Burnaby wrote:

> Because of the "don't care" attitude of big business and big government, we will be forced to cut back our retirement dreams in order to pay the bank to keep our homes, while bank profits soar—

These are just a representative example of the hardship being faced by my constituents in Burnaby, Mr. Speaker. Another renter writes:

> My rent is roughly 60 per cent of my total income which means I must cut basic and pleasure spending—

The writer adds that his diet has been affected by the housing policies of the government.

That is the devastating effect that the lack of a comprehensive and humane housing policy is having on my constituents in Burnaby. Not only are interest rates unacceptably high, but it is virtually impossible for people to find a home at an affordable price.

I have a few clippings from recent issues of The Vancouver Sun and The Vancouver Province. What is commonly known as a "handyman special" is advertised for $125,000. The advertisement says that if you can overlook some traffic and do a bit of upgrading-and there is not much of a view, apparently-you can get a house for $125,000 in Burnaby. Another advertisement triumphantly claims that the price is reduced by $20,000 to only $259,000 for a basic three-bedroom bungalow in South Burnaby. Another is listed as "builder's own" for $189,000.

There is also a problem with rentals for those people who obviously cannot afford the exorbitant housing prices in Burnaby, which are the highest in Canada. In South Burnaby a two-bedroom basement suite in a duplex goes for $600 per month; a small one-bedroom basement suite with shared toilet facilities goes for $350 a month; in Times Square, overlooking Burnaby's Central Park, one-bedroom suites start at $550 per month; a two-bedroom basement suite at the foot of Simon Fraser University is only $475 per month. The government is condemning thousands and thousands of Canadians in my constituency of Burnaby to totally inadequate levels of accommodation, Mr. Speaker.

The government says, "Let us get on with Bill C-89". The fact of the matter is that if the government was serious and brought forward legislation which dealt in a responsible manner with the housing crisis, we would be the first to support it. Bill C-89 is totally inadequate to deal with the real concerns of Canadians in the housing field.

Mr. Young: It is the Liberal scheme of caring and sharing.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): As the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young) puts it, it is the Liberal scheme of caring and sharing.

My constituents are angry and concerned about the government's failure to address what is unquestionably a housing crisis for all British Columbians; they feel a lack of hope for the future.

What is the housing policy of the Liberal government? Perhaps Paul Martin said it best in May, 1968, when he said:

> Our housing policy can be summarized in three words: Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

If the summary of the Liberal housing policy is "Pierre Elliott Trudeau", it is further evidence of why we in British Columbia have quite properly rejected any suggestion of Liberal members of Parliament in that particular province.

Mr. Heap: The Prime Minister himself lives in public housing.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Yes, he is one of the few who is fortunate enough to live in public housing.

Mr. Kelly: Where do you live?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): As I say, it is no surprise that British Columbians have rejected the Liberal party.

Mr. Cosgrove: You are holding up the bill.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): There are some calls on the other side defending the policies of the Liberal government. Those persons will have the right to stand before their constituents and explain to them why they are losing their homes and cannot afford proper accommodation.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) came out to British Columbia not so long ago. He is my twin in Burnaby. I intend to put before the people of Burnaby the voting record of the Minister of National Revenue on the policies of the government and on the budget. I will let the people of Burnaby decide whether my twin, the Minister of National Revenue, is seriously interested in the concerns of those people. Recently the minister spoke to some Liberals in Burnaby at a convention where he said he could sympathize with westerners who felt alienated because the federal government seems to be so remote and "doesn't always respond to local needs". He called the Liberal government "quite a national government" in the matter of housing. If it is a national government in housing, certainly its policies seem to stop at the British Columbia border. We in British Columbia and we in Burnaby are hurting from those particular policies.

What about the Conservative Party? Some people suggest that while the Liberal Party has failed—and of course they are right—to address the concerns of Canadians in this time of a housing crisis, the Conservative Party may have some answers. Let us look at the policies and the record of the Conservative Party during its short tenure in government. It was not the NDP who threw out the Conservatives; it was the people of Canada who threw them out and no one else. During its short term in government, interest rates increased five times. This hurt small business people, home owners and many other people in the community of Burnaby. I should like to give one example. A large hotel owner in South Burnaby wrote to the then prime minister in a telegram as follows:

> Congratulations Mr. Prime Minister Clark. We both are flat broke. You politically, me financially. We all will be out of business very soon. It is impossible for me or anyone to pay 16.5 per cent interest on $2 million on debenture to the Bank of Montreal from business $2.3 million gross take.
> You just didn't have heart to nuzzle these interest rate hungry pirates.
> P.S. Please don't tell me it is good for Canada and the only way out. I can give you half a dozen ways to keep the dollar where it is today without bankrupting Canadians.

This telegram is reflective of many other people in British Columbia who quite rightly rejected Conservative policies on housing in Canada. The Conservatives took steps to totally dismantle CMHC.

Mr. Clarke: Hurray!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I hear the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) cheering at the suggestion that CMHC should be dismantled. I suggest he should tell the thousands of Canadians who depend on CMHC for adequate housing that he believes it should be dismantled entirely—

Mr. Clarke: I will tell them what it is costing them.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): —and turned over to his friends in the private sector. In a moment I will deal with the friends of the Conservative Party in the private sector. Of course, its allies in the Social Credit provincial government are trying to dismantle rent controls and have failed miserably to address the serious housing crisis in British Columbia. Their first action was to dismantle the B.C. Housing Corporation shortly after assuming power. The B.C. Housing Corporation was established by the progressive New Democratic Party government in the years from 1972 to 1975.

Mr. Jarvis: What did the people do to them? It seems to me they were thrown out.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): What else did members of the Conservative Party have to say about interest rates? There were some rather enlightening comments on the subject. Hon. members of the House may recall that it was the Conservative government and the Conservative minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who reappointed Gerald Bouey, or "Bouey XIV", as he was called by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

Mr. Blais: He called him "Bouey XVI".

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I am sorry, "Bouey XVI". He reappointed Gerald Bouey as Governor of the Bank of Canada. In the summer of 1981 the hon. member for St. John's West said:

> Yes, I would continue to back Mr. Bouey . . . I agree that our interest rates have to keep track of those in the United States—

This was the Conservative minister of finance agreeing with high interest rate policies.

This is not something in the distant past. The present Conservative finance critic, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), said just a week ago that he accepted the high interest rate policies which government is espousing. He said:

> One after another the premiers proposed reducing interest rates, while accepting the inflationary consequences of a lower Canadian dollar. They were convinced that the benefits of lower interest rates and increased economic activity would offset the negative effects of increased inflation.

What did the Tory finance critic have to say about that? He said, "I do not agree with the premiers" that interest rates should be lowered. It is clear the Conservative Party offers no responsible alternative either. Is it any wonder that both the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party have failed to address seriously the housing crisis in Canada, when one looks at the fact that both parties receive substantial financial contributions from major banks of the country which are the only institutions to benefit from the pain Canadians are suffering as a result of the housing crisis?

I have before me the returns which show the donations made to the Conservative Party and to the Liberal Party.

Mr. Clarke: How much?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra asks how much.

Mr. Clarke: It was $50,000.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): It was $50,000 from each of the five major banks in the country; $50,000 to the Liberal Party and $50,000 to the Conservative Party each year.

Mr. Clarke: A pittance.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra indicates that they want more. I am not surprised. I am sure they will probably receive more. Not only do banks support both the Liberal and Conservative parties, but what about big land developers?

Mr. Howie: What about CLC?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): But what about the big speculators in the land? Let us have a look at the documents to see who they support. Nu-West Development Corporation gave the Conservative party $11,000. Deyong Management gave $15,000. Cadillac Fairview Corporation gave the Conservative Party $16,000. Genstar Ltd., major land speculators in Canada, gave $30,000 last year to the Conservative Party. Each and every one of these land speculators and developers also gave money to the party in power, the Liberal Party. They gave a little less. Daon Development gave only $10,800 to the Liberal Party. I guess they are happier with the policies of the Conservative Party, and again that is not surprising.

• (1720)

What we must recognize is that both the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party are squarely in the pockets of the land developers and speculators in Canada today. It is no wonder that they are so bankrupt when it comes to policies to benefit home owners, renters and workers at this time of housing crisis. It is no wonder they want to remove rent controls in Canada; they have to pay back their friends in the land development community. They are just looking after their friends.

Mr. Howie: What about our mortgage interest deductibility proposal?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): We in the NDP have a different approach to housing in Canada. It is a fundamentally different approach. We say that every Canadian is entitled to clean, warm, affordable housing as a fundamental right, just as they are entitled to health care, to proper education, to adequate diet and to a clean and wholesome environment. In fact, we feel so strongly about this that we proposed an amendment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that would recognize these as fundamental rights. Because as Frank Scott put it so eloquently, "the trappings of democracy hang loosely on an emaciated body politic". We need all of them. We need those fundamental rights to proper housing and the other rights that I suggest.

We have a positive alternative for housing. I am quite prepared to put it on the record today. We suggest that interest rates must be lowered, and lowered quickly.

Mr. Kelly: By how much?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The hon. member opposite asks by how much. I welcome his contribution to this debate—and his suggestions as to how far we should be lowering interest rates. What we have said is that interest rates should be lowered to one point above the rate of inflation today. That would have an immediate and dramatic impact on the housing crisis in Canada.

We suggest that banks should set aside a specific proportion of their lending portfolios for long-term mortgages at lower rates, primarily for first-time buyers. Instead of dismantling CMHC, as the Conservative Party has suggested, we believe we should restore the presence of CMHC in the housing sector with the inclusion of an additional $500 million to the capital budget for social housing. That is a minimum. That is a start. It is needed to provide non-profit co-op and rental accommodation. That is just the beginning.

In the province of British Columbia the forest industry is in a state of crisis. Thousands of forestry workers, members of the IWA in particular, are out of work having been laid off, and others face the uncertainty of lay-off in the future. That industry is in a serious slump. It is about time this government came to its senses and recognized that the thousands of construction workers and forestry workers looking for jobs to meet a real need for affordable housing in Canada should be put back to work. Put Canadians back to work to build affordable housing for all Canadians. That is the kind of tough and effective program that we would implement were we in government.

We also believe that federal Crown land should be made available on a leasehold basis for affordable housing. We believe in tough and effective programs of rent control. Some say "Well, you are not in government." I point to the government of Manitoba which has recently announced a major program along the lines I have suggested today that will be of significant help to the renters and home owners in the province of Manitoba.

What about another large group in my constituency, the students? There is a serious problem with student housing, particularly in my constituency of Burnaby in which is located Simon Fraser University, the B.C. Institute of Technology, which is the province's only high-technology training institute, and the Pacific Vocational Institute. BCIT graduates some 1,900 students annually.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tousignant): Order, please.

Mr. Greenaway: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member entertain a question?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I will entertain a question at the conclusion of my speech, if the hon. member will await that time.

As I was saying, BCIT graduates some 1,900 students annually. It accepts students from throughout the province. It has a student population of about 4,000, half of whom come from outside the lower mainland. There is an on-campus facility for only 250 students. This is not adequate. Each year 2,000 students require housing at BCIT. Many of them who cannot find housing are from rural parts of British Columbia and are denied an adequate education in these very important high technology areas. The demand has been increasing over past years. In fact, it would need 6,000 students to meet the demand for graduates from BCIT. It is a very successful institution in our province. BCIT cannot expect to meet its potential if out-of-town students cannot find proper housing in order to attend the institution.

About a year ago the municipality of Burnaby undertook to enforce its illegal suite bylaw. The inspectors swooped down at mid-term. Students at BCIT, PVI and SFU had to persuade the politicians that it would be disruptive to toss out students from these illegal suites. That is the situation we are in. Students are forced to double and triple up in illegal suites in order to find adequate housing accommodation.

The Pacific Vocational Institute had different housing requirements. Many students are trades people who come on campus for a four to eight-week period. They are there for a relatively short stay. They need unique and special forms of accommodation. PVI has approached CMHC for housing. Unfortunately the administration has been told that there is no money available for this form of housing. Right now, PVI needs 350 housing units for on-campus housing. In the very near future it will need 500 units.

Finally, Simon Fraser University, also located in my constituency, shares many of the same problems. Simon Fraser University has a critical situation on its hands. There are over 9,000 students at SFU. On-campus housing is adequate for only a small fraction of those students. There are 210 apartments on campus and a 225-bed dormitory. In September, 1981, 3,200 applicants applied for on-campus housing. There were 300 applicants for 20 beds. Where do the rest of those students go? They either go into substandard housing, basement suites where they are doubling and tripling up, or they are giving up and returning to their communities in despair and being denied the education to which they are so properly entitled.

Simon Fraser University has asked for housing assistance from the minister responsible for CMHC. Simon Fraser University has been told "Not a penny for your student housing."

Mr. Kelly: What about the B.C. government?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Hon. members over there try to pass the buck to other governments. They will have their opportunity to speak. The federal government is cutting back on aid to provinces, but hon. members will have their chance to speak and to explain to my constituents and to the students of Simon Fraser, BCIT and PVI why they are denying those institutions adequate housing. Liberal members will have a chance to explain. The administration of those institutions cannot attract faculty because housing is prohibitively expensive if it can be obtained at all. Liberal members opposite can explain all of that. I welcome the opportunity they will have to explain that.

Mr. Young: The B.C. government is just as bad.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Obviously the B.C. provincial government, the Social Credit government, has to accept its responsibilities as well.

I have a few more remarks on elements of this legislation that I believe should be changed. There are some serious problems with the provisions respecting mortgage financing. In many instances, Bill C-89 will do nothing but ensure a number of mortgage gimmicks, gimmicks that do not benefit the borrower in the end but which will certainly benefit the wealthy lenders, the banks, friends of the Liberal and Conservative parties.

There are four gimmicks that will be allowed under this bill. First, the interest deferred mortgage, the variable rate or floating mortgage, equity participation mortgages and second mortgages. I do not have time to go into the details of each of these, but there is no doubt that each gimmick does not begin to address adequately the real need for housing in our community. Even the bankers recognize the folly of this government program. I quote Peter Carter, who was then assistant general manager for retail lending and mortgage services with the Royal Bank of Canada:

As a responsible banker, working in a consumer-oriented society, I just cannot agree with a plan that sees the borrower ending up after five years owing more money than he borrowed in the first place.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the Liberal government's answer. That is what they said to home owners who cannot afford their monthly payments—"We will let you defer some of the interest and at the end of the year you will end up owing more than you started out owing at the beginning of the year". That is Liberal economic policy. That is the Liberal government's answer to the housing crisis and we reject it.

I mentioned that one of the areas we would promote is co-operative housing. We do have a concern with respect to the suggestion that the profit-making element may be allowed to move into the co-operative sector, and we are going to be examining carefully the proposed amendments to Section 15.1 and Section 56.1 to ensure that the intent of the co-operative movement is in fact met.

Mr. Cosgrove: They agree.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): If in fact the phrasing of those provisions is adequate, Mr. Speaker, certainly they will be supported. However, we want to ensure that this does not in any way permit the commercial profit-making sector to move in on the co-operative area. At the present time, Mr. Speaker, co-operatives have huge waiting lists. We should be significantly expanding this particular sector of the housing market.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, to talk about the importance of adequate and effective rent controls. I could talk about how the present minister responsible for housing has indicated that rent controls must be disbanded. We do not accept that. We have seen the attempts of the Social Credit government in British Columbia to eliminate rent controls, and we reject those attempts categorically. More and more renters are finding that because of rent increases they are moving beyond the level at which rent controls protect them and they are being gouged. In addition, high interest rate costs are being passed on to renters and rents are escalating very dramatically.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize that my constituents are angry and feel a sense of betrayal because this government promised, during and before the last election, that it would be taking effective measures to deal with the housing crisis. No one in my community, no one in the municipality of Burnaby, believes that any of the measures this government has taken, whether it be the disastrous budget, the high interest rate policy or this totally inadquate bill, will begin to address their serious and real concerns.

We have an obligation to hold out hope for the future. We have a great country with great potential, but what are we telling our young people? This Liberal government is telling them: "Forget it; you will not be able to afford your own home". Well, both I and my constituents reject that message. Young people, elderly people, native people, working people generally, all of us, demand that this government finally come to its senses and bring forward a realistic and responsible housing policy which recognizes the fundamental social right of all Canadians to affordable accommodation. That kind of policy will put Canadians back to work in the forestry and construction sectors, and we as New Democrats will be fighting for that in the weeks and months ahead. It is because Bill C-89 totally fails to address those very serious concerns that we will be opposing this bill on second reading.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to participate in this debate. I was listening with great interest to what the member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) was saying. I understand that there were some discussions with the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation about co-operative housing, and that an agreement was almost reached. I want to point out to the hon. member that I was very concerned when I heard him say that he does not agree with this bill and that he intends to vote against the bill as a matter of principle, all this in spite of the fact that there has been so much co-operation and collaboration on the part of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) who tabled the bill.

[English]

I have heard the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) and the hon. member for Burnaby debate this bill this afternoon. I got the impression from the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra that he supports this bill in principle; at least, he did not say he is going to oppose it. In that he seems to be of the same view as the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), that in effect he is going to support the bill. However, the hon. member for Burnaby in his conclusion said he would not support the bill. I am not surprised. The NDP are like that. They are very contentious and disputatious and oppose most of the measures introduced by the government as a matter of principle.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Because they are wrong.

Mr. Blais: However, what he fails to recognize is that this bill favours British Columbia more than any other province on a per capita basis. Of the 15,000 units envisaged by this bill, 3,000 are going into the lower mainland of British Columbia. So by opposing this bill the hon. member is in effect saying to 3,000 families—

Mr. Cosgrove: Of moderate income.

Mr. Blais: —"we are not interested in supporting your access to additional housing". He did not address that question, but that is exactly what he is saying.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Nonsense.

Mr. Blais: Plus all the jobs, of course, created as a result of the use of products from the B.C. forest industry. They are not going to use northern Ontario jack pine or white pine in order to build houses in British Columbia; you can bet your bottom dollar on that.

Having said that, I want to commend the minister responsible for housing for the attention he has paid to British Columbia. We all recognize that Vancouver and the lower mainland have had a difficult time in the recent past because of the increasing demand for housing. As was said by a famous American humorist, "Invest your money in land because they don't make it any more." They do not make land in the lower mainland of British Columbia. It takes a long time for the Fraser River to deposit sufficient silt in order to create additional land for use in housing. The lower mainland is a beautiful market for speculators. That is its history. We are attempting to address that as best we can, which is what this bill attempts to do.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I am a bit concerned—less so now because we are going to have time allocation—at the opposition's attitude because I get the impression that the members who have spoken on this bill—and I have not had time to read all the speeches—do not really oppose the bill. And they cannot be seen in their own ridings as opposing this housing measure. I say that quite readily. However, it does not seem to stop the hon. members from delaying the passage of this legislation, which frustrates the attempts made by the minister responsible for housing to alleviate some of the concerns and hardships which are being felt in the marketplace.

I am advised that to date there has been a grand total of some 720 cases brought to the attention of the minister. Of those, 384 have been brought by Members of Parliament, and 340 have been brought singly or privately by the parties concerned. A large number of these 720 cases will be dealt with by this legislation. Unfortunately, until the legislation is passed the minister's hands are tied.

Mr. Jarvis: You are still taking applications, J.-J. Nobody's hands are tied.

Mr. Blais: The hon. gentlemen opposite who are now making noises are the ones who are delaying passage of this bill. I therefore commend the minister responsible for having taken measures under the rules to limit debate and permit passage of this very, very necessary piece of legislation. However, I am not surprised—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: —at that particularly niggardly attitude of hon. members opposite—

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Blais: —because they have a terrible record when it comes to housing. The hon. member for Burnaby was quite accurate when he spoke about their very negative attitude during that short time, that brief period, when Your Honour and I were on the opposite side looking at the fumbling which was occurring on this side on a daily basis. If Your Honour recalls, during that mindless period there was an attempt by the gentlemen on the opposite side to deal with housing.

There are two items which come to my mind, that stick in my mind, as I am sure they stick in their minds. The first was the commissioning of a report on CMHC with a view to privatizing it. For those hon. members who do not understand the jargon, that means to send out into the private sector, into the glory of private entrepreneurship. What was the target for privatization? It was not the CCI, which was having major problems at the time the Tories had control over it, but, rather, the then central mortgage and housing corporation. That institution, that Crown corporation, had been responsible for the creation of more housing units than any other institution in the whole of Canada. It had been able to integrate and provide more access to housing for Canadians at a time when there was a high demand for housing, namely, in the early seventies, than any other government institution or corporation any place else in the country. They wanted to privatize that, so they hired a political hack, a fellow named Donald Matthews, to prepare their report. Of course, being of the Tory bent, he provided the sort of report that they love to read.

Mr. Jarvis: Dave Peterson may read this speech.

Mr. Blais: He said they should privatize CMHC. However, not only did he say that, but he also said, "Let us get rid of co-operative housing. We do not need co-operative, non-profit housing; that is a Liberal invention. It smacks of socialism. We can get rid of that quite easily and return to our old reactionary practices".

That is what the Tories wanted to do. They did not do it because they did not get the time. However, what indirectly caused their defeat, again, was another housing measure. That was the ill-fated mortgage interest tax credit. That was one of their major inventions. Of course, if it costs a fortune now, one can imagine how much the treasury would have lost had they been successful in passing it. However, at the time it was a great Tory idea to favour the wide swath of the middle class which was paying interest rates for all of their friends.

However, they came to the fateful day when they were dealing with that particular measure in this House and they were facing opposition on this side; but effectively they perhaps could have passed that measure. But were they serious about passing it? I have my doubts, because although that measure was available to them to debate and to pass before Christmas of 1979 so that they could go and sell their budget during that Christmas period, they chose not to pass that bill, not to get it accepted by the House, but to—

Mr. Jarvis: After how many days of debate?

Mr. Blais: —to go ahead with the budgetary measures.

Mr. Jarvis: Seven days of debate.

Mr. Blais: The budgetary measure is that which they chose—

An hon. Member: You filibustered.

Mr. Blais: —knowing full well that they could not pass that budgetary measure but would have to go and defend the budget, the mukluk budget, before the people of Canada. I cannot see that a government with some wisdom would have wanted to be defeated. If hon. members opposite were serious about a housing bill, they should have preferred to pass the housing bill, if they were interested in housing measures, because there was sure defeat pending at the end of their noses. Since they went to the budget, it is undoubtedly because they did not want to pass the housing bill. I suppose it is a bit convoluted to my own way of seeing things, but their rationale seems to be self-evident. They preferred to face defeat rather than deal with the housing bill.

Mr. McCauley: A Tory syndrome.

Mr. Blais: I was immensely sorry to see that but I was not surprised, because now, in effect, they have received representations from housing groups in this country, including HUDAC—

Mr. Cosgrove: UDI.

Mr. Blais: —and the UDI, the Urban Development Institute, which said "Pass that measure". The wise minister responsible for urban—

Mr. Cosgrove: Housing.

Mr. Blais: —for housing—

Mr. Jarvis: That is part of the problem: you do not know either!

Mr. Blais: It said, "As the wise minister responsible for housing has presented it to the House, pass that measure".

Mr. Jarvis: You put your finger on the problem right there!

Mr. Blais: "Pass that measure as rapidly as you can because we need that in the housing industry". These fellows are sitting on their hands over there. Look at them! They are all sitting on their hands—

Mr. Jarvis: I want to speak.

Mr. Blais: —waiting for something to happen because, of course, they do not want to present any initiatives of their own. In effect, I feel that housing needs a shot in the arm.

[Translation]

Everybody is agreed on that. As far as housing is concerned, well, I come from northern Ontario, and in my area, there have been substantial lay-offs in the forestry industry because there is very little demand for construction lumber, which has led to production cuts and the lay-offs in question. The House will recall that not long ago, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) announced that a federal-provincial agreement had been concluded with the province of Ontario under which his department will be promoting jobs in the forestry industry in northern Ontario for 2,000 workers who were laid off because of a lack of markets. Obviously, since those markets include more than just the Canadian market, this bill or any other bill, for that matter, will not be able to generate a recovery in the housing market that would increase employment in my area, because the majority of forestry products from my area are exported to the United States, and when their market is slack, this obviously reduces the number of jobs in my part of the country. Mr. Speaker, it is a recognized fact that the main cause of these lay-offs is high interest rates, which in turn are affected by high inflation rates, because if we analyse the situation, the main problem, and everyone will agree, is the high rate of inflation which has been going on for far too long. The government has approached this question by saying that it will bring down inflation. Thus, interest rates will drop and lower interest rates will increase our economic stability, which means that people will be prepared to invest in business and housing. Once those investments have been made, the demand for housing and for lumber used in housing construction will increase and create jobs in my part of the country. Meanwhile, I am most indebted to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who chose my area for the purpose of assisting those people in the north who have lost their jobs because of the labour market situation.

• (1750)

In effect, the agreement that will allow approximately 2,000 temporarily laid-off lumber and forestry workers to continue working in forestry-related activities during the current downturn in the industry was a very good initiative on the part of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It required not only his will and that of the government, but the will of the province of Ontario which provided co-operation, as well as the forest products manufacturers in northern Ontario who recognized that there is now a soft market in the lumber industry.

I am very confident that there is a building demand in the marketplace for housing. There is an increase, not a dramatic but a gradual increase, in the number of family formations. There is a relatively low vacancy rate in most rental markets in Canada. Therefore, there is a demand, but that demand will not be satisfied when interest rates are volatile. It will be satisfied once interest rates are brought down as a result of inflation being brought down and the whole is stabilized. That is the basic aim of the government's policy.

I am very pleased at the initiatives being taken by the minister responsible for housing. However, I am somewhat dismayed at the lack of understanding, comprehension and especially foresight demonstrated by members of the opposition when they speak very briefly in response. I suggest they have no knowledge at all of the real world as it relates to Bill C-89 or to the current economic climate. Let me say that this government is determined to demonstrate leadership and restraint and to recognize the principle of equity in putting new programs in place. I applaud these measures that have been proposed by the minister of housing.

Now, for the sake of clarification and edification of members opposite so that they may more fully understand what these amendments to the National Housing Act will accomplish, let me review some of the proposals briefly.

First, the amendments would allow Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to have a greater impact on the supply of rental accommodation. That is most important. For many years now there have been certain business restrictions regarding the operation of CMHC in the marketplace. These amendments will enable CMHC effectively to resolve these difficulties.

For example, in the recent past premiums charged for graduated payment mortgages were inadequate regarding the business risks involved, and the deteriorating markets over the past four years have not helped the situation. It is to such an extent that premiums even on ordinary NHA home owner loans have been marginally inadequate to cover the risk.

The solution to this problem is before us. The amended legislation would allow CMHC to adjust mortgage insurance premiums and to set them at a level that would be appropriate for the risk involved. It would also allow CMHC the wherewithal to cover the cost and expenses of doing business. In short, CMHC would have the same flexibility with regard to premiums as a private insurer.

The advantages would be obvious, even to the most clouded thinker, and Lord knows there are a lot of clouds on the other side and very little in terms of silver lining.

An hon. Member: Clouded stinkers?

Mr. Blais: I said clouded thinker. "Clouded stinker" would be unparliamentary.

Mr. Clarke: Turn around.

Mr. Blais: As far as I am concerned, I am showing my best side to those who feel most comfortable with it.

Mr. Clarke: Show a little respect.

Mr. Blais: I am showing that as well.

Let me raise another important element in the legislation which the opposition has fogged in this debate, the Canada mortgage renewal plan. Between clouds and fog, we are getting the colour of the other side. Allegations have been made that the renewal plan is, in effect, too little and too late. To refresh the memories of members opposite, let us define who needs help the most.

It has been standard operating principle, followed not only by the government but by most major lending institutions in the country, that people should have a gross debt service ratio of not more than 30 per cent. That has been the rule of thumb. I recall that from when I was practising law. We talked of 27 per cent to 30 per cent being the gross debt service ratio. This means that Canadians who need help are those families and individuals who have to pay more than 30 per cent of their gross income on payments of principal, interest and taxes, and 50 per cent of condominium charges.

Think about it. This has been the benchmark that has been the guideline for years. Yet if you followed the convoluted rationale of some members opposite, we would be opening up the vault, no matter what the cost, to people who are not experiencing hardship and who can afford to make their payments without help from the government.

We can follow the rationale of the official opposition, the members of the Conservative Party, quite readily. They are the ones who advocated the mortgage interest tax deductibility program which, in effect, did not target any sector of the economy and favoured those with the most.

Mr. Clarke: They would have loved it in North Bay.

Mr. Blais: The high flyers borrow a lot of money to buy a $200,000 house. They may pay $120,000 a year on a mortgage at today's 20 per cent interest rates and deduct the whole works from their income. Imagine that! What about the renter? He would have been left holding the bag, the one who would have had to make up the difference.

We believe that the amount available should be targeted to those most in need. Were it not for the frustration that we face from the members on the other side as a result of what they are doing to this bill, we would have had this in place a long time ago.

An hon. Member: Three and a half days.

Mr. Blais: There have been five days of debate on this bill. The minister responsible told me that is how long he has to sit here listening to the guffaws of frustrated politicians on the other side who today recognize they missed their chance when they could have done something about housing and did absolutely nothing. See you tomorrow.

THE BUDGET

CALL FOR WITHDRAWAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, whereas the November 12 budget taxes benefits from health care and dental programs; kills a large number of company benefits such as leased cars and subsidized housing loans; disallows interest deductibility for retirement savings plans; threatens charitable organizations; introduces negative taxation measures for small businesses and discourages Canadian equity ownership, etc., etc., I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House, in the interests of keeping Canada together, urges the government to withdraw this disastrous budget. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have no mandate to reign over the dissolution of this nation.

CROWSNEST PASS RATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, the budget of November 12, 1981, as brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), restricts the farmers in Canada and is threatening the very existence of farming. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House call on the government to stop its action to remove the statutory Crow rate in view of the fact that farmers are faced with the highest production costs in the history of farming.

That this House insists that for once the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development keep his word.

INQUIRY INTO SINKING OF "OCEAN RANGER"—LABOUR REPRESENTATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that labour has participated in the past in commissions established to investigate injuries and health risks to workers, including the Burkett commission in 1980 which was a joint federal-provincial commission into safety in mines and mining plants in Ontario, the Wright commission in 1978 which investigated safety in metallic mining in Manitoba, and the Hamm commission in 1974, which was a royal commission on health and safety for miners, and since labour expertise has been invaluable in these commissions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CALL FOR BAN ON LANDING OF SOVIET AIRCRAFT ON CANADIAN TERRITORY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. According to a recent report in the U.S. News and World Report, the Soviet Union is now flying arms to Nicaragua not only through Cuba but also directly through Newfoundland. Apparently Russian Aeroflot transport planes fly to Gander, Newfoundland, refuel, and continue on to Central America to deliver arms supplies to the revolutionary Sandinista regime. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That in conjunction with the announced sanctions on the Soviet Union over martial law in Poland, and in the interests of stability in Central America and the world, this government announce its intention to ban totally Soviet transport aircraft from landing on Canadian soil.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

MEDICAL CARE

COMMITMENT TO NATIONAL HEALTH CARE SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that extra billing in Alberta is back up to 44 per cent, with some specialities as high as 88 per cent, that nurses have been forced to go on strike in order to get better working conditions, and that regressive premiums continue to be used as well as increased in amount every year in Alberta, one of Canada's richest provinces, thus showing that medicare is as much a matter of philosophical commitment as it is of money, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House reaffirms the commitment of all parties in the House to a national health care system characterized by universality, comprehensiveness, accessibility, affordability, and public administration.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

CALL FOR MINISTER TO IMPROVE LOAN TERMS OR RESIGN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, in view of the ability and willingness of the Government of Canada to extend credit to Algeria for a monument, and $1 billion at 10 per cent interest to the U.S.S.R to build a gas pipeline which will be invaluable to the war machine of that country—this loan costs Canadian taxpayers $198.5 million and irritates our allies who are applying sanctions on the U.S.S.R for occupation of Afghanistan and the bludgeoning of Poland—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges):

That (a), the Minister of Agriculture make immediate arrangements with his cabinet colleagues to supply the Farm Credit Corporation with capital to loan to farmers at less than 10 per cent—surely our farmers deserve better treatment than foreigners—for the economic production of food and (b), failing success in (a), he resign immediately as a protest to the government's giving interest rate preference to foreign governments and failing to extend equal or better treatment to Canadian farmers.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

WITHDRAWAL OF PARTNERS IN ALSANDS PROJECT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It deals with the fact that three more partners have withdrawn from the Alsands consortium, putting that project in serious jeopardy. What is the minister doing about it?

• (1415)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, last night I had a meeting in Toronto with senior officers of Shell Canada, and today officials of the government of Alberta and the Government of Canada are meeting with officials and technicians representing the companies concerned. I expect there will be a meeting between the parties at the political level also—the level of ministers—in the very near future.

REQUEST FOR CHANGES IN PROGRAM

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, the national energy policy says at page 94:

The National Energy program will spur oil sands development. The positive impact of the program on oil sands development can be illustrated by its effect on the commercial viability of the Alsands project—

We now know that that statement is about as accurate as other statements the minister has made. Would the minister tell the House what changes he will make in the National Energy Program to ensure that at least this project goes ahead?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, with respect to the National Energy Program I draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that there has been an agreement with Alberta which provides that we pay the international price for oil from the tar sands.

Mr. Crosbie: So what?

Mr. Lalonde: My very knowledgeable friend who was the former minister of finance and who is a great specialist on taxes on oil and gas says, "So what". Does he suggest that we should ask the taxpayers and the consumers of Canada to pay more than world price for tar sands oil? That is not the view of this government. This government has taken the view that we should pay the world price or the international price for oil from those projects. The government of Alberta and the Government of Canada have also made provisions for very generous fiscal arrangements for those projects.

Mr. Crosbie: Bunk.

Mr. Lalonde: Those fiscal arrangements seem satisfactory to some of the partners. They do not seem satisfactory to some other partners. The remaining partners in the consortium are at the present time consulting with other potential partners. I myself have had discussions with such other potential partners, and in the next few days and weeks we will see how these negotiations will be concluded.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the minister did not attempt to defend the National Energy Program, which is hopelessly wrong.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ADMIT PROGRAM NOT PERFECT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, this project would generate thousands of permanent jobs and billions of dollars in investment. It would help our trade balance by at least $3 billion a year. It would increase our security of supply. In the words of the Economic Council of Canada, it is one of the only good things the economy has going for it in the 1980s. Given those stakes, would the minister not admit that he must do everything possible to ensure that this project goes ahead, even to the extent of swallowing his pride and admitting that the National Energy Proram, the resulting taxes and so forth, perhaps are not perfect?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have never pretended that the National Energy Program is perfect. The best evidence is that we have made changes to it. As a matter of fact we have an agreement with the three producing provinces which is satisfactory to those governments. This also made some changes. I will say to the hon. member, however, that the National Energy Program is far superior to anything the Conservatives put forward in their day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: It is a program which will ensure that during this decade the people of this country will own and control their oil and gas resources, rather than leaving them in the hands of the major multinationals, as the Tories were doing when they were in office.

With respect to the point raised by the hon. member, I want to draw his attention once more to the fact that both the government of Alberta and the Government of Canada have provided very generous fiscal incentives with regard to those projects. Some partners are satisfied with them; others are not. There may be other partners who will come in and who will be satisfied.

Mr. Andre: Who?

Mr. Lalonde: My friend asks who. I suggest he wait for a little while and be patient. There will be developments, I hope, in the next few weeks.

Mr. Shields: We have been waiting two years now.

Mr. Lalonde: I remind my friends on the other side that the Syncrude project in 1975 ran into the same types of problems, and they were resolved at the time by this government.

EMPLOYMENT

CUTBACK IN SPENDING ESTIMATES FOR JOB CREATION PROGRAMS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It pertains to the spending estimates tabled in the House on Tuesday. I would like to ask the minister why in heaven's name the government is going to cut back on job creation in 1982-83 when we already have over one million people unemployed in this country.

• (1420)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I understand the hon. member's concern. If he had looked at last year's estimates he would have found that the job-creation estimates included at that time were considerably less than the actual amounts that were expended on job creation. As the hon. member may know, the job market is assessed in the course of the year and often additional sums are made available, so he should not draw the conclusion that there is less priority to the job-creation function of the government.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACT TO CREATE JOBS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, the estimates must surely speak for themselves; the facts are there for everyone to read. We are going from $318 million spent to $216 million spent. That is a loss of $102 million for the creation of new jobs. When is the government going to understand that its job is not to continue to create a depression in this country but to begin to create jobs and give people some hope in the country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, that question has previously been addressed to me in the House and I have indicated that I am prepared to undertake appropriate measures as required. Certainly the field of job creation is one area that is receiving careful attention.

Mr. Crosbie: Buncombe.

GOVERNMENT INTEREST RATE POLICY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday in his speech in New York he said that the government had rejected all pleas to embark on a course of economic stimulation, and indicated that the government was quite prepared to sit back and wait for the recovery of the United States economy. At the same time the Prime Minister was standing up in this house telling us that the government was considering the possibility of lowering interest rates to provide stimulus to the economy.

Now that the minister is under pressure from the people of Canada, the ten provincial premiers, members of his own caucus and even the Prime Minister, is he prepared to abandon his disastrous high interest rate policy, or will he continue to refuse to take any independent action that would allow the country to lead its own economic recovery?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is true that I stated in New York yesterday that I did not see the solution to our problems to be spending our way out of the recession, and add to the deficit and add to the inflationary pressures in the economy. That is my view, and it is the policy that has been endorsed on three separate occasions in the House since the budget was presented.

I want to tell the hon. member that the comment which I made yesterday, to the effect that we are opposed to the suggestion that interest rates can be forced down significantly if only we accept the depreciation in the value of our dollar, is a statement of our policy. It is a policy that is not at all altered or changed by any comments made yesterday in the House by the Prime Minister.

DEFICIT IN TRADE IN MANUFACTURED GOODS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, that will not be welcome news to the millions of Canadians who are unemployed and the small businesses that are going bankrupt.

The minister also stated in New York yesterday that he would resist any pressure to protect this country's manufacturing industries. How can he continue to advocate that Canada remain the international boy scout of free trade when we racked up a $21 billion trade deficit in manufactured goods last year and lost over 300,000 jobs in total, in this vital sector of our economy?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, what I said yesterday is that it is not our intention to join in a policy of increased protectionism at the present time. That is a very strong temptation in every country—to put up trade barriers and adopt "beggar-thy-neighbour" policies. We know from past experience that that would be very dangerous to Canada because we depend on a very dynamic international trading system. If we did anything to impair that, we would be putting ourselves at a very grave disadvantage.

CUT IN JOB-CREATION BUDGET

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, the position in the New Democratic Party is that, if they want profits, it is necessary for companies to provide Canadians with paycheques as well. Although the government continues to restate its concern for the unemployed in Canada, the weakness of its commitment became clearer than ever earlier this week when the estimates came before the House. In the face of over a million people unemployed, the government actually cut $102 million from its already meagre job-creation budget. On the one hand, how can the government keep telling the unemployed of Canada that it recognizes and is greatly concerned about their plight, but on the other hand callously cut 35 per cent from this portion of the budget?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, perhaps I should repeat the answer I already gave, because it is very important. Never have job-creation figures in the main estimates ever represented the total amount of money spent on job creation in a particular year. If the hon. member reviews past history he will see that the amounts included in the main estimates are usually greatly exceeded by subsequent commitments of the Government of Canada. That is the answer for the second time today.

Oral Questions

DISASTERS

SINKING OF "OCEAN RANGER"—LACK OF RESCUE CRAFT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I am told that I can only ask one question. Perhaps because of the importance of it you will let me put it in two parts. My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister tell the House why in the early hours of February 15, the critical hours, there were no fixed wing aircraft on the ground or no surface vessels in the area of the sinking of the Ocean Ranger, and what rescue operations there were, were not being directed by the Air-Sea Rescue Centre in Halifax but by the Mobil Oil company?

Could the minister also tell the house how he could find $22 million for two executive aircraft but could not find money to instal weather radar in the rescue helicopters in Gander?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I understand very well the concerns of the hon. member for St. John's East about the Ocean Ranger incident. I can assure him that I share his concern about what happened in this case. First of all, I do not think any orders were given by any of Mobil's people to the rescue centre. The co-ordination centre in Halifax is the lead centre and it gives whatever orders must be given concerning search and rescue. As far as improvements in Newfoundland in search and rescue capabilities are concerned, I can send to the hon. member a list of what we have done since 1976. We have stationed three helicopters in Gander and two ocean vessels since then. I think we have improved tremendously the effectiveness of search and rescue operations in the area.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION IN UNITED STATES CONGRESS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. First I would like to congratulate the government for its belated recognition of its responsibilities. I think it has announced a joint inquiry into the terrible Ocean Ranger disaster with the province of Newfoundland. I hope this six-member commission will do the job of thoroughly exploring the issue. It now realizes that no ultimatum was given by the province of Newfoundland, and it has co-operated with them in this endeavour.

In Washington today, the Congressional merchant marine subcommittee headed by Mr. Biaggi is examining a bill to remove the right of non-American workers on United States-owned oil drilling rigs or vessels to recover damages from U.S. companies in U.S. courts for injuries suffered outside U.S. waters. The legislation will not be retroactive, but it is very important in view of the fact that the Ocean Ranger was a U.S.-owned rig operating outside U.S. waters. Has the government appointed representatives to appear before the committee to oppose the passage of the bill or to make representations on behalf of Canadian citizens and the Canadian government? If so, who are they and what are their instructions? Will we do everything we can to see that that legislation is not passed by the United States Congress?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, indeed we are well aware of the bill of Representative Biaggi. It was introduced on October 29, and therefore was not introduced in contemplation of this accident. It would not have the effect of barring completely law suits by aliens in United States courts, but it would make them seek remedies in other courts first before it would allow them to have recourse to United States courts. Of course we are watching it very closely, and there is some uncertainty as to legislative jurisdiction over semi-submersible rigs, depending upon whether they are to be classified in international law as ships of a country or as projections of a coastal state.

PIPELINES

EXTENSION OF GAS PIPELINE TO MARITIME PROVINCES

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Maritime Council of Premiers and the Association of Mechanical Contractors have expressed concern about maritimers being able to supply goods and services for the natural gas pipeline being constructed in the area. What measures is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources taking to stop the delays in construction in the TQM Pipeline, and what is he doing to see that people from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are given a fair chance to work on the project and to supply goods and services when it is under construction in the maritimes?

Will the minister confirm the commitment of his government that the spin-off from energy megaprojects like this will be used as development tools in these provinces that suffer from regional disparity?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Howie: Marc, they won't think you that smart down east.

INDUSTRY

CONSOLIDATED COMPUTER INCORPORATED—TIMING OF DECISION TO TERMINATE GOVERNMENT ADVANCES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. The President of the Treasury Board will know that he was advised of the difficulties being encountered by Consolidated Computer Inc. in a letter to him dated June 23, 1980, from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when he was advised that the company lost $10 million on $22 million worth of sales in 1979. Will the minister confirm that no action was taken by him to terminate advances to Consolidated Computer Inc. until he wrote to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on May 12, 1981, advising:

I am not convinced that CCI prospects warrant further government investment.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, yesterday I answered a question with respect to Consolidated Computer Inc. based on the leaked documents. I think I made it clear, and I think the history of this company, which goes back to the late 1960s or early 1970s, made it clear, from the leaked reports on which members have been relying, that there was a history of losses. This government, when it came into office, inherited the situation from the Conservative government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Don't be so dishonest.

Mr. Johnston: I replaced the hon. member for York-Peel in this position. I think this government, through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, took steps to bring the unhappy situation to completion—

An hon. Member: Grovel in the dirt.

Mr. Johnston: —and for that purpose it went so far as to appoint independent specialists, outside of government, Mr. Bill Rosenfeld an attorney from Toronto, and Mr. Terry Godsall from Shieldings Investments, in order to determine what was the viability of that company. When the data was available to government, steps were taken immediately to ensure no further losses would be incurred by the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Crosbie: Only $125 million.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What is $125 million?

SINKING OF "OCEAN RANGER"—ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL INQUIRY

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the Newfoundland government and the federal government have finally agreed to a joint commission of inquiry into the tragic sinking of the Ocean Ranger, could the minister inform members of this House or provide us with the details of the terms of reference of that inquiry? In addition, can the minister assure both sides of this House that the report will be made public immediately upon completion of the inquiry?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, indeed there has been an agreement reached between the government of Newfoundland and the Government of Canada on a joint inquiry to be chaired by Mr. Chief Justice Hickman, and composed of six outstanding Newfoundlanders. The two governments have agreed that there will be indentical terms of reference. The exact drafting is not completed but I expect no difficulty in this regard. It has always been the intention that the report will be made public and this will be done once the commission has completed its work and it has submitted its report.

ENERGY

ALSANDS PROJECT—REQUEST THAT FURTHER TAX BREAKS BE DENIED TO CORPORATIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday Dome Petroleum and Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas announced that they were pulling out of the Alsands consortium project. This morning Shell Explorer Ltd. followed suit, bringing to five the number of oil companies that have pulled out of the agreement in what looks, at least to the cynical among us, like a well orchestrated effort to force the government to sweeten the pot for the private companies involved in the project.

Mr. Crosbie: What nonsense.

Mr. Rose: Similar tactics were used in the mid-1970s to force a different kind of financing for the Syncrude project. The government paid 70 per cent of the cost and only got 30 per cent of the equity. Will the minister assure this House that he will not submit to this type of blackmail again by offering these corporations more and more tax breaks, unearned equity, or higher rates of return at the expense of the already well gouged taxpayer?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, indeed there has been some withdrawal on this particular project. I have indicated repeatedly in the House that there is a limit to how much the taxpayers of Canada should be asked to pay for any project. The two governments are working hand in hand in this respect. We are eager to see this project proceed, but again not at any price or at any cost to the taxpayer. We will have further negotiations and I will be very happy to inform my colleague about the development of those negotiations once they are completed.

FUNDS TO EXPAND EXISTING OIL PRODUCTION

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I wish the radiant minister of energy would feel the same way about nuclear projects. In light of these tactics being employed by private corporations, will the minister give serious consideration either to running this project as a public utility, as has been suggested, or rechannelling a lot of the funds that were intended for this project into enhanced recovery programs for old oil and heavy oil, oil that could become available at one quarter to half the price of these marginal projects?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I do not think the Government of Canada and the government of Alberta have excluded any possibility on the basis of any doctrinaire position. But I think both governments are of the view that the best way of realizing this project is on the basis of a mixed project, including public and private participation. We certainly hope that there will be major private participation in the construction of this particular project.

CANADIAN CONTENT REGULATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for International Trade. It has to do with the ailing auto industry. As the minister well knows, it has suffered the loss of 50,000 Canadian jobs in the last year alone. Because the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce sounds like a broken record on this subject regardless of what the question is, I would like the Minister of State for International Trade to tell this House and, more important, tell the industry, which is waiting in limbo out there, whether or not it is government policy to implement, by way of legislation if necessary, Canadian content regulations for automotive parts in Japanese vehicles sold in Canada. The industry can no longer depend on vague statements regarding delegations and meetings. Is it government policy, or is it not?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, as I indicated yesterday in reply to a question posed by an hon. member opposite, in our meeting with the Japanese we will be initiating discussion on some form of a content proposal. But obviously we do not want to carry on the negotiations here in the House.

BASIS FOR NEGOTIATIONS WITH JAPANESE REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I would have expected that answer from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but not from the Minister of State for International Trade. We are not asking for vague comments, nor is the industry. The industry wants to know, and we want to know, whether the government wants to implement these regulations or not. If it does want to implement regulations by way of legislation if necessary, at what base level is the government going to start negotiations? If the government does not want to make that a policy, why is it not a policy when it cost the Canadian public 50,000 jobs in the last year alone?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Give us a straight answer.

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, I would have thought that my hon. friend with his expertise in the business community would know that it serves no purpose to carry on negotiations in the House prior to sitting down with the two principals involved.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF NORTHERN ALLOWANCE REMISSION ORDER

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who must know that his proposal to terminate the temporary remission order affecting the northern living allowance will lead to mass unemployment in the resource producing industries of Northern Canada. In Labrador and northern Quebec alone, the United Steelworkers' locals representing over 10,000 workers have already told their employers that they will be forced to negotiate salary increases in the range of $4,000 to $8,000 a year as a result of the November 12 budget. The mining companies are not able to meet these extra salary demands, so northern communities are faced with the spectre of prolonged strikes, shutdowns, and thousands of additional lay-offs.

Will the minister undertake to extend the remission order for as long as it takes through a serious process of consultation with the union and mining companies to find a mutually acceptable solution to this critical problem?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in the budget statement I did, in response to representations from the north, extend the special remission order for an additional year. In that time I expect it will be possible for the government to consider what alternative system ought to be put in place rather than rely on the tax system. So the remission order has been extended and it is the intention of the government to replace it with a more appropriate system.

MEETING WITH UNION AND COMPANY REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of National Revenue who will know that the taxation of northern benefits will take at least $40 million out of northern communities next year and will lead to widespread demands for higher wages, strikes and lay-offs. Since the Minister of Finance has so far refused to meet with those affected, including more than 10,000 steelworkers in the Minister of National Revenue's riding of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, what alternative program of benefits does the minister have in mind, and why is there no provision for such a program in his own departmental estimates, which program will require between $30 million and $50 million for 1983 alone? Who is he trying to kid?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the question is, who is the opposition trying to kid? First of all, the remission order as it presently stands is unfair to the majority of people in the north because it applies mostly to those people in higher income brackets. It is a typically Tory position, Madam Speaker, to support the remission order as it presently exists. Many of us have been saying that it is not equitable and not fair because it does not address low-income people. I feel that is what we should be addressing over this year, and not simply prolong a measure which is inequitable.

As far as meeting with steelworkers is concerned, the Minister of International Trade and myself have a meeting on Saturday afternoon in Labrador City with the union and companies in that area. We are looking after our people, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPEECH MADE BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE IN LONDON, ONT.

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, we see that the Minister of Agriculture has been out on the range again, prowling in southwestern Ontario earlier this week. My question is to the Minister of Finance because when the Minister of Agriculture was in London earlier this week he met with the Canadian Farm Survival Association. He encouraged that association to make representations with reference to the government moving forward on a moratorium on farm bankruptcies and foreclosures. Is the minister contemplating any action in this regard? Was the Minister of Agriculture speaking on behalf of the government in London earlier this week?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, when the Minister of Agriculture makes the representations alleged I will give them consideration. However, I understand from the minister that these statements are not quite in line with what he actually said.

QUERY RESPECTING FARM CREDIT LEGISLATION

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, there must be some misunderstanding because, under questioning this morning in the Standing Committee on Agriculture, the minister indicated that he made that comment. Well, Madam Speaker, we will check to see what the record shows. However, another statement holds more ramifications, and certainly indicates a need for clarification. In his second statement the minister indicated that his government anticipates reviving the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. That statement obviously, as the Minister of Finance will know, raises some real problems with reference to the financial difficulties farmers face today. Was the Minister of Agriculture speaking on behalf of the government, or was he speaking through his big green hat as he usually does?

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Beatty: Put the bull back in the pen.

Mr. Whelan: It is on that side of the House today.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, when the policy is announced in this matter I will be glad to make it available to the hon. member.

EFFECT ON ALSANDS PROJECT

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The Alsands project is threatened because of a very ill-conceived national energy policy. We all know that the economic impact of that project across Canada will be $450 billion during the life of the project. The minister knows that $81.8 billion will go into Ontario and $13 billion to $14 billion into Quebec. When is the minister going to make the necessary changes in that policy which will allow the Alsands project to proceed, along with the other projects needed for energy self-sufficiency?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): First of all, Madam Speaker, in regard to the question asked previously by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, I would like to indicate that I have raised the issue of the gas pipeline several times with my colleagues in the maritimes. I have urged them in the last two years to take steps to appoint distributors to try to make sure that they will show interest and provide leadership in this regard. I am happy they are finally doing so. I also invite them to help me—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think the question was asked by the hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Lalonde: I am sorry, Madam Speaker. I thought it was a speech rather than a question. I want to tell the hon. member that the governments of Alberta and Canada and the private companies remaining in the consortium are working hard at trying to make this project go forward.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER CHANGE POLICY

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, since the national energy policy was introduced by the minister's department, oil exploration activity in Canada is down, Alsands is jeopardized, the Cold Lake plant is on hold or dead, production of oil and gas is down, 2,000 fewer wells were drilled in Canada this year than last, exploration expenditures are down, and the expansion of Syncrude has been cancelled.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Shields: When is the minister going to put the economic health of this country ahead of his own pride, and reverse some of the decisions he made in the national energy policy? When is he going to put the people of Canada ahead of his own pride?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: You think that is funny, but the people of Canada don't.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would invite my hon. friend to look at reality rather than his own rhetoric. I would remind him that this year planned expenditures in the oil and gas sector will increase by close to 40 per cent, as compared to about 7 per cent last year. They will increase at about twice the rate of expenditure in the manufacturing industries. Over the next five years it is foreseen that expenditures in the oil and gas industry will be very substantially higher, proportionately, than the increase in the manufacturing sector in this country. There is a lot of action taking place. I am afraid my hon. friend must be wearing blinders.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

INITIAL PRICE FOR GRAIN—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT IN MARCH

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board is in the other place, and the Minister of Transport is not here, so this question has to go to the Minister of Agriculture.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hovdebo: Last year the minister responsible for the Wheat Board did not announce the initial prices for grain in the early spring, when it assists farmers in their seeding plans. Since the government was condemned by the industry for not doing so, and since the government always does what the western farmers' consensus indicates, can the minister assure the House and grain producers that the government will announce the 1982-83 initial price for grain in March when it helps, rather than in July when it does not?

• (1450)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has answered his own question by the very fact that, as it was announced late, it did not have very much bearing on what the farmers planted last year because it was one of their biggest harvest or production years in the history of western Canada. Therefore, it had little bearing on what they were going to plant or what they were going to do.

REQUEST THAT PRICE COVER INCREASED PRODUCTION COSTS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): The western Canadian farmer wants to know, right now, if he will seed enough to reach the 35 million metric ton target which has been talked about by the government. What is the minister telling the farmer today, by word and by action? Because if it is, "Yes, grow more grain", then will he give the House a commitment that the farmers will get enough prices for their grain so that they can pay for the increased costs which are going into production? Will he also indicate that farmers will get transportation at a cost which will allow them to have an income which might be somewhat similar to what they got last year in an extra production year? For a group that remits several billion—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Order.

Mr. Hovdebo: —$4 billion in foreign exchange, they should have some commitment as to what they grow.

Mr. Kempling: Now, my question is—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member seems to discredit farmers for having the ability to make up their own minds, themselves, concerning what they should plant and how much they should plant. Yesterday I answered a question by hon. members opposite from the other party concerning the need for proper financing. I stated that I agreed to that. But the hon. member should also remember that the crop year shows that last year was the largest year ever for shipping and exporting grain.

Mr. Hovdebo: Smallest price.

Mr. Whelan: Over 26 million tonnes were involved. Therefore the farmers have the ability to produce and to do these things on their own. However, the announcement the hon. member spoke about does not have a great bearing on what they will do, because last year they made up their own minds concerning what they would do, and they will do that again this year, regardless of when we make that announcement.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO ASSIST INDUSTRIES IN NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Acting Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I would like to ask when we can expect to find some tangible measures taken to assist industries in depressed parts of Canada, which have export as well as domestic capabilities. I wrote to the minister on February 4 and sent copies to the Minister of Finance and Senator Olson. I have not, as yet, received any response. Two specific industries are very important to areas of Nova Scotia, that is to say, Sydney Steel and Hawker Siddeley in Trenton, Nova Scotia, both of which need orders, orders which could very well be allocated to these industries without in any way incurring extra expense.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Gray), I shall review the hon. member's correspondence and try to provide a reply as soon as possible.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATUS OF "OCEAN RANGER" WITHIN TWO HUNDRED MILE LIMIT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the uncertainty, to which he just added, concerning the status of the Ocean Ranger as to whether, in fact, it was a free-floating ship or whether, because it was attached to the ocean floor, it might conceivably be thought of in terms of an artificial island, I was wondering whether the minister has received legal advice concerning the status of that particular body within the 200-mile limit beyond Canada's shore.

Also in view of this uncertainty, will he say whether the Canadian government will make representations or has asked to make representations to the inquiry being mounted by the Coast Guard of the United States, because the status of that particular object out there, within the 200-mile limit, could be within Canadian jurisdiction, or could not?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we certainly do not want to take any steps at the present time which will in any way affect the status of any Canadian litigant. However, I must say that while there is some uncertainty in international law as to jurisdiction over such a semi-submersible rig, whether it is rightly classed as a ship and jurisdiction therefore belongs to the flag country, or whether it is considered to be within the 200-mile zone and therefore within the jurisdiction of the coastal state, our position is that it is within our jurisdiction.

QUESTION OF CANADIAN JURISDICTION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The minister has not answered the second part of my question as to whether, knowing that the United States Coast Guard is also mounting an inquiry, representations or at least a listening brief was being considered by the Canadian government on that other inquiry. If it is within Canadian jurisdiction, is the minister excluding the Coast Guard from carrying out its inquiry?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we are, of course, watching the U.S. proceedings; but, just as we would not want to take any step which would prejudice the rights of Canadian litigants, so we would not want to take any steps which would prejudice our claims as a government under international law. Therefore we certainly have no present plans to make submissions before the U.S. inquiry.

THE PERFORMING ARTS

CHEQUE DUE TO EDMONTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State in charge of art and culture. We on this side are very pleased to see that some of the lottery money which the government is getting back from the provinces is going into art galleries here in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: However, I would like to ask the minister a question. The Edmonton Symphony needs $84,000 and the cheque is long overdue. I would like to ask the minister if he would be so kind to give it to Charlie Lynch who will be there this weekend with the Allied Jazz Band, which is doing a benefit for the Edmonton Symphony, so that he can present it for a truly good cause.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I would first like to point out to the hon. member that the moneys which were announced last week for the National Gallery and the Museum of Man did not come from the lotteries fund but, rather, from a commitment by this government to arts and culture in this country.

An hon. Member: You are anti-Lynch?

Mr. Fox: As far as the Edmonton Symphony is concerned, it will, of course, benefit from the deficit reduction program which was developed by this government. This cheque has now been issued and has been forwarded to my colleague, Senator Olson, in order that he may give it to the Edmonton Symphony.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howie: What does Olson play?

Mr. Paproski: We are very pleased, Madam Speaker, but I say to the minister that the last minister who was presenting money to galleries here six years ago was the Hon. Hugh Faulkner, and he is no longer here in the House.

EDUCATION

SCHOOLS' ACCESS TO CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION FILMS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. For the past ten years Canada's universities and schools have been trying to obtain access to CBC broadcasting materials that could be useful in our schools and universities across Canada for educational purposes. Our educational institutions require the films for short periods of time only, and are willing to pay a nominal fee, but they have met with limited success to date. Will the minister inform the House of what he has been doing to assist our schools and universities in solving this problem?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, basically, if the hon. member has thought about the National Film Board, there is a distribution system which makes the program production of the National Film Board widely available throughout the country. I am told that the hon. member is referring to the CBC. If he has any specific programs he would like to see made available to our schools, I would be delighted to raise the matter with the president of the CBC.

ESTABLISHMENT OF GUIDELINES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, the British government has worked out a satisfactory solution to this problem, and the U.S. government has appointed a committee made up of publishers, educators, radio and TV artists and broadcasters. This committee is establishing guidelines for off-air recording of broadcast programming for educational purposes. Will the minister appoint a similar committee so that we may work toward a solution to this problem that has been with us far too long?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1500)

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): As the hon. member knows, Madam Speaker, the field of education in general is a matter of provincial responsibility. The question to which the hon. member refers is one which relates to the copyright laws of this country. My colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and I, have set up task forces within our departments to look at this whole question. The task force in my case is made up of eminent Canadians very knowledgeable in the area; Andre Raynauld of the University of Montreal, John Hylton, the former vice-chairman of the CRTC, and Claude Brunet of Montreal, an acknowledged copyright expert. I would be delighted to draw the hon. member's concern to their attention. I already know that this is the type of issue with which they will be dealing. Perhaps in closing I might add that I expect this group to report to me in early summer.

PETITIONS

MR. MAZANKOWSKI—REQUEST FOR CONSTRUCTION OF POSTAL FACILITY IN TOFIELD, ALTA.

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the one hundred and eighty-third report of the Clerk of Petitions, stating that he has examined the petition presented by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) on Wednesday, February 24, 1982, and finds that it meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, this being Thursday, I would like to ask the government House leader to give us some indication of the House business for the next few days.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I am honoured to be asked the question by my colleague. I want to confirm that tomorrow, Friday, will be an allotted day. Later on today we will resume debate on second reading of Bill C-89, the National Housing Act.

[Translation]

Next week, Monday we shall resume second reading of the bill dealing with the National Housing Act, and depending on the outcome of the division on the motion today, there will be a division on second reading Monday evening. From Tuesday until the end of the week, that is until Friday, we shall be considering a major bill we intend to introduce tomorrow. The bill concerns energy security and a notice appears in the Order Paper. Once again, the bill will be introduced tomorrow but consideration of the bill will not start until Tuesday, so as to enable hon. members to study the bill in detail during the weekend.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I might ask the House leader for the New Democratic Party if he wants to comment on the allotted day motion presently on the Order Paper.

Mr. Deans: Thank you very much. It is not often I get asked a question. The hon. member is doing a better job than his boss!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deans: I might indicate that although we have a motion standing on the notice paper with regard to an opposition supply day, it is my understanding that the opposition supply day tomorrow will be a Conservative day. While we would like to leave the motion stand on the Order Paper, we do not want to create any conflict. We do not ask that the Chair rule on which of the motions is acceptable. We are prepared to accept debate on the motion put down by the Conservative Party for tomorrow.

Mr. Lewis: That is fine, Madam Speaker. That is all I wanted to establish with respect to that motion.

ENERGY SECURITY ACT

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

February 23, 1982—The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—Bill intituled: "An act to amend and enact provisions related to the Petroleum Administration Act, the National Energy Board Act, the Foreign Investment Review Act, the Canada Business Corporation Act, the Petro-Canada Act, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979 and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act; to repeal the Energy Supplies Emergency Act; to amend an Act to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act; to amend the Adjustment of Accounts Act; and to enact the Petroleum Incentives Program Act, the Canadian Ownership and Control Determination Act, the Energy Monitoring Act and the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act".

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am in a bit of a dilemma. The government House leader announced that tomorrow he will be introducing the energy security act for first reading. Based on the title alone, as indicated in the notice paper, we have some concern about its propriety with regard to its form. We would ask the Chair to examine the propriety of its form and, under Standing Order 69, make a ruling.

The dilemma is that the appropriate time for the decision of the Chair is at first reading. That is confirmed by a decision of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux reported in Journals of January 26, 1971. Obviously we cannot have a reasonable debate as to the propriety of the form until we have the bill. We do not have the bill until it is given first reading and is printed. Therefore, we have a Catch-22 situation. Mr. Speaker Lamoureux dealt with this on January 26, 1971, when he said:

In my view it should be the responsibility of the Chair, when such bill is introduced and given first reading, to take the initiative and raise the matter for the consideration of the House by way of a point of order—

My suggestion to the Chair is that the Chair permit a caveat on first reading to allow us the opportunity over the weekend to examine this bill to find out if in fact our concerns are legitimate, and on Monday, if it is deemed desirable, to discuss whether the bill is in order or not, allowing the opportunity for the Chair to exercise its discretion in a way that is not prejudiced by the fact that we will have completed first reading.

I am not sure if I have made myself clear in this Catch-22, chicken and egg situation. I am asking for an opportunity to see the bill and then have a discussion of the point of order as to whether or not the bill is in order. I think this needs a decision by the Chair.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the same request was put to you not long ago in connection with a borrowing authority bill, because it included several other tax measures, and because of this omnibus aspect you were asked the same question at the time by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). On that occasion I said that if the hon. member thought he had a good case, he should raise his point of order at the appropriate time, that it was not up to me as government House leader to decide whether his argument was justified or not, and finally, that I was always prepared to debate the issue. I should like to point out that in the case we have here, a draft bill was published in July, that a very detailed notice of ways and means motion was published in the Order Paper, that the bill will be very similar to the draft bill I have just mentioned, and that the content of the notice of ways and means motion will be reflected in the bill. We are going to introduce the bill tomorrow, and if my hon. colleague is here tomorrow, I shall try to send him a copy beforehand, which means later today or some time tomorrow morning, which will be helpful if he again wants to argue a point that was unsuccessfully debated not long ago.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I am sorry to rise again. There is a matter I wanted to clarify with regard to the House business. We have been meeting, as you are aware—perhaps you are not aware and you are not even supposed to be aware—to discuss the terms of reference for the referral of the matter of bank profits to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

It had been my understanding that that reference, as amended, would be moved today. I notice that the reference still stands on the notice paper in its original form. Is the House leader in a position to tell me whether he in fact intends to move the reference, and whether he intends to move the reference in an amended form or in the form it now is and has been for the past two days?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, we had a House leaders' meeting yesterday and we did come to an agreement. If it is the will of the House, I am prepared now to move the motion with the small change to which we agreed—it will be very brief—or I could wait until you call notices of motions.

Madam Speaker: Perhaps the minister will not mind waiting until I call notices of motions.

ENERGY SECURITY ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

On the Order: Introduction of Bills:

February 23, 1982—The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend and enact provisions related to the Petroleum Administration Act, the National Energy Board Act, the Foreign Investment Review Act, the Canada Business Corporation Act, the Petro-Canada Act, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979 and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act; to repeal the Energy Supplies Emergency Act; to amend an act to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act; to amend the Adjustment of Accounts Act; and to enact the Petroleum Incentives Program Act, the Canadian Ownership and Control Determination Act, the Energy Monitoring Act and the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act".

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I listened to the undertakings given by the government House leader about dealing with the bill you are about to speak to on the question raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). The problem may very well be a problem only if the undertaking is accepted as solving the issue because the bill, even by its title, seems to go beyond the terms of the notice of motion.

If I may say so, I think that the suggestion which was made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre is a good one, that the caveat be entered, that time is given and the Chair take the time to review this matter over the period suggested by the hon. member.

I am sure that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) was acting in good faith—I am not suggesting that he was not—by giving that undertaking. However, the problem still exists, and I think it is implicit in the title of the bill which seems to go beyond the notice of ways and means motion. That is why there is some good sense to the suggestion of the member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the impression I have is that my hon. friend is afraid to be afraid. As a matter of fact, we have said that we will introduce a bill tomorrow. This bill will look like the draft bill which has been given to the opposition last July. It will reflect the ways and means motion. Once the bill is introduced, if they have a point of order to raise, that is their right. We will argue that. The matter is very simple; if they do not agree with the omnibus aspect of the bill—we say it is according to practice—we will argue that in due course. The opposition will have the weekend to study the bill, as well as Monday, and we will debate it on Tuesday.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, we have an unusual situation here. There has been a draft bill circulated. The government House leader has just indicated that the bill which he intends to introduce, which no one on this side of the House, at least, has seen, will look like the draft bill. He has not said it will be precisely like the draft bill. We do not know the precise nature of the bill which will be introduced and we have some very real cause for concern that the bill which will be introduced will not be allowable and acceptable in the House, for various reasons which we will not burden the House with at this moment.

As you know, the dilemma is that we will not be allowed to debate at the time of its introduction for first reading. What we are asking seems to me to be straightforward and reasonable and is also backed up by a precedent decision of one of your predecessors, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux. What we are seeking is that the Chair indicate now that first reading would be a caveat, with the caveat being that the bill proposed to be introduced, which none of us has seen, is a bill which is, in fact, acceptable to the House of Commons.

In summary, that is the situation as put forward by my colleague from Calgary Centre. What we would ask is for you to act as your predecessor, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, has acted and have the House give a caveated first reading.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, you proceeded in a definite way previously. We do not object to proceeding the same way but it is not for the House to give its consent, it is for you to exercise your discretion.

Madam Speaker: It seems to me the House has already dealt with this problem very recently. It seems to me that the caveat is not really necessary because I will certainly rule diligently on this matter which has been brought up by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. I will do that some time before second reading, so points of order may be brought up and I can hear those points of order. We have dealt with this before. I feel we can solve this particular problem in the same manner.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, perhaps that does clarify it. If the Chair is acknowledging that we can, in fact, raise a point of order between first and second reading which the Chair will hear and base a judgment on the assessment and evaluation of those arguments, then we have no dispute. My concern was that the Chair might have indicated that since first reading had been completed there would be no opportunity to address any points of order which may be raised. That was my only concern and perhaps the remarks of the Chair have cleared that up.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, as far as I am concerned we will be ready to argue any point of order on this bill tomorrow.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. YURKO—REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN ORDER PAPER

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rose on a point of order yesterday to request a change on the Order Paper to alternate or switch to the motions that are on the Order Paper in my name. Yesterday, the House leader of the Conservative party indicated a reservation with regard to a member sitting as an independent being permitted the opportunity of switching two motions. I wonder if the acting House leader is now prepared to tell us what his decision has been and perhaps why such a decision has been made?

Madam Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to renew his question, which I assume he has done, to switch the order of his motions, I will ask the House again if it gives its unanimous consent to the changes which are asked by the hon. member for Edmonton East. Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member does not have the unanimous consent of the House to change the order of those motions.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, concerning government notices of motions I can say that there is unanimous consent, which my colleagues will undoubtedly confirm, to the following motion:

That the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be empowered to review the profit situation of the chartered banks.

That the motion be amended by adding the following words:

"And that the committee be empowered to engage necessary expert staff."

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I can confirm that our party welcomes the opportunity for this parliamentary committee to study the interest rates policy and review the profit situation of the chartered banks. The government House leader has confirmed to us earlier and to the House, I believe, that this inquiry will be given the widest terms of reference possible. We agree with the addition to the motion of the provision to hire staff.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, the unanimous consent that is given is, of course, to a motion to have the inquiry. In fact, there is not only unanimous consent to have the inquiry; it is eagerly sought by members of this party.

I am disappointed, I must say, that we were not able to convince the government House leader and the Conservative House leader to include a review of federal government legislation on some other matters which we felt were essential to the conduct of a proper inquiry. However, the government House leader and the House leader of the official opposition indicated that as far as they were concerned the committee had the power to ask for, and would likely receive, the opportunity to travel, if that became necessary, and it could hold public hearings. Knowing my astute colleague from Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), we will be able to find a way, during the committee's deliberations, to investigate the federal government's complicity in the high interest rate policy of the banks which has resulted in the inordinately high profits.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I would just like to comment that it was the government House leader who made the comments on travel. At no time did we make any comments about travel in inquiries like that.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the committee is the master of its own procedure. If it desires to come up with an interim report to request permission to travel, then, as I told the hon. member, it will be seriously considered. In the meantime, the committee will decide what objective to attack first. It comes under the terms of reference which are broad enough to allow a very serious debate about the concerns expressed by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans). Therefore, I seek unanimous consent of the House to adopt without debate the motion I have just read.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, may I ask for a point of clarification. The motion of the House leader uses the term "Canada's chartered banks". He may recall that the last Bank Act provided for the incorporation of many banks. There are 30 or 40 already incorporated via letters patent. Were those banks operating as foreign banks in Canada prior to the new Bank Act and since then to be excluded from examination by the committee?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I think the terms of reference are very broad. It is not our intention to limit at the level of the House of Commons the terms of reference of the committee. The committee will look into this and make a decision. If it is not clear and if the committee feels it should come back to seek further power or an order of reference which is more specific, we will consider that. However, at this stage I think the terms are broad enough to include the profits of the chartered banks and, I suppose, the banks about which my hon. colleague has just spoken.

Time Allocation

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER BILL C-89 ON SECOND READING

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That, in relation to Bill C-89, an act to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, one additional sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the second reading stage of the bill; and that 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on that day, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the said stage of the bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Clark: Shame!

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, it was three months ago almost to the day that I first asked for the support of all members of the House to consider the urgency of the measures in Bill C-89. The last two paragraphs of my comments on that day were as follows:

The task now, Madam Speaker, is for the House to translate into action its expressed concern for housing matters and Canadians thereby affected. I will soon table a bill to amend the National Housing Act. This legislation is important. It will enable the government to assist households renewing their mortgage; it will enable the government to assist first-time home buyers through modifications to the mortgage instrument; and it will enable additional stimulus to be provided to rental production by allowing CMHC to insure higher loan amounts on rental production.

I trust and pray, Madam Speaker, that just as my confidence in the government was vindicated by the budget, so too will my confidence in the good sense of the hon. members of the House be vindicated by their speedy passage of the housing legislation so sorely needed by many Canadians today.

I wish that confidence had been borne out.

In April of 1980 the Speech from the Throne set the basis—and should have alerted this House—to the general intentions of the government with respect to housing. The Speech from the Throne stated that the government would:

—act to assist those unable to bear the burden of renegotiating their home mortgages in the present abnormal situation so that the spectre of foreclosure will be avoided.

We described how this would be approached by the government. We were convinced that the government could do this:

—without the government embarking upon a major subsidy program.

Those signals were sent to the opposition many, many months ago. The Canada mortgage renewal plan introduced in the budget on November 12 did just that. It followed the intentions of the government I have laid out. It is a plan to assist Canadians who are unable to help themselves with guarantees, through interest deferral or grants up to $3,000 per household.

This legislation was tabled in this House prior to December. I had copies of the draft legislation hand delivered to the housing critics of the opposition parties. In January prior to the return of this House to its normal business I sought the co-operation of the parties through their respective spokesmen—in the case of the New Democratic Party, spokeswoman.

We have been discussing this legislation now for five days. What is particularly perturbing to me—and a disappointment—is the fact that hon. members opposite asked in October and November that I or my office use what influence we had to assist Canadians who were troubled about mortgage renewals. I received nearly 400 requests for assistance from hon. members opposite. This legislation is required in order that I can indeed assist not only hon. members opposite but also the many Canadians who have sought the assistance provided in the programs in Bill C-89.

In addition to that, when hon. members opposite returned in the fall, they tabled many petitions containing thousands of signatures of concerned Canadians. I personally signed responses to over 10,000 Canadians advising that the government would take action and that it would be in accordance with the principles I have enunciated in these brief remarks. This legislation is required to assist many of those Canadians.

I would like to stress that the commitment of the budget was $350 million over the next two years to encourage the construction of rental accommodation. One third of those units promoted by that budgetary commitment are what we refer to as rent-geared-to-income accommodation. Any hon. member who has any experience in the housing field knows that that program through the years in most of the provinces of Canada has been one of the most effective ways of providing affordable accommodation to Canadians at lower income levels. The delivery of that accommodation to Canadians is being delayed by the delay of this legislation. Without this legislation we cannot proceed with that program.

There has been the complaint that this bill is not enough, but I point out, as I did to the new critic for the New Democratic Party, that the 15,000 units are a minimum and that after we receive proposals and responses from the building community the $350 million could result in many thousands of additional units over and above the 15,000. The many jobs which will be created through the construction of that rental accommodation will be the result of this legislation.

Hon. members have recounted in this House the experience in their communities, and they have asked for government programs. That was done today by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie). Hon. members have been seeking government programs to create employment across the country. The legislation before us, Bill C-89, for which we have sought co-operation, is one of the tools which addresses that problem. There is a potential of 70,000 person years generated through the expenditure of $350 million. I felt that would have motivated more support and a speedier response to the legislation and possibly would have obviated the necessity of the government's proposing the motion I am proposing today.

In conclusion, I remind hon. members that the blueprint for action of this government in the Speech from the Throne in April, 1980, addressed not only the needs of those in this country who need help most and the intentions of the government to respond in a real way to those who need help most, but it also addressed the posture of the government in terms of how it goes about general government business. One of the principles is a recognition that Canadians do not necessarily want more government. They want more effective government.

The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is dealt with in Bill C-89. From comments of hon. members on both sides of this House and from personal representations made by hon. members, I know that the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has served Canadians and the representatives of Canadians well over the last few years. The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation needs this legislation to make its operation more effective in the handling of claims, in the area of underwriting and in being able to support the lending institutions with the types of new mortgage documents which are now generated in our changing economic climate. Those provisions have not been attacked. In five days of debate not a single word of criticism has been addressed to those objectives.

I will conclude by saying that I wish we had the support of hon. members opposite. I believe that the response of the government in this bill is a sensible and sensitive one to a difficult problem.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, we have just witnessed what I consider to be one of the most outstanding examples of hypocrisy that I have seen around here in a long time. The minister who is responsible for housing pleads with us; he tells us how he tried to cajole us into getting on with the bill and then damns himself out of his own mouth. The very man who stands in his place today to bring in a closure motion talks about the business of Bill C-89 being incorporated in the Speech from the Throne in April 1980!

So much for urgency, Mr. Speaker. It did not see the light of day again until the budget of November 12, 1981. Again, so much for urgency, so much for discharging a promise to the home owners of this country in the budget of April 1980. The bill does not come before the House for second reading until February 8, 1982, three full months after the introduction of the budget. And still the minister talks about urgency.

Let us look at the record of debate on Bill C-89 since second reading debate commenced on February 8, 1982. Debate was continued on February 9, then was interrupted on February 10 because the government wanted to deal with Bill C-90, the Customs Tariff bill. It was picked up again on February 11 and then we did not get back to it until February 22.

What happened during the intervening days? There was an allotted day. The government could have set that aside; it manages the business of the House so it could have said that it wanted to get on with Bill C-89 because it was a matter of urgency. Apart from an allotted day, we had the labour benefits bill, the Canagrex bill, the taxation and borrowing authority bill, a supply day, the labour benefits bill again—everything but Bill C-89. Yet the minister has the unmitigated gall to stand in his place and say that the House has dragged its feet and that this bill is a matter of urgency. We have had five days to deal with this bill. That is the only opportunity we will have to examine the housing crisis and the government's response to it.

It is worth looking at the record of those five days, Mr. Speaker. It is not only members of the opposition that have been carrying the debate; members of the government party have participated, as have members of the NDP. It was only when the minister felt that the debate was going on a little bit too long that he decided to pull his members back. But that is no reason for us to withdraw and not discharge our responsibilities to the people in this country.

There is not a member sitting in this House who is not faced with a critical housing crisis in his or her constituency.

Mr. Kelly: Nonsense!

Mr. McGrath: Yet the government has the unmitigated gall to invoke closure after five days of debate—to invoke closure on a bill that will probably pass second reading with a nod. No one is opposed to the principle of the bill. What we have said in speech after speech after speech is that the bill offers a mere pittance; it does not go far enough; it does not significantly address the problems of home owners nor the acute shortage of rental accommodation in this country. But because of the pittance it provides for those in dire straits, no one in this House is going to vote against it.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) should know that this is a money bill and that the opposition cannot move amendments to it. All we can do is try to make the case and hope that the government will be sufficiently impressed that it will subsequently bring in amendments to the bill.

Another matter that gave us cause to hope that the government might bring in some amendments is the famous letter signed by the ten that was released coincidentally with the commencement of second reading of the bill. It was signed by eight backbenchers on the government side and, significantly, by two members of the government.

We all know the contents of that letter and the press release that accompanied it. It called for a new housing initiative; it called for 50,000 housing units to be commenced immediately. The bill makes provision for only an additional 15,000 units. Surely we had reason to suspect as a result of that letter that something might be forthcoming. If not, we had an obligation to make the case to the government that the bill does not address the critical housing situation in the country today.

I should like to quote from the leaked document, Mr. Speaker. Referring to the consequences of high interest rates, the problem that this bill is supposed to address, the document quotes from a memo written by the minister who is responsible for housing to his cabinet colleagues—to the effect that the prospect is not only for tight rental markets but for waiting lists and doubling up with family and friends. It goes on to say that we will witness a substantial regression in housing conditions following 35 years of gradual improvement.

That is not the official opposition speaking, Mr. Speaker, and it is not the New Democratic Party; that is what the minister was saying to his colleagues just a few short months ago. Now he has the nerve to get up in the House after five days of debate, knowing full well that the bill will receive general support—albeit critical support because it does not go far enough—and deny members of the House the only opportunity they have to try to press home to the government that there is a critical crisis in the country today and that in the budgets of 1980 and 1981 the government failed miserably to address that crisis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: That is the responsibility we have, Mr. Speaker. All we have to do is take the minister's own projections. For this year we need 77,500 apartment units, but how many will we get? We will get 15,000 units because, according to the minister's own statement, no rental housing will be built in Canada this year other than that which is publicly assisted. We know that the only assistance for people building rental accommodation this year, for those who qualify, is the $7,500 interest-free loan. There will be a net decline in the number of social housing units built this year. The minister will find that information in the budget. Last year we built 30,000 units but this year the government intends to build only 25,000 units.

I am surprised that the Minister of Public Works, a sincere, honest and honourable man, would carry the can for the government's mismanagement of the economy. The government may have some excuse for mismanaging the economy of this country, Mr. Speaker, but it has no excuse for mismanaging this House!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat puzzled, because whenever I happen to speak in the House after one of the former ministers of the previous Conservative government, they have been trying to teach the Liberals a thing or two, and it is especially surprising in this case, since the hon. member supported the government that in 1979-80 had decided to get rid of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. At that time, privatization was the order of the day, and responsibility for housing construction was to be transferred to the private sector. The hon. member supported that government. Should he be taken seriously today, when he tells us that they are probably going to support this bill, Mr. Speaker? I think it is absolute hypocrisy. They have kept this bill in the House for six days, which includes today's debate, plus one more day next week, on Monday, which makes seven, and then he has the gall to tell us that they will probably vote in favour of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

It is hypocrisy, Mr. Speaker, and I think Quebecers and Canadians are going to realize this. After all, what the minister is proposing is to stimulate the construction industry, not only through government assistance but also indirectly by assisting the private sector. I am from a basically residential riding, Mr. Speaker, and I am well aware what this can involve for the private sector and for developers and contractors in my riding. Thanks to this government we have had several housing projects for senior citizens which were built with government funds, with the collaboration of the private sector. These projects included apartments for senior citizens and apartments built in collaboration with the co-operative housing program. In any case, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have any lessons to learn from the hon. member and his party. When they were in power, they proved that they were unable to govern, and Canadians have judged them accordingly.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to be allowed to do so too. I am pleased to have a chance to discuss the measures that have been tabled in the House and to consider the proposals made since they are of vital importance to Canadians. For weeks I have been hearing members opposite complain that the bill does not go far enough. I heard them reading letters in which constituents described their particularly unfortunate circumstances. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. members opposite are really concerned and are prepared to act responsibly and listen carefully to the distress signals they are receiving from their constituents. This is exactly what we are doing, Mr. Speaker. We have stopped talking and we are taking action. If the hon. members had been more receptive to the needs of their constituents, they would have voted to adopt this bill without further delay, because it is what Canadians want. If they were responsible people, they would stop pushing this incredible proposal to have the bill provide for additional funds we do not have. The same opposition is saying that the government is spending too much. They said it this week when the estimates were tabled, but they still keep rising in the House to ask us to spend more money. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be part of a team that is paying attention to the needs of Canadians, while at the same time realizing it has a duty to enact effective legislation, in other words, to propose and support measures the country can afford and to be fair to the people who elected them.

Mr. Speaker, the impact of the Canada mortgage renewal and rental assistance plans could indeed be spectacular. Many of our friends opposite have spoken about the housing shortage that is affecting Canadians in all parts of the country. I shall be more specific and mention those Canadian families who are obliged to spend more than 30 per cent of their gross income on housing. It certainly is ironic to hear members opposite talk about this. The bill being debated in the House today is, in fact, aimed at amending the legislation and at providing help where it is truly needed. Now I ask you, Mr. Speaker, why do the opposition parties insist on drawing out this debate? If they are so convinced of the need for this bill, they should have supported it when the debate began in the House. This bill provides for the spending of $350 million on housing projects to be set up for Canadians with the collaboration of the private sector, contractors and developers across Canada, in Quebec, and of course in the riding of Louis-Hébert, where the plan will be welcomed by my constituents, by people who are looking for homes and people who are eager to build them. It will be a first step toward turning around the residential construction industry in Quebec and Canada.

I repeat, $350 million will be spent on helping Canadians who are seeking rental accommodation and those who are having problems with mortgage renewal. One of the spin-offs will be to create 70,000 jobs as a direct result of adopting these measures. Mr. Speaker, Canadians who are waiting for the hon. members opposite to take positive action deeply resent this contempt for their housing problems, and I think the Canadian people will punish the members opposite for their attitude to this problem. Changes are absolutely necessary. The proposed amendments to the legislation will not only help those who really need assistance, but will also enable the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to operate more effectively. They would allow home buyers to benefit from new mortgaging techniques providing more flexibility to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation as far as the type of loans it can insure is concerned. Moreover, CMHC would be in a better position not only to react to the restraints of the market, but also to continue to play and to improve its leadership role in housing, a role it has been playing for 35 years with the support of this government, and will continue to play in the future. Of course, the direct result for Canadians as a whole is that they will be, as they already are, the best housed people in the world. The provisions contained in Bill C-89 focus government support on specific target areas so that the Canadian housing market can provide both a sufficient rental housing stock and reasonably priced housing for home buyers.

In my opinion, delaying this debate as the members of the official opposition are doing deprives Canadians of their right to obtain the support they need, and this should no longer be tolerated. The previous speaker mentioned his indignation, but what provokes the indignation of Canadians and of members on this side of the House is to have lost precious time on a bill which, for all practical purposes, the members opposite will probably support because they know that it is what Canadians want and what Canadians will have as early as next Monday evening.

[English]

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to disillusion you. I think the bringing in of closure on this piece of legislation is an affront to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada, especially those who have gone through the last year looking for some assistance to meet rapidly escalating costs attributable to accommodation, resulting directly from the economic policy the government has followed. To suggest for one moment that because we have taken all of five days to discuss this piece of legislation, suddenly the government no longer requires the benefit of the views of hon. members from across the country with regard to the impact or non-impact of housing legislation on their communities, is ridiculous.

I draw to the attention of the House the fact that we need an all-out attack on major housing problem areas in every corner of Canada. We cannot see that in this legislation. There were 15,000 or 20,000 people who demonstrated not so many months ago, telling us that they could not afford to live in the houses they presently occupied because of the high interest rate policy of the government. There were 100,000 people standing on the steps of the Parliament Buildings not three months ago telling us that they could not find accommodation in the country within their ability to pay. Then we obtained the piece of legislation brought forward by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) which perhaps will build 15,000 housing units. There is a demonstrated acceptable need for a minimum of 70,000 housing units per year more than we currently build. The minister agonizes that we have taken five days to discuss the housing problem, that we have taken this period of time which he cannot afford to spend in the House.

On this issue alone there is no room for closure. On this issue alone we should be devoting every single moment of the time of the House of Commons to discussing how we can build homes, how we can put people to work building homes, and how we can make available necessary mortgage money at a price people can afford, both in terms of their need to renew their present mortgages and in terms of making available additional moneys for new homes and new mortgages which are so necessary if we are to house Canadians in the way they are entitled to be housed. I am not talking about palatial surroundings. I am not talking about two or three-bathroom homes with five or six bedrooms on one acre lots. I am talking about modest three-bedroom homes in which families can be raised within the ability of those who work in that family to meet the cost.

I want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, in the few moments that I have that it does not take a financial expert to see what has happened in this country over the course of the last two or three years. Some glaring examples of the mismanagement of this government as it affects housing are evident everywhere. But the one that comes to my mind most quickly is the high carrying costs attributable to home ownership and rental as related to income.

In 1978 in the city of Vancouver, based on an average income, it took 30 per cent of a person's or a family's, income to maintain housing. By the fourth quarter of 1981 that percentage had risen to 56.7 per cent of that same family's income. In 1978 in Toronto the percentage of a family's income spent to find accommodation was 32.9 per cent. By the fourth quarter of 1981 that percentage had risen to 47.5 per cent. In 1978 in Halifax the percentage was 29.5 per cent of a family's income, and by the fourth quarter of 1981 the percentage had risen to 38.5 per cent. In 1978 in St. John's the percentage was 27.3 per cent of a family's income and by 1981 that percentage had risen to 38.2 per cent.

This situation is evident in every single community in Canada. The outlay required from a family's income to find accommodation fit to live in is rising by leaps and bounds. The amount has gone up by no less than one third in almost every instance. I put to the minister in his absence that the only decent thing he has done since he took over the ministry is to be absent. His presence has afforded nothing in the way of any housing starts worth mentioning. In terms of being able to influence his cabinet colleagues with regard to action to reduce the high level of mortgage interest his representations have fallen on deaf ears.

I cannot believe the minister would have the audacity and effrontery to come here and tell us that this is it, that this is the message. He says to us: "Oh, there will be more". When will there be more and what will the more be? When will we see the housing program of the government? The government knows, as you know, Mr. Speaker—and I know you know it as well as any member in the House—that housing starts were down dramatically last year over the year before. We have unemployment in construction up dramatically this year over last and up last year over the year before. We have carrying costs for accommodation up in every single community from coast to coast.

We have a CMHC commitment to housing which you would expect to see rise in relation to the need we see develop. But what do we see? We see that CMHC's commitment to housing is down dramatically in the 1982 budget even in spite of the fact that the minister has paid lip service to the recognition that there is a housing crisis. Affordable mortgage financing is down in every single community across the country. Try to get a mortgage, Mr. Speaker. Try to refinance your home today. If it is a modest home, as I suspect yours is, I know you would have grave difficulty finding any mortgage company that would give you the money necessary. Perhaps that is not fair in your case, given the high salary that you have. But in the case of many average income people, that would be true. In my own community, a community shared by the Minister of Indians Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), who is listening intently or sleeping—no, he is listening intently. That was a joke by the way; I knew you were awake. Are you aware, Mr. Minister, that in your own constituency certain of the mortgage lending institutions have red-lined—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is aware of the requirement of the House that he address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Deans: Let me ask you, Mr. Speaker, are you aware that the minister is aware that in his own community there are certain sectors where mortgage institutions will not lend money? They have red-lined them. They will not lend money to people even though those people have been paying their mortgages faithfully month after month. When you call Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and tell them there is a modest home with a mortgage of $30,000 that can be purchased and ask whether they can help, the answer is inevitably and invariably no, that there is no money. They are not in the lending business any longer, even as a lender of last resort.

The reason we are so effronted by the legislative proposal of the minister and why we are so opposed to allowing it simply to pass is that it does not even begin to address the serious housing problems of this country. I tell the minister, who I know will be sitting reading this tonight when he gets home, that it is absolutely essential that we get on with the job of making homes available for people at a price they can afford, and that this kind of legislation we will not put up with.

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a few remarks on the legitimacy of ending this debate at second reading stage and getting on with trying to provide some assistance to those Canadians who are in dire straits with regard to mortgages.

First, I want to comment on what the hon. member for Hamilton-Mountain (Mr. Deans) has said. I was disappointed that he repeatedly referred to what was happening here today as being closure.

Mr. Deans: It is closure.

Mr. Smith: It is not closure. Anyone who knows the Standing Orders knows that closure is covered by Standing Order 33. Closure is a device that has been used on occasion since 1913 when it was brought in by the Conservatives. Notwithstanding the fact that we have been in office much longer than the Conservatives for most of the century, closure has been used more by Conservative governments than by Liberal governments. Be that as it may, this is not closure.

Mr. Deans: It is so.

Mr. Smith: We are operating under Standing Order 75C, which is time allocation. This is a reasonable and legitimate device when it is clear, obvious and evident that a filibuster is taking place. That is certainly what has been going on.

Mr. Miller: Nonsense.

Mr. Smith: Reference was made to this debate having taken up five days at second reading stage. In actual fact this bill was debated on February 8—

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure that the parliamentary secretary would not want to intentionally mislead the House, but if he looks at Standing Order 33 he will not find the word "closure" either in the heading or anywhere in the wording.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I hope that interjection will not be deducted from the time allocated to me. I can assure the hon. member that if he even took the time to read such books as the "Canadian House of Commons Procedure and Reform" by John Stewart, Beauschene's "Parliamentary Rules and Forms", etc., it is widely recognized that closure is in fact Standing Order 33 which was introduced by the Borden government in 1913. The hon. member might take a little history course on that so he can make more meaningful interjections.

In any event, second reading stage of this bill was debated on February 8, 9, 11, 22, 23 and 24. So we have spent six days on second reading.

• (1600)

In addition, we have this debate today and there will be the allocated day on Monday, totalling eight days. On Tuesday, when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) delivered the estimates to the House, there was an exchange between him and the opposition House leader and an invitation was extended to the opposition to co-operate in getting this legislation through. An interjection was made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), who said that up until then there had only been three and a half or four days spent on this bill, whereas in December, 1979, when the Conservative government brought in their mortgage deductibility scheme, seven days had been spent debating it and certainly we could expect an equivalent amount. Well, Mr. Speaker, if that did not clearly indicate that rather than trying to deal with the merits of the proposal there was a clear and obvious filibuster going on, for whatever purpose, I do not know what would.

What is clear is that when you include today as well as Monday, you will have had eight days spent in debate on second reading. Now quite apart from that, in view of the fact that this measure was included in the budget address, there was a fair bit of debate on this item during the budget speech debate. I think it is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that what has been going on here has been a filibuster, particularly on the part of the official opposition. So what we really have to do is decide whether or not we are going to get serious and try to provide this type of program for people who need it.

Now, when I go down to my constituency office in Toronto for appointments, which I try to do pretty well every weekend, hardly a weekend goes by without someone coming in with a mortgage problem. I go through the facts and figures they have and in a number of instances—I would not, of course, give names because I would not want to embarrass anyone—I can assure the House that this program will in fact provide badly needed relief. I think it is unconscionable for it to be blocked. The NDP are saying, "Well, it just is not good enough." I am not quite sure where the official opposition are on it; that has not been made clear to me. But I do not think there are any grounds to believe that somehow the people of Canada will be better off by not having the measures this program would implement.

There are many people in this country who may well have budgeted for a house at a time when interest rates were lower, who bought a house which was well within their ability to carry, and who now, through no fault of their own, are in trouble. Perhaps some of them had at one point two family incomes. They may have had children since then and the wife had decided to stay at home, thereby reducing the family income at the same time as interest rates were going up. They need help. I think the time has come to get serious about this, to put it through.

There has been a lot of talk here today about amendments. Someone seems to have forgotten that this is second reading. We will have this bill dealt with in committee, we will have report stage, and if anyone thinks that somehow there will be no opportunity for amendment because of what is happening here today, I do not think they understand anything about procedure.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think today's procedure is reasonable and the sooner we get on with it, the better we will be serving the interests of the people of this country who need this sort of help.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I cannot remain silent in this debate, especially when we see a government that refuses to take our claims seriously. When I hear members on the government side accuse us of more or less taking advantage of the House by using up six days to debate an issue as vital as this one, I find that absolutely incredible and utterly scandalous. I remember when just two years ago, the same people on the other side of the House obstructed our property tax credit proposal for two or three weeks, and were it not for this obstruction, 900,000 home owners would not be faced with the problems confronting them today. It is nonsense to claim, as the minister would have us believe, that this bill is going to meet the needs of thousands of home owners who are living with the uneasy prospect that they may lose their homes in 1982. The funds allocated under this bill will cover about 10 per cent of those who really need the money, and the number of housing units is in no way adequate to meet the demand, owing to the lack of government measures and policies during the last two years.

Not long ago, Liberal members from Quebec, as the minister will recall, recommended a minimum of 50,000 housing units. The number of units recommended in the bill is nowhere near this figure. The minister is obviously afraid that his fellow members may be tempted to rise and publicly condemn his bill in the House. I think that is one of the reasons why he has asked his party to use closure in this debate, since the members opposite will be hard put to keep silent and let the minister responsible or the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) oblige them to betray their own signatures on a letter that has now made history.

I realize that the present government is in a difficult position, as it must face opposition members who are doing no more and no less than express the views of constituents in their various ridings. Could we ask government members to be as energetic and dedicated in seeking a solution to the problems with which they are confronted at the present time? Today, they have shown that they do not intend to do so, by limiting debate on an issue that deserves our attention. It is therefore the duty of members of the opposition to make every effort to defend the cause of reason and to make the minister responsible for housing introduce proposals that are more attuned to the needs of the Canadian people than they are at the present time.

The minister did not tell us, for instance, that last week, spokesmen for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation came right out and said that no changes could be expected in the housing sector until six months from now, and that at that point, a slow recovery might be possible. The minister knows perfectly well that hardly anything is going to change, considering the lack of adequate measures in, and the impact of, the budget brought down by the Finance Minister last fall. That is not the sort of thing the minister cares to tell us. All he wants us to do is to gulp down a pill that is not about to cure any of the housing sector's present aches and pains. The minister has carefully avoided mentioning what we can expect in the difficult period that lies ahead if he fails to get additional funds from the Minister of Finance or from cabinet.

I was listening to the member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson), who is from the same province as I am and who said he was proud of the government's record on housing and construction. Mr. Speaker, how can anyone be proud of a team that has dealt a mortal blow to the construction industry? I would be ashamed to be part of a team that was responsible for getting rid of a property tax credit policy that would have been very helpful to home owners today. I would be ashamed to belong to a team that is resolving the problems of only 10 per cent of Canadians who have a right to own their own home, and especially those Canadians who are faced with the very real possibility that they may lose their homes. The members of this team say they are proud of the work being done by the minister responsible for housing. No, I am not saying that the minister did not try to get a more representative and more responsible budget from cabinet and from the Minister of Finance. I am not saying he did not try, but if he did ask the minister responsible for additional funds, he failed to get them. The government members have failed, and now they are clearly betraying the cause of the Canadian people. Let them applaud on the other side! Meanwhile, they are trying to gag the opposition, because as members of the opposition we are trying, and this is the kind of leverage we have, to force the government to act and to act reasonably. No, they are going to keep on smiling, and the two ministers who recommended a minimum of 50,000 units, the eight members who at least had the courage to publish their letter and then disappointed many Quebecers last Friday when they sat down as usual, following the orders of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—it is really incredible, Mr. Speaker!

These people are trying to prevent us from speaking and from taking further action, while depriving themselves of a chance to make the minister listen to reason and force the government to respond more satisfactorily to the needs we are discussing here today. Of course, some will say they feel sorry for us because we have to make the recommendations and representations that should be made in Parliament, but in any case, Mr. Speaker, we cannot accept things the way they are now. I hope it is not ignorance on their part. Or is it perhaps malicious hypocrisy, this refusal to respond to a vital need? Today, they are accusing us of trying to deprive a few home owners of substantial assistance, while the same people refused to support a policy that was very well received and would have helped all home owners who at the time were faced with the same mortgage payment problems. Two years ago, for two whole weeks, the same people opposed a bill that would have remedied the situation and helped to stimulate the construction industry, thus preventing the loss of thousands of jobs. Those people are responsible for the present situation, and they are trying to gag us, to deprive us of our right to speak in the House, because we want to make the minister responsible take action and make this government understand, once and for all, what the vital needs of our society are. This would help to stimulate construction and enable thousands of Canadians to own their own homes. That is the kind of government we have and that is why we are continuing our opposition to this bill, because it does not provide an adequate response to the needs of our country. Of course, we cannot refuse to support a project of 15,000 units, but we want to make it clear to the government that it is not enough and does not respond to the present needs of Canadians. They know this, but they do not have the courage to get up and act responsibly. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but we shall not stop as long as this Parliament is ruled by democratic process. Today, what we are seeing is a totalitarian gesture, an obscene gesture, and I would be ashamed to belong to a government that would act that way.

[English]

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few moments to discuss the Canada mortgage renewal plan in terms of the current situation in Newfoundland, and especially in terms of the ongoing obstruction of this bill by the opposition. The truth of the matter is that I have been looking over some of the mail from my constituents and have been speaking with some of my fellow MPs. It is becoming increasingly apparent to me that the stalling tactics of the opposition have put some people in some real economic peril.

Mr. Blaikie: The Academy Awards are next month, Roger.

Mr. Cosgrove: They think that is funny. It is a sad comment.

Mr. Simmons: I am sure the opposition is amused by its stalling tactics, but I want to tell hon. members that there is a group of people in my riding who are not very impressed with the stalling tactics, because those tactics have meant some very real economic peril for those people.

I want to speak for a moment about a particular group of people which desperately needs this mortgage renewal plan. I am thinking about young Newfoundland couples who are faced with the loss of their homes.

Mr. Blaikie: Thanks to your interest rate policy.

Mr. Blenkarn: Add the principal to the debt.

Mr. Simmons: As Your Honour knows, residential construction activity in Newfoundland has seen an escalation in house prices, coupled with an influx of workers. In the last few years there have been many Newfoundlanders who, seeing the likely trend in housing prices, have gone out and purchased homes while they could still afford them. To Newfoundlanders, especially those in smaller communities such as the 135 communities I have the honour to represent here, home ownership is a very strong tradition. It is a way of life.

These people might well have gone a little further out on a limb than they should have, in financial terms, in order to get a home, but they felt, and I believe correctly, that it was their only chance, their best chance, for home ownership. Many of these people are now faced with mortgage renewals. Contrary to what many people say, they do not want government assistance. They prefer to go it on their own, to go it alone. However, these are not easy times. In a situation of very high unemployment, it is doubly hard to make ends meet.

I may say that I represent an area in which there are two particular pockets of unemployment which are experiencing the highest unemployment rates in Canada, sometimes approaching 70 per cent to 75 per cent.

An hon. Member: Liberal policy!

Mr. Simmons: It is precisely the young couples who do not have the new, high paying jobs but who have those all-important houses that the Canada mortgage renewal plan will benefit. These are the people this plan is designed to benefit—

Mr. Blenkarn: How?

Mr. Simmons: —if we can ever get this bill through the House. It will not be with the help of the opposition, but we will do it over their obstruction. We have had to do it that way before, and if it means benefiting these young Newfoundlanders, these young home owners—

Mr. Blaikie: Is this for the TV at home. Roger?

Mr. Simmons: —we are prepared to do what has to be done—

Mr. Blenkarn: What a benefit!

Mr. Simmons: —to override, to undo—

Mr. Blaikie: Undo what you have already done.

Mr. Simmons: —the senseless obstruction of the opposition. It is the young Newfoundland couple who need some interest deferral at this particular time so that they can have time to reorganize their personal financial problems. It is the young Newfoundland couple or home owner who needs a grant of, say, up to $3,000—

Mr. Blaikie: Deferred dire straits.

Mr. Simmons: —if their is little or no equity in their home.

Mr. Lewis: That's good.

Mr. Simmons: I know that the hon. members of the opposition do not like what we are saying.

Mr. Blaikie: No, we do not like the bill.

Mr. Simmons: They are afraid the truth will get through. They are afraid that the average home owner out there, the young Newfoundlander, will actually get the message—

Mr. Lewis: From you?

Mr. Simmons: —that this bill will help them if the opposition will ever let it get through. This bill will help them with interest deferral. This bill will help them with a grant.

Mr. Lalonde: They do not care.

Mr. Simmons: That is the kind of information, the kind of hard, cold fact that hon. members opposite find to be something funny in this proposal, who find something amusing in this obstruction—

Mr. Lewis: Just the speaker.

Mr. Simmons: —who find something humorous and exciting in being able to sit here in this House, paid by the Canadian taxpayers, and obstruct a program which will help those same taxpayers.

Mr. Lewis: I agree.

Mr. Simmons: I cannot follow that sense of humour. To me, it is kind of warped. I do not understand the rationale behind it. I do not believe the young home owners who are waiting for the benefits this bill will provide will understand the logic behind the wise-cracking and the smiles on the faces opposite.

• (1620)

Mr. Blaikie: Something you would never do.

Mr. Simmons: I do not take any comfort from or see any humour in the sad situation in which some of these home owners find themselves. I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) that we are doing something for them now, if you will let us get on with it. We will provide interest deferral for them. Are you against interest-deferral for the home owner?

Mr. Orlikow: Yes.

Mr. Simmons: Then have the courage to stand in your place and say it. Are you against the grant for the home owner? If so, tell that to your constituents. Do not hide behind the camera, get in front of it. Tell the people who sent you here what you are doing to the programs which could be of help to them. It is easy to shout your lungs out when you are hiding from the camera. Tell your constituents what you really think about this plan.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I call to the attention of the parliamentary secretary that his remarks should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. Simmons: I thought I was doing exactly that. I invite hon. gentlemen on Your Honour's left to level with their constituents and tell them that they do not want young home owners facing mortgage renewals to have access to grants or interest deferral.

Mr. Blenkarn: What grants?

Mr. Simmons: Read the bill.

Mr. Blaikie: The grant is to the bank.

Mr. Simmons: The grant is to individuals, up to $3,000.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: I know these hard facts come as cold comfort to people who want to undermine the program with all the red herrings which have been dragged into this debate. It is a good bill. This bill will alleviate some of the hardship that these young home owners I represent would otherwise face once we get it through, over the senseless, mindless obstruction of the opposition which is more interested in scoring points than representing the interests of their constituents.

Then there is the budget and the very real prospects for lower inflation. I invite members to look at the trend in recent months. The trend is that inflation is coming down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Simmons: That is another truth they do not want to hear. Inflation is coming down—

Mr. Lewis: Coming down hard on Canadians.

Mr. Simmons: I do not mind sending the figures to my good friend if he does not have them.

Mr. Lewis: Your figures.

Mr. Simmons: Not my figures, figures of independent analysts. Independent analyses in recent months show that the trend is downward. Let the hon. member deny that. These are truths which the opposition cannot stand to have voiced in this House. It punches holes in their theory that everything in this country is bad, that everything is going wrong. Well, some things are going right. Something that is going right is the inflation trend.

Mr. Lewis: Would you like an election?

Mr. Simmons: I will take the hon. member on in an election any day he is ready. Is my time up so soon, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, we have heard criticism levelled at the opposition today that we are mindless obstructionists, that we are filibustering this and other bills and that we are not co-operating with the government.

I would first like to point out that this is another closure debate. That is precisely what it is. Whether it is under Standing Order 75 or 33, it cuts off, or limits, debate. I would like to give a few figures from this session of Parliament to demonstrate that the opposition has taken its responsibility seriously. We have co-operated with the government when that co-operation was due.

In looking through the figures, I find that 84 bills have been given first, second and third reading in this single session of Parliament. In addition, 11 other bills have gone through first and second reading and some have gone as far as report stage. Others have been dealt with seriously in various committees.

The record shows that we on this side of the House have done our best to ensure that good legislation is passed when it is put forward by the government and passed as quickly as is reasonable and commensurate with a reasonable amount of debate on the subject.

I do not think on this or any other occasion in this session of Parliament have we acted irresponsibly or engaged in what members opposite so flippantly call filibusters. It is true on occasion Parliament has dug in its heels. For example, Bill C-48 would radically change the whole approach to oil and gas legislation in much of Canada. We did not like that. History will prove that was a bad law for Canada. In that instance we were fully justified in digging in our heels.

Had the government been prepared to show that it was willing to make some deals with regard to what other members in this House wanted and had it backed off a little, it would have had our co-operation on the oil and gas legislation, but that was not to be the case. The government wanted to ram it through at all costs.

Hon. members will notice that Standing Order 75C has been used in a number of instances, particularly on Bill C-48. Standing Order 33 has been used on a couple of occasions. I am becoming very concerned. In the past, closure was looked upon as something out of the ordinary. It only occurred when there was a real impasse. Governments were reluctant to use it. They respected the right of Members of Parliament to debate matters and hopefully arrive at sensible compromises. That is not the case with this government which uses closure as a matter of course. When the government now uses closure, members of this House and the public are not so abashed. It is like crying wolf. The first time a lot of people get upset and rush about. After it has been done 12, 13, 14 or 15 times, people get used to it. I am concerned that the people of Canada are becoming used to the government-imposed closure. I think that this continual use of closure constitutes an abuse of Parliament.

As Members of Parliament we have to consider what we should be doing. Surely it is our function to engage in public debate on the major issues of the day. We are paid to consider these problems and to pose possible solutions to them. We are paid to engage in debate so that Canadians can follow that debate and present their views through us on a particular subject. The issue today is housing and it is a matter of great concern throughout the country. I, as well as many other members I am sure, have received a considerable amount of mail on this subject, not to mention telephone calls.

Particular issues on housing may differ from one area of Canada to another, as was illustrated by the hon. member for Burin-St. George's (Mr. Simmons) who just spoke. He expressed his views on how this bill would solve housing problems in one area of Newfoundland. I am not familiar with that part of Newfoundland and this bill may, indeed, help that area. I doubt it, but I can tell him that it will not solve the fundamental housing problem in my part of Canada.

In my part of Canada we are faced with the high mortgage interest rates which are uniform across Canada, and in addition we are faced with extremely high utility expenses. For instance, the electrical bill for an average home in my town, not including electricity to heat the home but just for basic uses such as lighting, fridge and stove, is approximately $250 per month. During the cold winter months when you must pay $1.50 per gallon for heating oil, since there is no gas in my area, the heating bill for the average house is approximately $350 per month. When you add the utilities and the heating costs together, it comes to more than $700 per month. This expense when added to mortgage costs makes it especially difficult for people to own their homes.

I have found this debate on the housing question interesting and useful. I have learned a number of things. I have discovered that the general approach taken by the three parties in the House is quite different. The approach of the government is to do very little. It is apparently satisfied with those policies which are in place. It proposes only to make a few technical changes and a few minor amendments.

Mr. Cosgrove: With $350 million?

Mr. Nickerson: The approach of the government is to introduce camouflage amendments. It indicates that it will introduce programs to help certain groups of people, but only those at the very bottom of the heap will obtain any assistance at all and very few will be able to take advantage of them. It is providing a limited amount of money to them and only for certain purposes. I can understand why it is not allocating a great deal of money to housing because it has already brought a number of financial difficulties upon itself.

The philosophy of the New Democratic Party is to advocate the expenditure of billions of public dollars to solve the housing crisis. I presume that they envision people living in all kinds of government apartments. We have seen pictures like that in the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. They have some simplistic ideas which appeal to their simplistic minds, which includes reducing the rates of interest by fiat. They do not give any consideration to what the long term effects on inflation and the banking system in Canada might be.

We on this side have a mortgage interest and local tax deductibility scheme which I think is a very good one. It would be expensive because this year we would have given assistance to home owners in the amount of approximately $2.8 billion. But if hon. members had studied the Crosbie budget when it was introduced, they would find that we thought the matter through. We considered from where we would have derived these funds and in such a way that we could have reduced the federal deficit and therefore the rate of inflation, at the same time. I believe that if the Crosbie budget could have been put into effect and the election which was brought about by the Liberals and NDP in 1979 had not happened, the interest rate today would probably be about 4 per cent lower.

The main point I wish to make on this debate on closure is that I strongly take exception to the fact that the government uses closure as a matter of course. It will not allow policy and legislation to be developed in the House. Legislation has been developed within the public service, brought forward and Parliament is asked to rubber-stamp it. I, and I am sure all parliamentarians, do not want Parliament to become simply a rubber stamp.

[Translation]

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I do not really have the impression that hon. members have objectively examined the full meaning of the amendments to the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, as we have been told repeatedly over the past three weeks. This bill has several features designed not only to come to the rescue of Canadians who run the risk of losing their homes, but also to help Canadians who need rental accommodation or seek employment. It will also be a shot in the arm of the economic community.

Mr. Speaker, the comments we have been hearing in the past few weeks have a rather hollow ring. Members opposite say that we ought to be spending more money and get more involved. Those remarks come from a party which as recently as yesterday—and we have to include the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who spoke earlier—was openly urging that the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation be privatized; in other words, that it be run right into the ground. "Privatization"is the latest fad word. They keep saying that the private sector would manage to come out of it unscathed. Day in and day out we heard the same comments about Petro-Canada. Those words were uttered by that same group of members who now decry the limited scope of the amendments and argue that the government should pour more money into the programs envisaged under Bill C-89. Whatever happened to their sense of responsibility and their openmindedness?

An hon. Member: They never had any.

Mr. Cousineau: As my colleague is saying, they never had any, nor will they ever.

Mr. Speaker, dismissing for the moment the contradiction between privatizing the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and urging that additional funds be set aside for housing, I should like to put a precise question, namely, would the private sector have put up the direct subsidies which were offered by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation for social housing in 1980 and 1981? I am wondering if private industry, without government support, would have had sufficient financial resources to build, as proposed in our programs, an additional 15,000 units throughout Canada in areas where there are few or no vacant and available housing units.

I, for one, believe that one of the most significant aspects about which Parliament must now legislate has to do with the fact that, in our opinion, all sectors must get involved if we are to set the current situation on a more constructive course. It seems to us, Mr. Speaker, that our very first responsibility is to lend a hand to Canadian individuals and families that may be putting their house on the line because of the soaring interest rates they have to cope with when they renew their mortgage. Secondly, through the Canadian rental housing construction plan, the government calls upon private enterprise so that together we can face the challenge of providing rental accommodation in those regions where there is practically none. At the same time, we have proposed measures that will enable the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to operate more effectively, by giving greater flexibility to operations relating to the insurance regulations already provided under the act, measures which from now on will authorize the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to adjust premiums according to the risk involved.

This aspect of the amendments indicates once again that the government is very receptive to contributions from all sides and is in favour of team work. I wish I could say the same about the cooperation shown by some members of the opposition. Although we have observed that in some ways they are supportive of this important bill, it has now been three weeks since the bill was tabled in the House. They have wasted two weeks instead of acting right away to provide immediate assistance to Canadians across the country who need it most. We on the government side are convinced that it is very important Canadians should receive assistance through the Canada mortgage renewal plan, the Canada rental assistance plan and other amendments to the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, all of which will help the corporation to meet requests for assistance more positively and to operate more effectively on the market in question. Mr. Speaker, that is why we feel that we must get on with this business instead of wasting precious time on useless verbiage. It is time to act. Whatever our politics may be, to all Canadians who today are waiting for federal housing assistance, actions speak louder than words. So, let us stop this empty chatter, let us stop indulging in petty politics to make the leader opposite look good. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if this is not another string of filibusters! We on this side are prepared to act responsibly, and that is why we have invoked Standing Order 75C, to limit debate on Bill C-89.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Well, Mr. Speaker, here we go again. Any time the government senses that we in the official opposition are getting our message across to the public and any time it senses we are getting a little too close to the bone and exposing the weaknesses of its policies, zap! Down comes the guillotine. It is not unusual for this government, however, to cut off freedom of speech, freedom of expression and the right of individuals to express what they wish against government policies, whether inside or outside this Parliament.

This government seems to be gathering momentum these past 48 hours, and the cutting off of free speech has now become a rather ominous hallmark of this government. That applies to individual public servants who, in their free time, see fit to criticize government policies which deserve criticizing, and it certainly seems to apply to Members of Parliament who are duly elected to speak on behalf of their constituents and on behalf of the people of Canada in this Parliament. We can be cut off just as quickly.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Smith) attempts to split hairs and draw a distinction between Standing Order 33 and Standing Order 75C by suggesting there is a difference between time allocation and closure. With respect, Sir, the parliamentary secretary is a horse's foot if he thinks the public or we in the opposition are going to believe that. It is closure. Standing Order 75C or time allocation: closure is closure by any other name or any other number the government chooses to apply to it.

Closure has been used eight times—this will be the ninth—in the last year and a half. In July, 1980, closure was used on the pipeline debate for the summer recess. On December 4, 1981 closure was used at the third reading stage of Bill C-48, the Canada Oil and Gas Act. On June 8, 1981, closure was used at the third reading stage of Bill C-57, to amend the Excise Tax Act. On March 31, 1981, closure was used at the report stage of Bill C-59, borrowing authority. On February 12, 1981, closure was used at the second reading stage of Bill C-59, borrowing authority. On January 13, 1981, closure was used at the second reading stage of Bill C-48, the Canada Oil and Gas Act. On June 9, 1981, closure was used at the second reading stage of Bill C-30, borrowing authority. Today, February, 25, 1982, closure is being used at the second reading stage of Bill C-89, an extremely important piece of legislation.

When I first saw Parliament in action, it was engaged in an extremely emotional debate on closure arising from the pipeline debate of 1956. As I understood it, closure was only used when there was a flagrant abuse of the time of the House, and the onus was then on the government to prove, when it brought in closure, that there had been abuse of the time of the House. Nobody on the government side could possibly prove that there has been a flagrant abuse of the time of this House of Commons after five days of discussing one of the most critical issues facing Canada today and one of the most important pieces of legislation which has come before us, amendments to the National Housing Act.

There is absolutely no question that the subject uppermost in the minds of Canadians these days is housing. Uppermost in their minds as well are mortgage renewals. Not only are Canadians faced—indeed, crippled—with a housing crisis which has been exacerbated by high interest rates, but also know, because of my responsibilities as consumer and corporate affairs critic looking into the issue of hazardous products, about the nightmare people are facing in relation to urea formaldehyde foam insulation, a form of insulation which is hurting people. It is doing damage to people. This situation was manufactured by this government, encouraged by this government and promoted by this government. People were paid by this government to put UFFI into their homes. Then this government began to worry, temporarily banned and then permanently banned UFFI, and it is now doing its best to duck its ultimate responsibility for this monstrous blunder.

That is only one aspect of the terrible housing crisis facing the people of Canada. The plight of those victims must be addressed and, in light of the United States ban on UFFI this week, it becomes even more acute.

Let me get back to the procedural aspect of this and why we feel it is so important that we must have the maximum opportunity to discuss this housing legislation. The reason the government says it must bring down the guillotine and cut off debate is that this matter has to go to committee. The fact is that there are no other housing bills on the table. We want to discuss the entire housing situation, and the government is not yet ready for committee. It has not yet made witnesses ready, but the House of Commons has the attention of the nation as we discuss the critical housing situation before us.

The problem with committee is that once we get there we are frustrated to the extreme because bills of tremendous importance are automatically given "yeas" by the majority members of the parliamentary committee, according to the instructions given to them by their superiors. In my view, committees can be a sham under a majority Liberal government.

Then we come back after the committee to report stage and third and final reading here. As one hon. member said, once we get this bill through the committee and through third and final reading here—over the senseless, mindless opposition—then we can get on with the government's tinkering with the National Housing Act. Is it not too bad that there is an opposition here and that it is not just a one-party system in this country? That is the way these fellows would like to operate. It is too bad there is an opposition which can raise serious concerns on behalf of the people of Canada in terms of very meaningful and serious legislation and serious amendments we want to propose. They have their own internal operation. Anyone who thinks we can get fundamental amendments through committee, let alone through third reading stage, does not know how Parliament works under a majority Liberal government. When we reach the third reading stage then, of course, the government will probably bring in another closure motion.

The Liberal government may see fit to lower the boom on our ability to discuss this and other legislation. It can and will lower the boom in any way it sees fit; but I warn this government that the people of Canada will lower the boom on it in the interests of the preservation of free speech in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I want to recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), but I wonder if I might deal with the adjournment motion before he begins his remarks.

Mr. Blaikie: Agreed.

Time Allocation

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove:

That, in relation to Bill C-89, an act to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, one additional sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the second reading stage of the bill; and that 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on that day, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the said stage of the bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I will not have been a member of Parliament for three years until next May, but already I have lived through a number of debates about closure or time allocation. I want to preface my remarks today by saying that one might feel more well disposed to the need of the government for time allocation if one had the feeling that the issue of parliamentary reform had priority and was on the front burner rather than on the back burner of the government's schedule. I think all hon. members would acknowledge the need for some measure of improvement in the way we deal with matters in the House so that the opposition is not constantly put in the position of having to respond to moves like this by the government.

I think the real reason the government wants to put an end to debate on the measure to deal with the problem of people losing their homes as a result of its high interest policy is that it does not want to discuss the incredibly desperate situation that many Canadians find themselves in as a result of its policies in the public eye any longer.

My basic objection to the bill is, first of all, that it came before us so late. We heard in the throne speech in 1980, two years ago, that the Liberals were going to do something for people who were affected by high interest rates. Now we have the hypocrisy of the minister's blaming the delay on the opposition when we have only debated this bill for five days.

The reason for the motion is that the government does not want to hear about the plight of the Canadian people. I think it feels guilty about the abysmal inadequacy of the bill, which only postpones the day of reckoning for many people. Instead of doing something about high interest rates and the monopoly power of the banks over the Canadian economy, all it has done is to subsidize the banks. It has done nothing for the home owner who finds himself in a desperate situation.

The hon. member who just spoke mentioned the problems that some people have experienced with urea formaldehyde foam insulation. Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents is under attack by the government on three fronts. First of all, his mortgage is about to be renewed and, as a result, his payments will double. He is a young family man and that would be difficult enough, but his second problem, as a result of high interest rates and the downturn of the economy is that his employer, Canadian National Railways, has laid him off. CN says there has been a downturn in its revenues. Mr. Speaker, he has been laid off by a Crown corporation which made a profit last year and therefore should be employing more people. His third problem is that he has urea formaldehyde foam insulation in his house. He cannot renew his mortgage, he cannot sell his house and he cannot work. That is the situation in which this particular Canadian has been put by the government.

We are not just talking about some abstract economic instrument that in their wisdom the experts have been forced to use, when we talk about high interest rates, Mr. Speaker. We are talking about a basic decision that has been made by people. God only knows where. I cannot figure out where some of these decisions originate. Some people say they come from Washington, some say they come from the Trilateral Commission and some say they come from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), but I suspect he is but a little cog in a very big wheel. Wherever it was made, the decision was that the problems of the western industrialized economies would be fought on the backs of people who do not have the power to protect themselves against high interest rates. That is an immoral, political decision.

Much of the debate in this House ignores the reality that high interest rates are not something which in general cause the powerful to suffer; it is the people who cannot wait for the end of what may turn out to be a longer recession than the Minister of Finance has in mind who are hurt by the policies of the government, or by the acquiesence of the government to policies which are set somewhere else. In either case, the decision is shameful.

The problem of high interest rates points to one of the fundamental absurdities of our economic system. The people who always talk about productivity are the same people who are now putting all their money into non-productive places. They are productive places in so far as they make money, but not in so far as they build houses, create jobs and produce the necessities of life. I think interest rates are the best example of the absurdity of the present economic doctrine under which we live. I hope the people of Canada will take the opportunity presented by the high interest rate crisis to see how contradictory and inhuman the system is.

The Liberals want to bring this debate to an end so that there is no opportunity for reflection by the Canadian people, in so far as that can be stimulated by Members of Parliament speaking on their behalf. It is in the interests of the government to stifle that kind of reflection. Its back is to the wall and it does not know what to do. It has offered a pittance to people in dire straits. All it has done is to defer the evil day by refusing to face up to the basic economic problems in the Canadian economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Essex-Kent (Mr. Daudlin) but perhaps he may wish to call it five o'clock and be recognized at eight o'clock.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the hour I think it would be appropriate to call it five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers) and public bills.

There being no items on the Order Paper under the heading of private bills, the House will proceed to notices of motions (papers).

COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN CONCERNING RESIDENTIAL MORTGAGES AND HOME FORECLOSURES

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all communications during 1981 between the government and/or the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the government of the province of Saskatchewan dealing with residential mortgages and home foreclosures.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that we are able to debate this motion today in the middle of the ongoing debate on Bill C-89. It is particularly appropriate because it will give us the opportunity to discuss another aspect of housing—the difficulties created by the simple fact that the physical aspects of construction, in the literal sense, are a provincial responsibility. Provincial governments by their powers are able not only to intervene in the housing field, but they have a responsibility which is certainly not less than the responsibility of the federal government.

The motion refers specifically to correspondence between the federal government and the government of the province of Saskatchewan. When there is communication or correspondence, the normal procedure is for the federal government to request permission of the provincial government for the documents to be released. It is my understanding that this permission has been requested. It is possible in due course that the Saskatchewan government will give approval for the release of these documents. I take issue with the tendency of the two levels of government to communicate with each other in this fashion, because I believe all such communications should be open and available to the public so that the public at large can see precisely what each level of government is attempting to do, particularly in a field where there is some conflict of jurisdiction.

The Saskatchewan home owners protection act became law on December 11, 1981. It affords protection to home owners against loss of their principal residences from January 1, 1982, to December 31, 1982. Of course, this has concerned the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation because of its interest in mortgages which it insures and the possibility that there could be some additional costs incurred by the Crown corporation as a result of the provincial legislation. After some two months of operation two legal tests were conducted in Saskatchewan, and there was no clear impression left in anyone's mind as to exactly how it will operate for the rest of the year. Neither of the cases heard set any standard to determine who is to be protected under the law, and at the moment one of the two cases is under appeal. An application to foreclose on a couple who had not made payments on their mortgage since last August was made and dismissed by the court. The couple had declared bankruptcy last December, and the court in its judgment ruled that there was no basis upon which the action could proceed against them. Incidentally, there was considerable equity in the house despite the fact that the couple had declared bankruptcy.

Then in Saskatoon Justice J. H. Maher ruled that a Saskatoon resident must make mortgage payments at an increased interest rate despite pleas of financial hardship. Mr. Justice Maher said that the 17.5 per cent mortgage renewal offered was in line with prevailing rates. The old mortgage rate had been 11 per cent, so there was a substantial increase in the monthly payments. The result after some two months and two tests is that no one knows where we are going.

CMHC is concerned about insured loan arrears and claims on the mortgage insurance fund. The reason for this is that in the event of a claim under the mortgage loan insurance policy the corporation, under existing legislation, can only pay interest at the full mortgage rate for 12 months from the date interest is due, or accrued and unpaid, and mortgage interest less 2 per cent for a further six months. In other words, there is a total 18-month limitation on the liability of the corporation. As a result, CMHC communicated with its officers in the province of Saskatchewan that for any new loan commitment an NHA undertaking to insure will be conditional on the Saskatchewan home owners protection act having no effect whatever in the event of a claim under the insurance settlement provisions of the National Housing Act.

It is quite apparent that the influence of provinces on housing is considerable. I will go a step further and say that their effect has been detrimental to the interests of Canadian citizens. At the present time six of the ten provinces have rent control legislation. I understand why rent control legislation is in force and why there is pressure to maintain rent control legislation.

Nevertheless, let us look at the facts. At the moment in British Columbia there is a 10 per cent limit on rent increases; in Ontario, the figure is 6 per cent; in Nova Scotia, 4 per cent; in Prince Edward Island it varies between 4 per cent and 8 per cent. We have rent controls in Saskatchewan, and in all probability Manitoba, where there was a recent change in government, will also impose some form of rent control. The estimated gap between rents required to render rental construction viable and market rents is now between $120 and $200 per month per unit. As a result we have a very tight rental market at the present time. It has been suggested that if there is not some adjustment in rents in the very near future to make rental construction viable, the situation will become even more serious; in fact, somewhat disastrous.

The alternative is for governments—and I mean both federal and provincial governments—to enter into permanent and costly long-term support for the construction of rental housing, depending upon degree. Of course, we can bandy around various figures, but there is no doubt that we are talking about many billions of dollars.

It is unfortunate that some provinces, particularly the province of Quebec, do not take advantage of the programs which are presently available. I listened to the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) screaming earlier this afternoon. I think he should direct his attention to the provincial government in Quebec City which, because of its hatred of the federal system and its desire to dissociate itself in any form from the federal government, has not only failed to recognize the part the federal government has played but has refused to participate in programs which will be of direct assistance to the residents of that province.

I have looked at some figures concerning the assisted rental program. As I have put on the record previously, the program cost the federal treasury through CMHC some $186 million. Because some 80 per cent of that housing was in the province of Quebec, one can roughly calculate so far an involvement of about $150 million in rental housing in that province under ARP. That is not all by any means. That is only the up front moneys. The amount which is charged for the insurance of the mortgage under this program is 1 per cent and it has been estimated that the rate should be in the order of 8 per cent. This is also an indirect subsidy. I mention these figures because too often these days the government of the province of Quebec is choosing to ignore the part the federal government has played in trying to assist the citizens of Quebec.

I was particularly angry a couple of nights ago when a member of the Péquiste government said on the radio that the federal government is cutting the funds that were going into that province. I suspect that we are sometimes a little reluctant to talk about the moneys that go to the province of Quebec, but I want to put on the record that when that Péquiste member said the amount was being cut by some $600 million, I have no idea how he arrived at his figures but I suggest that he forgot that during this fiscal year—and I say during the fiscal year, not over the term of the whole year—the program of equalization of which the province of Quebec is a major participant saw the total funds from the federal treasury increased from $1.7 billion to $2.1 billion. Last spring the Péquiste government could have included in its budget the total of $1.7 billion. However, it is getting an additional $400 million this year. That is not talked about.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Begin) when talking about the Canada Assistance Plan mentioned the amount of the increase this year. Extrapolating the figures for the province of Quebec, although the precise totals are not yet ready, one can see that the province has received something in the order of $150 million more in fiscal year, 1981-1982, ending March 31. Just in those two programs alone there is $550 million of extra moneys which the province of Quebec could not have counted upon last spring.

Let us look at federal programs that have been offered to all provinces, of which the majority of provinces make use and which the province of Quebec chooses to ignore. First, the rural and native housing program. The new housing component is cost shared. Quebec refuses to sign the agreement. The result is that no affordable housing is being built under the rural and native housing program. Quebec is prepared to borrow money from the federal treasury. In fact, that province will take all the money it can get but it will not sign ownership agreements. I suppose one can acknowledge that is the province's right, but I want everyone to realize that this lack of co-operation between the government of the province of Quebec and the federal government is very costly to the citizens of Quebec.

Second is the non-profit and co-operative housing. This program does not reach the lower income band, again because of lack of Quebec participation. The federal government provides subsidies. Quebec could provide an equivalent subsidy, but it chooses not to. Once again the opportunity is not used. Therefore, we have this continuing conflict between the two levels of government. I suppose one can say that is its provincial right. I will accept that, but I do not want that same government that chooses not to co-operate to return and complain. The opportunity is there. It has made no alternative suggestions except to turn over the funding.

When we challenge the government of the province of Quebec as to whether it will take the funding, it expresses some reluctance. The reason is obvious. If the government of the province of Quebec chooses to take tax points instead of cash from the federal treasury, it will lose several hundred million dollars. The reason is very simple. The tax base in the province of Quebec is steadily declining and deteriorating as people have moved out. For example, retired people with high incomes have decided to move elsewhere to get the benefit of lower tax rates. No longer does the Quebec government have the choice that it used to talk about for years of taking its own tax points. I challenge my provincial colleagues in Quebec and I challenge the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle) to acknowledge the fact that the province of Quebec has had quite a good deal from the federal government. Furthermore, not only has it had a good deal, but it had been offered a lot better deal which it turned down.

In the motion such as the one I have proposed this afternoon for the production of documents—and I have proposed several in this House—the intent on my part is to underline that a great many more documents not marked secret or confidential should be in the public domain. They should be accessible not just to members of Parliament but to the public at large.

We are hearing a lot of discussion these days about the freedom of information bill. I am not particularly interested in this bill myself. I do not even know what we are expecting to produce that we are not presently getting. What I am talking about are documents that are in no sense secret documents, or confidential documents, but documents which are necessary, in my opinion, so that the public can better understand what the federal government is doing in its various programs and what agreements the federal government is making with the provincial governments.

Just last week I spoke of the Canada Assistance Plan. Its guidelines were established by the federal government but they were not published. I suggest that the federal government should sincerely look at opening up a public perusal of all of these guidelines and communications between the federal and provincial governments, and in cases where the provincial government refuses to make such documents public, to acknowledge that fact and to tell the public that it is not the federal government but the provincial government that is refusing to disclose. There may be good reasons and they can be made public, but the purpose of this motion is to underline the fact that too many documents at the present time that have absolutely no reason whatever for being kept under wraps should be made available upon demand through Members of Parliament to the public at large.

That is the reason I have brought forward this motion for discussion today. Also, it enables me to discuss once again in some measure the problem of division of jurisdiction between the two levels of government, the provincial government which is essentially responsible for the physical construction aspects and the federal government which tends to do its part through its fiscal powers.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, the motion presented to the House by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) gives us the opportunity to consider the role of Canada Mortage and Housing Corporation in relation to two very important matters, matters of great concern to the people of Canada today, namely, the residential mortgage and the interest rate thereon, and the number of home foreclosures occurring across this country arising from the inability of home owners to meet the interest rates being imposed upon them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have to consider a very basic fact and principle of Canadian life: family security is often related to the ability of that family to provide adequate housing. There are other essentials of life, of course, including food, clothing and education. However, if a family unit cannot properly house itself, then it is bound to experience difficulties.

Home ownership has always been the dream of Canadians. That was my party's view when we proposed a program to assist Canadians in providing for home ownership for their families. That program involved mortgage interest and property tax deductibility for home owners. Mr. Speaker, the government of today opposed that program when it was presented in this House and as a result the principle of assistance to home owners was defeated. We are paying the price for that opposition today because there are thousands of Canadians across the country faced with the problem of extraordinarily high levels of mortgage interest.

Today the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) revels in the fact that mortgage interest rates have declined over the past few months, although they are still at a level of 18 per cent or 19 per cent. There are many Canadians who, because of the kind of homes they have or must purchase, are not able to negotiate a mortgage at that rate and are forced to pay much higher rates.

Now, Mr. Speaker, relating that situation to the problem of foreclosure—the ultimate sanction against a home owner unable to meet mortgage payments—we have to consider not only the immediate and practical consequences, but the social consequences which flow from the loss of a home. It is not only demeaning to the family, but it creates greater problems which must be resolved by government through social service programs. The family placed on the street without funds must apply to a municipal or provincial welfare agency to obtain housing, and that quite often involves public expense. This means it is possible to make a case for very substantial government involvement in the residential mortgage field by way of direct and indirect assistance. As I indicated, our party attempted to do that, but having failed in that endeavour we must now look at what kind of assistance we can provide in today's circumstances.

This debate is very timely, Mr. Speaker, because Bill C-89 purports to deal with, in part, the housing problem and the problem of those unable to meet their mortgage payments. The bill, Mr. Speaker, is a paltry measure when compared with the plight home owners find themselves in. Even so, Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for housing rose in the House today to direct that debate be halted on this measure. He wants to remove from parliamentarians the opportunity to address the difficulties which arise because of high mortgage interest rates. He wants to stop discussions which might produce more effective and generous measures to assist home owners. That is not only a blow to the parliamentary system, it is a tremendous blow to those Canadians who look to the federal government for assistance with this very special problem.

Now, why do they have that problem, Mr. Speaker? It is because over the last ten years the government has spent the public's money in a wasteful manner, which has led to a situation where the internal and external value of our dollar has dropped. As a result, in order to provide any return to investors, interest rates have increased so substantially that they affect the ability of Canadians to provide themselves with housing.

There is more to the case to be made for governmental assistance to home owners. There are reports in the press every day that the housing construction industry has slumped to the point where it is becoming a national problem. Many jobs have been lost in the residential construction sector. Contractors across the country are going bankrupt. Demand for homes has decreased to the point where there is very little construction going on. To the extent there is a need for housing and there are people who can afford to purchase at today's rates, we have a situation where the builders simply cannot get an appropriate return for their efforts. As a result, they withdraw from the housing construction field. So not only do we have a problem of people losing their homes due to high interest rates; it also has a very dramatic effect on the entire construction industry, particularly the home construction sector.

What does the minister responsible for housing propose? In regard to the resulting unemployment, he proposes a very minor program which will provide $7,500 for rental unit construction. He proposes assistance only for those in absolute dire straits, which assistance to that very limited group will only help them over a very short period of time and only on the basis of a loan or recoverable assistance. Mr. Speaker, the situation calls for much more dramatic action. It requires very special aid. Canadians who can renegotiate a mortgage in the $50,000 range—not a great deal when you consider that hardly anywhere can you buy a home for less than $70,000—will find their monthly payments increasing by almost $300 a month. Yet their salaries have not increased at the same rate and they do not have the ability to meet the increase.

What happens then, Mr. Speaker? That brings us to the issue of foreclosure. What, in specific terms, is foreclosure? Well, the home owner who can no longer carry his mortgage payments is faced with a legal process whereby the family home is sold to recover the debt represented by the mortgage. In very few cases is there anything left over for the home owner. Foreclosure is usually triggered by a situation where the mortgage debt is at least as great as, or greater than, the value of the home. So the result is that the home owner, after paying the mortgage and municipal taxes for years and after having made improvements to the home, is left with absolutely nothing. We must, therefore, recognize that foreclosure is one of the most cruel forms of legal action that can be taken. In 90 per cent, if not all, of these cases, the home owner is left with nothing. In addition, he has to seek housing in some other area which may well cost just as much in terms of total monthly expenses.

In most cases the housing, which is the subject of foreclosure action, is only adequate for the needs of the family involved. They will face the same problem that existed before the foreclosure action occurred; that is, the provision of adequate housing, and it will face the same mortgage payments which, as has already been established, it could not meet before. My point is that this becomes a problem for government; it becomes a social welfare problem, and at that point, the government does step in.

What I am asking, and what I hope all hon. members will ask, is that the government take preventive action by providing assistance which will be operative before the home owners reach the point where they lose their homes through foreclosure action. If we are going to provide assistance, let us not wait until the damage is done and the homes are lost. Let us provide assistance at the time when the home owners can do something to maintain themselves and their families in their homes.

That kind of assistance has to be much greater and broader than the assistance the minister responsible for housing proposes in the bill now before the House. That is why hon. members in this party and on this side of the House have urged the minister, time and time again, to broaden the base of the assistance and to make it more substantial. That is why we would not be doing our duty to our constituents and to Canadians in general, if we did not stand up in this House at every opportunity and indicate to the minister that his program is not sufficient, that it will not solve the problem, and that greater action is required.

There certainly are many who say that interest rates ought not to be subsidized, as that just puts off a resolution to the problem. We have heard from the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), time and time again, that there must be a long-term solution to the problem, that we have to suffer through this difficult period so that the economy will recover and interest rates will decrease later on in the normal course of economic events.

However, we are playing with people's lives. We are speaking about Canadians, about individuals who live in homes, who want to maintain their families and who want to look forward to the future with some hope and some confidence. It is not just an economic matter, a matter of simply adding up figures and balancing payments in books, and so on. We are dealing with people, and we have to recognize that. That is why drastic situations require drastic action.

Therefore, I would say to anyone who dares to suggest that the situation is not so difficult or that we do not need to take this very specific kind of action, that person should cross the country and speak to the people who are in the situation of not being able to meet the mortgage payments being demanded of them. Talk to them and consider their problems. I am sure that any Member of Parliament or any Canadian who did that would change his or her mind concerning the matter of assistance for those home owners who find they cannot meet the financial obligations imposed upon them.

The instrument through which we have to effect housing policies nationally is the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. That is why it is so important that this motion be considered by hon. members of the House. It points the finger at Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and really, in effect, asks the question, "What is going on with that government agency in relation to residential mortgages and foreclosures?"

As I look at the newspapers of my own city of Halifax, as well as those of Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto, I note that most of the foreclosure actions in Canada are instituted by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. There is a reason for that. It is that the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation tends to overlend on homes; that is to say, the amount of money it provides in mortgage funds is sometimes almost as great as the market value of the homes. In many cases, it is even greater. The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has created a situation in which a home owner does not have any real equity in his property. He has simply made payments by way of rent over a period of years, and even though he thought he was in an ownership position, in actual fact he is merely a renter because Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has simply used his down payment, perhaps his effort in improving the house, and the money he has expended for public utilities and other services necessary, to maintain that home over the years. As a result, after as many as five or ten years, that home owner is left with nothing.

The point I am trying to make is simply that Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation creates situations by its policies which it then seeks to remedy by drastic legal action. The government should simply admit that the whole purpose of the program was to provide subsidized housing to the individual. In other words, to those who say that we ought not to provide subsidization for home ownership in Canada, I say we are already doing it, and we have been doing it for years. We have tried to mask it, refer to it by another name and pretend it is not subsidization.

We have tried to pretend, for example, with the Assisted Home Ownership Program, AHOP, that there is an actual sale of a house for the value of that house. That is not true at all. There have been no real sales. That is why many AHOP owners find that they lose their subsidy, five years down the road, when they cannot meet current interest rates and are simply not able to carry on.

The point is that the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation created that situation. The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation ought not to be allowed to simply withdraw and say it is dealing with these matters as business transactions, and if one cannot make one's payment, it will take foreclosure proceedings. This means that the owner will lose the home on which he has been paying for the past five years or more.

Some people want to deny assistance to home owners in Canada because they characterize home owners as rich people who do not require assistance, as the Minister of Finance did, in the 1980 election campaign when he was an hon. member of the opposition. The minister said that home owners were rich people who did not require assistance, and that government resources should be used in other ways to provide help to persons who rent their housing facilities, and to provide assistance to senior citizens, but not to provide assistance to rich home owners in Canada. That was simply not true. It was a myth, which the present Minister of Finance created; that there was this group of rich home owners in Canada who did not require assistance. We are seeing the realities of the situation today. We are seeing home owners who cannot maintain their mortgage payments and, as I have indicated, the result is foreclosure. They are on the street, and they become public charges. One simply spends the same dollar bills through the social assistance program instead of through an adequate housing program.

The whole point of my remarks is simply that one cannot escape problems by pretending to resolve them. One cannot nationalize poverty. One must deal with the economic facts as they exist across Canada. One of the economic facts of today is that home owners, in so many cases, cannot afford higher rates of interest. They cannot come up with the dollars they need to make the monthly payments required of them. If they are not given appropriate and proper assistance, the whole situation will simply collapse. Foreclosure will result, and these people will be out on the street. Then the government will have to deal with that social problem at the municipal, provincial and federal levels.

I hope the important message of my remarks and the motion which the hon. member has brought before the House is understood. Let us get the facts. Let us find out what is happening with mortgage interest rates. Let us find out what is happening with foreclosure actions. Let us find out what the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is doing. Let us assess the situation in light of those facts. If we make a fair assessment, I think we will very quickly come to the conclusion that very definite action must be taken by government, and that the action which has been taken by the minister responsible for housing, represented by the bill now before the House, is simply inadequate. It will not solve the problem. In fact, it may even exacerbate it because it will simply keep alive, for just a few months or a few years, those people who will have to face the realities of their situation somewhere down the road. All we are doing is patching the problem. This is not even band-aid treatment. We are not dealing with the issue, we are just avoiding it.

Therefore, I support the hon. member in attempting to obtain the kind of information which will allow for a fair and proper assessment of the housing situation in Canada, of the role of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and of the dire effects of foreclosure actions, because if we get those facts examined and assess them, I think we will then conclude that drastic measures are required. I think we will then be able to join together and devise those measures which will relieve the situation and resolve the problem for the benefit of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1740)

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is always a great pleasure to rise and speak in the House when you are in the chair. The debate concerns Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. 84 in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). It relates to communications during 1981 between the Government of Canada and/or Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the government of the province of Saskatchewan dealing with residential mortgages and home foreclosures.

I support the hon. member in his motion. However, he is putting up somewhat of a smoke screen to bootleg a speech into the House of Commons. I do not know what communication there was from the federal government to the province of Saskatchewan. I know there were two very important communications from the Saskatchewan government to the government of Canada concerning high interest rates and the disastrous effect this high interest rate policy is having on many people in this country. The province of Saskatchewan was not willing to stand by and see people in that province lose their homes through no fault of their own. We face the same possibility of lost homes and farms that existed in the thirties as a result of the insane monetary and high interest rate policies of the federal government.

On September 23, 1981, a letter was written by the Saskatchewan urban affairs minister, the hon. Walter Smishek to the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Two main principles were put forward in that letter. First, the Saskatchewan government pleaded with the federal government to establish a fixed interest rate for residential mortgages not to exceed 12 per cent. Second, it would require the lending institutions to allocate a specific percentage of their lending portfolios for residential mortgages to ensure an adequate supply of mortgage funds.

I am not sure what the response of the federal government was, but it was not very receptive to that kind of suggestion. There have been many debates in the House of Commons since September 23, concerning the high interest rate policy. We have heard about record numbers of foreclosures and people in fear of losing their homes. Others fear losing their livestock, crops and farms, because they cannot meet the unacceptably high interest and high mortgage interest rates they face. It does not make for very good planning to have a volatile interest rate situation which fluctuates every week. People do not know what the rate is going to be.

The second communication from the province of Saskatchewan dealt with the home owners protection act. In early December the province of Saskatchewan decided it could not stand by and allow anyone in that province to lose a residence because of high interest rates. The residences of these people in rural or urban areas were acquired after many, many years of investment. They had no control over future high interest rates and possibly not much control over their incomes. Therefore, the government would not stand by and see these people lose their homes. Even if one person was kept from losing his home, the legislation put through the Saskatchewan legislature was worthwile.

The application of that act passed by the legislature of Saskatchewan applies to the principal residence of the home owner. That principal residence is defined as the dwelling place of the home owner and any adjoining lands, not exceeding 65 hectares, owned by the home owner. It also applies to a trailer or condominium unit. A home owner can have only one principal residence.

That act does three very specific things. First, it stays all action for foreclosure or cancellation of agreements for sale for the period December 31, 1981 to December 31, 1982. It prohibits the commencement of an action for foreclosure or cancellation of an agreement for sale during that same period of time. Third, it extends the period for redemption of a mortgage before final foreclosure to January 1, 1983.

The act also has provision for appeals to be made to an advisory board. The Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council has the power to appoint an advisory board consisting of representatives of financial institutions and the public. The advisory board is to advise the public if there are certain exemptions that can be made under the act in cases where there may be unforeseen circumstances.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil stated there had been two test cases in the Saskatchewan courts. That is true. However, the hon. member did not point out the results of those test cases. He stated they had decided nothing to this point in time. I differ with him in that opinion.

There may have been more than two tests cases, but I am aware of two. The first case upheld the act that had been passed. A couple had gone to court stating they could not afford the exhorbitant increase in their payments because of the high interest rates. The rate was jumping from moderate to very high. Their income had not kept pace with the increased mortgage payments they were facing. The court ruled in favour of that couple. It was found that they could not afford the new mortgage payments. Had it not been for the home owners protection act in Saskatchewan, that young couple would likely have lost their home, through no fault of their own, but because of the high interest rate policy of this government.

The second case was different. It dealt with a couple who said they could not afford their mortgage. During the court proceedings it was determined that their income had risen proportionately to the increase in their mortgage payment. The couple had told the court they did not want to pay the huge increase, that they wanted a ruling in their favour and relief from having to pay those mortgage payments for a year. The court ruled against them. It found their income had gone up a significant amount, at least enough to keep pace with the high interest rates. That couple was more fortunate than some. They had extra income and were not really faced with losing their home.

The government of Saskatchewan did not intend to give relief to just anyone who did not want to pay more money. The relief is for those who desperately need it because they will lose their homes, and have no real control over the situation.

The test cases are very relevant in this situation. They set a good tone for the legislation I would encourage other provincial legislatures to adopt in order to deal with the situation until the economy is under control. This is a federal responsibility with which many provinces are having a difficult time coping.

The province of Saskatchewan is more fortunate than some others. My riding is in that province. Despite my relatively young age, I remember when that province was a have-not province. It was always drawing money from the equalization pie. That is why Premier Blakeney and his cabinet ministers agree with equalization, even though Saskatchewan is no longer a have-not province. It is a have province in terms that it contributes to the equalization pot.

We think that Canadians, no matter where they live, should have equal access to the essentials of life, such as shelter, medical care and a reasonable level of education. The province of Saskatchewan has acted very responsibly. It is limited in what it can do, faced with a national economic crisis and high interest rates. It has acted within its existing powers. It first pleaded with the federal government to take some action. I have outlined and quoted what those two points were in the letter of September 23 from the Saskatchewan minister of urban affairs to the minister in charge of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

We have been able to establish some other housing programs in Saskatchewan as well. Some of the poorer provinces have been able to participate in these kinds of programs. For instance, we have the co-op and the farm housing programs which are totally funded by the province. Under this co-op housing program I believe there were 400 units built in the province of Saskatchewan in 1981. Under the farm housing program there were some 350 units built. This totalled approximately 750 units built in 1981 under programs totally funded by Saskatchewan.

Interest rates are also locked in under these programs. They are subsidized by the provincial government to some extent, with locked in interest rates of 16 per cent. There is no rollover for a ten year period. In addition, the amortization period is 25 to 30 years. This provides people with some consistency in their future when paying for their homes. They know what their payments will be for ten years. This will make it much easier for young families or retiring couples to buy a homes. They know they will be paying 16 per cent interest for ten years. They will know how much they will be paying in principal for their homes. The tax may fluctuate somewhat, which may change their payments marginally, but there is greater consistency than there is for any other Canadian who has to go to a lending institution to borrow at our current high interest rates.

With respect to the co-op housing building program and the farm housing building program, people find it quite easy to get into those programs if they are organized. Saskatchewan has quite a co-operative spirit and people are able to enter these housing programs with a very small initial cash outlay. In order to enter these programs a 5 per cent equity must be put up. This equity can also be provided as "sweat equity". This means that the husband or wife, whoever is buying the home, does a substantial portion of the work. It could be in the form of digging the foundation, installing siding, shingling, etc. This would give them their equity in the home.

The figures which I will now cite do not apply to the whole province of Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan is divided into two different areas; the northern administration district and the southern half. Much of my constituency lies within the northern administration district. The reason for those two separate areas is that in Saskatchewan, as in all provinces, the northern area of the province has been the last to be developed. There were many resources coming out of northern Saskatchewan and we did not want inequities in lifestyle as between the north, which was paying its fair share through resource revenue, and the south, which had the bulk of the population who paid taxes and voted.

These figures are for the southern half of the province. In the early 1970s the department of northern Saskatchewan was formed to give a single agency approach to the development of northern Saskatchewan. The figures I have for the joint housing programs between Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Saskatchewan Housing Corporation in 1981 show, I believe, that there were 1,237 rental units built under public and non-profit housing, and approximately 142 housing units built for ownership under the rural and native housing program. That is a total of 1,379 houses which were built jointly between CMHC and the province of Saskatchewan through the Saskatchewan Housing Corporation.

The participation of CMHC is appreciated by the province and many of our communities which participated in those programs. Many senior citizens groups are very active in obtaining non-profit or co-op housing so they can remain together in their homes in the small rural communities of Saskatchewan. We do appreciate this.

However, there are some problems which arise from time to time. For example, in some cases CMHC has not released mortgages to people who have purchased houses through the rural and native housing program for a period in excess of five years. These people have been paying their mortgages through the rural and native housing program for five years and they do not know when they will get the mortgages into their own hands. Originally, there was a requirement that an individual or a family would have to live in the housing unit for a five year period before they could resell it. This was to prevent people from moving into the housing units for speculation purposes. The municipal, provincial and federal governments wanted to ensure that when those units were built there would be a definite need satisfied. That was the reason for the five year resale clause.

Many of these people, some of whom are in my constituency—and I have written to the minister about this problem—have paid for five years without any certainty as to what will happen with their housing unit, because CMHC will not agree on a price which should be charged for the units. What has happened in some areas is that CMHC wanted the specific cost of a housing unit to be applied to whoever was purchasing that unit, even though ten units may have been constructed in one area ranging in price from $45,000 to $75,000. Due to construction problems which varied the cost of those units CMHC wanted to tack those costs of a specific unit onto the unit itself. The Saskatchwan Housing Corporation disagreed with that, because the houses are comparable in terms of quality, style and size. Therefore, the Saskatchewan Housing Corporation wanted to take the total cost of those ten housing units built in one area, lump it together and divide by the number of housing units. For example, if the total project cost $500,000 and there were ten housing units, each of those units would cost the purchaser $50,000. That seems to me to be a fair and equitable manner in which to proceed. Why should one family pay $50,000 or $45,000 for a unit, and another family which is moving into a comparable unit pay $75,000?

I would ask the hon. member for Vaudreuil, if, by asking for the production of these papers he is really showing an interest in the problem of interest rates and housing, that he ask the minister in charge of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to move very rapidly to settle with these home owners who have been paying for such a long period of time and do not yet have the mortgages and do not know what will be the future status of their houses.

In closing I would like to say that the government of Saskatchewan, during the year 1981, was not willing to stand idly by and see home owners and farmers possibly lose their principal residences because of circumstances beyond their control; the interest rate and economic policy of the government. The Saskatchewan government acted by first requesting the federal government to knock the interest rates down and ensure that financial institutions set aside part of their portfolios, and second, by introducing and passing the home owner protection act so that people in Saskatchewan could feel secure in owning their homes. Thank you.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove:

That, in relation to Bill C-89, an act to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, one additional sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the second reading stage of the bill; and that 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on that day, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the said stage of the bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock the hon. member for Essex-Kent (Mr. Daudlin) had been given the floor.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I thank my friends opposite for waiting so patiently to hear me. I hope they will not only enjoy my speech but also gain a little from being patient enough to wait for my speech.

The second last speaker before private members' hour was the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott). Once again we were treated to an opposition speech which attempted to draw no distinction between Standing Order 75C and Standing Order 33. The hon. member once again attempted to demonstrate that there is absolutely no difference between closure and time allocation. If that distinction cannot be perceived by hon. members opposite, I fear little goes on in this House that is understood by them. I hope the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth will eventually avail himself of the opportunity of at least reading the rules in order to see the difference.

Innumerable constituents have been coming to my office seeking the assistance that is being held up by the fact that this bill is not going through. As do hon. members opposite, I have constituents who have difficulty with their mortgages and renewals of their mortgages. I trust most hon. members in the House, have suggested to them that there is a plan, that something was put together and that it was presented in the budget. I, and I hope hon. members opposite, have suggested to those people who are in difficulty that they should be going to lending institutions—banks and mortgage companies—asking whether they meet the criteria of the program, and that they should be getting ready by making application.

Having done that, those poor people are now coming back to my office and saying that they were told by the managers of those companies that we in Parliament are not allowing the bill to pass, and not allowing them access to the program. Until we pass the bill, people will not get the help promised them. They do not think that is fair. You are a fair man, Mr. Speaker. I ask you, who has been resisting this bill? Who has been holding it up? The minister has cried across the aisle, "Let it go through", but who said no? The cry of "Hold it up" has come from hon. members to your left. We do not think this is right. Again we hear too little and too late.

I have tried to go through the reported speeches of hon. members opposite and I have tried to listen to them today. When they get up to speak they immediately start crying that we want to cut off debate. I ask them tonight, Mr. Speaker, how many of them who claim that they did not have time to put forward their arguments have used the few minutes that are afforded us to make suggestions that would improve the bill? Have they tried to do that? They could not do a thing like that. They would not put those arguments forward.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On this side we are under the impression that the debate is on the motion under Standing Order 75C proposing closure. If that is the point, then I wish the hon. member would address himself to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There has been a certain difficulty in enforcing relevance in this debate. However, I have no doubt that the hon. member's remarks will be observed by the hon. member for Essex-Kent (Mr. Daudlin).

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to consider the relevance of the remarks of his colleagues to the motion under Standing Order 75C, to which he wishes me to restrict my remarks. The House permits a rather wide ranging debate on issues. A Speaker such as yourself, a man who is reasonable, who is able to understand the issues before us, a man who is prepared to allow a certain amount of debate to take place, might have thought there would have been—and I almost hesitate to use the term—a bit of bootlegging of good ideas if the ladies and gentlemen opposite had brought them forward. I am sure that as a reasonable man you would not have stopped them if they had offered some. I am sure there is not a man on this side of the House who would have said to you, "Don't allow this to happen." I am sure the minister would have been happy to hear a good idea from that side, but we have listened and we have not heard one.

I have told you, Mr. Speaker, that there are people in my riding who want this bill to come forward. They are waiting and their patience has worn thin; their bankers are waiting and their patience has worn thin as well. On almost every bill that has come before the House hon. members opposite have devoted their remarks to the need for jobs in this country. "What are you doing about jobs?" they ask every minister. Mr. Speaker, what we are doing about jobs is attempting to put a bill through this House which would create at a minimum—a small "C" conservative minimum—15,000 jobs and the ripple effect could double that number to 30,000 jobs. We could be looking at 60,000 or 70,000 jobs, Mr. Speaker. But even with five days of debate the bill has not been permitted to go through.

How could a person with any heart at all believe that hon. members oposite are speaking on behalf of their constituents, for whom they allege they bleed, when they do not permit bills to go through which would help to solve the problem they say they are trying to cure? They resist; they say it is wrong but do they try to improve the bill? No, they do not. Do they suggest there is a better idea that someone may have overlooked? Not at all, Mr. Speaker. One becomes a little concerned about what is motivating them but I suppose I am not allowed to reflect upon that. Why would people who want jobs generated resist this bill? That is incomprehensible to me, Mr. Speaker.

If this was the only thing the government was doing about housing, and if one wanted to stop this in an effort to highlight the fact that it is the only thing, then perhaps one could say there is reason for their actions. My constituents wonder, and you must wonder, Mr. Speaker, how the Mother of Parliaments can deal with issues that are of great moment with one or two days of debate, yet this House is not able to deal with a bill of relative simplicity in five days of debate.

An hon. Member: It is a worthless bill.

Mr. Daudlin: They say it is a worthless bill but do they improve it? Let us get it to committee. They claim this place has no meaning, that it is losing relevance. Let us get the bill to committee and exercise the rights we have as Members of Parliament to try to improve the bill. Instead, they try to stop it from going through.

An hon. Member: Time!

Mr. Daudlin: The hon. member calls time. If he looks at the clock he will see what time it is; the small hand and the big hand show the time. I know you are watching the clock, Mr. Speaker, and it is unfortunate that—

Mr. Taylor: You have already had ten minutes.

Mr. Daudlin: I will do the hon. member the courtesy of listening to him when it is necessary and when it is time. I see you are about to rise, Mr. Speaker. If I have used my time—

Mr. Taylor: You are stealing more time.

Mr. Daudlin: The people in this country want this bill. Job opportunities are being lost, housing is being stopped and it is time the bill was passed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the hon. member for Essex-Kent (Mr. Daudlin) has the gall to waste the time of the House on the closure motion proposed under Standing Order 75C. Earlier today the minister told the House he was in a hurry to get the bill through, and he referred to the fact that it had been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. That was almost two years ago, so what is the hurry now? The problem of housing was also discussed in the budget of November 12, 1981, so the government could have presented the bill earlier; it did not. Now the minister tells us that it is a major bill and he would like to see it passed as quickly as possible.

The bill proposes the expenditure of $350 million over two years. When one looks at the other spending increases proposed by the government one has to wonder about its priorities. Does the minister feel good about the government spending $47 million on a monument in Algeria? Does he feel good about the $24 million wasted in Haiti? Does he approve of the $200 million that may be spent on two airports in Trinidad and Tobago? Does he care about the $100 million loss by Eldorado Nuclear? Does he care about the $2 billion additional revenue needed for the national debt? Apparently he does not care, yet he has the gall to tell us that this bill which involves $350 million is a major piece of legislation.

One would like to ask the minister about the fisheries industry Mr. Speaker. Nothing is being done for the fisheries on the east and the west coasts. What about the forestry industry? Nothing is being done for it. But the minister tells us he is in a hurry to get this bill through and that we must limit debate. For three months he did nothing about it. There is 50 per cent unemployment in the forestry industry. A year from now the government may get around to presenting a bill to help that industry. What about the oil industry? Two more companies have dropped out of the oil sands project. Almost two years ago we told cabinet that the national energy policy would ruin the oil industry. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) is a member of the cabinet which approved the national energy policy. How can we trust the government? The minister asked why we were holding it up. We are not holding it up; we think the bill stinks.

Mr. Paproski: That is pretty plain language.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker, that is as plain as I can make it. The fact of the matter is that the bill does nothing. It does not solve the problem. The minister should be ashamed to rise in the House and tell us that we should limit debate on such a ridiculous bill.

When we consider some of the things the government is not doing, we wonder whether cabinet ministers really know what they are doing. The bill which the government wants us to pass will help build 15,000 units over the next two years, when at least 100,000 are needed. How much will the $7,500 subsidy for each unit help the people who really need help? Will it help people in lower income brackets? Of course it will not. It will help people who are prepared to pay maximum rents of $800 and more per month, and the minister knows it. The bill will not help people with small incomes. The minister told us it will help the 1.2 million people who will be renewing their mortgages over the next two years. He estimated that it will provide grants for up to 12,000 households and loan guarantees for another 37,000, or perhaps up to 50,000, when a good portion of the 1.2 million people will be having trouble renegotiating their mortgages over the next two years. The government refuses to deal with the real problem of bringing down interest rates to a level which people can afford. It simply skirts the problem. The government understands the symptoms, and Bill C-89 is a symptom of the problem of high interest rates.

Mr. Evans: Give us your answer.

Mr. Wright: If the parliamentary secretary had been in the House the night of the borrowing bill, he would have heard the answer. I recommend that he read Hansard of February 16.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have very much time to speak, but I will try to say what I want to say as fast as I can. The initiatives of the federal government in housing represent a good start, but they need expansion. The $350 million is simply not enough.

I should like to look at conditions as they were in November, 1975, and compare them with those of November, 1981, so that we will have the benefit of knowing the inflation rates and the parameters within which we had to deal. The inflation rate in 1975 was 10.8 per cent and the unemployment rate was 6.9 per cent; there were 690,000 people unemployed, and the federal debt was $59 billion. In 1981 the inflation rate rose to 12.5 per cent, the unemployment rate was 7.6 per cent, or almost 900,000 unemployed people, and the debt was approximately $137 billion.

In November, 1975, the then minister of housing, the Hon. Barney Danson called together provincial ministers of housing and laid out a remarkable program which read:

> The program which I am going to announce in the House of Commons this afternoon is going to help fulfil the objective, which we all share, of ensuring that all Canadians are well housed. At the same time, it will help dampen inflation in the housing sector and stimulate economic growth and employment.
> With regard to the problem of supplying enough moderately-priced housing, the federal government is making a commitment to one million housing starts over the next four years. I am asking you to join with us in a national effort to direct our resources in such a way as to ensure, not only that this target is met, but that a very high proportion of these homes are in the low and medium price ranges.
> To making housing affordable, we are, first of all, going to maintain our high level of activity in housing for low-income people. At the same time, we are going to give more help to people of moderate incomes to enable them to manage the carrying charges involved in buying a house.
> To make rental accommodation affordable we must encourage more production. That can only be done by ensuring the basic, economic viability of the rental industry—creating a climate in which builders and investors will have the confidence to produce rental housing. Our participation in this market will be conditional on maintaining affordable rents.
> To discourage unreasonable demands by the well-housed and direct resources instead toward moderately-priced housing, we will require lenders to reserve the most favourable credit arrangements for loans within regional NHA limits.
> All of these initiatives will not only help to deliver good affordable housing, they will, at the same time, stimulate employment and help to contain inflation.

> Lending institutions are going to have to boost their allocations for residential mortgages. They will not only have to put up more mortgage money, it also has to be directed into affordable housing. Sixty thousand dollars capital will have to produce two houses instead of one. What we are going to be interested in, as a government, is more well-designed, well-built, modest-sized housing, fully protected by a nationwide warranty system.

What I am trying to say is that economic conditions in November 1975 were not much different than they are today, with the exception that interest rates are considerably higher at the present time. The bank rate today is in the order of 15.4 per cent, with an inflation factor at the end of 1981 of 12.5 per cent. The inflation factor at the end of 1975 was 10.8 per cent and the interest rate was 9 per cent to 10 per cent. What is the difference? The difference is government debt, massive government debt. In today's market the government finds itself in a position, with $140 billion of debt, where it cannot afford to build social housing. Therefore, it must move in another direction.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please! It being 8.29 p.m., the two hours provided for consideration of the motion now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 75C are now expired. I must therefore interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of this motion.

[English]

Therefore the question is on the motion in the name of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

• (2100)

And the division bells having been rung:

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, before we proceed with the vote, I wish to raise a point of order. I know that you would want every member to be properly dressed for this vote, and I would invite the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) to reconsider his dress and perhaps re-enter the chamber when it is appropriate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Out, out!

An hon. Member: What about Chénier?

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) I am sure knows that I and many of my predecessors have ruled on this. In order to present oneself in the House one has to be properly attired and this means that hon. members are supposed to wear neckties. Therefore, I am afraid his vote cannot be recorded and he cannot enter the House in that attire.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Out, out!

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, I know that you have not given a ruling, but you said that because of a ruling made by your predecessor, you preferred that the hon. member leave the House. He has therefore voluntarily, at the request of the Progressive Conservatives—but that is their privilege. I would ask the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) to listen to me for a minute—

Mr. La Salle: They did the same for me!

Mr. Prud'homme: I am sorry, but I was not there. Madam Speaker, I understand that the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) has withdrawn for this evening, but I believe that the time has come for you to examine what is considered proper attire for a member in the House of Commons, because, Madam Speaker——my hon. friend from the opposition knows the rules very well. If you want to apply the rules according to the British parliamentary system, I cannot see why hon. members do not come here with a hat and bow to the Speaker when they vote.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, I am therefore unable to make any proposal this evening. I can only suggest that the Chair review, not only this rule which I consider antiquated, but all the rules which govern this House.

[English]

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, since Your Honour has acted to protect the traditions of the House, I feel obliged, in response to the suggestion by the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) to rise to protect your position.

Mr. Whelan: You have to get into the act, eh Joe?

Mr. Clark: As the House knows, these procedures respecting dress which prohibit, for example, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) from appearing here with the green hat through which he speaks—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —these procedures respecting dress are not established but only enforced by yourself. Certainly we on this side of the House would be most pleased to have the question of the proper attire for Members of Parliament referred to the appropriate Committee, which would be the Committee on Procedure and Organization, once that committee is convened.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Cosgrove) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 3,450, 3,453, 3,460, 3,693 and 3,698.

[Text]

COMMUNICATION HEADED "LETTER FROM CONCERNED CANADIANS"

Question No. 3,450—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware of the communication headed "Letter from Concerned Canadians" signed by the retired RCMP officers W.F. Johnstone, J.W. Duggan, W.L. Maguire, F. Bodnaruk, P. Starek, J.E.G. Bouchard and D.B. Ingam and also signed by A.L. Bewley, a retired British Columbia provincial court judge?

2. Did the communication contain the statement "Canadians know that to rid themselves of the hornet's nest, they must first smoke it out and burn it. Wasn't that what happened to the barn in Quebec? What was inside the barn that was so important to this country's security?" and, if so, what was the government policy or reaction to the statement?

3. To the knowledge of the government, what was actually inside that barn?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. Yes.

2. Yes, the communication contained that statement. The government feels it would be inappropriate to comment on a matter being examined by the courts in the province of Quebec.

3. The government feels it would be inappropriate to comment on a matter being examined by the courts in the province of Quebec.

SURVEILLANCE OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Question No. 3,453—Mr. Cossitt:

With regard to the answer to question No. 1,487 which was on the subject of whether surveillance of any kind, the tapping of telephones or the using of devices to listen to automobile conversations of any Members of Parliament had taken place in the past three years and which stated in part "if such a question were answered in the affirmative, it could provide information about security operations which might prejudice their success . . . ", is it government policy to make insinuations that security operations are proceeding against certain Members of Parliament and that admission of such a fact would be damaging to the national interest and, if so, for what reason would this be damaging to the national interest and (a) if Members of Parliament are engaged in the violation of national security, for what reason should this not be made public (b) if Members of Parliament are not engaged in the violation of national security, for what reason should the government hesitate to make this public?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): No, it is not government policy to make insinuations that security operations are proceeding against certain Members of Parliament.

(a) and (b) It is not in the national interest for the government to make public the names of individuals who are or are not engaged in the violation of national security.

PUBLISHING OF ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF NATIONAL SECURITY

Question No. 3,460—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 1,487 on the subject of whether surveillance of any kind, the tapping of telephones or the using of devices to listen to automobile conversations of any Members of Parliament had taken place in the past three years and which stated in part that if the answer was given in the "negative such information could provide comfort or aid to those involved in ongoing violations of national security", will the government adopt a policy of making public which Members of Parliament, if any, were involved in the violation of national security and those who were not?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): No, it is not in the national interest for the government to make public the names of individuals who are or are not involved in the violation of national security.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE CONTRACTS

Question No. 3,693—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did the Department of National Defence place a $678,000 contract with Remtec Inc. for a semi-trailer and, if so (a) for what purpose (b) does the cost include any equipment that may have to be installed in the semi-trailer?

2. Did the department rent cars from Rent-A-Wreck for a cost of $12,888 under contract number HAL81-5686/1 and, if so, for what purpose?

3. Did the department award a $88,832 contract to Air, Earth and Oceans Limited for a "study of detectability of tracks in snow" under contract number 10SD 97701-1-68218 (1SD81-00103) and, if so, what is the rationale behind this decision?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The Department of Supply and Services awarded a contract, on behalf of the Department of National Defence, to Remtec Inc., for the purchase of 12 bulk haul semi-trailers in the amount of $678,000.

(a) the purpose of these 18,000 litres aluminum tank trailers is for hauling fuel;

(b) yes, the cost includes equipment normally associated with this type of vehicle.

2. The Department of Supply and Services awarded a contract, on behalf of the Department of National Defence, to Rent-A-Wreck in the amount of $12,888 to provide a maximum of three cars per day during the period of October 1, 1981 to September 30, 1982. The purpose of the contract is to meet the requirements of the Base Transport Unit at CFB Halifax.

3. The Department of Supply and Services awarded a contract, on behalf of the Department of National Defence, to Air, Earth and Ocean Ltd. who submitted an innovative unsolicited research proposal which was relevant to the Department of National Defence's requirements. The work concerns the determination of vehicular and non-vehicular snow track conditions that are capable of being detected using ground-based thermal infrared sensors, with support from drone and ground-based photography and other sensors. In addition, the project includes a potential application in search and rescue missions.

TAX DEDUCTIONS AT SOURCE

Question No. 3,698—Mr. Deans:

Did the government instruct employers to collect income tax in excess of levels in effect under the Income Tax Act and, if so, under what authority?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): No. The Income Tax Act, section 153, provides that the amounts that are required to be withheld as payments on account of tax are to be set by regulation. The regulations are amended each year following the coming into force of the budget. The regulations presently in force require greater withholding amounts than are called for in the tables recently issued as guidelines for employers.

Tax withholding tables are normally issued as early as possible in December in order that employers have adequate lead time to introduce the necessary changes in their systems. Historically, intended changes announced by various ministers of finance have been incorporated in these publications and this practice was followed in the preparation of the tables for the 1982 taxation year.

It should be recognized that tax withholding only represents a payment on account of a future tax liability and the tables are designed to closely approximate the taxpayer's annual tax liability so that at year end the taxpayer will not be faced with an outstanding balance. The ultimate liability and the actual tax assessments will be established in strict accordance with the enacting legislation as finally passed for Parliament.

Mr. Smith: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 24, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-89, to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, as I enter the debate on Bill C-89 I note the exercise the House has just been through, namely, closure. As I observed the minister responsible for housing during this debate I noted that he has been concerned about two things. First, he has been concerned that hon. members of this House have been criticizing his housing policy. Second, he has been reacting rather vigorously to the statistics hon. members have been using in terms of housing starts, or the lack thereof. He feels those figures are not accurate.

As we consider the housing initiative before us, we should look very briefly at the economic situation facing Canadians. This provision flows from the budget. In tonight's Ottawa Citizen, a paper which has generally been supportive of the government opposite, there is an editorial entitled "Spectre of Depression". This editorial appears on a day when the dollar has again broken the 82 cent barrier. In fact, it dropped approximately .44 of one cent today to 81.68 cents. That drop in the value of the dollar will have an affect on inflation and the ability of Canadians to have suitable or adequate housing. Indeed, it puts that prospect into even further doubt.

What I find interesting about this editorial is that it is in this newspaper which, along with many others over the years, has criticized Members of Parliament who have said that when we have new programs we should know what the expenditures are and what the affects of those expenditures will be in the years to come. The reason editorialists feel that a spectre of depression is upon Canadians is the fact of the national debt, which now has risen to $122 billion. There is a sudden realization that roughly 25 cents of every tax dollar collected will be used not to pay the debt but to service that debt. It is easy to say, as the government opposite has done, that we can have all types of programs, which are good in themselves, but eventually they have to be paid for.

That is the situation we face today and I raise it because housing is one of the great necessities of Canadians. It is tragic that, because of various other programs that do not have the same merit as housing, the minister responsible is stuck with a bill that does not do enough. He does not have the wherewithal to put in place housing programs that will meet the needs of Canadians.

I received a message from a constituent today enclosing a newspaper article entitled "Trudeau, you are killing us". The article is a dissertation on the problems that average Canadians, especially small business people, are having because of the economy. The person who sent the clipping concludes the covering letter with the comment that he hopes the opposition can do something before we have a revolution.

Those are rather dramatic words for a Canadian to use, Mr. Speaker, but the government has mismanaged the economy so badly that people do not have confidence that any program will come close to meeting their needs, or that there is the capacity in our economy, under this economic leadership, which would lead them to invest in housing.

What initiatives does the government offer in the field of housing, Mr. Speaker? Bill C-89 is one; another is the CHIP program, and there are the insulation programs.

Just today in Manitoba one of the radio hotline programs dealt with UFFI. The reporter working on the story, along with other investigative reporters, has discovered that the government intends to remove asbestos from all defence buildings in Shilo. It has asked for tenders, but when questioned about the approximate amount of those tenders, officials refused to give the information. When the reporters inquired why the asbestos was being removed they were told it has to be removed because it is hazardous. They were then asked why the asbestos was being removed when the government was not looking after the needs of those Canadians who have UFFI in their housing. I might add that UFFI was approved by the government through the CHIP subsidies. Apparently there is not the same desire to see that matter cleared up as there is regarding the defence installation at Shilo. When questioned further about this the answer was that the reason it was being done in Shilo and not in private homes is that the buildings in Shilo are government buildings. That is not a good enough reason, Mr. Speaker.

The minister has been very sensitive in the last few days, but I must tell him that the iniatives the government has put forward for housing do not meet the needs of Canadians and, indeed, some of the programs have been disastrous. Some people who thought they were making improvements to their homes have found those improvements to be inadequate and expensive.

In research for my comments tonight, I went back to a speech made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) when he was opposition housing critic in October, 1979. At that time he spoke of mortgage deductibility and told the minister of the day, "When you are in trouble there is an out." Apparently the out is to blame the previous government. Has anyone ever heard more blame levelled at a government that was in office for less than a year by a government that had been in office for much too long? It was a very interesting speech, Mr. Speaker. He asked, for example, how a government could bring forward a program that would not benefit at least 40 per cent of the people. By extrapolation, does he then concede that the program would have benefited 60 per cent of the people? How many Canadians will benefit from the program the minister in charge of housing today has put before us? I suggest there will be pitifully few, Mr. Speaker.

We have heard what the NDP has to say about housing. Yesterday one member said that housing is a basic right, and that his party regards it as a basic right. What is the basic property that most Canadians buy, Mr. Speaker? It is housing. Yet the party that says housing is a basic right voted against property rights in the special joint committee on the Constitution, and did so in the House at every opportunity. What were they doing then? How can they, on the one hand, say housing is a basic right, and then, on the other hand, vote against property rights? For the vast majority of Canadians the only property they ever hope to own is housing. Yet the NDP says it is a basic right, that they are interested in the right but that they are not interested in property—

Mr. Blaikie: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, of course I will answer a question when I have finished my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Permission is not granted.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to ask a question and is not recognized during the regular question period I will gladly answer at the end of my comments. I know this is a very sensitive subject for members of the NDP. They do not want to hear that it was they who opposed property rights, aided and abetted by the government.

Mr. Blaikie: What about the Premier of Ontario?

Mr. Epp: At that time the government still wanted the support of the NDP and still wanted the support of Mr. Blakeney. But here they are saying, "Housing is a basic right but we are against property rights." That is the position of the NDP.

But they have another position, Mr. Speaker. They say they want housing. What kind of housing do they want? It is not necessarily the housing the individual owns. What they want is more social housing. Perhaps that fits with their idea that they do not want property rights. All members of the House are interested in social housing but surely the best type of housing is that owned by the person who has the ambition and makes the opportunity to buy his own home. They keep saying this, yet they want the same ownership rights and the same property rights as the rest of us. It is just that it is politically convenient for them to posture on social housing.

I heard another interesting suggestion by the NDP to the effect that mortgage deductibility was of benefit only to the middle class. Who makes up the middle class, Mr. Speaker? Why do we have to get into this kind of class structure at all? I thought the vast majority of Canadians regarded themselves as middle class, whether they are union people, shop owners, farmers, housewives or whoever. Basically most people think they are middle class. The best charge the NDP could come up with against mortgage deductibility was that it would help the middle class. I want to tell hon. members of the NDP that the middle class of Canada, the group of men and women who pick up their lunches early in the morning and go to work, are paying the freight. It is time government recognized that they also have needs. One of their greatest needs or desires is to own their own homes, their own property.

It was also mentioned that people were not convinced that the mortgage tax credit would help them. I attended a meeting in Pine Falls at which the lady of one household asked, "Is it definite that one of your first priorities will be the introduction of a mortgage tax credit?" I indicated that it was. She said, "I am voting for your party because that program is the only hope my husband and I have seen, of ever being able to own our home". Do hon. members know what the interest rate was at that time? It was 13 per cent.

What have been the interest rates under this government? They have been 20 per cent and 22 per cent. Some people might say that we should have high interest rates because at least they are bringing down inflation and keeping up the dollar. The dollar today is below the 82-cent barrier, at 81.68. Today we have a low dollar value which will increase inflation because of imports; obviously this in itself will increase inflation. At the same time we have high unemployment. Every economic index indicates that we are in a crisis today, and housing is not exempt.

I am one who is not very keen to have the government involved in all kinds of programs. The best initiative is the knowledge that an individual can eventually own something; then he or she has a commitment. Something happens to young Canadians when they put their names on that first mortgage. At one time there was generally a lot of hope; today they are not putting their names on that first mortgage because they know they cannot afford it. As a result we are becoming more and more a nation of renters.

The elderly may say this is a natural phenomenon because we are becoming more urbanized, but when we get into the question of rental accommodation we must consider vacancy rates. Who is willing today to invest money in rental accommodations? Who will take the risk when people can turn around and purchase Canada Savings Bonds at 19.75 per cent? Why take a risk when one can obtain such a return?

In the short time remaining, and speaking specifically to the bill, I want to relate an incident which indicates how the inadequacies of the budget affect individual Canadians. During the Christmas break a fellow walked into my office and asked whether there was something in the budget which would give him either interest deferral or a grant. He explained his situation. He was out of a job and he was behind in his payment schedule. He wanted to know whether there would be some kind of relief in the budget. I dug out the two paragraphs in the budget which indicated that his payments must exceed 30 per cent of his gross income and that during the period of high interest rates he must have rewritten his mortgage. Those are the two basic components.

While the gentleman was in my office I telephoned CMHC in Winnipeg and asked for a ruling, and, basically, I was referred to the two conditions. I indicated that this situation was somewhat different because his mortgage was with a credit union. Generally credit unions rewrite mortgages at different periods of time. They are lines of credit or some people call them "demand loans". Some credit unions have fluctuating interest rates; technically it was rewriting his mortgage rate whenever interest rates changed. Other credit unions, for example, do it on a half-yearly or yearly basis.

When I explained that to CMHC officials in Winnipeg, they were very kind. They said, "We do not know what the answers are, but we will get the information." That was fair enough. They called Ottawa and the officials in Ottawa said, "We never thought of that." They are the ones who wrote the budget, but this fellow in my office who wanted some relief thought of it. The Department of Finance with all its expertise had not thought of it. They returned my telephone call and asked, "What do you suggest we do?" I suggested that they do for this gentleman the very same thing they would do for every other Canadian who qualified; that is all I was asking.

Then I got in touch with the Department of Finance in Ottawa and officials here said it would be more difficult than they thought. When I asked why, I was told that the interest rate at the particular credit union was considerably lower than current market rates. In fact the credit union rate was 16 per cent. The credit union had done so well—and hon. members opposite should learn a lesson from this—that at the end of the year it dropped its mortgage rate from 16 per cent to 15 per cent retroactively.

Once again officials contacted me and said that this man was paying 15 per cent, which was lower than the going rate and, therefore, they did not think they had to do anything. I said, "Just a minute, is it not correct that it has been rewritten?" They indicated that was correct; everyone agreed. Then I said, "If he is earning no income, surely his payments are in excess of 30 per cent of his income." They had to rethink that one too. Eventually, to make a long story short, departmental officials said, "Yes, you qualify".

For what did he qualify? It depended on his equity position as against the amount of mortgage. He had to calculate his equity and his mortgage positions. For example, if one has more than a $3,000 equity position, one does not qualify for the grant but, rather, for interest deferral. If one has a $50,000 equity in a house and a loan of $47,001, one qualifies for the grant. But if one has reduced the mortgage to $46,999, one does not qualify. This is the kind of housing policy on which the minister uses closure to convince us to get the matter through, to get "thousands" of units going and "thousands" of jobs created. What a farce, what a farce! The minister asks Canadians to accept this legislation.

What is interest deferral? It reminds me of the story of an old car salesman. The first job I had out of high school was working for a garage which sold both new and used cars. In my home town most people work at some time in such an establishment. When a customer would say that a car was too expensive, the salesman would say, "Look, you don't pay more; you just pay longer." That is like this program; one does not pay more; one pays longer. At the end of the mortgage the interest deferral is attached, and one pays interest for all these years again. This is no different than AHOP, and AHOP was ill-devised. How many people walked away from AHOP? Having walked away from an obligation once, it is easier to walk away a second time.

Obviously there are other aspects to this piece of legislation. If one has equity of less than $3,000, one is eligible for a grant, at least to some extent. The reason we have this legislation is not because the minister has a housing policy. I know he wants a housing policy; he would like to have one. But this is a bail-out policy; it is not a housing policy. All one has to do is go through the correspondence which every hon. member receives from The Canadian Real Estate Association. I know there are some people in this House who do not like the Canadian Real Estate Association. Do you know what these people do? They make a profit. I am glad they are making a profit. I am glad they are turning that profit into housing and putting it back into the Canadian economy. These are Canadians who are legitimately seeking to address themselves to the housing market of the country.

In their presentation to the government some interesting things were mentioned. They talked about the reduced housing we will see in 1982. They talked about the impact on employment. I believe it was the hon. member for Essex-Kent (Mr. Daudlin) who said, "We have to pass this legislation because it will create these thousands of new jobs." But the Canadian Real Estate Association which knows the business, is not that impressed with the possibility of creating these new jobs. In fact, the association is not impressed at all.

Mr. Cosgrove: Just the person looking for a job.

Mr. Kempling: Petulant Paul.

An hon. Member: That is the most significant contribution the minister has made all day.

Mr. Epp: The Canadian Real Estate Association commented in this fashion:

> A reduced volume of buying and selling in real estate markets could have a significant secondary impact on persons whose livelihood depends on a healthy real estate market.

The paragraph continues:

> In addition, if low levels of real estate sales discourage production of new housing, then unemployment in the construction industry may also increase.

That is the housing policy of the minister. The Canadian Real Estate Association also talked about the supply of housing. I could go into that; suffice it to say that the minister spoke to the HUDAC conference in Winnipeg. What a reception he got. It was almost the same kind of warm reception we in the west reserve for most federal ministers. For instance, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) visited Delisle, Saskatchewan. It is a nice little community. There are great people there and 1,200 people came out to greet him warmly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cosgrove: They support the legislation.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Don't kid yourself.

Mr. Epp: The minister is awake again. If he wants to be a comedian, he could find a forum where some people would laugh.

There is another side to the story. I have a letter here from a lady in my riding whose situation is slightly different from that of a young couple who might want to buy their first home. She wrote about capital gains. That factor strongly influences the housing market. We are taxing away small pools of capital which individual Canadians hold. Canadians are not now making investments because of the fear that the taxation bite will be too hard. In part, this is what this lady said:

> I am sending you a copy of a letter I'm writing to the Minister of Finance in regards to capital gains.

Her letter continued:

> I've been a widow since 1965. I'm not in good health so I just have to sell my farm to survive. That unknown factor is a big boogyman for me. The Income Tax Office isn't much help. They say they don't know. The Minister of Finance office says we get one acre and the home tax free.
> Since a whole lot of us didn't send in our 1971 price what happens? In 1975 when my husband died and I was transferring titles I put down $200 an acre. Would that stand. We get so many problems from the civil servants. One time they allow it next time not. I suppose because the head office says so.

What she is trying to do is to sell her farm and have enough money to buy a home in a small community in my riding and live in dignity. That is all she is asking after a lifetime of work. What does she say next?

> When I finally sell I hope to get $86,000 for 240 acres and buildings.

The paragraph in her letter continues:

> —I could sell together or separate as it is a Life Estate with my son. If I can price the home acre at $50,000 (house large garage and barn). There would be $36,000 left. If I could establish some retirement fund that would last at least five years till I reach 65 I would be safe from welfare. My idea is go and buy a home in Winnipeg. One's that you don't have to fix run around $50,000.

How is she going to do it? Here is a person who has worked on her family farm all her life. She is not asking for a handout. She is probably one of those few Canadians who has probably never received a handout. All she is asking is to be allowed to sell this farm that obviously her husband, herself and her family have worked on, so she can somehow acquire some basic housing and have a little income left over from the sale to carry her to pension age. That is all she is asking. There are thousands of Canadians in this situation.

Without question, the most difficult problem we encounter as Members of Parliament, at least I do, is the problem of a widow between the age of 55 and 65 who has worked side by side with her husband and now cannot carry on the farm or the family business. She might have been at home looking after the family all her life and now does not have the skills to use outside the home. This lady is a perfect example. All she is asking is to be able to buy a $50,000 house and to use the $36,000 left over to support herself. How many hon. members in this House believe you can buy a house for $50,000 today? What kind of housing will $50,000 give you?

An hon. Member: There are pretty good houses for $50,000.

Mr. Epp: Yes, and if you fellows stay in office, with the dollar dropping and inflation as it is, there might be a lot of houses on the market at that price. Nobody will be able to afford them, but they will be there.

This government has to get back to some basics. First, people want to own their property. In order to do that, they want tax relief to maintain their own homes. Those of us who have had experience in municipal work, and the minister has, having been a mayor, and those of us who have had possibly more limited experience than that, but have had some, have had taxpayers coming to us saying, "I do not want to improve my property." You ask them why not and the answer is, "I do not want to pay more municipal taxes." That is the reason it becomes imminently more sound to allow a mortgage tax credit. This is another way by which people could have a greater opportunity for home ownership. That is what we have to get back to. I believe that is one of the fundamentals that helped build this country. For instance, take a look at what the homesteaders did. They had 160 acres. I see the hon. member over there laughing, but that is how the western part of the country was built and people worked mighty hard to have those homesteads. They came to have those homesteads—

Mr. Kelly: Does that sell in Manitoba?

Mr. Epp: I understand that the hon. member who is interrupting asks, does that sell in Manitoba. Yes, Manitoba was built by hard working people who moved onto homesteads, who moved to the Dauphins of Manitoba, not in my riding, who moved into the Vitas of Manitoba, who moved into the St. Pierres of Manitoba, who moved into the Beausejours of Manitoba, to build a country. Those are the people the hon. member is disparaging. What they asked for and what they received was land on the condition that they would work the land, build a dwelling on that land and make it a viable operation. That is all they were given.

What I am saying to the minister is this, no matter how sincerely he approaches his housing policy, we are reaching a situation in which Canadians cannot afford property. The only answer is relief from taxation, not more government subsidies and grants. We also have inflation. You talk to Canadians today, Mr. Speaker, and you will understand why there is cynicism in the country. They say, the Liberals promised us they were going to lower interest rates. Yet today we read editorials saying we are facing a depression because our deficit is too high. We have gone to the international bond market borrowing money for too long and in too large amounts. If you are going to lower interest rates you can be selective on certain aspects such as housing, for instance. Why do we not give selective rates on housing? We do this for other countries, why can we not do it for Canadians?

I say to all members of the House that if they think by some magic the interest rate can be lowered without repercussions—across the board I speak of now—they are badly mistaken. This government will have a lot to answer for. To a lot of young Canadians its legacy is, they will not be able to own their own homes because the deficit it created is a deficit they will have to pay. The government has been a proponent of the theory, let's have it now and have others pay it later. I say to the minister that he will not find enough room in the expenditures of this or any other government to respond to the housing needs now evident in Canada. The only course he has is to use the tax system to deliver selective reductions in interest rates for housing so that people can get back to the dream and its realization, that of the ownership of property.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaikie: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is there unanimous consent for a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, my question relates to some of the hon. member's remarks with respect to social housing and the NDP policy with regard to housing. Knowing well the alleged ambitions of the hon. member for the leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party in Manitoba, I was wondering if he would be willing to go on record against the social housing policies of the NDP concerning construction of senior citizens' housing right across the province, the construction of social housing in the inner cities—

Mr. Beatty: Is this a speech, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Blaikie: Is he willing to go on record against those policies and thus stay in the intellectual ghetto that the present leader of the Progressive Conservative Party in Manitoba led that party into?

Mr. Kempling: The only intellectual ghetto is in your mind.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate that the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) has been reading newspapers. Obviously that question must have been generated by some electoral fear he has. I want to tell him, Mr. Speaker, my frank personal view is that I would like to see Canadians have the ability to own their own homes. That is my position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Don't give us a sermon, give us an answer.

Mr. Epp: Well, I have heard a lot of sermons and no answers from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). What I am saying to the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill is, that is my preference. Obviously there are some Canadians who have not been as fortunate as he or I. Government has a responsibility to those people in terms of social housing, but the goal should be that as many Canadians as possible enjoy home ownership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to listen to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), but I quite often find myself in substantial disagreement with him, and I would like to take a couple of minutes in that regard.

In the last couple of weeks I have been the victim of some crossfire from the opposite side on interest rates and on the subject we are talking about today. I find it interesting because last week they were demanding that a few of us should vote with their side to bring them back into power so they could reinstitute the regime they brought in a couple of years ago. I recall that interest rates at that time were nearly as high as they are now, but under our government our interest rates were two or three points above the American rates, and our inflation rate was 9½ per cent when theirs was around 18 per cent. I would wonder what they might be now when our inflation rate is about 9½ per cent, while the American inflation rate is lower. There just did not seem to be any reason at all, the way they were running things, why our interest rates should be above the American rates when their inflation rate was double ours. At that particular point they reappointed Mr. Bouey.

I would now like to deal with a couple of other points the hon. member made. He made the point that property rights did not go into the constitution. He, as well as anyone, knows how that came about; he very ably led the opposition in that debate. But he knows perfectly well that the provinces were very jealous of property rights and basically did not want that right in the Constitution. That came too close to affecting provincial powers. Most of the provincial premiers were of the Tory conviction and said that, so I think we have to accept that as the basic reason.

Mr. Lalonde: So true.

Mr. McRae: One thing I would really like to talk about, and one of the reasons why I helped to vote that government out of power in 1979, is a document known as the Matthews report on housing, produced by a former national president of the Conservative Party of Canada. If you want to find a report which really condemns government supporting people who cannot afford housing, you should look at that report. That report says government should basically get out of it all; do not subsidize co-op housing, profit housing, or any of it. That was a scary document. It would have virtually eliminated CMHC and privatized everything. That, Mr. Speaker, along with PetroCan and interest rates, is one of two or three sound reasons why we decided, along with the NDP, that this government had had its day. The basic institutions around which this country has functioned, certainly since World War II, have been those set up mainly by a series of Liberal governments, including things like CMHC and so on. It is a kind of mixture of private and public institutions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—FIRING OF KINGSTON CIVIL SERVANT—GROUNDS FOR DISMISSAL—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I asked questions of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) on February 23, 1982, concerning the firing of a constituent of mine, Mr. Neil Fraser, from Revenue Canada in Kingston. I asked the minister to outline the grounds for such action taken by the government which has deprived Mr. Fraser freedom of speech, as well as to indicate at what point the government draws the line concerning the rights of civil servants to speak out on various issues. I was far from satisfied with the answers given to my questions. That is the reason I gave notice of my intention to speak to the matter during this adjournment debate.

This is a serious issue about which I, my leader, my colleagues in the House and many Canadians are very concerned. We are talking about the issue of freedom of speech in a free and democratic society. We are talking about the right to criticize those measures put forward by a government of the day. We are talking about the rights of a free Canadian citizen to stand up and freely speak his mind on his own time.

The Minister of National Revenue told the House that Mr. Fraser, as a relatively senior official with the Department of National Revenue, was fired because he spoke publicly against the metric system. The question I asked was, on what grounds is an off-duty public servant being deprived of freedom speech. In other words, I wanted to know the authority under which he was fired and the section of the act. The Public Service Employment Act, Section 23, Schedule III refers to the oath of office, and I quote:

> I, (name) solemnly and sincerely swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and honestly fulfil the duties that devolve upon me by reason of my employment in the public service and that I will not, without due authority in that behalf, disclose or make known any matter that comes to my knowledge by reason of such employment. So help me God.

Matters for which Mr. Fraser has been fired have nothing to do with this section or Schedule III under the act. The reason the Minister of National Revenue gave about collecting taxes should not be a disqualifying criterion for a public servant's right to freedom of speech, as the minister implies.

I am sure this incident will put extreme and undue pressure on thousands of Canadians who work for the public; if everything they say is subject to censure. This government action reminds me of George Orwell's novel "Nineteen Eighty-Four"; one can only think and not speak.

Public servants should have the right to make constructive remarks concerning government policies which are not related to their duties on their own time. It is intolerable that even the most responsible criticism of a government program brings reprisals down on the heads of public service employees.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is behaving strangely, especially since he is the man who appears to want history's recognition by entrenching the Canadian Charter of Human Rights in our Constitution. The Minister of National Revenue, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) and the Prime Minister have refused to cite any legal authority on which this action has taken place. Rigid codified systems of law, such as in the U.S.S.R., work in a fashion uncommon to Canadian tradition whereby everything that is not specifically mentioned is forbidden.

The minister's defence in firing Neil Fraser for criticizing the process rather than the substance of metrication does not seem credible considering the importance the government has placed on the fundamental freedoms we have spent so much valuable time debating over the past year. We have inherited a strong heritage in our system which respects and enforces rights and freedoms and, whether written down or not, we must ensure that we continue to observe these in the future.

I am not questioning the right of an employer to fire an employee who publicly speaks against the organization as the minister has stated, but I am questioning the right of government to fire Neil Fraser without just cause or reason. Just cause and reason does not mean talking about government policy because, if this were the case, hundreds of federal public servants should have been fired during the Quebec referendum. Mr. Fraser did not object to bilingualism, he stated that he did not feel the rights of non-francophones in Quebec were adequately protected.

If this case is lost on appeal, it will mean imposing virtually absolute silence on any public servant in Canada on any question. Mr. Fraser is not working for the Metric Commission or the Department of Justice, so he has not directly criticized his department's policy. As an employee of the federal government he has not exceeded any bounds of acceptable conduct of a public servant because he has not broken any oath concerning his own ministry in which he has been employed. Mr. Fraser deserves an apology by this government and should be fully reinstated with proper compensation for the harrassment he has suffered.

I feel the government is on shaky ground in this incident. First, it intimidated and tried to gag Mr. Fraser, then it fired him. This is not a case of a civil servant engaging in active partisan politics or disloyal conduct. This is unjust punishment affecting civil liberties, the basis of which is freedom of speech for all public servants. Public servants are not second class citizens. This is a disgrace to Canada and Canadians in light of our telling other nations around the world about the human rights that Canadians enjoy. This case should not have to go to the Supreme Court of Canada. I hope and pray that the people of Canada will see the type of leaders who are running our country and change them before it is too late.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is probably aware that the official concerned has submitted a grievance, and as I do not want to prejudice this case, in reply I shall simply retrace the events which lead to his being fired from the Department of National Revenue. I shall therefore outline briefly the various stages of the grievance procedure provided to allow him to exercise his rights. First, Mr. Speaker, the official involved has on several occasions publicly endorsed political ideas contrary to those of the government.

Following his first public statements criticizing the government and its policies, he was warned of the guidelines concerning the behaviour of an employee toward his employer and given notice that other such statements could lead to disciplinary action. In spite of these warnings, which resulted in two suspensions, he continued and even stepped up his public criticism in all the medias. That is when his employment was terminated, Mr. Speaker, or in other words, when he was fired. Let me remind the House that the Treasury Board is empowered to establish disciplinary standards in the public service and to specify certain penalties, including suspension and firing, which can be applied for a breach of discipline or misbehaviour, and to indicate when, how, by whom and under what authority these penalties can be meted out.

Treasury Board can also authorize the deputy minister of a department or a ministry to exercise its powers and fulfil its duties. It is under this authority, Mr. Speaker, that disciplinary action was taken against this employee. Such action is not taken lightly, and in this case it was based on a well-established principle to the effect that the senior officers and staff of the department should abstain from criticizing publicly the policy, the programs or the services of the government and from making unfavourable comments about them.

You can no doubt determine, Mr. Speaker, that, a fortiori, the employees of the Department of National Revenue hold a very sensitive position and that their behaviour must be especially above reproach.

I mentioned in the very beginning, and I want to emphasize this point, that the employee has a right of appeal, and this is what he is now exercising. This applies to any employee who feels he has been wronged by a management decision, and he is entitled to submit a grievance under the Staff Relations Act. There is an established procedure to this effect which can include four levels of decision of which the final level is that of the deputy minister. If the employee is not satisfied with the decision made at the final level he can, under certains circumstances, ask for a review by a third party, who is an adjudicator appointed under the Staff Relations Act. To accelerate matters, the grievance has been referred to the fourth level.

I hope that justice will be done after both parties have submitted their arguments, and I am convinced that this will be the case.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF LAY-OFFS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) on February 5 about the 1,800 lay-offs announced by the Canadian National Railways, system wide, on February 4. I was, and I am still, particularly concerned about some 216 positions which are to be eliminated at the Transcona shops at the rate of 49 every four weeks, and some 30 other jobs at Symington Yard. Most of these will be jobs of young people who may already be facing the difficult problems of home ownership and raising families at a time of criminally high interest rates and other economic difficulties.

What are they to do? They cannot wait for the Minister of Transport's scheme of railway revitalization to come into place; if, indeed, it ever will. If it does come into place, it might not create the kinds of jobs for which they are looking.

Indeed, some of these men have lost their jobs as a result of the Minister of Transport's last great scheme, his tragic and stupid reduction of passenger rail service in Canada Some of these lay-offs, even now, are the delayed result of the VIA cutbacks and not just the result of a downturn in the revenues of the railways caused by the MacEachen recession.

The list of injuries the Liberals have inflicted on railway workers continues to grow. First, the VIA Rail cutbacks resulted in lost jobs and in making a CN pass almost worthless. Second, there were the lay-offs of February 4. A Crown corporation which made a profit last year was allowed to lay people off in a period of high unemployment when there was plenty of work waiting to be done. Third, and even more recently, the CNR made a wage offer to the workers which is clearly part of the over-all Liberal plan to blame workers for inflation, in spite of the fact that the real incomes of workers, after inflation, have decreased every year for the last four or five years.

If the Liberal government had half a brain, it would provide the money that the CNR legitimately needs for capital investment through a national investment strategy, instead of forcing the CN to lay off workers and hold down wages in order to expand. That would be the kind of sound economic and employment policy we in the New Democratic Party could support and, indeed, would implement if we were the government.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, let me say emphatically that I share the hon. member's concern about the loss of jobs at Canadian National. I am certain the minister does too, as he has indicated in the House. However, the hon. member must realize that if the CN is expected to continue to serve its customers and Canada as effectively as it does, it must be allowed to operate in an efficient manner.

The facts are clear. Traffic was down substantially in the latter part of 1981 and, in January 1982, traffic was down 15 per cent from the previous year's level. It was regrettably necessary, as a consequence, to reduce manpower correspondingly.

The hon. member should not overdramatize the situation. Normal attrition, early retirements and job transfers will result in significantly fewer people affected than the number of positions abolished. Although the CN does not see a reversal of this situation in the immediate future, CN will, of course, hire employees back when traffic warrants.

• (2215)

The minister has pointed to the tremendous potential for growth in rail traffic in western Canada. I suggest that, if the hon. member wants to see an increase in employment in the railways, he should support the government's proposals on the statutory grain freight rates, which will allow this tremendous growth in western Canada to materialize.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 10.16 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CANADIAN FEDERATION

CONDEMNATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ACTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek unanimous consent to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Noting that since the member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau) first became Prime Minister in 1968, the federal government's share of total government spending in Canada has increased from 40.5 per cent to 41.9 per cent, and noting that the actions of the present federal government have contributed to division in the country, the election of a separatist government in the province of Quebec, and the election of a separatist member to the Alberta legislature, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House condemns the deliberate abandonment by the federal government of the principles which have kept Canada together since 1867.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF AID PLAN MODELLED ON SPANISH PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, in the February 12 edition of The Financial Times of London it was reported that the Spanish Minister of Agriculture had created a $700 million loan and aid program for farmers. The Spanish government and the banks are co-operating in making available to Spanish farmers ten-year loans at 7 per cent interest. In light of this farsighted action by Spain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That the Minister of Agriculture instruct his officials to investigate this program with the view to initiating a similar plan in Canada in aid of our hard-pressed agricultural sector.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

GRANDE PRAIRIE, ALTA.—CALL FOR INCLUSION IN SPECIAL INVESTMENT TAX PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, the city of Grande Prairie was excluded from the special investment tax credit program in 1980. This area recently has experienced severe hardship, thanks to the National Energy Program and the recent knock-out blow from the budget, and now Proctor and Gamble has begun laying off employees. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Haldimand-Norfolk (Mr. Bradley):

That the Minister responsible for regional economic expansion administer immediate first aid through this tax credit program so that we may once again see this area recover and grow.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

CROWSNEST PASS RATE—CALL FOR HALT TO MINISTER'S PROPOSAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. Considering that over 300 farmers in Swan River met on February 22 at a meeting sponsored by the local of the Manitoba Pool and passed the following resolution:

Whereas the federal government has announced its intention to break the historic Crowsnest Pass Agreement, and whereas the statutory Crow rate is a historic right of western farmers and the only concession ever granted to western Canada, and whereas an increase of the Crow rate by 5.1 times as recommended by the last Snavely report would cost rural Manitoba 90 million dollars and individual farmers an extra $20 to $25 per acre in production costs, therefore be it resolved that the meeting declare that the statutory Crowsnest Pass rates are not bargainable.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse):

That the government stop the Pepin proposal to plunder the west dead in its tracks.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

NECESSITY FOR STATIONING AIRCRAFT AND MAINTENANCE CREWS IN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Because of repeated demonstrations of the need to station fixed-wing aircraft in Newfoundland to complement our search and rescue squadron, and because this need was demonstrated again less than 48 hours ago when a stern trawler sank 120 miles north of Newfoundland at 2 a.m. yesterday morning, and since that ship, after losing its steering in high seas, began to swamp and requested search and rescue assistance which was denied, and since the two fixed-wing aircraft which just happened to be at a Newfoundland airport but were from another province were unable to bring pumps to the ship to keep it afloat, because the aircraft maintenance crews are stationed in another province and the aircraft needed maintenance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House recognize that enough is enough and request the government to station fixed-wing aircraft and maintenance crews in Newfoundland on a permanent basis.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GEOGRAPHICAL ERROR IN MINISTER'S NEWS RELEASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, in a news release earlier this week the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) announced details of Canadian government proposals to United States officials in the current round of negotiations toward a bilateral agreement on acid rain. In the release the minister said Canada is "prepared to cut sulphur dioxide emissions in eastern Canada, including Manitoba." I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That this House calls upon the Minister of the Environment to enrol immediately in a primary school geography class so that in his negotiations with the United States he will at least know where the great province of Manitoba can be found on the Canadian map.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NUCLEAR ENERGY

URANIUM SHIPMENTS TO SOVIET UNION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that large amounts of uranium hexafluoride are being shipped from Canada to the Soviet Union where it is processed into nuclear fuels and weapons-grade uranium, I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That the government be instructed to table a complete inventory of all uranium shipments from Canada to the Soviet Union, and of all nuclear materials produced therefrom, together with a thorough description of all control measures required by Canada, to include site inspections of the Soviet enrichment facility, tests and measurements performed to determine quantities of uranium produced, and a detailed explanation of all record-keeping methods.

FISHERIES

REPLACEMENT OF LOBSTER TRAPS LOST BY NOVA SCOTIA FISHERMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. During the past few months winter storms have been extremely severe along the south shore of Nova Scotia, causing an excessive loss of lobster traps. Since the full responsibility for the saltwater fishing industry lies with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) and the federal government under our Constitution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in co-operation with the Minister of Employment and Immigration set up a work project for unemployed fishermen and pay them wages instead of unemployment insurance benefits for the construction of at least 10,000 lobster traps to be held in reserve and sold at cost to licensed lobster fishermen who suffer losses when disastrous storms destroy their means of livelihood.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST THAT REGALADO BRITO BE ADMITTED TO CANADA AS POLITICAL REFUGEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of a statement by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) that a country is judged on the way it treats its refugees, and considering the fact that the security certificate issued against Salvadoran refugee Regalado Brito deprives him of his fundamental rights, that only two federal ministers know the contents of the certificate, that the charges have never been proven and that this constitutes a travesty of justice, I move, seconded by the member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the House demand the withdrawal of the security certificate, the immediate release of Mr. Regalado and his admission into Canada as a political refugee.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

SEARCH AND RESCUE

NEED TO UPGRADE EQUIPMENT AND FACILITIES IN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, the loss of the Ocean Ranger and 84 lives tragically points out the gross inadequacy of air-sea rescue in Newfoundland. I find it regrettable that the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), did not receive unanimous consent, so therefore I will try again. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate:

That this House instructs the Minister of National Defence to order immediately the installation of weather radar on the air-sea rescue helicopters at Gander and, further, that he immediately order the deployment of fixed-wing aircraft to eastern Newfoundland and the establishment of a rescue co-ordination centre at St. John's.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

ISSUANCE OF TAX FREE BONDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The federal government should move quickly to pass on to the municipalities increased responsibility for the financing, construction and management of public housing. In doing so it should provide the municipalities with increased fiscal capacity. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet):

• (1115)

That the federal government consider bringing forth legislation permitting municipalities to issue tax free bonds in the Canadian financial market and that a per capita ceiling be placed on the maximum borrowing capacity for such purposes.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ALSANDS PROJECT—POTENTIAL NEW PARTNERS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday the minister said that he was confident that Alsands would go ahead because he had other companies ready to replace the five companies that have withdrawn from this consortium. Could he tell the House who these companies are and when he is going to tell the remaining partners of Alsands who they are, because the partners do not know? Could he tell the House when this project is going to commence? When will construction start?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, what I said in the House yesterday was that there were other potential partners with whom I had discussions and with whom the partners of Alsands had discussions. Two days ago I had a meeting with officials of Shell Canada in Toronto and they indicated to me that they had approached some potential partners themselves. I do not think it would be appropriate to reveal any particular names of companies in that case. The initiative lies with the consortium. These are confidential, commercial discussions taking place between private companies, and I do not intend to reveal any particular names.

REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT THAT PROJECT WILL PROCEED

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, yesterday in spite of a higher bank rate the Canadian dollar fell by two fifths of a point to $81.68. This morning the dollar opened at $81.42, down another quarter of a point. This, of course, is inflationary and/or will lead to higher interest rates. Given that analysts attribute this fall to the news about Alsands, will the minister help stop this free fall of the Canadian dollar and give his ironclad commitment to the House that the Alsands project will go ahead?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I think one great contribution to help strengthen the Canadian dollar would be a change in the type of rhetoric used by the Tory opposition in this House on many subjects, including the subject of energy.

Mr. Clark: Invoke martial law!

SELF-SUFFICIENCY PREDICTION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I will take responsibility for a lot of things but not for the failure of the National Energy Program.

In the National Energy Program the minister said that we would be self-sufficient in oil by 1990, partially because of the new supplies brought on by heavy oil and tar sands projects. Now that those projects are falling by the wayside one by one, he says we do not need the tar sands for self-sufficiency because we have Hibernia and east coast developments, in spite of the fact that he has yet to reach agreement with the coastal provinces. Could the minister tell the House why we should consider his latest prediction to be any more accurate than the prediction he made 15 months ago in the National Energy Program?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, it is our view that every effort should be put into the implementation of the Alsands project in particular. We think it would be very helpful, in terms of our goal of self-sufficiency by 1990. I must add, however, that in the last 15 months a lot more information has been gathered about reserves in the Beaufort Sea and the offshore east coast. That information is very encouraging and would indicate that, indeed, we can achieve oil self-sufficiency by 1990 with the help of the offshore discoveries and the Beaufort Sea discoveries.

ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT OF EAST COAST OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concerns settlement of the dispute with the Atlantic coast provinces respecting control and ownership of offshore resources. The minister knows that much of the hope for the future in Atlantic Canada is based on the accelerated development of submarine resources and that this development has been delayed and retarded by federal-provincial disputes. What is the state of the negotiations at the present time, particularly in Nova Scotia? Will the minister assure the House that the provinces of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland will receive a reasonable settlement from the federal government that will allow them not only to participate in development of those resources, but will also give them a fair share of the revenue?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to advise the House that an agreement in principle has been reached with the province of Nova Scotia during the night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: That agreement in principle was reached in the course of discussions which took place last night. There are a few points which still need to be ironed out. I expect that these points will be ironed out by the middle of next week. If that agreement is reached, indeed it will be of great benefit to Nova Scotia and will be an event which will be welcomed by everybody in Canada. It should ensure that development which is already under way will not be delayed. Contrary to what the hon. member said concerning the dispute about jurisdiction, that development will go ahead at an even faster speed in years to come.

Obviously the nature of the agreement will be revealed once everything has been ironed out and once it is ready for signature. But today I can announce that we have made a great deal of progress with Nova Scotia. In light of this development, I hope we can now make similar progress with the government of Newfoundland, and that the government of Newfoundland will show the same spirit of co-operation which the governments of Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia have shown in the last year.

PORT TERMINAL FOR LIQUEFIED NATURAL GAS PROJECT

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I suppose it is prudent to reserve judgment on the terms of the settlement. We can only hope that they will be beneficial to the people of Nova Scotia, as well as to all people in Canada. But I must correct the minister on one matter. It is not members who are saying that development has been retarded, it is officials of the oil companies, such as the Mobil Oil company, who have made that claim.

I want to ask the minister about another important project which affects the east coast, energy self-sufficiency, and security of supply; that is, the LNG project called the "Arctic Pilot Project". Could the minister ensure that this project is receiving the full support of the government? Will he also assure people on the east coast that the Nova Scotia port will be considered as the terminal for the LNG plant and that there will be no political action intended to have it located elsewhere, particularly on the St. Lawrence River?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am surprised by the allegation of the hon. member that he does not trust the Premier of Nova Scotia and the minister of energy for Nova Scotia to negotiate a good deal for their own province. I can tell him that I have more confidence in them to negotiate such a deal than in anybody in the Tory opposition in that regard.

Mr. Crosby: Not with a gun to their heads.

Mr. Lalonde: With regard to the question he raised, the issue is before the National Energy Board. It is being heard by that body, and we will await its conclusions. Private parties and provincial governments are welcome to make their cases and to be heard by the board. We will await its recommendations. There has been no interference—and I do not expect any—in the operations of the board. It has always operated as a quasi-judicial agency, and I do not know of any interference which has ever taken place in the activities of the board.

CANADIAN FEDERATION

PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON CO-OPERATIVE FEDERALISM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I should like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister said that co-operative federalism is dead. Since the essence of federalism is that different politicians have different legitimate responsibilities at different levels of government, inevitably from time to time they lead to conflict. Does the Deputy Prime Minister not agree that to minimize inherent structural conflicts in the federal system of Canada requires a co-operative attitude, especially on the part of the central government? Therefore would he not agree that the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday is in itself destructive of the very essence of federalism?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should look more closely at what the Prime Minister said. He went on to give a description of what, in his view, had been co-operative federalism, which he said was no longer applicable. I do not think that from that statement the hon. member ought to draw the conclusion that co-operation between the federal government and provincial governments has ended. I believe there will be co-operation, but probably in a different way, and probably more in keeping with some provincial aspirations expressed in the past to do their own thing and to avoid overlapping with federal activities.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO BLOC FUNDED PROJECTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the minister's attempt to pour oil over troubled waters will not take away the actual words, including the actual context, which the Prime Minister uttered. But in pursuing the subject I want to get into an area in which the minister himself has been actively involved. I am referring to the block funding projects, which seem to illustrate clearly the lack of a co-operative attitude coming from the central government.

Considering that the federal government itself proposed to the provinces the bloc funding scheme to apply to post-secondary education and to health services, and is now cutting back on the amounts of money going to those funds, leaving the provinces with the responsibility, will the minister not admit that by this attitude it is the central government itself that is destroying the notion of co-operative federalism in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has mentioned that we are intending to reduce the rate of growth in transfers to the provinces. I have made it clear, and the Prime Minister has made it clear, that under the proposals made to the provinces, including equalization, the cash transfers under EPF and tax transfers, the growth will be close to 12 per cent a year. That is about the same rate of growth that we plan for federal expenditures. It seems to me that is a fair and a co-operative way to behave, namely, to treat the provinces in the same way you treat your own government. I do not see any difficulty with defending that approach in the country as being one of co-operation and, indeed, equal treatment.

QUERY RESPECTING POLITICAL CREDIT FOR FUNDS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, everyone knows the government is cutting back on funds. The universities have said it; the provinces have said it; the opposition parties have said it. Only the Liberal Party of Canada is denying that everyone else takes to be the case. What lies fundamentally behind this approach, is the sheerest, crudest kind of politics. Isn't this a new attempt by the federal Liberal government to undermine the provinces and the old cost-sharing arrangement, on the backs, by the way, of sick people and students who need the money? They are the innocent victims. Is it not an attempt to get more political credit for the federal Liberal Party of Canada? Isn't that what is behind it?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They do not have any credit.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, that is not the point at all, Madam Speaker. The hon. member should know that in the proposals made to the provinces there is absolutely no reduction in the support for post-secondary education. There is absolutely no reduction in the field of medicare. Neither of these have been touched in our proposals. Even the premiers of the provinces when they released information on federal contributions to medical care and post-secondary education this past summer did not include the revenue guarantee as part of that contribution.

Mr. Blaikie: You did for five years. You have changed your tune now, and you want to get away with it.

Mr. MacEachen: It is true that we intend to eliminate the revenue guarantee, which was an adjustment made to the provinces in 1972 to compensate them for the unpredictability that had been created at that time in their minds because of tax reform. Surely it is reasonable ten years later to remove that kind of element from the federal-provincial situation?

CANADA POST

HOLIDAY POLICY FOR LETTER CARRIERS

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I will address my question to the President of the Treasury Board. I have a recent directive from the Canada Post Corporation outlining the holiday policy in relation to letter carriers this coming summer. It also outlines the policy to be followed when hiring short-term summer replacements. The directive says in part:

> These term employees are to be selected from the families of members of the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada bargaining unit.

I ask the minister, is this the standard policy of this government's Crown corporations and, if so, does he not feel this return to the practice of nepotism is definitely discriminatory, and in fact an embarrassment to the letter carriers?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I will be pleased to take notice of the question. The Canada Post Corporation does not fall under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board. The personnel practices of Crown corporations are not subject to Treasury Board control. However, I have noted the point raised by the hon. member and I will draw it to the attention of the responsible minister.

HIRING POLICY OF CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Obviously the minister is not aware of the actions of Crown corporations under his jurisdiction.

Mr. Blais: It is not under his jurisdiction.

Mr. Bradley: My supplementary is for the Acting Prime Minister, Madam Speaker. Could the minister tell us if this is the standard hiring policy of the Crown corporations of this government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member the details on that subject. I would be glad to look into it for him, but I do not want to give him an answer on a subject which I have not looked at.

Mr. Clark: Why did you sign the budget, then?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

MIRAMICHI RIVER DREDGING POLICY

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. He will be aware of the dredging project which had been under way on the Miramichi for some little time, having been started only after substantial pressure had been brought to bear on the government. Unfortunately, because of bottom conditions, the dredging equipment called for in the original contract was inadequate and the project was subsequently called off. That area has been badly hurt in many ways, including the recent announcement by the government that CFB Chatham is being closed down, and it badly needs this project to continue. Will the minister tell the House if it is his intention to resume the project with the proper equipment and, if so, when?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I must admit that I am not up to the hon. member's information level regarding the Miramichi. I will inform myself and answer the question in more specific terms as early as I can.

INCLUSION OF WHARF AREAS

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I would ask the minister, when he does that, to recognize the fact that in the original contract no allowance was made to dredge the wharf sites to the same depth as the river, which makes the project questionable in the minds of a good many people.

If it is his intention to resume the project, will the minister assure this House that the work will include the wharf areas so that ships which do manage to make it up the river will be able to tie up alongside the wharves and load their goods?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I will add that to my inquiry, Madam Speaker.

HOUSING

USE OF GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING FUNDS

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. The cost of government advertising next year will increase by 14 per cent, to $70 million. I ask the minister, would that money not be put to better use in housing?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, for the last three days this House has been debating a bill on housing whereby the government is most anxious to put into effect a budget provision of $350 million to provide housing. I think the energy of the hon. member opposite would be more fruitfully directed toward expediting that legislation in order to assist the government in providing housing.

INQUIRY RESPECTING MINISTER'S VIEW

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, last night I told the minister I thought his bill stinks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wright: I ask him again, would it not be more useful to put that $70 million into housing?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Well, Madam Speaker, that is the depth of the opposition's response and feeling to an attempt by this government to provide 70,000 jobs to people in the construction industry, and 30,000 units of modest housing to assist those people most desperately in need of housing in Canada.

LEAKAGE OF BUTANE FROM TANK CARS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On January 27 a tank car carrying butane was removed from train number 386 en route to Hamilton from Sarnia because it had no brakes. It was subsequently discovered to be leaking butane so badly that it took the fire department eight hours to bring it under control and stop the leaks. Subsequent investigation uncovered the fact that 28 similar incidents had occurred within a month. I ask the minister what is wrong with the inspection procedures of the CNR whereby those tank cars could have travelled from Sarnia to Hamilton through all the intervening municipalities? Does he understand that this could well be occurring in every other municipality across the country, and is he simply waiting for a disaster to occur before he takes action?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): No, Madam Speaker, I am not waiting for a disaster.

An hon. Member: You are a disaster.

Mr. Nystrom: Crow, Crow, Crow.

Mr. Pepin: My friend is aware that we have had a very important inquiry into transportation of dangerous goods, the Grange inquiry. He is aware that subsequently the CTC had hearings and they are implementing recommendations with respect to speed, equipment, and inspections. Those recommendations will then become the regulations. I will be providing a full progress report on the Grange inquiry in a few days.

My hon. friend is aware that a couple of years ago this House passed a bill on the transportation of dangerous goods. Regulations have been worked on since then and will be published this summer. A tremendous effort has been made in Canada to cover this area of the transportation of dangerous goods, and progress is being made. The provinces are co-operating. There will be accidents, indeed, but the fact that the hon. member himself indicates that they have been identified and corrections made is a clear indication of progress.

REQUEST THAT ALL TANK CARS BE INSPECTED

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, surely the minister understands that there would have been no identification of those leaks had it not been for mechanical problems. The problem is that, while the country waits for the minister to act, there is the distinct possibility that there could be a major catastrophe in any one of a number of municipalities in this country.

Will the minister today instruct the CNR that every single tank car carrying flammable or dangerous liquids should be inspected at its source, and inspected periodically along the line it travels, in order to guarantee public safety?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, that is exactly what I am trying to say. It is not my job; it is the job of the CTC to make sure that these things are done—

Mr. Clark: Like holding hearings on VIA Rail.

Mr. Pepin: —which is what I have indicated is being done. Inspection is governed by a number of CTC regulations. The new regulations will indicate how the inspections should be carried out, when, and in what manner, either by equipment or by an individual. Therefore this is all covered in the regulations of the CTC.

FINANCE

INCOME-AVERAGING ANNUITIES

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, based on a letter which I received from officials in his department with respect to the income-averaging annuity and those cases where farmers and small businessmen had made sales just before or just after the November 12 budget. They state, in one sentence of that letter, that the income averaging annuity would have been continued had they had a pre-budget agreement in writing with the issuer of the purchase of the IAAC.

Knowing Canadians, as we presume he does, in the small communities across Canada, how many Canadians does the minister know whose bankers or accountants have told them that they could have such contracts, that they had until February to get them, and who would also say they want to have it in writing because the government might change its mind before February? How many does he know who would do that?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member a count on that matter. I do know that agreements in writing exist in a good many transactions that take place.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ADJUST BUDGET PROVISION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I suspect that there are a few cases in which the minister is right, where there is something in writing. Does the minister not see a great discrimination where accountants say that they have had agreements, knowing that their clients were intending to buy before February? Their lawyers say that verbally and their banker says that verbally. If somebody has that written down, they get the service. However, others are denied the total advantage of their whole retirement fund from sales of farms simply because they do not have something in writing. Can the minister make some adjustment for those people who have no other method of providing for their retirement, except at the time of the sale of their farm, to put some of that money into an income-averaging annuity? Can he make some exception in that regard?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe we made an adjustment which would permit individuals to purchase a one-year income averaging annuity contract which could be transferred into a forward averaging system in the following year. That was the second adjustment that we attempted to make in order to accommodate the transition from one system to another, which I believe in general will probably be more favourable to the farmers than the one to which they have become accustomed.

ALSANDS PROJECT—CONSORTIUM NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the Alsands consortium indicated to him at what point in time, if negotiations are not completed, the Alsands project will fall by the pulling out of the remaining companies? If the negotiations are not complete, does the minister have a target date in mind that the Alsands consortium will not proceed?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Madam Speaker. I have not had an indication of the specific date in my discussions with the consortium partners. As the hon. member knows, there is an agreement between the consortium partners, the remaining partners that would take them to the end of June, I believe, in terms of proceeding with their own expenditures on the engineering and related matters. Obviously the consortium partners can revise those agreements at their discretion, but I have had no specific indication from any of the partners.

REQUEST FOR IRONCLAD GUARANTEE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In his response to the hon. member for Calgary Centre, he declined to give his ironclad guarantee that Alsands will go ahead. Will he give the House of Commons today his ironclad guarantee that Alsands will go ahead?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Certainly not, Madam Speaker.

INQUIRY RESPECTING NEW PARTNERS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is again to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He has had a very positive attitude that this plant will proceed. He has indicated that there are people waiting to invest in it. Are those he is talking to about investment in the Alsands project, members of the OPEC nations?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Madam Speaker.

IMPLEMENTATION OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS ON EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. The minister will be aware that it is the sixth anniversary of the tabling in the other place by Senator Buckwold, and the tabling in this House by myself, of the report of the Special Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service. That report contained 72 recommendations on which there has been no legislative action. When can we expect the official government response to the 72 recommendations in that report?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I must say I was not aware that today was the sixth anniversary. I hope to be able to report a great deal of progress in this area. The cabinet now has before it for consideration a number of recommendations respecting employer-employee relations in the public service. I would like to assure the hon. member for Vaudreuil that, in developing those proposals, we have relied very heavily on the very fine work done by the parliamentary joint committee and on the work done by Mr. Finkelman.

PUBLIC UTTERANCES BY PUBLIC SERVANTS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question on the general question of the public service. When we had our exchange in the House the other day, the minister seemed quite sure about what his position and the position of the government ought to be with respect to public servants and public utterances by public servants. When he went outside the House, he was not quite so clear. He admitted to reporters that the situation of civil servants might not be that clear cut. He says one thing inside the House and something else outside the House. Given that situation, are the specifics of the kind of issues that are extant in the case of Neil Fraser also before the cabinet, because the law is unclear, and public servants are in danger of being pilloried as a result of the government's attitude to rules that are unclear and rules that are unevenly enforced within the public service?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I do not recall saying anything in the House that was incompatible with anything I said outside the House with respect to the Neil Fraser case. I certainly do not have the capacity to speak out of both sides of my mouth as the hon. member seems to do on occasion.

Mr. Clark: Stay on the high road, Don.

Mr. Johnston: This whole question is subject to the grievance procedure. I understand the employee in question is exercising his right in accordance with the grievance procedure. If I said outside the House that these cases are not black and white, they certainly are not. There are obviously grey areas in any kind of procedure. Dismissals, whether they be in the public service or the private sector, are subject to the same kind of considerations.

REPRESENTATIONS BY OTTAWA LIBERAL MEMBERS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, it is interesting that in the grey area the government moved so precipitously in this important case. Has the President of the Treasury Board received representations with respect to this case from the hon. member for Ottawa West, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, and the hon. member for Ottawa Centre? What views have they expressed to the President of the Treasury Board with respect to the case under discussion?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, whatever representations may or may not have been made to me as President of the Treasury Board have little to do with the case in question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: That settles that.

Mr. Johnston: As I explained in this House, and as I will again explain to the hon. member, the code of conduct with respect to each department is the responsibility of the deputy minister in that department. The decisions that are made with respect to discipline of the kind which took place in the Neil Fraser case is the responsibility of that deputy minister. The grievance procedure provides for an appeal to that deputy minister. As I said before, that is the procedure which is in place. It has always been satisfactory in the past. I gather it is proceeding in accordance with the established rules in the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Neil Fraser will obviously have every opportunity to present his views and to exercise all the recourses available to him under the law. I would be happy to hear representations from him with regard to that. If he is not satisfied that the appeal to the PSSRB is a satisfactory recourse, let him say so. We will be happy to look at it. However, to my knowledge, to this day the procedures which are in place have been entirely satisfactory in resolving grievances of employees who feel that they have been unfairly treated.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON TAX AUDIT OF FISHERMEN

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue who is responsible for the audit of fishermen which has resulted in garnisheed wages, remortgaged homes, and exorbitant loans to pay back-owing income tax. With regard to a letter which I sent to the minister on December 10 which asked for an independent commission to investigate that tax audit and how fishermen are being treated, does the minister have such a report? His reply was that he would have his department carry out a report on that audit. Does the minister have that report now and is he prepared to divulge that information to the House?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the audit is going ahead on the east and west coasts. There is no independent assessment of the audit. I receive reports from the department from time to time on the progress of the audit both on the east and west coasts. I do not have the figures in front of me for the west coast audit but I would be glad to get those and discuss them with the hon. member.

TAX DEDUCTIONS AT SOURCE

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, the minister had indicated in a letter from his office that he would be carrying out an investigation with regard to an independent audit, or at least providing a tax lawyer for those people wishing to appeal their audit.

In the motions tabled on November 12 in the budget there was the suggestion that fishermen will be required to pay income tax "at source", that is, when they sell their fish to the processors. Is the minister aware of the financial burden that this will place on fishermen in terms of trying to find capital at the beginning of a fishing season, and is he aware that it is an added burden which may drive more fishermen out of the industry than have been driven out already by this government?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the policy of having taxes for fishermen deducted at source was a request that indeed came from the fishermen themselves. At least the fishermen on the east coast requested that, and people who were supporting the fishermen and helping them with their tax returns said that this would be a good measure. It was a suggestion which we made to the Minister of Finance and he agreed that it was a proper measure, and indeed did insert in the budget ways and means to have fishermen's taxes deducted at source.

We believe that this is a good measure which would eliminate possible inaccuracies which may occur through reporting in other ways. If there is a different feeling on the west coast I would be glad to hear from the fishermen there, but it is quite clearly the position of fishermen on the east coast that they would like to have taxes deducted at source.

FEDERAL SHARE OF GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday the Prime Minister stated that the federal share of total government spending in Canada, including municipal expenditures, had dropped steadily since 1959 in favour of provincial spending. Would the minister confirm that since the Prime Minister took office in 1968 the federal share of government spending in Canada has in fact risen, and will he therefore admit that the Prime Minister's rationale for killing co-operative federalism in Canada is just an excuse to grab more power and even more money for the federal government at the expense of the health and education of Canadians, especially in the poorer provinces?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Madam Speaker, I would not admit to something which is totally incorrect. As I stated earlier in reply to a question from the hon. member for Oshawa, in the proposals before the provinces at the present time we intend to maintain our level of support for the provinces, not only to maintain the level but to increase it annually by up to 12 per cent in transferring billions of dollars to the provinces not only in cash but also in tax points.

PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON CO-OPERATIVE FEDERALISM

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, for my supplementary question I will refer the minister to a document from his own department entitled "Economic Review" dated April, 1981, and specifically to page 194, which makes it clear that the Prime Minister's statement yesterday about federal-provincial spending is totally false. In light of that fact would the Minister of Finance tell the House and the people of Canada, especially in the provinces which may be concerned, what is the rationale for the Prime Minister wanting to put an end to co-operative federalism in this country? Is it simply that he enjoys fighting with other Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, obviously the hon. member does not want any information. If he did he would not put a question in that offensive way, just to score some points against the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: What about the Prime Minister yesterday?

Mr. MacEachen: If the hon. member wants to ask a serious question I will be glad to answer, but I will not engage in a petty exchange with him in which he is scoring some political points.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

DEPLOYMENT OF FIXED-WING AIRCRAFT IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell the House, especially in the aftermath of the most recent tragedy on the east coast, why he has not complied with the recommendations of a federal inquiry set up in 1970 which recommended in 1971, following the sinking of two ships with the loss of lives on the east coast, that fixed-wing aircraft be deployed to Newfoundland? Why was that recommendation not followed and how can he justify serving an area of five million square kilometres from two fixed-wing bases within close proximity to each other in the maritimes?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, first of all I would like to repeat what I said yesterday, that I understand the concern of the hon. member for St. John's East very well, and I also appreciate the motion presented today under Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, and the hon. member for St. John's East.

An hon. Member: Why did you say no?

Mr. Lamontagne: I can assure hon. members that I will do everything I can in this matter and, further to that, I have already asked my department to examine the possibility of reinforcing the air rescue capabilities in Newfoundland as much as possible, without disrupting the effectiveness of other areas.

As for the recommendations in 1970, to which the hon. member referred, as I said yesterday, a lot has been done as far as improvements to our search and rescue capabilities over the last few years. As I said yesterday, we have initiated many improvements for our helicopters, such as providing long-range fuel tanks, rescue hoists, high-powered search lights, and some improved navigational avionics. In addition, we are currently working on new radar and improved instrumentation. Therefore I think a lot has been done about improving our search and rescue capabilities.

An hon. Member: Not enough.

Mr. Lamontagne: Maybe in the opinion of some hon. members not enough has been done, but what is enough when we consider the length of coastline we have to cover? I think that this is the important question with which we must deal.

LACK OF RADAR EQUIPMENT ON HELICOPTERS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, could the minister state why the rescue helicopters in Newfoundland have not been equipped with weather radar, a fact which rendered them useless during the Ocean Ranger tragedy, and why these helicopters do not have the support in Newfoundland of fixed-wing aircraft, which was recommended by a federal inquiry established by the government in 1970?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I have just mentioned to the hon. member the improvements we have made to our search and rescue operations. I think that the hon. member understands the complexity of such an operation. Even with new radar our helicopters would have been unable to take off, in the Ocean Ranger incident.

There is another incident off the Magdalen Islands which happened this morning. The aircraft are ready on standby but they cannot reach the area off the Magdalen Islands immediately because of bad weather.

Mr. Clark: We have a first-class good-weather rescue capacity.

Mr. Lamontagne: I repeat again that with all the opinions, and with people giving all sorts of reactions to the incident, I think the best way to deal with it is to wait until the inquiry recommends what the improvements should be. In the meantime we are doing a lot to improve our capabilities even in Newfoundland. If it is at all possible I will try, on a trial basis, to put fixed-wing aircraft in Newfoundland.

REMISSION ORDER APPLICABLE TO NORTHERN ALLOWANCES

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who has assumed the lead role for the responsibility of finding an alternative to the remission order affecting northern benefits. I would like to ask the minister today whether he has reached a decision on the technique or the regime which should be put in place before the end of this year to replace the remission order. In other words, will the Income Tax Act be used to compensate northerners for the excessive living costs they experience every day?

• (1200)

I would also like to know whether the minister is aware that his responsibility extends below Sixty. There are all kinds of uncongenial isolated environments in the country which lie below Sixty.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question I would first like to say that I appreciate the work the hon. member has put into the whole question of northern benefits, and we have examined in some detail some of the proposals he has put forward.

Yes, I have had many meetings with some of my colleagues, including the Minister of Finance, with respect to how we should go about doing something constructive about northern benefits, especially once the "moratorium" is over. Various techniques are being explored at the moment. I do not think it would be helpful to speculate at this stage on what technique may be adopted, inasmuch as they are all under active consideration. There has been no firm policy decision taken in terms of my submitting it at this stage to my cabinet colleagues. I can only tell the hon. member we are weighing all the alternatives. We are doing so in a very thorough way, and I hope in combination with my colleagues to have a definite proposal for implementation soon, possibly prior to the end of the moratorium.

INQUIRY WHETHER HEARINGS WILL BE HELD

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, in coming up with a final position with respect to this crucial problem, which is a very high priority in the north, can the minister tell me what technique he intends to use for the rest of the year to broaden the input? Will he hold hearings in the north? Will northerners have a say? Will there be a sectoral analysis including mining, Indian affairs, and other legitimate minority groups which will be affected in the north? What technique will the minister use to broaden the input and the public information that is necessary to make the right decision finally?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is well aware that the input already over the last couple of years has been very significant. We have heard from mining interests. We have certainly heard from the oil and gas people. We have heard from the chambers of commerce. We have heard from all the resource-oriented people. We have heard from native groups. We have heard from the territorial governments themselves on this question, and we are continuing to hear from them with respect to this, so the input has been gigantic. Some of the suggestions have been very good.

As the hon. member is aware, one impact on the whole question of northern benefits is the energy situation as far as north of Sixty is concerned. An energy task force has been working with the territorial governments and native interests. The report of the task force is almost ready for publication. Perhaps the draft is already in the hon. member's hands; I do not know. However, we are coming out with our own energy paper following that task force, and northerners have been very much part of that. It will have a very significant impact on what form northern benefits take because, as the hon. member knows, a very significant portion of the higher cost of living in the north relates directly to energy costs.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 2,264, 3,302, 3,684, 3,685 and 3,721.

MATERNITY BENEFITS

Question No. 2,264—Mr. Herbert:

1. In the last year, how many pregnant women were drawing unemployment insurance benefits and were not entitled to regular benefits during confinement?

2. Does the government consider that from eight weeks before the week of the confinement until six weeks after the confinement women are incapable of and unavailable for work?

3. For what period is an unemployed woman not entitled to regular benefits during confinement and is a woman who is available for work and actively seeking employment two weeks after confinement subject to a change in this period?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. In 1980 a total of 107,336 women were drawing unemployment insurance benefits during confinement.

2. No. As the legislation permits only the payment of maternity benefit during the period in question, the requirements of capability and availability, necessary for regular benefit, are not issues to be considered.

3. Unemployed women may not receive regular benefit during the period that commences eight weeks before the expected date of confinement and terminates six weeks after the actual week in which the confinement occurs. As this period is set by legislation, and there are no exempting provisions, any change in the claimant's availability will not affect the duration. It should be noted that the specific problems arising from the application of the legislative provisions dealing with benefits for reasons of maternity, were extensively reviewed by a task force which, among other things, has recommended major changes. These, however, are subject to approval by the government and the final decision has not yet been made.

COMPETITION FOR CR-5 POSITION

Question No. 3,302—Mr. Cossitt:

Did the Department of Employment and Immigration hold a competition, number 402 for a CR-5 position, bearing the code number 0437-34-EIC-3133 and, if so (a) what were the names of those who applied under this competition and what were the names of those actually interviewed (b) has the position been filled and, if not, will immediate consideration be given to one of the applicants, Mr. James A. Windsor of 366 James Street East, Prescott, Ontario?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No such competition, bearing code number 0437-34-EIC-3133 has been issued by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission/Department, and therefore, the Commission/Department is unable fo offer any comment.

BILINGUAL BONUS FOR PUBLIC SERVANTS

Question No. 3,684—Mr. Herbert:

1. Were public servants receiving the bilingualism bonus required to take a second test to determine their continuing eligibility for the bonus?

2. Is it the government's intention to introduce such a retesting procedure and, if so, at what time intervals?

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): 1. Yes, a number of them were. Since April 1, 1980, bilingualism bonus recipients have had to be confirmed annually, at the time of their official employee performance appraisal, as still meeting the language requirements of their position in order to continue receiving bonus payments. The Language Knowledge Examination (LKE) can be used for this purpose under the following circumstances:

(a) when there is no linguistically qualified supervisor to confirm the employee's eligibility;

(b) if the employee is not exempted from further testing by the Public Service Commission as a result of demonstrated high proficiency in the second official language;

(c) if the employee does not possess LKE results which fall within the one and two year periods of validity established by the Public Service Commission; and

(d) if an employee does not agree with the supervisor's assessment, he or she may have recourse to an LKE

2. See 1 above.

NUMBER OF PUBLIC SERVANTS RECEIVING BILINGUALISM BONUS

Question No. 3,685—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, by province and by stated first official language of the individual, how many public servants were receiving the bilingualism bonus?

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): The table below presents a breakdown by province (or by region where applicable), and by stated first official language of the individual, of the number of public servants which were eligible to receive the bilingualism bonus in each of the past five years.

In order to ensure consistency of the data supplied, figures for February, 1978, have been provided instead of those for December, 1977, as these were calculated by using slightly different criteria. Similarly, and as they are still eligible to receive the bilingualism bonus, employees of the Canada Post Corporation are included in the December, 1981 figures.

Order Paper Questions

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Question No. 3,721—Mr. Herbert:

What percentage of public servants working in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Quebec indicate English as their first official language?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: 39.1 percent.

[English]

Mr. Peterson: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the parliamentary secretary. Over the past several weeks I have been asking when I can expect an answer to questions Nos. 3,380 to 3,438 concerning the recommendations in the "Obstacles" report. I have been advised consistently that the parliamentary secretary has been "in hot pursuit" of answers to these questions. I am beginning to think what we are getting here are repeat shows of the "Bugs Bunny Road Runner Hour".

These questions are extremely important. The minister responsible previously advised us that these questions have already been responded to by the cabinet. I fail to see what possible reason there can be for not providing the answers to these questions on the Order Paper.

Mr. Peterson: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member very much for drawing this matter to our attention.

Mr. Young: Again.

Mr. Peterson: It is a matter I will be prepared to bring to the attention of my hon. colleague on his return.

Just for the information of this House, I would like to draw to its attention that to date we have answered 2,809 questions, including those which have been answered today. We are working very hard to respond in a responsible parliamentary fashion to the questions which have been brought to our attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CROWSNEST PASS FREIGHT RATES

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville) moved:

That this House condemns the government for abandoning the historical and statutory rights of western grain producers by proposing an end to the Crowsnest Pass freight rate, thereby giving guarantees to the railways and not to the producers; regrets that an inquiry has been established without clearly defined terms of reference, without adequate provision for producer participation and without reference to Parliament; approves in principle the payment by the government on an annual basis of an amount equivalent to the 1981-82 railway revenue shortfall, provided that adequate performance and capacity guarantees are met by the railways; and, calls on the government to refer the document "Policy Statement on Western Rail Transportation" to the Standing Committee on Transport for full consideration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on February 8 the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) made a major policy statement on western rail transportation on behalf of the Liberal government in the city of Winnipeg, to the effect that the government proposes substantially to alter a historic and statutory provision which affects not only the producers of Canada but the whole economy of western Canada. The implications of this policy are enormous.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say on behalf of this party that we protest in the strongest way possible the fact that the minister chose to make the announcement outside the House. We find this particularly offensive inasmuch as the House was in session at the time. This is a matter of vital importance to western Canada, Mr. Speaker, and it is also an issue of national importance. It could change in a fundamental way the lifestyle of many Canadians. The statutory rate could be considered the pillar of western Canadian society and the western Canadian economy. It should be recognized that there is a tremendous amount of emotion in the west about the subject of statutory change.

In view of all this we would have thought that the minister would have had the common sense to stand in his place in the House and make his announcement and then be available to respond to the questions of Members of Parliament from that region in order to clarify matters.

It appears that Parliament and parliamentary committees are going to be ignored in this process. It also appears that in the next four to six months a backroom deal will be negotiated in private, that Parliament will stand idly by while a group appointed by the minister strikes up a deal in camera. The minister has told us that if farmers do not like it or do not agree, then he will proceed unilaterally. In other words, the terms of the agreement will be imposed; the government will go ahead anyway.

What I find even more disturbing is a report which appeared in The Globe and Mail on February 8 in which the minister is reported as saying that the government cannot indulge in a great consultative process with the public. I am not sure whether that means more unilateralism or not; it probably does. The minister will likely claim that there has been a tremendous debate, and there has, Mr. Speaker, but his particular proposal has not been debated at any length.

Is it any wonder that a mood of suspicion, anxiety and mistrust is growing in western Canada? There are two reasons for this, Mr. Speaker. First of all, most people in western Canada do not trust Liberal governments, and second, most people in western Canada put little trust in the railways.

This is a two-pronged situation. Surely the minister does not expect members of the House to stand idly by, a mere rubber stamp in the process? Surely he does not expect the farmers of Canada to accept a pig in a poke—an expression used by a former member of the House who found comfort and rest in the Liberal ranks. That is really what the minister is asking the farmers of Canada to do.

The process upon which the minister has embarked should be rejected on two counts. First, it should be rejected because he has chosen to circumvent the parliamentary process, thereby denying their legitimate role to elected Members of Parliament who should have a say in it. There is a double standard here, Mr. Speaker, and a contradiction. The minister very graciously referred a document on a new domestic air policy to the transport committee for study. I understand many hearings have already been held involving the industry, other interested parties and Members of Parliament and these are expected to be helpful. In the case before us, however, the minister has chosen not to take that route, thereby denying Members of Parliament, interested groups and producers the opportunity to debate the issue in a formal way.

On the second count, we believe that the process should be rejected on the basis that it denies the producers of Canada their legitimate right to be heard. I cannot emphasize too strongly that if this policy is implemented it will have a most profound effect upon the producers of Canada. They view it with fear, anxiety and apprehension because it could very dramatically alter the social and economic lifestyle of many people in western Canada. I am concerned about the way this policy has evolved and how the legislation will be drawn up, Mr. Speaker. I know the minister to be a reasonable man but I say to you, Sir, and to the House that the only word to describe his actions in this regard is contemptuous. I warn him that his actions will further fuel the fires of suspicion and mistrust that exist in western Canada.

It must not be forgotten that this process is being introduced by a government which does not have an elected member from rural western Canada in the House.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): And it never will.

Mr. Mazankowski: I should like to deal briefly with the main objectives of the proposal introduced by the minister. First of all, it sets out to abandon the existing statutory freight rate; it commits the government to a level of funding equal to the 1981-82 railway revenue shortfall and it calls upon producers to meet any future cost increases beyond the 1981-82 shortfall in negotiation with the railways. One must pause and think about that, Mr. Speaker. What chance would producers have to negotiate freight rates with the railways? That would be very, very difficult indeed. Large corporations have tried to tackle the railways in an effort to gain a fair freight rate and have not succeeded. That is a serious weakness in the proposal.

While acknowledging the importance of the federal government's commitment to meet the current shortfall, I have to say that this party cannot accept a freight rate structure which will have an open-ended escalation clause that would result in increased charges being put on the backs of the producers. There is no way we can accept that, Mr. Speaker. Nor can this party accept the removal of the statutory freight rate assurance. This would have the effect of relieving the railways of a continuing obligation and shift it on to the backs of the producers as well.

The proposal also sets out to place a fixed ceiling on further federal contributions. That would mean that the government would be relieved of any additional burden over and above the 1981-82 shortfall while the producers would be bearing the brunt of any inflationary or cost increase associated with the movement of grain.

The minister has made this quite clear but other ministers have expressed different views. Apparently a "Crow rift" exists between the minister and the minister in the other place who is in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is not the first time there has been a rift between the two ministers but this creates even more uncertainty in the minds of producers and others who are watching the debate with keen interest.

The minister in the other place says that a change will not be imposed but the minister across the way says that it will be, regardless whether there is agreement or not. These conflicts and varying interpretations must be cleared up.

When methods are being developed to establish a system of periodic reviews to provide railways with adequate compensation, in effect they remove statutory protection. They are couched in such subtle terms that many people have difficulty discerning them. We must ask ourselves what are the implications for producers, or what is the basis for calculating railway revenue shortfall? Also we have heard comments to the effect that any future increases to producers may well be tied to increases in grain prices.

What are the implications? If we look at Mr. Snavely's last report, we see that he indicated that if the gross revenue shortfall continues to increase at the same rate in the future, it will exceed $1 billion by 1986. Given the shortfall of $600 million and the prospect of a $1 billion shortfall in five years, it seems to me that in five years producers may very well be looking at increased transportation costs in the order of $400 million.

I say as simply and bluntly as I can that farmers cannot afford it, particularly at this time. It is estimated that next year farm income will drop by 15 per cent. Statistics reveal that fuel costs will rise by 25 per cent in 1982, and this is on top of a 63 per cent increase over the last two years. This amounts to an 89 per cent increase in fuel prices over a three-year period. Between 55 cents and 60 cents of that fuel price increase goes to the coffers of the federal government. It is a massive rip-off on the backs of producers. When we consider what the federal government will cash in on from its energy agreement or its oil pricing agreement signed with the western provinces—something in the order of $51 billion—the subsidies to meet the Crow deficit are pretty small and pale by comparison. The fact of the matter is that Canadian farmers are hurting with high interest and depressed commodity prices. The budget provided no relief, there are bankruptcies, dreams are being shattered, young people are losing confidence, a lifetime of investment in long hours and hard work is vanishing. In short, there is hopelessness and despair in the farming community.

We in this party want to know, and producers must know, what the minister had in mind when he asked Professor Gilson to consider the application of variable freight rates. We should like to know how the government sees the subsidy being distributed. We should like to know what the minister would like to see in terms of how the $600 million should be distributed; obviously he has some ideas. We should like to know what the minister had in mind when he referred to guarantee mechanisms to ensure adequate performance and capacity. Will it be only through legislation? Will it be through penalties or a performance bonus? What about investment guarantees? The House and producers of Canada need assurances that the investment provided through the funding of the federal government goes into beefing up the railway system rather than shopping centres, oil companies and hotels. With due respect, I do not think the minister dealt seriously with this issue; he was far too casual. Also we should like to know what mechanisms the minister has in mind to remove existing freight rate anomalies and to provide some semblance of parity between processed and unprocessed products. Also we should like to know what the government has in mind. We should like some enlightenment when the minister talks about economic diversification. How will it help western Canadian farmers? There is much at stake, much too much to be left solely to the task of the negotiator.

The policy enunciated was extremely vague in many areas; it is open to different interpretations. Someone suggested that it was a policy slathered in grease. Parliament should not be a bystander in the process; Parliament and its membership should be active participants. There should be no question about the fact that producers must be involved. It is an issue that is far greater than a simple freight rate adjustment. It strikes at the very fabric of the social and economic lifestyle of western Canada.

I remind the House that the west is in a rebellious mood; there is a feeling of volatility out there. Sometimes the volatility in the House reflects the mood in western Canada. The move to dismantle Crowsnest Pass freight rates is perceived to be yet another attack upon western Canada and a further escalation of the climate of confrontation we have witnessed of the government which generated intense mistrust and suspicion. There is a difference in the mood out there today compared with the mood when my party formed the Government of Canada. At that time there was a mood of co-operation, a feeling of harmony and a feeling that we could do things together. There was a feeling of confidence and stability; promises and commitments were being kept and acted upon. We all know the mess in grain transportation when our party took over government. We had just come through a year when there was a loss of $1 billion worth of grain sales because of breakdowns in the transportation system. We sought and obtained the co-operation of all parties, including the provincial governments of western Canada. We appointed a railway co-ordinator. We worked together with the railways. We promised action on Prince Rupert, and action was taken. We promised action on preserving branch lines, and branch lines were preserved. There was a positive mood, not a negative one. Now the mood is really desperation.

I should like to turn to the question of mandate. Does the Liberal government have a mandate to abandon the Crowsnest Pass freight rates? Of course it does not. The Liberal government not only failed to live up to its promises to provide such things as cheap energy, energy self-sufficiency, low interest rates, a well-managed economy, jobs, adequate housing and a healthy agricultural climate, but it failed to tell Canadians what it intended to do. For example, it did not tell Canadians during the election campaign that it would embark upon a policy of confrontation which is literally tearing the country apart. It did not tell Canadians that it would spend the first 18 months of its term of office talking about a new Constitution and discarding the problems of the economy. It did not tell Canadians that it would bring in a devastating National Energy Program which is seeing men, equipment, capital and expertise flowing south of the border. It did not tell Canadians that it would tax them to the hilt, directly and indirectly, and literally double the price of energy. It did not tell Canadians that it would dismantle DREE or destroy the private sector. It did not tell Canadians that it would dismantle 20 per cent of the VIA Rail passenger route structure or that it would abandon Crowsnest Pass freight rates. I ask hon. members of the House whether the Liberal Party would have obtained its mandate from the Canadian people if it had told the truth? No, never!

Many of these crucial policies affect western Canada where there are no elected Liberal members west of the city of Winnipeg. Does one still wonder why there is alienation out there, mistrust or suspicion? Alienation and political reaction are ticking away like time bombs.

What is Liberal policy? The Liberal policy on the Crow, as indicated in its policy manual in 1980, was that it was committed to preserving statutory freight rates. As late as July 4 to July 6, 1980, at the Liberal Party convention, it was stated that the Liberal Party reaffirmed its determination to preserve statutory freight rates. The minister in this House acknowledged and agreed that the statutory rate must remain. There is a significant passage in Hansard for May 2, 1980 at page 693. I had the floor at that time and said:

We have been saying that the Crow rate in statute form enshrined in law must remain. We have also said, and the hon. member is now saying it in this motion, that the railways should be adequately compensated for the movement of grain.

Then there is an interjection by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), as follows:

Mr. Pepin: Right on.

In other words, he was agreeing with that statement.

As I said, there is no disagreement on that. Where there is debate and discussion but no clear consensus, it is on how the federal government will pay the difference. I repeat what I said on May 2, 1980:

We have been saying that the Crow rate in statute form enshrined in law must remain.

The minister at that time agreed. Today the minister says that a new statutory freight rate, which will have an increased freight rate for the producers, which will have built in a periodic escalation clause which will be paid for by the farmers after negotiations with the railways, is now being put into effect. That is entirely different. We have the deputy minister of transport suggesting in his comments to the press that the farmers will likely pay double or triple the Crow. If the cost triples, that means another $275 million to $300 million which will come from the pockets of the producers.

The deputy minister, when pinned down by reporters, said that he could not answer in any detail because "There were too many permutations and combinations." That is a far cry from the Liberal policy that was proposed during the election of 1980 and during a policy convention held in Winnipeg that year.

I repeat, the farmers simply cannot afford this additional cost. They are being strangled at the present time by high interest costs, high energy costs, high fertilizer costs, high machinery costs and high chemical costs. Most of those conditions are the product of this government. The farmers are facing reduced commodity prices. All of this is doing nothing more than driving nails further into the coffins of many progressive farmers in western Canada. The additional freight rate will simply add to that burden.

Our party has stated that the status quo, that is the existing arrangement, is not satisfactory. We have said that because it has brought us to the kind of chaos, breakdown and collapse in grain transportation which we see from time to time. We have said as well that the railways should be adequately compensated for hauling grain; that is, given a fair rate for hauling grain. We have said that the existing statutory freight rates should remain. We have said that the shortfall should be met by the federal treasury and that adequate guarantees must be provided to ensure adequate capacity and performance. When we say that, we are talking not simply about legislation but about penalties and/or rewards for extra, laudable performance.

As I have said before, we commend the minister for coming forth and telling the House and the country what the government is prepared to do in terms of meeting that shortfall. We have said that had to be done in order to proceed. We have also said that the anomalies of freight rates between processed and unprocessed products must be resolved. There should be no question about that. We have said as well that this can be done and must only be done with the provision that there is full and adequate consultation with the producers of Canada. Furthermore, we believe as well that the railways should not be relieved entirely of their statutory obligations. We believe they have an ongoing obligation and should continue to shoulder that ongoing obligation.

We believe as well that the federal government has an ongoing responsibility, in addition to the provision of the 1981-1982 shortfall, because there are a number of artificial and natural advantages that our competing countries have when it comes to getting our fair share of the export market potential. We believe that export grain, being a national asset, is an issue that has to have support in financial terms, in marketing terms and in moral terms in ensuring that we can maintain a healthy production in the export market of grains.

Furthermore, I believe that a very strong argument can be made for no further payments to the railways until they at least demonstrate to the satisfaction of the producers of Canada that they have installed adequate capacity, that they have put in place the kind of performance that will assure producers that they will deliver the grain on time in a reliable and effective fashion and, I stress again, to the satisfaction of the producers.

Some people believe that the Crowsnest Pass freight rates have always been a losing proposition for the railways. I want to tell this House that it has not been a losing proposition for 85 years. Up until about 1967, the Crowsnest Pass freight rate was compensatory. The railways made money on it. They built up vast empires during that period of time. They branched out into various activities.

I put to this House a very serious suggestion. It seems to me that if the railways could deliver grain in this country for half a cent a ton mile for 85 years, there may very well be an excellent argument made for the fact that surely they can deliver grain at a half a cent a ton mile plus $612 million for at least another 20 years. Maybe that is something the minister should consider. That would take us to the year 2000. I ask the minister to consider that proposal seriously. That would give the railways an opportunity to prove what they can do with $612 million annually. It would give the railways an opportunity to prove that they are serious about beefing up capacity and improving the service.

I have said before, and some people will argue, that that is quite a bit of money and we are tapping the federal treasury too severely. But I repeat again that this government is extracting a substantial amount of revenue out of western Canada in the form of energy taxes to the tune of $51 billio&ed-4n or $52 billion over the next five years. Every time a farmer fills up his tractor or combine, between 55 cents and 60 cents on every gallon of fuel that goes into his machine goes to the federal coffers. That is almost outright confiscation against our food producers.

I turn now to the New Democratic Party. The federal NDP say they want to retain the status quo, yet they want the Hall recommendations implemented. They cannot have it both ways. If the Hall recommendations are implemented, that is not the status quo. That is quite a change. The NDP should not argue that. They should be saying they are in favour of change. They offer as a panacea to improving the system the proposal to nationalize the CPR. They seem to be more interested in pursuing a philosophical objective than in improving the grain transportation system. Quite frankly, it would cost billions of dollars to do that and it would not move one additional bushel of grain.

The minister of transport of Saskatchewan says as well that he wants no change, but he is advocating change by recommending that we follow the Hall recommendations. He, too, wants to buy a railroad. He has a heritage trust fund in Saskatchewan that he is going to tap. He wants to buy the CPR. The minister there wants to spend the taxpayers' dollars in Saskatchewan in a way which will not improve the transportation system one iota. He is offering a Crow rate guarantee plan. Here again he is prepared to tax the people of Saskatchewan to fund a major portion of the freight bill to move processed products.

Mr. Shields: No damn principles.

• (1240)

Mr. Mazankowski: Then I come to the Premier of Saskatchewan. Well, he favours a statutory rate but not necessarily the Crow. He says he is prepared to negotiate future cost increases as long as the producers keep the benefit of the Crow. But then he signed a document just the other day which says he is not prepared to accept any changes. Mr. Speaker, how can the New Democratic Party be taken seriously when they say they are going to fight, but when the crunch comes they become merely an appendage to the Liberal government in office?

Mr. Shields: Always have been, always will be.

Mr. Mazankowski: When the chips are down they fall in line and bolster the hopes of the Liberal Party, a party which occupies the seat of a Treasury Board which is bankrupting this country. I say shame on them.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if this country is in a mess today, the New Democratic Party of Canada must share the blame. I say to you as well that if the farmers of Canada lose their statutory rights, they must blame the NDP as well as the Liberals because the NDP put this government in office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have to take a moment to compose myself. I have been sort of snickering as I listened to the last speaker outline his perception of my party's position on the Crow. I would point out to the House and to the country, Mr. Speaker, that our party has been consistent this year, last year, during the most recent election and in previous elections with regard to the Crow rate issue. I would point out that the hon. member's party still has members taking a different stand from the one he outlined. They are actively pursuing a program of doing away with the Crow, and they are unabashed critics of the Crow.

Before commencing my formal remarks I would just like to make a short comment about the allegation concerning the cost of nationalizing the CPR. If the hon. member was honest and looked at the amount of public money which has already been put into the CPR, and if he translated that into present day values and considered the time they have had the use of those assets, the difference between that and the current book or market value—whichever you want—of the CPR is less than $1 billion. Two or three years of the Crow subsidy would purchase the CPR and we could put the railway system on a national basis and operate it as a part of this country's national policy once more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: It could hardly pay for the operating costs.

Mr. Althouse: I am going to talk about the economics of the Crow rate but I want to put it in context by explaining to some extent the background. I think the reasons given for changing the Crow have essentially been described by the government and by those members of the Conservative Party who advocate change as being progressive reasons, reasons which are tied to economics and the philosophy of user-pay. I will get back to that, but I just want to point out that this country does not make very much sense from an economic point of view. This country is not something that would go together in an economic textbook if you were drawing boundaries and throwing people together. To quote a recent article by Don McGillivray:

> The fact that Canada exists shows that an economic absurdity can become a political reality.

I think when we review the history behind the Crow rate we will see that there were a great many of what would now be called economic absurdities but which were in fact political realities which had to be faced up to and solved with a creative pragmatism in order that Canada could continue as a country.

Canada developed in spite of geographical, language, racial and cultural barriers. There are two languages and many races and cultures. No one, Mr. Speaker, would ever propose a change to the basic and fundamental framework of this country by saying that, because of economics, bilingualism should no longer exist. We live with the cost of two languages, and there is some cost, with no complaint because it is part of the way this country was put together. It came about because we did not want to fight a big and expensive war over it. We decided that compromise made more sense than worrying about future economic considerations. So we have a bilingual country. The same thing applies to the signing of native treaties. We guaranteed certain native rights, not thinking about future economics but because it made sense, at the time, for political and defence reasons, to avoid bloodshed. And it allowed us to develop the whole of this country by following that route.

I began my remarks in this way because the Crowsnest agreement was developed for those same reasons. Even though there was a railway across Canada connecting the west to the centre, southeastern British Columbia was, in effect, being invaded by Americans. The states of Oregon and Washington were once British territories, but American settlers moved in and they became American. That was happening to the mineral rich area of southeastern British Columbia, and so that province urged the Government of Canada to run a branch line into the Crowsnest Pass in order to maintain our hold on that part of the country. There were political, military and economic reasons for this. They were good reasons in 1896 and there continue to be good reasons today.

When the then provincial government of Manitoba heard of the proposed gift to the CPR to compensate them for moving a line into that part of the country, they pointed out that a lot of farmers were very unhappy with the actions of the CPR. It was a monopoly and was behaving like one. It was laying down the rules as to where the little towns would be built, where the farmers could deliver their grain and which elevators would be situated on which sidings.

Now, there was quite a lot of separatist talk at the time, and part of the agreement reached was that farmers and settlers in western Canada would be guaranteed a rate based on equal distance, equal rates. That was the compromise reached at that time. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were established after 1905, and changes to the rate did not take place until World War I when it was allowed to lapse for a while. Following World War I there was a great deal of farmer unrest because of falling grain prices and freight rate inequities. We must remember that only those points which existed in 1896 and 1897 received the benefit of the Crow rate originally. All points developed since on other rail lines and in other towns and villages were not eligible for the rate. There were great inequities.

In 1926 a new statute was passed, not because of economics but because there were 65 progressive members mainly representing that part of the country here in the Parliament of Canada. The statute of 1926 was put in place and has remained ever since. It has not been an unchanging statute; the benefits have not remained unchanged.

The railways have been allowed to abandon some lines in order to cut costs. They have received branch line subsidies, free hopper cars and free repairs to rail cars. Therefore, the rate is not the same as it was in 1926.

On top of that, the Wheat Board marketing system came in. It was part of the tumult of the early 1920s when the wheat pools were set up following the establishment of the Canadian Wheat Board. That form of orderly marketing allowed an improved use of cars and a faster turnaround. Management of the system has to some extent been borne by the farmers through the Canadian Wheat Board. All this reduced railway costs and made the system more equitable. It was more able to survive.

I want to follow up on a point made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). He pointed out that the railways did not always lose money with this rate. We must remember that the land has always been and will continue to be there. Prices go up and down. Years ago Parliament granted the railways a similar long life. It is a corporation which will not die. It has to take the ups with the downs.

When the minister announced changes to the rate, he pointed out that at current grain prices it only takes between 2 per cent and 3 per cent to pay the transportation costs. That may be true in this day and age. I would like to point out something that no western Canadian has forgotten. In the 1930s, 85 per cent to 100 per cent of the price of grain was taken up with freight rates. One can go into any community and find an old-timer who recalls the time he shipped a carload of barley or oats and received a bill from the company saying he owed so much for freight. Everyone knows the standard response—"We have no money but we have more grain." The situation was a little like the current interest rate policy.

The supposed advantages touted by those who think the rate should change are as follows. They assume there will be increased livestock production in the west in spite of the fact that the increase will not be more than the losses in the grain sector. That argument is still being made by proponents of the rate in spite of the fact that the livestock industry in this country has been encouraged to diversify. There have been active programs to force livestock production in Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes and central British Columbia. Doing away with the Crow rate will disrupt that, yet we are told there will be more livestock production. We are not given any source for this information.

We have to compete in world markets. That is why grain farmers insist that the Crow rate remain. This country does not have the same cheap water transportation as other countries. In order to be competitive with the United States, our main competitor, there must be additional subsidies for grain transportation. The United States grants massive subsidies to its inland waterways. The river system is maintained by direct payments from the U.S. treasury at no cost to the users. We cannot compete without a comparable program. The Crow rate has served as that program.

If the Crow disappears, livestock producers will have some difficulty. When we talk of transportation subsidies, what about the At and East rates and the feed grain policy in all their various permutations? Therefore, there is an advantage to those outside western Canada.

The basic question is, where will this increased meat production be sold? This country now imports meat from the United States and the European Economic Community. Very little is sold to Japan and the eastern bloc countries. Those countries prefer to bring in feed grains and hire their own people to feed the livestock.

Where will we find a 65 per cent increase in sales of our livestock production talked about in such rosy terms by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan)? Where is the market? There is none. What is the incentive? Producers are now losing between 18 and 20 cents a pound. They are losing between $200 and $300 on each animal. What kind of incentive is that?

If we follow the bookkeeping or Snavely kind of economics, it will cost $12.50 to produce a bushel of wheat. What compensation will there be for the farmer? If that kind of economics and accounting is good enough for the railways, why does it not make sense for the farmers? Why does it not apply to agriculture? It is grossly unfair to look only at this in terms of the railway package and commitment. If this is going to be opened up, it should be opened up all the way. Look at the compensation which was received in the past. Put that into present day values. At least make it fair on both sides of the table.

At the moment the farmers are being asked to give up the agreement. The railways are getting off scot-free. That is grossly unfair. We say the Crow rate should be kept and the system should be improved. It would be disruptive to all of Canada to do away with it.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, recently I just spent a number of days in the west, in Delisle and Lethbridge, among other places. I met a number of people there who were wondering—and more of them are wondering—what kind of minister of transport my hon. friend from Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) would have been if he had had the good fortune to remain minister of transport for a longer period of time.

One way to answer this question is to see what he was asking of me this morning and judge him, at least in part, by that. He mentioned six or seven conditions I should have met prior to presenting the policy on western transportation.

First, he said that I should have held an inquiry of some sort. He is not satisfied with the degree of inquiry that has taken place up to now. Presumably the inquiry he asks for would have taken some time. I might say that his view does not correspond to the generality of views expressed to me by westerners. Nevertheless, he would have asked me to have an inquiry.

Second, he mentioned that there should have been a study by Parliament. Presumably what he has in mind is a committee of the House of Commons which would analyse the issue in depth. This would also have taken time.

He suggested, with a smile, that I should have a change made in the resolutions of the Liberal Party on the Crow rate. That might have taken a few days or months—

Mr. Lewis: Or years.

Mr. Pepin: That is assuming one is not satisfied with the present resolution, which I am.

He also mentioned that I should have had a national mandate, presumably in an election of some kind. We would have had to wait another few years for that.

He also mentioned I should have had some elected members from western Canada on this side of the House. That might be done faster but, nevertheless, it might take some time also.

Mr. Lewis: It might be difficult too.

Mr. Pepin: He also mentioned that I should be able clearly to demonstrate that the railways can and will carry grain in the most efficient way. I am satisfied that the railways are now able to do so but others might have taken more time to accept that proposition. Finally, he said that I should wait until all economic circumstances were more favourable.

I suggest very humbly and sincerely that he would have wanted me to wait and not do anything. The implication is that this is what he would have done. If he had practised what he is telling me to do he would not have remained very popular in the west.

Westerners believe that he would have done something to the Crow rate, but, again, if the hon. member had applied the same standards for himself which he is suggesting to me, we would be talking about it for years to come.

I believe that western Canada cannot wait that long. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the need for a strengthening of the main line of the railway in western Canada is extremely urgent. If there is anything which is urgent, this is it.

Since I have already spent a considerable amount of time on the road explaining the statement we made on February 8 in Winnipeg, I will not dwell on it for long. However, it is an absolute necessity that people read and understand that statement well.

There are three essential parts to that statement. The first includes a number of firm principles that the government states as its own beliefs. These are firm principles and they will be found in the statutory document we will end up with at the end of this current exercise. The statutory framework itself is a firm concept. The adequate compensation concept of the railway is a firm concept although not yet defined in detail. It will be. The guarantee of the responsibilities of the railways is also a firm statement. The federal contributions are firm and the obligation for producers to pay more is also a firm concept, as is the necessity to increase the efficiency of the railways.

That is the first part. The second part brings up a number of the issues or debatable items which are—and this will be the third part—given to a federal representative, Dr. Gilson, with the mandate of going to the interested parties trying to maximize the consensus, to bring it out, to define it, make it more specific and precise than it is now.

That is in the second part. It includes concepts like the proper level of compensation to the railways and the manner of payment of federal government subsidies; will it be to the farmers or will it be to the railways? It includes a discussion on performance guarantees, what they should be and how they should be given and implemented. It includes also a resolution of the debate on variable rates. Are there some that are acceptable? Are they all not acceptable? Another question is, what is the best way of supporting diversification and processing in western Canada? What should be included in the final statute the House will be asked to pass in due course?

That is the second part of the statement of February 8. I repeat that it involves a number of questions on which the government, in a very democratic fashion, would like to have the contributions and views of the interested parties in a very democratic fashion. I say that with great emphasis, because much of what comes out by way of condemnation of what we are doing is a misunderstanding, willingly or not, of the statement itself.

The article I have in my hand is entitled "Saskatchewan Challenges The Pepin Plan". The title itself is already a mistake. There is no Pepin plan now. There is only part of one, and the reason is that the government has in the most democratic fashion, asked interested parties to complete the "Pepin Plan", if that is what you want to call it.

Mr. Hovdebo: You have just said to us there are three non-negotiable points.

Mr. Pepin: I will answer all questions later with great pleasure. Again there is misinformation. On page 2 the article says:

> What is not in the Pepin plan is protection of the two fundamental principles of the Crow rate. There is no fixed rate for the producer.

And there will not be any, but I am in a pretty good position on that, because Premier Blakeney himself was saying a few days ago, "Perhaps a revision of the deal makes sense." All virtue does not lie with the New Democratic Party on this matter. Far from it. They are parsimonious, occasionally; even when they start reasoning with their heads instead of their feet, they are most reactionary. But this is not the important point.

> There is no equal rate for equal distance.

That is the question on variable rates. That is the very question the government has asked Dr. Gilson to help us elucidate in consultation with the interested parties. It was very wrong, undemocratic and unfair of the government of Saskatchewan to accuse us of not having proclaimed as a principle a concept that we have asked the interested parties to debate first.

So much for the statement we made on February 8. Let us look now at the motion we have before us today. Let us analyse it in some depth. We are told that the author of this motion:

> —approves in principle the payment by the government on an annual basis of an amount equivalent to the 1981-82 railway revenue shortfall—

Thank you very much. That is a good start. If we take the shortfall to mean essentially the losses incurred by the railways, $376 million in the last year, plus the subsidies paid by the government, $236 million, that should give us about $600 million a year of federal contribution to grain transportation in western Canada.

We are willing to go further than that, and hon. members will find in the future statute a confirmation of the branch line rehabilitation program and also the purchase of another 1,280 hopper cars in addition to the 10,000 the government has already paid for. The degree of subsidy would be more, as recognized by the government now, on an annual basis—something like $800 million—than the $600 million the hon. member for Vegreville is willing to go along with.

We start parting ways when he does not come out for any increase in the participation of the farmer in the transportation of his grain. I am not absolutely sure, but I gather from what he said today that he does not want to change anything in that particular area.

With respect to the Crow gap being more than the money the federal government is willing to put into filling it now, if the hon. member for Vegreville had his way, he would have a continuation of the gap, he would have a continuation of the inadequacy of railway compensation for the transportation of grain. What he has recommended is simply again to postpone the problem, not to resolve it now. What he would have is a continuation of the problem and a continuation of the anxiety of westerners as to the adequacy of their transportation system. That is what this government does not want to continue. We think the time has come to give western Canada an adequate transportation system. The time has not only come but perhaps has to a great extent passed.

A number of other things are said in the motion that need to be underlined. The author of the motion regrets that an inquiry has been established without clearly defined terms of reference. Let me tell my good friend, the hon. member for Vegreville, that this is not an inquiry. This is a negotiation. Everyone—brother, sister or his mother—whom I have met in the west has said to me, "Pepin, no more royal commissions. What we need is negotiation; get on with it". The mention of the lack of an inquiry will not be particularly welcomed in the west. Westerners think, generally, that the time has come to negotiate. The time has come to deal. This is what the interested parties want and this is what we are giving them.

The hon. member for Vegreville says the terms of reference are not clear enough. The statement we made on February 8 in Winnipeg was to represent the terms of reference of Dr. Gilson. In the coming days I intend to be even more specific and refine further the job he has been asked to do, and I will table that document in the House in due course.

The third point the hon. member makes has to do with our not making adequate provision for producer participation. As I have already indicated, I cannot accept that. Everybody says, "Get on with the job." Everybody would like to be there, obviously, but the interested parties themselves, grouped in the Western Agricultural Conference and in the Prairie Commodity Coalition, will select the members they want to be at the negotiating table with Dr. Gilson.

Mr. Hovdebo: Anyone from the farmers' union?

Mr. Pepin: Anyone who wants to negotiate. As I understand it, the National Farmers' Union is not too keen on negotiating. They are like the New Democratic Party. They say, "No, no, no; no change." They are reactionary. Hell will freeze and they will not change. Anyone who wants to negotiate is allowed to be represented at the table, and Dr. Gilson will report in due course on the consensus he obtains so everyone will be in a position to compare that with what the different farm organizations have said before, and everyone will be in a position to compare that with what the government will come up with by way of a final policy position on this matter.

My friend the hon. member for Vegreville also regrets that there was no reference to Parliament. I do not know what he has in mind. Does he have in mind that the negotiations should have been given to a committee of Parliament? I do not think he has that in mind. Does he have in mind that we should have had a meeting or a set of meetings in the Standing Committee on Transport to look at the documents?

Mr. Mazankowski: Just like the air policy.

Mr. Pepin: Indeed, we could do that; I have no philosophical opposition. I just want to remind the House that in due course the statute will be presented to the House and there will be ample opportunity to debate it.

• (1420)

Mr. Mazankowski: Just like the air policy.

Mr. Pepin: There are three related matters that I should like to raise in the ten minutes left to me, Mr. Speaker. The first concerns the guarantees that the railways will be asked to provide. A number of questions were raised this morning. Some people are afraid that the government is not going to protect the farmer against the "ogreness"—if that word is English—of the railways. Let me emphasize the fact that the original Crow rate was not a subsidy, it was a protective system. We want to keep it that way.

What we will have in the future is a statutory framework instead of a statutory rate. The statutory rate was very comfortable but my friends in the NDP know that the railways, being obliged to carry grain at that cost level, did not do it with very much enthusiasm until the federal government brought in plans for the rehabilitation of branch lines and started to buy hopper cars. In other words, the railways are not held to the impossible. As a matter of fact, according to some decisions of the Supreme Court they can only be held to a reasonable effort. A number of people have said that the Crow rate died when the federal government started buying hopper cars, and a lot can be said for that view.

I want to emphasize that we are going to have a statutory framework on grain transportation in western Canada. This will include, first of all, a mechanism or process or formula for the determination of a compensatory rate. That will most probably be in the bill.

Second, there will be a set of guarantees with respect to railway performance, railway investment and developmental rates for products, etc. Third, there will be a right to access to data. A monitoring system will be set up, possibly with a set of rewards or penalties, for the railways regarding their guarantee of performance and investment.

May I repeat that the system that will come out of this exercise will be a statutory one. It will be better than the statutory fixed rate the western farmer has now. Most of them realize that the fixed rate is not realistic any longer. That is what I wanted to say about railway guarantees, Mr. Speaker.

The next item I should like to tackle is the question whether the farmer can afford to pay more than the Crow rate, and in that regard I should like to make five points for the record.

First of all, there is no doubt that some farmers are going to be affected—I recognize that. So the government is being quite generous in this instance by allocating $1.35 billion for this purpose in the budget. Second, in the past the western farmer has paid more for transportation of grain, proportionately, than he pays now. There was a time, in 1958, when the Crow rate represented 75 per cent of the true value of transportation. There was also a time, in 1960, when transportation represented 8 per cent of the revenue of the farmer for his grain at Thunder Bay. Now it represents only 2.2 per cent. One could make the case that there were times in the past when transportation was a more costly item in the production of grain in western Canada.

Third, the farmer will not pay the full rate. In other words, transportation in western Canada will always be at a special rate and grain will always be a special commodity. The railways will never have to pay commercial rates for the transportation of grain. Obviously the concept of a compensatory rate is a limited one in comparison to what the railways would like.

The federal government is going to put a lot of money into easing the pain of western farmers when it comes to the transportation of grain. I have already mentioned how this will come about. The federal government will pay the current Crow benefit representing about $600 million per year. In the statement I made in Winnipeg I also envisaged that money might be made available, within the budgetary framework we now have, for a contribution to the added cost after 1981-82. I have already referred to the continuation of the branch line rehabilitation program and the purchase of hopper cars.

But the main point I want to make here is that western farmers stand to gain by having a damn good transportation system—sorry for the "damn", Mr. Speaker! I was the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board in the late sixties, so I have seen the uncertainty that exists among farmers about the adequacy of the transportation system. It is the intention and purpose of the government to put an end to this uncertainty about the transportation of present volume, and the uncertainty about the transportation of future volume. I do not have to wonder too much about the reaction of the western farmer when he is told he could sell a lot more grain. First of all he wants to be certain that the grain will be hauled.

There should also be a savings for the farmers on storage and on the purchase of hopper cars.

This morning a newspaper reported that the Canadian Wheat Board complained it was losing sales internationally because the system was not good enough to make it possible for more grain to be shipped.

Another thing that is changing in the west is that the western farmer—in Saskatchewan as elsewhere—is realizing that indeed he has an interest in transportation as the producer of raw grain, but he also has an interest as a processor of grain. The western grain producer who is a member of a wheat pool is interested in the maintenance of the best possible rate, but as a processor—for example, the Saskatchewan wheat pool accounts for 35 per cent of all rapeseed crushed in this country—is also interested in his processed products getting good transportation at good rates.

These are also ideas that are being expressed which might only make it more palatable for the western farmer to accept an increase in the basic rate. The rate might be tied to the grain stabilization program or to the cost of grain nationally and internationally. These ideas are being debated and no doubt will result in acceptable compromises.

The third matter being raised these days in western Canada concerns variable rates and whether they are tolerable. Mr. Speaker, some may be and others may not. On this subject the Saskatchewan government is making a big fuss about what it calls the fact that the policy we have announced would contribute to a deterioration of rural life in western Canada. It is inventing all sorts of things to demonstrate that. Anyone who has knowledge of the facts knows that consolidation of rural life in western Canada is a historical trend. It has been going on for a number of years with the Crow being the basic rate for the transportation of grain. Essentially it has been caused by the economics of primary elevators. As old elevators become obsolete they are replaced with others that have a much larger throughput. In many cases changes have also been caused by events that come under the control of provincial governments, such as building highways, integrating of schools and hospitals and so on.

If anyone is guilty of having contributed to the deterioration of rural life in Saskatchewan, it is likely to be the government of Saskatchewan. I do not blame it, however, because these events are the result of decisions made by individuals.

My friends opposite who love Hall so much should read the Hall report, on that subject, but, in any case, I should like one day to put some quotations from the report on the record. The truth of the matter is that a decision has not been made on variable rates. I repeat that this is one item which is on the table for discussion with the Gilson group.

I should like to reflect for a minute upon change. There is no doubt that everyone theoretically loves change, as far as it affects others. We have introduced an important statement which I think is but a recognition of changes which have already taken place. Knowing that people do not like to adjust to change, the policy presented by the government on western transportation was very democratic in the sense that we constantly took into account the view of interested parties, which I have demonstrated. Also I and many others think the government has been quite generous in the amount of money it is putting on the table to cushion the adjustments farmers will have to make. Finally and fundamentally, in order to protect farmers even better than in the past, we will in due course present a bill to the House that will consecrate the guarantees to which I have already referred.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is a very unique occasion when a westerner hears the account of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) about the problems of being understood in western Canada. After the speech which he just delivered, I can understand why farmers are somewhat confused. If the minister would just sit back in calm reflection and visualize the facts of life in the country, he would not be guilty of the type of confused statement he just made.

The debate on the Crow is not just a matter of dollars and cents or a matter of giving in to the promotion and con job of railways over the last 50 years. It is not just a question of trying to negotiate in a democratic fashion. What the minister said out of his own lips indicated that he did not understand democracy. I do not intend to become involved in a dog fight with the minister. I just want to make my points simply and occasionally take a crack at something the minister said which was pretty silly in relation to the facts, in the hope that every person in the country knows what this debate is all about.

Rightly or wrongly, Crow rates are part of the agreement which built Canada. Years ago the people of Quebec and Ontario were faced with the rush for land by Americans from the south. That was stopped in 1812-1819. Later on, to stop the rush for land, people from all over the world—people from Europe and Asia and even people from Quebec, Ontario and the maritimes—were asked by the federal government to settle in the west, which was described at that time as a desert unfit for human habitation. The key to bringing the population there was the railway.

The government which formed the nation sold its soul and its wealth to bribe the company to come in and construct a railway. As part of the deal a pledge was made to the immigrants who came. We tried to protect them in various ways. An agreement was made, the details of which are not important to this debate. Advertisements were placed in newspapers across the country and in Europe guaranteeing that if people came to western Canada they would always have an opportunity to market their grain. We settled the desert and made it one of the most productive places in the world in three generations. Always in the back of our minds we knew that we had a protection, a maximum rate on the hauling of grain to export position. This agreement became a statute in 1926. It has been amended, changed, confirmed and reconfirmed. The Crow rate is a mighty important but small part of our national Constitution.

When the report of the Hall commission came down five years ago, I stood in my place in the House and said on behalf of all westerners that the report was our Magna Carta, and it was. When the Minister of Transport made his statement in Winnipeg just last week, once again I rose in my place and questioned the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in the House. I asked him to protest this betrayal of the Railway Act, the National Transportation Act and the agreement on the Crow by threatening to resign if the government did not change its direction. This is our Magna Carta; this is part of the Canadian Constitution.

In its judgment a few months ago, the Supreme Court of Canada made it very clear to the whole world that our Constitution is not only comprised of written law. Our Constitution is comprised of the common law, customs, beliefs and oral agreements. It is comprised of the statutes of the nation, as well as the bills of rights of various provinces and at the national level. I hope it will be comprised of the new Canada Act some day. The decision of the Supreme Court made clear that the Constitution was not just what a bunch of lawyers wrote down or what the statutes provided. It is comprised of many things. They call them "conventions"; I just call it the understanding of the rights of people. What we have had for years and years is our right.

I will not enter into academic, legalistic high school arguments about right or wrong in this issue, but we should not change the Magna Carta every 85 years, even if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Agriculture say we should. A fundamental right cannot be changed in a year or two. It is only changed by agreement of all parties, not by agreement of just a few.

I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, a newspaper which has supported, as have many westerners, a re-examination of the Crow on a rational basis and a change to this part of the Constitution by discussing the actual situation. As I read the article, the minister will know that there is no animosity in the heart of this newspaper toward him. It reads:

> Jean-Luc Pepin made his presence felt as never before in Saskatchewan this week. He left in his wake the impression of a personable, even charming, individual but one who unfortunately failed to grasp the mood of a province wherein many are feeling a sense of betrayal over proposed changes to the long-cherished Crow rate.

> What this means is that the main message the transport minister should have delivered did not come through. He spoke in glowing terms and with impeccable logic of the ideal transport system to come as result of finally breaking the logjam over the Crow rate.
> The idea of tackling the Crow rate issue is one whose time has come.
> But Pepin did not implant the belief that the vast improvements he forsees are guaranteed. He assumed a trust in his faraway central government that has become battered in recent years in the west. He assumed a trust in railway companies that has never been widely felt here.
> He left worried Saskatchewan residents in his wake. They are saying, in effect, "but what if we pay all this extra money and the system is not improved? What if the railways are saying five years from now that yes, they have more revenue, but it's still not enough?"

They have been doing that for 50 years. The editorial continues:

> That is admittedly what politicians call the worst-case scenario. It reflects the emotion that surrounds the Crow rate issue. It reflects the symbolism to many Westerners in the act of striking down the 1897 statute that enshrined this one great concession from the centre of power.

That article was from a western newspaper. An eastern paper, The Globe and Mail, writes the same thing only in a different way. On February 9, 1982, the following appeared in an article in that paper:

> The fact is that the prairies do not trust the federal government. They have no faith in any promises Mr. Pepin may make, no faith in any promises his government may make. They have the Crow. They'll stick to the Crow.
> Will the federal government ever grasp the idea that it takes action, not promises, to win back a totally disillusioned electorate?

If that does not impress the House, I have another article published in a local paper from Renfrew county, Ontario. The paper is called the Renfrew Mercury and the article appeared

February 17, 1982. The writer is explaining the Crow rate to the Renfrew reading public as follows:

> For us here in Renfrew county, it is sometimes difficult to understand what the Crow rate is all about. The Crow rate was the name given to an agreement signed by the federal government, the CPR and the farmers of the west some 85 years ago. It was part of Confederation.

That is all the writer has to say. The eastern farmers and the eastern people know that the Crow rate is part of the building of this nation.

Let us put all of this into perspective. We are in the middle of a centralizing movement that has existed since the war. Everyone knows what I am talking about. We have listened to the constitutional debate. We have seen the National Transportation Act of 1967 passed with its centralizing power. We have seen the energy policy of this government over the last two or three years deliberately unconstitutionally taking an extra $50 billion in taxes from the western provinces.

We have witnessed the unilateral attempt by the government to change the Constitution. We have seen the pressure of various ministers to set up national marketing boards, not to sell stuff but to control people. I could give a thousand other examples, but people know that the politicians in government have put their faith in experts. Experts have a record of being wrong, a record which has been unsurpassed in the last 20 years.

The Hall commission report dealing with this subject recommended no change in the Crow. The Hall commission heard all of the same arguments from the railways. All the groups said "Keep the Crow. Set up a prairie rail authority run by prairie people, and we will take all the lands on which you claim you are losing money and we will run them. We will make money out of them and then we will give them back to you." They brought in the concept that instead of pulling back and raising rates, they should help develop the west.

This could be stated to be a farm position of all parties, of all politicians. No one should ask the farmers of western Canada to give one inch on this Crow issue until the government does a number of things. First, the government should stop interfering with the Canadian Wheat Board and the Board of Grain Commissioners. Those boards should have the independence and the right to carry out their functions without interference. Every farmer knows what I am talking about, particularly when it comes to these low prices of $1 below what they should be. They are the result of this type of interference.

Second, a prairie rail authority should be in place looking after the 2,000 miles of railroad on which they claim they lose money. Some centralized group should not be trying to run it. That is mentioned in the Hall commission report.

Third, the railways should railroad and carry out the terms of the Railway Act, the National Transportation Act and other directives of the government. No amount of guarantees by a government that has a record of not keeping the law will suffice, because for 50 years the railways have ignored all directives from government. Metric conversion is supposed to be taking place. Are the railways converting to metric? They have never even thought about it. The railways do not bother about the nitwits we have around here. Why should they? They would never force it on the railways.

Fourth, we want from this government less talk about some mysterious development program. We want to know what the government is going to do about the development of the geothermal resources, which admittedly belong to the provinces. We want to know what is going to be done about the gas reserves. We want to know what is being done with all of the coal in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. We want to know what we are going to do with all the water that is available.

In particular, we want to see a transportation system outlined in black and white and in the actual state of being built. We have to have a railway that is non-stop from the south of Saskatchewan to Churchill to haul potash, coal, grain, for eight to ten months of the year to Churchill. This proposal has been before the western provinces for 60 long years. If all of this were formulated over the next five, ten or 15 years and it is shown that you mean business and action, then I think the farmers would be willing to sit down and consider rationally what should be done.

I am confident that if the government goes forward with this development program, it will make so much money for the railroads and so much money for the provinces, will create jobs and give additional taxes to the federal government, that we will not hear of the Crow rate for a long time.

This has happened before. The railways came roaring in here several times asking for changes in the Crow rate. In 1967 they admitted publicly, and every party in the House admitted, they were making money out of the Crow rate. So we voted them down. Parliament would not even give up the right to maintain that Crow rate to any board that we set up, like the national transportation board.

I know the history the hard way, but I am simply saying to all Canadians that when one is caught breaking the law, when one is caught breaking the Constitution, one has no way of getting this proposal through. There has to be trust and there is none.

Then there is the crowning insult. Think of the fact that, after all this bad advice we have received from economists in the last 25 or 30 years, they went out and said there is no future for farmers in any part of Canada. They said we had to get rid of two out of every three farmers. They would not agree there was a world market, they would not agree there were hungry people out there willing to work and pay for food. In a report to the government in 1969 they recommended we get rid of two out of three farmers. We should be kind to the old ones by paying them to get off, but get rid of the young ones first. All they held out in the future for westerners was the export of 360 million bushels a year. What are we exporting now? Over one billion bushels a year, and exports are going up all the time because the world needs them and we can produce. But we have to have a railway system to get the produce out.

Now, my final worlds are this. How can we expect trust from farmers when they read who wrote these words? It is all in this book. The man I am talking about is the head of this so-called negotiating team. He did awfully good work for me when I was the minister, yet his name appears in here. How would you like it, Mr. Speaker, if you were a chicken and you were told that a weasel was being put in charge of the hen house? That is all I have to say, thank you very much.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to be taking part in this very important debate today. After the briefing I had last night and this morning, and on the basis of my experience in the office of the former minister of transport and also as a lawyer for the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission, I must, first of all, render unto Ceasar the things that are Ceasar's and say that the speech by the member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) is indeed typical of those people who do not want the Crowsnest Pass rate to be changed the slightest bit. That is most unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure it is not a matter of a generation gap between myself and the hon. member who spoke before me. I certainly do not think so. But first, if I may, I shall quote from a speech made by the Premier of Alberta, the Hon. Peter Lougheed, in the Alberta legislature on October 14, 1981:

> In our view, the entire question of the Crowsnest Pass rate should now be given a priority in decision-making in Canada instead of being left to gather dust.

That is what the Premier of Alberta said, also the provincial premier of the member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). I therefore fail to understand, Mr. Speaker, why the former minister of transport is criticizing us for taking action. It seems obvious to me that if the hon. member has had a chance to stay on as minister of transport, he would have taken action. And if he has to blame someone, I think he should be blaming his leader, the former prime minister, who brought about the election that put him out of a job, Mr. Speaker. Westerners know all about the Crowsnest Pass. For most wheat producers, it is like an insurance policy, but easterners, and perhaps Quebecers even more so, are certainly not all very familiar with my version of the history of the Crowsnest Pass.

We have heard the New Democratic Party's version, and we have heard that of the Progressive Conservative Party, and now I should like to have an opportunity to give Quebecers and all Canadians who are listening to me today, my version of the Crowsnest Pass agreement concluded by the government and Canadian Pacific in September 1897. The agreement provided that the government would subsidize the construction of 300 miles of track between Lethbridge and southern British Columbia, through the Crowsnest Pass, if the railway company promised to apply reduced freight rates. That was the deal, Mr. Speaker. In 1925, the agreement became an integral part of legislation applying to all railway companies operating in the Prairies. I shall digress, if I may, and examine some of the statements by the member for Vegreville, who was saying earlier in his speech that this should have been referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

I myself am a member of the Standing Committee on Transport. As a politician, of course I want everything to be considered in the transport committee, but at the appropriate time, which is when an amendment to legislation is proposed. I feel that at this stage, it would have been premature to refer to the transport committee a decision that has yet to be made. Regarding our domestic air policy, to which the member for Vegreville alluded, not legislation but policy is being amended, and I want to congratulate the minister for deeming this the appropriate time for referring the policy to our committee. The situation is therefore as follows: In 1926, the Crow was part of the Railway Act. So what has happened since that time? Well, today, the agreement applies to 16,500 miles of railway lines, and not 2,915 as was the case in 1926. There are 1,245 delivery points and not 289, and the agreement applies to exports carried to Vancouver, Prince Rupert, Churchill, Armstrong and Thunder Bay instead of Thunder Bay alone. Clearly, and the member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain was absolutely right, it was a very effective instrument of national policy, until the fifties when, unfortunately, inflation caught up with the freight rates. Thus, the artificially low rates for the transport of wheat, as provided under the 1897 Act which was renewed in 1926, have had major consequences for the west today. It is as clear as the nose on your face. First of all, grain processing did not develop in the production area, for very obvious reasons. Second, though grain was produced in the west, other industries in this area, such as animal production, which is carried out in an area dear to the heart of the member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), were unable to reap the same benefit. Third, low freight rates for six types of unprocessed grain—note that these were designated—did not encourage grain growers to diversify.

Obviously, if only six types of grain are going to benefit from this rate, it does not pay for farmers to grow other kinds, so they do not. So what is the end result? Well, perhaps it takes an easterner or a French Canadian to notice the obvious, namely, that the Crow has distorted the economy of western Canada and nipped in the bud what would have been a sensible urge to diversify. The development of eastern Canada and Quebec is closely linked to its many ports, and the development of western Canada has depended on its railway network. The west, which has already become the growth centre of Canada today, will grow if it has an effective railway network, and it is clear that if there is no immediate increase in the number of railway lines in western Canada, that growth is in jeopardy. It will stagnate. Now we must clear up, once and for all, the problem of who is going to pay the piper. The railways will have to pay a larger share, but the wheat producers will have to pay as well. That is the answer and it is very straightforward. Western economy is changing and nothing should prevent its development and its diversification. The west should develop its full potential in its own interest and in the interest of Canada as a whole. It is now forecast that the existing railway capacity will no longer meet the demand by the mid-eighties if new commitments to invest in development projects are not made this year. Politically, we have only two members from western Canada, and I would like to remind the members opposite of what might have been the most important part of the Speech from the Throne given on April 14, 1980, and I quote:

> Like all of your colleagues in the House of Commons, you who represent the people of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, have a responsibility to represent your constituents to the nation. You also have an extra responsibility in the present circumstances to represent the nation to your constitutents. It is a task no one else can fulfil. My government is prepared to co-operate fully in helping you to achieve this.

Mr. Speaker, something had to be done and we are doing it. If we do not act and nothing happens, history will not blame this government but rather the elected representatives of the western provinces for their lack of vision, because western economy is growing more rapidly than the railroad network, and if, for instance, 10 per cent of the bulk exports expected to be moved toward the west in 1985 are not transported, it will mean an export loss of nearly $1 billion. What is the position of the various parties, Mr. Speaker? In short the government is willing to allocate nearly $3.2 billion for grain shipment over the next four years. First, there is the amount of $1.85 billion which the government is committed to spend under the existing programs. Of course, everyone knows what this includes. It includes the branch subsidies, improvements to existing programs and car purchases. Second, there is an amount of $1.35 billion allocated in the budget of last November, which represents the full amount of the government commitment for the western rail network in the current fiscal year. That is our position.

What about the railways? They are of course the victims of these artificially low rates. I think that I agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain that there was a time when the railways were making money. That is certain. However, it is not the case in 1981-82. We only have to recall that in 1958 the producers paid about 75 per cent of the total costs and that, in 1981, this share has fallen to 24 per cent, while the railways have lost $244.4 million in spite of a direct surplus of $170.2 million. We can reasonably forecast that they will lose $1 billion in the eighties in spite of the increased shipments of other grains. Other products such as coal, sulphur and potash have been threatening to decline since the seventies, and as we all know, these products are bottling up the western rail network. No one can deny the present needs. Those who have lived in the west and who know the Rocky Mountains are aware of the long lineups of railway cars and the tie-up this creates. If nothing is done the traffic will remain bottled up.

What is the position of the grain farmers? They are the producers and they will have to pay in the end. We are lucky to have them, Mr. Speaker, because these people have provided Canada with wheat and grain exports of $4.6 billion, which is the fourth largest contribution to our balance of payments in Canada. I have met with grain producers, Mr. Speaker, since coming to Ottawa, and even before when I was in the Minister of Transport's office. Since the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain quoted from newspaper articles which obviously supported his arguments, I believe that it is important that I also be allowed to quote from a few articles, which are naturally more favourable to my position than to that taken by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. First, I would like to mention two names, the Western Agricultural Conference and the Prairie Farm Commodity Coalition, two agencies which speak on behalf of most major western farm organizations. They themselves agree that the railways should receive adequate compensation to cover grain freight costs, and that any arrangement should be enshrined in appropriate legislation. They are prepared to negotiate issues such as who will have to bear the burden of inflation in the future, and how large their contribution will be. This month, presidents of prairie organizations have been supporting the decision by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). I shall quote some of them. Mr. Ivan McMillan, President of the Prairie Farm Commodity Coalition, said in an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 9, 1982, and I quote:

> There is really no alternative, someone has to take action.

Mr. Howard Falkenberg, President of the Western Agricultural Conference, said in an article by Canadian Press of February 8, 1982, and I quote:

> We must get something started as soom as possible.

In The Globe and Mail of February 9, 1982, I quote the following:

> Much remains to be done to help western agriculture achieve its full development.

Other major western freight customers have welcomed the government's comprehensive approach. For instance, Mr. Garnet Page, President of the Coal Association of Canada, told Canadian Press on February 8, 1982 that he felt, and I quote:

> —it is extremely important that the railways and the government should undertake large-scale, long-term projects and that they do so this spring.

This spring means in two months, Mr. Speaker. On February 8, 1982, a task force on railway transportation in Canada said in a press release, and I quote:

> It is essential that new investments that are needed to expand the capacity of our railways be made this year.

At the annual meeting of the Palliser Wheat Growers Association held in Winnipeg on January 5, 1982, President George Fletcher told his 2,000 fellow members, and I quote:

The Crowsnest Pass Agreement has seriously distorted the development of agriculture in the prairie provinces by keeping us tied to monoculture and discriminating against animal production and meat processing in the Prairies. Our fears were justified, and the situation has become far worse.

There are many others, including the Edmonton Journal, which on February 9, 1982, started its editorial with: Well done, Ottawa. On February 8, 1982, the Canadian Press reported that the Premier of British Columbia said, and I quote:

A logical development of government policy, the need for which has been felt for a long time.

And there are many more. My time is almost up, Mr. Speaker, and we should now listen to what the members opposite, the members of the official opposition are going to say, because the position of the New Democratic Party is quite clear. Its members are against any development and against all progress. As my colleague from Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) said, NDP means non-development party. So what is the position of the Progressive Conservative Party, Mr. Speaker? The member for Vegreville, the former Minister of Transport, rose in the House on June 30, 1981, and asked a question, as reported in Hansard on page 11080, to which he supplied the answer, when he asked the minister how he was going to, and I quote:

—move the anticipated 70 per cent increase in rail tonnage over the next five years—?

That is ample proof of how urgent the matter is, Mr. Speaker. The former minister of transport, in an article published in the Regina Leader-Post of January 20, 1982, said, and I quote:

• (1500)

"Reform to the Crow would reduce discriminating rates against the oilseed crushing industry in western Canada."

[Translation]

Here are more examples. Perhaps I ought to remind the hon. member for Vegreville of the statement made by one of his constituents, Mr. Norris Hartwell of the United Oilseed Products Ltd. of Lloydminster in Alberta, as reported in the Globe and Mail of February 9, 1982, and I quote:

[English]

If the Crow issue can be resolved, it will be for the good of western Canada.

[Translation]

Here is how the position of the hon. member for Vegreville is described in a Canadian Press article dated February 9, 1982, and I quote:

[English]

The short lived Conservative government, of which he was transport minister, was working on a plan to change the Crow. If his plan was to pay the railways for their grain losses for 1980, that, plus federal purchases of hopper cars and branch line rehabilitation, would have restored the health of the railway system. In future years there would be negotiation among the railways, farm groups and the government on how the three would share increases in the rates caused by inflation.

[Translation]

That looks very much like what we are doing, Mr. Speaker. I have others like that, I have more. Of course, the position of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) is clear: as a beef producer he feels he is being penalized by the current situation. That is clear. He said so in the House on July 6, 1981 and again on July 17, 1981, but I will not quote him because my time is running out. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) said this in the House about Mr. Clay Gilson, the man who is responsible for getting the groups together, and I quote:

• (1510)

[English]

It is now up to the farm groups to work out the process for changing the Crow with as little political interference as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, here is a statement made in the House by the hon. member for Lisgar on December 11, 1981, and I quote:

[English]

Farm groups in Manitoba and Saskatchewan and virtually all farmers in western Canada are in favour of a change of some sort.

[Translation]

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that on the same day his colleague from Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) said, and I quote:

[English]

The people of Saskatchewan do not want anyone fooling around with the Crow rate.

[Translation]

Yet, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain is singing a different tune. The hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) will rise later, but we know already from press reports that he is in favour of the changes. So is the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). As to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert)—I do not know yet.

What is clear, Mr. Speaker, is that the Conservatives are divided on this issue. Some are in favour of the changes, others are against. As to those members over there, we are not paying too much attention to them, for we already know they are against any changes. But Progressive Conservative members have something to say, and we want to hear them.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deniger: I am glad the former minister of transport is listening to me, for I should like to quote from a very important statement which he made in the House on January 21, 1981, and I quote:

[English]

We have a transportation system which I know will work. It requires co-operation and leadership, but it will work. There are some things which will always be a problem. But someone has to take charge. I call upon the Minister of Transport to take charge.

[Translation]

That is exactly what the former minister of transport said to the Minister of Transport, and I must commend him for heeding this wise suggestion and acting on it, because had he failed to do so, we would have blamed him, and rightly so, for abandoning western Canada.

[English]

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate. It is a debate on a very historic subject which is vital to the future economy of western Canada.

I was interested in the comments of the hon. minister and the previous speaker, the hon. member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger). They made some comments with respect to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) who was the former minister of transport. I suggest that the record of the former minister stands by itself. Undoubtedly he was one of the best ministers of transport in Canada's history. He never acted at any time in an arbitrary or unilateral manner. He would not have cut services of VIA Rail by order in council rather than through hearings. He would never have attempted to dismantle the branch lines which have been guaranteed by his predecessors. He would never have arbitrarily cut back on Maritime freight rates.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that he would have held more than an inquiry which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is talking about. The minister says that it is not an inquiry that he has directed Mr. Gilson to hold, but negotiations. When negotiations are held, the indication is that the instructions given to that commissioner, or whatever his title is, are predetermined. He is just working with figures.

The Crow rate goes back approximately 80 years. To read the history of the Crow rate is to read the history of the railways, the history of western Canada, the development of agriculture in western Canada and, indeed, to read the development of our nation.

I had the opportunity to conduct some research on the Crow rate. In my research I came upon an interesting document entitled "In Defence of the Crowsnest Pass Grain Rates". It was a submission made by Mr. Brownlee, president and general manager of the United Grain Growers Limited to the MacPherson royal commission in 1959. It is very interesting reading and I would like to quote from that submission.

On page 7 of the submission under the heading "National Purpose Served by Statutory Grain Rates", it reads as follows:

The fact that certain grain freight rates in western Canada are statutory and are thus withdrawn from jurisdiction of the Board of Transport Commissioners identifies them as connected with national policy. They reflect an enduring national purpose rooted in Canadian history and dating back to confederation. That purpose was to develop agriculture in the area now comprised in the prairie provinces and formerly under administration of the Hudson's Bay Company.

Such agricultural development was to be based, and could only be based, upon growing grain for export. That enterprise required railway building in the first place, and in the second place permanent assurance of railway rates which would make grain production economically feasible.

It goes on to say:

Development, although slow to start, was to gather strength and move forward in a tremendous surge during the first 30 years of the present century—

It further states:

During that period central Canada reaped rich rewards with the growth of its industries based upon the domestic market opened up in the prairie provinces, and retained for it by protective tariffs. Throughout that period it was the wheat growing industry of western Canada which provided the chief stimulus for growth in the Canadian economy—

One final paragraph in this report I would like to read is as follows:

It is not to be assumed that Canadian Pacific entered into the contract reluctantly or only for the purpose of securing a subsidy. On the contrary, the new policy greatly benefited the railway. It assured settlement and made saleable the railway's vast holding of agricultural lands and gave these lands a selling value greater than they otherwise would have had—

Again, I would like to refer to a statement which was made by the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker. He made this statement in the House of Commons on May 13, 1959. The right hon. gentleman said at that time:

—the Crowsnest rates are part of a bargain which was made between the railways and the government on the one hand and the settlers who went west on the other hand.

The statements to which I have referred are as true today as they were in 1960, but of course the Crow rates have always been under attack by the railways, not only the CPR but the CNR as well.

• (1520)

My friends on the left talk about the nationalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway as if that were the answer to our problems, but the Canadian National Railways have been nationalized or made into a Crown corporation throughout its whole life—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Neil: —and it has not done any better and has no better record than the Canadian Pacific Railway. I say to my friends on the left that the nationalization of the Canadian Pacific Railway would not do a thing for the western farmer as far as the movement of grain is concerned.

Mr. Althouse: How come they did not supply cars when we were short of cars but CN always did?

Mr. Neil: In reality, of course, the railways have not been carrying grain at the Crow rate for many years because there have been branch line subsidies and rehabilitation programs, and they have been supplied with in excess of 10,000 hopper cars, some by the Government of Canada, some by the three prairie provinces and some by the producers through the Canadian Wheat Board. Over the years these benefits have amounted to many millions of dollars. However, when the former minister of transport in the Liberal government, the hon. Otto Lang, who was then the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt, became minister of transport, he and his colleagues in the Liberal Party adopted a policy of what he called user pays. This policy not only has continued to be followed by the government and Mr. Lang's Liberal successor in office, but now it is also being forced on the grain producer of western Canada.

Mr. Pepin: And everybody else too.

Mr. Neil: It can be forced upon the producer because this government has a majority in Parliament. It has no members west of the Manitoba-Saskatchewan border, and that is evidenced today by the fact that the government has no speakers from western Canada.

Mr. Pepin: Come on, now. Bockstael is coming.

Mr. Neil: I am pleased to hear that a member from the city of Winnipeg will be talking about the Crow rate. However, it appears that it is the intention of this government to force a change regardless of the consequences. Farmers on the prairies have been struggling to survive. They have been faced with high interest rates. They have been faced with high input costs, particularly for fuel. In the last year the tax farmers have paid to the federal government on gasoline alone has increased to about 50 cents a gallon.

Mr. Pepin: Don't change the subject.

Mr. Neil: I do not intend to change the subject of the cost of the operations of farmers because the farmer today is producing at less than the cost of production, and his income is dropping year by year. Yesterday in the mail I received from Statistics Canada a document entitled "Farm Net Income". If one examines this document, one will note that in 1980—and I am referring specifically to Saskatchewan—the total net income was $820 million. One year later it was down to $602 million, a drop of over 25 per cent in net income in one year.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) made a speech in Winnipeg at the annual meeting of Co-op Implements on Thursday, February 18, and this is what he said:

> Between 1975 and 1981, the ratio of farmers net income to farm cash receipts dropped from 39 per cent to 21 per cent.

He went on to say:

> This could get even worse in the coming year as net farm income is expected to drop another 15 per cent to 20 per cent in 1982.

Grain producers in western Canada cannot afford to pay any additional amount to move grain. According to newspaper reports of the speech of the Minister of Agriculture made in London, Ontario, a few days ago—and he confirmed his comments in the Standing Committee on Agriculture yesterday—he said that the government is looking at the review and revival of the old Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. That is how bad the situation of farmers is. The government is looking at an old piece of legislation which was brought into being during the depression years to save farmers from bankruptcy. That is how bad the Minister of Agriculture feels the cash situation of farmers is. Yet here we have the Minister of Transport bringing in a user-pay policy to make the western grain producer pay more to move his grain.

Mr. Pepin: Not true.

Mr. Neil: Under present circumstances there is just no way the western grain producer can pay any more money to move grain.

Mr. Pepin: We have $3.2 billion worth of user-pay policy.

Mr. Neil: The Minister of Transport has said from time to time in news releases and in the House that there is consensus in western Canada.

Mr. Pepin: Get on with the job.

Mr. Neil: I have not found that consensus, and I have talked to many producers. Without exception they all say it is possible that the Crow should be changed or at least the railways should be paid for moving grain, but in no way, they say, can farmers pay any more.

Mr. Pepin: So the government should pay it all?

Mr. Neil: If the Government of Canada undertakes to pay the difference between the 1981-82 Crow rate and the compensatory rate to the railways, that should be sufficient for the time being. Let us see how the railway companies will operate. Will they give service? Will they move the grain? However, let us not, as the leaked cabinet document said, expect the producer to pay any future increase over the 1981-82 figure because that figure could amount to between $400 million and $500 million in five years.

Mr. Pepin: What would you do then?

Mr. Neil: There is no doubt that there are certain anomalies in the transportation system in the west with respect to the livestock industry, the oilseed industry and the secondary industries for value-added products, and these matters should and must be addressed.

Mr. Pepin: Now.

Mr. Neil: But they must not be dealt with at the expense of the grain producer.

Mr. Pepin: Just prolong the agony.

Mr. Neil: I suggest that the whole matter should have been referred either to the Standing Committee on Transport or to a special committee for consideration.

Mr. Pepin: Delay, postpone.

Mr. Neil: Then that committee would have reported to the government. However, what is going to happen is that Dr. Gilson will hold his hearings. I call them hearings; the minister calls them negotiations. Those hearings will be held in camera so that producers and Members of Parliament will not know what representations are made to Dr. Gilson. Surely the western grain producer is entitled to know what representations are being made on his behalf. Why are these negotiations being held in secret, Mr. Speaker? Why are they not being held in the open when they affect every grain producer in western Canada? No doubt the minister will claim that the farm organizations represent the farmers, and perhaps they do but if that is the case, why are the hearings not held in the open so that the farmers know what their farm organization representatives are saying and what the railways are saying about costs so that they and we as Members of Parliament, can judge the result.

• (1530)

No doubt when Dr. Gilson is through with these in camera meetings he will make a recommendation to the minister. Legislation will be drafted, and then the minister will tell the committee that it is the result of a consensus negotiated by the farmers of western Canada or their representatives and that we will have to pass it. We will not have, as is our right, the opportunity to discuss the matter. The fact that the negotiations are to be held in camera has cast a cloud of suspicion over the whole procedure.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that an election is to be held in Saskatchewan very soon.

Mr. Pepin: That is not true. There will not be an election in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Neil: It is unfortunate that Mr. Blakeney and members of his government are using this matter as an issue for an election. The premiers of every province in western Canada should set up a joint committee to study the anomalies in the movement of grain. The minister should set up a standing committee in Ottawa to do the same thing. Then the two committees could get together in an effort to arrive at a consensus.

Agriculture is the most important issue in Canada today. Mr. Speaker, It is an absolute shame that at the present time an attempt is being made to use it as an election issue. The future of western agriculture is at stake. The provinces should be concerned about agriculture and the federal government has to be concerned about it so there ought to be input from both sources and non-partisan discussions in an effort to arrive at a solution.

Unfortunately, that will not happen because the minister and the government have decided that they will unilaterally take steps to deal with the issue of the Crow rate. The minister says that the amount will be negotiated, but I regard his actions as unilateral action. It is actions such as this which create the alienation which exists in the country, Mr. Speaker. We know about separatism in Quebec but now there is a separatist MLA in Alberta. This type of unilateral action can do nothing except feed the fires of separatism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I complete my term as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) it is as a result of first-hand observation that I can assure hon. members opposite that the minister has worked steadfastly and unrelentingly to resolve these issues to the benefit of the west. The efforts of the minister go far above and beyond the call of duty. He has tried to do what is necessary to resolve the problems of the west. Perhaps the minister does not realize it but I think there is something of overcompensation in his efforts because we do not have many representatives from the west on this side of the House. He spends his energy unrelentingly. He has travelled and met the people of the west and is well aware of their problems.

I am pleased to speak against this opposition motion. It is misleading and smacks of political opportunism. Hon. members opposite are taking this position to be able to tell their electors that they opposed any change in the Crow rate. In fact, several members opposite have admitted to us privately, and some even have said in their own communities, that the time has come to do something about the Crow rate, that a change is long overdue. Some tell me privately that the Minister of Transport is taking the correct approach.

I think we should reverse the motion which says, "we condemn the government." I think we should condemn the opposition for the stand it takes in attempting to thwart the progress of our efforts to meet the needs of transportation in the country. The opposition is doing a disservice to the country by perpetuating old myths and even by inventing new ones.

Let us look at the chronology of the Crow rate, Mr. Speaker. In 1897 an agreement was made between the Government of Canada and the CPR. In 1901 the province of Manitoba obtained better rates from the Canadian Northern Railway than the Crowsnest Pass rate. In 1903 the CPR had to meet the competition and lower the Crow rate to meet that of the Canadian Northern Railway. There is an effort to persuade people in Saskatchewan that the Crow rate was a condition of their entry into confederation. That is not the case. In World War I the Crow rate was suspended but it was brought back in 1925. In that year an application was made to the CPR for a rate for the transportation of grain from the west to the Lakehead. In 1927 a rate was implemented for the transportation of grain to the west coast and was applied to all railways. It is not a part of the Constitution, Mr. Speaker. In 1931 the Crow rate was applied to grain being shipped to Churchill.

In the 50 intervening years there have been commissions, studies and reports that have confirmed the adverse impact of the status quo on our national economy.

Today another myth is fostered by the opposition motion which holds that the government wants to put an end to the Crow rate. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, we are enshrining the Crow benefit by statute at the 1981-82 level. We are setting a datum at which the Crow rate will be considered and guaranteed henceforth.

In a letter addressed to the Hon. Allan Blakeney on February 23, the minister wrote that the Crow benefit, the difference between what producers pay under the existing statutory rate and the real cost of moving grain, which is estimated at $600 million per year, will be continued and guaranteed by statute. It cannot be tampered with easily, Mr. Speaker, because it will be enshrined in law.

Farmers in the west are being told by some people that they will have to pay five times as much to move their grain as they are presently paying. This is absolutely false. Nothing like that is intended. The farmers will pay the basic rate and the government will take up the difference. We are talking about negotiating and meeting the people face to face concerning what portions shall be absorbed by the railways and by farmers or producers. Also they said that the railways will receive more money. On the contrary, the third condition implied by the proposal of the government is that railways will be called upon and required to act on several fronts. They will have to give a performance and service guarantee related to grain transportation. They will have to make commitments regarding additional investment programs which they will be undertaking, such as building a double track to the west coast. They will have to make adjustments to other rates in order to promote agricultural diversification and processing in western Canada. They will have to present data concerning their revenues, costs and investment plans. These are the guarantees which we will expect to receive from the railways before the legislation comes before us to be discussed in the House and in committee and ultimately passed.

The government has a record of always helping producers. If we look at the record since I have been in government, we have had the drought assistance program, crop insurance, hail insurance, embargo compensation, branch line rehabilitation, subsidies, hopper car programs and so on. I have here what the Government of Canada has spent since 1970 on hopper cars, boxcars, branch-line subsidies, branch-line rehabilitation, the port of Churchill, the Port of Prince Rupert, rapeseed assistance, export flour and grain subsidy, and stop-off charges. It was $1,798,800,000. We are intending on guaranteeing subsidies for as long as the statutes are not amended by some subsequent government in the far distant future.

The minister has the foresight to come to grips with the capacity problems of the west. I should like to give two analogies. I come from the province of Manitoba where at one time I was a city councillor. In 1982 we have an aquaduct in the city of Winnipeg from Shoal Lake which was built in the early 1900s. This aquaduct was to serve the city for only 30 years, and even today it is more than adequate to serve a population of over 600,000 people in metropolitan Winnipeg. Now people say, "What foresight our forefathers had in designing that aquaduct!" Today some would say that they were stupid to make it that large. But in retrospect it is realized that they did a wonderful job.

In 1950 the city of Winnipeg was encountering floods. At that time everyone made fun of Senator Duff Roblin who was the premier of Manitoba. They said that he wanted to build Duff's ditch and that it was a waste of money. He built Duff's ditch at a cost of $80 million, and I cannot count the number of times since the construction of the floodway around the city of Winnipeg that the citizens have been spared many millions of dollars by not being flooded. This is thanks to Duff's ditch and Duff's foresight. Now they want to erect a plaque to honour him. We should realize today that the Minister of Transport has the foresight to know the transportation capacity which production in the west warrants. Perhaps we should take the opposition's point of view. Perhaps we should stick our heads in the sand like ostriches and say, "Maybe if we keep quiet, the problem will go away". Perhaps someone else will come along and pay for it. We are facing reality.

From 1940 to 1970 grain was sold at $28 to $67 per tonne. Producers were paying $4.78 to ship their grain at the Crow rate or approximately 7 per cent of their production. In 1980 when wheat was $219 per tonne, producers were still paying $4.78 or 2.2 per cent of their production to ship grain. It is perfectly in order that consultations are ongoing and that Dr. Gilson is heading these negotiations. The Minister of Transport should be commended for what he is doing.

I should like to refer to some quotations which appeared in the newspaper. Ted Turner, president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, as reported in the February 18, 1982 edition of The Western Producer said:

—the Pool will enter into discussions with Gilson.

Wallace Fraser, president of the Manitoba Wheat Pool, as reported in the same issue, said:

We are pleased that a process has now been set down for reform, since the problem of rail capacity is becoming more real all the time.

Allan Macpherson, president of the Alberta Wheat Pool, as reported in the same newspaper, said:

—Alberta Wheat Pool will take part in the coming negotiations in a positive manner. We are happy the government has committed itself to making the annual gap payment.

In the same February 18 edition of The Western Producer, the Alberta economic development minister, Hugh Planche, and the Alberta agriculture minister, Dallas Schmidt said:

—the federal proposal addresses "one of the major concerns of the Alberta government and provincial farm organizations through the removal of economic distortions created by the present statutory rate".

Also the article indicated:

The Alberta ministers said the federal plan takes an important step to resolving the economic distortions caused by the different rates for processed and raw products.

It also begins the process of determining how to expand the rail capacity vital to future economic expansion in the west.

The Minister of Transport is seeking to give the Canadian railway system the capacity to provide for other agricultural products and to take care of the diversification and processing of products. We look forward to the transportation of coal, potash, sulphur and many other products such as forestry products from British Columbia. The minister is working toward meeting a shortfall in our transportation system. Many organizations, such as the various provincial prairie wheat pools, the Western Agricultural Conference, and the Prairie Farm Commodity Coalition, have submitted briefs, made representations and passed resolutions at their annual conventions indicating that it is time the federal government did something. Because the federal government is now showing initiative which is long overdue, it is being criticized. This initiative should have been taken by Conservatives when they were in power, because they knew the needs of the west. They did not do it, and now because the government is doing it they object to the manner in which it is being done. They have said that we are not going about it the right way and that we should have consulted them first. We are going about it in the right way. Rather than criticizing the process, they should get behind it and say, "We will help you make it come to pass". For the benefit of the nation it is necessary to have a guarantee that the transportation will be adequate to carry our exports to the seaboard, so that they can be sent off to our customers. We should lend our support to the Minister of Transport and back him all the way. This is what I propose to do.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): First I should like to congratulate the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Killens) on her elevation to the chair. I should like to deal with the various positions of the Liberal and Conservative parties. For example, as late as February 12, 1982, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), was reported in the Winnipeg Free Press. It reads:

> Murta, who favours changing the Crow rates, said he supports the government's position because the issue has been debated long enough.

The Calgary Herald reported the following on February 13, 1982:

> The conventional wisdom is that Vegreville MP Don Mazankowski, transport minister at the time, would have proceeded along lines very similar to the course Pepin has struck.

On October 9, 1981, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board indicated the following:

> —because I'm convinced the Crow rate will stay and producers will produce if market returns remain good.

• (1550)

Since then he has made other statements of that kind.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) said "All I can say is that there has to be some other way devised to return the benefits of the Crow rate to grain farmers."

The Conservatives' attempt to confuse the issue probably comes from the fact that they are having a little trouble with the kind of support they should expect on a general basis.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Do you remember the Constitution?

Mr. Hovdebo: The hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) introduced a motion under Standing Order 43 on February 10. He quoted the premier of Saskatchewan out of context.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He wouldn't do that.

Mr. Hovdebo: I would like to quote from the same interview as follows:

> It recommended that farmers retain the benefit of the Crow rate. That was the basic recommendation which the government of Saskatchewan fully concurred with—the difference between the compensatory rate and the Crow rate being made up by the government.

As late as November 24, 1981, Mr. Justice Emmett Hall made a statement supporting the Crow rate. I want to read into the record part of that statement:

> If once tampering with the statutory rate is accepted or condoned or as an item on the bargaining table, all will be lost. For once the subject is on the bargaining table, it will be only a matter of time until it is lost step by step.

Transportation has always been and will always be an instrument of national policy in Canada. The government of Canada has been making deals in transportation since it first came to power.

In 1881, the federal government needed a national railway. A deal was struck. In 1897, the federal government needed a rail line into the Crowsnest Pass. Again a deal was struck. In 1925, Mackenzie King needed new legislation. The farm labour members from western Canada had seen the exploitation of the farmers by the railways. They insisted on a fixed rate in statute for the producer. Mackenzie King needed the support of the western Progressives. A deal was struck. That deal was the statutory Crow rate.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is right. That is history.

Mr. Hovdebo: That statute did two things. First, it gave the producers of grain a fixed freight rate with which the railways could not tamper. This was a guaranteed rate. Second, it gave the producers a delivery system. The guaranteed rate was an equal rate for equal distance, a so-called non-variable rate. Equal rate for equal distance guaranteed that we had a system in the west which would work. It was guaranteed that elevators could be built close to farms and the rates to port would be the same for the same distance wherever they were built. The country elevator system was built. The family farms and the rural communities grew up around the country elevators. The family farm and the rural communities gave us the world's most efficient producers of top-quality grain and built a certain quality of life.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You still see that in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Hovdebo: On Monday, February 8, 1982, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) announced a plan to change the structure under which grain will move. That so-called Pepin plan—

Mr. Rose: That is not a plan.

Mr. Hovdebo: —guarantees something quite different. It guarantees to the railways adequate compensation for the movement of grain. That guarantee to the railways is to be statutory.

Second, it guarantees that the producer will pay more.

An hon. Member: It is a statutory rip-off.

Mr. Hovdebo: The interpretation of the accompanying papers to the announcement indicate that even with some government subsidy, the producer is likely to pay five or six times more than the Crow rate by 1985.

Third, the plan guarantees there will not be a fixed rate for producers. In other words, they cannot be sure what they are going to be charged. The minister has indicated that these three guarantees are non-negotiable. The minister confirmed that just about an hour ago in the House.

Possibly as important to the farmers as what is in this proposal is what is left out. Two fundamental principles of the Crow agreement were left out. First, there is no fixed rate for producers. Second, there is no equal rate for equal distance. There is no non-variable rate.

Mr. Pepin: That is the subject of the Gilson discussion.

Mr. Hovdebo: The minister went on to appoint a negotiator. No doubt he is sincere.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): But there are no public hearings.

Mr. Hovdebo: He has been given instructions to find a consensus in private, in camera. We know that the minister looks on consensus having to do with the Crow as acceptable only if it is in agreement with his position.

We can give significant demonstration of public opinion. For instance, I can suggest that possibly there is no consensus between the whole of the Liberal Party in Saskatchewan and the minister.

An hon. Member: Right on. In the whole west there is no consensus.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): And Ralph Goodale.

Mr. Hovdebo: Some other Liberal parties in other areas have not yet indicated, but I think they are probably likely to take the same position. We have been getting petitions from all parties in Canada, petitions to retain the Crow rate as it is from Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia, British Columbia, and all of the prairie provinces. We have thousands of signatures from farmers, asking that the government consider keeping the Crow rate.

Just a couple of weeks ago a television station in Saskatoon asked a question "Should the railways be paid more money to improve grain transportation?" In the course of one hour 173 answered yes and 629 answered no. That is the kind of interest there is in the Crow rate and the kind of support there is for the Crow rate.

The National Farmers Union took a survey in south central Saskatchewan which discovered that 80 per cent of the farmers they contacted were in favour of retention of the Crow rate.

CanWest did a marketing survey for the pools. This survey divulged that 53 per cent were in favour of the status quo, and the question did not even mention the Crow rate. That particular group is also the group which the minister quotes quite often as having done a survey for the CNR. He quotes, but he never produces. I would challenge the minister right now to table that full study carried out by CanWest.

• (1600)

Many of the farm organizations said to be supportive of the Crow need to be canvassed more thoroughly. I am not so sure whether the membership follows the same position as the leadership. At a meeting sponsored by a local of the Manitoba pool on February 22, 300 farmers unanimously passed a resolution as follows:

> Therefore be it resolved that the meeting declare that the statutory Crowsnest Pass rates are not bargainable.

Mr. Pepin: I will give you some which says the opposite.

Mr. Hovdebo: That was in Swan River, part of the riding of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky). I would like to go back to the appointee who is to conduct the hearings on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). This man was a member of the task force which produced "Canadian Agriculture in the Seventies", and I will read from that report:

> The purpose of effective government action must be to assist the transition from what agriculture is today to what it should be in 1980, which is of course, only a mile post on the journey to 1990 and beyond.
> . . . we must consider the model toward which we are aiming.

They then refer to some trends, which I will read:

—decreasing numbers of farms, farmers, farm labour force and farm population.

—fewer family farms.

—increasing farm size.

Two out of three farmers must go; that is the basic thrust of that report. This from the man who was a member of the task force which recommended the disastrous LIFT plan. Hardly a friend of the farmer.

Apparently, Mr. Speaker, this government does not recognize the economic advantages bestowed by statute as being an obligation they must live up to. The Crow rate is recognized by all as being of some advantage to grain producers. In 1881 the Railway Act bestowed on the CPR the mineral rights to 25 million acres. That statute was of considerable economic advantage to the CPR. If it is considered fair to take away the economic advantage of the Crow rate from the producers of grain, is it not fair to open up the Railway Act of 1881 and take away the tremendous economic advantage given to the CPR by that statute? If it is fair for the farmer, it is fair for the corporation.

Mr. Pepin: You should read the Alberta Wheat Pool publications on the subject. You should read more on the subject.

Mr. Hovdebo: Now, let us look at the claim of the railways for a reasonable return on investment. We recognize and agree that no business can operate without a reasonable return on investment. The Snavely report says the railways lose $335 million a year hauling grain, but if we are going to apply this costing yardstick to railways, it is only fair to apply that same yardstick to the producers. If we use the Snavely formula for farmers, it costs farmers $12.94 to grow a bushel of wheat. The current price is $5.94, which indicates that farmers must be losing $7 on every bushel that they grow. That is a $7 billion loss annually.

Now, the federal government proposes legislation which will guarantee the railways the Snavely shortfall in 1982, indexed for inflation. If you can give that kind of a COLA clause to the railways, why can you not give it to the farmers? Some say that farmers should pay more. Well, net farm income in real terms right now is half what it was in 1970. The average Canadian farmer today makes a 7 per cent return on investment before income taxes, based on deflated 1975 land and machinery values, which would not hold very well now. The government says farmers and taxpayers must pay the railways $752 million to transport grain in 1982. The Snavely formula includes a 25 per cent return on investment and an additional 22.5 per cent in add-on profits. There would be a lot of happy farmers if they could get that kind of return. Yet farmers are being asked to expand production based on a 7 per cent return on investment, which return will be much lower if the Crow is taken away. If it is a good formula for the railways, why is it not a good formula for the farmers? The door must swing both ways.

If farmers operated under straight business principles, Mr. Speaker, they would stop growing food and invest it in shopping centres and oil wells the way the CPR does. Were it not for a dedicated farm population taking low, sometimes no, return on investment, Canada and much of the world would starve. Before we irreversibly uproot our prairie society, let us examine the alleged benefits of killing the Crow. Some say that farmers will get better service. Well, there are ironclad guarantees in the Railway Act which have not made any difference, and we are not likely to get better service.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Hovdebo: I still have five minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member has had 20 minutes to speak, which is a proper amount of time. I sense from his remarks that perhaps he was not aware his time had expired at 4.08 p.m. However, with the consent of the House the hon. member might take a moment to wrap up.

An hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have tried to be interested in the comments of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo). Having heard another member from Prince Albert I guess I am not too enthusiastic over the remarks made by the present member. I have to admit they are probably sincere, but not necessarily as convincing as they have been in the past.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are seized with a problem at the moment involving western farmers. And I must say as a practising farmer I know what added costs mean to a farmer. There is no way the farmer can have another cost added to the burden of maintaining his farm. No amount of statistics will rationalize the fact that we have lost many farmers. That is not the important point. The important point is that every farmer is hanging on by his fingernails. He is hurting.

In addition to the interest rate problem, the minister has added the problem of energy price increases. There is nothing we can do about that. It was caused by the stupidity of Liberal governments over the past ten years, going back to the time when John Turner was minister of finance. I was here at that time. He came on very strong. It was not important whether the country survived, only that the Liberal government should survive.

The whole press seemed to think that John Turner would be our salvation. I would like in my own simple way to make the press realize that it was the beginning of the end. That is my message to the Press Gallery. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) knows what I am talking about. It was important in 1972 that the Liberal government survive. It did what it thought necessary for its survival. Now we are seized with the problem where we have accumulated a $100 million debt over a ten-year period.

Now the minister wants to go to western Canada, because that is where the money is. That was not always the case. Western Canada has fed eastern Canada for many years and will continue to do so for years to come. We do not mind that, but the government must not zero in on the grain-producing economy just because that is where the dollar is.

The former minister of transport indicated very vividly that the moneys generated from the Crowsnest agreement were adequate to carry the railways. This administration has not taken account of that. In his comments, the Minister of Transport did not take that fact into account.

The CPR seems to be the main source of attack for the New Democratic Party. That is rather silly because attacking the CPR is really an attack against the development of the west. My grandparents settled in the west. This was possible because of CPR and CNR. I give credit to the governments of that time. I do not think that the railways should be attacked now simply because they are not making a buck. That is not right.

Look at past statistics. They show that when the most grain was moved, the railways made a profit. The minister has those statistics. I will not quote them because my time is limited.

I repeat, the NDP members are very vocal in their attack against the CPR. I have CPR and CNR lines in my constituency. Are the NDP members interested in destroying the system rather than developing it? I do not think it matters whether the CPR is financed privately or in any other way. What is important is that we get the grain moving. I suggest that the minister ignore those stupid comments from the NDP.

If I were to quote the Premier of Saskatchewan or the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), I would find a very contradictory situation. Let me quote from a speech by the Minister of Agriculture at the Hotel Beauséjour in Moncton, New Brunswick, on February 9, 1982. He said:

> They show that in 1979, farmers' average income from farming was only $7,744.

Which member of the press or which member of the House could live on that? Who could say that is a fair and reasonable income to support one's family?

Regardless of what the rationale is of the Minister of Transport, I would like him to take that into consideration. Does he realize that the number of permit-book holders has dropped from 210,000 to 140,000? Why? You do not stay in business if you do not make a buck. That message should be passed on to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). The government must understand that this country will not survive on charity, or this government's version of benevolence. There is only one way this country will survive. I say to the minister that I do not care who it is, including those on the government side, if there is a buck to be made we will reach for that answer.

I have never in my 24 years as a Member of Parliament apologized for the fact that there was a buck to be made in anything. I thought it was good for the government and I thought it was good for the people of Canada. I will never apologize for telling the government that it must proceed in the direction which shows Canadians that they have an opportunity, a chance and a way out of their dilemma. They will find their own way.

When I look at the statistics which the Minister of Agriculture gave in the committee, I find he told us that the simple reason he was zeroing in was that Saskatchewan had a 25 per cent increase in the value of its land. He thought they were rich. At the same time he made a speech like this to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which I have quoted from and will not quote again.

I ask the Minister of Transport to rationalize and consider his position. I will send statements to my constituents which indicate that the Premier of Saskatchewan is willing to negotiate. My colleague from Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) asked an important question in the house because the Premier of Saskatchewan wanted to call a meeting of the federal government and other interested parties and he wanted to know what he was going to negotiate. It is important to know that despite all the depredation that he makes in western Canada now, he was willing to negotiate something. He was either prepared to hand over money or prepared to listen to the Minister of Transport. I would like to know from the minister or one of his spokesmen what it was that the Premier of Saskatchewan wanted to negotiate. Tell us what he wanted to negotiate.

Mr. Pepin: He did not want to negotiate anything at all.

Mr. Korchinski: I want to know because I believe it is important since he may be planning to call an election. If the minister has any information which would lead us to believe that he was prepared to offer anything, I would like to know about it. I already know about the previous commitment that the farmers had made through the Wheat Board for the purchase of hopper cars and so on but I would like to know where my premier stands on this issue.

Unfortunately, I have used up my time and must end my remarks but I would like to have a response from the minister or one of his spokesmen. I repeat that I want to know the position of the Premier of Saskatchewan on this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I do not know whether the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is standing in order to reply to the suggestion of the hon. member. It would have been the Chair's intention to recognize the hon. minister shortly. However, the proper procedure now is that I will recognize the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer).

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, this truly is a historic and important debate for western Canada. Many of us who come from western Canada realize its importance when we return to our constituencies. Personally, I believe I understand the issue somewhat differently from other people because I grew up and lived most of my life in Saskatchewan and have lived in Manitoba for 15 years. I think I have an understanding about what many of the farmers are thinking in western Canada when they hear the prospect of the Crow rate being changed. Before I discuss that, I would like to discuss what has been said about Premier Blakeney.

In many ways, I am surprised by the reaction of the NDP because according to the statements of the Premier of Saskatchewan in January of this year I would have thought that the NDP would be supporting the proposals of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. On November 18, 1981, the Canadian Press reported the Premier of Saskatchewan as saying, "The federal government should clarify its position on the Crow rates for moving grain." He proceeded to make some more statements, and at the end he said, "We clearly can't be asked to commit ourselves until the federal cabinet commits itself."

What the premier is saying there is that the provinces cannot be expected to commit themselves until the federal government does. That is essentially what the minister did in Winnipeg on February 8, and I was present at the press conference which was held by the minister.

On January 10, 1982, while speaking on the CBC public affairs program "The Food Show" on a Sunday morning, the premier said:

—obviously they (federal government) wish to have the matter debated and for that I do not criticize them. I think that the issues involved should be better known. I think that there are, clearly, as I indicate, a number of issues involved. Perhaps a revision of the deal makes sense—

That is precisely what the Premier of Saskatchewan said on January 10, 1982, that "—perhaps a revision of the deal makes sense." Therefore, I do not understand why the NDP to my left takes such great exception to what the minister is doing.

There is more. An interview with Premier Blakeney was printed in the January issue of Business Life on pages 22 and 23. I will read part of that into the record to further question why the NDP federally is not going along with the Saskatchewan NDP. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) quoted Mr. Blakeney, and I will quote what premier Blakeney said in this interview. He said:

But the perception of our government really is that the farmers ought to keep the benefit of the Crow rate.

The NDP and the Farmer's Union make big mileage out of the difference between the benefit of the Crow rate and the Crow rate. Here, the Premier of Saskatchewan is saying that the farmers should keep the benefit of the Crow. The premier goes on to say:

If we want to address the issue of who is to pay the additional compensation to the railways, we are prepared to address that issue.

I think most members would agree that the compensation should come from the federal government. The premier goes on, and this is interesting because he says:

We make one other narrow point: in this discussion it is very important to distinguish between the current level of the Crow rate and the principle of having a statutory rate.

He does not say "the present statutory rate", he says "a statutory rate". To me, that clearly means a new statutory rate. This is precisely what the minister is doing.

Again, I find it difficult to understand why the NDP is not getting up and applauding the minister for his actions, because he is doing precisely what Premier Blakeney has suggested he do during the last three or four months.

There is more, Mr. Speaker. He said:

Some people take the position that there ought not to be a rate for the movement of grain set by the Government of Canada. With that position we are absolutely and unalterably in opposition.

I think we agree with that. It is interesting that the NDP attacks this party for not having a position, but clearly when the main spokesman for the NDP is Premier Blakeney in Saskatchewan—and I think that the federal NDP would agree with that—and he is on record as saying on three different occasions that he agrees with what the Minister of Finance is doing, it boggles my mind as to why the NDP complains about what the minister is doing. The minister is doing precisely what the Premier of Saskatchewan has asked him to do. Members of the New Democratic Party had better make up their minds as to which way they are going and what position they are going to take. If they do not, perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Premier of Saskatchewan should get together on that issue.

• (1630)

Mr. Kilgour: The Minister of Transport.

Mr. Mayer: The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), excuse me. The Minister of Finance is another story.

I would like to talk about process, because it is important to understand what transportation is to western Canadians. It is the reason that part of the country was settled. It is part of our heritage. We are proud of it, and it is very recent to us. As I said, I lived on a farm in the middle of Saskatchewan. I do not consider myself a has-been or very old yet, but I had an opportunity to plough land for the first time ever with the use of modern machinery. That is how recent our history in western Canada is, and transportation is very much tied up with that history.

It has been mentioned several times in this debate—by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), a distinguished former minister of transport of this country, and by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton)—that transportation is more than simply moving goods around the country and doing it efficiently. It is part of our guts. It is almost a religion to us. If we want to be esoteric and academic about it, we could say it is metaphysical. The minister smiles, but I think he would agree with me because I heard him say in Winnipeg at his press conference that the way people in the west feel about transportation is similar to the way Quebecers feel about some of their cultural and language issues. If one can understand that, one can understand why we approach this revision of the Crow rate with such apprehension.

I would like to make a comparison. The hon. member for La Prairie (Mr. Deniger) spoke today. His total claim to the opportunity to speak about western transportation is the fact that his riding is called "La Prairie". That is his sole claim. My riding is called "Portage-Marquette", and my name is pronounced "Mayer" in French. I receive a certain amount of French mail in my office. I lament the fact that I cannot speak and write French as well as I should, having studied French at high school and university. Had I been a better student, I probably would understand French better. However, the minister is from Quebec, as is the hon. member for La Prairie who spoke today about issues affecting western Canada. His doing so is tantamount to the hon. member for Vegreville's going to the province of Quebec and talking about a new deal respecting language for Quebec. I could just imagine the hue and cry that would go out if that ever happened. Yet in many ways that is precisely what the Minister of Transport is doing so I urge him to understand the way we in western Canada feel as we approach this issue. I am sure he does in many ways, but he must understand the depth of feeling we have about this kind of issue.

It might be presumptuous on my part, but I submit that it is very difficult for one to understand that kind of feeling unless one grew up and lives in that part of the country. This is important. It is something which is inside us. It is the raison d'être of the west. We are in western Canada because of transportation, and when we approach the revision of the Crow rate, we find it very difficult because it is so important to us historically.

Another issue I think the minister should consider carefully when he deals with this is the history of the Liberal Party in western Canada. In recent times it has not been a party in western Canada, and that is our problem. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) spoke this afternoon. He is from St. Boniface. He is in no way a westerner, and that is not to take anything away from the parliamentary secretary. I have a high regard for him, but he is asked to speak and to take a position on something about which he knows nothing. He does not understand it. He does not feel it like westerners do. That is the kind of problem the minister faces in addressing this issue. The minister is dealing with issues which are much more important than simply the fiscal arrangements for some tracks and the moving of freight around the country.

There is one other point which needs to be made. I am not so sure it has been made yet in this debate on an opposition day. Incidentally, the Conservative Party chose to debate this issue. I will digress a minute here. It boggles my mind to know why the New Democratic Party, which wants to champion itself as the defender of the Crow rate, did not take the opportunity it had to put its own motion on this issue. I cannot understand why the New Democratic Party did not take its first opportunity. If I am not mistaken, the leader of the New Democratic Party moved a motion under Standing Order 26, the day after the announcement on Tuesday, February 9, to adjourn the House for an emergency debate on the Crow. Yet when the New Democratic Party was given the opportunity, it did not take it. This party took it. It is our responsibility to talk about the Crow rate because it is very important to us in western Canada, and it was this party which did so.

Mr. Althouse: We had our opportunity last week, and you took it away.

Mr. Mayer: The New Democratic Party did not take that opportunity to show how sincere it is about the Crow by debating the issue. We look forward to seeing what members of the New Democratic Party do with the remaining opposition days in this supply period.

Mr. Althouse: Do you think you will give us one some day?

Mr. Mazankowski: You had this one.

Mr. Mayer: The hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) wants to know if we will give him a day. Actually, it is not in the power of the official opposition to determine when the NDP has an opposition day. As I understand the situation among House leaders, the NDP clearly had the opportunity to have this opposition day as its own but turned it down. I do not understand what kind of reasoning the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre is using when he asks if we are prepared to give him a day, we being the official opposition.

Let me deal with what westerners think of the railroad companies. In many ways the railroads are mistrusted. CP is the largest Canadian company. According to "The Financial Post 500" CP is the largest company in Canada. It is larger than General Motors, larger than George Weston, larger than the Ford Motor Company of Canada and larger than Imperial Oil. CP is the largest Canadian company and, in many ways, the most profitable company. If I read the table I have before me correctly, its net profits last year amounted to $583 million. That is a tremendous amount of money, yet CP wants more. It is not prepared to talk about going ahead with necessary expenditures on rail and on double tracking through the mountains because it wants an increase in freight rates from grain producers. Grain producers are facing tremendous increases in costs on the one hand and, on the other, they are being asked to pay more for moving their grain. They will be in such a position that when it comes to filling up their tractors with diesel fuel in the morning to go out to their fields, it will cost between $400 and $500. That is the cost producers see in the next two or three years. It is understandable that producers face this revision of the Crow rate with some apprehension.

The hon. member for Vegreville very ably pointed out this afternoon that producers do not want to get themselves into a position of looking at open-ended escalation of freight rates without knowing what they will get in return.

I have before me the Revised Statutes of Canada. If producers are going to pay more, they would like to know what they will get in return. I refer to page 6438 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. Section 262 of the Railway Act dealing with accommodation states:

> The company shall—
> (a) furnish, at the place of starting, and at the junction of the railway—

The company is supposed to furnish equipment.

> (b) furnish adequate and suitable accommodation for the carrying, unloading and delivering of all such traffic;
> (c) without delay—
> (d) furnish and use all proper appliances—
> (e) furnish such other service incidental to transportation as is customary or usual in connection with the business of a railway company—

That guarantee is now in statute form. The government set up a situation whereby the railways must guarantee performance.

I see my time is running out. Let me make a final point about another reason why producers in western Canada are concerned about the Liberal government and its attitude about the Crow rate.

On January 18, 1967, Bill C-231, dealing with the National Transportation Act, was before the House. One of the clauses in that bill was the following:

> No later than three years after the coming into force of this section, the Commission (CTC) shall inquire into the revenue and cost of railway companies subject to the jurisdiction of Parliament that are attributable to the carriage of grain and grain products at the level of rates established or maintained pursuant to Section 328—

In effect, that was an attempt in 1967 to remove the Crow rate. This matter was debated in the House, and it is recorded in Hansard at page 11959 for January 18, 1967. That amendment was voted down in the Committee of the Whole which studied that legislation by a vote of 59 to 58. I am told by hon. members who were here at that time that it was the Conservative Party which saw to it that the Crow rate remained in effect. Had we not done that, the Crow rate would have been long gone. Is it any wonder we feel some mistrust about some of the things which are going on in terms of the Crow rate?

I could go into the whole issue of the process and our feeling that Dr. Gilson should make his hearings as public as possible so that producers know exactly what is being said on their behalf behind the doors. I think that is very important. If Dr. Gilson cannot make his hearings public, he should be willing to hold press conferences with all parties involved after his sessions so that producers will know exactly what they are getting. This goes back to the old dictum of English jurisprudence that justice should not only be done but also be seen to be done. If we do not heed that dictum, no matter how glowingly the minister will describe the agreement that will be reached and subsequently come to the House in the form of legislation, if he does not make producers understand that they are being treated fairly, it will not work and we will be worse off than if we had left the whole thing alone.

• (1640)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I thank the opposition for giving the government this opportunity today to debate the merits of our February 8 announcement about expanding western railway capacity. My colleagues and I welcome the chance to correct any wrong impressions that some hon. members may have had about the government's intention in acting on the grain transportation issue at this time.

This is a subject of utmost importance for all Canadians, particularly the citizens of the four western provinces. It deserves to be given a full and informed discussion, both in the House and in the country. But there can be no informed discussion of this issue while some are basing their opinions on myths and misconceptions.

With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be useful if I took a few minutes to clear up some of these unfounded points of contention.

The first is the accusation that the federal government is unilaterally imposing a change in the Crow rate on western grain producers. This is certainly not the case. As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) made clear in his announcement of the government's decision, our action at the present time is a response to a series of requests from various groups in the west, including most farm organizations. It should not be forgotten that the Western Agriculture Conference and the Prairie Farm Commodity Coalition had petitioned us to do something to improve western railway capacity. In making this request, both groups had put forward their own suggestions about possible solutions to the problem. These positions included a recognition that the grain producer should pay more to ship grain in exchange for an improved level of service.

Moreover, the government has not chosen simply to impose a new rate structure in place of the existing statutory rates. It has put up a strong financial commitment to improving the railway system through branch line rehabilitation and the purchase of an additional 1,280 hopper cars. And it is offering to bridge the current Crow gap with public moneys and to confirm this ongoing benefit to western grain growers in legislation. As we pointed out in our announcement, grain will continue to have a special status where transportation is concerned.

The Government of Canada is willing to spend $3.2 billion over the next four years on western grain transportation. This is the public's contribution to solving the impasse over the Crow rate which has existed for a number of years. It amounts to about $23,000 for every grain grower in the west. Now we are turning to the private sector, to the railway companies and the western farmers and asking what their contribution will be.

The government is not imposing its will on the west, as some critics have said. It is acting responsibly and very much in the interests of western Canadians—especially farmers—and is looking for a shared solution that is worked out in consultation with the groups affected.

Another piece of misinformation that has been spread by the critics is the notion that the federal government has already made up its mind about all the issues like variable rates, how much the farmers should pay, how the Crow benefit will be paid out and so on. They say that the consultations led by Dr. Gilson will be just a sham.

That is not true. The government is bargaining in good faith. We have not made any final decisions about variable rates, the manner in which the government will pay the Crow benefit, nor any hard and fast formulas on how much producers should pay for transporting grain in future years. The government's position is outlined in the policy statement issued on February 8. That is the framework we have established for Dr. Gilson's discussions with the railways and farmers. Nothing more and nothing less.

I know that there have been some other pieces of paper floating around and a lot of talk about leaked cabinet documents. I see the hon. member opposite who was minister of transport in the last Conservative government is in the House.

Mr. Mazankowski: I know nothing about them.

Mr. Whelan: As he knows and as anyone who has been in cabinet knows, officials may submit several documents to a minister before one is accepted. Officials had presented the various documents to my cabinet colleagues and I, in consideration of this issue and some of the information, was questioned. Perhaps some of the documents that the official opposition found when it was in government are documents which we discarded. They could come into my office today and look at my desk. If there is anything secret there that they want, they can have it. There are probably some of those old documents still around. They cannot look at this material and say that it represents the government's position.

It is not true, for instance, that deals have already been struck with the three prairie wheat pools, yet that is one accusation that has been made. Of course, I have met the people concerned at different times but we have not struck any deals. I repeat, the government's position is as set out in the policy statement.

Another untruth that has been spread in the west is that grain growers will be asked to pay five or ten times the current freight charges for grain. Mr. Speaker, there was a political leader who once said that if you were going to tell a lie, you should tell a big one and then people would believe you. He started a world war. In order to enrage people you just have to be as false as you possibly can be!

I have been a politician for 36 years, Mr. Speaker, I do not have much going for me except honesty. The opposition continually tries to attack that by attacking me for wearing a green hat or things that have nothing to do with making decisions. You would think it was a crime to wear a green hat. The opposition tries to downgrade the government in any way it can, but that is being dishonest too.

Producers currently pay 15 cents per bushel. The total cost of transporting a bushel of grain to export points has been estimated at around 75 cents a bushel. That means that farmers are now paying only about 20 per cent of the real transportation costs. Many farmers have said to me, "Look, Mr. Minister—look, Gene, or look, Whelan—we are ready to pay more. You just make those trains move. We will grow more, we will ship more grain and sell more grain." The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), who was the minister of transport in the Clark government, used to say, "Keep those trains moving". That is what it amounts to, Mr. Speaker.

If we were still growing grain in the way we grew it in 1879, Mr. Speaker, we would not be one of the world's leading exporters. No country in the world exports as high a percentage of the grain it produces. No country has to haul it as far to port. In some years we export over 70 per cent of the wheat we produce. The United States may export more in actual tonnes but it does not have to be hauled as far. In fact, I think they export about 50 per cent of the wheat produced.

We faced a lot of different challenges in this land that is 4,000 miles from sea to sea. Over our rough terrain and in our cold winters the trains lose one third of their pulling capacity through the mountains and across the prairies. This year we will move the largest amount of grain we have ever moved—26 million tonnes, or two million more than ever before. That will be with what some people say are inadequate facilities. I have received various letters and petitions from farmers. I have had occasion to meet with various people. With the exception of the National Farmers Union, they have all said, "Keep the Crow." They have refused to look at anything else. They have also said, "Whelan, why are you doing this?" I said, "I am keeping part of the Crow; I am keeping the part of the Crow which will fly." I am referring to the one which will make the grain move. The Minister of Transport said that he would keep that part of the Crow as well. He will not charge them full transportation costs. We have made the commitment that our commercial grain producers will not be put at a disadvantage with any other commercial grain producer in any other part of the world. I know we will be able to do this with an improved transportation system.

We must remember that the governement is offering to pay the current Crow gap in future years. Therefore, it is ridiculous to say that farmers' share of increased costs will lead to immediate five or tenfold jumps in charges. I say to these people, whoever they may be, that they are wrong and dishonest; it is a terrible thing to be saying.

Some people are saying that the Crow rates should not be changed because they were part of the original confederation pact and represent a permanent commitment to the west. Crow rates have nothing to do with any bargain on confederation. They are not some kind of Magna Carta. I have heard people say that they are the Magna Carta of the west. Lord help us if any other Magna Carta was similar to the Crow rates. They are not some kind of Magna Carta of inalienable western rights. The original Crowsnest Pass agreement was signed in 1897 and applied only to eastbound grain and flour shipped from some 289 CP grain delivery points. These rates were not extended to other delivery points until 1925. Moreover, westbound export grain and flour were not put under the Crow rates until 1927, and shipments through the port of Churchill did not qualify until 1931. Let us be honest and say that this is not something which is holier than anything else. Some people say, "Holy Crow". No Crow was as holy as they make out this Crow to be. No Crow could be as holy as leaders of the National Farmers Union like to indicate. I agree with them on some matters, but I have always disagreed with them on this. Should we refuse to change? No, we would be the most backward country in the world if we accepted that attitude and refused to accept change for the better. I say that this is better for all industries, not just the agricultural one, but first and foremost I think about the agricultural industry and its great potential.

There is also a myth that Crow rates are tied in with the land grants given to Canadian Pacific at the time the first transcontinental railroad was built. Some people say that CP should be forced to use profits from other operations to keep the Crow rates at their current level, because it received millions of acres of land grants and $25 million when the railway was built through the west a century ago. There is nothing in the 1880 agreement to suggest that these grants or any returns from them should be used to offset the operating costs of the railway; not a thing. The MacPherson royal commission investigated this question in 1961. Who was in power then? It was not us. At that time it found that the sole reason for the original grants was to build the railway through to the west coast. CP received land grants of 33 million acres, and all but 1 per cent of this land was subsequently disposed of. About 6.8 million acres were returned to the federal government in payment of the loan, and 24 million acres were sold to settlers at prices of about 50 cents to $1 per acre. I just wanted to put this information on the record.

It does not make sense to waste time now questioning the wisdom or fairness of dealings between the CPR and the Dominion Government more than 100 years ago. We clearly face a situation now where western rail capacity is not adequate to meet the needs of western farmers and other rail users. We must get on with doing something about it.

We have also heard the Premier of Saskatchewan and others, including the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) and a couple of other NDP members, charging that changes to the Crow will wipe out hundreds of small rural communities in the west. This relates to the question of variable rates, in other words, rates which would vary on volumes shipped, location, shipping season and other factors. The government has not advocated variable rates. What we have said in our policy statement is that we would consider suggestions from western agricultural associations concerning variable rates, provided that they are, and I quote from the policy statement:

—consistent, however, with the principle that such rates should not work to the detriment of the individual producer.

In other words, producers, not the railways, will decide if they want variable rates and, if so, what kind of rates. The government will seek to protect the interests of individual producers.

This question of decline in rural communities is of concern to me and other members of government. We are not insensitive to the situation. How could anyone be insensitive to such a situation? We are not about to contribute to decline in rural communities in Canada. There are many factors at work which are causing rural change, quite apart from the Crow rates. A change in Crow rates will not likely materially affect current trends. As the Hall commission pointed out, it is the people and the spirit of the people which give a community viability; not railways and elevators. The commission found no evidence that any community which was already declining would be saved by the retention of the railway. Nonetheless, the government has guaranteed by order in council until the year 2000—and I may still be Minister of Agriculture at that time—that about 16,000 miles or about 83 per cent of the original rail line system will be maintained. We have also announced our intention to legislate that Parliament, not the railways, will decide on the framework and conditions for future changes to the railway system.

Another myth about changing the Crow is that the livestock industry in eastern Canada, particularly in Quebec, will be placed at a severe competitive disadvantage by any change in Crow rates. Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan has been quoted as saying that the help western hog and cattle producers receive as a result of changing the Crow will be at the expense of eastern livestock farmers. He is trying to divide the country; he is hoping to do that. I am glad the Saskatchewan government recognizes that the Crow has distorted the use of agricultural resources in the west between grain and livestock production. This is one of the reasons the federal government is anxious to see the Crow changed, but increasing Crow rates will have little or no effect upon the livestock industry in eastern Canada. Some people may ask, "Why?" It is because Ontario produces 400,000 tonnes of surplus grain over and above its need at the present time. Quebec will be doing that within five years. The Livestock Feed Board has a surplus of $1.5 million this year because there was not much grain moved under the livestock feed grain program.

Let us take the price of feed grain, for example. This price is directly linked to the price of United States corn. Prices for Canadian grains are determined on world markets, and there is little chance to pass on higher freight rates to foreign buyers. Therefore, feed grain prices at Thunder Bay will not change as a result of revising the Crow. Similarly, an increase in western grain transportation tariffs for hogs and cattle will not affect the basic price relationships between Omaha, Calgary, Toronto and Montreal.

Changing the Crow will decrease the relative price of feed grains on the prairies, enhancing the profitability of livestock production in the west. The main idea behind all this is to improve the general economic structure of the west, to provide jobs and to process products there. I see that my time is up. I would love to debate at any time, in any place with anyone, why we are changing the Crow. It will be the best thing which has ever happened for the west and all of Canada, as far as I am concerned.

SPORTS

APPRECIATION OF CANADIAN DOWNHILL SKI TEAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, those crazy Canucks have done it again. This past Saturday Canadian downhill skiers took four of the top seven positions in the Molson world downhill championships at Whistler, British Columbia, which was, indeed, an outstanding achievement. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Bossy):

That this House, through Madam Speaker, express its best wishes to the Canadian downhill skiers who competed at Whistler Mountain and that a special expression of appreciation be extended to their coach, John Ritchie.

Madam Speaker: The House may express its feelings by applauding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

PURCHASE DEADLINE FOR REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, during the last week of February Prince Edward Island, Western Newfoundland, the Magdalen Islands and northern New Brunswick were ravaged by a storm which stopped many residents from making final arrangements to purchase registered retirement savings plans. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Finance extend the purchase deadline for RRSPs by an additional ten days for those citizens of Atlantic Canada affected by this storm.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—CALL FOR NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN WARRING PARTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, in light of the observations of the subcommittee which recently visited El Salvador that the possibility of a free and meaningful election is not possible at this time, and in view of the fact that the American ambassador to that country admits that the number of violations of human rights is not, in fact, declining, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the Government of Canada reconsider its position in regard to elections in El Salvador and join with President Portillo of Mexico and other like-minded countries to bring international pressure to initiate negotiations between the warring parties and postpone the election until a time when all Salvadoreans will be free and safe to participate.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

SUGGESTED USE OF PRAIRIE FARM EMERGENCY FUND FOR RESEARCH PURPOSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, whereas an examination of the 1982-83 estimates tabled last week is an indication that the Minister of Agriculture gives little priority to research and development in agriculture and is more concerned about market development. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Minister of Agriculture forthwith bring in legislation to make the $9 million of producers' money held for the past ten years in the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund available to producers for research and development of cereal grains and oilseeds suitable for cultivation in the Canadian Wheat Board area or, alternatively, undertake to pay interest on the fund at current rates, which would amount to approximately $4,000 per day, until such time as suitable research arrangements are made.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

CALL FOR INVESTIGATION OF GUN CONTROL SECTION AND OF EMERGENCY ORDER IN COUNCIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, the present gun control section of the Criminal Code of Canada is cumbersome, expensive to administer, and ineffective. It does not prevent criminals from securing or using firearms, knives, hatchets or hammers. It does militate against peaceful citizens in their proper use of guns and, along with the emergency order in council authorizing civilian detention camps, it aggravates concern about what is happening to our Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble):

That this House urges the government to order a full public investigation into both these matters.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

CALL FOR IMPROVEMENTS TO BENEFIT DISABLED AND WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that proposals to improve pensions for the disabled and women under the Canada Pension Plan are being opposed by the Tory government of Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House calls on all Progressive Conservatives, in particular the hon. member for Rosedale and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands—those self-proclaimed lefties—to lobby the Ontario Tories to come into the twentieth century, albeit kicking and screaming, and agree to implement much needed improvements to our pension system, especially for the disabled and women.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ADMINISTRATION

APPOINTMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): The government's promotion policy allows it to demote parliamentary secretaries who keep their criticisms private, fire public servants for telling the truth about the government's philosophy and, the same week, promote to parliamentary secretary, backbenchers who have written public letters saying the government is wrong. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That the government urged to clarify its policy publicly so that we might all know how it reconciles these irreconcilable actions.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE JUDICIARY

SUGGESTED NOMINATION OF WOMAN TO SUPREME COURT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, given that no woman has ever been appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada, even though many qualified women have served with distinction the superior and supreme courts of the provinces, and given that the government has an opportunity to rectify past neglect when it appoints a new member to the Supreme Court later this week, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That in filling the vacancy left on the Supreme Court of Canada by the retirement of Mr. Justice Ronald Martland, the government break the tradition of 115 years of male appointments by nominating a qualified woman to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE HONOURABLE MEMBER FOR OTTAWA CENTRE

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That the House expresses its deepest sympathy to the hon. member for Ottawa Centre whose reward for months of valiantly defending the indefensible, that is, the MacEachen budget, was to be stripped of his post as parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

METRIC CONVERSION

STATEMENT IN GOVERNMENT WHITE PAPER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House reconfirms its approval of the government white paper on metric conversion brought in by the then minister of industry, trade and commerce, Mr. Pepin, where it states that because of the close ties between the U.S. and Canada in science, technology, industry and commerce, each country has a special interest in the course likely to be followed by the other in respect of metric conversion.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member of Beaches (Mr. Young):

That in the interests of rail safety the Minister of Transport tender his resignation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA POST

ROLE OF AUDITOR GENERAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, the legislation transforming the Post Office into a Crown corporation called for the Auditor General to retain authority for monitoring the Post Office for two years, after which it could be shifted entirely to a private firm. In view of the fact that the Auditor General acts in the public interest and assures disclosure of Post Office operations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble):

That this House recommend the Auditor General retain authority for the monitoring of the Canada Post Corporation and that authority not be transferred solely to a private firm which might not protect the valid interests of Canadian taxpayers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

RAILWAYS

TRAIN WRECK NEAR ORILLIA, ONT.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he could bring us up to date on the train wreck that occurred outside Orillia. Can he tell the House if the safety procedures recommended by Grange and studied by many committees and the CTC had been in place whether this wreck could have been avoided?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my answer is no. If the regulations had been in place concerning hot box detectors, for example, they would not have applied in this particular case. The situation is under control. The possible cause of the accident is not a hot box; it is a broken wheel, which is a type of accident that apparently happens in Canada two or three times a year.

Thirty-six cars derailed in all. Those 36 included 12 cars containing dangerous goods, most of it in boxcars and most of it in relatively small quantities. The key car was the hydrofluoric acid car, No. 12, buried in the jumble of cars. This one contained 39 tonnes of hydrofluoric acid, which is corrosive and toxic. This is the situation as of now. There is still some fire, but it is not creating any major anxiety on the part of the emergency officials who are at the site at the moment.

POSITIONING OF CARS CONTAINING DANGEROUS GOODS

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for that part of his report. Could he assure the House that under existing regulations proper safety inspection procedures were carried out on the wheel which broke, at its last stop, which I presume was in Toronto? In reference to his answer wherein he talked about the hydrofluoric car buried in a jumble of cars, could he assure the House that in future regulations the positioning of cars containing dangerous goods will be addressed in relation to recent American studies which assert that such cars should be at the rear of trains, not in the middle of trains, even though there may be a buffer zone in the middle of trains?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as usual there are different views on the subject. I understand that there is a United States report to the effect that cars containing dangerous goods should be in the last part of trains. Justice Grange suggested that they should be in the first part of trains, and the practice now is to put them in the middle of trains. I say this without smiling, just to indicate that there are different views on subjects of this kind.

Partly because of the work done by the Grange commission following Mississauga, the response system in this particular instance worked very well indeed. For example, Canutech, which is the federal emergency centre, was contacted and provided information on the dangerous goods which were involved. The Ontario Provincial Police Emergency Centre in Toronto was very efficient in its handling of the situation. A CTC commissioner was on the scene very early. The expertise of chemical companies was available very early as well. The cars had been properly spaced, dangerous goods had been properly identified, and the manifest was available very early. There are some of the good effects of the Grange report.

With respect to emergency response, we have made tremendous progress. Unfortunately accidents still happen, but at least we cope with them better than we did before the incident at Mississauga took place.

SAFETY INSPECTION PROCEDURES

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I have a short supplementary question. I appreciate that there is a difference of opinion, but my question was twofold. First, could the minister assure the House that proper inspection procedures were carried out at Toronto on the wheel? Second, what study would MOT or CTC instigate to resolve the difference of opinion as to the positioning of cars carrying dangerous goods?

The CTC press release of September 30, 1981, after the show-cause hearing, indicated that safety initiatives will not appreciably affect the competitive position of railways, will not require additional public funds, and will not create an undue increase in charges to the public. In other words, CTC indicated that safety procedures will not affect the financial load of railways, the public purse or charges to the public.

I agree with the minister that there has been a lot of work on safety initiatives, but what will he do to accelerate them? Will safety be part of the mandate, rather than these three other factors, so that some of the safety recommendations which have now been discussed for almost two years will be implemented?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there was a hearing before the CTC on that particular subject. Indications were pretty clear in the recommendations of the CTC that there was a change of orientation, a change of approach in our society. The economic preoccupation is still considered to be of major importance. Nevertheless, the CTC has made recommendations and will make other regulations concerning, for example, hot box detectors, the type of equipment, the shields, the couplers and what not, which obviously will add to the operational cost of the railways. The CTC has tried to maintain a proper balance in this matter, and as everyone across the country has told me, we have to keep a proper balance of preoccupations between safety and economic activity. That is the balancing act that is necessary.

If I may continue, Madam Speaker, on this subject of whether or not there was an inspection of this equipment, because it is rather important, I questioned the CTC this morning who informed me that the CTC had no reason not to believe proper inspection was carried out. By way of an answer, the CTC outlined the different inspections a boxcar, or a tank car has to go through. It has to be inspected during and after manufacture and at intervals during its lifetime.

Mr. Nowlan: But was it?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, it was. At least, there is no reason to believe it was not is the answer I received. Each time a tank car is filled, it is inspected by the manufacturer, and the shipper before and on completion of loading. The railway itself has a mechanical inspection at every marshalling yard throughout a journey. A superficial inspection is carried out when two trains meet. When the consignee receives the tank car and unloads it he also does an inspection. I am told that this time it was an accident.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

RIDLEY ISLAND TERMINAL, B.C.—CONTRACT ISSUED TO JAPANESE FIRM

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the Minister of Transport. For much of last week the minister was in British Columbia. He will be aware that the second stacker-reclaimer built by Stephens-Adamson for Westshore Terminals begins operation this week. My questions, however, have to do with the Ridley Island Terminal. Was the minister in Prince Rupert last week? Does the minister have any better answers now for the exporting of Canadian jobs to Japan? Does the minister have any better answers now for the cover-up of the reasons for the exporting of those Canadian jobs to Japan?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, no, I will not comment on it further.

Yes, I did meet with Mr. Ross of Swan Wooster and I did meet again with Mr. Franche of the National Harbours Board. They are going to produce for me a four-page, a three-page or a two-page letter—

Mr. Epp: What about a no-page letter?

Mr. Pepin: —in which they will reiterate the reason why the decision on the purchase of a stacker-reclaimer was made the way it was.

I emphasize the fact that there is great urgency in the decision-making process with respect to the coal terminal construction at Prince Rupert. And I again emphasize the fact that different departments of government were involved in the decision-making process in that particular instance. And again I emphasize the fact that it was not possible, and I do not believe that it should be for the minister to impose his own judgment in these matters when he is surrounded by experts who can advise him properly on these questions.

BURRARD FLOATING DOCK CONTRACT—CANADIAN CONTENT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I hope that the minister will make that letter more available than he has the memos and other documents that we have not yet seen. However, with regard to the same contract, the minister talked last week about 53 per cent Canadian content promised by Mitsubishi of Japan. The minister will be aware that Mitsubishi also received a contract for $26 million for the Burrard floating dock in 1980. At that time there was a promise made of a $17 million Canadian offset. Not one cent of that promise has been forthcoming.

What makes the minister think that this contract will be handled any differently than the other one and why would he believe that the Japanese would keep this promise any more than they did the other one? Since the Canadian supplier would provide 96 per cent Canadian content and not 53 per cent, would the minister once again give us those figures that can justify the exporting of Canadian jobs?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to judge on the other case mentioned by the hon. member. One of the reasons that the 53 per cent Canadian content will be carried out here is that I will be watching for sure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1425)

Mr. Pepin: The letter to which I referred will obviously be tabled in the House if my hon. friend asks me to do so in the next couple of days.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF THE HON. JOHNATHAN MOTZFELDT, PREMIER OF GREENLAND

Madam Speaker: May I draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of Mr. Johnathan Motzfeldt who is the Premier of Greenland and, I understand, also the Speaker, which seems to be a great combination for anyone with normal political ambitions.

RAILWAYS

NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES REQUIRED TO CARRY OUT SAFETY INSPECTIONS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I do not think it will be any surprise to you but I do have some questions for the Minister of Transport. By way of directing questions to the minister, may I remind him, if he needs it, that since the early 1950s representatives of railway workers—

Madam Speaker: Order. We were doing very well. The first questions were extremely short. The hon. member need not remind the minister of too many things. Just ask a question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, your remarks are very appropriate and I would be even happier had you directed them to other questioners earlier this day.

Now, since representatives of railway workers and members of this House—I even remember the former member for—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member must ask his question forthwith.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, considering the rare occasions that I have this opportunity, I ask only for one more minute of patience on behalf of the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member need not have a long preamble. He may ask a question, and I must say that some of his time has already expired and, if he is short, he may have his three questions. Otherwise, it will only be two.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, you are probably right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: So may I ask the minister, since some 30,000 jobs have been done away with, and since the matter has been raised so often in Parliament, including by members of this House—

Mr. Epp: Well, who else?

Mr. Benjamin: —and since it was looked upon up until recent years as some kind of a narrow and selfish interest by railway workers, and because of the eradication of those jobs there is inadequate inspection and maintenance of railway rolling stock before it goes on the tracks, will he, under the authority he presently has under the Railway Act and the National Transportation Act, require the railways to restore whatever number of jobs are necessary to guarantee the inspection and maintenance of rolling stock, since the eye can detect defects sooner than computers?

Mr. Epp: Yes or no.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, yes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: Seriously, Madam Speaker, I indicated a moment ago that inspection of railway cars, tank cars in particular, was a job accomplished by a number of people at different times, such as the shipper, the person who receives the car, the railway companies themselves, and the CTC. We have a great number of inspectors there, too. My hon. friend seems to be indicating that the railways do not take their role seriously enough. I will pass my hon. friend's remarks on to them and repeat to them—because I believe in the essential value of the message my hon. friend is delivering—that they have, with others, the responsibility of ensuring railway transportation safety.

REQUEST THAT DISASTER COMPENSATION FUND BE ESTABLISHED

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, this happened not only in Orillia, but also in Coquitlam and one other location in British Columbia yesterday. I will say it before the minister does—one cannot stop all the accidents 100 per cent of the time. However, in the interests of adding to present and future regulations on safety and transportation, would the minister consider establishing a disaster compensation fund by a small surcharge on freight charges or by slight increases in taxes, so that all people can be compensated for damages or evacuation, immediately after any such mishap?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I understand that the railways are insured. This is a question which comes up fairly regularly.

Concerning the subject of safety, I want to emphasize that air safety, marine safety and railway safety have been a very great preoccupation of mine. My hon. friend will recognize that I brought in the bill on the transportation of dangerous goods. Since then, and it takes time, progress has been made in terms of bringing the provinces to pass legislation similar to ours, in terms of administrative agreements with the provinces, in terms of the appointment of inspectors and so on.

This afternoon I will issue a progress report on Grange's 15 recommendations. It indicates what has been done concerning each one of the judge's recommendations. I believe very much in safety, particularly railway safety. It will indeed cost the railways more money. We are trying to do the best we can. It takes a bit of time to do the best we can because of the many interests which have to be accommodated in this matter, as with everything else.

PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY PUBLIC SERVANTS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board, and it concerns the repression being practised against some 300,000 Canadian civil servants who, the Prime Minister says, are free to speak about philosophy. In a letter to me dated February 22, with regard to Neil Fraser, the minister stated that while there are no explicit rules governing public statements by public servants, it has long been accepted as a condition of employment in the public service that public servants should not publicly criticize government programs or policies.

I would like to ask the minister was that condition negotiated with the public service unions, and when. Is it administered to persons when they join the public service? Can the minister produce in written terms, the condition of which he speaks?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the subject was exhausted, it seems to me, in exchanges in this House and outside the House last week.

Mr. Clark: Just wait.

Mr. Johnston: I do not believe the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands was present during those exchanges. The Prime Minister at no time said that public servants could only speak about philosophy. That particular exchange, I believe—

Miss MacDonald: That was the answer.

Mr. Johnston: —took place with the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, and he threw that out as a subject matter.

Miss MacDonald: The only one.

Mr. Johnston: I would also like to point out that there are rules of conduct. I mentioned this last week. They vary from department to department because the responsibility for the conduct of public servants has been delegated by the Treasury Board to the deputy ministers who are responsible in each department across the government. These departments, in some cases, have codes of conduct. In fact I have one with me today, which is quite an elaborate code of conduct, of the Department of Employment and Immigration, and which has been in existence for many years. I understand, in fact, it was in existence while the opposition briefly formed the government in 1979 and early 1980.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We never had any problems like that, that I recall.

POSITIONS TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I, too, have copies of those codes of conduct of which the minister speaks. However, I notice that he did not answer any of the questions I asked as to whether or not they are negotiated with the public service unions or whether they are just brought in for convenience at the time a minister thinks they can apply. For example, last November thousands of Canadians, including many public servants, demonstrated on Parliament Hill against the government's policy of high interest rates, unemployment, and mortgage costs. They carried placards and banners, and they made verbal protests. However, they were not suspended or fired. They were allowed to express their freedom of speech.

What is the difference in the case of Mr. Fraser, who did exactly the same thing? In this case, is the government being big and bold, and able to use bully boy, ruthless tactics, moving against a single individual, a single voice, using punitive action against him, when it took no action last autumn? What is the difference in Mr. Fraser's case?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the issue of conduct of any employee is a matter of judgment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: It is clearly a matter of judgment. Perhaps that is not something with which the hon. member is familiar. However, it is a matter of judgment between employers and employees in any situation. It is generally recognized that public servants in any jurisdiction are not there to fan the flames of controversy on issues which are controversial at any particular period of time. But, generally speaking, the matter is not a black and white one. It is specifically provided in these codes of conduct, for example, that there is no problem with respect to matters of collective bargaining. I therefore suggest to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that she is trying to fan this particular issue entirely out of perspective.

Miss MacDonald: Do not worry; the whole country is.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Fraser has every right to embark upon the avenues of appeal which are available to him. I understand he is doing so.

Oral Question

METRIC CONVERSION

COMMENTS MADE BY UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, the unemployed civil servant, Neil Fraser, said Canadians should continue to exercise their freedom of choice and that mandatory imposition of metric systems assaulted this freedom. For speaking this truth, he was fired. Last Friday it was reported that the United States ambassador to Canada thinks that the mandatory imposition of metric is rubbish, and predicted that it would be many years, if ever, before the United States switches, and that it might be detrimental to trade between our two nations.

Therefore I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he intends to recommend that Neil Fraser be reinstated for telling the truth, or does he intend to ask Washington to recall its ambassador for presuming to tell the truth to Canadians about the metric system, as Neil Fraser did? He lost his job.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I believe that the comments of the American ambassador, to which the hon. member refers, were made in his personal capacity. Certainly we have received no such representation from Washington.

Mr. Clark: What about Fraser?

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, I say to the minister that Neil Fraser's comments were made in the privacy of a public meeting, not while carrying out his duties as a member of the tax department.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Domm: Now the civil servants know where they can speak.

ORDER MAKING IMPERIAL MEASUREMENT ILLEGAL

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): I would like to ask a question of the minister responsible for the Metric Commission. The white paper on metric imposition states that because of the close ties between Canada and the United States in science, technology, industry and commerce, each country has a special interest in the course likely to be followed by the other in respect of metric conversion. Those words were written by the former minister of industry, trade and commerce who is sitting beside the minister in this House. I would like to ask the minister why this government has reverted to an order in council making imperial measurement illegal without full parliamentary discussion in this House of Commons. Why did the minister do that? Why did the minister not implement the white paper, which Mr. Fraser was fired for referring to as the document which brought about the implementation of metric in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member should get his facts straight before making statements without any justification as he has done just now. It is totally false to give the impression that the Parliament of Canada has not spoken on this matter. Here in the House, we have had a debate in which all political parties supported the measure. There was also a bill to amend the Weights and Measures Act, which enabled the government to proceed with metrication. I may remind the hon. member that the bill was supported by Progressive Conservative members at the time.

THE ECONOMY

IMPACT OF PROPOSED CHANGE IN CROWSNEST PASS RATE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance my question goes to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the impact on the overall economy of the proposed changes in the Crow rate. The minister knows that we have certain geographical disadvantages in being a long way from a seaport, and he also knows that our competitors, the Americans, the Europeans and others, subsidize grain producers. He also knows that the export of grain meant over $5 billion last year to the Canadian economy.

What studies has the government undertaken as to the implication of changes in the Crow on Canadian trade, the balance of payments, and the value of the Canadian dollar; and will he give a commitment to the House to make these studies public so that we may have a chance to assess them?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the postulate is obviously wrong, and my hon. friend should know that the federal Government of Canada will continue to subsidize the transportation of grain. If he reads the announcement we made, he will come to the conclusion that the degree of subsidization will be even higher in the future than in the past. At the level of $800 million a year, on an export of $5 billion—the figure he has used—this is a fairly substantial degree of subsidization. So the postulate being wrong, the rest of the question is not relevant.

INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT STUDIES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I would very simply like the minister to answer the question. What studies have been undertaken by the federal government to assess the impact of the proposed changes on our balance of trade and the value of the dollar? I ask that question because the only study I have seen is one completed only a few weeks ago by a consultant named David Harvey, for the Minister of Agriculture, that said that with the changes in the Crow rate we would still have 1.9 million tonnes of grain less, which is about 9 per cent of our production. I simply want to know what studies have been undertaken, and will he make those studies public?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it must have been seen that under the effect of the system as it exists now the farmer pays money to purchase hopper cars through the Canadian Wheat Board. He is also paying money for the storage of grain that he might not have had to pay otherwise. According to the Canadian Wheat Board, he is losing sales around the world in some years, because of the inadequacies of the transportation system. So I think that, looking at it from the point of view of the farmer, and looking at it from the point of view of western Canada in general, there is a tremendous growth in export that will develop from the building of an adequate rail transportation system. If my hon. friend does not believe in that, he could take a trip to the west coast and see what is happening there, in terms of port developments that have been built in order to receive these goods coming from western Canada and going abroad, to all parts of the world.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, how can the federal government make a major change when it has not made any studies as to the impact of this change on the balance of payments and on the value of the Canadian dollar? Is the minister admitting to the House that it has not done any studies of the impact on our economy?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will see if any in-depth analysis has been made of that, but any child knows that if you have an adequate rail transportation system in the west, all these commodities that are going to double in production in the next five years and triple in the next ten years—I mean grain, I mean coal, I mean potash, I mean petro-chemicals, etc.—will be exported and the balance of the export-import trade of Canada will be improved.

CANADA POST

AGREEMENT ON HIRING OF PART-TIME LETTER CARRIERS IN SUMMER

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation. The minister will know, I am sure, of the latest policy set up by the corporation pertaining to the hiring of part-time help to replace letter carriers this summer. He is probably also aware that the corporation has said that this agreement was arrived at with the letter carriers in order to allow it to hire part-time help, which it was not allowed to do before. Since this arrangement or agreement, Madam

Speaker, is not in the contract of the letter carriers' union and since it could be starting a precedent that we would not necessarily appreciate, I wonder if the minister could inform the House if he is aware of any other verbal agreements within the corporation, and, if so, what are they and, if not, does he feel that this verbal agreement should stand?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I shall be pleased to discuss the matter with the President of the Canada Post Corporation and obtain an answer for the hon. member.

[English]

ACTION TO CORRECT DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I would have thought that by now the minister would have been informed. Possibly he should also approach the president on the fact that the corporation is stating that this would allow preference to be given to families of letter carriers for summer employment. In fact, the directive does not say "preference". It says they "will be selected from." That does not allow the postmasters any preference clause in the hiring. I would like to know, in my supplementary, is the minister aware of any action being taken to correct this discrimination and, if not, does he plan any action to correct this discrimination?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, those negotiations took place between union and management of the new Canada Post Corporation. The hon. member may not have realized that some changes have been made and that we no longer have a post office department but a Crown corporation. I shall be pleased to refer the hon. member's representations to the president of the corporation.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ARCTIC NATURAL GAS PILOT PROJECT—CONDEMNATION BY GREENLAND

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane-Superior): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Earlier today he met with Premier Motzfeldt of Greenland. One of the items which the Premier of Greenland discussed with the minister was his concern about the Arctic Pilot Project, which is a plan to bring liquefied natural gas to the south, through the northwest passage by tanker down to the east coast. Last October the Greenland parliament unanimously condemned this project. I would like to ask the Minister of the Environment if he could tell the House exactly what steps are being taken so that these very legitimate concerns of Greenland—concerns, by the way, shared by many Canadians—are taken fully into account.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, yes, I did meet earlier today with representatives of the Greenland government. It is true, as the hon. member has suggested, that they raised the question of the Arctic pilot project. I was pleased to see that the Greenland representatives and myself agreed that the need was for us to begin again the discussions which had taken place in the past. I believe that the last meeting took place in August, 1980. Both sides are in agreement that these discussions, which for one reason or another had not continued, should begin again.

FINANCE

CHANGE IN APPLICATION OF SALES TAX—POSSIBLE REMISSION OF EXCESS TAX

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, my question, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, is for the Minister of State for Finance. I would direct his attention to a comment made in answer to a question raised in this House on February 12, made by the Minister of Finance, with respect to the intended change in the federal sales tax. He indicated at that time:

> There is absolutely no increased revenue from that particular change. There is absolutely no additional revenue coming to the treasury. I can assure the hon. member of that.

I wonder if the minister would care to confirm to this House that, in the event that any revenue should be generated in excess of what the treasury now obtains, there will be a remission of the excess tax.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member asked this question, and with the hon. member and other members of this House, I am also anxious to have an opportunity to discuss in committee the fundamental change that will consist in transferring the application of the federal sales tax from the manufacturing to the wholesale level. I also wish to confirm the answer given by the Minister of Finance, namely, that the point of this exercise is not to generate new revenue for the government but to remove a number of inequities that are present in our tax system and to make this part of our system more equitable for all Canadians. So the point is not to generate revenue, and if the tax percentage is applied to a larger amount, as we shall see in committee, the percentage of tax applicable will be reduced in such a way that no new revenue is generated.

INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Madam Speaker, what the minister said was that there was absolutely no additional revenue coming to the treasury. I ask the minister very simply, in the event that additional revenue does come to the treasury because we have changed the base and the rate, will the government remit that excess? It is a very simple question.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): The answer is as simple as the question, namely, since the assumption does not make sense, no answer is necessary.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RIGHT OF PUBLIC SERVANTS TO COMMENT ON PUBLIC POLICY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I will not comment on that assault on parliamentary democracy by the Minister of State for Finance. Let me direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. He will have noted the response by his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who drew an interesting distinction when he said that the United States ambassador, and I quote, "was speaking in his personal capacity". Does the government accept that Canadian public servants have the right to comment on public policy in their personal capacity?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the entire issue is one of what conduct is appropriate for public servants. As I indicated earlier, I firmly believe it is a question of judgment in each particular case. Clearly there is a difference between a public servant in one area of the bureaucracy commenting in general terms about a government policy and a senior public servant becoming involved in an issue of controversy, picketing, appearing on radio shows, whatever. Clearly there are questions of conduct which must be matters of judgment for the deputy minister to decide. Ultimately, if the deputy minister is wrong, just as if a private employer is wrong in determining that an employee has acted in a manner incompatible with his duties, the employer, in this case the Public Service Staff Relations Board, and ultimately the courts, if necessary, will determine whether the deputy minister acted improperly.

COMMENTS MADE BY DISMISSED KINGSTON PUBLIC SERVANT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister cannot shift this responsibility off to deputy ministers. The government has a responsibility to establish policy and to indicate the principles on which that policy is based. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has recognized that foreign public servants operating in Canada have the right to speak in their personal capacity. The Government of Canada has denied the right of public servants operating in Canada to speak in their personal capacity. That is the principle and the inconsistency here. There is one standard for Americans speaking in Canada and a quite different standard for Canadians speaking in Canada. That is what we find unacceptable.

Let me come to the specific instance. The minister will know that the only action Parliament has taken on the metric question has been to approve a measure which allowed voluntary implementation. An order in council was passed, which ran against the will of Parliament, imposing implementation. What Mr. Fraser did was speak the principle that parliament spoke. Is a public servant in Canada to lose his job because that public servant speaks the principles that Parliament speaks?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I have not nor do I intend to make any personal judgment with respect to the circumstances of Mr. Fraser. The Leader of the Opposition pleads his case very eloquently. I assume that similar representations will be made to the Public Service Staff Relations Board, and that body, which is there specifically to protect the interests of employees and employers, both ways, will ultimately decide whether Mr. Fraser was dealt with properly. I see no point in pursuing the issue here. It is purely one of judgment based upon the facts of a particular case. There are no overriding questions of principle involved. Surely the Leader of the Opposition expects certain conduct from employees. The issue is whether the conduct was appropriate or not appropriate. It is that simple.

REASONS FOR FIRING OF PUBLIC SERVANT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister is suggesting what the country already knows, that this government acts without any principle at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question is to the Minister of National Revenue. The minister knows what Mr. Fraser said and what Parliament said. He knows that the only guidelines in the Department of National Revenue are draft guidelines, not guidelines that are actually in effect. Will the minister tell us why he fired Mr. Fraser?

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, at the first instance of Mr. Fraser's conduct involving the press and in public, he was counselled that if he had certain things he wanted to say through certain channels, that was a different matter altogether; for example, if he had made his representation through his Member of Parliament. Mr. Fraser chose to bring this to the public forum, to use the media and to criticize government programs openly.

I would also make the point that I do not think it is right that Parliament be substituted for a legitimate grievance procedure. There is a grievance procedure and that procedure is being followed. I do not feel it is right for Parliament to judge what is legitimately the judgment of another body.

Mr. Clark: Martial law.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LAND CLAIMS SUBMITTED BY HAIDA, NUUCHAHNULTH AND HEILTSUK

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In the fall of 1980 three Indian nations on the Pacific coast, the Haida, Nuuchahnulth, and the Heiltsuk submitted land claims. One and a half years later they have not been told whether or not these claims have been accepted for negotiation. Last fall departmental officials said they would be told as soon as the Department of Justice had reviewed them. Can the minister tell the House today whether these claims have been accepted, and will he assure the people involved that there will be no offshore drilling for oil or gas until these claims have been settled?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member may be aware, there has been more progress with respect to the acceptance and negotiation of land claims in the last year and a half than there has been in the entire history of Canada. With respect to these particular claims, there is no doubt about the complexities involved. I will check to see when Justice will be ready to give an indication one way or the other. I am fully aware of some of the concerns of the Indians involved, and will try to inform the hon. member as soon as I can. That decision is not yet ready.

KASKA DENA CLAIM IN NORTHERN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): After one and a half years these people are entitled to an answer. Two weeks ago the Kaska Dena Council submitted a comprehensive land claim for northern British Columbia. Since the Kaska Dena people are threatened by the impact of two megaprojects, the Alaska Highway natural gas pipeline and the proposed Liard power project, will the minister promise the House that these people will not have to wait a year and a half for an answer to their claims? Also, will he guarantee that neither of these megaprojects will proceed before their claim is settled?

• (1500)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, it is not within my competence, or perhaps even within the federal government's competence, to state right here that we can stop megaprojects. I would imagine that the B.C. government might have some considerable say with respect to what goes on in terms of the jurisdiction of that government with respect to megaprojects.

I can tell you that the Kaska people were in, and there is no doubt about it that the two megaprojects to which the hon. member makes reference will certainly have significant impact on the traditional lifestyles of the Kaska people. I indicated to them that I would tell the Department of Justice of the urgency of the situation and that some indication should be given because of that fact.

The other situation concerns moneys being made available to the Kaska people to study the potential impact of these megaprojects. We have made some moneys available to them for that purpose. I am looking at the prospect of making further moneys available to them for that purpose next year. They also indicated that if the megaprojects do go ahead they would want to have some economic development moneys in order to be in a position to participate in the employment opportunities afforded. This is in addition to the impact moneys. I indicated we would look sympathetically upon that.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DOMM—ALLEGED CONTEMPTUOUS COMMENTS MADE BY PUBLIC SERVANT—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: On Wednesday, February 24, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) raised a question of privilege arising out of certain words spoken by two employees of the Metric Commission. The first problem I have with this question of privilege is that it does not appear to have been raised at the earliest opportunity. However, after taking the matter under advisement I am now prepared to deal with it.

The hon. member names two people in his submission, both employed by the Metric Commission and both, according to the hon. member, used words which the hon. member found to be objectionable.

The question whether the use of such language against a member of Parliament by public employees warrants their dismissal is not a matter for the Chair. I am concerned only with whether the matter should be given precedence over other business so that the House can deal with it immediately.

As the hon. member recognized in his submission, in order to constitute a contempt or breach of privilege, words reflecting on Members of Parliament must, in the the words of Erskine May, "concern the character or conduct of the member in that capacity". On page 136 of May's nineteenth edition, we also find the following:

It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

Parliamentary privilege is based on the need to protect members from any action tending to obstruct, or intimidate them or impair their effectiveness in the discharge of their duties. It is not designed to protect them from criticism, however strong, even when the language used might be excessive. The hon. member himself quoted the words of a British select committee report, cited in a ruling of my predecessor on June 23, 1977, which is as follows:

—the House should be slow and reluctant to use its penal powers to stifle criticism or even abuse, whether of the machinery of the House, of a member or of an identifiable group of members, however strongly the criticism may be expressed and however unjustifiable it may appear.

He went on to quote further words from the same report:

Nevertheless, a point may be reached at which conduct ceases to be merely intemperate criticism or abuse and becomes or is liable to become an improper obstruction of the functions of Parliament. For such cases, however rare, the penal powers must be preserved and the House must be prepared to exercise them.

I would point out that the whole thrust of the report from which the hon. member quoted was to discourage the raising of questions of privilege based upon abusive language. It is recommended that where a member feels he has been libelled or slandered, he should seek his remedy through the courts. I shall quote two of the recommendations of that select committee report:

In the future exercise of its penal jurisdiction the House should follow the general rule that it should be exercised (a) in any event as sparingly as possible and (b) only when the House is satisfied that to exercise it is essential in order to provide reasonable protection for the House, its members or its officers, from such improper obstruction or attempt at or any threat of obstruction as is causing, or is likely to cause, substantial interference with the performance of their respective functions.

In the ordinary case where a member has a remedy in the courts he should not be permitted to invoke the penal jurisdiction of the House in lieu of or in addition to that remedy—

It is relevant to refer at this point to the case alluded to by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in the course of his intervention. That case, in which certain members who represent the province of Quebec in this House were described as traitors in an advertisement published in a Quebec newspaper, was not raised here as privilege. Rather, the members concerned sought a remedy through the courts.

The question for the Chair to determine, therefore, is whether it is possible to sustain an argument that the words complained of by the hon. member constituted an obstruction of the hon. member in the discharge of his functions. Has his effectiveness as a member been impaired? Have the words uttered prevented the hon. member from discharging his duties in any way?

In a free society we must accept that the line between fair comment and abuse is sometimes thin indeed. Those of us who enter public life are frequently the targets, not only of criticism, both justified and unjustified, but also of abuse. As the hon. member for Yukon pointed out, it has been many years since anyone was brought before the bar of this House to answer for a contempt. I suggest that if such action were taken on every occasion when a member of this House was a target of abuse, we should be summoning a very large number of people to the bar.

Although the hon. member finds the word "redneck" to be contemptuous and insulting, I cannot find that this alone amounts to a prima facie case of contempt of Parliament. With regard to the other comment, I suggest that the use of the words "that is not true" do not of themselves constitute an accusation of lying. Two people may dispute the facts of a matter in completely good faith without either of them being liars.

There are several relevant precedents of this House, and I will now refer to one in particular dealing with virtually the same point. On June 18, 1975, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) made a submission, claiming he had been the victim of attempted intimidation when he was attacked on a CBC radio program and described as a "McCarthyite" and a "screwball". The Chair gave an immediate ruling in the following terms:

—his privileges as a member of the House of Commons, his right to appear here and to participate fully as an active member of the House, his right to speak and to express his opinions, have not in any way been interfered with. Nor do I see that his rights would be interfered with by any commentary, editorial writer, speaker, television president or otherwise throughout the country. No member is subject to such intimidation, and certainly it does not seem to me that the hon. member has been intimidated in theory or in fact. Therefore, I do not consider that a question of privilege is involved.

I must therefore decline to accord this matter precedence over the regular business of the House, particularly in view of the fact that it does not appear to have been raised at the earliest opportunity. This requirement is not a mere technicality, but indeed in some respects a test of the validity of the complaint.

MR. BEATTY—ALLEGED BREACH OF SAFE CONTAINERS CONVENTION ACT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, on Friday I gave notice of my intention to raise a question of privilege today. When I did so, I did not realize that the significance of the particular regulation in question would be underscored by the accident which took place near Orillia yesterday.

The reason for raising this question of privilege is that Parliament is being impeded in discharging its responsibilities due to the failure of the government to comply with the law as passed by this Parliament. I should also indicate that I have given notice to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), who was the minister sponsoring the particular order in question, of my intention to raise this question of privilege.

Mr. Pepin: Five minutes ago.

Mr. Beatty: The particular regulation which I have in mind is an order under Section 8 of the Safe Containers Convention Act. The order itself is the Safe Containers Convention Act Amendments Order, 1981, which was made on January 21 of this year and registered on January 22. It is SOR 82-156. The point that I would like to make this afternoon in explaining my question of privilege is that the government's failure to comply with the law as stated by Parliament prevents Parliament and the members of this House of Commons from discharging their responsibilities as members of the House.

I listened very carefully to the description which your Honour gave, I think quite properly, earlier this afternoon about what constitutes privilege. You stressed the fact that to demonstrate that privileges were being breached one had to demonstrate that action had been taken which impeded Members of Parliament from discharging their responsibilities, which affected the ability of this House of Commons to act. While that is a relatively conservative construction of what constitutes privilege in this House, I think it is absolutely correct, and I think it is absolutely applicable in this particular case I am raising today.

I refer Your Honour to the Safe Containers Convention Act and, in particular, Section 8 of the act, which gives the government the authority to amend, by order, the schedule to the act. Section 8(2) of the act provides the following:

An order under Subsection (1) shall be laid before Parliament not later than the tenth sitting day of Parliament after it is issued.

In this particular case the order was issued on January 21. It was registered on January 22. It is now March 1. Parliament has sat for more than a full month since the issuance of that order, and yet, as best I have been able to ascertain, the government has still not yet complied with Section 8(2) of the act.

Why is this particularly important to Parliament? It is important for a very good reason, and that is that Section 8(4) of the act provides:

Where a motion for the consideration of the House of Commons or Senate is filed as provided in Subsection (3) with respect to a particular order referred to in Subsection (2), that House shall, not later than the sixth sitting day of that House following the filing of the motion, take up and consider the motion, unless a motion to the like effect has earlier been taken up and considered in the other House.

Subsection (3) provides:

An order referred to in Subsection (2) shall come into force on the later of

(a) the thirtieth sitting day of Parliament after it has been laid before Parliament pursuant to that subsection, and

(b) the day provided in the order

unless, before the twentieth sitting day of Parliament after the order has been laid before Parliament, a motion for the consideration of either House, to the effect that the order be revoked, signed by not less than fifty members of the House of Commons in the case of a motion for the consideration of that House and by not less than twenty members of the Senate in the case of a motion for the consideration of the Senate, is filed with the Speaker of the appropriate House.

In other words, what the law provides is, first, that the government must lay before Parliament within ten sitting days an order issued under the act. Second, it provides that 50 members of this House can put down a motion to disallow the order amending the schedule to the act which was previously laid before Parliament. Presumably it is not possible for 50 members of the House of Commons to lay down a motion proposing that the order be disallowed unless that order is first before Parliament. As yet the government has not complied with the law. Its failure to comply with the law prevents members of Parliament from putting down the motion that is specifically referred to in Subsection (3). Indeed, the government's failure to comply with the law prevents the consideration of the motion which is specifically provided for in Subsection (4). The House of Commons is required to hold a debate to consider that motion within six days of the motion's being tabled to consider the order which has been laid before the House. Parliament cannot do that. This House of Commons cannot hold that debate because we cannot yet put down a motion to disallow the order which has not been placed before Parliament.

If it were simply that the government was acting illegally and that did not in any way affect Parliament's rights and responsibilities or its ability to act under the provisions of the law, then it could properly be stated that this was a matter for the courts to determine and it was not a matter properly before Parliament. In an instance such as this, however, the government's law-breaking affects the ability of each member of Parliament to discharge his or her responsibilities in this House.

I want to expand briefly upon that because I think that is the crux of the issue Your Honour will be asked to decide this afternoon. The first point I would like to make is that this was not a matter which was frivolously put in there by Parliament. It was recommended by the government that the government have a positive onus put upon it to lay the order before Parliament within ten sitting days. That decision was consciously made by the government. It was consciously passed by this Parliament. It was not a frivolous decision.

Second, there is clear and valid reason for that being included in the act. The government and Parliament both felt it was sufficiently important that Parliament should have the opportunity to consider an order made amending the schedule to the act and possibly to strike down that order or disallow it if need be that they wrote that provision in there, and Parliament cannot act in that way unless the government has first complied with the law. Its failure to comply with the law impedes Parliament in discharging its responsibilities.

I should stress that the government itself in passing the law provided in Section 7 that it would be an offence to contravene provisions of the law and, indeed, it provides for a fine of up to $5,000 for anyone contravening a provision of the law. Section 7(1) reads as follows:

Every person who contravenes a provision of this act or the regulations is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars.

The government may very well claim that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is somehow immune from that section, but what it does underscore is that when this law was passed Parliament and the government felt that compliance with the law was sufficiently important that there should be sanctions put in place for those people who would choose to disobey the law. For the government to maintain one standard for itself of a disregard for elements of the act and a totally different standard for anyone else in the country is, I think, totally indefensible and certainly not something that Parliament—and you, Madam Speaker, as the custodian and the guardian of Parliament's rights—should be prepared to allow.

One of the important questions to be determined is whether, as I said earlier, this is simply a legal question which is up to the courts to decide or whether in fact it is a matter properly before Parliament. I argue that the fact is that this has become part of the procedures of this House. It has become part of the operating procedures of this House and, indeed, one of the subsections of Section 8 of the act, Subsection (4), specifically puts a positive onus on the House of Commons. We do not have the luxury of ignoring the law in the way the minister has. If in fact the order had been properly tabled in Parliament within ten days and if in fact 50 members of the House of Commons on either side had put down a motion to consider the order, Parliament would be required, within six sitting days, to act upon that motion, and Your Honour, as the Speaker, would be required to comply with the law of the land.

So Section 8 clearly affects the operating procedures of this House of Commons. Not only does it provide the ability to Parliament to discharge its responsibilities and to examine a piece of delegated legislation made under its authority, but it goes beyond that. Subsection (4) puts a positive onus on the House to act within a certain specified number of days and, consequently, it would be impossible to argue that this section of the act does not constitute part of the operating procedure of this House of Commons.

I bring to the attention of the Chair pages 138 and 139 of Erskine May, which deal with the question of the importance of such a matter being considered part of the operating procedures of the House. In Chapter X, "Breaches of Privilege and Contempts", under the section "Disobedience to Rule or Orders of Either House" Erskine May states:

> Disobedience to the orders of either House, whether such orders are of general application or require a particular individual to do or abstain from doing a particular act, or contravention of any rules of either House is a contempt of that House.

At page 139 Erskine May lists examples of possible contempts, and "neglecting to make a return" is one of them. I argue that even if Subsection (4) of Section 8 of the act was not there and even if there was not a positive onus upon Parliament to act within a certain specified number of days, the citation from Erskine May would still be valid, but it is doubly valid because of the fact that when Parliament passed that act, we specifically put an onus on ourselves in complying with the law to act within a specified number of days, within six sitting days of a motion being put down for consideration and possible disallowance.

It could also be argued by the government that somehow this is a matter which could properly be considered by the courts. I suspect that if the government were to take a look at Section 7 and the provision which imposes a fine of up to $5,000 on people who are responsible for infractions of the act, the government would feel that did not apply to it, but it might very well say that questions relating to the enforcement of Section 8 of the act would require the courts to take a particular decision.

I would argue, in response, that the procedures described in the Safe Containers Convention Act are internal proceedings of the House and might very well be beyond the jurisdiction of the courts. In that respect I cite Erskine May's nineteenth edition, pages 199-201.

If you accept that point which complements the first point that I made, Madam Speaker, then it follows, using the May citation, that the courts may very well not be able to adjudicate the matter. Therefore, Madam Speaker, it must be your responsibility to ensure that the government complies with the law if what we are dealing with is something that the government may claim is beyond the enforcement powers of the court. I do not know that the government will make that argument, but if it does, clearly that strengthens your position as the sole custodian of Parliament's rights and the person charged with the responsibility of making sure that the law of the land is complied with.

Lest anyone claim that there was a relevant precedent on a similar matter on February 1, 1979, which would sustain the government's failure to act in this instance—its clear breach of the law—let me deal briefly with that point.

On February 1, 1979, as recorded at page 2789 of Hansard, my colleague the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) rose on a question of privilege. He pointed out that the government had not complied with the law as it related to the tabling of the annual report of the Canada Council. In that instance the law required that within a certain number of days the annual report of the Canada Council be tabled in the House by the then secretary of state. In response the minister indicated that he did not have the report and therefore was not able to comply with the law and could not be forced to do so.

Mr. Speaker Jerome indicated very clearly that his decision was based precisely on that answer. At page 2791 he stated as follows:

> For the moment the Secretary of State has put that point to rest because he has indicated he does not have the report. I must accept his word. If he does not have the report, he obviously cannot refer it to the House. If the report is in his hands at a later time, or if in fact there is some action to be taken against the chairman for failing to file the report with the Secretary of State, that may be so.
> The essence of the hon. member's question of privilege at this time is the refusal of the Secretary of State to ensure examination of the report by Parliament. The minister told the House today, and I must accept it, that he does not have the report and therefore cannot ensure that at this time. There may be other matters the hon. member may wish to raise on further investigation. However, for the moment any question of privilege which is today related to a refusal of the Secretary of State has to be set aside subject, of course, upon further examination by the hon. member, to any action which might relate to a failure on the part of the chairman and the council itself.

Let us consider this very carefully, Madam Speaker. This particular precedent differs from what we are considering today because the then secretary of state was able to say to the Chair and to the House—and the House was obligated to accept his assurance that his answer was factual—that he was unable to comply with the law because a report which he was required to table in Parliament had not yet been furnished to him; consequently, he could not table a report which had not been made available.

I stress that such is not the case in this instance. The Minister of Transport or some other responsible minister is required—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member could enlighten the Chair by telling me from the decision he is quoting precisely on this matter, the failure to table a report, whether the Speaker found there was a prima facie case of privilege. Perhaps he could continue with that decision. He seems to have an important piece of paper in front of him.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, that was the conclusion of the Speaker: because the then secretary of state said he could not table a report he did not have, that did not constitute a question of privilege in itself. The Speaker held open the possibility that had the minister had in his possession a copy of the report, that might very well have constituted a question of privilege. The relevant sentence reads as follows:

> If the report is in his hands at a later time, or if in fact there is some action to be taken against the chairman for failing to file the report with the Secretary of State, that may be so.

In other words, the important distinction to be made is that in that instance the Speaker found there was not a question of privilege because the minister could not be forced to table a report which he did not have.

Mr. Speaker Jerome made it very clear that he left open the possibility that it might have constituted a breach of the privileges of members of the House if the minister had the report and had simply chosen not to comply with the law.

The distinction I should like to make in the instance before us, Madam Speaker, is that the Minister of Transport or whoever the appropriate minister may be to lay this instrument before Parliament cannot claim that he does not have access to it. It is an order made by the governor in council issued on January 21 and registered on January 22. No argument could be made that the government did not have in its possession an order made under the act. Clearly it is something that the government had and could have chosen to table at any time had it chosen to comply with the law.

On the strength of a reading of Mr. Speaker Jerome's ruling I would argue, first of all, that the fact that he ruled there was not a question of privilege because the minister did not have a copy of the report in question in his possession does not invalidate the point I make today. In fact, the government does have in its possession the order that it is required to lay before Parliament.

Second, I would argue that a reading of the decision by Mr. Speaker Jerome makes it clear that he was leaving it open that had the minister had the report in his hands—and he denied having it—that might very well have constituted a question of privilege.

In any case, Madam Speaker, I think the fact that there is a positive onus upon Parliament to act within a specified number of days after the tabling of the order in Parliament adds further weight to the argument that this is a bona fide question of privilege. It means that if Parliament is to act at all, if it is to have a motion to consider the order when it is laid before Parliament, with the possibility of disallowing the order, it must act within a specified number of days. That includes having a debate within the specified number of days. That may not be the case in the instance of the reports of the Canada Council or other reports that are required to be tabled in Parliament, but I think it adds weight to the importance of the government complying with the law. It also adds urgency to the need for the government to table that order before Parliament so that it can discharge its responsibilities.

In sum, Madam Speaker, that is the argument I want to make today. Let me simply capsulize it by saying that no one can argue that the government has complied with the law. Section 8(2) of the Safe Containers Convention Act makes it very clear that the government has an obligation to act within ten sitting days of the order being tabled. That has not been done. Parliament has been sitting for over a month since the order was made.

There is a positive onus upon Parliament to act. It is clearly part of the operating procedures of this House. Parliament is being obstructed in the discharge of its responsibilities.

If members of the House were to review the ruling that Your Honour made earlier today in defining, quite properly, what constitutes a breach of the privileges of members of the House of Commons, they would see that it is clear that action which obstructs Parliament and obstructs an individual member from discharging his or her responsibilities is a breach of the privileges of all Members of Parliament.

I have one final point, Madam Speaker. The government may make two claims. First, because Parliament included a provision in Subsection (3) that said that the order would not come into effect until the later of either the thirtieth sitting day of Parliament after the order has been laid before Parliament or the day provided in the order, perhaps the government would argue that there is no injury in this instance; that the order is not being activated at the present time because it has not been properly laid before Parliament. Consequently, it could argue that no one's rights have been jeopardized in the interim.

I would argue that that claim would not be valid, Madam Speaker. The government has a positive onus under the law. For Parliament to discharge its responsibilities requires that the government obey the law. To claim that there has not been injury to Parliament's ability to discharge its responsibility would be patently false.

Let me elaborate on that briefly by saying that the very fact that the government recommended the bill to Parliament when it brought it before Parliament that Parliament included in the statute a provision whereby an order made under the act would not come into force until 30 days after it was laid before Parliament underscores the importance in the minds of members of Parliament and of the government of the requirement to lay the order before Parliament. If Parliament had considered it a frivolous matter, we would not have required, and the government would not have recommended to Parliament in proposing the act, that the order could not come into effect until 30 days after it was laid before Parliament. This underscores the importance in the minds of Parliament and of the government of the day that it must be brought before Parliament.

It could also be argued by government that Parliament will still have the authority, if we choose at a later date, to put down a motion with 50 attached signatures and require that a debate be held on the consideration of the particular order, with the possibility of disallowance. It may very well be claimed the fact that may still be held at a later date means there will be no injury to the rights of Members of Parliament. I would say that is false. When the government has a positive onus put upon it by the law to act within a specified number of days,when the timetable of Parliament flows out of it, and Members of Parliament have a specified 20 days after the laying of the instrument before Parliament to put down a motion, and when within six days of that we must have a debate in the House of Commons, it is very clear that Parliament's ability to discharge its responsibilities is being obstructed at the present time.

No attempt by government to bring itself back into conformity with the law when it is breaking the law today rectifies the fact that today there is a grave impediment to Parliament's ability to discharge its responsibilities. In other words, it is false to suggest that if the government complies with the law at a later date, it makes everything all right, wipes the slate clean and there is no damage done to Parliament. Clearly Parliament has a responsibility to act and that ability is contingent upon the government's compliance with the law. If it obstructs Parliament today, the fact that it will remove the obstruction at a later date does not mean that there was not in fact at the time a bona fide breach of privilege.

I know it is a complex point, but I think it is a very important one for all Canadians, particularly for hon. members of the House. Parliament has a responsibility in protecting its rights and the rights of all Canadians to ensure that government sets an example of obedience to the law. When the government, with its own flagrant lawbreaking, takes an action which is clearly in breach of the rights and privileges of Members of Parliament, it sets a very sad example for other Canadians and it undermines respect for the rule of law in the country.

I thank Madam Speaker for the time to enable me to argue this complex case. If Your Honour finds that I have a prima facie case of privilege, I would be prepared to move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the government's failure to lay before Parliament an order made under Section 8 of the Safe Containers Convention Act, as required by Subsection (2), stand referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for study and report.

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I am not particularly familiar with the facts of this case.

Mr. Epp: That never stopped you before.

Mr. Smith: But assuming that they are as set out by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), I do not see where it would draw the factual situation which he pointed out within the very narrowly defined ambit of what constitutes privilege. I have searched Beauchesne's and I do not see anything in Beauchesne's which would draw it within that ambit. It would seem to me that the only authority the hon. member was able to cite, which he felt would draw it within the ambit of privilege, is found on page 138 of Erskine May, which refers to disobedience to the orders of either House, whether such orders are of general application, etc. Then a number of examples of those types of orders are given on page 139. They include things such as neglecting to make a return, neglecting or refusing to withdraw from the House, etc.

I submit that there is a fundamental difference between an order of the House and the enforcement of the law in general. If the hon. member is suggesting, as it seems to me, that somehow Madam Speaker is to become the arbitrator as to whether or not the government, like any other citizen, must conform to the law, it would place the Chair in an impossible position. We would be really usurping the legitimate function of the courts. We would not be able, because of the rules of Parliament, to hear evidence provided by witnesses according to the strict rules of evidence, and things such as that.

What we really have here is something which belongs in the courts. There may or may not be jurisdiction in the courts, but who is to say until it has been tested? Certainly that is the place for an issue of this nature to be resolved, not in the House of Commons, taking up time we would like to use to pass important legislation.

Madam Speaker: I will reserve on this question. At first blush it looks like a matter of compliance with the law rather than compliance with an order of the House. The hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) gave a very structured argumentation, but I must remind him that his quotation of Erskine May related to orders of the House, not to compliance with the law. In this respect the quotation was not entirely helpful. He quoted a precedent at which I would like to look, although I have other precedents of decisions taken in similar matters where quite clearly the Speaker refrained from determining what is a matter to be complied with according to the law and what is a matter for the Speaker to deal with. In case the precedent of the hon. member is relevant, I want to look at it before I make a decision.

MR. McDERMID—FAILURE TO DISTRIBUTE PRESS RELEASE

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I have given notice of a question of privilege, and I will be brief. It arises out of an incident which took place toward the end of last week but came to my attention early this morning. It pertains to material being distributed to Members of Parliament through the distribution service of the House of Commons.

In the past, material has been presented by various organizations that wish to make representations and to pass on certain information to Members of Parliament. As is required, they provide certain quantities of French and English versions of the information to the post office or the distribution centre. Over the past number of years releases have been distributed to Members of Parliament.

Last Friday a press release was distributed by the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association, as has been done many times for many years. We have all received such releases through the distribution service. Mr. Richard Mallette, who identified himself as a supervisor for the House of Commons post office, made the decision to censor the material and refused to distribute it to Members of Parliament. The particular press release concerned the firing of Mr. Neil Fraser. Because this has caused so much controversy in the last while, and because air traffic controllers have always been able to distribute press releases in the past, whether or not they criticize the government—most of them were critical of the government—I feel the supervisor in the House of Commons post office does not in fact have the right to go through this material and to make a decision on what material should or should not be distributed to Members of Parliament.

Madam Speaker: Order. I am somewhat uneasy about having the conduct of members of the staff of the House of Commons discussed in the House. I would rather think that this is a matter of management, which is under my jurisdiction. I would prefer the hon. member to come and see me with his complaint. I will investigate it to see whether he has been deprived of privileges which he should enjoy as they relate to services provided by the House of Commons. Obviously he knows it is not a question of privilege or a point of order. I suggest that this matter would be better settled if he came to see me, made his complaint, and then I investigated the matter.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

On the Order: Government Bills (Commons):

Second reading and reference to a Committee of the Whole of Bill C-94, An Act to amend and enact provisions related to the Petroleum Administration Act, the National Energy Board Act, the Foreign Investment Review Act, the Canada Business Corporations Act, the Petro-Canada Act, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979 and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act; to repeal the Energy Supplies Emergency Act; to amend an act to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act; to amend the Adjustment of Accounts Act; and to enact the Petroleum Incentives Program Act, the Canadian Ownership and Control Determination Act, the Energy Monitoring Act and the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act.—The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Point of Order—Mr. Andre

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order respecting Bill C-94 which I mentioned to the Chair last Thursday. The bill was given first reading last Friday and I have had the weekend to look at it.

● (1540)

In my view, this Energy Security Act, Bill C-94, is plainly and simply out of order. Standing Order 69 states:

No bill may be introduced either in blank or in an imperfect shape.

"Shape", according to the Oxford Concise Dictionary, is a synonym for "form". Therefore, a bill according to Standing Order 69 must not be in imperfect form. The question of a bill's form is extensively dealt with in our parliamentary authorities, such as Beauschene and Erskine May, and I will show that the energy security bill violates not just one but several requirements as to form. To be precise, six requirements.

The title of the energy security bill is as follows:

An act to amend and enact provisions related to the Petroleum Administration Act, the National Energy Board Act, the Foreign Investment Review Act, the Canada Business Corporations Act, the Petro-Canada Act, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979 and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act; to repeal the Energy Supplies Emergency Act; to amend an Act to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act; to amend the Adjustment of Accounts Act; and to enact the Petroleum Incentives Program Act, the Canadian Ownership and Control Determination Act, the Energy Monitoring Act and the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act.

That is the title of an omnibus bill with a capital "O" and a capital "B". Indeed, I would argue that it would be more accurately described as an "omnifarious" bill, meaning of all sorts, or perhaps an "omnific" bill, meaning all-creating. Certainly there has never before in the history of Parliament been included in one proposed bill such an incredible hodge-podge and mish-mash of such disparate items.

The Chair is well aware that the question of omnibus bills has been raised in this House on several occasions in the past. Various Speakers, including yourself, Madam Speaker, have made rulings on this question, but I will argue that Bill C-94 goes far beyond anything previously introduced in this House, far beyond anything on which Speakers have heretofore been requested to rule.

On the general question of omnibus bills, I would like to refer the Chair to the very excellent ruling made by your predecessor, the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, as reported in the House of Commons Journals for January 26, 1971, at page 284. Commenting on the fact that omnibus bills had been introduced in the House of Commons in the past, he went on to say:

However, where do we stop? Where is the point of no return? The honourable member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I believe the honourable member for Edmonton West, said that we might reach the point where we would have only one bill, a bill at the start of the session for the improvement of the quality of life in Canada which would include every single proposed piece of legislation for the session. That would be an omnibus bill with a capital "O" and a capital "B". But would it be acceptable legislation? There must be a point where we go beyond what is acceptable from a strictly parliamentary standpoint.

Mr. Lamoureux then went on to say that having reached second reading—and that was the time at which this point of order was raised to which he was referring—it was basically too late to take such drastic action suggested by the point of order, namely, that the bill be split up, and he said that in future such questions should be raised at first reading.

This is what I am doing today. Mr. Lamoureux then went on to say:

—it is much easier for the government to go back to the legislative mill to where bills are prepared, to the judicial luminaries of the Department of Justice for the consideration of Parliament.

If I may say so, I think that even those very learned gentlemen should take into account that this is an aspect of a matter that is of interest to all honourable members, of interest I am sure to the government, and certainly of interest to the Chair, namely that there must be a point where an omnibus bill becomes more than an omnibus bill and is not acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

Mr. Lamoureux, in order to emphasize this point a third time in his ruling, stated:

Having said this, I would have to rule—if I must rule—that the government has followed the practice that has been accepted in the past, rightly or wrongly, but that we may have reached the point where we are going too far and that omnibus bills seek to take in too much. All honourable members should be alerted to this difficulty of which the Chair is fully conscious.

My colleagues and I will show the Chair that this bill, in the words of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, "goes too far" and, therefore, it is unacceptable "from a procedural standpoint." Mr. Speaker Lamoureux suggested in his ruling that when another omnibus bill is proposed to the House it should be scrutinized at first reading, when all hon. members would be given an opportunity to express their views, and the Chair could express its view as to whether the bill goes too far or is acceptable from a procedural point of view. This, Madam Speaker, is what I am doing.

To establish the omnific and disparate nature of Bill C-94, one need go no further than to the press backgrounder supplied by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) last Friday after tabling the energy security bill here in the House. While this bill contains eight parts plus six schedules and would amend 11 existing acts and create five new acts, the press backgrounder supplied by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources divides the contents of this bill into seven separate stand-alone, independent subject matters. From the minister's statements these are, first:

A. Petroleum Incentives and Canadian Ownership and Control.

This part "A" is made up of the new petroleum incentives program act; the new Canadian Ownership and Control Determination Act; amendments to the Canada Business Corporations Act, as well as amendments to the Foreign Investment Review Act.

This group of two amendments to existing acts plus the creation of two brand new acts, although spread throughout the bill, do in fact stand alone as a single item. The principle involved here, in the words of the minister is:

To implement and support the new incentives system for the oil and gas industry envisaged in the National Energy Program.

There is nothing else in Bill C-94 dependent upon these provisions, nor do these provisions depend on any other cautions or parts of the energy security bill. Those two new acts and two new amendments are in fact a stand-alone part that in no way are related to the rest of the bill or depend on the rest of the bill. Nor does the rest of the bill depend upon these parts.

Part B of the bill is energy monitoring. In the words of the minister this involves:

The new energy monitoring act replaces the Petroleum Corporations Monitoring Act and will enable the federal government to obtain on a regular basis complete information on the activities and financial performance of enterprises that have more than $10 million in oil and gas annual revenue or $10 million in assets.

Here again, Madam Speaker, these provisions stand absolutely alone. The principle involved here is to require oil and gas companies to supply the government with certain information about their activities. This has nothing to do with Part A of the bill, and no other part of the act depends on this. This is a stand alone provision. Whether it is desirable or not is something which this House should have the right to decide. It is in no way connected to other parts of the bill.

Part C deals with energy administration. This portion, which the minister has called energy administration, includes the oil export charge; the transportsation fuel compensation recovery charge; the petroleum compensation charge; the special compensation charge; the Canadian ownership special charge; the Canadian ownership account; the role of Petro-Canada and new energy corporations.

I would argue that these provisions, grouped by the minister in something called energy administration, are themselves an omnibus, omnific or omnifarious collection of disparate items that perhaps ought not to be included under one heading or one bill.

For example, the oil export charge has to do with the fact that Canadian crude oil is priced by government rather than by market considerations. An oil export charge is provided to collect the difference between that which is charged by foreign purchasers of Canadian oil and that charged Canadian purchasers. The ownership special charge, on the other hand, is moneys collected from the consumers of gasoline and heating oil to be used by Petro-Canada for the purchase of Petrofina. As such, they have no relationship with each other. It has nothing whatsoever to do with export charges or Canadian oil pricing regimes. Also, Madam Speaker, the amendments to the Petro-Canada Act and the provision for the creation of new Crown corporations are quite separate and distinct from other parts or this part of the energy security bill.

Most certainly those eight items, Madam Speaker, which the minister has called energy administration, are totally distinct, separate and in no way connected to other parts of the act. They neither depend on other parts, nor are other parts dependent on them.

The other four separate parts of the bill as identified by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources are amendments to the National Energy Board Act to broaden tht board's jurisdiction with respect to power lines, allocation of oil and gas, and to redefine the board's jurisdiction in relation to oil and gas exports. Another part is amendments to the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, which again is separate, distinct and has nothing to do with the rest of the act. There are also amendments to the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act, enacted last year, and here again these amendments have nothing to do with the rest of the energy security bill.

Finally, there is the creation of the motor vehicle fuel consumption standards bill, which would empower the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to establish a voluntary fuel consumption program. Thus, Madam Speaker, even using the minister's groupings—and as I have indicated one of his groupings is in my view all too inclusive—there are seven distinct, separate and stand-alone subjects dealt with under this one bill.

Citation 703 of Beauchesne reads in part, and I quote:

> Although there is no specific set of rules or guidelines governing the content of a bill, there should be a theme of relevancy amongst the contents of a bill.

Now, that citation is attributable to a ruling by the Chair on May 6, 1971, as reported in Journals, page 532, in which the Chair said:

> It follows, of course, there should be a theme of relevancy between the contents of a bill. They must be relevant to the subject of the umbrella which is raised by the terminology of the long title. It is of course a matter of judgment in each case as to when a bill offends to the point that it should be ruled as unacceptable because it contains disparate matters in the same bill.

The Speaker went on to say that in the case of the bill under consideration he did not think there were disparate matters being considered. However, Madam Speaker, I think it is clear from the minister's own press release that in this case there certainly are disparate matters being considered, and there is no umbrella and no theme of relevancy. The Oxford Concise Dictionary defines "relevant" as "bearing upon or pertaining to". So if there is some theme of relevancy, then one part of the bill must bear upon another. Yet we know from the minister's own comments that there are at least seven parts to this bill, each of which has no bearing upon any of the others.

The government might argue, Madam Speaker, that this bill flows from the National Energy Program and that provides the necessary relevancy. To begin with, that would not strictly be true. While most of the items were mentioned in the National Energy Program, there are parts of this bill which do not flow from the National Energy Program. They are separate.

Secondly, and more importantly, if that argument is to be given any weight then one clearly would have to accept the principle that a single bill could be brought in covering all intended legislation for a session, rationalized on the basis that all its component parts flow from the throne speech which commenced the session. As Mr. Speaker Lamoureux pointed out, that obviously would be going too far.

Presumably the government will also argue that the component parts have to do with energy and thus that provides the theme of relevancy to the bill. Well, Madam Speaker, to begin with, all the component parts do not deal with energy. However, if that argument were put I would only say that to accept it would be to accept that it would be satisfactory to bring in a single bill covering income tax, excise tax, appropriations, borrowing authority, and for that matter unemployment insurance, since all of these deal with money. It that is the theme, then we could have that kind of grouping.

As I pointed out, Madam Speaker, the bill includes more than just energy items. As one example, the amendments to the Canada Business Corporations Act do not deal with energy companies exclusively. The bill has consequences for the entire capital markets of this country, and is not restricted in any way to energy.

When I first received a draft copy of this bill, Madam Speaker, I had the Library of Parliament undertake a study on the rationale for House of Commons procedures. They prepared the study and I would just like to read one short passage from it. It says:

> The passage of a bill has only one objective in procedural terms: the making of a new law or the amendment of a law already existing. This implicit rule will sometimes lead to the division of a bill in two or more bills—for the sake of precision—on the other hand it may also lead to the fusion of two or three connected bills if they refer to the same principle. This process can happen at committee stage upon recommendation from the House. This implicit rule will also forbid the existence of omnibus bills dealing with separate matters referring to different principles—by definition a law is a statement on the application of a principle—not a hodge-podge of intentions.

So to conclude my first point, Madam Speaker, based on the evidence supplied by the minister himself as to the components of the bill, based on Citation 703 of Beauchesne, plus the excellent ruling of your predecessor, the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux, I submit that the Chair has no choice but to send this bill back to the draftsman so that it might be broken up into more appropriate parts for proper consideration by Parliament.

The second point I would raise, Madam Speaker, is the difficulty, indeed the impossibility, of having a coherent and proper second reading debate and vote on this bill as presently structured. Citation 734 of Beauchesne states, and I quote:

> The second reading is the most important stage through which the bill is required to pass; for its whole principle is then at issue and is affirmed or denied by a vote of the House.

I think it goes without saying, Madam Speaker, that it is impossible to have a vote on the principle of a bill which, on evidence presented by the minister himself, contains at least seven different principles. And I would argue there are perhaps ten different principles involved in this bill. It is surely reasonable to anticipate, Madam Speaker, that some members of this House might be in favour of the petroleum incentives program to provide grants to companies primarily Canadian-owned for the capital costs involved in drilling exploratory wells but, on the other hand, to be opposed to a special tax which goes directly to the account of a Crown corporation; or to be in favour of the creation of new Crown corporations by the minister but opposed to the provision of subsidies to Syncrude and Suncor.

I could go on but I think it must be patently obvious to the Chair, indeed to everyone, that one cannot have a single vote on principle when there are so many different principles involved. That is especially true for this bill where there is every likelihood that many members of this House will be for and against various principles expressed by the parts of this bill.

It may be argued by the government, Madam Speaker, that a vote on second reading is not really a vote of approval for each and every one of the different principles at issue, but rather a vote to send the bill on for further study. This argument has been put in the past, but it is quite clear from various rulings made by the Chair that second reading is most definitely a vote in favour of or against the principle of the bill. For example, as reported in the April 2, 1974 Votes and Proceedings, page 90, in ruling on the admissibility of a report stage amendment by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), the Chair ruled the amendment out of order on the basis, and I quote:

> The amendment . . . would, in the opinion of the Chair, negative the principle of the bill as determined by this House on second reading.

• (1600)

On July 2, 1975, as reported in Votes and Proceedings, page 677, Mr. Speaker Jerome, ruling on a report stage amendment proposed by myself, ruled that that amendment was inadmissible and out of order, and stated:

> With the greatest respect to the hon. member who expressed his intentions clearly, it seems inescapable that the amendments fly directly in the face of the basic principle of the bill, and in order to confine it to its narrowest terms at report stage, they are just not procedurally acceptable to the Chair.

As a final example, as reported on June 29, 1976, in Votes and Proceedings at page 1384, it is stated:

> There is a rule that amendments after second reading cannot contravene the principle adopted by the House on second reading.

Thus, not only does the citation in Beauchesne state that second reading is a vote on the principle of the bill, but various rulings by the Chair have clearly established this fact as well as the examples I have pointed out. The fact that the principle of the bill is established and concurred in at second reading very seriously proscribes the types of amendments which might further be put to the House. Hence, we have the double dilemma of the impossibility of having a second reading vote on a bill which contains so many disparate principles, as well as the very serious difficulty in which the Chair would be placed in trying to ascertain what types of amendments are acceptable or not during further stages of a bill's consideration. Thus, my second point is that this bill contains much more than one principle, and it is therefore impossible to have a single vote on the principle of the bill, which is the requirement of second reading.

I would now like to deal with the problems the Chair faces by virtue of the fact that certain types of omnibus bills have been ruled acceptable in the past. In certainly recognize that in many instances omnibus bills are not only properly admissible, but, indeed, are also the best way to proceed since the grouping of certain amendments or certain items aids in providing a coherence to the debate and discussion, and attempting to handle the subject matter by a different set of separate bills would not only be wasteful of time but would also be confusing. An example of this type would be Bill C-40, passed by this House on July 9, 1980. Its title was "an act to amend the Pension Act, the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, the War Veterans' Allowances Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act". This was an omnibus bill in the sense that it would amend a number of acts under one bill; but there was clearly a fundamental, underlying, principle, namely, the increasing of pensions to veterans and others affected by the war.

Another type is the Canada Post Corporation Act, which set up a Crown corporation for the post office and amended 14 other statutes to make them consistent with the new statute dealing with the post office. It is clear that grouping these is an aid, not a hindrance, to proper parliamentary discussion and decision.

Another type, which I frankly think gets a little close to the edge, is Bill C-43, referred to as the freedom of information act, but in fact it is not entitled that. In fact, it is entitled "an act to enact the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, to amend the Federal Court Act and the Canada Evidence Act, and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof". This bill seeks to create two new acts as part of one bill. While I have some reservations about the way this bill was drafted, in fact the grouping of these two separate subjects under one bill is an aid to the discussion, and there is certainly a single underlying principle covering both of these, in spite of the draftsmen having proposed two acts and, I think, erroneously.

On several occasions in the past, points of order have been raised as to the appropriateness of omnibus bills, and the Chair has been called upon to make rulings. I would like to deal with what I believe to be the last three occasions on which the Chair has made such rulings and specifically addressed this question of what is an appropriate and inappropriate grouping of subjects in an omnibus bill.

Within the last two weeks, of course, the Chair was asked to consider Bill C-93, which combined the Borrowing Authority Act with amendments to the Excise Tax Act. The Chair ruled that she could find nothing wrong with grouping borrowing authority with a bill based on Ways and Means; thus, Bill C-93 was in order. I only want to emphasize to the Chair the narrowness of that ruling in that Your Honour did not discuss or comment on the general question of omnibus bills, but merely made the decision that a Borrowing Authority Act could be included with a bill based on a Ways and Means resolution. That was a decision which we argued against, but, nonetheless, a decision which has no bearing on the question under discussion now, which does not involve a borrowing authority being attached to Ways and Means, which was the simple question Your Honour had addressed in your ruling.

The last major or substantial argument and decision by the Chair on an omnibus bill is recorded in Hansard on May 11, 1977, dealing with amendments to the Criminal Code. At that time, Mr. Speaker Jerome ruled that since the point of order was raised at second reading, he could find no authority which would allow the Chair to divide the bill into its component parts at that stage and, second, that the use of omnibus amending bills was enshrined in our practices. The point to be emphasized is that Mr. Speaker Jerome was speaking of omnibus amending bills. Throughout that judgment, he spoke of omnibus amending bills.

There is clearly a distinction to be made between an omnibus bill which would amend a number of existing statutes and an omnibus bill which would create a number of new statutes. Existing statutes have been passed by previous parliaments. They have a principle which has been authorized and okayed. To amend these, even several of them at the same time, seems to me to be taking a much smaller step than creating a whole new series of acts since, by definition, a separate act has a separate principle. If the principles of two acts were the same, there would not be two acts. They would be one act.

I would also like to point out that in his ruling on May 11, 1977, Mr. Speaker Jerome was very troubled by the difficulties caused even with omnibus amending bills, let alone omnibus creating bills. Indeed, he was moved to say:

> This still leaves and it has in the past, every time this kind of argument has been put forward, some very deep concern about whether our practices in respect of bills do in fact provide a remedy for the very legitimate complaint of the hon. member that a bill of this kind gives the government, under our practices, the right to demand one decision on a number of quite different, although related subjects.

He went on to propose a potential or partial means for dealing with this dilemma in the case of that particular bill. However, since the Energy Security Act, Bill C-94, which we are considering, must be considered in Committee of the Whole, the remedy suggested by Mr. Speaker Jerome to deal with that dilemma does not apply in this instance and is not a remedy which is available to this House. One could safely conclude that Mr. Speaker Jerome would have been exceedingly troubled by the Energy Security Act.

I have already mentioned the only other ruling to which I would like to refer at this point, namely, the ruling on January 26, 1971, of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, who said:

> For hon. members to express their view in Committee of the Whole on a particular clause of the bill is not the same as being given an opportunity to express their views on a clause of the bill by way of a recorded vote.

Mr. Speaker Lamoureux was saying that it is an essential element of the reasonable conduct of this House, when dealing with legislation, that hon. members have the ability to call for a recorded vote of this House on each and every clause. Because of this grouping we have here with the ways and means resolution which requires the bill to go to Committee of the Whole, that essential feature which Mr. Speaker Lamoureux identified is not available to us. The remedy for that problem posed by Mr. Speaker Jerome is not available to us either. Therefore, we find that between those two Speakers, the concerns they have raised and flagged as being serious concerns are ones which cannot be addressed by any available procedures in this House except by splitting up this bill into reasonable parts. Thus, both Speakers have said that it is essential that hon. members of the House require a standing vote of the House and not just a vote in Committee of the Whole on every clause of the bill.

As Your Honour will recognize, this is impossible concerning Bill C-94. Such a requirement might not exist for an omnibus amending bill. If such a requirement exists for an omnibus amending bill, about which they were speaking, it most certainly and absolutely exists for an omnibus-creating bill which is creating brand new statutes. Surely, if we are to have any adherence to the hundreds of years of tradition in this place, there must be that ability for the House to express itself on each and every clause. It is quite clear from rulings of Your Honour's predecessors that the conditions placed upon the reasonableness of omnibus bills are conditions which are not met and cannot be met in the case of Bill C-94, the Energy Security Act. Thus, the Chair, in the words of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, should send this bill "back to the legislative mill, to where bills are prepared, to the judicial luminaries of the Department of Justice for the consideration of Parliament".

The fourth difficulty or reason why this bill should be sent back to the draftsman arises from the fact that in its present form it needs to be treated in Committee of the Whole.

A part of this bill, called by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources the energy administration part, deals with taxes and therefore was preceded by a Ways and Means resolution. That means that, according to our rules, it must be treated in Committee of the Whole. In Committee of the Whole, Madam Speaker, there is no ability to bring in officials or outside experts in a way that members can address questions directly to those officials or outside experts. There is no ability to go into the detailed clause-by-clause consideration that is necessary, desirable and prudent when considering new and complicated legislation—and this is certainly new and certainly complicated.

I think I can say without exaggeration that on every piece of legislation that I have followed carefully through committee there has been, as a result of the committee's work, several and in some cases numerous amendments brought forward and passed by the committee because of anomalies, inaccuracies or drafting errors brought to light by reason of this very useful committee consideration.

There is a paper that, Madam Speaker, I had the Library of Parliament prepare for me on the rationale for House of Commons procedure. I would like to quote from that paper:

> Bills that are retained in Committee of the Whole (budget bills) are very similar from one year to the next and can allow general discussions because there are fewer things to be changed. The Standing Committee is thus a committee specializing in a certain area and it can review a bill in an expert manner. The task of a committee is thus to permit the possibility of a detailed discussion.

The fact that we treat most bills by sending them to a standing committee is a very valuable part of the scrutiny that the House of Commons gives legislation. By and large it is budget bills that come through Committee of the Whole—amendments to income tax, to the excise tax. There are annual kinds of changes that come here and it is not necessary to go through the same kind of detailed discussion.

Furthermore, most of the time they are preceded by a six-day budget debate. They are also preceded by Ways and Means resolutions which also provide the House with an opportunity for examination. So the treatment of bills based on ways and means motions should not be confused, united and joined with bills that most properly are treated by a standing committee because of the two different intents and purposes of the types of procedures.

Moreover, Madam Speaker, there is no reason for us to have this uniting of Ways and Means motions with the rest of the bill, because the Ways and Means part stands alone and does not depend on the rest of the bill. The fact of the matter is that the non-Ways and Means portion of this bill are quite separate. It can go to standing committee. The Ways and Means portions are in no way related to the non-Ways and Means portion. There is absolutely no reason for them to be attached. There is no hindrance to the discussion and debate on the bill that would occur as a result of these being separated. So there is that fourth reason for ruling this legislation out of order, namely, that it is an inappropriate mixing of Ways and Means and non-Ways and Means.

The fifth reason I believe this bill should be ruled out of order has to do with the schedules. Citation 708 of Beauchesne states:

> At the end of many bills there is found a set of schedules which contain matters of detail dependent on the provisions of the bill. A schedule is part of the bill and is dependent on one or more of the preceding clauses, by means of which the provisions of the schedule are carried into effect.

Schedules I and II of the Energy Security Act are schedules of the regular, ordinary type in that they contain detailed amounts respecting the oil export tax and the transportation fuel recovery tax.

Schedules III, IV, V and VI, however, are separate, distinct acts. Their connection with the main body of the bill is essentially nil. For example, Schedule III is claimed to be dependent on Section 113 of the main body of the bill. Section 113 states:

> The Petroleum Incentives Program Act set out in Schedule III or any provision thereof shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation.

It would be a perversion in the extreme to suggest that Schedule III, a complete act, is simply a matter of detail dependent on the provisions of Section 113 in the main body of the bill.

Similarly, Schedules IV, V and VI are each separate and distinct, completely new acts and connected to the main body of the bill by Clauses 114, 115 and 116 respectively, each of which merely states that the schedule shall come into effect on a date to be set by proclamation. To suggest that these clauses, stating that the acts shall come into effect on a date set by proclamation, legitimize the connection of the four separate, brand-new acts to this bill is quite frankly a perversion of the proper form of a bill.

I would bring your attention, Madam Speaker, to another practice where we have this kind of perverse behaviour. It arises out of Citation 777 of Beauchesne, which states:

> Schedules to a bill are treated in the same manner as the clauses. They are considered, as a rule, after new clauses are disposed of. If a schedule is disagreed to, another cannot be offered to replace it, until the remaining schedules have been disposed of.

In other words, Madam Speaker, each schedule is treated in committee as if it were a single clause. To treat a whole new act as if it were a single clause is a total violation of our traditions and practices.

Erskine May at page 465 defines a bill as a draft statute. He says:

> A public bill is in the form of a draft statute, and contains the following parts—

He then talks about the various parts. Beauchesne at Citation 703(2) states:

> Some of the constituent parts of a bill are essential; some are optional. The title is an essential part; the preamble is not.

Since we know that amending bills do not have short titles, we know that a long title is an essential part of the bill. Indeed, Erskine May says that:

> When the term "title" is used without qualification it usually refers to the long title.

In other words, the requirement in Beauchesne that the bill must have a title is a requirement that there must be a long title to the bill.

If we look at the Energy Security Act, Schedules III, IV, V and VI, we see that each of these is a separate act. Presumably, as separate acts they could have been brought in under separate bills. That is the definition of a bill. A bill is the draft statute or act. So we could presumably, if we were passing an act that is properly constituted, bring in a bill and pass that act. If we did that with these schedules, each of these bills would be out of order, for the simple reason that there is no long title. There is no long title for the petroleum incentives program act. There is no long title to the energy monitoring act and no long title to the Canadian ownership and control determination act. If we allow this bill to stay as presently constituted, we will be creating an act unlike any other in the Statutes of Canada in that it would be an act without a long title.

I have looked through the Statutes of Canada and I can find no example of an act or statute that does not have a long title. I asked the Library of Parliament where this practice came from. They said that, as far as they knew, it was some 500 or 600 years ago. Acts have long titles. They are filed for reasonableness in alphabetical order of long titles.

In this bill we have four acts with no long titles. They will be created in a way that if the government attempted to do this by separate bills, they would be ruled out of order on the strength of citations in both Beauchesne and May. They are trying to do through an omnific kind of hodge-podge something that cannot be done if it is attempted in a regular way. I wish to quote Citation 1 of Beauchesne:

> The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law, have always been kept steadily in view by the Canadian Parliament; these are: To protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority; to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner; to enable every member to express his opinions within limits necessary to preserve decorum and prevent an unnecessary waste of time; to give abundant opportunity for the consideration of every measure, and to prevent any legislative action being taken upon sudden impulse.

This bill violates a number of those fundamental precepts of parliamentary law. It is impossible to have a reasonable transaction of public business in an orderly manner when one has this kind of omnibus bill to consider. It would be a travesty and a precedent of scary proportions to allow this type of bill to go forward with so many disparate and different items collected together for no other reason than to obfuscate and confuse. It will not be possible to have a reasonable and intelligent discussion and debate on the various parts when they are all collected.

The minister of energy will be talking about great things having to do with Canadianization. That will be the sum total of his contribution. The other side will be clouded over trying to identify the ramifications of the amendments to the Canada Business Corporations Act which extends beyond energy companies. What about the Petroleum Corporations Monitoring Act which flies in the face of the commitment of the government to cut red tape and cut the paper work burden? What about the implications of all those things? These will be all obfuscated as a result of trying to discuss that item and at the same time trying to discuss the petroleum incentives program and so on.

I want to make it clear to the House that I am not interested in breaking this bill up for the purpose of carrying on an interminable debate. Before Christmas I notified the minister through his parliamentary secretary that if they wished to separate what amounts to Part I, the petroleum incentives and Canadian ownership and control part, I would recommend to my caucus that this legislation be treated with some dispatch and carried through. The minister countered that if I would agree to treat it all with some dispatch, he would go along with it.

That was not something I was prepared to recommend to my caucus, nor would I guess that my caucus would accept it. I am certainly willing to negotiate with the minister the manner in which we might treat this bill in a more reasonable fashion. Some arrangements can be made. Parts of the bill are not controversial and, if properly formulated as separate pieces of legislation, could be dealt with quite quickly. There are other parts that need and deserve careful committee study in the standing committee with outside experts. People will be affected and influenced by this bill. They should have an opportunity to bring their concerns to the attention of this House.

There are the taxation parts which by our rules must be considered in Committee of the Whole. We would be prepared to consider them. I have no interest in delaying, but I do have an interest in protecting the integrity of the House. I fear that if this precedent is allowed to stand, we will have reached that day when we will have a single bill covering the entire legislative program. It will be rationalized on the basis that this is what was promised in the throne speech. The bill will be called "the betterment of Canada act", and who could argue against that?

We do not argue against energy security. We are 100 per cent in favour of it. We just do not think that title is an adequate description of everything that is contained in this bill.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I apologize to you for the fact that you are being kept in the chair so long this afternoon to deal with a whole series of points.

Listening to the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), I was reminded of my time as a practising lawyer. Lawyers used to argue that the weaker the case, the longer the argument. My impression this afternoon is that my friend must be defending a very weak case indeed. On the reverse theory, the better the case the shorter the argument, I will keep my remarks as brief as possible.

• (1630)

[Translation]

First, Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to my hon. colleague that Bill C-94 has a single theme and objective. The theme and objective are both indicated in the short title of the bill itself, the Energy Security Act, 1982. The bill is the main legislative component of the National Energy Program. As you know, Madam Speaker, the National Energy Program was a wide-ranging set of proposals which attempted to provide a specific and stable planning framework for the energy sector in Canada. The program had three objectives: first of all, it was to establish the basis for Canadians to seize control of their own energy future through security of supply and ultimate independence from the world oil market. Second, we wanted to offer all Canadians a real opportunity to participate in the energy industry in general and the petroleum industry in particular, and to share in the benefits of industry expansion.

Finally, we wanted to establish a petroleum pricing and revenue-sharing regime that recognizes the requirement of fairness to all Canadians. As far as Bill C-94 is concerned, each component of our bill on energy security is based on the objectives and philosophy contained in the National Energy Program. I am now going to deal with supply, demand, Canadian ownership in the industry and a reasonable pricing system. All of these aspects are part and parcel of the bill, and I maintain that we cannot deal intelligently and consistently with the problem of energy security unless we look at all of these aspects simultaneously. That is what this bill is trying to do. For instance, where oil supply is concerned, I may refer you, Madam Speaker, to the amendments to the Petroleum Administration Act, which will make it possible to establish adequate and sure prices for new supplies, so as to attract investors, and to the petroleum incentives program act, which will provide a direct incentive to investment in this sector. Furthermore, the tax measures contained in the Petroleum Administration Act implement the new system set forth in the National Energy Program and designed to provide adequate incentive to the industry, while avoiding unfair windfall gains. Finally, to continue with the measures contained in the bill that are aimed at improving the oil supply outlook, these include amendments to the Petro-Canada Act that will enable the corporation to act as a leader and catalyst in the implementation of these measures.

Thus, Madam Speaker, we have here a long list of the measures contained in this bill which have to do with oil supply.

I shall now deal with the measures concerned with oil demand. I am referring to the amendments to the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act, which is intended to encourage a reduction in oil consumption by assisting the substitution of more abundant fuels for oil. The same applies to the motor vehicle fuel consumption standards act, which is part of a general conservation and liquid fuels policy designed for Canadian needs and conditions. In addition, amendments to the National Energy Board Act will enable the Board to ensure that oil and gas are distributed fairly across Canada, while amendments to the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979, provide the means for a more effective response to the need for restrictions in emergency situations.

So we have now dealt with the matter of supply and demand. Another aspect of the National Energy Program is concerned with opportunities for Canadian ownership in the industry. Here, Madam Speaker, I am referring to the petroleum incentives program act, which I mentioned earlier, and the Canadian ownership and control determination act. I am also referring to amendments that will make it possible to establish new corporations acting as agents of Her Majesty. I am referring to the establishment of the Canadian Ownership Account and to amendments that will be made to the Canada Business Corporations Act and the energy monitoring act which will enable the Petroleum Monitoring Agency to play a key role in monitoring the financial position and ownership of the major oil companies. Two technical amendments will be made to the Foreign Investment Review Act which will not modify the interpretation of the act by the Foreign Investment Review Agency.

Finally, Madam Speaker, one of the main objectives of the National Energy Program was to establish a system in the energy sector that is fair to all Canadians. And that is the intent of amendments to the Petroleum Administration Act, for instance, in terms of the prices Canadian consumers will be paying for oil and gas and of sharing oil export charge revenues with the producing provinces. That is also the objective of amendments to the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act, which provide for financial assistance to consumers wishing to convert to fuels in more abundant supply than oil.

Thus, Madam speaker, the components of the proposed legislation are all interdependent aspects of an over-all energy strategy that will make Canada independent of the world oil market and make it possible for Canadians to benefit substantially from increasing revenue from and expansion of the oil and gas industry in Canada.

My colleague has referred to a number of precedents. Most of his arguments, Madam Speaker, were heard during the debate on Bill C-93, and I am not going to discuss the matter again. However, I should like to point out that, as my hon. colleague indicated, there are many precedents for the fact that one bill can include a number of subjects provided there is a single central theme. And as I indicated earlier, this bill has a single central theme, and all components of the bill are closely linked to it. My colleague referred to the ruling made by Mr. Speaker Lamoureux on January 26, 1971. I simply want to remind the House that on that occasion, the Speaker pointed out the long-standing practice of introducing omnibus bills in the House. I want to refer to another ruling made by the Acting Speaker Mr. Honey on May 4, 1971, as reported on pages 5585 and 5586 of Hansard, when the Acting Speaker specified that the issues dealt with in a bill must be relevant to the subject indicated in the long title. He also noted that each case must be analysed to determine whether a bill is unacceptable because it contains too many disparate elements. Finally, Madam Speaker, on February 16, 1982, you turned down a request concerning Bill C-93 stating that such provisions could be included in one bill on condition that the required notice be given.

My colleague tried to say that he was shocked by the schedules contained in the bill. I want to point out, Madam Speaker, that the bill was prepared in this way to facilitate its consideration by members of this House. It would have been just as easy to introduce a bill starting with Clause 1 and ending on the last page with Clause 356 and simply to line up one after the other the various elements contained in this bill which, as I have already said, are all interrelated. To make it easier for parliamentarians and the public to examine this bill, we have attempted to group subject matters so that, during the debate, we may truly focus our attention on clauses of the bill instead of simply having a succession of unrelated provisions.

There is no doubt that every provision contained in this bill and the schedules can be debated and amended in the House. As for us, we are willing to debate it without delay. My colleague also argued that the bill is such that some members might be willing to agree to certain provisions while objecting to others, and that they could therefore not be asked to vote on second reading on such a bill. I must remind him that this is the case with almost every bill introduced in the House. I think there must be few bills about which certain opposition members do not say: For my part, I would be willing to agree to such a clause, but I find other clauses inadequate. Such bills are still debated, and no one argues that they should be divided simply because the opposition is willing to accept some parts of them and opposes others.

In addition, my colleague stated that he would readily agree that the provisions of the bill which involve payments to companies be passed very quickly by the House. However, he noted that some provisions involving taxes should be debated at length, that his party is not sure to agree, and so on. This also is too easy, Madam Speaker. The implication would be that the House could easily provide for expenditures but when it came to collect funds for those expenditures, it would be another matter altogether. As I said, what is involved here is a total package. This bill includes proposals for significant expenditures and grants to corporations, but it also includes significant and most varied taxation features to finance those expenditures. I submit that my colleague has no valid point when he suggests that the bill should be divided to allow easy passage of the expenditures, but that all sorts of tactics will be resorted to in order to deny the government the means of paying for the proposed expenditures. Madam Speaker, I said my argument would be brief, because I feel it is valid and I see no need to review one by one the points made by my colleague at considerable length. I know that most of these points have already been covered during the week of February 16, when Bill C-93 was debated, and I see no need to delve unduly into the points made by my colleague.

I want to flatly reject the point made by my colleague that these provisions, the various chapters or parts of the bill are not connected. Quite the opposite, they are closely connected, closely interdependent. They have to do with that basic goal that we as a government have been putting forward since 1980, the goal of securing for Canadians energy security through a reasonable price structure, by acting on supply and demand and at the ownership level, in order that Canadians may have a share in that industry.

[English]

I will conclude with what might be the most telling argument. When I was a lawyer I learned that the best argument should be saved for the last.

Mr. Rose: And the loudest.

Mr. Blackburn: Is that why you are in politics?

Mr. Lalonde: My colleagues opposite are afraid. They should not worry; the arguments will come from themselves.

My colleague referred to a number of precedents and developed his argument in relation to them. I have said a few words about that, but I think the best argument, again in support of what we have been doing, has come not from my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre, but from his predecessor, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson), when he was energy critic. On January 27, 1981, as recorded at page 6596 of Hansard, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre said that the House of Commons should be given the opportunity to consider the National Energy Program in, and I quote:

> —one place, in one forum, not spread among five different forums as a result of the different pieces of legislation?

The hon. member for Etobicoke Centre thought this would result in a clearer understanding of the National Energy Program. I say amen to that, and I hope it will have the support of the opposition.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Madam Speaker, I do not want to add unduly to the length of deliberations on this particular point. There has been a repetition of some of the arguments in relation to Bill C-93. It is true that the Chair did find against us. We may have to accept the ruling, but we do not agree with it.

I come back to the charge that it is not right to mix Ways and Means motions with a number of other subjects. This time it is not just a case of borrowing authority with a few Ways and Means motions. The Ways and Means motions referred to in this bill number seven or eight, and then there are all the other matters referred to by my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), and by the minister—the Petroleum Administration Act, the National Energy Board Act, the Foreign Investment Review Act, the Canada Business Corporations Act, the Petro-Canada Act, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act. Then there is the repeal of the Energy Supplies Emergency Act and then a further act to amend an amended act. There is also new legislation. What is the forum, Committee of the Whole or a standing committee? That is one of the points.

What the minister has done here again is to adhere to the well-known principle which seems to guide this administration, that the end justifies the means. We say this has to do with a particular plan dealing with an aspect of energy, but to say that it is an Energy Security Act is grandiose boasting because it does not secure energy for this country at all. All it touches is the petroleum part, and it has nothing to do with other forms of energy.

There is no way we can take all these references—acts here, acts there, the Canada Business Corporations Act, the Foreign Investment Review Act and all those I have cited—and say that there is one principle to this bill. All one can say—and perhaps this is what the Chair will come to—is that this is a bill and that the principle of the bill is to amend certain acts in relation to petroleum and the taxation and production thereof. That is all. However, should amendments be put forward, there will come a very difficult question, and that is the question in relation to which Mr. Speaker Jerome got into trouble. With respect to the criminal law bill which eliminated the death penalty, an amendment to vary the form of death penalty was deemed to be contrary to the principle of the bill since the abolition of capital punishment was the principle of that bill. I continue to insist that was not so. There were pages and pages of amendments dealing with all other types of crime from A to Z, and the same problem faces the presiding officers in this case, whoever they may be.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that if he wishes to criticize decisions of former Speakers, that is not very relevant to the debate we are having now. I would very much appreciate it and it would be very helpful to the Chair—this is the reason the Chair has recognized several speakers—if the question itself were not debated but the point of order were discussed.

Mr. Lambert: Madam Speaker, with the greatest respect, I am discussing the point of order, and it is by showing the error in relation to a previous omnibus bill that one shows the error that is easily led into with this type of bill. It is wrong. After all, this House must be given an issue on which it can declare itself. Hon. members of this House might be strongly disposed to voting against certain features of this bill—let us assume taxation—yet they find that they are fully supportive of some of the many other features of the bill. How are they going to vote? That is something about which the Chair has to concern itself. How is the House going to proceed with this type of bill?

What we are talking about are the great omnibus bills that have been put forward. This is a highly complicated and very extensive bill, one of the most important to come before the House in years. Yet we seem to dismiss it because it concerns energy. The government wishes to tidy things up, and therefore the House will have to deal with all these matters in one bill.

One could as readily say that we could deal with the problems of agriculture—the price of beef, the price of pork, support prices, the foreign market—in one bill. In a sense, that is wrong. It is impossible to do so and that is what I wish to underline.

My colleague has covered the subject very carefully and the minister has presented the case for the government. I wish to emphasize the particular difficulty the House may have in coming to a resolution of particular points when the bill is referred to the committee that deals with energy. What about the rule that Ways and Means motions should go to Committee of the Whole?

Those are the points that present difficulty when we encounter them in an omnibus bill.

Mr. John Thomson (Calgary South): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order but I shall be as brief as I can. I think my colleagues, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), have covered the arguments very well. There are a few points that I want to reinforce, however, which are covered in Citation 703 of Beauchesne regarding the umbrella caused by the terminology in the long title of the bill. Citation 703 also deals with the point of relevancy among the contents and Citation 734 deals with the principle at stake. After that, Madam Speaker, I have a few general remarks to make.

The minister said that the single theme of this bill was energy security. That simply is not the case, Madam Speaker; it deals with a whole range of subjects that have nothing to do with energy security. He also said that the bill is the main legislative element of the National Energy Program. That is not the case either. There are 18 different parts in the bill, of which five sections and one part relate to the National Energy Program while 12 sections and part of one other section are not mentioned anywhere in the National Energy Program. The bill does not constitute the main legislative element of the National Energy Program nor does it deal with energy security.

Citation 703 of Beauchesne reads in part as follows:

> They must be relevant to and subject to the umbrella which is raised by the terminology of the long title of the bill.

The operative word is "umbrella", Madam Speaker. There is no umbrella in this bill. How can there be an umbrella when it deals with 15 different acts in a wide range of legislation? How can the Foreign Investment Review Act and the motor vehicle fuel consumption standards act be said to fall under the same umbrella, for example? Citation 703 also deals with the theme of relevancy amongst the contents of a bill. How are hydro transmission corridors relevant to the motor vehicle fuel consumption standards act?

The point that the minister was trying to make—and I do not think he succeeded—was that each part of the bill is interdependent on the others. That is simply not true. Most parts of the bill stand on their own. How can the Canada Business Corporations Act be relevant to the transportation fuel compensation recovery charge? How can the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979, relate to the Canadian ownership and control determination act? They are poles apart.

I will not go further in demonstrating my point under Citation 703, Madam Speaker. Citation 704 of Beauchesne deals with the question of the whole principle at stake. The hon. member for Calgary Centre dealt with that at some length. There are seven different principles at stake in this bill and the minister admitted that in his press release. Is energy security the whole principle that is at stake here? It is not at issue at all. Many other subjects are dealt with in the bill that have no bearing on energy security. I have made the point that they do not relate to the National Energy Program either.

Let me conclude with some general observations, Madam Speaker. I have spent a good part of my life in the oil and gas business. This is the most comprehensive and complex document that I have ever seen. It makes Mr. Benson's white paper look like child's play. It is a gross abuse of a member's ability to perform well for his constituents. I am not trying to argue a question of privilege, Madam Speaker, but I say to you in all sincerity that I do not think six members of this House can debate this bill intelligently. I cannot, and I have been in the industry for 20 years. I will have to get some help. I will need expert witnesses if I am to serve my constituents and I believe that every member of the House will need help in order to debate the bill intelligently. Apart from the politics of it, this legislation is highly controversial and will have far-reaching effects. Surely it is incumbent upon the government to allow time for proper debate of its contents in the interests of public disclosure.

I believe that to present a bill on such a complex subject in this fashion is a gross abuse of the government's power. I let my argument stand there, Madam Speaker.

• (1700)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, we have heard three interjections from the other side. I should like to emphasize a couple of points in response to some of the concerns expressed.

In response to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson), it is fair to say that the bill is complex, comprehensive and very complicated; there is no getting away from it. The bottom line, which really determines whether or not a bill is in order, is whether it deals with one subject. It does. It is all energy-related; there is no question about it. Basically it implements aspects of the national energy policy which were not implemented in Bill C-48. I think this is the only manner in which it can be done in a cohesive, rational and orderly fashion. Notwithstanding the fact that the bill is complicated, it contains a couple of entire acts for which there are precedents for it to be in order.

Going back to the early 1970s, the Unemployment Insurance Act was very comprehensive and was of similar magnitude. The government organization, 1970 bill contained within it entire acts.

Today we heard the suggestion that Mr. Speaker Jerome thought that there was something basically different in terms of an omnibus bill which amended an existing act as opposed to one which created one. With respect, I submit that I do not see any difference. I think the precedents would indicate quite clearly that on numerous previous occasions there have been bills of similar magnitude which have in themselves contained entire acts.

Because it is a tax bill, it is based upon a Ways and Means motion; there is no doubt about it. Some complaints were made today that because of this it will go to Committee of the Whole and falls under Standing Order 74(3), which reads:

> Any bill based on a supply or a Ways and Means motion, after second reading thereof, shall stand referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Citations 521 of Beauchesne reads:

> Bills related to Ways and Means resolutions are referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

This is not something new or something which has been suddenly sprung upon Parliament. If the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) had the opportunity of its going to a standing committee, he would probably find witnesses, if he searched long and hard enough, who might not like certain aspects of it. I am sure the government could find some witnesses who liked it. Then we would have some witnesses saying that it was great and others saying that it was not. It is not a question of discretion. It is based upon a Ways and Means motion and therefore it goes to Committee of the Whole; it is as simple as that. This does not mean that members cannot move amendments; of course they can. We can have as lengthy a discussion of those amendments in the Committee of the Whole as we would have if it were referred to a standing committee.

With the greatest respect, there is really no precedent for Madam Speaker to split the bill. Of course, there is the precedent which occurred on a motion during the flag debate, but I would suggest that to break such ground would cause considerable problems for the Chair in the future. I cannot conceive of any omnibus bill or complicated bill, which may deal with several principles, being brought before the House by the government when we would not have the opposition imploring Madam Speaker to split it.

There was the comment of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux when he asked, "Where do we stop?" In a sense that was really an obiter dictum, because he did not do anything about it. He was sort of musing out loud, "At what point do you go too far?" Notwithstanding the fact that the bill may contain several different aspects, all of which are part of the National Energy Program, it is not going too far or crossing the bounds to which he referred but never really defined. He was sort of hypothesizing a situation which did not develop, and I suggest that it has not developed here.

There may be some fine-tuning which has taken place since the announcement of the national energy policy, but no one can deny that there is a common thread, denominator or common link through all aspects contained in the bill—that this implements the national energy policy. Some people may say that it is complex; there is nothing new about that. Some people may say that it contains more than one principle; there is nothing new about that. Many bills have been complex and contained a number of principles. Members can move amendments as the bill goes through its various stages. It may create difficult decisions for hon. members when it comes to the final vote as to whether or not hon. members like it. It may contain some things they like and some things they do not like. This is nothing new. This happens. This is why we are elected. We are elected to make decisions.

With regard to the schedules, they can be amended; there is no doubt about that. I do not see why the fact that some schedules are incorporated, which in themselves are entire acts, somehow means that they are removed from the main body of the theme running throughout the entire bill. There is no question of this bill being rammed through or anything like this. I think the first draft was published last summer. As the hon. member pointed out, it is a complicated bill. There has been an appreciation of that fact on the part of the government, which accounts for one of the reasons the first draft was released some months ago—in order to give those interested members a considerable amount of time to review it. Of course, it implements a policy first announced back in the fall of 1980.

Basically we get back to the ruling which Madam Speaker made on February 16, as reported on page 15053 of Hansard. In dealing with the point of order raised at that time as to whether or not it was appropriate for the borrowing authority to be combined with Ways and Means motions relating to excise tax, Madam Speaker said:

As I indicated to the House on January 19, 1981, I have no quarrel with the practice of combining in the same bill taxation matters based on Ways and Means motions with the borrowing authority, provided the notice provision was respected.

I submit that the same principle applies here. We have a Ways and Means motion which is related to the bill. There are other matters in it, but there is a common denominator or thread throughout it. We are implementing one package, namely, aspects of the national energy policy which were not included in Bill C-48. I submit that the bill is perfectly in order.

Madam Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) for raising the point of order and other hon. members who have contributed to elucidating it. I will take the matter under advisement and rule on it later.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, February 25, 1982, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-89, to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Madam Speaker, once again it is a pleasure to speak on Bill C-89. The other night I managed to get in perhaps ten minutes, at which time I dealt with some of the remarks of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) who belaboured his concern and the concern of his party about the absence of property rights in the Constitution when dealing with the mortgage and housing portions of the bill. I had to say then, and I repeat now, that this kind of argument is being used around the country in some way or the other to indicate that this government is not concerned about property rights—

• (1710)

An hon. Member: It isn't.

Mr. McRae: —when the hon. member knew, as they all knew, that this was a matter strictly within the realm of the provinces.

Miss MacDonald: Why was it accepted?

Mr. McRae: Most of the provinces had Tory governments. They were very much concerned that we move into this area.

Mr. McDermid: NDP blackmail.

Mr. McRae: The fact that the rights were not included in the bill of rights in no way changes the relationship of property in terms of the provinces and the property rights of individuals.

Mr. Taylor: Why did you put it in in the first place, then?

Mr. McRae: The other point which the Tory party often mentions, and which the hon. member mentioned, is the whole question of the mortgage deductibility scheme.

Some hon. Members: Right on.

Mr. McRae: The Tory party did not stay around long enough to have that scheme enacted. But I think there are many reasons why that was an untimely bill. First, given the amount of freedom with indexing, and so on, which ministers of finance have, it meant that the minister of finance was tied almost totally to mortgage deductibility. It was the only thing he could add given the restrictions on money. It meant that $2 billion or $3 billion would be going out of the treasury for this purpose. It would be going to people who did not need it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Be careful.

Mr. McRae: It would be mostly welfare for people in very high income groups.

Mr. Taylor: Do you really believe that hogwash?

Mr. McRae: That same amount of money would not be available for people with a great need.

Mr. Domm: What about those losing homes?

Mr. Taylor: Do people lose their homes on purpose?

Mr. McRae: Another objection to that bill, and I think it is an objection which we should still take very seriously, that kind of over-all bill which was a reverse income tax type of bill in the sense that it provided more return to the wealthier people in our society than it did to the poor is that it tended to come at the wrong time in terms of the growth of the country.

Mr. Domm: Property ownership?

Mr. McRae: The rate of family formations, which was a very important aspect of life in the early 1970s, was the time when we were putting a lot of money into housing. We were putting it basically where there was the greatest need. But at this stage of the game, large portions of capital are not needed. There is not that kind of inducement at this stage of the game in this area, at least not as much as needed in other areas, such as energy.

In a sense, the minister of finance was moving money into an area where there was some need, but moving it away from an area where there was a great need. These basic needs will still have to be met.

Another point I find interesting when debating this bill with the opposition is the opposition's great concern about housing for Canadians. Put that together with the few months the Tories actually were in power and take a look at the Matthews report, which was a rather interesting document, a report put out by a task force chaired by a former national president of the Conservative Party. That document basically underlined why that government did not remain in power.

Mr. Howie: Because a report came out?

Mr. McRae: Basically this report said that we must get away from subsidies and support in general for non-profit housing, and all kinds of things like that.

Miss MacDonald: You would have people live in the cold?

Mr. McRae: Over the years these have been basic social requirements in this country. Over many years and under successive Liberal governments, as well as under the Diefenbaker government, we have arranged to make sure that these things were available to Canadians. I think that housing report was a very big step away from that kind of support that Canadians have learned to expect.

The same thing, I think, could be said about the move away from Petro-Canada. That was another move away from things that Canadians were beginning to expect in a more complex world.

Mr. Domm: They love it now.

Mr. McRae: On the other hand, I have not heard that many speeches from the New Democrats. But once again, we are caught in this in-between business. One side says we are doing too much and another side says we are not doing enough.

Mr. Taylor: Who said you are doing too much? Nobody ever said that.

Mr. McDermid: It is too much of the wrong thing.

Mr. McRae: It seems to me in this day and age one tries to get more, but at least we support what is here. I would like to see this mortgage assistance increase. I would certainly like to see that, but I want to get through what we have in this bill as soon as possible.

Some hon. Members: Sit down, then.

Mr. McRae: We have had six days of debate. We should get along with this legislation and get this thing going. I want to get this bill going because I have constituents here and I am sure others have constituents here who need some assistance at this point and for whom the bill will provide assistance.

Miss MacDonald: You said nobody needed assistance.

An hon. Member: He has changed his mind.

Mr. McRae: There are some very serious cases. I am sure if I recite two or three of them that all hon. members could duplicate them.

Mr. McDermid: You had better get your act together.

Mr. McRae: They need the assistance that is going to come from this bill.

Mr. Domm: They need mortgage interest assistance.

Mr. McRae: Let us take one example. What about a person who has a serious health problem?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Is he helping you?

Mr. McRae: This serious health problem arose very recently. This person has a mortgage with the Bank of Montreal. I specify the Bank of Montreal because that bank is the harshest of all the major chartered banks—

Miss MacDonald: Next to the government.

Mr. McRae: This bank concerns me the most. This bank, alone among all of the other major chartered banks, refuses to pass on to its managers information about the mortgage scheme. The Bank of Montreal has refused to do that. That is in sharp contrast to what the Royal Bank does. Not only does the Royal Bank pass on the information but it sets up possibilities for other things to happen. This bank advertises how people in an emergency can cut their interest rates back, and so on. It also suggests how to roll back the 20.5 per cent interest rates that were negotiated last summer. The Commerce has done the same sort of thing. But the Bank of Montreal refuses even to discuss the passing on of information to its managers. It refuses to discuss this whole business of mortgage assistance.

I can cite one case of a citizen who went to this bank, is caught with a 20.5 per cent mortgage, who has a serious health problem and cannot go to another bank because likely he would not be able to get a mortgage since he has financial difficulties. He is one of those persons holding on and waiting for this bill. He cannot last much longer. I think that is the fact with a lot of people. Therefore, I think this bill should be moved along.

I have been critical of high interest rates for at least two to two and a half years.

Miss MacDonald: You will get fired, just as Neil Fraser did.

Mr. McRae: I was very critical of high interest rates when the Conservative Party was in power. I was quite disturbed last week, and I have mentioned this earlier, when my name was being used as one who should vote to get this government out of power so we could put these people in power.

Mr. McDermid: You should be disturbed.

Mr. McRae: The Tory government was the government that had the largest spread that ever existed in real interest rates between Canada and the United States. Real interest rates are the prime rate minus the inflation rate.

An hon. Member: You like yours much better?

• (1720)

Mr. McRae: On October 26, 1979, I asked a question in the House with respect to a five-point spread in interest rates between the U.S. and Canada. That was the highest spread ever. The U.S. inflation rate was higher than ours, yet our interest rates were five points above theirs. That is the kind of government we put into power.

Mr. McDermid: What were the interest rates in those days?

Mr. McRae: Now, I make it quite plain that I want to see interest rates come down, which I think they will. At this stage of the game it is very pleasant for me to stand here and see that we have our prime rate at or slightly below the U.S. prime rate. I hope the government will continue to keep it at that level and that the Americans' will come down, and we will come down also. I would like it to move faster, but that certainly is one of the things we have to do.

I would like to make two suggestions to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the first one having to do with the banks themselves. In studying the Bank Act in the last ten years it seems to me that we would just get started but never finish because an election, end of a session or something like that occurred. However, in late 1978 or early 1979 the member for York-Simcoe at the time, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) now, suggested very strongly that it was time we took a look at our banking system and compared it with systems in other major industrialized nations such as the U.S., Japan, Switzerland and so on, to see whether our system was effective.

I thought at the time that made some sense, and I think it makes a great deal more sense right now because during the last six or 12 months I do not think our banking system has functioned well enough with respect to mortgages and those people caught in the mortgage vice which occurs when we have high interest rates. This is not to condemn the banks because I think some of them—and I mentioned the Royal and the Commerce—have functioned very well and have done their best. However, it seems to me that the whole system should be looked at. Let us see if there are not better and more effective ways that our banking system can work.

I have brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance my very strong suggestion that we form an all-party task force, possibly from the Senate as well, and give it a fair period of time to have a good look at other banking systems and see if there are ways in which Canadians can be better protected.

One of the things which has bothered me, and I think it has bothered most members, about our financial institutions—not just the banks, but all financial institutions—is the absence of long-term mortgages. The idea that a mortgage would only run for a year or two, or five years at the most, is most disturbing. It used to always be that when you bought a house, you took a mortgage at a fixed rate for whatever period was required to discharge the mortgage. That is not the case now, of course, but it is the case in the United States. So I think there are a lot of things we can look at, and I suggest very strongly again that a task force of this kind be put together.

This would not in any way duplicate the proposed reference to standing committee with respect to bank profits. That is an entirely separate item which I support strongly. The task force would be totally separate and would look at our banking system and our financial institutions, not in a critical way but rather comparing them with other financial institutions around the world, to see whether there is anything we could introduce which would serve Canadians better than they are presently served.

The final point I would like to make has to do with where I think we have to go with respect to housing and a whole series of things. Over the last several years I have come to the conclusion that the macroeconomic ideas that we put forward, the fiscal and monetary policies that we use, have become less and less effective as time goes on. I would think that even people like Milton Freidman would be very upset if he thought that the economies of the countries where monetarism was being tried were so inflexible that it takes a doubling of interest rates to have any effect on inflation at all. I would think the whole theory is based on the fact that marginal increases would have an effect and reduce inflation accordingly.

What has happened is that the system is so inelastic, for all kinds of reasons such as multinational corporations and trade unions, that these things are not working. Similarly, increases in demand and government spending, which is very popular in the NDP, lower taxes and so on, do not have the effect they used to have. We used to say that if you could increase the flow of money by so much, you would have a multiplier effect of so much. That is not so at this particular time. Therefore, I think we have to look at other ways of producing the effects we want to produce.

The problem that bothers me most is high interest rates, because I think they are having an opposite and inflationary effect to that which was intended. At the same time, particularly with respect to mortgages and small businesses, they are very indiscriminate in application. If you have a house with a long-term mortgage, you may not be affected. Someone else has a mortgage of, say, $400 a month and all of a sudden he has to pay $800 a month. So while it may be only a small inflation factor across the country, it is a very major factor for that particular home and family. There are a lot of families who cannot survive because their way of life is based on a certain income plus an inflation factor. It is that indiscriminate application of interest rates which creates the real problem.

If, for instance, the dollar were to drop and imports cost a little bit more, then instead of buying 12 oranges this week, buy six, or whatever it is. You can adjust because the change is only a marginal one. However, when the mortgage loan or very large business loan interest rate goes from 10 per cent to 20 per cent overnight, that family or business is put under severe strain, and in many cases it is a total disaster.

Mr. Taylor: Why do you support the bill, then?

Mr. McRae: The point of this legislation is to try to put some kind of floor under that family in crisis. And we are just talking about families in crises because governments today cannot afford to take hold of things as they could in the early 1970s when growth rates were higher.

• (1730)

I would like to conclude by just speaking a little bit about an approach that we must take. I was a principal of a medium-sized high school in northern Ontario up until 1972. Around 1970, all of a sudden, almost within a year, we went from a situation in which there was a great shortage of teachers to one in which there was a glut of teachers on the market. It happened very rapidly. I was aware that this would happen some time before because I was trying to keep my school down to a certain size, and the board wanted to build a great many extra rooms, so I had done some demographic work and was certain that this would happen. However, it did not appear to the school system that this would happen before it did happen. It happened suddenly. There were four or five years in education in Ontario and, I am sure, in other parts of the country, where there was much turmoil and strikes, annoyed teachers, students who were being shuffled around and parents and teachers who were fighting. There was much of an upset in education. I am not condemning anyone, but that could have been avoided if we had had sufficient foresight in Ontario and in other places to see that that particular growth pattern was no longer there, and that the pattern of upward mobility, with new schools opening, new jobs for principals, new vice-principals, new department heads and so on, would disappear. What came to my mind, having looked at it somewhat beforehand, was that we had to look at alternative approaches to slower growth. In this case, there was a sudden drop. However, even gradual, slower growth should have been considered.

I think that the particular case that I mentioned can be applied to a broader range of matters. We can look at the facts and say that it is not likely that we will resume, for any sustained period of time, growth rates such as we had in the early seventies, in the sixties and through the fifties, and that that 4 per cent, 5 per cent or 6 per cent growth rate cannot be indefinitely sustained.

There are all kinds of reasons for this. Considering only the notion of exponentiality, if there is a 5 per cent growth rate, that means a doubling every 14 years. It doubles and doubles and doubles. If resources like oil run out, all kinds of problems are created concerning the environment, and so on. There are kinds of reasons for this being likely. I think governments must accept the principle that gradually, over the years, there will be some lowering of the growth rates, not suddenly, as in the teaching profession in Ontario and in other parts of the country, but a gradual reduction. It seems to me that the first principle the government must consider is how we will provide alternate solutions which Canadians can choose and which will provide some hope and good feelings. I think we are speaking about quality of living. I think we are speaking about the same kind of things as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke about in 1975 and 1976 concerning some lifestyle changes. However, it seems to me that we must make some of those adjustments.

I am not satisfied when someone says that we must pull in our belts. I do not think that is what we are talking about. I think we are talking about looking at other approaches to this kind of situation. This is not the time to develop this thought because we are talking about a housing bill, except to say that in housing itself there are ways and means which can be found to provide people with good, decent housing, although not as lavish as some of the housing people have been forced to get into over the last several years. I am reminded of a type of house which was built in Thunder Bay during the war. Many very attractive homes were built and hundreds and thousands of people still live in them today as they have been kept up well. This is a basic, core floor type of housing. I mentioned this to the minister and he told me that he grew up in one of those houses. It was a very sensible approach to housing. There is no way we can build one of those houses today. No one is building them. Houses are being built which are much more expensive.

I think that at some particular point we must be able to consider a starter home, a home in which a new family can start, and when their circumstances improve they can move into something larger. I do not mean poor quality housing, but I mean a small, modest type of house. I think that is the kind of thing we must consider.

I say that the first principle is that we must anticipate that we will have a slower growth rate, and then we must provide alternatives to people in this country so that they will have hope and alternatives in quality living which do not demand a larger use of goods and services. The second point is that we must be very careful. The reason I belong to this party is that I believe very strongly that we have always held, as a small "l", liberal principle, not a nineteenth century Liberal principle, that if there are groups in our society which are, in some way or another, put under more strain than they can handle, then the state, the government, whether the provincial, the federal or the municipal government, must be able to provide some support. This is the essence of this bill. Much as I would like to see more in this bill, this is the essence of the bill. We should ensure that no one loses their homes because of quick, high interest rates and because they cannot make adjustments to survive. I emphasize the word "adjustment". That does not mean that people will not have a tougher time; I mean that they should not be asked to pay mortgages which rise from 20 per cent or 25 per cent of their total income to 40 per cent or 50 per cent of their total income, which this bill covers. I think that is a cardinal principle which we must keep.

It seems to me that those two principles are the ones we must consider for the future. We must consider the adjustment to a somewhat lower growth rate and provide incentives in the way of quality of life and a more stable type of environment. Second, we must ensure that no individuals, whether businessmen or families, are made to suffer unduly because of some of these changes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove that Bill C-89, to amend the National Housing Act and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the basic reason for the crisis in housing in Canada today is high interest rates. High interest rates have created widespread unemployment in the building trades. Carpenters, electricians, plumbers, artisans, masons, bricklayers and labourers are unemployed in near record numbers. In the Atlantic provinces, three quarters of our lumber mills are closed and millworkers, lumberjacks and woodworkers are unemployed in very large numbers. Many businesses which have existed for generations by selling building products are now closed; their employees, too, have joined the lengthening ranks of unemployed Canadians who live in the Atlantic provinces.

According to CMHC, as many as 40,000 Canadian families may lose their homes this year because of high interest rates. Generally, a $45,000-a-year income is needed for a person to be able to afford an average-priced home in Canada today. Serious shortages are developing in many centres. Housing starts in 1981 were barely one half the level needed to keep up with housing requirements. In terms of rental housing, this bill provides interest-free loans of $7,500 per unit to a maximum of 15,000 units. What the $7,500 a unit interest-free loan means is that rent for an $800 a month unit would be reduced to $700. It is a good measure, but its impact is restrained. The prospect of paying $1,000 a month on a mortgage is not as attractive to a couple who can rent an apartment, if they can find one, for $300 a month; yet, if that couple had purchased a home, their apartment would have been available to someone else.

The reason the mortgate interest and property tax deductibility plan of the Clark government was a good thing was that it encouraged home ownership. It would also have had the effect of stabilizing the rental market by increasing the supply to meet the demand and make rental units more competitive, thus lowering the price.

Another measure in the bill, the mortgage deferral scheme, is a good measure. It means to some people who receive the benefit that what you do not pay today you will pay tomorrow with interest and you will pay interest on the interest; but to others there is a good financial benefit. The bill's intent is, first, to provide the necessary legislative authority to put into effect the Canada mortgage renewal plan and, second, to enable the government to act more effectively in stimulating production of rental housing and make possible new kinds of assistance to young families who are buying their first home.

I do not think there could be any serious disagreement with this intent—indeed, it is a laudable one. My concern is with the magnitude and the impact of the measures proposed in the bill in relation to the enormous problems that it seeks to attack, and in this regard I find the measures inadequate.

The plan will offer interest deferral guarantees of up to $3,000 to borrowers who have some equities in their homes and are obliged to renew their mortgages at rates of interest which could require an excessive proportion of their income. For borrowers with the same problem but with no substantial equity, the government will provide assistance up to $3,000. The program will apply to mortgages renewed between September 1, 1981 and November 12, 1982. It will only be for home owners who are required to pay more than 30 per cent of their gross family income.

It is really a scheme for home owners to borrow against equity, to pare down their payments and pay off the amount at a later date. This grant and loan guarantee program will assist a total of 50,000 home owners out of nearly a million who renew their home mortgages during the time limit imposed by the government. In fact, 37,500 of the 50,000 assisted receive temporary help, but only 12,500 will receive real financial assistance.

On the subject of housing and the high cost of rents, I wish to refer to an ominous note sounded in some of the material tabled with the budget.

One of the tax expenditures referred to in the budgetary paper on this subject that was tabled by the minister with his budget, was the subject of imputed rent to ordinary Canadians who live in their homes and own their own homes. By imputing a charge for rent and making it subject to tax, the government would be able, according to the paper, to achieve a saving of a further $4.5 billion for its tax revenue. That was based on the fiscal year 1979. According to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), if the government chose to charge that imputed rent, that $4.5 billion would have resulted in a tax increase of an average of $458 per tax filer in Canada.

It is in the same tax paper that saw other tax expenditures terminated by the budget. It is significant that computations were made to see how much revenue could be gained by a tax on imputed rent. The minister decided not to do it this year, but when you consider the fact that other measures in the same paper did find their way into law, and considering also the goverment's tax record and its role as a tax master, Canadian home owners and families have good cause for concern that the trial balloon floated by the Minister of Finance in November of 1981 may very well turn out to be the reality in the coming budget.

The best plan to have seen the light of day in the House to assist home owners with high interest rates and to stimulate the building trades, is the Clark government's mortgage interest and tax deductibility plan. To Canadians facing high interest rates, $1,250 provided by that plan would have been a big help this year. Where is the government's better program to replace it? Where is the shelter assistance program for lower-income Canadians facing massive rent increases? Where is the energy tax shelter similar to the one proposed by the Clark government for Canadians faced with high heating fuel costs?

I would like to express thanks for the small blessings that are contained in the bill before us. The basic problem is probably outside the mandate of the minister and is rooted in the high interest policies of this government. The best answer was the Clark government's interest and property tax deductibility program; and the present government has not proposed a better alternative.

Another group of home owners who are on the short end of the stick when dealing with the government are those who insulated their homes with urea formaldehyde foam insulation on the advice and with financial backing of the federal government. Anyone who is currently trying to sell or renew a mortgage on a home with this insulation knows all about UFFI.

It took the government over a year after it banned UFFI to bring in a program to help clean up the very mess which it helped create. The government is taking its sweet time to begin processing applications, obviously wanting Canadians to shoulder the financial burden themselves, at a cost which can easily run into thousands of dollars per household.

If the government had acted more quickly, it would not be faced with so many angry Canadians, not to mention the problem of removing the foam. There is no question that the government has a responsibility to help remove UFFI, because it pushed for Canadians to use it.

It is clear that the most common sense approach would be for the government to own up to its responsibility, to recognize a mistake was indeed made, to stop dragging its feet, and to pay full compensation to home owners involved in this government-sponsored mess.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I consider this is a very critical bill that we have before us at this time, Bill C-89, dealing with the housing measures that were produced in the budget. I have been rather interested, listening today to various Liberal members get up and in a somewhat backhanded way try to defend the measures that have been put forward. Obviously, try as they will, they cannot bring much empathy to it. They cannot put much of their spirit into it, because they too know that the bill is only a very partial solution. In fact, it is no solution at all but a band-aid to a very serious and critical problem.

The minister, when he was speaking about this bill, purported to show that it responds to a crisis which has spread across the country, touching cities large and small, urban and rural areas, depressed and prosperous regions, a housing crisis which touches all parts of Canada.

When I refer to the housing crisis in Canada, Mr. Speaker, I have to stress that this is the best indicator of the economic malaise and the stagnation that so bedevils this country today.

We know, Sir, that it has been a long tradition in Canada that everyone has the right sometime to own their own home. That has been the view, the dream, the hope, the belief of our forefathers and foremothers down through generation after generation. But here, today, that tradition is being lost. It is being lost for tens of thousands of home owners who can no longer afford to pay to keep up that right, to have that right to own a home. It is also being lost for so many young Canadians who will never be able to afford a home in the first place.

How does this loss of the right to own one's own home affect the very fibre of our nation, of our society? I submit that the home is the traditional foundation of the family, of a strong family, and that that very convention is today under attack. Rents and mortgages are skyrocketing. Housing starts cannot keep pace with the demand. Homes that are being built become much too costly for even middle-income families. The one million poor, many of whom are single-parent families and elderly pensioners, are in a desperate position as inexpensive housing becomes non-existent. It is just impossible for them. As well, the national vacancy rate is edging toward the zero mark.

Faced with the cold, hard facts pointing to a housing crisis, the government has responded, as it did in this budget and as it is doing in this bill, with a quick-fix measure. No long-term solutions are proposed. They are not even attempted. The minister has ignored the gloomy housing outlook documented in memoranda given to him by people in his department some months ago. It shows the gloomy picture that lies ahead in the housing area. It is all there in those documents. He may remember one which he himself signed. It is all there in the words used in this document such as "little hope", "standards of living set back", "unmanageable burdens on housing budgets", "substantial regression in housing conditions". These are all in the documents provided to the minister.

We must come to terms with the severe shortage of housing in Canada today or embark on a regressive course from which we may never recover. That seems to be the way at the present time. The regressive course of which these documents speak seems to be the way we are going.

Looking over the history of housing in this country, we see that some 13 years ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) authorized a task force to examine housing and urban development in Canada. That task force was set up under the then minister responsible for housing. It was to report on ways in which Ottawa together with the provinces and the private sector could meet the housing needs of all Canadians.

That is the way the Prime Minister thought of going some 13 years ago. He was going to work with the provinces and the private sector to try to bring a viable, healthy housing industry to this country. At the present time we know he has dismissed any kind of co-operation with the provinces from here on in. However, those were the terms under which he wanted to operate some 13 years ago.

As a result of the work of that task force, conducted under the then Liberal minister, Mr. Hellyer, some recommendations were brought forward. It outlined some principles on which housing policy should be based in Canada. I will quote two of those principles because they very much bear repeating. They are:

> Housing and urban development are an urgent priority for the people of Canada.

If it was an urgent priority in 1968-69, how much more urgent is it today? I quote the second recommendation:

> Every Canadian should be entitled to clean, warm shelter as a matter of basic human right.

That is what was espoused by the Liberal government of that day. Today these same principles that I have just enunciated should be the cornerstone of the housing policy. We are faced with the most severe housing crisis since 1945. I do not think the minister would deny that, yet this government's token response shows that the basic principles enunciated in 1969 by that task force meant nothing to the Trudeau Liberals. Whatever they meant then, they mean nothing today.

What does Bill C-89 mean to the more than 900,000 home owners facing mortgage renewal this year? I submit it really will not mean very much. A mere 12,000 out of 900,000 who are facing mortgage renewals will receive direct assistance. Those "dire straits" home owners were told last fall by the minister responsible for housing to grit their teeth and hang on until the budget.

Many of them did that in great expectation. For a few weeks prior to the MacEachen budget, the minister held out hopes to the thousands of home owners faced with high interest and foreclosure. I know the minister to be a decent man. I believe he really hoped he would be able to offer people a great deal more than the budget allowed for. I am sure the minister expected more from the tight-fisted Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) than was finally produced. I am sure he shared in the disappointment of many Canadians from coast to coast. I only hope he has expressed that disappointment and his reaction to the Minister of Finance on every possible occasion so that some of the difficulties that lie ahead for Canadians may be somewhat modified.

The assistance plan contained in this legislation before us offers no long-term solution to the chronic housing shortages in Canada today. I, of course, do not oppose any measures, however small or however inadequate they might be, to provide relief to home owners. What I oppose, and I say this in all seriousness to the minister, is this government's token efforts to deal over-all with the housing crisis.

The minister will have received different reports and analyses of his bill. The Canadian Council on Social Development, an agency which does a great deal of analysis of social problems throughout Canada, branded the housing plan as a stop-gap measure. The budget's proposals to assist home owners do not begin to meet the needs of the more than 100,000 households documented by CMHC whose mortgage payments will exceed 30 per cent of income after renewing their mortgages. This situation has been outlined to the minister by his own officials. It is not something trumped up as some partisan issue.

The interest deferral plan we are being asked to consider simply puts home owners into greater debt. Mortgage interest rates are reduced by shifting the lower cost to the principal amount of the loan, thus increasing the over-all mortgage debt for a short-term reprieve. If interest rates do not go down, home owners may well face the loss of their equity. Second, home owners with little equity to use as collateral in deferring interest payments are eligible for one-time grants of $3,000. This will provide a little help, very little, to a small number of people.

What the bill really shows is that the government does not want to face up to the housing crisis. Whether the minister wants to or not, he cannot get the cabinet collectively to face up to the housing crisis. Nowhere is this more evident than in the bill before us today and the token assistance it provides. Further, the bill does not respond to the chronic shortage of rental units in Canada. The national vacancy rate went from 2.8 per cent in April, 1980 to 1.2 per cent in October of last year. Relief in the federal budget is virtually non-existent. The net effect of the budget may in fact be fewer housing starts, a point to which I want to return later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the House rose at six o'clock the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) had the floor.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, when I was reviewing this bill before the dinner hour, I stated that it did not respond in any way to the needs of the 100,000 families which Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has stated will be paying more than 30 per cent of their income for accommodation this year. It will affect only approximately 15,000 families.

Furthermore, the bill does not respond to the chronic shortage of rental units in Canada. Anyone who comes from a metropolitan area will know how those shortages are becoming increasingly acute. The national vacancy rate fell from 2.8 per cent in April, 1978, to 1.2 per cent in October of last year. Relief in the federal budget is virtually non-existent. The net effect of the budget may, in fact, further reduce housing starts. This is a point to which I will return later.

The dream of owning a home in Canada may sson become just that, a dream which can never be realized. High mortgage interest rates have had a grave impact on the affordability of homes in Canada. In the third quarter of 1981, the average price of a home in Canada was $77,900. Assuming a 10 per cent down payment, $1,000 in property tax and the rule of thumb that total payments for principle, interest and taxes should not exceed 30 per cent of gross income, when these facts are added up the result is that a family income of $44,500 is now needed in order to afford an average-priced home in Canada.

According to the Canadian Real Estate Association, a family income of $56,000 is needed in order to afford an average-priced home in Toronto. An income of $79,800 is needed in order to afford that same average home in Vancouver. Mortgage rates today are 18 per cent to 19 per cent compared with 10.25 per cent in 1978. The price of an average house now is $77,900 compared with $54,800 four years ago. The combined effect is an increase of about 130 per cent in the cost of servicing a mortgage or a new home. Furthermore, 1.2 million Canadian families all across this country have to renew their mortgages over the next two years. Those renewing mortgages, which they presently hold at 10 per cent, will, at the new rate of 18 per cent or 19 per cent, see their payments rise by 40 per cent. How many families will be able to afford 40 per cent increases each month? When the CMHC looked at these figures, it estimated that 40,000 Canadian families will lose their homes because of high interest rates. Where will these people go when vacancy rates are now registering zero?

Ben Gestrin, the chief economist at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, says that the five-year mortgage rate may soon be a thing of the past. If the five-year mortgage rate is dying, it will be replaced by mortgages of one year or less—six months, perhaps making life all that much more difficult and much tougher for home owners and those buying homes.

The Progressive Conservative Party's mortgage interest and property tax program would have helped provide some relief. It was a program we put forward knowing it would not resolve all the difficulties, but we knew it would be helpful to hundreds of thousands of Canadians across this country. For instance, for a person renewing a $40,000 mortgage at 18 per cent, the tax credits which would now have been in effect would have lowered the effective interest rate to 14.75 per cent for the 1981 tax year and to 13.5 per cent for the 1982 tax year. To anyone who has to take an 18 per cent or a 19 per cent mortgage at this time, how much better a 13.5 per cent mortgage rate now sounds!

During the 1980 election campaign, in February 1980, the Liberals promised to increase "affordability of ownership so that more Canadians can choose between renting and owning". What a hollow lot of words that is at this point, because there are very few Canadians, given the present high mortgage rates, who have that choice of renting or owning.

However, facts and figures aside—and I have been dealing with a number of facts and a number of figures—how can the government ignore the human cost of its failure to deal with the serious housing problem and the housing crisis which confront this nation? The homeless in metropolitan Toronto provide a very dramatic illustration of this. Hundreds of ex-psychiatric patients, battered wives, single parents, unemployed, welfare recipients and evicted families—the have-nots of our population—have joined the traditional down and out people and the drifters. They have joined them in not being able to find accommodation. They have joined the ranks of the homeless. They are the real victims of the so-called equity budget of the Minister of Finance.

According to a recent series on the homeless in the Toronto Star, as many as 3,000 people could be homeless in Toronto at this time when vacancy rates and housing starts have fallen to an all-time low, with nowhere to turn at night and no shelter they can call their own. Usually metro's hostels and their 1,100 beds are taxed and overbooked in January and February, but in October of last year they were already full before the real depth of winter occurred. They were already full, and people were looking for places to stay overnight. In December one of the churches in Toronto set up an emergency shelter and took in some 250 people. They had to sleep on the floor, but at least this provided a roof over their heads. That is how desperate things are, and that accounts for only half the 3,000 people who right now are homeless in the city of Toronto.

Toronto alderman Gordon Cressy is quoted as saying that if more affordable housing is not provided, more vandalism and more theft will result. To quote Mr. Cressy from a Toronto Star article of December 10, 1981:

> We're on a collision course. The survival instinct is very strong in people. If they are left on their own, they'll go out and get what they need.

Jay MacGillivary, a hostel worker at Nellie's Home for Woman, says that the housing crisis has already claimed lives. Think of the seriousness of that statement! Jay MacGillivary was quoted as saying that people are literally dying because there is not enough housing. She went on to cite the illustration of four women aged 28, 29 and 30 and already distressed by their personal problems, to the point that they committed suicide last fall because they had no place to go. These four women were alone, abandoned and homeless, and they ended up committing suicide. They had no place to go.

There are cases in my constituency in Kingston. I meet people when I go to my office on Saturdays. A woman came to see me. She had worked hard all her life, as had her husband, and through no fault of their own, both their jobs in the manufacturing sector were terminated. Both found themselves unaccountably on unemployment insurance for the first time in their lives, although each of them had worked for a number of years. They came to a point where they were faced with a great increase in the mortgage rates they had to pay. Their renewal had increased their mortgage rate tremendously. One of them came to me and said, "What are we going to do?" They have unemployment insurance on which to live. They have to face the fact that their mortgage payments will increase drastically, and they have no help. The alternative is that their home will be taken away from them. It was solutions to these kinds of problems people were looking for when they knew there would be assistance in the budget respecting housing needs. People hoped for assistance that would help them personally, but it did not come. It did not come to the hundreds of thousands who desperately need that kind of help.

Canada needs something in the vicinity of 220,000 new housing units each year. Back in 1980 only 159,000 housing units were begun. In 1981, last year, 178,000 units were built. Each time the number was well under the 220,000 units it is estimated we need every year. The latest forecast I have seen for this year has been by HUDAC. That was in February of 1982, and HUDAC predicted that only 155,000 units will be built in 1982. If we were to take the results of the last three years together, we would see that there is a shortfall in Canada of 168,000 new units. High interest rates have made construction of badly needed apartment buildings unprofitable for anyone to take on. In Ontario a landlord would have to charge in the order of $800 per month for a typical one-bedroom apartment just to break even on a new building financed at today's interest rates. How many people can we find who would pay $800 for a one-bedroom apartment? This is more than double the current rental rates in most cities; not surprisingly, apartment construction has ground to a halt. I want to elaborate on what I think is the plight of renters. Just what has the government offered to deal with the rental shortage? Instead of increasing funding for rental units, it is reducing it.

The MURB program was responsible for the construction of approximately 25,000 units in 1981. This program should be reinstated.

The assistance proposed to builders is expected to result in only 15,000 starts or 10,000 fewer than were built last year under the MURB program. Simply put, Mr. Speaker, the government's commitment to social housing has been reduced to 25,000 starts this year, from 30,000 last year. In every sector we see that the number of units, whether social housing units or MURBs, will be down this year.

The poor and the sick, who need shelter the most, find it toughest to get. In Toronto, renovations and demolitions have claimed many of the old boarding houses which used to be rented to people with little or a very subsidized income.

More than 8,000 people are on waiting lists for government subsidized public housing. The minister's own officials told him in the leaked CMHC document:

The prospect is not only for tight rental markets but for waiting lists and doubling up with family and friends. We will thus witness a substantial regression in housing conditions following 35 years of gradual improvements.

Suddenly we see a turnaround. Instead of more units being built to meet the demand, we are facing a regression in the housing sector.

The same CMHC document predicted that we will have a zero per cent vacancy rate by 1983. If the present trend continues, we should approach that by this summer. In the city of Kingston, the vacancy rate dropped from 3.2 per cent in April, 1981, to 0.6 per cent last October. This is a steep decline.

I want to reiterate that this government deliberately ignored the advice of its own officials. The CMHC report stated that the situation of renters will worsen as a result of the short-term rental market prospects. To quote the CMHC report again, referring to the rental situation it states, on page 21, that it is "the most fundamental housing problem today."

Clearly, the government does not see it as being fundamental. But to thousands of renters, Mr. Speaker, this government's inactions may result in homelessness.

The Canadian Council on Social Development shows the devastating impact the housing shortage is having on low income Canadians. In 1979, almost 56 per cent of renters, both families and individuals, had income before taxes of less than $14,000. Over half of this group had income less than $5,000.

Rent increases have averaged 8 per cent to 10 per cent in the last two years in most provinces. Recently, there is growing evidence that increases have exceeded these rates by as much as 20 per cent, even in provinces where rent regulation is in effect.

The Canadian Council on Social Development says the budget emphasizes mortgage renewal, even though the rental housing sector is of more serious concern.

To quote the CMHC document again, it reports as follows:

Close to half a million low income renters already pay over 30 per cent of their income for shelter.

These are people in the lowest income bracket in the country—and 500,000 of them pay over 30 per cent of income for shelter!

With predicted rent increases in Toronto of over 12 per cent, the council estimates a single parent in the labour force, with a $10,000 income, will be paying 40 per cent or more of his or her income for rent by the end of this year. What is going to happen to those people? I would classify these people as being in the most dire straits.

HUDAC predicted on February 16 this year that there will be large rent increases in months to come because a great number of rental projects were built in 1978 under the government's assisted rental program. Half of these had mortgages at 10.5 per cent to 11.75 per cent interest rates and five-year terms. People had something that they could manage, but all these mortgages will be coming up for renewal this year at rates of about 18 per cent or 19 per cent.

HUDAC estimates that monthly rents in these buildings would have to increase $200 to $250 per month per unit to cover the mortgage increases. Such forecasts are cold comfort for those on low and fixed incomes. The simply do not know where they will get the extra money each month to meet the increase in rent.

Foreclosures, and the doubling up of families predicted by the housing minister's own officials, may well provide fertile soil for family breakdown, crime, violence, alcoholism and suicide. With more than a million unemployed Canadians, social unrest and hardship are bound to grow.

The government has failed to see the link between a strong housing sector and a more vital and stable economy. HUDAC estimates that for every 1,000 housing starts, 2,210 jobs are generated for one full year in our economy. For every 1,000 lost housing starts, the national economy loses $83,500,000 in income. That is what a healthy, viable housing sector means to the economy—more jobs, more income.

Yet, we must recall the words of the finance minister who told his provincial counterparts in Halifax last November, that the unemployed would have to be sacrificed in the short term to bring down inflation over the longer term.

Sir, our criticism of Bill C-89 relates to the government's failure to bring in adequate relief measures commensurate with the severe housing crises and not just band-aids such as this bill provides.

I come back to the second principle that I mentioned earlier of the task force established by the government in 1969. That principle was that every Canadian should be entitled to clean, warm shelter, as a matter of basic human right.

Canada has made great strides since the Second World War in providing shelter for its citizens. But, Sir, this government has lost sight of the principle I just enunciated. The government's own housing officials say there will be "a substantial regression in housing conditions following 35 years of gradual improvement". It will unfortunately be true that the principle that every Canadian should be entitled to clean, warm, shelter as a matter of basic human right, is slowly but surely being put behind us.

Owning a home will perhaps become a reality for only the rich, leaving low and middle-income Canadians to fend for themselves in a period of high interest rates, near zero vacancy rates and spiralling inflation. Their government holds out little hope for assistance.

Mr. Speaker, despite all the warnings about deteriorating housing conditions in the country, the government fiddles while Rome burns. The right of Canadians everywhere to adequate housing fades away, as did Mr. Hellyer and the many former members of the Liberal cabinet who are no longer gracing government benches.

Mr. Carlo Rossi (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Montreal-Bourassa, a riding that includes the lovely town of Montreal-North, I am very pleased to take part in this debate. In spite of all attempts by the opposition to discredit Bill C-89, I believe that the bill now before the House is sensible and takes into account both the needs of the Canadian people and the government's responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, we have all heard the unfavourable comments made haphazardly by the members opposite. I wonder whether they realize what is involved. I wonder whether they realize the extent to which the proposed amendents will help to resolve some of the housing problems confronting the Canadian people today. I wonder whether they are at all concerned, and whether they realize that while they are wasting precious time making insinuating remarks and criticisms that are not at all to the point and have no justification, Canadians are waiting anxiously for us to take some kind of action. Many of us will have seen on national television Tuesday evening, the story of a family that is desperately holding on to its home until the Canada mortgage renewal plan becomes effective. Mr. Speaker, these Canadians do not want rhetoric, they want facts. With a profound sense of responsibility, the present government has taken the initiative. The minister responsible for housing has already made it clear to the House that after a number of meetings with lending institutions, he had received the assurance that they were ready to do their part in making the mortgage renewal program work so as to benefit the individuals and families that need it most. Mr. Speaker, we have clients who are waiting for this plan and we have people ready and willing to help put it into effect. We must get to work immediately, and to do so, we need constructive comments and not endless speeches that keep repeatig the same senseless clichés.

Mr. Speaker, another important point is the government's intention to take steps to help people who rent their homes. The budget provides $350 million for housing over the next two years, part of which is to finance the Canada rental supply plan. To refresh the memory of my hon. colleague, the rental supply plan is a stimulus for the construction of rental units, under which interest-free loans of up to $7,500 per unit are to be granted for the construction of 15,000 low-cost rental units in areas of the country where the rental market is tight or a substantial increase in the population can be expected. Of course, the loans will be in addition to assistance already provided under present non-profit and co-operative housing assistance programs. Members on both sides of the House have expressed their concern regarding the supply of rental accommodation across Canada.

Incidentally, I may point out that the province of Quebec has the highest proportion of renters in Canada. The percentage of renters in Quebec is 44 per cent, compared with 18 per cent in Newfoundland. Under the plan I just mentioned rental units will be built in Quebec, as in the other provinces, in areas where vacancy rates are low and where the population can be expected to increase. This means that the program will be fair and adapted to actual need, thus benefiting people with low incomes.

Mr. Speaker, another interesting point is worth discussing. Renters have lower incomes and fewer assets than home owners. According to 1977 figures, renters have an average income of $16,800, while home owners have an average income of $27,800. The average home owner has net assets of $71,650, compared with $8,900 for the average renter. The Canada rental supply plan fits in very well with the non-profit and co-operative housing assistance programs, and will provide 25,000 units in 1982. Quebec has put the non-profit and co-operative housing assistance programs to good use, adapting them to specific needs. In all, the various plans will be providing 40,000 units during the next few months, which will be available to people on low and moderate incomes. I have already indicated, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will be playing a key role in providing 15,000 additional units for Canadians under the Canada rental supply plan. The bill will, in fact, enable the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to provide more substantial loans for rental housing.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, by raising the loan value ratio and offering interest-free loans of up to $7,500 per unit, the government will be achieving two major objectives. It will be providing moderate-cost rental accommodation to the people who need it most and furthermore, it will be creating about 35,000 jobs in the construction industry and related sectors. In the present situation, this is an admirable initiative to which the members opposite cannot close their eyes, although they are asleep more often than not. Another aspect of the bill before the House concerns measures to assist home ownership. Canadians who want to own their own homes are having problems owing to high interest rates and especially because of the fact that mortgage funds are available only on a short-term basis. And when I say short-term, I mean as short as less than a year, in some cases. As a result, the individual who does become a home owner has high monthly payments to meet and has no way of knowing how these payments will fluctuate in the future.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-89 is certainly designed to make home ownership easier. Its provisions will enable Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to develop new mortgaging instruments. I must add that these new mortgaging instruments include mortgage loans with capital gains sharing, which will help many Canadians to deal with some of their present problems and will help future occupant home owners to obtain the required financing and to plan their future on the basis of the type of payments they will have to make. I would like to emphasize another point, Mr. Speaker, namely, that this bill does not represent a complete answer to the issue of providing affordable housing for all Canadians.

I have already mentioned the assisted rental program, mortgage renewal assistance and the home ownership assistance programs. However, when I refer to additional housing initiatives, I am thinking about improvements which should be made to the worst housing conditions in Canada, those of our native people and rural poor. Much progress has been made to improve housing conditions for these people, but a lot remains to be done. As other government members have pointed out, in the last few months, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has made a comprehensive review of the rural and native housing program. Major amendments and improvements to the program, as well as a consultation process are now under way. Moreover, other amendments to the National Housing Act are now being prepared to make significant improvements to federal programs, concerning both residential rehabilitation assistance and construction of new housing under the Rural and Native Housing Program. This legislation will provide improved living conditions for rural residents and native people throughout the country.

Another long-term priority is the housing allowance. As we all know, because of financial restraints the government will not be able to implement this project immediately, but it remains the subject of serious consideration. A housing allowance program can take many forms and various options are now being considered. One possible approach would be to use the same indications for the housing allowance program as for the Canadian mortgage renewal plan. In other words, the housing allowance could be offered to those who spend more than 30 per cent of their income for housing.

Many Canadians are in that situation. Older people with fixed income and single-parent families trying to eke out a living with an income at or below the poverty line are particularly affected. A housing allowance program would be exceedingly helpful in their quest for better housing or to reduce the excessive amounts they have to spend for their current accommodation. I am referring to this long-term endeavour to show clearly that not only is the government acting now but it can also foresee future housing requirements and plan accordingly within the framework of a sound housing policy. Bill C-89 which is now before the House is a very significant step in that process and I urge all hon. members to adopt it.

[English]

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to offer a few thoughts tonight on Bill C-89. I am extremely honoured that the minister has seen fit to sit in the House to listen to my words of wisdom and has given up some of his reading for a moment or two to listent to the concerns of my constituents, who are under a great deal of tension because of the policies of this government.

Bill C-89 is perhaps overblown as far as my constituents are concerned. This bill will be put forward as the greatest thing for housing since sliced bread. However, the people in British Columbia do not think the bill will be that valuable. The minister is going to tell us about how it will create 300,000 housing units and 70,000 jobs. I think that is a step in the right direction.

Mr. Deans: It is also a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Rose: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Deans: It is also a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Rose: You think it is a lot of nonsense. Well, that is your comment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Rose: I was going to say that I had enough trouble being heckled by the opposition without having someone in my own party "helping" me.

An hon. Member: Bring back Stanley.

Mr. Rose: I have a personal story to tell tonight. It is not about my hon. friend here because I do not think we should do that sort of thing in the House of Commons, but about a personal experience of mine.

In 1961, at the depths of the Diefenbaker recession, I purchased a "spec" home, just an ordinary, plain jane "spec" home for my family. It was a home for my wife and my three daughters in Coquitlam. It cost $13,000. The home was modest and frugal. It contained 1,500 square feet. It had three bedrooms and one bathroom and an unfinished basement. There was no carpeting and it was not even located on a road with a sidewalk or a pavement.

Mr. Deans: Things were bad in those days.

Mr. Rose: My mortgage was 6 per cent for 20 years. The payments were roughly $100 per month—perhaps $107 but I have forgotten because it was such a long time ago. Today, because of the pressures on the housing market, one can purchase that kind of house in a municipality just across the river at Langley for $70,000.

Mr. Deans: That is a rip-off.

Mr. Rose: The interest rate is 19 per cent and the payments are $1,000 a month, not $100. It takes an income of $40,000 a year to handle the purchase of a home at that price. The most interesting part of all is the fact that the house is worth $35,000 but the land upon which it sits is also worth $35,000.

Mr. Cosgrove: There is the story.

Mr. Rose: When one considers that a house is made up of labour, material, contracting and profit totalling $35,000 and that 50 per cent of the cost of that house is land and interest rates, that is something we should consider when we are dealing with a housing problem. So, one might ask, what is keeping people out of housing? It is not the cost of labour, or even the contractors' profits. It is two things only, land prices and interest rates. The land under the house I bought in 1961 was 10 per cent of the total cost. Today that same house costs $70,000, but the land under it is now 50 per cent of its cost. Perhaps the minister is going to say, "Well, that is all the fault of the municipalities".

• (2050)

Mr. Cosgrove: The provinces.

Mr. Rose: The provinces? Oh, well, I know, the Liberals are always out to bash the provinces these days, like the Tories are always out to bash the stand of the NDP because we are known, of course, as the western wing of the Liberal Party. I have heard that in about 16 Tory housing speeches to date, and I thought it would be nice to put on the record here that since last October the Tories voted with the Liberals 20 times.

Mr. Deans: Twenty times?

Mr. Rose: Twenty times they sided with the Liberals, their ideological friends.

An hon. Member: Good judgment.

Mr. Rose: And the NDP voted with the government 13 times.

Mr. Roberts: How many times did you vote with the Tories?

Mr. Rose: So who is the western wing of the Liberal Party?

An hon. Member: The Tories.

Mr. Rose: The hon. Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) is asking—

Mr. Deans: The only party with two right wings.

Mr. Rose: I wish the Minister of the Environment would respect the fact that I am a meek and timorous member and that I get sort of bothered by that kind of—

Mr. Roberts: You have a lot to be meek and timorous about.

Mr. Rose: And humble, too. I think it is terrific that you read so much about Winston Churchill. I did not even know you could read.

I think it is obvious from what I have had to say here, Mr. Speaker, that land prices under the control of the provinces, or the municipalities if you like, are almost as important as interest rates in terms of why we have moved from what I think was a reasonably sensible housing policy 20 years ago, to one which puts interest rates in the position of impeding the kind of housing development that we need. I think it is all part of the problem of the federal government trying to privatize housing, mortgage interest rates and development so that the government can ease its way out. The minister shakes his head. I did a musical dedication to him at Christmas with the little musical background that I have—

An hon. Member: Very little.

Mr. Rose: —and I think he has had a very difficult time as the minister responsible for housing. I think it serves him right, but I know he has suffered as well. Because of his record of producing housing I did not know whether to dedicate to him that old tune "A Shanty in Old Shanty Town" or, for the many people who are doubling up and sharing accommodation, that song from "My Fair Lady", "All I Want is a Room Somewhere".

His record has not been all that terrific. It has been great, though, for developers, the banks and mortgage companies. But it has been really rotten for consumers, for people who desperately need housing.

Mr. Cosgrove: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. member would entertain a question if time permits at the end of his comments?

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to answer any questions the minister cares to pose to me after I finish.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me talk to you a little about bank profits. We have had these record high interest rates and they were supposed to fight inflation. What happened, though, is that they have caused inflation. The minister knows that full well, but obviously he does not have the influence in cabinet to have that changed so we can have decent and affordable interest rates as we once had.

In the decade between 1970 and 1980 the average industrial wage in Canada rose 150 per cent to $317 per week. Direct taxes on individuals rose 300 per cent to a total of $41 billion. Now, contrast those figures with the record of the banks over the same period. Bank profits were up 210 per cent, their taxes were up only 14 per cent, and their tax rate was cut from 50 per cent to 15 per cent. So obviously there has been favouritism on the bank side of the equation. Some people say, well, what happened? We had a reasonably good housing policy in 1970. We might have even had a better one in 1960. I am sure the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) would agree that we probably had a better one in 1960 than we did in 1970, but we had a good one in 1970. What happened in the meantime? I will tell you what happened. In 1967 the Liberals freed the bank rate from the 6 per cent limit. It was said that if we could only eliminate that limit, we could have a lot more money for mortgages. So we eliminated it, and bank rates started rising for mortgages.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands talked about the housing report of the hon. member for—I have forgotten, but I think it was some Toronto Trinity riding—who had a big housing report on behalf of the Liberals. I can still remember that report; it had two big zeroes on the front of it and its author was the Hon. Paul Hellyer, a big "0", too. Later, and belatedly, he came over and joined the Conservative Party. I will tell you what he advised. He said, "Remove the ceiling on NHA mortgages". So we did. That is what happens when the Liberal government takes the advice of a Conservative. Then, around 1969 Mr. Hellyer advised that we introduce five-year roll-over mortgages. That would put more money into housing. Now, where is that man today? He is usually up there in the gallery, but they just sold out The Toronto Sun to MacLean-Hunter, so he is probably down in Bermuda clipping coupons. I do not know where he is today, but I do not think that advice helped us at all. I do not think that advice helped the housing industry one whit.

In 1973 the Liberals and the Conservatives encouraged high-priced housing by unrestricted interest rates. All that did was to allow the developers and lenders to put their money into high volume projects where they could make the most money. In 1974 the Liberals introduced the AHOP program which has become a disaster for many people. I am quite certain that when Barney Danson, who is no longer with us, introduced it, he did not intend that at all. His intention was that if you start out with a low mortgage, after a few years the breadwinners' incomes rose and they could perhaps pay the higher interest rates. But what happened? Because of this, government mortgage rates outstripped incomes and so people were stuck with them. They abandoned them right, left and centre, and in many cases, such as in Oshawa and Brantford, ended up selling them to speculators. As if that were not enough, in 1979 CMHC withdrew from direct lending. Gradually, over the years, there has been a withdrawal of CMHC from an active role in the housing market to becoming observers and guarantors for the mortgage companies. That is their role today, and it is not satisfactory because it does not solve the problems we face.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have a few more gimmicks. We have the mortgage interest deferral, and what does that mean? It means that after five years of deferred mortgage interest rates you end up owing the lending institution more money than you did five years previously. Then we have the other little thing imported from the United States, and I will speak about it a little more later; the variable rate mortgage. A no-limit mortgage is really wonderful. That sort of thing gives a great deal of stability to our country—that is nonsense.

We have a minister over there who is laughing about all of this while many people are crying because they are seriously concerned about losing their homes, their propects and their dreams. I do not think the minister should laugh about peoples' problems. I think he should cry in shame as well. I do not think he feels comfortable about it, though. I am not suggesting for one minute that the minister feels great about this. He probably feels very frustrated, like many people do.

What is the current situation? The current situation is that most people in this country think that an affordable home is a constitutional right. We have heard stories in this debate about property rights.

Mr. MacBain: Not from us.

Mr. Rose: We have heard that people should enjoy in the Constitution, federally, despite what the provinces might say, the right to own property. I can understand that, notwithstanding the fact that I think the enshrinement of property rights federally is an intrusion on provincial rights. I think that we can understand the peoples' desire for property rights. The fathers, mothers, grandfathers and grandmothers of people sitting right here in this room came to this land from Europe and Asia for a dream, for land they could own, land that was there, because they did not have it where they came from. Therefore, they could be owners of property. They could have their own homes and farms. I think perhaps the right to shelter, like the right to health, like the right to medicare and like the right to legal services, should have been enshrined in the Constitution as a constitutional right, because what is happening right now is that more and more people, not fewer and fewer, are becoming tenants on their own land. The number of tenants is rising and the number of owners is declining. Why is that? Is that because of the wicked socialists? No. It is because of the rapacious interest of the mortgage companies, banks and private developers.

I just heard the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands say, "That was not me, I did not do that."

Miss MacDonald: I did not say that. I said it was great up here for you to be an audience.

Mr. Rose: I think it is terrific that you are an audience, and I am really pleased that you are interested.

Miss MacDonald: Thank you.

Mr. Rose: In British Columbia, where I come from, the average family earns about $30,000 a year. The average house price over in the Vancouver area, anyway, although I believe it is cheaper up the valley in suburbia, where I come from, was about $140,000 last year.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Rose: If one spent 30 per cent of one's income, with a 16 per cent mortgage, and that is a low one, one could probably qualify for a $50,000 house, except that there is just one snag in that whole scenario—there is no $50,000 house. One needs an income of $80,000 to $90,000 to purchase a house. So what has happened to that dream of home purchasing? It has gone. It is out the window. No young person can aquire a home unless he has a mother or father who helps him.

Mr. Deans: The Liberals are destroying them.

Mr. Rose: Home ownership is being destroyed.

Mr. Deans: By whom?

Mr. Rose: The minister might say that the private housing market will fix it up. The private housing market cannot fix it up. It is impossible for it to do that. What will happen in future? We have a zero vacancy rate for rental units in Vancouver and that area. Yet, houses are sitting vacant, unsold, because of high interest rates. No one wants to buy them because they cannot afford the mortgages, because they do not earn enough to afford the mortgages. In my riding, 30 per cent of the forest workers and the millworkers are unemployed. Many shingle mills in the riding I represent have just closed down. The workers are out. They are out of work. We have a country with money, we have a country with skills and we have a country with raw materials, yet we are short of housing. Zero vacancy rate! That must say something about mismanagement somewhere. It does not matter whether one points a finger at the minister responsible for housing, whether one points a finger up in the air, or points the gun at the foot and shoots the foot off. There is something wrong in this country when that happens. This mismanagement is totally unacceptable. People will be forced to double their mortgage interest rates.

Let me tell hon. members a little story about a constituent of mine. Approximately six months ago, a very nice young woman with three pre-schoolers came to see me at my office. She told me her story. She will have to give up her family AHOP home because it will soon be five years since they bought their place, and the mortgage is due for renewal. She is extremely worried about this. Out of her husband's net income of approximately $1100 or $1200 a month, they pay $465 for house payments. If the interest rates remain around 20 per cent, this young couple will face a mortgage payment of more than $750. That is out of $1100 to $1200 a month. I do not know how your math works out, but it looks to me like approximately 60 per cent or 66 per cent of family income goes to mortgage payments. So what will they do? They will have to do one of three things. They will have to sell the house and find something cheaper, which will be very difficult, or they will have to go renting, which is almost impossible, or else she will have to go out to work if she can find a daycare centre for her children. That situation is replicated all over Canada. I know it is much more tense in high-cost areas such as Calgary and the lower mainland of British Columbia; but I think it is only one example of the tragedy which affects many people and the tensions which build up in the family, the sort of policy in human terms, the stress and the scrimping of many households, as a larger and larger hunk of the family income goes to pay off mortgage payments, just for shelter.

We must talk about these things in human terms, because it is happening to people. It happens to people whom I represent. Hon. members cannot be unfeeling about this. We should freeze mortgage rates. At any time the family income goes above 30 per cent for shelter, we should freeze mortgage rates.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: There is no question about that. We cannot let it go on. We had it before in the thirties. We had it in Saskatchewan. What did the CCF do? Banks were threatening takeovers of farms. The new government forbade that to happen, and the people of Saskatchewan have never forgotten T. C. Douglas for that.

A lame justification was offered by the minister when I approached him with this. He said, "Well, you would be helping home owners, but you would not be helping renters. Besides, after all, they are increasing their equity." I have forgotten exactly whether the minister said this to me or to the House. He further said, "It would be unfair because many renters would be caught in the same squeeze if it were not for rent controls." My view is that that is no excuse for doing nothing or for cutting rent controls, which is what he suggested in order to stimulate house purchases or more building of rental accommodation. He said AHOPers could claim an extra subsidy under certain circumstances and implied that the people were getting wealthy because their home values had doubled. Listen to the minister. Here is his advice. Great! "Sell your house and be rich and homeless." That is what he is saying.

Approximately 300,000 people are due for mortgage rollovers in the next few years, approximately three or four years. In Saskatchewan alone, there are 15,000 in distress, and it is what, two thirds the size of British Columbia? Probably. We are in a high-price area. However, most people do not talk about that. They are embarrassed to admit that they are scrimping on food, giving up on insurance, clothes and entertainment. Other people sell just to beat the foreclosure. They sell before the bailiff comes in. I do not understand why we have not had mass civil disobedience over this sort of thing, mortgage strikes, or rent strikes. I think a time will come when people will both refuse to pay and refuse to move out.

I will refer back to the 1960s. We had a 6 per cent legal ceiling. We cannot go back to 6 per cent, and everyone knows that. However, there certainly ought to be some place between 6 per cent and the inflation rate of 12 per cent, and perhaps 2 per cent or 3 per cent for a reasonable kind of mortgage interest rate. I think the minister agrees with me because I do not think he is a heartless man. He has been under a great deal of pressure. I think he has attempted to convince his colleagues that the matter is serious. The minister just cannot convince his colleagues to go along with him. At least, I hope he cannot. I think something has to give somewhere. It is not going to splash all over the household. What we now have is a shelter shambles. Nobody can quarrel with that. What do we need? In the Vancouver area we need about 2,000 co-op units next year. Last year it was over 1,000 we built. Next year, building will be down around 900. Why? Because federal funding has been withdrawn from the co-op units for senior citizens and others on low income. We need 14,000 total units per year on the lower mainland alone. The minister says that if we pass this bill there would be an additional 3,000 units. We would have 3,000 for all across Canada. We could use that many in our lower mainland without any difficulty at all.

I know that one has to make a start somewhere. But what has happened is that the government has cut back and is not going ahead.

An hon. Member: They are starting to go backwards.

Mr. Rose: They are starting to reverse. That is what concerns us. The hon. member must believe, as the Frenchman said when he kissed the girl on the hand, "You have to make a start somewhere." I do not think making a start is an answer to our problem. The question is, who is doing what to whom?

Miss MacDonald: You wouldn't say that if you had women in your caucus.

Mr. Rose: That is very interesting coming from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. We have a few women in our caucus. You have even fewer in yours.

Miss MacDonald: You cannot even count.

An hon. Member: Try percentages.

Mr. Rose: A recent report of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation said that the housing starts for British Columbia were going to be down 8,000 units in 1982. That is an extremely serious matter for the people in an area where the housing starts are already too low.

What is that going to do for rents? I do not know if the minister really thinks that rents should go up in order to entice more people to build more rental accommodation.

Mr. Deans: Sure he does.

Mr. Rose: Unless rents somehow keep pace with the income increases of the average person, I do not think rent hikes will be the solution. We know that incomes have fallen behind the inflation rate now for five years in a row. The abolition of rent control is going to be particularly harmful to Canadians.

The minister says in this bill, essentially—it is unstated, it is said sotto voce, it is subliminal, it is a kind of implicit assumption—that if we would only allow the private sector to look after things, everyting would be fine, that if the government would only get out of the housing business directly and maybe go into guaranteeing things and propping up things here and there, things would work out and we would do pretty well. I am not so sure that that is going to be the case.

What we need in this country is a mix of housing. We do not need just public housing, we do not need just private housing, because no matter how efficient the private sector is, and it is efficient, we have one of the best housebuilding industries in the world, more than that is needed.

I would like the government to take some of that 97-cent petroleum incentive program dollars it intends to give to the oil companies for puching holes in the Beaufort Sea, and give it to our housing industry and see how they would do it, with conservation measures and solar measures and heat pumps and all that kind of thing. That would create far more jobs. We need to review the kind of policies this government has been following.

Anyway, the government cannot just sneak out and leave the private sector to do it all alone. The privte sector cannot do it. The reason it cannot do it basically is because of interest rates. Other people have highligted that. It is not a sort of new discovery by me and my party as far as interest rates are concerned.

I talked today to the spokesperson from the real estate board of the Lower Fraser Valley. He said to me, "We see the light at the end of the tunnel; we have some optimistic kinds of things happening now, especially in low-cost housing, low-cost private housing, but interest rates are the biggest impediment to progress."

As long as blind adherence to high interest rates prevails, I do not think anybody, the private or the public housing sector, is going to be able to solve housing problems. But, remember, the Tories and the Liberals do not disagree on high interest rates all that much.

On June 5 or June 6 of 1981, on a television program on CTV, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) said, and I quote in part: "Yes, I would continue to back Mr. Bouey." This is our former finance minister from the Tory party. He said: "Yes, I would continue to back Mr. Bouey, he is doing his best on the monetary side, the interest rate and the money supply." And then Michael Wilson, Etobicoke-Centre, has no quarrel at all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would call it to the attention of the hon. member that the practice is not to refer to hon. members by name, but rather by the constituencies they represent.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for referring to Michael Wilson. I should have said, that the hon. member for Etobicoke-Centre (Mr. Wilson), who is the critic on financial matters for the Conservative party, speaking before the Canadian Club, said that he agreed with the high interest rate of the government. He was telling us that the Conservatives would do nothing differently.

Mr. Taylor: That is a misquote.

Mr. Rose: A misquote? You are missing a lot. They are exactly the same. They are identical.

Mr. Taylor: It is just the opposite.

Mr. Rose: Just the opposite? They are both high-interest-rate parties. The Conservative Party is the western wing of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Taylor: How can you say that?

Mr. Rose: I guess you have forgotten the numbers. I say the Tories have been voting with the Liberals 20 times and we have been voting otherwise.

An hon. Member: They are the supporters of separatism in Quebec.

Mr. Rose: What the CMHC has told us, essentially, Mr. Speaker, is that we can predict continued high interest rates, a continuing decline in housing starts. We already have a problem, and the minister's own department says that if we carry on the way we are going, we will have an even worse problem. Those are the facts. Is that irrelevant?

I was speaking a little earlier about the area I represent, a suburban riding which constantly needs a lot of housing. And the housing means growth, it means economic development. Our party is not against economic development.

Mr. Taylor: Nationalization.

Mr. Rose: That is not the answer to everything. If nationalization made a social utopia of any country, every one of the countries would have been doing it by now.

Mr. Taylor: It never will.

Mr. Rose: You do not have all the answers, either.

Mr. Taylor: We do not say we have them all, but we have got some of them. Nationalization is not the answer.

Mr. Rose: The hon. member said that. He has a few ideas, that is right. I represent a suburan riding, and when the housing starts go down in a suburban riding, and they are, the growth is down, the lumber sales are down. I have already said that about 30 per cent of the people whom I represent who work in the mills are out of employment. The retail building sales are off. The subtrades—the electricians, the plumbers and such types of contractors—are not fully employed. In my riding we expected a 5 per cent growth in population per year. We have had a housing glut. We have not been able to sell the lot we had. We are now moving into lower-cost housing, as I described in my opening statement. A $70,000 house in British Columbia is a low-cost house. It is a 1,000 square-foot house with an unfinished basement, a plain Jane. The contractors are now cutting their price. Prices have dropped 30 per cent and the builders are building on smaller lots and they are taking lower profits. But the average price is still $90,000 in my area. If you have an $80,000 mortgage on it, that is $1,224 a month. If you multiply that by three, and that is about $40,000, you have to have that in order for it to be 30 per cent of your income. So it is a Catch 22. It is a bad state of affairs for most people. It is. Read that to your children some day. The builders will need all the help they can get. They need mortgages through CMHC. In my area they are now moving into building houses, not mansions as they were doing for the previous ten years because of the policies of this government.

Why do we have high interest rates? That is probably the greatest single impediment to cheaper housing. I will give a few ideas about why I think we have high interest rates. We have inhererited a lot of the American policy in terms of interest rates. We cannot ignore that. We cannot limit interest rates all by ourselves. We can have a made-in-Canada interest policy, but it will certainly reflect what is going on in the United States. We have put all our eggs in the big basket of megaprojects as the hopeful economic solution. The other day we heard that the Alsands project is in trouble. That is a serious matter. No one can say it is not. Do members know how much Alberta intends to put into Alsands? Between $3 billion and $5 billion. How much is the Government of Canada going to put in? Two billion dollars.

Four billion dollars is being spent through the petroleum incentives program to poke holes in the Beaufort Sea. Those are 93 per cent public dollars. We are prepared to make a $6 billion subsidy to sell four Candu reactors to Mexico. We are going to subsidize B.C. North-East coal transportation at the same time as we are cutting the Crow subsidy on grain from the prairies. God knows how much we will spend on the prebuild of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline through Alberta.

If we are going to put that kind of money into megaprojects, it is obvious there will not be money left for the housing assistance plan of the minister. If you plunk all those billions of dollars into megaprojects, you must cut back on housing projects, post-secondary education, medicare and hospitalization. This will be necessary because there is not that much money. That is why our interest rates go up and our dollar declines. The high rollers opposite are suffering from megamania. That is why we do not have enough money.

What is the government's solution? Cut back on social housing, protect the banks from excess profits, and support mortgage deferrals as it grasps the straw available to the minister of housing. Talking about mortgages in 1980, Peter Carter of the Royal Bank said:

> As a responsible banker, working in a consumer-oriented society, I just cannot agree with a plan that sees the borrower ending up owing more money than he borrowed in the first place.

Well, they are in it in spades. The banks cannot see it, but they are in it. Lately we have been talking about six-month mortgages. Soon we will be talking about variable rates with no restrictions. At least in the United States there are some restrictions; a 1 per cent rise every six months. The government policy of high interest rates did not bring down inflation. It added to it. It is a wrong-headed, dumb policy, and members opposite are following it blindly. It will not help anyone.

What are we asking for? I will conclude with this, and possibly there will be time for the minister's question. We want a six-month freeze. We cannot carry on in this way. We want to bring down interest rates with a made-in-Canada interest rate policy just a little higher than the inflation rate. This need not be for the whole portfolio. The banks may still want to lend money for shopping centres or something similar at an interest rate of 22 per cent. However, it should not be for housing. It is too important. We want CMHC back into direct lending. It helped my father, it helped me and it would help a lot of other people to gain shelter. If I were not able to help my children, they would not be able to acquire any kind of shelter. They would always be victims of rapacious land owners.

We want a lid on bank mortgages and a capital gains tax on speculative housing. It is not hard to be a speculator. Most of us need only look in the mirror. Whether we like it or not, our housing assets grow up with the times.

I do not think anyone has the entire solution. We hear about do-it-yourself subdivisions, changing our zoning and having smaller lots. There are all kinds of ideas. The point is there is a serious housing problem. It is not a simple matter. But it cannot be something that defies solution in a country with all kinds of land, materials, resources and a labour force which is at least 10 per cent unemployed.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member indicated that if there was time he would entertain a question. My question arises out of news reports of an opinion of his colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) who has a seat quite close to him in the House. That hon. member indicated that if elected premier of an NDP government in the province of Ontario, he would move to augment the federal non-profit program with a commitment of $100 million to the non-profit co-op program. Can the hon. member explain why the NDP governments of the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan have not adopted a similar policy?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mission-Port Moody has about one minute remaining.

Mr. Rose: I do not know the figures. I did not see the news release. All I know is the excess profits of the banks in 1981 over 1980 amounted to something like $700 million. The new leader of our party in Ontario is not more than 31. I know he is over 21. If the minister would like to ask why this mature individual put forward this program, the best place to direct that kind of question would be to the new leader of our party in Ontario.

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to become involved in this debate on Bill C-89. I would like to point out that I really cannot understand the rationale of members opposite tying up the valuable time of this legislative body with such a ridiculous debate as we have heard over the past few days. I say this knowing full well that by now most Canadians fully understand the many options available under the budget put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). As a matter of fact, we spent about three weeks debating and discussing some of these endeavours in this very House, with a proposal by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove) for the amendments to the National Housing Act and other matters.

It is obvious that members opposite still do not have a real perception of what is being done and what will be done. At the same time, while they are not fully cognizant of the many fine features contained in the housing and rental measures of the budget, they are telling us to spend more and more money. This is particularly true of the party of which the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) is a member.

In these times, that is surely the advice of fools and followers. That is the basic difference between this government and the other parties and that is surely why we are the government and they are not.

Our policies are based on sound reasoning and judgment. Our policies are for the times. With this in mind, let me just remind the House and refresh the memories of my colleagues that the measures contained in the budget were specifically designed to help those Canadians who need help the most. What kind of nonsense would it be if we were to write a blank cheque? No, these measures were responsive to the needs of Canadians at this particular time.

• (2130)

Mr. Taylor: That is the kind you got from Mexico and Russia.

Mr. MacBain: We had to use Standing Order 75c to get this bill to conclusion. Yet, you see the response, Mr. Speaker. They do not want to let me speak. There is no one in the House to vote. They will try to get clear of voting.

Mr. Taylor: You introduced the closure, not us.

Mr. Deans: Don't threaten or we will have a vote. I promise.

Mr. MacBain: Specifically, I would like hon. members to recall the Canadian mortgage renewal plan which was proposed to help borrowers who are renewing mortgages at admittedly high interest rates.

Basically, there are two major components to the program. The first component involves the government's guarantee of interest deferral by lenders to home owners experiencing a cash flow problem upon renewal of their mortgages. As defined under the program, these are home owners who have to spend more than 30 per cent of gross household income on principle, interest and taxes, but who otherwise have substantial equity in their homes and therefore cannot be described as hardship cases. The interest deferral component of the plan is therefore intended to ease the cash flow problems of those home owners by allowing them to borrow against the equity in their homes.

However, the CMRP recognizes that interest deferral is not an appropriate solution where there is not sufficient equity in the property against which to borrow. Therefore, the program provides that in those cases where people have little or no equity in their homes, the government will offer guarantees.

I would like to talk for a moment about the guarantees. The government will undertake to compensate lenders in amounts of up to $3,000, plus accrued interest during the deferral period, for any losses incurred for deferral of mortgage interest payments provided that the borrower's mortgage payments, including principal, interest and municipal taxes and 50 per cent of any condominium fees exceed 30 per cent of household income at the time of renewal. Household income, in this case, is family income from all sources.

The guarantee will apply only to one mortgage period, the first, second or another encumbrance, according to the borrower's choice, provided it was assumed or arranged at the time the property was purchased, and will apply to only one renewal period. Payments on these encumbrances may be taken into account in calculating the proportion of monthly payments to income.

The guarantee will apply to properties occupied by the owner, including duplexes and triplexes. In the case of duplexes and triplexes, gross rent from the space not occupied by the owners must be considered income in calculating eligibility for assistance.

The guarantee will begin on the date on which the mortgage matures and continues for ten years but is discontinued when the property is sold or the mortgage is fully paid or until such time as the equity in the property returns to the same level as at the mortgage renewal date. The grants will be paid to the lender on the borrower's behalf in monthly instalments of up to $250 and are not taxable income. The grants will begin on the date on which the mortgage matures and continues for 12 months or until the property is sold, the mortgage is paid in full, or mortgage payments fall into serious arrears.

What about AHOP recipients? The maximum level of support available under the proposed Canada mortgage renewal plan is $3,000 annually. The government has increased the level of contributions available under the extended AHOP contribution program from $1,500 to $3,000 per annum. Current recipients of AHOP contributions will be eligible for assistance under this extended AHOP plan rather than the proposed Canada mortgage renewal plan. AHOP home owners who receive interest reductions loans under AHOP, rather than contributions, will be eligible for the proposed Canada mortgage renewal plan.

By focusing assistance to those home owners who need it most, CMRP provides a fair and equitable response to the renewal program. CMRP recognizes that home owners have significantly higher incomes than renters—$28,000 as against $17,000—and much greater wealth—$72,000 in net assets for owners as against only $9,000 for renters. A general and therefore high-cost program of mortgage renewal assistance would simply have transferred income—and wealth, in the long run, because of real house price increases—from less wealthy households to more wealthy households.

The government's program takes into account home equity and the proportion of income used to meet housing costs. There is general acceptance of the need for the explicit consideration of these factors. Without this, the mortgage renewal plan would not assist those who need assistance and would not ensure that federal tax dollars are used appropriately.

Beyond the questions of equity and fairness, the cost associated with a universal program would have been prohibitive and impossible to reconcile with fiscal restraint and the budget objective of bringing down inflation and interest rates.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the Canada mortgage renewal plan was designed with forethought and compassion for Canadians who are experiencing difficulty with current interest rates. It is meant to assist those Canadian families and individuals whose payment for shelter exceeds 30 per cent of gross income.

I believe that this program has another important facet with respect to administration. Although the federal government will administer the plan through Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the lender will initiate applications for assistance. I believe that this is very important because the plan will not alter the essential close relationship between the mortgagee and the mortgagor in any way. Also, the participation of lending institutions in the administration of the plan reduces the administrative and financial load which the government would have had to bear under a strictly governmental program. It allows the government to administer the plan without establishing a vast bureaucracy. The participation of lenders is restricted to screening applications and advancing the moneys. Financial institutions will not derive direct over-all benefit from the plan.

It is vital that the government not act as a middle man in this situation. Instead, the government chooses to offer financial assistance to those Canadians who are really in need.

We believe that this is equitable and fair. We also believe that it is more cut and dried than the current situation in Saskatchewan where the provincial government's assistance plan is mired in legal confusion. On the other hand, Manitoba's position closely follows the rationale of the federal government plan.

But these programs alone will not solve all the problems. For this reason I would like to acknowledge certain other elements contained in the amendments to the National Housing Act. One of the most disturbing aspects of the current situation is its volatile nature due to the increase in uncertainty regarding the future of interest rates, which affects both lenders and potential home owners. It almost goes without saying that such measures dampen both the effective demand for housing and the supply of investment capital.

It is obvious the changes to the National Housing Act would allow the CMHC to be even more responsive to consumer needs and to the concerns of the lending industry, builders and experts in the mortgage field by removing the loan guarantee restraint. They would also permit the government, through the CMHC, to widen the choice of mortgage options available to home purchasers. What this country needs is action by government, not complaints about perceived shortcomings in the proposals which do not take into account the current fiscal climate in this country. That is why it is very important that Bill C-89 be adopted by the House without further delay. The principles of equitable and targeted assistance are set out in the Canada mortgage renewal plan. That is what Canadians need.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, several times the previous speaker mentioned encumbrances. After his remarks I would say that he is the legal encumbrance of his wife.

Bill C-89 is evidence of the centralist attitude of this government. It is taking more and more of the national product and sharing less and less with the provinces and municipalities. With respect to housing, nowhere is the centralist attitude of the government better illustrated than in its decision to scrap the community services contribution program. I understand that funds for this program run out this month and that when they do, the program will be terminated. I think this is very sad. In my view this kind of root canal economics escapes all logic.

The community services contribution program generates about $1.5 billion in construction each year and assists municipalities to provide essential services and rehabilitate older neighbourhoods. To my way of thinking, what government is all about is not to interfere with the free enterprise business community and not to buy oil companies, but to assist communities.

Speaking in the House, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cosgrove), who is responsible for housing, asked:

> What is the appropriate responsibility of this level of government? What is the appropriate level of responsibility of the provincial or municipal governments? Should the federal government be funding the construction of municipal buildings? We have to ask ourselves, does that make sense in this day and age?

> We have to ask ourselves whether there are other programs to which the government should respond that have a higher priority.

I see the minister is in the House tonight. Where are these programs which have a higher priority? Where are the government programs which will rejuvenate our slumping construction industry? Where are the programs which would enable Canadians to purchase homes at affordable prices and at affordable rates of interest? Where are the programs which have a higher priority which would provide shelter, a basic roof over our heads?

The great Canadian poet, Robert Service, once wrote:

> But the gnawing hunger of lonely men for a home and all that it means; For a fireside far from the cares that are, four walls and a roof above;

In this day and age and under this government it is unlikely we will see that.

Where are the programs which have a higher priority which would ease an already tight rental unit market? Does the minister realize that in some urban centres the percentage of unoccupied or unrented units is well below 1 per cent? That is the case in my riding. Where are the minister's programs which have a higher priority which would provide jobs for Canadians in the construction industry and which would provide spin-off jobs in the supply and services industries and plants right across this great Canada of ours?

One of my closest associates is in the building business in my home riding. He has progressed and is highly respected in the community, but for the first time in the history of that company he has laid men off. Where are these programs which have a higher priority which would keep the forest industry and sawmills from closing down and throwing employees out of work? The hon. member from British Columbia who spoke mentioned this.

The answer to all these questions is that the "higher priorities" simply do not exist. The priorities of this government have been the Constitution and a phony charter of rights, metric forced from the top down, bilingualism and closure. Those are the priorities. The government is devoid of solutions and, indeed, I am not even sure if it fully understands the problems.

The minister responsible for housing insulted Canadians right across this bountiful country when he suggested that the Canadian dream of an ivy covered cottage was perhaps beyond the reach of Canadians. Imagine that in this land! The minister is right; the laissez-faire attitude of this government about the economy is what is crippling us.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEED FOR MEASURES UNDER INDUSTRIAL AND LABOUR ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgency for the people of Waterloo region. Despite representations by business and labour to each member of the cabinet committee on Industrial and Labour Adjustment Programs, the government continues to ignore the plight of the growing number of unemployed in Kitchener-Waterloo and surrounding communities.

The meagre support to the automotive parts industry is of little help in addressing the social cost from unemployment across the communities. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty):

That this House direct the government's ILAP committee to bring forward quickly some practical and creative responses to present unacceptably high levels of unemployment, so that communities like Kitchener-Waterloo can, once again, confidently attract industrial growth.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

INCREASE IN PRICE OF PETROLEUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, today petroleum prices across Canada rise by another two cents per litre as a result of the government's high energy price policy. This translates into about nine cents per gallon, Madam Speaker, only half of 18 cents. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That this House congratulate the government on only raising oil prices nine cents, not 18 cents this time, and require from the minister confirmation of how many times since September 18, 1980, he has raised prices by only nine cents per gallon instead of 18 cents per gallon, and call on the minister to explain why federal taxes imposed since February, 1980 now approximate 63 cents per gallon on gasoline, home heating oil and other petroleum products.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

BANK FUNDING FOR SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, given the daily report about the increasing difficulties of small business in this country I should like to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

Whereas Canadian banks are reaching the limits of the funds they are willing to commit to the small business bond program, and whereas this proves that the banks cannot or will not prop up small businesses in financial hardship so that they can meet the increasing difficulties they are facing because of high interest rates, this House calls on the government to admit that the small business bond program is not working in the way in which it was intended, and calls on the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism to indicate when the small business financing review will be made public as it has now been in the process of operation for 20 months.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

POSITION OF CONSERVATIVE PARTY ON HOUSING LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the Conservative Party last night demonstrated the ultimate in perverse flip-floppery by voting with the government after forcing a seven-day debate on second reading of the bill designed to relieve many Canadians with mortgage problems, and whereas this Tory filibuster continues to delay the implementation of a program which would generate 70,000 jobs for Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau):

S.O. 43

That this House urge the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to abandon his obstructionist tactics and demonstrate his interest in the welfare of Canadians with mortgage problems by co-operating in giving speedy approval to the remaining stages of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE EMIGRANT'S LAMENT

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, one of Canada's most renowned cartoonists, Jim Unger, who created the lovable character "Herman", has chosen to leave Canada permanently because, and I quote, "My tax money is going to support things I don't support and there is creeping leftism and a breakdown of law and order in the present government", and according to a recent local poll it was noted that 87.3 per cent of citizens prefer Herman to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), while the other 12.7 per cent think that Herman is the Prime Minister, and since Herman has more charisma than at least two Liberal leadership hopefuls, namely, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and, as Jim Unger might imply, we ought not to be giving the Russians a $600 million loan at 10 per cent interest while Canadian farmers are going bankrupt; or spending millions of dollars for monuments in Algeria when Canadians cannot afford homes; or hire Japanese firms—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly pressing and urgent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ESTIMATES

LEVEL OF FUNDING FOR EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION COMMISSION AND FOR PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of some urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Restraint and equity were two of the main themes of last November's disastrous budget. The tabling of the 1982-83 spending estimates demonstrates that the government has no intention of practising either. Despite the fact that there are more than 1.5 million Canadians unemployed, the budget for the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission will only increase by 6.6 per cent, in contrast to a 24 per cent increase in the funds being provided to run the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the Prime Minister, in the spirit of restraint and equity, take immediate steps to reverse either the percentage of increase with respect to his office and the employment commission, or use his additional funds to hire unemployed Canadians who obviously have a sound, first-hand understanding of the state of our economy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GARRISON DIVERSION

SUGGESTED VISIT BY CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS TO WASHINGTON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, the International Joint Commission, in a report on the Garrison diversion project in 1977, recommended that "those portions of the Garrison diversion unit which could affect waters flowing into Canada not be built at this time". Since that time construction on the Garrison has gradually proceeded. Subsequently the House unanimously passed a motion on March 5, 1981, supporting the thrust of the decision of the International Joint Commission. Until recently the only thing preventing continued construction on the Garrison was a court injunction obtained by a private group of Americans. Therefore I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the federal government support the suggestion that was made to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House on November 19, 1980, to send an all-party delegation of members of the House to Washington to let American legislators know that Canadians are unalterably opposed to construction of those sections of Garrison which will cause damage to Canadian waters.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

REQUEST THAT THE HOUSE CONDEMN THE GOVERNMENT'S REFUSAL TO CO-OPERATE WITH PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, considering the arrogance and lack of co-operation shown yesterday by three federal ministers regarding Quebec's emergency plan for assistance to smaller and medium-sized businesses, and considering the disastrous effects of the Liberal government's economic policies in Quebec and throughout Canada:

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House condemn the Liberal government for its offhand attitude and its refusal to co-operate with the provinces on economic matters.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE HONOURABLE MEMBER FOR BROADVIEW-GREENWOOD

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the former finance critic of the New Democratic Party is following the lead of the Government of Canada by promising more aid for co-operative housing in the province of Ontario, and that it is rumoured the former NDP finance critic, now leader of the Ontario NDP provincial party, may not remain as a member of the House much longer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson):

That before the former NDP finance critic resigns his seat in the House, he use his good offices to attempt to persuade the NDP governments of Saskatchewan and Manitoba to adopt his plan to provide financial assistance to co-operative housing in their provinces.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

EFFECT OF LIBERAL AND NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY POLICIES ON FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to western Canadian farmers. The NDP-Trudeau coalition, in defeating the Progressive Conservative government, has resulted in some very negative effects for western Canada, including the NEP—

Some hon. Members: Crow, Crow, Crow!

Mr. Gustafson: —with increased prices of gasoline of 87 cents per gallon in Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is entitled to have the House hear his motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gustafson: The result of this coalition action now threatens the removal of the statutory Crow rate in western Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That this government take steps to reverse its position on the statutory Crow rate and condemn the NDP-Trudeau coalition for the detrimental effect it is having on western Canadian farmers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the motion?

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver South.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration who is not presently in the House, although I understand he will be here. Therefore, may I defer my question until he arrives?

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

IMPACT OF ENERGY TAXES

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Canadians are again today being hit with price increases at the gas pumps and for home heating fuel. In view of figures from the Department of Finance which tell us that the indirect tax burden for Canadian consumers over the past year was more than $6 billion, which represents $881 per household per year, and since the real income of the average Canadian has declined while the federal government's income has increased, why does the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs not feel a responsibility to protect the consumer from these devastating taxes and offer some protection particularly for the working poor, the farmers and middle-class Canadians, especially in cases where heads of households are not eligible for GIS?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I feel that Canadian consumers have already acted responsibly by getting rid of the Progressive Conservative government, when in addition to all other oil price increases, it was preparing to impose an 18-cent surtax which was entirely unacceptable.

[English]

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT INTRODUCE ENERGY TAX CREDIT

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, that 18-cent excise tax on a gallon of gas looks pretty good compared to what this government is doing to consumers right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): And I might add that tax did not apply to the cost of home heating fuel, which brings me to my next question. The federal government has more than $6 billion in energy tax dollars in its coffers now. It will accumulate many more billions of dollars over the next five years. The government is collecting all this tax and contributing nothing in its stead. Why does the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs offer no energy tax credit? Will the government not reconsider for once this means of putting approximately $220 back into the pocket of every consumer?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is quite remarkable how Progressive Conservative members manage to talk out of both sides of their mouths. The Progressive Conservative energy critic feels that the Canadian government is not doing enough for the oil companies and that our energy policy is actually doing substantial harm to the major companies. I am very surprised to hear such divergent views from within the same caucus.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL RECONSIDER ITS DECISION CONCERNING EMERGENCY MEASURES PROPOSED BY QUEBEC

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Yesterday, Madam Speaker, three federal ministers met their counterparts in Quebec City to discuss an emergency plan aimed at helping small and medium-sized businesses, and since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources acted as spokesmen, my question is directed to the hon. minister. In view of the disappointment—the minister will understand why—of millions of Quebecers following the federal government's negative answer to Quebec's proposal for an emergency plan; considering the efforts made by the federal government last year and new programs that will probably have an impact in the medium and long term, can the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources inform us today whether he is willing to reconsider the decision made by his team or his party yesterday, namely, to refuse to co-operate with the emergency plan proposed by the Quebec government in view of the importance of saving thousands of small businesses from bankruptcy and putting a stop to the galloping rate of unemployment which is particularly evident in Quebec?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I believe I cannot allow the minister to answer this question. Perhaps another minister who actually has ministerial responsibility for this area could reply. The hon. member directed his question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as political spokesman for a region, and I do not believe that is allowed in the House.

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member for Joliette has brought up the subject at this particular time, because the press reports we received following the meeting we had yesterday in Quebec city with our Quebec counterparts in no way reflected what actually happened. We did not refuse to collaborate with Quebec. Concerning Part III of Quebec's request which dealt with an emergency job-creation program, we indicated to our Quebec counterparts that a firm proposal had been made by our Minister of Employment and Immigration to create jobs in Quebec in the near future. However, the Quebec ministers preferred to play petty politics by leaving the meeting and announcing that we refused to help small businesses in Quebec. However, at the present time, our programs are able to help more than 7,000 Quebec businesses. The programs proposed by ministers Biron and Landry were aimed at helping 1,000 Quebec businesses in the manufacturing sector. We have left the door open. We asked whether we could fit our programs in with the Quebec programs so that Quebec entrepreneurs and Quebec businessmen and women would be able to make use of our programs sooner and in greater numbers and more federal funds could be put to work in Quebec's economy.

FOOTWEAR—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE MEASURES TO ENSURE VIABILITY OF INDUSTRY

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I should think that the minister will acknowledge that he indeed rejected Quebec's proposal and offered them a program which is that of the federal government. In a more specific field, I have a question for the Minister of State for International Trade. Considering that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, following in the footsteps of the other ten, made public a letter to denounce openly the policy of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with respect to the footwear industry and decided to make public a letter written to the Minister of State for International Trade, would the minister tell the House whether he has received the letter from the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe who rightfully blames his colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and does the Minister of State for International Trade intend to make recommendations to his colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with a view to ensuring the viability of the footwear industry in Quebec as well as in Ontario and Canada?

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, I received the letter alluded to by the hon. member as I receive representations from many members on this side of the House with respect to the footwear industry. We are looking at the possibilities of rectifying some of the situations referred to in the letter.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

BRITISH COLUMBIA COAL DEVELOPMENT—AWARDING OF CONTRACTS TO JAPANESE COMPANIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Yesterday, while in British Columbia, I learned that two more manufacturing contracts associated with coal development in the northeastern part of that province had been bid on by companies from Japan, France, and here in Canada. Is the minister aware that the Canadian bid was the lowest of the three but, in spite of that, the projects and the jobs are going to foreign countries? If he is aware of that, when is the Government of Canada going to take steps to make sure that manufacturing jobs associated with resource development stay in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I will be very happy to get further details of the projects mentioned by my hon. friend and get back to him about them. Our general policy is that, where Canadian companies are competitive, then they should have a full and fair opportunity—

Mr. Siddon: What about a preferred opportunity?

Mr. Gray: —to take part in the industrial benefits from major projects of this sort, and I certainly want to work to see that this policy is respected.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I can tell the minister why; I learned that in British Columbia yesterday as well. The reason we lost these manufacturing jobs in Canada is due entirely to this government's high interest rate policy. The Japanese have underbid us on the financing by offering an 8½ per cent interest rate, so we are losing jobs because of this government's high interest rate policy. That is the reason.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

RIDLEY ISLAND PROJECT—AWARDING OF CONTRACT TO JAPANESE FIRM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a related question, this time concerning another Japanese firm and relating to the Ridley Island project. As we know, last week it was announced that this contract went to a Japanese firm instead of a Canadian firm which also had a lower bid. I want to ask the minister whether he will confirm to the House that, as a result of the loss of this contract, Canadians will lose 150,000 man-hours of employment which ought to reside in Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am not in a position to confirm that that will be the result in terms of lost man-hours, because I understand that the contract which was awarded involved 53 per cent Canadian content. That, in itself, must amount to a substantial amount of Canadian employment.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I point out to the minister that the Canadian firm, which was lower in price, offered 96 per cent Canadian content, which was just a little better than the Japanese firm.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL RESOURCES

TERMS OF SALE TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I would like to ask the minister, given the government policy of selling off resources at almost any price it can get, and given the lack of a related manufacturing development policy, when will the Government of Canada submit an integrated development policy to the House which will ensure that Canadian resources, when they are sold, will be sold at prices which will maximize Canadian benefits and will not be sold under conditions which do not include the maximum number of manufacturing jobs associated with their development which is occurring here in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend is quite mistaken in his premise to this question. Our policy is not as described by him with respect to selling of resources. Our poicy is, however, very much one of ensuring to Canadians, on a full, fair and competitive basis, the spin-offs in terms of industrial benefits coming from resource projects.

Mr. Andre: Since when?

Mr. Gray: We are speaking about jobs and we are speaking about manufacturing opportunities—

An hon. Member: Where are they?

Mr. Gray: —as well as service opportunities. That is why we put in place our office of industrial and regional benefits and our objectives and guidelines for major project sponsors. Even though some of these matters are under provincial jurisdiction, we intend to be working increasingly effectively to ensure that Canadian companies and Canadian workers receive these benefits. This is our policy; this is what we are doing.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are driven.

FINANCE

DROP IN VALUE OF DOLLAR

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I address my question to the Minister of Finance, and I hope we get better response than the bluster we got with the last answer. My question relates to the huge loss in foreign exchange reserves in the month of February, amounting to some $800 million. This, as the minister is well aware, is a culmination of the drop in the value of the Canadian dollar from the time of the budget at 85 cents to the current level of approximately 81.25 cents.

Could the minister tell the House the reasons for the weakness in the dollar? Why have the reserves fallen as much as they have, and how much of the drop in the reserves is related to the dropping out last week of three of the participants in the Alsands project?

Mr. Siddon: Do not blame the Americans for that.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in my view the drop in the exchange rate in the past month has been mainly due to the interest rate developments or the relationships in interest rates between Canada and the United States. I believe that this level of reserves and the recent change in the level should make it very clear that the Canadian government has no plan to devaluate the Canadian currency and is standing firmly behind the Canadian dollar.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER CHANGE POLICIES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, it is very clear that the drop in the reserves is related to many more things than the interest rate factors to which the minister has referred. It is related to the Alsands mess, the National Energy Program, and the attitude of this government toward investment, both domestic and foreign.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson: It is related to the anti-investment attitude expressed in the budget. All of these together have resulted in a huge outflow of capital which, last year, was six times the level of the 1970s.

Is the minister considering a reversal of some of these policies which are causing such chaos in the foreign exchange markets, which resulted in record high interest rates in this country during the past year, and which are causing so many problems to our economy? Is he prepared to make some changes in those policies?

• (1430)

An hon. Member: Don't blame the Americans.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member asked me what my opinion was of the change in the level of Canadian reserves and the drop in the Canadian dollar over the last month, which is well known to all of us. I gave him my reason, my considered judgment, that the principal reason for that is mainly the interest rate relationship between Canada and the United States, particularly the fact that at one point that relationship was negative and Canadian rates were lower than United States rates, and that is bound to have an impact on the exchange rate and influence the intervention of the exchange rate authorities. That is my view.

The hon. member rose and then said that is all wrong, and gave his own reasons. The hon. member is entitled to have his own reasons. I disagree with them. Therefore I do not suggest that the policy changes he recommends are appropriate nor would they bring about the effects that he believes they would achieve.

AVIATION INDUSTRY

QUERY RESPECTING LOAN GUARANTEE TO CANADAIR LIMITED

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board who has before him an application to authorize the guarantee by the Government of Canada of a $150 million U.S. loan to Canadair Limited at 15.5 per cent. In view of the fact that the company's statement for the year ending December 31 shows the company has a debt of $973.7 million and only had a net income of $3 million, does the President of the Treasury Board feel it prudent that the Government of Canada should make further guarantees of further loans to Canadair?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, we all know how important Canadair is to the Canadian aerospace industry and what a marvellous product it has been able to develop in the new Challenger jet. I am surprised at the implication of the question from the hon. member.

An hon. Member: Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, my question was to the President of the Treasury Board. I am surprised he did not answer with respect to the prudence of the loan.

Bearing in mind the government problem that he got into with respect to Consolidated Computer Incorporated, and bearing in mind the advice he received from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with respect to the viability of that corporation, and bearing in mind the study of the Enterprise Development Board that he has before him, I would ask the minister, then, is he going to have a full study of the Enterprise Development Board and Canadair, is he going to table the Canadair statement, and is he going to table new projections with respect to Canadair, to indicate that we are not going to have another Consolidated Computer on our hands as might be indicated by the information he now has with him.

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, when guarantees are brought forward they will be the subject of supplementary estimates in this House. Then he will have ample opportunity to raise all his questions with the responsible ministers in Committee.

HOUSING

ADVICE FOR FIRST TIME HOME BUYERS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the minister responsible for housing. Tomorrow the minister will be addressing a seminar sponsored by one of the largest real estate agencies in the country, the theme of which is creative financing and the legal obligations of home buying. I would like to ask the minister responsible for housing, as we face another serious shortfall this year in housing starts, which could go as high as 70,000 by the minister's own projection, as we face continuous high interest rates, which could see mortgages continue to escalate around the 20 per cent mark, which means of course that the minister, by his policies, is contributing to housing inflation, would the minister tell the House what advice he proposes to offer to first time home buyers, tomorrow?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, at this time last year when housing starts were at a five-year high, seasonally adjusted for the month of March, somewhere around 242,500, it was interesting that there was no question from the learned member who has just asked that question. That was a time of prosperity. He cannot stand the improvement in the housing situation and which is so important. Last year, for the first time in five years, we had that improvement in the number of housing starts, one year over the last. As I indicated, I hope that that strength in the industry will be reflected in this year's production.

One of the things I do intend to say to the other panelists and to people who may attend is that I hope they will encourage members opposite, some of those who supported Bill C-89 last evening, and those of the New Democratic Party who voted against them, that if they would support Bill C-89 there are provisions in it to assist Canadians looking for a first time purchase of a home.

An hon. Member: He is the next candidate for parliamentary secretary.

NUMBER OF UNITS TO BE FINANCED UNDER BILL C-89

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, it seems entirely appropriate that the minister would be speaking to a seminar sponsored by a real estate company, because it is only the real estate companies and the banks that are benefiting from the government's housing policies. I would like to ask the minister this question. This morning, on the "Canada AM" program, the minister indicated that the 15,000 apartment units which would benefit from the bill now before the House, Bill C-89, is only a floor, only a minimum. That is the first time the minister has given the House that information.

An hon. Member: He did not give it in the House.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the minister what he considers to be the total number of units to be financed under Bill C-89, since the 15,000 mentioned in the bill is only a minimum?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I welcome the obviously serious question by the critic for housing from the official opposition.

An hon. Member: Give a serious answer, then.

Mr. Cosgrove: I invite him in the same spirit to look at page 14, paragraph 4 of the document that was tabled with the budget, called "Budget in More Detail", which sets out in further detail the fact that the $350 million allocated to assist in the production of affordable rental accommodation is intended to do that. It is intended to be a start for 15,000 and, if there is a surplus, to assist in further production during the later period of this year or next year.

ENERGY

AGREEMENT WITH NOVA SCOTIA ON DEVELOPMENT OF OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It concerns the very significant energy agreement between the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia. I would like to ask the minister if he could elaborate on certain points regarding this agreement, in particular the duration of this agreement, where does this exactly leave the question of ownership of the offshore, resources, and whether this same type of agreement is available to the province of Newfoundland.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Nova Scotia have signed today a long-term offshore agreement on offshore resources development, offshore Nova Scotia. This agreement is for an indefinite period, but will last at least until the year 2024. It provides for very generous revenue sharing and for a real participation by the government of Nova Scotia in regard to those offshore resources. That agreement obviously is available to the province of Newfoundland also, and we would be willing and ready to sign the same type of agreement with the province of Newfoundland tomorrow, if the government of Newfoundland wished to do so.

RAILWAYS

LEAKING TANK CARS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On Friday last I raised with the minister the fact that there were 28 tank cars in the Hamilton yards that were leaking a variety of different toxic and flammable substances. I want to suggest to the minister that that number has been raised now from 28 to 74, that between the months of October and December an additional 46 tank cars were found to be leaking, and in every case the leaks were discovered as the result of mechanical work being done on tank cars. Is it not possible that those tank cars had been leaking all the way from Sarnia to Hamilton through each of the municipalities on the way, and does he not now recognize, as a result of the weekend disaster, that there are many people in jeopardy by the lackadaisical attitude of the CTC?

• (1440)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have not yet received a report from the CTC on that subject. I hope to get one very soon.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF INSPECTION REPORTS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if he is prepared to table all the investigations that have taken place, all of the work records that have been undertaken, and all of the testing that was done, both at the source and along the way, on every single tank car which travelled on that train which travels from Sarnia to Hamilton to Nanticoke. Will he explain how it is possible that an adequate inspection procedure can be carried out, given the tremendous number of people who have been laid off by the CNR and CPR, the result of which obviously means that there are not a sufficient number of people employed to do the work?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I will indeed give consideration to that suggestion. On the other subject which the hon. member had been recommending, in recent days, that is the addition of a substantial number of people to inspect railway cars, I have had this suggestion analysed. Hon. members might recall that yesterday I indicated how the inspection of cars takes place. I indicated that it is done a number of times, by the shipper, by the railways, and by the receiver of the goods. I have had estimated the consequences of one of these suggestions which the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain has been making to the press. For example, the complete mechanical inspection of all railway cars twice a year would require approximately 1,300 people, or person-years at the CTC. That would only be part of the examination, the examination of the car itself. Presumably my hon. friend would also like us to start examining the tracks, the crossings, the operators, etc. There might be more examiners at the end of the exercise than cars to be examined.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

FORECAST OF HIGHER FUND DEFICIT

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday the minister confirmed that the November budget forecast on the unemployment insurance fund deficit was wrong, that the deficit may be much higher than the $218 million predicted. The deficit of $218 million was based on an unemployment forecast for 1982 of 7.8 per cent. Can the minister tell the House what the revised unemployment rate is?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to clarify for the hon. member that my only indication at the time was that we would have to see what the revised figures would be according to our quarterly estimates of what the actual draw was on the unemployment insurance fund. It is obviously a revolving fund and has to keep pace with current conditions. It should come as no surprise to the hon. member, or to anyone else, that we have a substantial demand upon the fund at the present time because of the current very serious economic circumstance. I would point out to the hon. member again, in case he has forgotten, that this government substantially reduced the premiums on unemployment insurance in that November budget. We provided substantial savings to both employers and employees in that budget. That saving provides a major asset at this point in time. There is no projection of figures. It is one we would simply calculate based on quarterly assessments of UI draws.

REASONS FOR DEFICIT

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, the minister said, "It may mean there will have to be some increases in rates next year." I come back to my question which the minister was careful not to answer. If the deficit that was in the budget in November was based on an unemployment rate of 7.8 per cent, and if the minister is now confirming what his officials are indicating, that the premium rates will have to go up to cover a much greater deficit, can the minister tell us whether there are any projections whatsoever within his purview which indicate that the unemployment rate of 7.8 per cent which was predicted for 1982 is wrong? If the minister now says there may be a deficit, to what does he attribute that deficit—a wrong estimate of unemployment or increasing unemployment? If it is increasing unemployment, will he kindly tell us what that increase is going to be?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I think the important words in the statement I made were that there may have to be a raise in premiums, depending upon the draw on the fund. There was no confirmation. There may have to be a raise if unemployment stays at the present level of 8.3 per cent. That is a conditional statement, not a confirmed statement. I would simply say that is the basic practice. Each year we estimate what the draw will be upon the fund and what the premium requirements will be for the following year to make it up. Last year we had a substantial surplus of over $300 million. As a result, we substantially reduced the premiums. We will want to assess that as the year progresses and at the end of the year determine whether we have to raise or lower premiums, depending on the state and condition of the fund. I would caution the hon. member not to get too excited.

REQUEST FOR UNEMPLOYMENT FORECAST

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, I am sorry if I have to be cautioned not to get too excited. The minister's comments have led to speculation that his own department probably now has different figures of what it expects the unemployment rate will be during 1982. I do not want the minister to fudge on this. I am asking whether the minister has any figures which lead him or his officials to believe that the unemployment rate for 1982 will be different from the 7.8 per cent presented in the budget of his colleague. We know that a lot of the projections in the budget have been wrong. I am giving the minister a chance to indicate whether he is working on a new forecast. The country is certainly entitled to know that. I do not think I can be accused by the public, the workers, or their employers, of getting too excited about the matter.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity the hon. member gives us to clarify the situation because the only speculation that is being raised is on the part of the hon. member and in some news stories trying to develop projected figures. We say the reality now is that there is an 8.3 per cent unemployment rate. That is a serious and tragic circumstance. We are taking a number of steps to offset it. In the hon. member's province alone we have signed close to 40 work-sharing agreements which are putting thousands of workers back to work in his province. The same is true right across Canada. We are not going to engage in the kind of speculation the hon. member does. We are not in the business of raising false alarms as the members of the opposition do.

ALSANDS PROJECT—QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE ALTERNATIVE PRODUCTION

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister has stated on a number of occasions that the Alsands project is not needed for Canada to reach energy self-sufficiency by 1990. Indeed, last Friday the minister would not give a guarantee that the Alsands project would proceed. What alternative does the minister have to replace the shortfall of 130,000 barrels of oil from the projected production of Alsands?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have indicated that we should do everything we can to get the Alsands project proceeding and that this production would be extremely useful in achieving our goal of self-sufficiency. The latest forecasts we have of production coming out of the east coast offshore production and the Beaufort Sea production indicate that we can count on at least 200,000 barrels being available from that production by 1990.

PRODUCTION FORECASTS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister realizes that these forecasts along with the Ocean Ranger are now at the bottom of the sea. From the information the minister has given us, it is indeed a black day for Canada when he admits in this House that Alsands is not required, to the detriment of jobs in Canada and our economy with its weak dollar. I have nothing to ask him because he has indicated in this House very clearly—

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Very simply, Madam Speaker, I told the hon. member that the Alsands project would indeed be a very welcome development and that we should do everything to ensure it takes place. However, there is a limit on what the taxpayers should be called upon to contribute. There is not a bottomless pit in the public treasury. My hon. friend should be old enough and wise enough to realize that.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ABSENCE OF HIGH COMMISSIONS FROM POSTER COMMEMORATING COMMONWEALTH DAY

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I want to ask the minister about the poster which has been put out, as Commonwealth Day approaches, for the second year in a row by his office, to commemorate the affair. I am wondering about whether the fact that the High Commissions—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Clarke: —of Canada are eliminated—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that he may not display a poster in the House.

Mr. Clarke: I am sorry, Madam Speaker; I just want the minister to be sure what I am talking about. I wonder if it was a fait accompli, that his office was planning to cut off relationships with Commonwealth countries? Why is it that Canada's High Commissions have been replaced by embassies, according to this chart, a term which is reserved for non-Commonwealth countries?

Mr. Baker: (Nepean-Carleton): You need a new artist over there.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, without having seen what the hon. member held in his hand, I cannot comment on that poster, but I can say that the notion of Commonwealth Day was advanced by our Prime Minister some years ago. It has been adopted across the Commonwealth and we are very pleased to observe it here in Canada because of the intense dedication that we have to the Commonwealth ideal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: Madam Speaker, I am shocked that the minister is not aware of this poster which has been put out for at least the second time to commemorate the very day he is talking about, and Canada's ties with the Commonwealth. I suggest that he familiarize himself with it and consider a correction for next year's poster.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

CANADIAN CONTENT IN JAPANESE MANUFACTURED CARS AND TRUCKS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that approximately 18,000 workers are laid off in the Canadian auto parts manufacturing industry, and in view of the fact that Canada had a $4.35 billion net trade deficit in trade last year, would the minister explain to this House just why he refuses to raise the Canadian auto parts content to 85 per cent in Japanese cars and trucks being sold here in Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the objective of increased content is very much part of our strategy policy as a government.

We have taken a number of steps for the purpose of working toward this direction, for example, our arrangement with Volkswagen. Another example is our individual duty remission agreements with a number of car exporting companies. The matter of Canadian content in parts and vehicles is something that we put forward very forcefully in our discussions with Japan in particular, and we will be continuing to do so.

An hon. Member: A broken record.

CANADA-JAPAN NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I gather that the minister's buzz word in his answer was "forcefully". Therefore my supplementary question is to the Minister of State for International Trade. Will the minister undertake to assure the Canadian auto parts industry and its workers that at the talks in Japan in two weeks time Canada will insist on much greater Canadian content in Japanese autos and trucks, eventually leading to 85 per cent, in view of the fact that this is a labour-intensive industry and not part of the other resource-based megaprojects which are really causing fundamental structural problems in our economy?

An hon. Member: Say yes, Ed.

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, in response to one of his colleagues last week I stated that we would be initiating a content proposal during our negotiations with the Japanese. I do not think it would serve the interests of the industry or the Canadian workers to discuss those negotiations in the House at the present time.

DANGEROUS PRODUCTS

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER MADE STUDY INTO DANGERS OF STEEL WOOL

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of the publication of European studies which reveal that steel wool might be just as hazardous as asbestos, would the minister tell the House whether his department has made a study on that subject?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. I can assure her that the officials of my department are now examining that question and that I will report to the hon. member as soon as possible.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CANADA-UNITED STATES WEST COAST BOUNDARY DISPUTE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the boundary negotiations on the AB line on the northern coast of British Columbia. One of the senior officials of his department is quoted as saying, "I see no relationship between the salmon talks and the boundary negotiations with the U.S. The Canadian government is not willing to jeopardize its trade agreements with the U.S. over a boundary dispute". Would the minister confirm that this is the position of the Canadian government on that particular boundary dispute?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I can confirm that that is not our position. The position of our government is consistently that each issue must be taken on its own merit. We do not engage in bargaining one issue against another. It is for this reason, indeed, that we have been taking great exception to some of the proposals made recently in the United States whereby they would propose actions of that kind. Whoever made that statement is not enunciating government policy; quite the contrary.

QUERY RESPECTING MAINTENANCE OF BOUNDARY

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. Will he confirm that Canada's position is to maintain an historic boundary line which has existed now for 80 years?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, when the hon. member puts his question in those terms I do not know whether he means to exclude additional claims which we might have. We are certainly not contemplating abandoning any of our traditional claims, but we do not necessarily limit ourselves to traditional claims.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT ON ACID RAIN

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology. Would the minister advise the House what progress was made at his meeting with his American counterpart in Washington last Wednesday which dealt with our mutual problem of acid rain? Specifically, did the American government make a commitment to equal the commitment of the Canadian government to cut down emissions which cause acid rain by 50 per cent by the year 1990?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, meetings did take place last week between the two negotiating teams of Canada and the United States on the acid rain question. These are difficult negotiations. They are proving to be difficult. We did have the opportunity at that meeting to put forward our proposals which, after consultation with the provinces, are that we are prepared to see that sulphur dioxide emissions in Canada are reduced by 50 per cent by the year 1990. These are contingent upon American action in meeting similar reductions. The proposals which we have presented are being assessed and studied by the American administration. There is some progress in the sense that the American government will be appointing scientific assessors before the end of the month to review the scientific evidence.

An hon. Member: Why not just say no.

Mr. Roberts: That is a step forward. Negotiations will continue and I expect that we will meet another three times before the end of this year. That is the extent of the progress to date.

PROMISE MADE BY PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the minister's answer and the fact that the United States Department of the Environment has cut back its number of employees by 40 per cent since the first of the year, thereby indicating a far lower level of activity in attempting to control the environment from now on, both of which indicate that the U.S. government is very badly dragging its feet in this matter, would the Prime Minister tell the House how does the stand of the American government at the present time, as displayed by the minister's answer, and the facts which I just brought out, compare with the very warm, fulsome promise by the President of the United States, Mr. Reagan, when he was here last year, that the United States would give 100 per cent co-operation to Canada in our mutual fight against acid rain?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member points out two facts. First, the U.S. administration has, according to the hon. member, cut back on the number of its public servants in a certain area. I cannot judge that. I know they have been cutting back rather substantially in many areas and perhaps that is just one of the many areas where this has taken place.

However, in terms of the second fact which was brought forward by the hon. member, I listened to the answer given by the Canadian minister responsible for the environment and it seemed to me that he indicated, on the contrary, that there were more meetings planned, that there had been a draft agreement tabled, that progress was slow but that progress nonetheless was expected.

• (1500)

The hon. member alluded to President Reagan's commitment to me of, I believe, last March, when he was in this House of Commons. He did indeed commit himself to reaching an agreement with Canada on a diminution of energy pollution, and that commitment was restated when I visited the White House in July. I take those commitments as indications of a desire to negotiate in good faith, and I take from the minister's answer some evidence of that desire.

Mr. Hees: This is the Americans' way of dragging their feet.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RESIGNATION OF MR. BOB RAE

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: If hon. members keep this up too long, I'm likely to change my mind!

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Rae: I knew that would have the desired effect.

As many hon. members will be aware, I was fortunate enough to be honoured by my provincial party and to be elected to a position of leadership in my native province of Ontario. Because I feel so strongly that the electors of Broadview-Greenwood should be represented full time in the House of Commons and because I have come to recognize, as those who are in positions of leadership will know only too well, just how awesome are the responsibilities of leading a party, I have decided that I should submit my resignation to you, Madam Speaker, as the member of Parliament for Broadview-Greenwood. In doing so, I would like to pay tribute to my electors, the voters of Broadview-Greenwood, who three times have done me the honour of electing me as their Member of Parliament.

It was three and a half years ago that I was first elected to this place, and I am sure those hon. members who have come here through the struggle of partisanship will know and understand what I am saying when I simply say that in a democratic society such as ours I regard it as, perhaps, the greatest honour that could be bestowed on anyone to have been elected to the Parliament of Canada; and I want to thank the people of Broadview-Greenwood for their advice, for their encouragement and for the warmth of their friendship. Whatever party they may or may not have belonged to or supported, I will respect them always, and I thank them from the bottom of my heart for having done me the honour of electing me to this place.

I am sure hon. members will understand when I express my gratitude to my staff and particularly to my constituency assistant, Valerie Lawson, who has served me and my predecessor, John Gilbert—who is now a judge in the province of Ontario—with tremendous dignity, distinction and hard work. I think it is important for everyone here to remember that our staffs are our eyes and ears in our constituencies for listening and serving the people, and I want to pay public tribute to them.

I want to thank my colleagues in the New Democratic Party. We have had our differences from time to time. From what I understand and read in the newspapers, occasionally all caucuses have differences of opinion. Even in the party opposite I understand there are differences of opinion. However, I want to say that it has been a pleasure, an honour and a lot of fun to participate with my brothers and sisters in bringing the message of social democracy to the people of Canada through this Parliament.

I want to thank members of other parties. I do not think the public understands sufficiently the necessity and the fact that all of us—I hope—make a distinction between things which are said in the spirit of political partisanship and the friendships and the sense of colleagueship we all feel in our common work which is, I suggest, to serve the people of our constituencies, the people of our provinces and the people of Canada.

There are a great many people in all parties I could single out who have given me the gift of friendship, which I regard as perhaps the greatest gift we have. They have given me much good advice—sometimes after I made mistakes rather than before I made them! I particularly want to pay personal tribute, as it were, to those ministers who have responded to my questions, or not responded to my questions, as they saw fit.

I will not take too long, and I hope Your Honour will indulge me, but I was looking over the very first question I asked when I came to this House, and I think it shows the quality of repartee in this institution. The second question I asked was directed to the then minister of finance, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). In the last part of my question I said:

—will he reconsider and suspend the government's present policy of restraint and cutback which is only increasing unemployment insurance payments and welfare expenditures?

The minister's reply to that was to say that he had no intention of introducing exchange controls at that time!

I have asked several questions since that time. I still have not received the answer I want, which might explain why I have decided to leave. However, I do want to pay tribute particularly to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), the Minister of Justice and the current Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) for their courtesy to me as the finance critic for our party. Perhaps I should preface that by saying "personal courtesy" to me, because my political differences with these ministers are, of course, a matter of record.

When I came here the Liberal Party was on its last legs.

Mr. Epp: Still is.

Mr. Nielsen: No change.

Mr. Rae: It had become the captive of a neo-conservative ideology. It was desperately afraid of an election. The Conservative Party had the distinction of having five finance critics, not just one, and all I can say is that when I arrived here I was very green and wet behind the ears. The point of those three remarks is that perhaps nothing changes at all.

In closing, I want to thank you, Madam Speaker, for your courtesy, to thank the officers at the Table for their help, to thank the Sergeant-at-Arms and to thank all the staff of this House of Commons, the people who make this place work and make it the wonderful place it is.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I should like to say a few words to express my heartfelt thanks to the constituents in my riding of Broadview-Greenwood, to those who worked with me in the party, to those in the other parties who worked together with us for the future and welfare of our country. I wish to thank you, Madam Speaker, and all the senior officials of the House of Commons for their friendship, their assistance and the work they have done, all of which has been a great help to me in my own work.

[English]

Finally—and I am sure hon. members will understand when I say this—my deepest thanks of all go, of course, to my family, whose indulgence, support and love have made it possible for me to be a Member of Parliament and to have spent so much time away from them. My family has participated with me in the tremendously rewarding life which is the life of a politician.

• (1510)

Since I am not retiring from politics, Madam Speaker, quite the contrary, I do not regard this as a tremendously nostalgic event. I want to close, along with a book I read recently, by saying that what is past is prologue. I want to thank you and to thank hon. members for your friendship and help these past years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have never been elected in Broadview-Greenwood; in fact, I have never run for office in Broadview-Greenwood, but somehow I feel very close to that riding. I want to tell the hon. member that I intend to take a great deal of interest in it in the weeks and months ahead and perhaps to spend a great deal of time there.

Mr. Broadbent: That is good news for us!

Mr. Kaplan: I have been in one more election than my hon. friend and I have sat in one more Parliament than he has. I want to make the observation that this has been a particularly bitter Parliament for all of us—very partisan, with lots of confrontation and difficult moments. At a time like this, which comes infrequently, we have the opportunity to share a common bond—Liberals, Conservatives and New Democratic Party alike—in the service of our country from the various perspectives we bring to this place.

I can say for my party that it has been an experience for us to sit opposite the hon. member and watch his performance over the years that he has been here. To borrow a very traditional line, as he leaves this place to continue his political battles, Madam Speaker, we wish him well—but not too well!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like very much to respond on behalf of the "five official opposition finance critics" that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) referred to. I, too, would like to wish him the best, though I am not sure the best of what. On behalf of the Conservative Party, however, I can say that we would like to wish him long tenure in his office as leader of one of the opposition parties in the province of Ontario.

On a serious note—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I think I have stunned the House! We would like to wish the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood the best of everything in his new position. We understand the tremendous responsibilities he has taken on. I am sure the experience he has gained in this House and all the good friends he has here will serve him well in his new career.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I want to add a few words to those that have been spoken by hon. members in the House today. Of course, we are all a bit sorry when someone decides to leave the House, and that applies to the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood who has carved a place for himself here.

In the name of all hon. members, I want to wish him well in whatever capacity. As Speaker I would be the last one to prophesy anyone's political fortunes, so I shall not qualify that!

May the qualities and talents which the hon. member has displayed in the House, as well as the experience he has gained which I am sure is considerable, be of good counsel to him in his new endeavours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VACANCY

BROADVIEW-GREENWOOD—BOB RAE BY RESIGNATION

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for the electoral district of Broadview-Greenwood having given notice of his intention to resign his seat in the House, it is my duty to inform the House that when the notice has been entered by the Clerk on the Journals pursuant to Section 6.(1)(a) of the House of Commons Act, Chapter H-9 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, I shall forthwith issue my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer to issue a new writ of election for the election of a new member for the said electoral district.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—S.O. 43. MOTIONS MOVED BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a brief point of order. The Chair will have noted the appointment yesterday of several new parliamentary secretaries. As the Chair will recall, under the very first ruling of Mr. Speaker Jerome, one which he made in 1974 and which has been with us since, parliamentary secretaries are not permitted to move motions under Standing Order 43. It was probably an oversight on the part of the—I see you nodding in the negative Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: —and the "Disco Duck" saying "not true" also.

Mr. Speaker Jerome ruled that parliamentary secretaries would not be recognized for the purpose of putting motions under Standing Order 43, which was not the case with respect to putting questions. He allowed that and indeed you, Madam Speaker, have allowed that, notwithstanding the fact that I have raised it as a point of order in the past. Each time a point of order has been raised with respect to a parliamentary secretary moving a motion under Standing Order 43, the Chair has prevented it.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Schroder), newly appointed yesterday, I believe, put a motion under Standing Order 43 today. I hope we will revert to the practices that were established under Mr. Speaker Jerome which you, Madam Speaker, have been following in this session. I see you nodding in the negative again, Madam Speaker, but I do not recall an instance where a motion under Standing Order 43 has been accepted by the Chair.

Mr. Lalonde: Why not?

Mr. Nielsen: Because it has been the practice for six years not to do so, that is why.

I suggest that rather than being allowed to put motions under Standing Order 43, they can damn well call up the department of the minister concerned and get the answer. I suggest that the same applies with equal force to questions.

If this is going to be allowed to cut into the privileges of members on all sides of the House, then in my submission it is an infringement on the time that is normally given to private members. The situation is as ludicrous as it would be for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to ask questions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). Perhaps she would have been better served had she done that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I can hear the "Disco Duck" over there again. I submit that the practice should be honoured and parliamentary secretaries should not move motions under Standing Order 43.

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, this very point was raised by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) about two months ago and Your Honour ruled that it was quite in order and that any member was entitled to move a motion under Standing Order 43. That was made quite clear and it has been the practice regularly, perhaps two or three times a week, during this session. It is not something which has happened suddenly, and Madam Speaker ruled on this and said that it was in order.

• (1520)

Madam Speaker: I refer the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to Standing Order 15(2), which in part reads:

> Members, other than ministers of the Crown, may propose motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 at this time.

That is the time which is set out in the Standing Orders. I believe my predecessor ruled out the possibility that parliamentary secretaries would ask questions—

Mr. Nielsen: No, it was the other way around; motions under Standing Order 43.

Madam Speaker: Yes, I think he allowed motions under Standing Order 43. If my memory serves me right—but I will not insist on it because I am really basing my remarks on the Standing Orders—I rule and confirm that parliamentary secretaries may put motions under Standing Order 43, but they may not ask questions.

I refer the hon. member to Citation 370 of Beauchesne, which indicates that parliamentary secretaries should not be asking questions since they have access to ministers and can be informed about questions they should like to ask. I must confirm—and it was not an oversight this afternoon—that I distinctly feel the Standing Order, as written, allows parliamentary secretaries to put motions under Standing Order 43.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BEATTY—ALLEGED BREACH OF SAFE CONTAINERS CONVENTION ACT—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: Yesterday the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) raised, as a matter of privilege, the failure of the government to lay an order made under the Safe Containers Convention Act before Parliament within the period required by the act. The act provides that an order "shall be laid before Parliament not later than the tenth sitting day of Parliament after it is issued". The hon. member, in his presentation, indicated that the order in question was issued on January 21 and was registered on January 22. As he pointed out, Parliament has sat for more than a full month since the issuance of the order. I therefore doubt he has raised this matter at the earliest opportunity. That is one point.

Of course, it is not the function of the Chair to interpret the law. I must also point out that alleged errors in the tabling of documents have not in the past been ruled to be breaches of parliamentary privilege. The hon. member quoted from a ruling given by my predecessor on February 1, 1979, but I am afraid I cannot agree with his interpretation of the implications of the ruling.

I would draw attention to two other rulings given by my predecessors. In a decision given on June 27, 1972, concerning the failure to table a report of the National Harbours Board within the period required by the National Harbours Act, the Speaker in the course of his ruling said:

—I fail to see how this can be considered a breach of the privileges of the House.

On June 19, 1978, dealing with a complaint concerning the late tabling of the annual report of the post office, my predecessor ruled:

—I feel that the hon. member is raising a grievance rather than a question of privilege. I do not see how, under the guise of privilege, the Chair can be drawn into determining a question of law—

The hon. member further quoted Erskine May in support of his submission and cited in particular the paragraph appearing on page 138 of the nineteenth edition concerning disobedience to the orders of the House. I cannot agree that the failure to comply with the law constitutes disobedience to an order of the House. While it may be argued that legislation is adopted by Parliament and therefore reflects the will of Parliament, I do not think it possible to sustain an argument that an act of Parliament constitutes a specific order of the House, either of this House or of the other place. I would also refer the hon. member to page 578 of the nineteenth edition of Erskine May, wherein he has stated:

Breach of a statutory duty to lay an instrument before Parliament will not of itself invalidate the instrument, though it may amount to a misdemeanour. The resulting situation has been dealt with both by statute and by statutory instrument.

It seems clear that such a failure on the part of the government has never come within the scope of parliamentary privilege.

In this particular case it is my view that, if the government is indeed in violation of the law—and if it is, it is not for me to determine—the hon. member may have a grievance rather than a valid question of privilege. If the government has not properly complied with the requirements of the Safe Containers Convention Act, a remedy could be sought through the courts or otherwise. However, it would appear—although I emphasize that I am not interpreting the law—that orders issued under the act have no force until the procedures laid down in Section 8 of the act have been complied with. If the government, therefore, chose to rectify any error which might have been made with the least possible delay, Parliament would have an early opportunity of debating the order and coming to a decision on it. Therefore, I cannot find that the matter raised by the hon. member should take precedence over other business as a prima facie case of privilege.

RENTAL RATES OF WATERLOTS IN VANCOUVER HARBOUR

Question No. 2,347—Mr. Cook:

1. What was the arithmetic mean of rental increases per square foot of waterlots (a) between the First and Second Narrows Bridge in Vancouver Harbour of leases up for renewal in 1980 (b) east of the Second Narrows Bridges over Vancouver Harbour of leases up for renewal in 1979 and in 1980?

2. What is the policy, formula and method of appraisal of the National Harbours Board for determining value of individual waterlots for rental purposes in the harbour?

3. What is the arithmetic mean of rental rates per square foot of waterlots in the harbour in 1981 (a) between the First and Second Narrows Bridges (b) east of the Second Narrows Bridge?

4. What is the arithmetic mode of rental rates per square foot of waterlots in the harbour in 1981 (a) between the First and Second Narrows Bridges (b) east of the Second Narrows Bridge?

5. What is the arithmetic mean of the mode of rental rates per square foot of waterlots in the harbour in 1981 (a) between the First and Second Narrows Bridges (b) east of the Second Narrows Bridge?

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows:

1. Based on a sampling of 10 per cent or more of the large number of existing leases (a) $.0567 (b) 1979—$.0205; 1980—$.0717.

2. The formula for determining rental is the application of a rate of return to fair market value of the property. For the most part, the B.C. assessment authority value is used in determining fair market values of waterlots in the area.

3. Based on a sampling of 10 per cent or more of the large number of existing leases (a) $.061735 (b) $.02335.

4. Based on a sampling of 10 per cent or more of the large number of existing leases (a) $.10 (b) $.02.

5. As the mode is one number, the arithmetic mean would result in the same number.

SIDE LOOKING AIRBORNE RADAR

Question No. 3,377—Mr. Nickerson:

1. Do regulations prevent the use of the airborne "wet process" system for obtaining hardcopy of side looking airborne radar imagery in Canadian registered aircraft but not prevent its use in United States registered aircraft flying in Canadian territory?

2. Is the "wet process" superior to the "dry process" and, if so, does this necessitate one of the two Canadian firms that undertake SLAR work using a United States registered aircraft and does it put the second firm at a competitive disadvantage because its aircraft were registered in Canada?

3. Are changes planned in order to ensure that both Canadian and United States registered aircraft are treated the same when operating in Canadian airspace, with respect to regulations governing the use of SLAR hardcopy production systems, and, if so, what are the changes?

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Provided the developing solution on board is not connected to any of the aircraft operating systems and the developing solution is not considered to be a dangerous article as defined under the International Air Transport Association—Restricted Articles Regulations, there is no regulation to prevent the use of the "wet process" for side looking radar in either a Canadian registered aircraft or United States registered aircraft operating in Canada provided they have been granted operating authority.

2. Transport Canada is not aware of differences in the image quality between the two processes. To operate a commercial air service in Canada, whether with Canadian or United States registered aircraft, authority is required from the Canadian Transport Commission and Transport Canada.

3. The regulations pertaining to aircraft operating in Canadian airspace do not differentiate between registrations in that they apply equally to both. No changes are foreseen.

EYE TESTS FOR CANADIAN ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Question No. 3,655—Mr. Cossitt:

Is all eye testing for Canadian Armed Forces personnel done by graduate optometrists or medical doctor eye specialists and, if not (a) what type of persons are used and what are their qualifications to perform such examinations (b) what are all the reasons justifying any government policy that does not require graduate optometrists or qualified physicians to perform such duties?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): (a) and (b). Eye testing in the Canadian Forces is done by or under direction and supervision of physicians and ophthalmologists. Physicians and ophthalmologists are qualified to provide eye care by virtue of their medical degrees. They are assisted by ophthalmic technicians who only perform limited procedures. Ophthalmic technicians in the forces are qualified to the same standard as their civilian counterparts by the Joint Commission on Allied Health Personnel in Ophthalmology, an accrediting body recognized by the medical professions of both Canada and the United States. This policy conforms with recognized civilian medical practices in Canada.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As you will recall, several days ago I asked the parliamentary secretary why I have not received answers to question No. 3,461 concerning Canadair which I placed on the Order Paper on November 23. At that time he indicated that he would look into it. Since that time I have placed other questions on the Order Paper concerning this subject, and still I have received no responses. Today the hon. member for Mississauga South raised further questions during oral question period about this matter. Once more I ask the parliamentary secretary if he would be kind enough to find out why these questions cannot be answered.

On a slightly related matter, if Madam Speaker will permit me, I wish to raise a point of order concerning the fact that I am having great difficulty with the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in obtaining answers to correspondence about two matters of vital concern to my constituents. In the case of the Minister of Transport, it relates to Northumberland Ferry Services which provide a vital sea link between Nova Scotia—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. This is not covered by the Standing Orders. The hon. member may ask a question concerning his questions on the Order Paper, but the matter of correspondence is not covered by the Standing Orders.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, on a further point of order, my point is that it takes up unnecessary time during question period. These matters could be dealt with if ministers would answer their correspondence.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, again I will pursue the question raised by the hon. member. I know those inquiries are on the way. It may take a little longer, but we will come up with the answers pretty soon.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary how the chase is coming along in terms of obtaining answers to questions Nos. 3,380 to 3,438 concerning the report of the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, the chase is coming along fairly well. I am in hot pursuit and hopefully we will obtain something before too long.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ENERGY SECURITY ACT, 1982

On the Order: Government Bills (Commons):

Second reading and reference to a Committee of the Whole of Bill C-94, an act to amend and enact provisions related to the Petroleum Administration Act, the National Energy Board Act, the Foreign Investment Review Act, the Canada Business Corporations Act, the Petro-Canada Act, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979 and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act; to repeal the Energy Supplies Emergency Act; to amend an act to amend the Petroleum Administration Act and the Energy Supplies Emergency Act; to amend the Adjustment of Accounts Act; and to enact the Petroleum Incentives Program Act, the Canadian Ownership and Control Determination Act, the Energy Monitoring Act and the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act.—The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Madam Speaker: Perhaps hon. members might wish me to refer at this time to the point of order raised yesterday afternoon by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre). He has taken the position that Bill C-94, being an omnibus bill of considerable complexity, should be divided. I take this opportunity to thank him for the arguments he presented. Also I want to express my thanks to those other hon. members who offered their contributions to this interesting procedural matter.

This question is one which is not only of concern to me, but has also concerned some of my predecessors in this chair. The hon. member for Calgary Centre has described his view of the difficulties encountered in a measure of this kind and has supported his view with procedural arguments. In presenting his procedural argument, no precedents were cited which would establish the validity of his point of order that the bill should be divided.

The hon. member did, however, emphasize the observation of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux in a ruling of January 26, 1971, as follows:

There must be a point where we go beyond what is acceptable from a strictly parliamentary standpoint.

Mr. Speaker Lamoureux went on to rule that the government in that instance had followed the accepted practice of the past. Although he expressed the reservation that the point of going too far may have been reached, he did not offer a solution, except to say that future omnibus bills should be scrutinized at first reading stage when hon. members can express their views.

Mr. Speaker Jerome, on May 11, 1977, expressed——some very deep concern about whether our practices in respect of bills do in fact provide a remedy for the very legitimate complaint of the hon. member that a bill of this kind gives the government, under our practices, the right to demand one decision on a number of quite different, although related subjects.

No solution to the matter was proposed by Mr. Speaker Jerome. The bill was allowed to proceed.

For my part, in the present circumstances there seems little point in offering yet another opinion on a question so well addressed by my distinguished predecessors. The matter is there for all to see. It may be that the House should accept rules or guidelines as to the form and content of omnibus bills, but in that case the House, and not the Speaker, must make those rules.

Therefore, having heard argument and having examined Bill C-94, I must now rule on the basis of existing precedents, which do not support the proposition that the bill should be divided or struck down.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not arguing with the ruling that you have now made, but it does bring forward a number of questions. There is one in particular that I would like to put to the Chair. It arises from Citation 764(1) which has affected me adversely in the past. It reads:

A committee is bound by the decision of the House, given on second reading, in favour of the principle of the bill, and should not, therefore, amend the bill in a manner destructive of this principle.

Perhaps the Chair could give me some guidance as to what the principle of this bill is so that I might be guided in terms of what amendments at committee stage I am permitted to propose or not propose.

Mr. Pinard: That is a hypothetical question.

Madam Speaker: I would not think the Chair would want to make any comments on the principle of the bill. The Chair would only comment on procedural matters. I am afraid that at the present time I cannot answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, it is quite clear that second reading is a vote on the principle of the bill. It is quite clear from our precedents that we are going to be required to vote on that principle and that we are going to be guided by the principles in preparing amendments for committee study. Having given the view that in fact there is a principle, having established by your ruling that indeed we can have a second reading vote on the principle, I think my question as to what the principle is is very reasonable under the circumstances.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, may I draw your attention to citation 117(5) and (7) of Beauchesne's fifth edition, pages 38 and 39, which reads as follows:

(5) Hypothetical queries on procedure cannot be addressed to the Speaker from the floor of the House.

(7) The opinion of the Speaker cannot be sought in the House about any matter arising or likely to arise in a committee.

Consequently, I think that if my hon. colleague wishes an opinion on parliamentary procedure, it is not appropriate for him to direct such a request to the Speaker, from the floor of the House. These questions are procedural, they are hypothetical, and I submit, with due respect, that it is not up to the Chair to answer them.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, hypothetical or not, and I would argue it is not, we are in a dilemma in that you have ruled that since there is no precedent you cannot address the question that this bill has no principle, or that it has a multitude of principles, and all the other problems. If the Speaker cannot do anything because there is no precedent, the Speaker can never do anything. Precedents are only established by Speakers. Having ruled that you cannot act because there is no precedent, Madam Speaker, you have in essence ruled that no Speaker can ever act. Because you have to start somewhere: which is the chicken and which is the egg?

Mr. Nielsen: What about Bill C-93?

Mr. Andre: We are in a circumstance, Madam Speaker, where literally the tyranny of the majority prevails in contravention of Citation 1 of Beauschene. There is absolutely no possibility of preventing the government from doing anything unless perchance some Speaker was not so proscribed in the past as to say "Yes, I will take action, even though it is establishing a precedent." If you cannot act because there is no precedent, nobody can ever act on anything.

I humbly submit, Madam Speaker, that there is no protection of this chamber from the tyranny of the majority in that circumstance.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member should know that the only protection that members have, apart from the one specified very clearly by the rules and which the Speaker is bound to enforce, is the House itself. The members themselves should be making the rules by which the Chair will conduct the debates or preside over the debates of this House of Commons.

The hon. member is inviting the Chair, in the absence of a precedent or a rule, to make one of her own. I submit to the hon. member that is the last thing a Speaker should do. In the absence of precedents or any valid argument or valid rule on which I could base a different judgment from the one I have just made, I have to refer the question to the House itself. That is why in my decision I have asked the House, if it feels this question has to be addressed, to determine guidelines or rules that would be applicable to the particular situation which the hon. member so ably brought forward in the House the other day. But it is wrong to ask the Chair to substitute her own rules in the absence of clear rules or clear precedents.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I move therefore, that Bill C-94 be put aside and a committee of this House be authorized to examine the appropriateness of omnibus bills of this sort containing multiprinciples being brought before the House. If that is a requirement on which the House needs to judge, then the Chair should allow this House some mechanism upon which to reach that conclusion.

If a precedent can never be established, and the House has no mechanism to carry forward the suggestion which you, Madam Speaker, have raised, we are back to the fundamental dilemma that whatever is proposed by the majority shall come to be; that is, the tyranny of the majority will prevail in direct contravention of Citation 1 of Beauchesne.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, two things are quite clear from the hom. member's statement. First of all, he has been thoroughly criticizing one of your rulings which is based on the standing orders and parliamentary procedure, and that is in itself inadmissible. Second, he is proposing a motion without having given prior notice to the House, which is entirely irregular. In the circumstances—we are pressed for time since we have already wasted seven days on second reading of a bill supported by the party that is now using delaying tactics—I suggest that we proceed without further delay with consideration of the bill in question which the Chair ruled was admissible and which we are ready to debate.

Madam Speaker: To conclude on the statement by the hon. member for Calgary Centre, it is clear that I cannot accept his motion since no prior notice was given, which is against the Standing Orders of the House.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, the intervention by my friend, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) was by no distortion or stretch of the imagination a criticism of the ruling of the Chair. That is not the way I heard it. The hon. member was seeking desperately not only for clarification but for guidance, having regard to the very serious nature of the question raised by him and the very serious consequences of the ruling by the Chair.

The government House leader suggests that it is wrong to ask the Chair for guidance on a hypothetical question. There is nothing hypothetical about the fact that the bill is before us accompanied by a ministerial press release which sets out seven different principles. The hon. member for Calgary Centre has submitted that the bill goes beyond that, but I am prepared to sit with the minister's own press release. The guidance and clarification we seek, Madam Speaker, is: does your ruling now mean that the long-established precedents and practices of this House that it has a right to divide on the principle of a bill—because that is what second reading is all about—has now been expanded to the point where the House can be confronted by the government with several different and disparate principles in one bill, and be asked to divide under the guise—simply because the bill has a long title—of dividing under one? If that is the case, the clarification we seek is, where is the principle?

If we go along with the conclusion that the Chair is not called upon to determine what the singular principle of the bill is, and we know we are confronted by the minister's own press release with seven different principles, we are, I submit, abandoning the practice of hundreds of years' standing.

We would like to know, Madam Speaker, whether your ruling means that we are now embarking upon an entirely different practice where, in the future, the House may be called upon legally by your ruling to divide, if they so choose, on several different principles under the guise of dividing under an omnibus bill, which by its very title sets out several different principles.

Madam Speaker: Well, obviously the meaning of the ruling I have just made—and the hon. member was debating the question—is precisely that I saw no reason for dividing the bill. I feel that the procedure which will apply to the study and eventual adoption, or otherwise, of that bill is a procedure we have followed in other circumstances. I have precisely said in my ruling that I felt this bill, as it is written, may be studied in the manner proposed. I am not introducing anything new. I have refrained from doing so because I have no precedent or rule on which to do other than what I have suggested in my ruling.

So I am not confusing the House by introducing new procedures. These procedures are well known to hon. members; they are ones which have been followed by the House in the past.

Mr. Nielsen: I have a further question for clarification, but the Chair has made the statement that I was debating the issue. It was certainly not my intention to reflect on the ruling of the Chair. I was legitimately and sincerely seeking guidance because of the Catch-22 situation we are in here.

One of the points raised with great clarity by the hon. member for Calgary Centre had to do with existing Standing Orders which require bills, on receiving approval in principle on second reading, to be referred automatically to standing committee. Now, we have four different and disparate bills by way of schedule which are now going to travel the Committee of the Whole route, thereby denying members of the House an in-depth inquiry by way of calling witnesses before the standing committee to inquire into the various clauses of the bill.

If I understand your ruling correctly, Madam Speaker, it means that those four schedules—in effect, four different statutes—will not go to standing committee but will remain in Committee of the Whole and thus deprive members of their normal rights. If I understand your ruling correctly, that is the result.

Madam Speaker: Well, the hon. member is again arguing the ruling and using the same arguments as the hon. member for Calgary Centre used the other day in his point of order. Those arguments were considered, and the ruling I just made answered those arguments. If the hon. member looks at the intervention of the hon. member for Calgary Centre, which intervention was most complete, he will find that the hon. member argued those points which the hon. member for Yukon is arguing over again.

I do not mind questions as to what may now happen in the House, but certainly the hon. member has to realize that he is not accepting the ruling and does not want to proceed as the ruling now determines the House should proceed. I am afraid I have to ask him to accept it, because that is the purport of the ruling.

The hon. member refers to the schedules, and he knows the hon. member for Calgary Centre spoke about the schedules and referred to the fact that there were four different principles or ideas, and so on, in those schedules. I dealt with that in my ruling.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, let me point out at the outset that this is the second time the Chair has made the observation that I am arguing with the ruling of the Chair. I am not arguing the ruling of the Chair, however much you, Madam Speaker, may think so. If I have left that impression, I want the Chair to dismiss it from her mind. I am simply seeking clarification. I know quite well that the hon. member for Calgary Centre made these arguments. I have not only read them, I have studied them, Madam Speaker, and I am quite aware of what they say. The reason I raise these questions for clarification now is precisely because the Chair, with great respect, did not deal in the ruling with the several points made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. That is why I raised the points for clarification.

Now, had the Chair dealt seriatim with the six points raised by the hon. member—and I was following very carefully the ruling of the Chair to see whether each of those arguments was met—then I would not be standing here. I am standing here because, with great respect, we are left in this quandary by virtue of the fact that these several points raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre have not been dealt with.

For instance, in regard to the point on the principle, which I will leave aside because I raised it a moment ago, the Chair did not give a response in detail to that argument. The one I am dealing with now with respect to the denial of our normal rights under the Standing Orders had the bill gone to standing committee as it ordinarily would have has not been dealt with, unless it can be said to have been dealt with by the umbrella rejection of the hon. member's submission. With great respect, I would have expected the Chair to deal with each one of the points raised because all of them are very important points indeed.

Another one which has not been dealt with, with great respect, and without intending to reflect on the ruling of the Chair, is this question of the rights of members to divide on a recorded vote. That right has, in the hon. member's submission, been removed. That point has not been dealt with by the Chair.

The clarification we seek is genuine. The question outstanding, Madam Speaker, is: does your ruling mean that in future, legislation can be introduced by means of a schedule, as it has in this case, thereby changing our existing practices under the Standing Orders and sidetracking new legislation away from the standing committees into this House in Committee of the Whole? Is that the result of the Chair's ruling?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: The ruling just made by the Chair has not added any new elements, since the same situation occurred not long ago. The House is aware that when the government introduces a bill seeking authority to borrow money, commonly called a borrowing authority bill, if the sole object of the bill were to seek borrowing authority, we would not go before the Committee of the Whole, and the bill would be referred to a standing committee of the House. However, since tax measures are included in this bill, our motion must include a request that the bill be considered in Committee of the Whole, and that includes the provisions concerning borrowing authority.

The example I just gave was in fact a very recent precedent, namely Bill C-93, on which the Chair made a ruling. There have been other precedents as well, however. It is, therefore, not something new. The hon. member claims that the opposition is frustrated because it will not have an opportunity to consider certain aspects of the bill in the standing committee, as opposed to what it will be able to do in Committee of the Whole. I may answer the hon. member that first of all, this is not a precedent, that it is a consequence of the Chair's ruling on Bill C-93, and that previous Speakers have handed down similar rulings on far more complex bills. When the hon. member says that they are penalized, I doubt that is really the case, because when we go into Committee of the Whole, as a rule each clause of the bill is debated and may be discussed or amended. In fact, the bill is given far more thorough scrutiny than it would ever receive in a standing committee of the House. Now we may or may not agree on this comparison between the work done in Committee of the Whole as opposed to a standing committee of the House, but the fact remains that the precedents are established and clear-cut, and when a bill contains measures that entail the levying of taxes on Canadian citizens, we have no choice but to go into Committee of the Whole. Bills containing provisions that are solely concerned with taxation do not contain tax provisions in every single clause, but that does not mean that only the clauses in which taxes are levied are referred to the Committee of the Whole and other clauses of the same bill that do not are referred to a standing committee of the House. Thus, there are many precedents, the Chair's ruling does not have any new consequences, and unlike what the hon. members said, we are not setting new precedents or taking new directions. The Chair has served the House, as is its role, by interpreting the Standing Orders, precedents and parliamentary practice and if this practice is not satisfactory to members on both sides of the House, the way to make changes is to agree to changes in the Standing Orders, and my hon. colleagues know perfectly well that we are prepared to discuss such changes. In the short term, however, we are still governed by the existing Standing Orders and the Chair's ruling merely confirms past practice.

Madam Speaker: I will answer the hon. member who has put a question to me concerning what this means for the future. I will tell the hon. member that I will not decide the future now. When future procedural problems present themselves, I will study them on their merits and try to rule on them to the best of my judgment.

The hon. member has referred to the fact that he felt I had not dealt with some of the arguments point by point. Yes, perhaps I did not answer each and every one of the arguments which were presented to me during perhaps more than one hour and a half in which hon. members spoke on this particular subject. However, I can assure the hon. member, as I did in my ruling, that they were fully considered. My practice is not always to answer every argument that hon. members put forward point by point, because there is a certain approach to rulings and to the way in which the Speaker must deal with the House where the Speaker does not necessarily want to knock down every possible argument that she feels was not particularly pertinent to the situation. However, what I do, I believe, in all of my rulings, is to give hon. members the basis for my decision by stating which arguments were compelling and on which I have based that decision.

At any rate, if hon. members wish me to make very, very long statements, I can always do that; but I rather thought that my role was to try to leave the time of the House to hon. members rather than to take too much for myself. I can oblige hon. members by systematically referring to all of the arguments which have been brought forward, but it does not seem to me that that is an absolute necessity.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I am certainly not suggesting to the Chair, as a generality, that in every single instance verbose rulings be made. I would not be so presumptuous, nor so silly, as to suggest that. I was not present to hear all of the matter, but I have read and studied the submissions of the hon. member for Calgary Centre. Because of the far-reaching and serious implications of the arguments of the hon. member—and there were only six arguments with that kind of serious implication—and because of the serious consequences of Your Honour's ruling, I am simply saying that I would have anticipated, in this particular rare instance where some detail is expected, that it might have been forthcoming so as to assist us in resolving our present dilemma of where we are to go. I am certainly not asking Your Honour to get out your crystal ball to gaze into the future with respect to what you might do in future instances. However, we are confronted here with an existing situation, with four brand-new bills in four schedules, which we would ordinarily have expected to go to committee.

My question was really with respect to these four. Am I correct that as a result of Your Honour's ruling, notwithstanding the Standing Orders in that regard, because these four bills now appear as schedules to this legislation the ordinary procedures which would hive them off to standing committees do not apply? Are we now confined with these new pieces of legislation to Committee of the Whole? Is my understanding of the effect of your ruling correct?

Madam Speaker: That is correct.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I would again repeat what the hon. member for Yukon, our House leader, has indicated. I am not questioning the ruling; I am asking for clarification because of the seriousness of the six points raised during the point of order. There were six very important principles based on precedents by previous Speakers, some which were so enshrined as to become part of our parliamentary authorities, referred to in several places, such as this question of second reading being a vote on principle.

I would ask the Chair to clarify, if she can, the dilemma that I face as one hon. member, and the dilemma that I am sure other hon. members in this House face. Let me quote Mr. Speaker Jerome, who remarked on May 11, 1977, as found on page 5523 of Hansard:

> I think an hon. member of the House ought to have the right to compel the House to vote on each separate question.

He felt that the requirement that an hon. member be able to compel the House to vote on each separate principle was fundamental. Indeed, it is so fundamental that it shows up on numerous occasions in our parliamentary authorities.

The question that I put to the House concerns the opportunity for myself and other hon. members, given the way this bill is treated, to request a vote of the House, for example on Part A, petroleum incentives and Canadian ownership and control, which, generally speaking, we would approve, and a vote of the House on Part C, petroleum administration, which, generally speaking, we would oppose. How can that happen?

I also wonder about the future. Are we now establishing a precedent that it will indeed be possible to create a law, as it were, upon which the House of Commons, supposedly the supreme law-making body in this country, has not had an opportunity to divide? That is a precedent of enormous consequences, so much so as to render this institution absolutely meaningless, so much so as to give effect to the often made accusation that we have a four-year or five-year dictatorship. That is the impact.

I, for one member, must re-examine my reasons for being here if, in fact, I am unable to vote on something as fundamentally important as that. I am not asking for the ability to influence; I am just asking to vote, that is all. The ability to vote is the last right of a Member of Parliament. We are not even asking to have the ability to legislate, but just to vote on principle. I would like to ask, Madam Speaker, how in this circumstance, as a result of this situation, how this bill is proceeding and so on, I as an hon. member will be able to fulfil my responsibilities and obligation to stand up and be counted on the various distinct principles that are brought forward in this piece of legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Very briefly, Madam Speaker, the consequences mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) are not new. Rulings handed down by your predecessors had the same results, and I am thinking of one particular instance when a bill was introduced to amend several aspects of the Criminal Code. I am sure that many members would have preferred to vote on individual provisions of the omnibus bill that was debated, although supporting debate on the entire bill. However, because of the Standing Orders and parliamentary procedure, that was not possible.

Today, the hon. member is critical of the fact that a number of different aspects are contained in the omnibus bill, which, and I shall repeat this once again, is admissible according to our procedure and precedents. He is saying that he would like to be able to vote in favour of certain aspects of the bill and against others, and that now he is in a position where he will probably be obliged to vote against the bill, although he is in favour of some parts of it. This is true on both sides of the House, Madam Speaker, and our Standing Orders affect the government side the same way where an opposition motion is concerned. The House will recall that before the Christmas holidays, the opposition, on an opposition day, introduced a motion on capital punishment. Many members on this side of the House would have liked to be able to vote for or against capital punishment, without at the same time having to vote on a motion of no-confidence in the government and thus having to decide whether an election would have to be called.

We, on this side of the House, also would have liked to say:

[English]

"We want to be able to divide, we want to be able to divide on an election, or on the death penalty".

[Translation]

Therefore, Madam Speaker, the Standing Orders of the House apply on both sides, in all kinds of situations, and that is why—

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Calgary Centre and myself have been very careful to put questions to the Chair by way of clarification for us, as a result of the ruling that you gave today to the submission made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. The government House leader has been allowed to do that which he, in my submission, should not be allowed to do. He is not asking for clarification, he is not asking for guidance from the Chair as a result of your ruling. He is presenting further substantive arguments today that he did not make yesterday. In my submission, it is quite inappropriate for him to be allowed to put forward further substantive arguments here today. If he is as confused as we are about the consequences of your ruling and wishes to seek clarification, as we are seeking clarification, that is one thing. But to be permitted to add to argument by this subterfuge, to allow him to fill in arguments that perhaps he overlooked filling in yesterday, in my submission is very inappropriate. If he wishes to seek clarification, that is fine, Madam Speaker, but I think that the course that he has been allowed to follow here in submitting substantive argument is most inappropriate.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Then I apologize for having interrupted the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I would like now to complete my comments because I did not interrupt him when he was arguing his point. I think he has some nerve to take me to task for refuting the point raised by the member for Calgary Centre. Indeed, they are clearly out of order when they challenge your ruling and put questions to you contrary to Beauchesne's Citation 117 (5) and (7) which I quoted a while ago. I think that they both should be ashamed of challenging a ruling, the consequences of which they deplore but which are nothing new, since they are similar to the consequences of rulings made by your predecessors and to which you referred in your ruling. When the hon. member for Calgary Centre states that he would like to be able to vote in a specific way on several elements of the bill and when I tell him that, if it is frustrating for the opposition, there have been other situations under the Standing Orders where the government has experienced the same frustrations, I think it is quite relevant, and if the hon. member for Yukon does not understand the substance of my argument, I cannot be blamed for his obtuseness under the circumstances. In conclusion, I point out that members opposite are complaining about the consequences of this ruling. But these consequences are nothing new. They are the same as those which flowed from your predecessors' rulings and they do not fly in the face of parliamentary practice. Quite the contrary, they do not fly in the face of our Standing Orders, and under the circumstances, I submit that members opposite are wrong in taking the time of the House in an indirect attempt to question your ruling which is quite clear and, I repeat, consistent with all previous rulings.

[English]

Madam Speaker: I think it is perhaps time we conclude this matter and I will try to answer the question of the hon. member so that he will feel that he can proceed with this bill in the usual manner. I feel that if members follow the usual process, there will be no confusion. The hon. member for Calgary Centre and other members know that in the process of the debate as it is outlined in our rules and regulations there are devices whereby they may present amendments on second and third reading and there will be an opportunity for a standing vote in Committee of the Whole.

All of these are things infinitely possible in the course of this debate. The proof of the matter would be, as I suggest that the House should commence the debate and we will see what amendments are acceptable in the course of that debate. Perhaps that would be the best proof that the process allows for all of the things which hon. members legitimately seek to do in studying this bill.

The process is not new. It simply follows the rules and procedures which have been followed in this House before. I think the hon. members, if they begin the debate, will see that it is entirely possible to do this to their satisfaction.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, this is not on the same point of order at all. Your ruling has been that this is an omnibus bill and perfectly proper for debate. Your ruling essentially is that it covers the same issue, presumably energy security. But I raise another issue with you that I think bears some immediate consideration.

Because of the format of the legislation before us, we have an Energy Security Act, 1982, which is to be the title of the bill when it becomes an act. As Your Honour knows, when a bill passes Parliament and receives the royal assent, it becomes an act of Parliament.

Our problem here is compounded by the fact that Schedules III to VI of this bill now before us pretend to be acts, but they are really schedules to an act. We therefore have a very difficult situation before Parliament.

When this bill is passed, as may well happen, it becomes an act. Then what have we got? Have we got five acts passed or have we got one act passed with four schedules to it claiming to be acts? I was wondering if Your Honour had directed herself to question the law officers of the Crown, the Attorney General or the Minister of Justice's Mr. Chrétien department with respect to how this bill we now have before us will become an act of this Parliament. Will it in fact become five acts of this Parliament? It strikes me that we have a serious problem.

May I suggest to Your Honour—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member is again discussing the point of order which was discussed the other day. I did hear all the arguments. Now that I have made my ruling, I am afraid I cannot hear new arguments. That point has been covered in the ruling and I cannot entertain arguments on it.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. The basic concept of democracy is that a member represents the thinking of the majority of the people who sent him here. When a bill has two principles, one that my people support and one that my people do not support, and I am required to vote "yes" or "no", I am misrepresenting the thinking of the majority.

• (1610)

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member is again discussing the point of order which was dealt within the ruling. I am afraid I cannot accept his argument.

Mr. Taylor: I am discussing a point of representation. My ability to represent my people rests with me being able to vote.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member rose on a question of privilege. Unless that question of privilege flows from the deliberations today—and he is now referring to deliberations on which I have ruled—it is therefore ruled out; he cannot intervene on these points. If the hon. member has another question of privilege about the manner in which he should be allowed to represent his electors, he can raise it at another time by giving me the notice required by the Standing Orders. I cannot entertain a question of privilege at this time at this point.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, the whole point I am raising is basic to democracy. If a member is unable to represent the thinking of the people in his constitutency, something is wrong.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Taylor: Are we running a communist state or what?

Madam Speaker: All the debates in this House are about democracy.

Mr. Taylor: This is not democracy, this is communism.

Madam Speaker: Democracy in this House can only be preserved by following the rules which the House has devised for the conduct of debates. I am telling the hon. member that if he wants to discuss this important matter of democracy and his particular role in preserving that democracy and in representing his electors, he may do that, but he must do it according to the periods and timing reserved for that under our Standing Orders. That is what I am saying to the hon. member. Order in the House is basic to the functioning of this Parliament and the ultimate preservation of democracy. My preserve is to maintain order. I do not want to allow the hon. member to discuss this matter now because it is not in order at the present time. I can entertain his argument at another time.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, your ruling prevents me from representing my people. It affects democracy.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think I have been very reasonable—

Mr. Taylor: You are not reasonable.

Madam Speaker: —in expressing the views of the Chair in this particular circumstance. I am afraid the hon. member cannot continue. I would ask him to co-operate.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I have some concern over this and I seek clarification on this ruling. Something that Speaker Lamoureux treated as very serious, as has been mentioned by my colleagues, is the opportunity of members who deal with bills before us in the House of Commons to have the chance to vote individually on the various clauses. My concern arises from the fact that in this omnibus bill before us, as has been mentioned, we have four schedules which are in fact acts.

Madam Speaker: I understand, but that point has been covered by the ruling. It has been argued by hon. members before the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper). It was covered by the ruling and the subsequent exchange we had.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) was trying to get across is another unanswered question, unanswered in my submission in your ruling and unanswered so far in any of the discussions taking place this afternoon. Normally if a bill is treated in Committee of the Whole under the normal procedure, we go through it clause by clause and, as the Chair has pointed out, we can have a standing division clause by clause.

One of the central points made yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary Centre was that since our precedents require a schedule, in this case a whole act, to be treated as a clause in the bill, then we are deprived of that right of dividing with a standing division clause by clause.

As I understood the hon. member for Peace River, what he was trying to ask the Chair as a result of your ruling today was, in effect, does the ruling of the Chair by virtue of the precedents which the Chair has cited deprive members of a standing division in Committee of the Whole on each separate clause in each of the schedules? To put it in the positive sense, can members be assured by virtue of the Chair's ruling today that they will have the right to a division on each of the clauses in each of the schedules to the bill? That is the question.

Madam Speaker: At the present time the question is hypothetical.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that that question will be dealt with by the Chairman when the time arises.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, surely members are entitled to know at this stage, because we are breaking new ground. We are dealing with four distinct pieces of legislation in a schedule. With the kind of legislation we had hitherto, we had the right to divide clause by clause at the Committee of the Whole stage. Surely the Chair, for the protection of the rights of members and by virtue of the decision which was rendered today, can reassure us and answer positively the question whether we will have the right to vote clause by clause on legislation of this nature, notwithstanding the unusual manner in which it is being treated.

All we ask of the Chair is a reassurance that that right will not be taken away from us, that we will have the right to a standing division on each of the clauses in each of the schedules, they being separate pieces of legislation. That has been past practice. I hope we can be reassured it will be continued in this instance, notwithstanding the rare problem we are dealing with here.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the hon. member would not want me to interfere with the work of the committee. The committee itself will decide what it must do in the particular circumstance to which the hon. member is referring. I have before me now second reading of the bill. I have ruled on that. I think the House is perfectly equipped to proceed with it.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I find myself in a difficult dilemma as a Member of Parliament trying to act responsibly and fulfil the obligations that fall upon me, having been elected by the good people of Calgary Centre. By virtue of the ruling, I find myself having concerns that I have raised, six separate points, which are very serious in their implications. In your ruling you did not explain how you dealt with those separate points. You gave the reason why you did not explain. You said you did not want to take up the time of the House. However, I now find myself in the position where these points are of concern. They should be of concern to any member who has some respect for the traditions of our parliamentary system and respect for what in fact this institution is supposed to do.

In view of our inability to get that explanation and my inability therefore to know how to approach this particular question in any meaningful and realistic way, I have no choice but to move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson):

That this House do now adjourn.

• (1620)

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Madam Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Speaker: Call in the members.

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion lost. It is not easy to determine what time it is in the House of Commons. After long consideration, I can state that it is now past ten o'clock on Tuesday, March 2. As it is too late to begin the sitting on the 17th at the time prescribed, the sitting is now adjourned.

At 2.38 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 18, 1982

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT INTEREST RATE POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, in February of last year 158,000 workers were employed in the St. Catharines-Niagara region. This February only 130,000 are so employed. That 18 per cent drop is largely due to the decline in the automotive industry. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the Minister of Finance bring a halt to his insane high interest rate policy that is destroying the new car market and keeping auto workers on the Unemployment Insurance Commission line.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

FUNDING FOR OUTREACH PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, given that the Outreach program has been more successful than the government's own employment centres in finding jobs for women returning to the work force, and for handicapped women and others, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Island (Miss MacDonald):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration explain why he proposes a 5 per cent cut in funding to the Outreach program this year, as if he wishes to penalize an organization which has proved its capacity to find jobs for women.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

CALCULATION OF TAX ON IMPUTED RENTAL INCOME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis):

That the Minister of Finance be severely reprimanded, castigated and removed from office for including in his budget documents the suggestion that $4.5 billion to $7 billion could be collected through the taxation of imputed rental income on homes owned by individual Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

CALL FOR REMOVAL OF RESTRICTION ON DEPOSITING OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. All members of this House are aware that credit unions and caisses populaires do not compete on an equitable basis with the chartered banks of Canada. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker):

That the government introduce legislation to amend Sections 11 and 71 of the Financial Administration Act to allow government departments and agencies the opportunity to deposit funds in financial institutions other than chartered banks.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON TAXATION OF IMPUTED RENTAL INCOME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, in his November budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) imposed a number of unjust and unfair taxation measures, not in an effort to create tax equity but to raise more money for the government's wasteful spending. Canadians are now justly concerned that the federal government will eventually institute taxation of imputed rent as it has with respect to interest on money borrowed for RRSPs and on imputed income from employee benefits. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence):

That the Minister of Finance make a statement to this House that the government will not, now or in the future, resort to this iniquitous bureaucratic recommendation to tax home owners on the rental value of their homes.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF CANADIAN FORCES BASE CHATHAM, N.B.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, the ravages of the government's ineptness have been particularly extreme in Atlantic Canada. In many areas unemployment has reached 40 per cent or more. In view of the fact that the Miramichi region of Chatham and Newcastle has a work force of 18,000 people and 8,000 of them do not have jobs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That the Liberal government can its plans to can CFB Chatham, which will can another 3,500 jobs, and, while it is at it, can the minister who originally proposed it.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN GASPÉ PENINSULA—INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT DID NOT PROPOSE SOLUTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Traditionally, the Gaspé has always had the poorest record for employment opportunities in Quebec. One of the effects of the present recession has been to raise the unemployment rate in this area to 26 per cent. We must do everything in our power to put an end to this injustice, and I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer):

That the Minister of State responsible for Quebec affairs make a statement on motions explaining why he has not been able to get cabinet to take whatever action may be necessary to remedy this intolerable situation.

Madam Speaker: This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

GOVERNMENT POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the government has consistently given lip service to the concept of equal rights for women, in light of the fact that the Liberal government saw fit to send only 5 per cent of its caucus—as opposed to 40 per cent of the NDP caucus—to meet with the National Action Committee on the Status of Women on Monday, and noting that the government was found guilty of denying equal pay to women for work of equal value two years ago and then deliberately stalled for two years before deciding to pay the people the money due them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis):

That this House award the Liberal government the Alice in Wonderland award for double talk for its consistent ability to say one thing and mean something else.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BANKRUPTCIES

CALL FOR BUSINESS ASSISTANCE MEASURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, in February of this year a record 917 Canadian businesses went bankrupt. This is 36 per cent higher than February, 1981, and 64 per cent higher than February, 1980. These bankruptcies, combined with receiverships and insolvencies, coupled with buisnesses just plain giving up, are costing hundreds of thousands of jobs right across the country. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That the Minister of Finance withdraw the budget that the Solicitor General describes as a disaster and replace it with measures which will help businesses to prosper and employ people rather than drive them into the ground.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: Allan MacEachen said no!

MINES AND MINING

LOSS OF EXPLORATION CAPITAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in a recent letter to the Minister of State for Mines, the B.C. and Yukon Chamber of Mines has documented the exodus of millions of dollars of mineral exploration capital from Canada to the United States, due largely to the anti-investment thrust of the NEP and the disastrous November 12 budget, and whereas this collapse of investor confidence will lead to the direct loss of thousands of jobs in northern and western Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King):

The government immediately reverse its attack on investment in the energy and mineral resources sector, so that thousands of jobs might be restored to Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

REBATE ON FUEL USED IN PRODUCTION OF FOOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, fuel prices to Canadian farmers have more than doubled since this government returned to office in February, 1980. Depending on the type of fuel used, the federal government collects between 40 cents and 60 cents per gallon excise tax on farm fuels. Therefore I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That in order to help keep the price of food down, thereby assisting the consumer to cope with inflation, the Minister of Finance consider increasing the 7 cent rebate on fuels used in the production of food.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF MASSIVE JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the unemployment insurance fund was set up to protect the incomes of Canadian workers during periods of unemployment, and instead of being able to collect the benefits they have paid for, unemployed workers in all provinces are being forced to go on interim welfare because of administrative chaos in the UIC bureaucracy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration introduce a massive job-creation program, starting within his own department, and that he fund this project out of general government revenues or the $1.37 billion spending reserve, rather than through further raids on an unemployment insurance fund already stretched to the breaking point because of government economic policies.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NON-ATTENDANCE OF CONSERVATIVE PARTY MEMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I rise seeking the attention of all hon. members of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43.

Whereas every member, before taking his seat in the House of Commons is requested by Section 128 of the British North America Act to take and subscribe an oath of allegiance—

Miss MacDonald: His or her seat.

Mr. Flis: —and whereas the Conservative members broke their oath of allegiance by mischievously not attending a sitting of this House since March 2, 1982, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher):

That all Conservative members who refused to carry out their sworn duties as elected members of this Parliament be docked one day's pay for each sitting day that they did not perform their duties as elected and sworn to do.

SUGGESTED RETENTION OF CROWSNEST PASS RATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I wish to raise an urgent and pressing matter relating to western Canadian grain farmers. The NDP-Liberal coalition in defeating the PC government has brought upon farmers the highest fuel increases in the history of farming. Bankruptcies for farmers are at an all-time high. In view of this economic emergency which the NDP-Liberal coalition has created for the western farmers I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the government reverse its position on the statutory Crow rate and endorse the retention of the statutory Crow rate for the western Canadian grain farmer.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE LATE TOM COSSITT

TRIBUTES TO FORMER MEMBER FOR LEEDS-GRENVILLE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, with the agreement of the House I rise on a point of order to pay tribute to the memory of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville whose sudden death on Monday night was a cause of shock and deep regret to all hon. members of the House of Commons. Certainly I know that I speak on behalf of my colleagues, and I am sure on behalf of members on all sides of the House, in expressing my deepest sympathy to his wife Jennifer, to his family and friends.

Tom Cossitt will be remembered by members of this party as a man of principle and as a skilled and creative parliamentarian. He was a man of tenacity and of courage who held firm views and pursued them vigorously and skilfully. He acquired a reputation for controversy, but that was a consequence of his actions, not the motive for his actions. Tom Cossitt had deep convictions about what was good for his country, and he acted on those convictions with an intensity which quite probably shortened his life.

He first came to the House as an elected member in 1972, and he was re-elected in the federal general elections of 1974, 1979 and 1980. As is known, he was formerly associated with the Liberal Party, but when he came to the House of Commons he came as a Progressive Conservative, and that was a matter on which we count ourselves fortunate.

I knew him as a friend and as a parliamentary colleague who believed firmly that governments should be accountable to the people. That was a rule which he applied equally to all governments, including the one I led. He was a man who was in awe of no one and who performed his public duties fearlessly. Above all, he was a dedicated and energetic representative of his constituents, placing their needs first.

Tom Cossitt will be missed by all members of the House of Commons and by the people he represented. His colleagues on this side of the House knew him as a man of principle and conviction. His party applauds him. And that is how we will remember him. We join with all members in expressing our sympathy to his wife Jennifer, to his family and to his friends.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I should like to join with the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in expressing our shock and sadness at the news of the sudden death of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville, Mr. Tom Cossitt. When death strikes one of our colleagues, we are all reminded of the particular burden of stress and responsibility borne by those in public life and, particularly, shared by their families. The demands made upon the health of Members of Parliament are little known or understood outside this chamber, but are no less real for that.

Tom Cossitt earned a reputation as a man who worked hard for the people of Leeds-Grenville, despite serious physical setbacks in recent years. He knew the risks involved in maintaining his accustomed pace of activity, and accepted those risks as the price of public service. He died in the performance of his duties as a Member of Parliament and among constituents whom he was elected to serve.

He was often a partisan politician, as we all are from time to time, but death is not a partisan affair nor is the sorrow we feel for his widow, Mrs. Jennifer Cossitt, in this time of her bereavement. We join together at this time of sadness to express our deepest sympathy and understanding to Mrs. Cossitt, and to the relatives and close friends who are experiencing a grievous sense of loss.

We recognized Mr. Cossitt for his tireless devotion to the interests of the people of Leeds-Grenville. He always had time for the individual constituent who appealed to him for assistance. He realized that while many problems of constituents are routine for a Member of Parliament, they are uniquely important to the individual concerned. Mr. Cossitt was known in his riding as a man who served very well the people whom he was elected to represent. For people who believe profoundly in the value of representative democracy, there can be no higher praise than that.

I hope, Madam Speaker, that you will convey our sentiments to Mrs. Cossitt, and with those sentiments our condolences and sympathy.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues I would like to join with the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in extending our deepest sympathy to members of Tom Cossitt's family.

Mr. Cossitt was an outspoken Member of Parliament, as we all know, and a man with a genuinely independent spirit. At all times, whether one agreed with him or not, he fought hard for what he believed in. That is perhaps the prime obligation of all members of this House. We send our deepest feelings of sympathy to all members of Mr. Cossitt's family.

Madam Speaker: I have already sent a message to the widow of the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) and to his family expressing the grief of the House over the sad news of the death of one of our colleagues. I would like the House to rise now and observe a minute of silence in his memory.

[Whereupon the House stood in silence for one minute.]

FINANCE

THE BUDGET—DESCRIPTION GIVEN BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the acting Prime Minister. He will know that the Solicitor General has publicly described the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance as being a "political disaster" and "seriously flawed". Will the acting Prime Minister tell us whether the Solicitor General will be resigning or whether the Minister of Finance will be resigning?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I must thank the right hon. Leader of the Opposition for bringing me back into the limelight after the obscurity of the last several weeks.

Mr. Nielsen: You are still obscure.

Mr. Nowlan: It was well deserved obscurity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The fact of the matter is that there is absolutely no reason in present circumstances for the Solicitor General to resign.

Mr. Nielsen: You can.

Mr. MacEachen: As for myself, I am sure the Canadian people would find it very unacceptable if I tendered my resignation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Yesterday was St. Patrick's Day.

Mr. Clark: That is a matter on which the people of Canada would be delighted to be heard, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ECONOMY

POSITION OF NEW ENTRANTS INTO LABOUR FORCE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, might I now deal with the budget of the Minister of Finance? The minister accepts the description of his colleague that it is a seriously flawed budget—he must, or he would have insisted on his colleague's resignation.

The minister will know that there are now 169,000 fewer jobs in Canada than there were a year ago, that is, people who held jobs and who have lost them. The minister will also know that normally in a year some 300,000 people enter the labour force for the first time, women, students and others. Therefore, will the Minister of Finance tell us what he intends to do to ensure that these new entrants into the labour force, people who want to find jobs and build security for themselves, will find jobs in an economy that is already rushing backwards?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is quite right in pointing to the difficulties presently being experienced in the economy. There is a very high rate of unemployment, and weakness in the economy's output. I believe the surest way to create jobs and resume growth is to provide the basis for a sustained recovery in the economy, which is the purpose of the posture we have adopted in the way of an anti-inflationary stance in order to create the conditions for growth and greater job development in the economy.

In the meantime, in order to help as much as we can within the over-all fiscal framework, we have established very substantial job-creation programs. Just last week the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced additional funding for training, particularly among the youth of the country, and advanced additional sums for summer employment of students. These are the specific steps we think most appropriate in the present circumstances to meet the problem of unemployment.

INQUIRY RESPECTING POSSIBLE CHANGES IN BUDGET

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has advanced the program to where it was last year. He is training people for jobs which will not exist because this government has brought in a budget which is driving investment and jobs out of the country, and depriving Canadians of the opportunity to build a future in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Now, this budget, which is described by his colleagues as seriously flawed, has already been changed in several instances by the minister. Will he tell us whether it is his intention to announce any other changes in the budget?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have said repeatedly in the House of Commons that I would be listening to representations from interested groups—

Mr. Broadbent: Ask the Solicitor General.

Mr. MacEachen: —and obviously when the bills are before the House we will be giving them a searching examination, and if improvements or changes are justified I have assured hon. members that I will be listening very carefully and will be prepared to make those changes. I have no changes in mind at the present time, but if, before that process takes place, particular changes are necessary, then of course I will make them.

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition knows that on December 18, in response to public representations, I did make considerable changes which were justified, and I make no apology for those steps because it has always been the duty of the Minister of Finance to make changes following a budget—

Mr. Nielsen: He usually resigns, too.

Mr. MacEachen: —and I do not propose to change that practice.

REQUEST FOR PROGRAM TO STIMULATE JOB CREATION

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Finance. The minister is well aware of the startling fact that over a quarter of a million manufacturing jobs have been lost in the last six months alone. The minister must also know, Madam Speaker, that this has had a devastating impact on working people and their families right across this country. Representations have been made to the minister from the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and hundreds of other local and regional associations, all of them protesting the policies of this government, particularly in relation to their impact on the economy. They all want to know the answer to this question: when will the government begin a program of stimulating job creation in the manufacturing sector of this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am rather interested to see the newly discovered interest of the opposition in the unemployed. They have been off the job for the past three weeks—

• (1430)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —and they totally forgot about the unemployed. I am not very much impressed with their new-found interest expressed today.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

EFFECT OF BUDGET ON EMPLOYEE HEALTH BENEFITS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Perhaps, Madam Speaker, the minister may find some new-found interest in another matter.

An hon. Member: Crombie for leader!

Mr. Crombie: The minister may recall that unemployed and employed people in this country will be hurt by the government's plan to tax health and dental benefits for working people. The minister informed the House some time ago that he was studying representations from the Canadian Life Association, the Canadian Labour Congress and others. I have asked the minister on two previous occasions when he was going to make an announcement about changing those things.

An hon. Member: Question!

Mr. Crombie: This is a serious matter, Madam Speaker. It is urgent and important because it affects the health and dental benefits of more than one million Canadian families. They want to know, and we all want to know, when the government will finally make those announcements, make those changes and protect those benefits. Laugh that one off!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member tells me that these matters are urgent and important.

Mr. Crombie: Three times we asked you.

Mr. MacEachen: Were they urgent and important to the hon. member, as he stayed out of the House for two weeks—three weeks?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Why do you not do something today?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No answer to the question.

THE ECONOMY

PLIGHT OF THE UNEMPLOYED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Finance. Since Parliament last sat to do its job, we have learned that the economy of this country is in its deepest decline since the 1930s. Just last week we learned that the largest number of unemployed ever recorded by Statistics Canada exists. We learned that the economy is operating at only 75 per cent capacity.

I would like to ask the minister, during the more than two weeks of absence of Parliament, how many unemployed workers did he talk to? How many people with mortgages up for renewal did he speak with?

Miss MacDonald: In his penthouse!

Mr. Broadbent: How many small businessmen who have gone bankrupt did he talk to? Is the Government of Canada now prepared to take some action to protect these Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: He just laughs!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks me how many unemployed workers I have spoken to since the House was last in session on March 2. I want to tell the hon. member that I have spoken to a good number of unemployed workers because I have been in my own constituency where there is a very high level of unemployment, and where I have discussed the policies which are currently being followed by the government in order to bring the economy out of a recession and in order to create the basis for sustained growth in the future.

Mr. Huntington: Come on out to mine and tell them.

Mr. MacEachen: No one knows better than I do the impact of unemployment because I have talked to those workers. However, I think it would be a mistake for me to go to my own constituents, some of whom are unemployed, to tell them that there are magic solutions, because they do not believe that. They are not taken in by the soothsaying of the leader of the New Democratic Party. I want to tell him that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I want to say to the minister that the unemployed workers in his riding understand the impact of unemployment a little better than he does, contrary to what he would like to suggest.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: However, we also learned during the past week that, for the first time since the Government of Canada has been making figures available, we have had a net decline in the number of jobs available, year over year, specifically in February when 162,000 fewer jobs were available to Canadians. Considering the fact that the minister, both in this House and in his speech in New York, made it very clear that the Government of Canada was exclusively relying on an upturn in the American economy before he anticipated positive effects here, and since only a week ago the Reagan administration itself acknowledged an upturn will not come in the U.S. economy until the end of 1982, how long must the people of Canada wait for the Government of Canada, their government, to take independent action?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it would be a mistake for the Leader of the New Democratic Party to believe that in New York I had stated that our economic problems were exclusively dependent on solutions in the United States. The fact is that we are running very high levels of inflation. Our prices are very high. Our costs are increasing. If we intend to be competitive, if we intend to create conditions in our own country for recovery, and if we intend to participate in the international recovery, then we have to do certain things at home. Those things which are necessary at home have been laid out in the budget. The hon. member knows that unless we can create the conditions for growth in Canada, we will not get anywhere, and we will not get conditions of growth while we have these high prices and high costs.

SOLICITOR GENERAL'S DESCRIPTION OF BUDGET

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): My final question, Madam Speaker, is directed to the Solicitor General. Since the Solicitor General has publicly stated that the fine work of the Minister of Finance, that is to say, the budget, is a political disaster, and also since the Prime Minister stated only a few weeks ago that no one in the cabinet was to make further criticism of the budget unless such criticism was accompanied by a letter of resignation, I would like to ask the Solicitor General if he has had the integrity to follow up his honest criticism of the budget with a letter submitting his resignation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I would like to invite the hon. members opposite to read the letter, or even to read the report of it which is contained in the newspapers. I think that if they do, behind the colourful expressions which have been the subject of—

Mr. Broadbent: Colourful?

Mr. Kaplan: —their questions today, they will find that I supported the budget, that I support the need for restraint at this time, and that I am behind the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: They are your words.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: It is still a disaster.

HOUSING

INQUIRY RESPECTING AMENDMENT OF BILL C-89

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the minister responsible for housing. The Solicitor General, in a letter to the Toronto Real Estate Board, criticized the minister's housing proposals and said the budget was seriously flawed and, from a political point of view, a disaster—that coming on top of the criticisms of two other cabinet colleagues. The latest figures released by CMHC yesterday show that the total number of units built last year under MURBs amounted to 53,900. We can only expect 15,000 units under Bill C-89, notwithstanding the minister's assurances to the contrary. In view of the critical housing shortages, especially in the rental sector, does the minister now intend to bring in amendments to Bill C-89?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am sure that with the holiday period of the House in January during which all hon. members had available time in which to study Bill C-89, and with the further holiday period that the hon. members have enjoyed during the last—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cosgrove: —couple of weeks, the hon. member asking the question would have realized, as I pointed out in answer to his last question in this House before he went on holiday, that this government—

An hon. Member: Be serious!

Mr. Cosgrove: —is showing its priority concern for housing and has allocated $350 million to that end. That will provide not only the 15,000 units of which we have spoken, but an additional opportunity for more. Section 40 of the National Housing Act, for example, was responsible for and made possible the announcement this week by the minister of housing from the province from which the hon. member comes, showing that 130 units of public housing will be built in his province under Section 40. Therefore I am sure that if the hon. member takes into account the continuing programs of CMHC and this government and the initiative of the $350 million, he will find that to be a response which has not been equalled and certainly has not been followed by the provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, the minister may try to mislead the mayors of this country, as he did in a telex on March 12, but he cannot mislead this House. In Bill C-89 there is still only allowance for 15,000 units, and that will not come anywhere near meeting the critical shortage in this country.

I want to ask the minister a simple question arising from what he said about parliamentary holidays. Why did he and his House leader instruct the chairman of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works not to hold a meeting which we agreed to hold on March 4 to deal with Bill C-89, which we thought was so urgent?

• (1440)

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, in response to the hon. member's opening remarks, the people of Canada, I am sure, are not going to be misled by the histrionics of the theatre of the hon. gentleman. They will not be misled by that ploy any longer. They cannot understand, Madam Speaker, when we indicated that there is a potential for 40,000 units of affordable accommodation—whether it is through the regular supply plan, non-profits or Co-ops, that potential is there for housing under that plan and with the jobs which would be created by it—how the hon. member can stand up with such histrionics and avoid the fact that that legislation has been available before this House on notice since November 12 and he still has not been able to read it. He has not bothered to read it. The hon. member still fails to see that this government has committed $350 million, which will provide all of the opportunities for jobs which we set out.

AGRICULTURE

SITUATION FACING YOUNG FARMERS

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I am certain that the Minister of Finance should be well aware of the financial dilemma which many Canadian farmers are facing today, particularly those producers who are in the red meat sector, those farmers who have very little equity in their operation, and particularly the young farmers. In fact, Madam Speaker, the situation is so severe that we have many of our young Canadians in colleges and universities who are assessing the financial status of the Canadian agricultural industry. And even though those young Canadians have family farms to go home to, they are reluctant to make a decision to go home because they fear they will not be able to maintain the family farm which generations have worked so hard to establish. That is not an over-exaggeration; that situation is real; it exists and it is extremely serious. Given that situation, what hope, if any—and, if no hope, what advice—can the minister provide for these young Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as a first step I think the House could pass the farm credit legislation.

FUNDING FOR FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Hon. John Wise (Elgin): Madam Speaker, I am quite convinced that the Minister of Finance does not understand the situation of the agricultural committee. He has just indicated that he is not aware of the status of that bill.

Does the minister know that farm bankruptcies are up 54 per cent from February over February, and they are up some 75 per cent from January over January? Does the minister not realize that the additional $50 million that his budget provided for the Farm Credit Corporation has been spent, that those funds are exhausted? Does the minister realize that the banks are not participating in the Small Business Bond program? The minister some time ago, in answer to a question I put to him in the House, indicated that he wanted the banks to bleed a little bit. The Minister of Agriculture indicated, amongst other things, at a meeting in London, Ontario, that he would have $1 billion to loan to farmers by June 1. That was to the Canadian Farm Survival Committee. The Minister of Agriculture also indicated that the Minister of Finance's budget did not let the banks bleed, but in fact provided a transfusion for the banks.

When will the Minister of Finance grant approval to the Farm Credit Corporation to allow the corporation to increase its borrowing authority, and grant approval for the Farm Credit Corporation to secure money from the private sector, and, furthermore, to introduce the agri-bond concept?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, when decisions are taken on a number of policy questions raised by the hon. member then, of course, they will be announced to the House. I am pleased to know that the provisions that were made in the budget to assist farmers through additional funding and through special rates for farmers in difficulty, have been so relevant and so successful that all the funds have been used up. I remember the opposition telling me that this was really a useless gesture, but it has proved to be very useful indeed. The hon. member has asked for additional funding. If any decision is taken on that point, an announcement will be made.

I want to tell the hon. member he is totally wrong in saying that the banks are not providing any Small Business Bonds. He inferred that the banks were not co-operating. Following a similar question asked in the House some weeks ago, I made an inquiry that was specifically directed to every single bank in the country and found that each bank was still in a position, or most of the banks, because of their tax position, were still in a position to provide these Small Business Bonds which are now available to farmers, as requested by members of the opposition. They have not yet understood or they do not remember how many good things, in response to their representations, have been contained in the budget which they have attempted, uncessfully, to defeat in the House three times.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILES

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the minister has now acknowledged, albeit reluctantly, that the cabinet late last year approved in principle an agreement with the United States, an agreement that includes the testing of Cruise missiles in Canada, a matter he saw fit to keep secret from the parliamentary committee discussing security and disarmament in his statement to the committee a few weeks ago, can the minister tell the House exactly what the agreement contains, and whether it includes other than, further than, Cruise missile testing and whether, as my colleague from Selkirk-Interlake indicated the other day, the United States government is forgiving the cost of R and D for the F-18s purchased by Canada, in exchange for our agreeing to the Cruise and other missile testing?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the agreement to which the hon. member refers is presently under negotiation and that accounts for the fact that I am not able to give details of the agreement now nor was I in a position to present them to the standing committee. I might say that it is not anticipated that they would include the testing of other similar delivery systems. It would probably allow the testing of such things as artillery and helicopters, but in which case it is anticipated that there would be a separate agreement under the framework agreement which would legitimize the testing of a particular weapons system.

I might say, Madam Speaker, in response to the latter part of the hon. member's question, where she asks if we are doing this in return for certain benefits which the United States will confer upon us, we are not doing this for the United States. We are doing this for ourselves and for the alliance to which we belong. I can well understand the hon. member, who leads her party in rejecting the NATO alliance, that she would not be interested in the protection which that alliance gives us in its reliance on nuclear weapons. That is not the position of this government and the testing of these weapons systems is in the interest of our own defence.

REQUEST THAT AGREEMENT BE TABLED

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, why does the minister make those statements when he knows perfectly well at least two members of the NATO alliance in Europe have refused to have the Cruise missiles and the Pershing IIs situated on their soil? At least they have the guts to say that they believe in nuclear suffocation, which is supposed to be the strategy of this government. So much for the Prime Minister's strategy of suffocation. That brings me to my supplementary, as to whether if, in fact, there will have to be future agreements for future testing of future weapons systems. Why can we not see in this Parliament the present agreement that has been drawn up—the minister has not denied it—to cover Cruise missile testing?

Therefore I ask the minister to give us no more of this other garbage which he has been giving us. Will he present and table in the House the agreement in principle that has been drawn up, and the specific agreement concerning Cruise missile testing? Will he return to the committee discussing our preparation for the UN special session on disarmament and explain to the Canadian public, through that committee, why the government of this country is abrogating the spirit, if not the letter, of its strategy of nuclear suffocation?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes or no.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, as I previously explained to the hon. member, the agreement is in the process of negotiation. When the agreement is completed I will certainly consider making it available to the House. I see no reason why it should be kept a secret.

Miss Jewett: You have been keeping it secret for two years.

Mr. MacGuigan: I can assure the hon. member that I will be before the parliamentary committee again in the ordinary course and I will certainly be pleased to answer questions on the subject.

I am sorry that she has such a misunderstanding of the policy of suffocation. This is a policy of mutual restraint. It is not a policy of unilateral disarmament which I am sure would please the hon. member. While the hon. member may advocate the policies of unilateral disarmament, that is not the policy of the government. The government policy is one of mutual restraint. In fact we believe that the maintenance of our deterrent is in itself the best bargaining counter that we can have in the negotiations for arms limitations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

CRITERIA FOR LOANS

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As the minister is, I am sure, painfully aware, the number of bankruptcies and receiverships, and the number of Canadians who are just closing their doors on their businesses reached unprecedented heights in February, thus contributing to massive unemployment. At the same time the Federal Business Development Bank for the last year has imposed criteria which are much more severe than even the criteria imposed by the chartered banks. As a vivid illustration of this, during the last nine months of 1981 in Cambridge, with a population of 75,000, there has been one loan for $30,000. Does the bank have any useful function any longer, or is this just another illustration of this government turning the screws on the small business community when times get tough?

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I feel that the hon. member could have asked his question in an entirely different forum, but I should be very happy to look into the situation in Cambridge personally with the authorities of the Federal Business Development Bank. However, his conclusion that the Federal Business Development Bank is an institution whose trade practices are more restrictive than those of the chartered banks is a gross misrepresentation of the facts. When we know—and the House does know since these figures are public—that last year, the Federal Business Development Bank lost $41 million and that prospects are more or less the same for the current year, it is clear that the bank is losing money on its loans, Madam Speaker, and is doing so at a rate of 2.6 per cent, compared with 1.2 per cent for chartered banks. The Federal Business Development Bank is therefore not only useful to businesses as a lender of last resort, but it is also helping the economy, since more than $500 million worth of loans are being made by this institution to Canada's small businesses.

[English]

REQUEST THAT CRITERIA BE RELAXED

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, just as the Liberal government has cut the guts out of the small business development aspect of the bond, it has cut the guts out of the development aspect of the bank.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speyer: For my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance, I plead with the minister in these times when we have punishing interest rates, a deepening recession, and 1.2 million people unemployed, to loosen the restrictive criteria of the Federal Business Development Bank so that more small businessmen and women in this country can obtain loans.

[Translation]

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I do not think that the criteria governing the practices of the Federal Business Development Bank were instigated by the government. Legislation was passed by this House in 1976, and indeed the terms of reference within which the Federal Business Development Bank must operate do not give it much leeway, because under the 1976 legislation, the bank is required to operate on a cost recovery basis, and at the same time, it is asked to take more risks. In recent years, that is, since the 1976 legislation was passed, the Federal Business Development Bank has acted on Parliament's request that it take more risks, and that is why, unfortunately or fortunately, the bank is now suffering considerable losses, which I hope will at least benefit Canada's small businesses.

MINES AND MINING

UNEMPLOYMENT IN TRAIL AND KIMBERLEY, B.C.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question was intended for the Minister of State for Mines but in her absence I will direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. We now have an inventory of over 16,000 jobs lost in the Canadian mining sector on either a temporary or permanent basis.

The announced summer shutdown of the Cominco mines and the smelter at Trail will put more than 7,000 workers on the unemployment roles in Trail and Kimberley, British Columbia, for the first time in history. This calamitous state of affairs cannot just be blamed on international conditions. Industry experts agree that the collapse of our minerals industry is largely aggravated by a loss of confidence in the Canadian economy due to the anti-business thrust of the National Energy Program and the November 12 budget. What do the minister and his sidekick, the Minister of Finance, propose to do about this tragic situation?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the production from those mines and the Canadian mining sector is distributed worldwide. The hon. member does not seem to be aware that in the last year the world has been facing a worldwide recession and that prices of raw mineral resources have doubled in all sectors around the world. Canada is not immune to that situation. We are facing the same situation as most other countries which have large mineral activities at the present time.

The only real hope is for a turn-around in the world economy, particularly in the western economies. Once this happens there will be a rise in demand. At the present time the demand for raw resources is considerably down around the world.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, that is just an outright copout. The serious crisis of confidence in this country in our economy reflects the need for a national vote of confidence in this incompetent Liberal government.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I suspect that my hon. friend did not have much to do in the last three weeks to come up with a second question like that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EMPLOYMENT

ALLOCATION OF JOB-CREATION FUNDS TO VANCOUVER RIDINGS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question was to be addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who has not seen fit to stay in the House for question period on the first day that the House has resumed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is your fault. You started it.

Miss Carney: I will ask my question of the acting minister. The minister should be aware that British Columbia has been hit by a record number of lay-offs. Unemployment is plaguing all sectors of the economy. Last December the minister designated my riding of Vancouver centre as a "lay-off" constituency and allocated extra funds to it under the Canada Community Development Program. A few weeks later this funding was abruptly withdrawn, with no explanation, and the same thing has happened to other Vancouver area ridings.

Given this record unemployment in British Columbia, why did the minister and his department withdraw these job-creation funds from the Vancouver ridings, and is the money which was allocated to Vancouver being used to help fund the additional $20 million for the Summer Canada program?

QUALIFYING FACTORS APPLICABLE TO PROVISION OF FUNDS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, since there is no one on the government side of the House who is prepared to speak on an issue of record unemployment in Vancouver and in the province of British Columbia, I will direct my supplementary question to any minister who cares to answer it. Since record unemployment is apparently not a qualifying factor for job-creating funds, what is?

Mr. Nielsen: There is no answer.

Mr. Crosbie: Wake up!

• (1500)

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. I will definitely take notice of her question and reply to her tomorrow.

Oral Questions

CRIMINAL CODE

REFERRAL OF SUBJECT OF PROSTITUTION TO PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General while he is still the acting Minister of Justice. Last Monday the National Action Committee on the Status of Women urged the government to move quickly to pass, with the needed amendments, Bill C-53, the long overdue legislation overhauling Canada's archaic and ineffective rape laws. At the same time many residents of Canadian cities, including particularly those in the west end of Vancouver, want effective action to deal with the problem of street prostitution in residential neighbourhoods.

Is the government prepared to accommodate both of these important objectives by making an early reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that it can set up a special subcommittee dealing with all aspects of prostitution? Such a committee could then sit at the same time as the full Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is dealing with the sexual offences legislation.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I attended that meeting of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and spoke to the representatives on that subject. I reminded them on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of Justice, that the establishment of a special subcommittee on that subject would not be necessary in view of his suggestion that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs consider that issue at the same time as it was dealing with the provisions contained in Bill C-53. The government would very much welcome full consideration by members of the committee of the problem of street prostitution, and the minister responsible suggested that the proper place for it could well be that meeting and those meetings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the minister is trying to work both sides of the street on this question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HARASSMENT OF INNOCENT WOMEN

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, as the minister knows, many organizations and individuals, including Mayor Mike Harcourt of Vancouver, national women's organizations, and chiefs of police, have demanded that the government put an end to the double standard which now exists in our prostitution laws whereby a "John" who harasses an innocent woman for purposes of prostitution cannot be prosecuted. Will the minister at least assure the House that his government will move quickly to put an end to this blatant discrimination against women and change the law to allow the harassing customer—the "John"—to be charged under the same circumstances as a prostitute is now being charged?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the government cannot move any more quickly on this matter than the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs does. Because of the work stoppage in the House there were no meetings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Kempling: We were there.

Miss MacDonald: Where were you?

Mr. Kaplan: Hon. members should not be seeking to evade the responsibility which the minister has suggested ought to be that of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to look at these questions and to try to come to some sensible conclusions about them.

EMPLOYMENT

SUMMER STUDENT EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Since August of last year 216,000 jobs have been lost in the Canadian economy. Of those jobs 138,000 jobs were lost by young people in the 15 to 24 age group. Given that young people are bearing the lion's share of this recession, how does the minister justify the fact that only 53,000 students will be employed this summer under the summer student employment program whereas two summers ago, when the situation was much less serious, some 70,000 students benefited?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration I welcome the question, and I want to bring to the attention of the hon. member the particular training programs which have been announced by the minister lately. If the hon. member will show a little patience he will also hear subsequent announcements in relation to summer employment and other summer undertakings which will be helpful to students.

Mr. Thacker: Madam Speaker, we know last year $120 million was provided. This year an additional $20 million has been provided. There has been a bit of public response. The government has kicked in another $20 million to bring the figure up to last year's level. There has been a total lack of consideration for the young people of this country.

REPAYMENT OF STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Secretary of State. A good many of these 138,000 former students who have lost jobs are in the process of paying back Canada students loans, and interest on those loans is now being charged at the current rate. What is the minister doing to see that those students do not have judgments entered against them, which could ruin their credit ratings for the rest of their lives?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will be aware that if a former student becomes unemployed because of conditions beyond his control, it is always possible for him to pass on that information and indicate his circumstances, and he will find that every effort will be made to accommodate his particular problem in relation to a payment schedule.

EMERGENCY MEASURES

PLANNING FOR CIVILIAN INTERNMENT CAMPS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General, while he is still Solicitor General. Under the emergency planning order passed in secret by the cabinet in May of 1981, the Solicitor General was given the responsibility of planning for civilian internment camps in this country. I have asked him this question in the House before. How many camps is he planning for, and what is the planned location of these camps?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, to characterize the emergency planning order as having been passed in secret is, I think, totally unjustified. It was passed in the same way any other order is passed.

Miss MacDonald: In secret.

Mr. Kaplan: It was published in the same way any other order is published. It is an attempt by the government to assign to ministers responsibility to prepare contingency plans for our country in the event of war or in the event of peacetime emergencies.

I cannot answer those specific questions, but I can assure the hon. member that as yet no work has been done in the area of making plans, and I would like very much to invite the hon. member to comment and make suggestions on whether this country wants its government to plan for emergencies of this sort and indicate whether hon. members opposite are prepared to make contributions of ideas and policies.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, this was an order in council passed ten months ago, and it required the Solicitor General to do something. He is now telling us he has not done it. One wonders why the order in council was passed.

INQUIRY RESPECTING PROPOSED NUMBER OF INMATES

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is about over-all planning. What is the maximum total number of inmates for these civilian internment camps for which the minister is planning?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, the hon. member refers to the emergency planning order's having been passed recently. I would like to remind him that this emergency order passed recently is nothing more than a renewal of an emergency planning order which was first passed in 1965 under the Conservative administration.

Mr. Crouse: No.

Mr. Hees: We were not in power then.

Mr. Kaplan: I have asked for the plans which were begun by the Conservative government when that emergency order was first put into effect. There are none. I have asked for the plans which were prepared by my hon. friend when he was the solicitor general of Canada. There are none. I can understand why there are none because very difficult questions of balancing public order and civil liberties arise, and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which hopefully will become law in this country shortly, will have a tremendous bearing on any emergency planning done by the government.

I can only assure the hon. member that no such plans have been made, and I invite him to make a positive contribution to dealing with and preparing to deal with wartime emergencies which might arise in the future in this country.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFLECTIONS ON RECENT EVENTS

Madam Speaker: I hope the House will bear with me if I share with hon. members some reflections on recent events. There is no need to recall that for more than two weeks, the bells rang to call in the members, and since the House had not adjourned, the Speaker's chair had to be occupied around the clock. I want to thank all those who went beyond the call of duty, and especially my assistants who worked long hours in order to provide a minimum of services to the House.

Well-informed parliamentarians will have understood that the rules of the House had to be observed, but I am not so sure that the public understood our insistence on tradition. What ensued from our failure to bring our rules up to date earned us shrugs and even sneers from our fellow citizens. We may even have strengthened an unfortunately widespread tendency to be skeptical of the actions of Parliament, and I was very concerned about this during the past two weeks. More than once, I considered the possibility of intervening in order to end the deadlock. If common sense and logic dictated that an arbiter should be called in, that arbiter would have to be the Speaker. After all, it is the Speaker's responsibility to ensure that Parliament can function.

I admit that I was often tempted to respond to appeals, first by some hon. members, then by the press and even by the public, that I should write history and create the precedent that would resolve the situation. However, it seemed to me that any action on my part would be incompatible with my concept of the responsibility of the Speaker to the House. In support of this view I would like to quote Josef Redlich, an expert on parliamentary procedure, who said:

● (1510)

[English]

The modern president of the House of Commons, . . . is a judge who has to apply the rules of procedure to the best of his ability and with perfect impartiality, maintaining with a firm yet sensitive hand the proper relations between the two parties to the proceedings before him, the majority and the minority; he must do so by maintaining the rules and the usage of centuries, and by taking care that both majority and minority are unimpeded in their use of the forces and the weapons which the order of business provides for strong and weak.

[Translation]

I was therefore faced with duties and responsibilities that seemed to be at odds in most respects. References have been made here and there, and mostly in the press, to precedents that had no bearing on the present situation. First the situation in 1961, when one of my predecessors, Mr. Michener, did not let the bells ring for even as long as an hour before he sent a message to the whips ordering them to enter the House for a division. There was no parliamentary crisis, it would seem. There is no reference in Hansard that sheds any light on the circumstances of the incident, and no one, not even Mr. Michener, can remember why the whips were late. Upon receiving the Speaker's message, they entered the House, and no questions were raised by any one. Who can tell whether this precedent, if it is one, is valid? What would my predecessor have done if the whips had refused to come and vote?

Another important precedent has been cited this time, from the British House of Commons. It relates to the occasion when Mr. Speaker Brand terminated a debate on his own initiative after it had continued for 41½ hours. It took place at a time when the Irish Nationalists had some 60 members. There were then no time limits on debate and the use of closure was unknown. The Irish Nationalists had employed obstructive tactics over a long period designed to bring the process of government to a standstill. The Speaker put the question, but only after consultation with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition and with their joint support. I could not see that similar circumstances existed in Canada in 1982 and, therefore, felt the intervention of the Speaker could not be justified.

What would have been the consequences of an arbitrary decision that did not derive from any of the rules approved by this House nor from a precedent with any relevance to the present situation? It would have meant breaking with an age-old practice that has proved its worth. How can the Speaker make sure that all members available to take part in the division are in the house? Is it the responsibility of the Chair or the whips? What would prevent the Speaker from setting the time of the division in other circumstances? The Chair would have set a precedent that might create even greater confusion in the case of a minority government.

[English]

In any event, such action on my part would have been open to allegations of partiality. Clearly, the Speaker must at all times be impartial. If, for example, the Chair had sacrified itself in order to get the House back to work, would this have saved the House? And in the circumstances, would the House have agreed with the new precedent that I would have created? It was a question I had to ask myself.

The authority of the Chair is no greater than the House wants it to be. When the rules are clear and offer precise guidance to the Speaker, the authority of the Chair is absolute and unquestioned, for this is the will of the House. On the other hand, when there are no rules to fall back on, the Speaker must proceed very cautiously indeed. The most the Chair can do is to lay the matter before the House which can then itself create a new precedent. Again I quote Josef Redlich:

It is no part of (the Speaker's) office to consider how he may use his power to devise new reins or bridle for the House. The guiding principle is that the Speaker is not the master of the House, but its representative . . . He must always be sure . . . in making any change of practice, that he is in accord——with the average opinion of the House. . . . And . . . when precedents are not conclusive, the Speaker is to lay the matter before the House for decision.

Here I refer to the precedent in Great Britain.

If the last ten days have taught us anything, it is that we must review our parliamentary procedure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: The Speaker is the guardian of the rules of the House. He does not invent them. It is up to the House to decide what changes are necessary. I merely point out that there is a problem. In the meantime, the Chair will continue to be vulnerable until the House provides it with guidelines which would lead to settled practices regarding those very difficult and highly controversial questions, where the rules and practices appear to be less than satisfactory.

If the indefinite delaying of a division is to be taken as a new precedent, it could be used again to oppose indefinitely any business that happens to be before the House. In addition, it is a tactic that could also be used by the majority if it suited their purpose. I question whether it is the will of the House that such a precedent should become enshrined in our practices. The rules by implication assume that the procedure of voting will be completed when members are called in. Today, we all know that the procedure must be spelled out more clearly, since the House cannot function satisfactorily while debate may be interrupted indefinitely by any of the parties. I say this in no sense of criticism but as a statement of fact. I may point out that obstructive tactics are allowed by the rules. However, their use must be regulated so as to safeguard the government's right to have the House consider its order of business and the equally important right of the opposition to criticize, oppose and even obstruct a government measure.

Again, I quote Redlich:

Protection of a majority against obstruction and protection of a minority against oppression are both alike functions of the Chair. It is hardly too much to say that they exhaust the duties of the high office held by the impartial guardian of parliamentary law—

It is my hope that such a situation will never again occur in this House. However, should it occur again, the Chair, unless it is provided with firm guidelines, would need to consider its course of action with very great care under the new circumstances. I trust that in the overriding interests of this honourable institution, the House will take steps to make known its will as to how the Chair should act before any such situation occurs again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REFLECTIONS ON RECENT EVENTS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, your statement just a moment ago takes us on this side totally by surprise. I should like to take the opportunity between now and tomorrow to read carefully the remarks which you have made and perhaps exercise my right of response on behalf of the opposition tomorrow.

Madam Speaker: I would very much like hon. members to take my statement as it is made, and I would ask them not to comment on the statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: I think hon. members will understand that the Chair could take that liberty, and I asked the indulgence of the House to make that statement. In the course of the debate which will take place today, I am sure hon. members can make their opinions known about the general things that I have treated in my statement, namely that parliamentary reform is, of course, clearly needed in the House; I think hon. members are intending to discuss precisely that topic.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I had no idea that that kind of statement would be made today. Bearing directly as it does on the events of the last two weeks, and ranging as broadly as it did, I want to examine it very carefully indeed. I may not wish to reply tomorrow, but it may well be that I will have to request the indulgence of the Chair and of the House to exercise that right of reply.

On government business, it is not my intention, in view of the discussions which are now under way between House leaders, to ask the normal Thursday question. I will defer it until tomorrow.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HERBERT—MOTION FOR PAPERS NO. 85—ALLEGED NON-COMPLIANCE WITH HOUSE ORDER

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I choose to raise this matter on a point of order rather than on a question of privilege. I have given you notice because it includes privilege and, as such, you require notice and that I raise the matter at the earliest opportunity.

It deals with Motion No. 85 which was answered in the House on February 24. Because the motion was accepted by the House, it was in my opinion an order of the House. I am suggesting—and I did so in my letter to Madam Speaker—that the documents which the House ordered be produced were not in fact produced in their entirety. Rather than going at length into my argument as a question of privilege, I should like to bring it to the attention of Madam Speaker as a point of order. I should like your investigation, and possibly at some later suitable time we can discuss whether in fact the order of the House has in fact been complied with.

Madam Speaker: I think I can comply with that request. I will investigate the matter and perhaps I can take it up with the hon. member later or at another time in the House.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKINNON—NOTICE OF QUESTION TO BE RAISED

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I rise to give notice of a question of privilege. I had hoped the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) would be here at this time. I have just discovered that the minutes of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence have been altered in five places at the request of his staff.

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member may send me notice that he wants to raise a question of privilege. He need not do it in the House. I will accept a written statement by the hon. member, but he need not give notice in the House.

Mr. McKinnon: I will do so at the first opportunity.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Question No. 2,446—Mr. Flis:

1. Does the Canadian Film Development Corporation export films?

2. For each year 1977 to 1980, what was the number and total net profit of films (a) sold domestically (b) exported to the United States (c) exported to other countries?

3. Were attempts made by the corporation to become self-sustaining and, if so, what were they?

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Film Development Corporation as follows:

1. The CFDC does not export films directly. Rather, it helps the industry to develop its own capacity to market its product. To that end, the corporation participates in foreign festivals and film markets, promoting awareness of Canadian productions and assisting Canadian producers in contacting foreign sales agents and distributors. In accordance with section 10(1)(c) of its act, the corporation provides financial assistance to Canadian distribution companies for the distribution and marketing of Canadian certified feature films. Under a program established in 1981, CFDC's assistance to distribution in Canada consists of short-term loans and investments to be used in the theatrical launch of a Canadian film in the Canadian market by a Canadian distributor.

2. As the CFDC itself does not export films, the corporation has only recently begun to gather information from independent Canadian producers on the success of Canadian films in theatrical distribution in Canada and in the United States. This information is based on gross box office receipts and does not include television sales. Prior to 1978-79, the corporation's records contain information concerning only Canadian theatrical distribution of productions in which it had invested.

(a) and (b) Based on information available to the CFDC,

	Number of new Canadian feature films released for theatrical distribution in Canada		Gross theatrical revenues in $000s
	Total	Number produced with CFDC participation	Canada	U.S.A.
1980-81	27	18	12,000	46,000*
1979-80	16	9	10,000	45,000
1978-79	16	11	6,500	N/A
1976-77	"	21	4,800	"

*Note: 15 new Canadian feature films were licensed for theatrical distribution in the United States in 1980-81. Data on the number of new productions licensed in previous years is not available.

(c) Information is not available from the CFDC.

3. The corporation was established by Parliament in 1967 with a mandate to foster and promote the development of a feature film industry in Canada. The act does not specify that the corporation is to be self-sustaining. In keeping with its mandate, the corporation employs its parliamentary appropriation, together with all revenues earned from its investments in and financing of Canadian films, to stimulate growth within the private sector of Canada's industry, by aiding in the production and distribution of feature films which are increasingly a reflection of Canadian identity.

The corporation earned $385,000 in revenues from its investments in 1980-81, down from $627,770 in 1979-80: this reflects the CFDC's continuing practice of investing in productions of cultural significance, nationally or on a more regional basis, which are less likely to achieve commercial success and provide a return to the corporation, as well as providing loans for production.

FUNDING FOR P.E.I. FIRMS

Question No. 2,479—Mr. Herbert:

1. In each of the past five years, how many firms in Prince Edward Island were funded by the government to provide additional jobs and how many of the companies were (a) foreign owned (b) Canadian owned with head offices in (i) Prince Edward Island (ii) the rest of Canada?

2. How many of the companies are no longer in business and what amount was provided to the companies?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as follows:

In so far as the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission is concerned:

1. TELEPHONE SWITCHBOARD EQUIPMENT

Question No. 3,067—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Department of Communications aware that telephone operators keep interrupting incoming long-distance telephone calls by Members of Parliament to their offices at periodic intervals, that members are often disconnected and that the excuse offered by the operators is that the equipment is so outdated that they are instructed to listen on the line to determine whether it is still in use because automatic disconnecting does not occur?

2. Does the government intend to take measures to update the system and, if so (a) what measures (b) on what date will this be done?

3. Have there been discussions with Bell Canada on the subject and (a) if so, what are all the details (b) if not, for what reason?

4. Does the government consider such interruptions an invasion of privacy?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows:

1. Yes, the Department of Communications is aware that the type of equipment presently in use at the government switchboard does not provide automatic disconnect. Accordingly operating procedures have been established to test the line under certain conditions to confirm if the call has been terminated. The cord-type switchboard operations and the present central office equipment are the principle factors causing sporadic disconnects.

2. Yes, the Government Telecommunications Agency has taken measures to update the system with the introduction of a system based on new technology by mid-1983. The existing switchboard will be totally replaced with modern equipment which will eliminate the above-mentioned problem.

3. Yes, a joint GTA/Bell Canada task group was established in October, 1980, to plan and implement a system to replace the existing networks with new, state-of-the-art technology which will provide for improved service, new system features and increased reliability. The objective is to convert to a new digital multiplex system by mid-1983.

4. When Parliament in 1974 enacted Part IV 1 of the Criminal Code on invasion of privacy, it recognized the need to exempt from the purview of the law interruptions caused by operator tests performed out of operational necessity. Such interruptions are not therefore considered an invasion of privacy.

"LETTER FROM CONCERNED CANADIANS"

Question No. 3,451—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the government aware of the communication headed "Letter from Concerned Canadians" signed by the retired RCMP officers W. F. Johnstone, J. W. Duggan, W. L. Maguire, F. Bodnaruk, P. Starek, J. E. G. Bouchard and D. B. Ingam and also signed by A.L. Bewley, a retired British Columbia provincial court judge?

2. Is the government prepared to answer the numerous allegations contained in the letter and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

3. Did the letter contain the statement (a) "During the October crisis, perhaps before or after, how many lives of how many politicians targeted by the FLQ were saved? The security force of the RCMP knows. Ottawa knows." (b) "Canadians will not allow a cherished tradition to be eradicated and replaced by a civilian effort of unknown character, experience or political affiliation." and, if so, what was the government policy or reaction to the statement?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. Yes.

2. No, the government is not prepared to answer the allegations contained in the letter. However, the Solicitor General did reply on December 17, 1981 and rejected the major themes identified therein. The specific questions asked relate directly or indirectly to issues now before the courts in the province of Quebec, and for that reason, the government feels it would be inappropriate to comment further.

3. Yes, the letter contained those statements. (a) The government is not in a position to say in this context what may or may not have occurred if history had taken a different course. (b) It would seem that this statement is a reference to the RCMP security service being replaced by a civilian security service. The government has indeed taken that decision. This change has been recommended now by two substantial royal commissions, more than a decade apart, which studied the question. I can assure you, however, that there was no intention on the part of the government, in taking that advice, to eradicate a cherished tradition, nor has a cherished tradition been eradicated. The presence of the RCMP throughout Canada remains and will remain after the establishment of a separate security service. I can also assure you that the government intends that the new security service will be subject to the provisions of legislation that will be brought before this House in due course.

CANADIAN WINES

Question No. 3,452—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 3,191 which stated in part that there are "constraints of quality . . . " with regard to the serving of Canadian wines by the Department of External Affairs, what were the names of all persons connected with the department who made any judgment that the quality of Canadian wines was not sufficiently high enough for them to be used on certain occasions?

2. Is the government aware that in recent "blind" taste tests Canadian wines were selected by experts in most cases ahead of similar foreign products?

3. Will the government embark on a program to insist that only Canadian wine and other beverages be served to all foreign service establishments as well as at Department of External Affairs functions held in Canada?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. In his capacity as Honourary President of the North Atlantic Council, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, hosted in December, 1981, a dinner for foreign ministers of NATO countries. Canadian wine was served at this dinner. The Department of External Affairs regularly serves Canadian wines at luncheons, dinners and receptions for foreign guests. A wine committee, formed of senior officials from the department and other agencies, reviews this question periodically.

2. The government is aware and seeks to use Canadian products as often as possible.

3. A joint press release was recently issued by the ministers of Agriculture and External Affairs in this regard. Co-operation between the Department of External Affairs, Mr. Whelan's office and the Canadian Wine Institute will result in worthy Canadian wines being selected for use at official functions in Canadian diplomatic missions.

2. Was this base station returned to the House of Commons or elsewhere and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, does the RCMP listen in on conversations between the officers of the Protective Staff on Parliament Hill?

STUDIES IN TROPICAL MEDICINE

Question No. 3,510—Mr. Halliday:

1. Do any employees of the Department of National Health and Welfare possess diplomas or certificates in tropical medicine and, if so, how many?

2. Is there a requirement or an opportunity for such employees to take periodic refresher courses and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes. Seven employees of the Department of National Health and Welfare possess diplomas or certificates in tropical medicine.

2. There is no requirement for such employees to take periodic refresher courses. However there are opportunities to do so. UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Question No. 3,673—Mr. Herbert:

1. On the last date for which the information is available, by province, what is the average time that persons without employment were receiving unemployment insurance benefits?

2. In 1981, how many persons received unemployment insurance payments for their maximum entitlement period?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. The following is the average time (weeks) that persons without employment were receiving unemployment insurance benefits as of December 1981:

Newfoundland	25.2
Prince Edward Island	24.0
Nova Scotia	21.6
New Brunswick	24.3
Quebec	21.4
Ontario	15.8
Manitoba	16.6
Saskatchewan	14.5
Alberta	11.0
British Columbia	14.7
Yukon	19.0
Northwest Territories	16.2
Outside Canada	17.2
Canada	18.5

2. The number of persons who received unemployment insurance payments in 1981, for their maximum entitlement period amounted to 443,370.

RECEIPTS OF MONEYS BY LAID-OFF EMPLOYEES

Question No. 3,686—Mr. Herbert:

1. On what basis can a laid-off employee continue to receive remuneration from the previous employer and also be eligible to draw unemployment benefits?

2. Can the payment of accumulated holiday and sickness benefits to a laid-off worker be deferred indefinitely or, alternatively, paid over a long period of time, so as to ensure eligibility for unemployment insurance payments?

3. Can a lump sum severance payment be allocated and paid on a weekly basis, so as to ensure eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. A laid-off employee who continues to receive remuneration from the previous employer would not be eligible to receive unemployment insurance benefits.

2. Most provinces require that accumulated holiday benefits be paid to laid-off employees at the time of termination of employment. Accordingly, the question of deferred payments, or payments extended over a long period of time generally does not arise.

There may be situations, however, where accumulated holiday pay is not payable until a time subsequent to the layoff. (For example, when it is payable at a fixed time every year under a collective agreement and there is no vacation period involved). If the claimant happens to be unemployed when it is received, the accumulated holiday pay is allocated from the week that it was actually paid. On the other hand, if the accumulated holiday benefits are paid or payable only after the claimant has exhausted his unemployment insurance benefits, then such a payment will have no effect on that person's past entitlement to benefits.

As for accumulated sickness benefits, these are not considered earnings for unemployment insurance purposes, and therefore will not affect a person's eligibility for benefit upon being laid off.

3. A lump sum severance payment can include many types of payments such as vacation pay, accumulated sick leave credits, severance pay and wages in lieu of notice. Some are regarded as earnings and some are not. Severance pay, for example, which is generally a payment from an employer to an employee in recognition of past years of service, is not earnings and would not affect eligibility for unemployment benefits. On the other hand, wages in lieu of notice are earnings that do affect eligibility for benefits.

GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE LINES

Question No. 3,700—Mr. Cossitt:

Does the (a) Unemployment Insurance Commission (b) Department of Employment and Immigration (c) Canada Post Corporation (d) Department of National Defence (e) Department of Transport have access to government telephone lines when calling from Brockville or Prescott, Ontario in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville by calling the telephone number 345-0001 and using a code?

Mr. Jack Masters (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows: Transport Canada is the only department in Brockville or Prescott, Ontario which has a valid call code billed to that location. However, any holder of a valid government of Canada call code billed to another location, who may be in Brockville or Prescott on travel status, has access to the network via telephone number 345-0001.

OHIP PREMIUMS

Question No. 3,888—Mr. Herbert:

In cases where both the husband and the wife are public servants and live in Ontario, does the government contribute to the payment of hospital insurance premiums for both employees?

Mr. Norman Kelly (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): The Ontario Health Insurance Plan (OHIP) monthly premiums are $23 for "single" coverage and $46 for "family" coverage, and the government's current contribution on behalf of its employees toward those premiums is $10 and $20 respectively. Where both husband and wife are federal public servants, it is usual for only one to pay a premium at the "family" rate. However, if for some reason both wish to pay premiums at the "single" rate that is permissible since the total government contribution on their behalf would be the same.

STUDY OF WINTER SHIPPING IN ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Question No. 3,890—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is any investigation, consideration or experimentation taking place under the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority with regard to eventually instituting winter shipping through the seaway?

2. Has a winter shipping study been or will it be carried out and, if so, what are all the details?

3. What is the purpose of the existing boom used to control ice from entering Lake St. Francis?

4. To the knowledge of the government, are Quebec Hydro and American power authorities opposed to the winter shipping concept?

5. What is the government policy with regard to winter shipping in the St. Lawrence Seaway?

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes, in relation to the possible implementation of a 9½-month navigation season.

2. Two studies have been carried out, both primarily cost/benefit-oriented. The report of October, 1978, prepared by L.B.A. Consultants, Limited, concluded that an extension of the navigation season was not cost-beneficial under existing capacity demand conditions; the June, 1981, report prepared by Hickling Partners, Inc., arrived at the same conclusion.

3. The existing boom control is used to alleviate ice management problems during the opening and closing periods of navigation.

4. The hydroelectric power entities are concerned that winter navigation will further restrict the flow capacity of the river's winter regime, reduce power production, and inhibit their ability to comply with the flow regulations of the International Joint Commission.

5. The government policy is to continue to evaluate an extension of the navigation season to 9½ months while at the same time evaluating other options to increase the capacity of the system.

2. Were any possible infractions investigated and, if so, what were the names of the candidates and the results of the investigations where any fault was found?

3. Is there any evidence that one candidate diverted approximately $8,000 from such funds for the purpose of paying personal legal expenses that had nothing to do with the 1980 election or his position as a Member of Parliament?

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Chief Electoral Officer as follows:

1. On the basis of the information provided by all candidates at the 1979 and 1980 general elections the Chief Electoral Officer is satisfied that all funds were turned over in the manner prescribed by law.

2. No alleged violations with respect to candidates at elections having failed to turn over funds as required by the Canada Elections Act came to the attention of the Chief Electoral Officer and consequently no investigations were conducted.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

Madam Speaker: Since there are two motions on the Order Paper for today, it is my duty under Standing Order 58(4)(b) to make a selection. I do so with the knowledge that there are still two allotted days left after today in this supply period. Therefore, I intend today to propose a motion standing in the name of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—PARLIAMENTARY REFORM

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That in the view of this House the future effectiveness of Parliament as a democratic assembly, representing the needs, beliefs and aspirations of the people of Canada, requires that an immediate review of all its rules and practices proceed without further delay, and this House therefore urges the government to refer the document "Position Paper: The Reform of Parliament", tabled on November 23, 1979, to the Standing Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization as a basis for commencing discussion, along with proposals for reforming the budgetary process.

He said: Mr. Speaker, given the tensions that have crystallized since March 2, this is not an easy time for any member of this House to speak calmly to the House of Commons. But I think it is an essential time for us all to speak about the House of Commons. We must do more than speak; we must begin to act on reforms that will make Parliament both more efficient and more democratic. I emphasize both of those goals, the goal of efficiency and the goal of democracy. They are both important and I will come back to the importance of both later.

But first, let us be frank about emotions, both in Parliament and in the country. We talk a lot in Parliament about a sense of collegiality and about good will in this institution, but that pretence has prevented us from facing Parliament's own problems squarely. There is anger in this House. There is frustration here and there is a certainty that we are not doing the job that Canadians expect of us. That state exists among members of all parties on both sides of the House. It is confirmed whenever we go home to the people who sent us here and stand accused of being powerless to do the job that we were sent here to do. One member of this House used the phrase the other day that private Members of Parliament are regarded as—

—poor little parish priests.

[English]

Unhappily, that member is right. We all wear the clothes of authority but only a handful of the members of this House, the central ministers, have any real authority. That, Sir, is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: One of the reasons there was such support in this country for the ringing of the bells is that Canadians know that such centralized authority is wrong and want it changed.

[Translation]

In Le Devoir of March 17, editorial writer Jean-Louis Roy said the following, and I quote:

After the absurdity of federalism without provinces, Canadians have been treated to government without Parliament.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, we have been without a Parliament for quite a long time. No matter which party is in power, our rules and practices allow the government to impose its will on Parliament and to govern by orders in council and by regulations without even consulting Parliament. Worse, the system practically prevents ordinary members from having their own concepts or proposals adopted by Parliament. Private members' motions are seldom passed, and when they are, the reaction is usually one of surprise. Hon. members know cases where some of their constituents are on the verge of bankruptcy. What can they do for these people? Others are in danger of losing their homes. What can they do for them? In every riding in Canada, Canadians are losing their jobs. How can we help them? Many members have good ideas that Parliament would do well to consider. And why not? What it boils down to is that most members can do no more in the House than rise, speak and bow. Is that democracy?

[English]

When the government House leader was first appointed, he indicated his interest in parliamentary reform. I look forward to hearing his proposals today, and I hope he will agree to allow the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to start immediately on a wide-open consideration of the ways we can renew parliamentary democracy in Canada.

We put forward some proposals as a government in a position paper published by the then president of the Privy Council, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Those proposals include a fundamental strengthening of the power of parliamentary committees, including the power to initiate inquiries into questions that the government might not want investigated.

We proposed a major change in the power of private members to have their proposals considered seriously and at length in the House of Commons. We proposed a system to re-establish Parliament's control of spending by extending debate on the estimates of any two departments which the opposition might choose without prior advice from the government.

We proposed a means to require parliamentary consent to regulations before those regulations can take effect.

In the interests of efficiency, we proposed to limit the length of speeches in the House to 20 minutes each, and to establish more regular sitting periods for Parliament. I make the point, sir, that these significant changes, to increase the power of Parliament and to reduce the power of the executive, were made when we were in government, yet they reflected, I believe, an understanding of the way governments can abuse their power.

These proposals go a long way toward reform, but they were designed then to begin the discussion, not to limit it. Our attitude today is the same. We suggest these proposals be considered as the basis for commencing discussion in the standing committee.

I am obliged to note that the reason this paper was not referred to committee in 1979 was that the present Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), then the Liberal House leader, indicated the Liberal Party would want to debate for some time the question of a reference to committee. I can indicate to the government House leader now, that providing the reference to committee is wide enough to allow full and positive consideration of fundamental reforms in Parliament, there would be no such delay from this party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Canadians will also know that we have proposed a major change in the way budgets are prepared, a change to ensure that in the future there will be full public discussion in advance of significant tax changes so that the government on the one hand, and individuals, companies and organizations on the other hand, can assess the impact of those changes and plan their implementation. That recommendation did not arise simply from this party. That recommendation arose as a result of a series of public hearings held in 16 communities across Canada by a special committee of the Progressive Conservative caucus on the budget and the economy which heard representations from 168 organizations and hundreds of individual Canadians. We would want that proposal, to open up the budget-making process, to be considered as well in the committee as a means to protect Canadians against a process which resulted in a budget which the government's own ministers now describe as a disaster.

It is worth pausing on the question of the budget because it demonstrates that when Parliament is weak, bad law is the result. The budget was a major mistake. It underestimated the depth of the recession in Canada. It introduced tax measures which look good in theory but were a disaster in practice. It has driven job-creating investment out of Canada and contributed directly to Canadians losing their homes, businesses, farms and their confidence. It happened because Parliament let a group of civil servants make decisions which the House of Commons should be making.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The only time the government asked people who knew whether what they were doing on the budget was right was after the government had acted and committed itself to a course which is proving disastrous, not only to them politically but also to hundreds of thousands of individual Canadians who face the prospect of losing their jobs, homes and businesses, or simply losing the kind of hope which has been the fuel of growth in this country. If this government had asked those questions first, many of these measures would not have been brought in and we would have avoided some of the bankruptcies, foreclosures and some of the thousands of lay-offs in Canada.

The point is that when Parliament works badly, Canadians get hurt. That is not just a question for Members of Parliament; it touches directly the lives of people who are affected by what Parliament does or, indeed, fails to do.

What has happened with the budget has happened on other questions. For examples, why was Parliament shut out of any consideration of the VIA Rail closings which affected so many communities across this country? How can orders in council be passed giving the government the power to establish internment camps without the House of Commons being consulted? Why should the government have the power to change the express will of Parliament and make the metric system mandatory when the House of Commons said it would be voluntary?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: These are not just questions for Parliament; these questions affect the lives of individual Canadians, sometimes profoundly, and yet their Parliament has no role. That is wrong, and if we in this House have any self-respect, if the hon. member heckling opposite has any self-respect, if indeed he has any respect for the people who sent us here, then we will change that system and take advantage of those changes.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I mentioned the need for democracy, and that is one of our requirements, but Parliament must also be effective. Our country has changed tremendously since confederation, and its problems are more numerous and often more complex. We cannot solve today's problems with nineteenth century tools. There must be a way to agree on limiting debate. Common sense and mutual respect must prevail if differences are to be resolved. We have proposed a number of ways in which Parliament could be made more effective, and we are willing to give serious consideration to any proposals from the other parties, especially proposals that stress respect for democracy and a desire for effectiveness. We are convinced that agreement is possible if we demonstrate our good faith and if we share the conviction that Parliament has a central role to play in governing Canada.

[English]

Sir, I have outlined the specific proposals put forward by my party and by us as a government. I would like, if I might, to speak a little more personally, on the basis of an experience which is not widely shared in this House, as someone who has had the opportunity to serve as a private Member of Parliament, as Prime Minister and head of a government, and as the Leader of the Opposition.

I should say at the outset that there will always be, at the base of discussions about the role Parliament should play, a difference of view as to whether Parliament is here simply as the body to which the government is responsible, or whether parliamentarians themselves should be involved directly in the formulation of public policy. Arguments can be made on either side. As someone who had responsibility for leading the government of this country, my own view, very strongly held, is that Members of Parliament should be here not simply to be reported to, not simply to hold the government accountable, but to participate directly in the formulation of the public policy of this country. In my view, that is our role.

I believe, Sir, that the weakness of Parliament is a major threat to the country, indeed a major danger, because this House is the only national institution to which every corner of the country has a claim, to which every corner of the country sends a representative, and in which every corner of the country has a voice. As a consequence, we are the only national institution which can speak with legitimacy in expressing the will of Canadians and in responding to their needs. That is in the nature of this institution, and it is ours uniquely and ours alone.

We are, for many individual Canadians, the only connection they have with their government. Public servants are not that kind of connection; government advertising programs are no substitute for Members of Parliament. We are the only connection that most people have with their government, the only ones they can call to account for reflecting their needs and aspirations. Therefore, this House has to be at the centre of the people's government or else it is a government which responds to something other than the will of the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In my view, the weakness of this House is based on three major developments. One of those has been that, as the business of government has become more complex, instead of turning to the talent, understanding and experience of members of this House, consecutive governments have turned to the public service and ceded more and more of the decisions of responsibility which should rest here to professional and unelected experts.

Second is the proliferation in number and subject matter of federal-provincial conferences and consequently the number of decisions which reflect directly upon the business of this House, yet those decisions are taken elsewhere before they come to this House and agreements are made before they come to this House. There has been a significant and dangerous movement of the power of decision-making away from the public and their Parliament to the private quarters of federal-provincial conferences.

The third, and perhaps most crucial development, has been the natural tendency of those who hold power to try to keep it, indeed to try to enlarge upon it. The most recent victim of that tendency, I regret to say, has been the freedom of information legislation which, when we were piloting it through the preparation stages of government, encountered time and time again objections from various vested interests in the government who did not want the public to know. My colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), as government House leader, prevailed to ensure that the balance was struck much closer to the needs of the public, and perhaps exposing and putting at risk some of the preserves of government. That unfortunately has changed, because the private sources of power in Ottawa have again been exercising their influence to ensure that the power of the executive expands and the power of both Parliament and the people of Canada diminishes.

I also regret to say, but it is germane and important to say it now, that that same tendency, that same determination of those who have the power to keep it or to enlarge it, has been at the base of most of the proposals for parliamentary reform which have come from governments. There is a natural preoccupation on the part of governments to enlarge the power of the executive, to focus on the need for efficiency. There is no doubt at all that this institution needs to be much more efficient than it has been. We all agree with that. However, efficiency can be won along with democracy, not in the teeth of democracy.

I want to propose ways, psychologies and attitudes which, in my view, can accomplish that goal. However, those three developments—the determination to hand public servants, not elected members, the power to resolve questions which grow more complex; the growing role of federal-provincial conferences; and the perhaps natural but, nonetheless, resistible temptation of those with power to enlarge power—have fundamentally changed Parliament and raised real weaknesses, real dangers and real menaces for our country. I believe that since those changes have been fundamental, the reform and the renewal of Parliament must be equally fundamental.

Let me now express a view in which my colleagues may not yet want to join me. I do it as a party leader. I do it as a former Prime Minister. It is my view that we can afford to limit radically the mandate and the control that parties exercise over individual hon. members of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: You are fired, Joe! Enough of that!

Mr. Clark: You have had enough of that, Ed?

Mr. Broadbent: What heresy! You are out of the club now!

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: Someone just suggested that I talk to an independent member. I am in the House to speak to all members, because I feel the problem is one facing all parties and all the members of this House. I feel that it is a very basic problem for the House of Commons, and I hope that the Liberals will show the same determination I have seen here, namely, to put a priority on democracy and the rights of regular members and their constituents.

[English]

Let me just pursue that further for a moment, if I may. I think on the question of what constitutes a matter of confidence, I see no reason at all why it should not be possible for us, for a Parliament, for a government, to sit down with its members before a session begins or shortly after the Speech from the Throne has been published or given, and we should be able to say: "Here are the measures which are of fundamental importance to the government. Here are the questions on which we will stand or fall. Here are the questions on which party lines will be enforced and the whips will be imposed." They would be a minority. We should be able to say: "But here are the other questions which will arise in the course of our mandate, questions which have already arisen concerning the public view and on which the party has no strong consensus."

I see no reason why there could not be a division made and stated at the beginning of a session by a government as to which will be the fundamental questions of confidence on which its existence, its lifestyle, will depend or fall, and which will be those questions which can be addressed directly, independently, if you will, by individual members of the House of Commons. As a party leader and former Prime Minister, I have no fear of that. I have no fear of the judgment of my colleagues, whether my colleagues in this party or my colleagues in the whole House. I happen to have faith in the collective judgment of the elected members of the House of Commons, if those members are allowed to express their judgment. That is what I seek to have achieved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As to those other matters which are not questions of government confidence, let them be considered on their merits. Let them stand if they deserve to stand. Let them be rejected if they deserve to be rejected. What in the world is wrong with that? That is the way most of the people who elect us think this Parliament works. That is what they think Parliament is. They would be shocked if they knew the degree to which party voting is imposed here on all sides of the House. They would be shocked by that, and so should they be, because it is unnecessary and a betrayal of the trust that all of us hold as individual members of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I seem to have won some support for that view from at least my colleagues and, I gather, from some hon. members of the NDP, including their leader, as well as a couple of hon. members on the Liberal side. I am pleased to see that happening. I hope there will be more of that and that we can carry on in that spirit in the parliamentary committee.

However, let me suggest that an approach of this kind can lead to at least two results. One would be a more extensive participation by elected Members of Parliament in the formulation of public policy. Personally, I see no reason why we should not prefer the public judgment of elected people to the private judgment of appointed public servants.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I recommend that the government House leader and his colleagues most seriously consider this second point. I believe this would create a much more positive attitude toward the work of governing on the part of hon. members on all sides of this House. I am not speaking here of the role of government. There is no doubt that some of my colleagues, and perhaps I myself, would act most quickly to introduce sunset laws and other pieces of legislation which would reduce the scope of government. I am speaking here of the work of governing. There is no doubt that one consequence of frustration in this House is that many members on all sides feel that they cannot contribute to it so they should stop it. There is no doubt that that is an attitude which has taken root in this House of Commons. There is no doubt that it is wrong and against the generally positive nature of most of the people who are elected here.

I believe that if individual Members of Parliament were given much more opportunity to play a larger role in the formulation of public policy, then the government's problems with respect to getting bills through would diminish. The question of time would not be as contentious as it is now. I believe that if we give Members of Parliament from all parties positive things to do, they will concentrate on doing positive things and will not be interested in finding nits to pick. Instead, they will be concentrating their efforts on ways in which to advance the public interest of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We are not speaking here entirely theoretically. A preceding government to this one, a Liberal government, allowed Members of Parliament to help formulate an immigration bill and, indeed, allowed public hearings across the land. That was a highly complex bill which, if my memory serves me correctly, passed through this House in four days, despite its complexity, because Members of Parliament and the people of Canada had been involved in its formulation. They had a chance to speak on the content of the bill, not simply to say "yea" or "nay" at the end. That is a model for the future, in my view.

Sir, the events of the last few weeks have been unusual only in degree. It was the first time that a government had sought to act on such an omnibus measure. It was the first time an opposition had used the bells that way. However, the issue has been building for a long, long time. Our system has been changing for a long time, gradually giving more power to governments and parties and gradually limiting the rights of Parliament, the rights of private members and of the people we all represent. If that continues we will waste the talent of the hon. members who serve here, lose the trust of the people who sent us here and gradually erode our democracy. We cannot let that happen.

We are here to pass good laws and to prevent bad ones; but we are also here to protect the symbol and the instrument of democracy in a free country. Suddenly, in a way which no one could foresee, large numbers of the Canadian public have become aware that there is something wrong in Parliament. They know that the people with power will not listen and that the people who listen cannot act. They want this institution renewed and they count on us to renew it. I believe that the great majority of hon. members in all parties in the House genuinely want a Parliament which is both democratic and effective. I hope we will seize this opportunity to begin that most basic reform.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I feel that the motion presented by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) should be seen against the background of the events of the past few days, and I should like to start by congratulating my colleagues on the government side who, during the past two weeks, have made it abundantly clear that they respect Parliament by remaining available throughout this time to enable Parliament to function and to continue to exist, despite the attempt to degrade this institution. They have shown that it is possible to resolve an unprecedented situation through purely parliamentary means, in a truly dignified manner, without giving in to blackmail.

• (1600)

So, first of all, I want to pay tribute to those who, in traditionally Liberal fashion, continued to support the institution of Parliament throughout the unfortunate events that took place during the last two weeks. Mr. Speaker, I feel that since I only have a few minutes to speak to the motion presented by the Leader of the Opposition, it is my duty to clarify once more the circumstances in which the hon. member is proposing parliamentary reform. Subsequently, I shall try to suggest several possibilities for bringing about a number of very desirable changes in our institution. Finally, I shall give other members of the House a chance to cover other aspects of the subject and formulate their own suggestions, because I fully intend to take note of any positive proposals that may be made today in the course of this debate.

Mr. Speaker, during the last two weeks, Parliament was prevented from functioning by abusive means that have never been used before in all of the 115 years that Parliament has existed in Canada. The bells that rang for 16 days have existed for 115 years, and never, not even in recent years under Mr. Stanfield or even under Mr. Diefenbaker, has an opposition party ever found it necessary to let the bells ring for so long, in fact paralysing the entire parliamentary system, for the purpose of attracting public attention to the political aspects of one of their claims. This is the context in which today, the Leader of the Official Opposition is presenting a motion to change the Standing Orders of this House. It reminds me a little of the man who pushed his mother under water when she was drowning and shouted: "Help, help! I am trying to save my mother!" That is exactly what the Leader of the Opposition is doing now. For more than two weeks he has been sabotaging this institution in an irresponsible, childish and shameful manner, and now he has the audacity to tell us to save Parliament, modernize the institution and change the Standing Orders. Those, Mr. Speaker, are the circumstances in which the Leader of the Opposition has dared to make his proposals before the House. I listened carefully to his speech here in the House and on the television monitors behind the curtains. I looked for any positive proposals for change that would help prevent the abuse of practices that we have witnessed in Parliament during the last 12 months. There was nothing on limiting the ringing of the bells and there was nothing on the use or misuse of points of order or questions of privilege which occurred during the debate on the Constitution, when the Conservatives used another ruse, another childish and irresponsible subterfuge, to paralyse Parliament. So those are the circumstances, and I feel perfectly justified in speaking as I do. I am not a hypocrite and I prefer to speak frankly. When I see the Leader of the Opposition smiling as he is right now, after having sabotaged the Parliament of Canada for 16 days—he is still smiling, he seems to think it is a joke—and, meanwhile, the unemployment rate in this country is high. We want to create jobs. We are trying to remedy a difficult situation, and the hon. member thinks it is all very funny, after preventing Parliament from introducing practical solutions to the present financial situation; I find it very sad. I think his attitude shows disrespect for Parliament and I think these things should be said.

It is because I am honest that I want to tell him frankly what I really think. However, Mr. Speaker, this will not prevent me from being constructive and positive in seeking ways to modernize Parliament and make it more effective, and I can see that the Progressive Conservatives do not seem interested in this type of modernization and efficiency. They object as soon as the government speaks about efficiency, about introducing bills which will help to solve the problems of this country, such as the bill to amend the National Housing Act, which aims at creating 15,000, and perhaps 40,000 housing units as well as 70,000 jobs immediately. Not so long ago, for seven days, they prevented the passage of this bill at its very first stage. They forced the government to limit debate because they wanted to avoid the vote on second reading. We forced them to take a stand and they had to support the bill. This points to a problem which should be corrected as soon as possible. It reflects a truly destructive and obstructionist style of opposition, and I believe that if we are to speak about parliamentary reform so that changes can be made as soon as possible, which will allow this institution to better meet present requirements, the official opposition will have to be much more honest; it will have to act in better faith, and the Leader of the Official Opposition will have to abstain from abusing certain rules or the absence of rules, as he has done in the last eight months, to hog-tie this institution and prevent for all practical purposes the government from passing legislation which could help solve the problems which exist in our society.

Mr. Speaker, the bell rang for 16 days for procedural and political reasons. The procedural reasons are easy to understand. One need not be a genius to realize that the bell could go on ringing indefinitely if the whip of the Progressive Conservative Party kept away from the House. This is elementary, but in 115 years, no one had used such a destructive, negative and obstructionist tactic. As we all know, the Progressive Conservatives moved a motion to adjourn the House because they were not satisfied with a ruling of the Speaker that the energy bill was in order. They caused the bell to ring, and then they hid and refused to come to vote, hog-tying Parliament for all practical purposes for over 15 days. Under our procedure, therefore, we were unable to conduct parliamentary business because the official opposition refused to come to vote, and because of this, Parliament was unable to operate for the last two weeks.

The political reasons underlying this motion of the Progressive Conservative party and this tactic which prevented Parliament from operating seem obvious to me. Earlier, on the motions moved under Standing Order 43, on the first day after the end of this strike by the Progressive Conservatives, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) moved a motion and began his preamble in these terms: In view of the NDP-Liberal coalition in December, 1979, in defeating the then P.C. government. Those were the first words we heard today after 16 days of idleness in Parliament. Anyone who wants to know the true reasons for the ringing of the bells during the last 15 days can find them in the preamble of the hon. member for Assiniboia. The Progressive Conservative Party has never accepted its defeat in the House in December, 1979, and has never been willing to behave as a responsible official opposition since. This is unfortunate because, after trying to behave as a majority government when holding only a minority, this party is trying to use Parliament and to sabotage its work in order to relieve a continuing frustration which is not only eroding the type of official opposition offered in Parliament, but is also literally destroying the Leader of the Official Opposition who now has a price on his head and whom we shall no longer see after January, 1983. Mr. Speaker, it was important that I first put the motion of the Progressive Conservative leader in this context because these are the facts.

Those who refuse to face this fact are either extremely partisan or would rather not know the truth. The arrangement made to stop the ringing of the bells is very simple. I paid a tribute a while ago to the parliamentary spirit shown by the Liberals during the past two weeks. And the way we succeeded in stopping the bells and solving that problem was strictly consistent with parliamentary rules. We referred to a Standing Order which enables us to set allotted days and this gives us a six-day period to negotiate how we could consider Bill C-94 on energy security. Well, such agreement is quite simple. We have not departed from any parliamentary principle as far as we are concerned, because the negotiations on the energy bill only began after the vote on the Tory motion, when the bells stopped ringing. This was sacred for us. We could not be forced to negotiate on Bill C-94 while the bells were ringing and we were asked to pay a ransom.

• (1610)

The principle was safeguarded, Mr. Speaker, because the negotiations began after the vote on the Tory motion yesterday. The second principle which was safeguarded was the right of the government to set, as you know, the order of business under Standing Order 18(2). If we had agreed to introduce some other government bill instead of the energy bill, then we would have created a dangerous precedent, because each time the opposition would like to alter a bill or would be displeased with the contents of a bill, it would only have to blackmail the government saying: "Change the orders of the day or otherwise we will be filibustering. We will let the bells ring 15 days as we have just done for the energy bill and we will raise ridiculous points of order or questions of privilege, as we have done during the debate on the Constitution to cripple Parliament."

One will readily understand that we could not give in on that point. We did not either. So, finally, a compromise was reached: the government agreed to negotiate the form, the manner in which the energy bill would be debated, but to do so only once the bell had ceased to ring, that is, after the vote on the Conservative motion, once the knife was no longer held to our throats, and to negotiate during a maximum period of almost six days, which could be considered adequate time for the parties to come to an agreement on how to divide the bill, and also negotiate a reasonable calendar for the completion of the study of all parts of the bill as divided.

So, essentially, the compromise is twofold: first, the bill will be divided; that guarantee is on the table, provided, second, there is also on the table the guarantee that a reasonable parliamentary timetable will be respected. That is understood. I feel chances are excellent that an agreement can be reached well before next Monday. Negotiations are now under way and they will continue; but I think it is also very important, in the context of this debate, that I should make clear the nature of the agreement reached yesterday because it is imperative that parliamentary supremacy be safeguarded, that negotiations not be pursued while the government, so to speak, has a knife pointed at its throat, and that the right and obligation for the government to decide what the order of the day will be should be upheld. Those principles were safeguarded. At the same time, the solution is parliamentary because, just as it has always been with parliaments worthy of the name, problems are solved by negotiation. We have about six days to negotiate the form of the debate on the bill which, as you will note, is not a precedent; we are willing to break up the bill provided, of course, a reasonable parliamentary calendar is set to complete the debate on each one of the parts of the bill so divided.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, not only is parliamentary reform a necessity, it is also an urgency.

It is true that as soon as I was appointed President of the Privy Council, I indicated that I was interested in modernizing this institution, in making it more human and efficient. But one must also consider the circumstances that have prevailed in these last two years since my appointment in order to understand where discussions stand in respect of the necessary changes to our rules. In the first place, I should say that when I was appointed when we were elected as a government in 1980, we inherited the aftermath of two elections in less than a year. We had to negotiate and put some sort of order in the business of supply that was in a mess and to which the Standing Orders were no longer applicable, due to the fact that the main estimates could not have been tabled in time because of the election date. All this is very technical, but the consequences were tremendous. An agreement was needed to revive rules that included time limitations. Negotiations were required, an agreement had to be concluded, some sort of order had to be put in the whole area of supply proceedings that are the raison d'être of this Parliament, the very foundation of the House of Commons and the Senate.

Such an agreement was reached after negotiations. We also inherited a tremendous accumulation of legislative measures that were on the Order Paper, again because of two elections in less than a year, and we managed during the first months prior to the summer of 1980, from April to the end of June or early July, to dispose of a backlog of legislative measures with the passing of some 25 to 30 bills. Then summer came. We had our summer recess and hon. members had other duties to perform in their constituencies, meeting with their constituents. With the fall of 1980 we had the constitutional debate. Everyone remembers the atmosphere that prevailed in this House during the constitutional debate. Everyone remembers the bitterness that was rampant here. It was far from being conducive to the consensus needed to change the rules and proceed to parliamentary reform. So it was that through those months from the fall of 1980 to the spring of 1981, we had that hijacking of Parliament I referred to earlier. The atmosphere was assuredly not favourable to attempts at negotiating procedural changes. After the constitutional debate, the need arose last fall for a second budget to address the economic situation.

As soon as the estimates were passed after the Christmas recess, I proposed to the House leaders a procedure for dealing with the matter of reform, and then there were discussions. I suggested a specific formula to deal with the issue, since the matter of supply had by then been settled, the legislation backlog resulting from holding two elections in less than a year had for the most part been dealt with and we had tabled our budget, the dust had settled and the atmosphere was more favourable to the consensus needed for procedural changes. So, as soon as we came back from the Christmas recess I proposed to the House leaders a way of dealing with the matter of reform, but our discussions were interrupted by the bells.

This is where matters stand. What I would like to explore today, as a possible avenue to practical, positive changes within the best possible time frame, is this: the Leader of the Opposition is asking us to send a general reference to the committee, and I will consider this.

Keeping in mind the circumstances I have related, the urgency of making changes and the fact that some changes have already been closely scrutinized and recommended to the House and could be implemented without reference to a committee, I would be more inclined to test the good faith of the opposition and consider the advisability of going ahead with some of those changes at the earliest opportunity. That could be done without any reference to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and without at the same time asking the committee, which is the appropriate forum to study changes and the whole question of parliamentary reform, to consider the document tabled by the Progressive Conservative Party when they were in office, a document which contains a few useful suggestions but which is not exhaustive by any means, namely the Lambert report, the Economic Council of Canada studies and the Peterson report on regulations. All those documents ought to be carefully reviewed and a detailed report by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization should come out in due time. What I am saying, however, is that the way to go about it would be to find out whether the Leader of the Opposition is truly sincere and whether the members of the Progressive Conservative Party want reform and changes.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the tradition-based parliamentary procedure to make changes in the House is to have the changes examined by the House committee which deals with such matters, the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. In 1976—and that had begun in 1975 if I am not mistaken—that committee sat and travelled during several months and it went to London. It was chaired by the then government House leader, the Hon. Mitchell Sharp, and included the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—it was Grenville-Carleton then—the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) to name a few, and I was also on that committee along with a number of other members who are here in the House, including the hon. member for Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) who will have an opportunity to give us his views later on today. That committee spent several months considering the general concept of parliamentary reform and was indeed able to produce quite an exhaustive report.

I am ready to test the good faith of the opposition by making the following suggestion. Let us continue the House leaders negotiations on the subject, let us select those changes in the report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization which have undergone the parliamentary test of analysis by the committee members and let us implement them practically overnight and refer the rest to the committee. The changes which might thus be considered in the negotiations I will be having with the other parliamentary House leaders in the immediate future in the hope of reaching agreement very quickly could include 20-minute speeches. That was one of the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, and I refer to page 20:55 of that report. Twenty-minute speeches have been advocated since 1976. It is the subject of proposal No. 41 of the Progressive Conservative document and there is absolutely no reason why we could not immediately set a time limit on speeches.

I recall quite vividly that last year during a debate on parliamentary procedure I challenged the Leader of the Official Opposition to implement forthwith the 20-minute limit on speeches, but at the time he did not have the courage to take up the challenge. Today I am making the same suggestion to him and if he wants 20-minute speeches we are quite prepared to go ahead with that suggestion right now. However, I am convinced that they are not prepared to agree to anything today, but still I want to continue my efforts to seek the required consensus at least to make those changes which are of a non-controversial nature.

Another non-controversial change which does not settle the whole question of parliamentary reform but would be a token of good faith would be to proceed with all the votes at a given time. Mr. Speaker, Parliament has 282 members and a $75 billion annual budget to manage, and here we are running along corridors like school children called by bells which more often than not ring too long. It seems to me it would be normal. In much smaller companies where decisions are made about much smaller amounts of money and where those decisions have far less impact, the directors are tactfully advised in advance of upcoming voting meetings so as to be able to arrange their schedule and plan for those decision-making meetings.

Consequently, if the opposition is sincere, it should have no objection to defer all the votes to a given time. This way, the members would know in advance when a vote would take place. There will be no more hide-and-seek games to try to catch somebody off guard, no need to call back members away on official trips, no attempt to break the traditional parliamentary rule of pairing or to take the government by surprise. These are childish games, and I think they explain, among other reasons, why the people are cynical toward us. In my opinion, it would be normal for us to determine the time of the votes. It would prevent a recurrence of the shameful incident which occurred lately. On page 2067 of the committee report I mentioned a moment ago, smaller committees made up of 15 to 16 members are recommended. In its recommendation No. 22, the Progressive Conservative Party advocates eleven-member committees. We are prepared to consider the immediate implementation of this proposal. All we need to implement it without referring it again to committee is a little show of good will on the part of parliamentary leaders and all members.

Concerning the quorum, even the Progressive Conservative Party, along with the committee report, recommends that there should be no fooling around in the House, that the House should not be prevented from going about its business because some members have to answer phone calls or attend committee meetings. I think the bells should be allowed to ring for several minutes, maybe ten, before the Speaker can adjourn the House because of a temporary lack of a quorum. Another change that might be considered, if there is a consensus before the matter is again referred to committee, is to go to a four-day week, while keeping the same number of hours. At the present time, the House sits for twenty-seven hours a week. We could easily sit longer, for twenty-eight hours if necessary, which is just one hour more. I have a detailed breakdown of these hours spread over four days, which means that members could visit their ridings more often without exhausting themselves in the process and without risking their lives as has often happened to a number of members, and while being able to discharge their twofold responsibilities, that is, to represent and meet with their constituents and to come to the House and perform their legislative duties.

I have just mentioned four or five changes that have already been considered by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. Recommendations have been made and I feel it would be utterly ridiculous to refer them again for consideration. It seems to me that if the opposition is sincere, these changes could become effective before the summer recess. At the same time, we could consider asking the appropriate committee to prepare a more in-depth analysis of parliamentary reform in general, taking into account the studies I mentioned earlier.

Another possibility, considering the present situation, the attitudes we have seen during the past year and the opposition's destructive approach in the House, would be to create an independent committee made up of former Members of Parliament, who would examine the subject of parliamentary reform, unfettered by excessive partisanship, and would report within a specified period, probably before next fall, and refer the report to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization for—

• (1630)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please! I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time is up. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There appears to be agreement for the hon. member to continue.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Not to abuse the time of the House, I will conclude my remarks in less than three minutes.

Mr. Speaker, the avenues which I have just mentioned are available. If there is good faith on the side of the official opposition, some changes which have been scrutinized and analysed in depth already by a parliamentary committee could be implemented very quickly, or an independent committee could be asked to submit a report to the government, a report which would be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, which in turn could report to the House, and we could come to a decision on this here. That is another avenue I am willing to look into very seriously within the next few days. Nevertheless, except for these avenues which are available to us to streamline this institution, to render it more modern and efficient, to reshape it so that it could respond more readily to reality, there is something that matters more than a simple change of mechanism, Mr. Speaker, and it is a change in attitudes. Even if this institution was provided with the best Standing Orders in the world, even if we tried to correct all flaws so that Parliament could function better, even if we had a Standing Order book a mile thick and covering all imaginable angles, these changes would be to no avail if hon. members, especially those of the official opposition, did not change their approach from a to z. It will always be possible for a madman to throw a monkey wrench into the works or for a negative opposition to disrupt the orderly functioning of the system, whatever regulations we may adopt. What I am seeking, therefore, from hon. members from both sides of the House is not only a will to come to a consensus to bring about changes as soon as possible, but also an effort to change attitudes, so that the Canadian people may look up to this institution. Unfortunately, experiences such as those we have just lived through have a very negative impact not only on the Leader of the Opposition, but also on hon. members generally; and in the light of that unfortunate experience, I hope that in the foreseeable future and in keeping with the suggestions I have just made, we will be able not only to improve our Standing Orders, but to change some attitudes, so that Parliament may be respected, function and operate effectively, and that as servants of our people, we may be proud to serve the Canadian Parliament.

[English]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this important motion—important in the context of what we have gone through for the past couple of weeks in the House of Commons and, beyond that, important to the future of parliamentary democracy in Canada—I want to address my comments to two concerns in the democratic system.

One is to have the opportunity of dealing effectively and promptly with the problems the nation faces; that is to say the right of a government to govern and to do so expeditiously. The other is to have the opportunity to make suggestions about what could be done to improve the effective participation of Members of Parliament as Members of Parliament.

I think it is quite possible, indeed I would say in the context not merely of recent events but of the performance of Parliament in recent years it is more than possible, it is desirable, if we are to restore effective respect across the country for Parliament itself, that we act now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I listened with interest to what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) had to say and, of course, I have read the report tabled by the then leader of the Conservative government in the House. I want to say on behalf of my colleagues that we find many of the ideas, probably the majority, quite acceptable and desirable and would like to see them implemented soon.

I want to make some specific suggestions about what we think would be desirable and would make this place more effective in dealing with legislation and more just in terms of giving rights to members.

Whatever changes we make in the rules and practices of the House, in my view there is a very important matter that goes well beyond the rules. It is essential to the working of any democratic institution, any democratic government, whether in continental Europe, the United States or here. That is the question of trust, Mr. Speaker. I will put it bluntly. In my view, no changes that we make, indeed no changes that will be accepted by all of us in the future in regard to the procedures, rules and practices of this House, would have avoided, in my judgment, had they already been in effect, the recent two-week impasse in Parliament. I will come back to that point in a few minutes.

Important as practices and rule changes are, in a democracy, both outside this institution in society as a whole and in this institution, attitudinal questions are of fundamental importance to the functioning of our system. I want to put forward a few things that we think are desirable that were set out in the white paper put forward by the former Conservative government and which we think should be acted upon reasonably soon.

The suggestion that speeches be reduced from 40 minutes to 20 minutes duration makes very good sense.

As for idea of having fixed adjournment dates so that not only Members of Parliament and their families know when we recess for Christmas, summer or Easter, but constituents know on a regular basis when they may expect their Member of Parliament to return to the constituency, it is time we got better organization into our lives in Parliament. This would have a net benefit beyond our immediate circumstances. This is about the only legislative body in the world that does not have fixed adjournment dates and this change is long overdue.

On behalf of my colleagues I want to say very seriously that we believe committees need to be strengthened. That could be an important step not only for the feeling of more effective participation by regular Members of Parliament but the reality of their participation, if it were done in a serious way, would not put into jeopardy the fundamental principle of parliamentary or cabinet government, namely, the government's responsibility to govern and the opposition's responsibility to be effective critics on behalf of the people of Canada.

We think the committees would be strengthened immeasurably by providing them with their own independent staff. These staffs would be there on a permanent basis. Hopefully some of them would acquire seniority and expertise over the years so that when Parliaments change, committees and regular backbenchers would have competent, professionally trained committee staffs to advise on technical matters of which they must be aware. This would improve the performance of all Members of Parliament, but particularly I think it is important for regular members who are not in cabinet or in leading positions of opposition parties.

• (1640)

The committees ought to be able, on their own initiative, to decide to study certain subject matters. They should not be dependent upon a reference from cabinet or from government to initiate work in a certain direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I should like to deal with another item which goes more directly to the other side of the House than to this side. Hon. members on both sides must come to grips with the reality that it now takes almost twice as long to produce legislation in the House of Commons than it did ten years ago. As members of Parliament, we must all be concerned about this fact. We must improve the efficiency with which we deal with legislation, because housing and unemployment problems are real and energy bills must be dealt with.

Speaking as the leader of an opposition party and on behalf of my colleagues, I say that we must come to grips with the issue of timetabling to meet the legitimate need of government to govern. Also we should provide ample opportunity for opposition parties to make their points in debate when they disagree with the government. I happen to think it can be done. Most legislative systems in the world accomplished it a long time ago. We should look at the timetabling principle in a serious way. We should accept the notion, but then say that for each opposition party in each session there could perhaps be two or three bills to which the normal timetabling for the scheduling of bills would not apply, and that there would be no fixed limits in the debate on the two or three bills selected in each session by opposition parties. I simply put that forward as one suggestion among a number of means one might select to implement the idea.

In supporting the reference to committee before the House, we should have a very hard look at the West German experience in terms of the allocation of time of Members of Parliament. At present Members of Parliament know very well that we have obligations to legislate and to debate important matters of substance before the House, to present legislation on the government side, to criticize it on the opposition side, and to pose questions during question period—but not obtain answers. These are important duties but we also have duties to our constituents, and increasingly so. The past experience of my predecessors in the House of Commons indicates the workload from a constituency point of view has certainly increased immeasurably. Therefore, my suggestion is that we should have a very serious look at our responsibilities in Ottawa and in our constituencies in light of the West German experience.

West Germany is a federal state as well. As many hon. members know, its parliament sits for three weeks in each month—and members spend the fourth week in their constituencies. This is an established, fixed practice. It is something at which we should look with a great deal of care. In a country as diverse as ours, hon. members have an obligation to return to their constituencies in order to meet with farm groups, small businessmen, trade unionists and other constituents. We should look at this idea with a great deal of seriousness. If we can tighten up our rules and practices to enable us from a legislative point of view to accomplish in three weeks what would normally take four, there is no reason we should not be able to allocate the fourth week for hon. members to do effective work in their constituency offices. We should look with care once in a while at new ideas that have been implemented somewhere else.

I have put forward a number of suggestions which, along with those proposed by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and by the government House leader, would help make government, the House of Commons and individual Members of Parliament more relevant in their different obligations in the House of Commons. However, in putting these suggestions forward I emphasize that we cannot delay any longer. There should be a reference of the position paper mentioned in the motion to committee, along with the ideas I have suggested and other documentation proposed by the government House leader, and I think that reference should be made soon. Also I think it would be very advantageous if the committee submitted a report not later than June 30, 1982, or before the summer recess, with very specific recommendations.

Further, I take for granted that these suggestions would come on the basis of an all-party consensus, and that all parties would work seriously to achieve this goal. We would have the report before the recess, and I suggest that we could try the new proposals when we return in September or whenever until December. We could have a House order to that effect and we could try them for that three-month period. If we found that they were effective improvements with which we as Members of Parliament could live, they could become part of our permanent practices. If, after the experience of the fall, they were found to be defective, we could revert to the present system and hopefully continue to look for improvements. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition, and I hope the government, agree that we cannot wait any longer for reform. Let us move and move now.

I should like to make a few comments regarding the question of trust and its profound relevance to parliamentary democracy. As I said earlier, and I repeat and emphasize now, none of the proposals made today by the government House leader or the Leader of the Opposition, if they or the best possible set of rules imaginable had been in operation, would have avoided, in my judgment, the parliamentary impasse we experienced during the past 16 days. No matter what set of rules or practices are in existence, if a political party represented in the House of Commons wants to grind Parliament to a halt, it can do so. Parliamentary democracies operate on the fundamentally important principle of trust at two levels. First, there is the trust which ordinary people—truck drivers, bank clerks, farmers, small businessmen and all Canadians—have in their elected representatives. It is very important to maintain that trust. The second trust is one which is essential if we are to function as a legislative body. It is essential for the parties in the House to have trust for one another.

If there is to be the first trust to which I referred, that is the trust of Canadians in their Members of Parliament, then all politicians must be seen to be doing what they promised. In that context, politicians must be seen also to be relevant to the everyday concerns of the ordinary people of this country. Without that kind of relevance and integrity, cynicism becomes rife in a democracy, whether in Canada or in any other democratic country. My own sense of the reality of Canada right now is that cynicism about politicians and about political institutions is growing. It is something other than high school level speculation. Perhaps that is easy to say, but it is so easily dismissed as being a cliche or a trite observation.

Those who have studied European democracies between the wars know very well that attitudes formed by the public toward political institutions have great significance in terms of the survival of those institutions. We in the House of Commons have to be concerned about the growing state of cynicism in the country about politicians and about the House of Commons.

Trust is important. The trust Canadians have in Parliament is also related to the way we as politicians—and to put it in more relevant terms, we as parties—perform here in this House and how we relate to each other day in and day out, whether in practices or procedures. In this television age this becomes more and more important because increasing numbers of Canadians quite literally see us here responding to each other. In my view, when they see Liberal Party members, Conservative Party members or New Democratic Party members, they see parties who differ profoundly on important questions facing the nation.

There are now and always will be seriously different approaches to what is the desirable goal for Canadian society. There is now, and I hope always will be, very tough-minded debates in the House, and a no-pulling-of-punches attitude when we deal with matters of substance that we think and feel deeply concern the future of this nation. However, this does not mean that for parliamentary democracy to function, the toughness in debate, the firmness and logic, the depth of understanding and the difference of the parties in this respect should carry over into a lack of respect about the other party. I take that to be a matter of great significance for a democracy. There must be a will in the parties to accept the difference of view that is on the other side of the House or between the two parties on this side of the House, a will that says that whatever our differences are we can agree on procedures to resolve those differences, and that however we may differ in philosophy and program, we can agree on the methods of coming to decisions.

But this requires an attitude of trust between the parties. It is my judgment, rightly or wrongly, that we would not have undergone what we did in the past two weeks if there had not been a breakdown of trust. I say that in terms of the other two larger parties in this House. For whatever reason, and I will not speculate on the causes, there was no trust or respect between them in terms of procedure about the importance of parliamentary democracy. For whatever reason, bad feeling that got beyond differences in policy and bad feeling that got beyond differences in philosophy interfered with the effective working of Parliament.

When we look back at the past 16 days, it will be realized that Canadians witnessed an unfortunate spectacle. Canadians saw that the men and women elected to do a job were not there to do it. In my view, these men and women did not do their job because of a lack of fundamental respect for each other, a respect that is so essential for the functioning of our democratic system. As a result of that, who suffered? While we were not sitting, public business certainly suffered. We did not deal with legislation that ought to have been dealt with. Housing problems were not met. Programs were not initiated to deal with unemployment. As a result, the public suffered. Politicians also suffered because the level of respect felt across the country for this institution and its members in my view diminished. But more important, because we are a democratic country, our society somehow suffered in a broader sense than that conveyed in the economic issues to which I have just referred.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark):

That in the view of this House the future effectiveness of Parliament as a democratic assembly, representing the needs, beliefs and aspirations of the people of Canada, requires that an immediate review of all its rules and practices proceed without further delay, and this House therefore urges the government to refer the document "Position Paper: The Reform of Parliament", tabled on November 23, 1979, to the Standing Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization as a basis for commencing discussion, along with proposals for reforming the budgetary process.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The allotted time for the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) has expired. He may, however, continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Benjamin: That is another rule change that we need.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will not abuse the consideration of the House in allowing me to continue. I want to conclude by saying that a number of good suggestions have been made by all parties in this debate. I think the committee should get on with its work and that we should modernize our rules and procedures to improve the efficiency of government and the effective participation of Members of Parliament.

I want to emphasize also that we should not be deluded when we make these changes, as I hope we will, into believing that once they are there everything will function well. What has to be done and done now for this Parliament to perform effectively for the rest of its term is to restore a sense of trust between the parties so that we can work within that framework to debate the serious differences in policy that we have.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I agree with those members who, in referring to the parliamentary deadlock we have experienced during the past two weeks, concluded that some good might come out of all this and that perhaps the experience would strengthen the resolve of all the members of this House to address the problems of parliamentary reform in a concrete manner and without further delay. It is a truism to say that we all have our views on the subject. We all want Parliament to be more effective. However, there is a danger that we get so tied up in details that we lose sight of the fundamentals. That is why I should like to take a few minutes to consider the real problem of parliamentary reform. Obviously, parliamentary reform involves Parliament. And we often tend to forget what Parliament actually is, when we stress any of Parliament's specific roles or functions, give our own perspective, and support a measure beause it reflects a specific concept or definition of the parliamentary system.

What are Parliament's roles? It is perhaps useful to recall them at this point. There is a legislative role, of course, and a budgetary role, because Parliament must approve the estimates tabled by the government, enabling government to administer programs implementing the legislation approved by Parliament itself. In addition to these two roles, Parliament has a normative function which I do not think is being questioned here. Every day the House sits, members have an opportunity to hold the minister accountable for his actions and thus provide the assurance to the public that the country is being governed according to acceptable standards.

We must not forget, however, that in addition to these two roles and this function, there is also the basic premise underlying the functions of Parliament, and that is the principle of responsible government. We could have endless and probably futile discussions on the merits of stricter separation between the executive and the legislative function than what we have in our own system. In any case, our system is patterned on the British parliamentary system which combines the legislative and the executive functions within the same institution. It is not necessarily a bad thing, since as a result, we have a healthy give-and-take which is usually creative and in the final instance makes it possible for the two orders to live together and act as a mutual stimulus. But it is a very real constraint.

We must not forget that when we discuss parliamentary reform, we cannot make a mental reservation and ignore the fact that in our system we have the principle of responsible government. I shall come back later to the proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) which I took upon myself to applaud and which referred, in the context of party politics, to giving greater freedom to parliamentarians when they have to approve legislation introduced by the government. On the basis of this constraint, which is absolute, we have imposed upon ourselves a number of relative constraints which have developed throughout the years because of tradition, as a result of rulings made by successive speakers during the 700 years of existence of Westminster and since the beginnings of confederation in Canada, and of our Standing Orders, which is the final analysis are a consolidation of these rules that we have ourselves established and which help us fulfil our duty as parliamentarians in view of a certain balance between the opposing forces. When I speak of opposing forces, I do not mean simply bilateral, but also multilateral forces because we have on one hand government forces and opposition forces, and on the other hand the forces of members of Parliament in their legislative capacity and the forces of the executive and its overriding importance confirmed by tradition and regulations. In other words, this creates a certain balance of power which has brought us to this point and which the crisis of the last two weeks forces us to review, because balance implies self-discipline and implies most of all, since we live in a democracy, that everyone involved must accept the rules of the game and that the balance of power must be reviewed when they are no longer accepted.

Yet, I am afraid that for certain people, parliamentary reform means simply functional arrangements within this traditional balance of power without involving any review of the balance of power itself. This brings about a contradiction, a paradox which, in my opinion, will be difficult to correct and which may have prevented any real parliamentary reform until now. Several attempts have been made since I came to this House in 1974. I sat on the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization with the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and other members, including the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau). This committee examined three very specific and well-defined issues which were of concern to parliamentarians at the time, namely, the role of Members of Parliament in introducing legislation itself, in other words, what are erroneously called private bills and are finally public bills introduced by private members, time allocation and committee work.

Therefore, I fear that if we look simply for new arrangements, we shall be faced with an impossible paradox, on one hand a government which quite legitimately wishes to introduce legislation and deal with government business with as few obstacles as possible, which is quite normal, and on the other hand, and completely opposed to this legitimate desire of the government to play its role, the also quite legitimate desire of parliamentarians to play a concrete, positive and constructive role in the affairs of the country in this House, which means discussing bills and estimates submitted by the government. How can this paradox be resolved? The one who can resolve it should perhaps be beatified or decorated with the Order of Canada or something else, but by resolving this paradox, we would finally be giving a true meaning to this institution. Without necessarily solving it once and for all, and it should perhaps remain unsolved, because there would no longer be this creative tension between the two orders of government and we would no longer have, at least as we know them now, the British parliamentary system and responsible government, which are the foundations of our government, we should perhaps, just the same, seek a new balance.

As I said, we could all make suggestions based on our own experience. It is true that we are probably all rather frustrated by the inconsistencies of this institution, its really antiquated aspect, its obsolete mechanisms that require us to go through some foolish exercises such as the ringing of the bells, prompted the NDP leader to say that some Canadians were cynical. Unfortunately, it is true and that cynicism goes beyond the parties and is directed at the institution itself. However, apart from our own experience and the suggestions which could be made to improve the operation of Parliament, the fact remains that we all want the members to play the role that the Canadian people think they ought to play.

I have taken it upon myself, Mr. Speaker, and I assure you that I do not claim to have the monopoly on truth, of putting on the Order Paper on February 23 last a motion which seeks to conciliate in the abstract or at least which attempts to launch a debate on a well-defined aspect of our parliamentary activities, the committee system. I must regretfully admit that in the past few years I have lost faith in the House to a certain extent. When I refer to the House, I mean the House gathered here with all its members present and I am rather inclined to work in committees. Why? Perhaps because the groups are smaller, the issues more specific, there are fewer representatives from the media as well as less partisanship, but it is still possible sometimes for a parliamentarian to make a useful contribution.

I have, therefore, centred my attention on the committee system which, I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, does not operate very well, to try to strike a new balance between the opposing forces which might promote the creativity of an hon. member while safeguarding the legitimate aspirations of the government, because, as the system and the people so require, the government must govern. I will not explain my motion in detail, Mr. Speaker, for it would serve no useful purpose at this time, but, I want to say that as we are dealing with parliamentary reform, if we really want to promote this creativity which we should show at all times instead of only once in a while, we will have to strike a new balance between the opposing forces.

Let me give you an idea of what Parliament could be. The Leader of the Opposition mentioned the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, a committee on which I had the honour to sit, which has done in fact a tremendous job and whose efforts have resulted in a bill that had gone through the various legislative stages fairly quickly.

I also had the privilege to be a member of one of the task forces set up by this government and approved by the House at the beginning of this session. I must say that it is probably the most fascinating and certainly the most positive experience I have had here, and it is undoubtedly the most constructive and dynamic development to take place in the House in quite a while and which some members who have been in the House longer than I can probably remember. Why? Because a number of small groups with well-defined terms of reference and fairly large working resources, and especially terms of reference entirely devoid of partisanship, I mean, these groups of seven parliamentarians finally managed to rid themselves of the old reflexes and the absolutely intolerable weight of partisanship and petty politics to carry out constructive work. And you can see the results, these substantial reports which both the Canadian Parliament and the general public have received with relief.

My time is almost up, Mr. Speaker, so I will simply conclude by commenting on the issue raised earlier by the Leader of the Official Opposition about giving members more freedom when divisions are taken, in other words to free members on both sides of the House of any party commitment on certain bills. Ideally, of course I fully agree, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat that I applauded the Leader of the Official Opposition when he made that suggestion. But would not that be putting the cart before the horse, for if we are to relinquish the party guidelines which have set our course for so long, that means we would have to acquire self-discipline, Mr. Speaker, and that is something we cannot draw out of a magician's hat. We will have to learn to discipline ourselves as parliamentarians. We have been in shackles for so long that we will have to learn to act responsibly as individuals. The Leader of the Official Opposition did seem to suggest that hon. members be allowed to drop those shackles, and I agree with him, but at the same time we would have to set up new mechanisms to enable members to learn to work individually and constructively without those party guidelines so that we will at last be able to come to grips with that basic proposal since the very essence of the British parliamentary system is at stake, namely, responsible government. And once we have reached that stage it will mean that the House has fully grown up and that it operates in the eighties rather than in the past when things were probably simpler.

Mr. Speaker, I am gratified that we are discussing parliamentary reform. I hope the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization will soon, in fact very soon, have an opportunity to consider this matter. All I can say is that I hope the show of good will sparked by the events of the last two weeks will not subside in a matter of days. We must not fall back into our routine of saying: Well, parliamentary reform can be discussed later when we have a better consensus or when there is a better show of confidence by the House. We must understand that confidence is what we are going to get as a result of parliamentary reform and not the other way around. All members of this House must get involved in this discussion as soon as possible, and tangible proposals must be made without delay so that, as was said earlier by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), they can at least be tested, if we want to become better Members of Parliament and play a useful role in this House.

[English]

Mr. Friesen: I think the hon. member has a minute or two left in which to speak. Would he entertain a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed.

Mr. Friesen: First of all, I want to applaud the hon. member's speech. I thought the tone was excellent. I thought he was creative in the suggestions he made and I am particularly interested in his supportive concept of doing away with block voting. I am very much in support of that.

I wonder what we could do in order to do away with the label of having either bolted the party or been disloyal to the party. How can we destroy the old image of breaking cohesion if we do not continue block voting? I think the hon. member understands the dilemma. I would like to see us take up the cause of following his suggestion. I would like to see whether he has an immediate suggestion as to what we can do to break that kind of pattern in this House.

Mr. Lachance: If I were to be presumptuous I would say that if one approves my motion and puts it into application, it will lead to that. However, I will not be presumptuous. I will only say that that is the objective, but I do not think we can achieve that objective right away because the old reflexes are there. It will take a bit of time before we start to act responsibly, both as individuals and collectively.

However, what will be discussed in the committee will be a way, maybe as an experiment, in which we can give meaning to the so-called confidence motions. I do not know whether hon. members have ever asked why there are non-confidence motions if all the bills are non-confidence. Therefore, is it relevant to have a non-confidence motion if everything is confidence? Therefore, if one starts defining confidence and deciding when confidence will apply in true terms, one will get slowly to the point, of course, where one will be responsible. We will reach the point where we could get away from this very heavy burden that we all have to carry. However, that is somewhere down the road, and we will not get there like that, with a snap of the fingers.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I begin my speech by sharing the sentiments expressed by my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) with respect to the very constructive attitude taken by the hon. member for Rosemont (Mr. Lachance). May I also say that I believe that speech of my hon. friend from Rosemont has set the tone which is very much needed in this House of Commons. It has been set also by certain other members. It is very much needed in this House as we consider this very important question of change.

• (1720)

I would also say something about the member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta. The paper which is referred to, which was tabled in my name when I had the honour of serving a government in the House of Commons, was inspired to a great degree by the work which was done by the member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta in the period of time preceding the opening of the Thirty-first Parliament. The work of that caucus committee within our party, which he chaired, which was shared by many people within that party, led to a paper being submitted to the government which formed a large part of the proposals which seemed to have found some favour with the member for Rosemont and the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). I want—because it is now possible for me to do this—to pay tribute and express my grateful thanks, personally and on behalf of the House, to the member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta whose work has led to this.

Mr. Speaker, there was something said by Madam Speaker today that I think all of us ought not to forget. There may be questions about what she said, but there is a phrase which I copied down and which I think none of us ought to forget. She said "We must review our parliamentary procedures" She was right: we must do that.

We have gone through an unprecedented period in the last little while. Those of us who in this House speak about a change of attitudes are right. It is because of the requirement that we be cognizant of our attitudes that I am not going to comment today on what was the most extraordinary speech, in the circumstances, by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard). It was a most extraordinary speech in the face of the motion which has been placed here, but I am not going to comment on that. I have been a government House leader, and the problem of being a government House leader from time to time is that all of us have to bear crosses, and we bear them all the time. So I can have some sympathy, in a way, with the burden that is put on his shoulders, because I carried some burdens as well. What we are trying to do here, I hope, by this motion is to change somehow the attitude in the House of Commons.

I want to suggest to my hon. friend that if there had been some follow-through by the government on the promise that it made in the Speech from the Throne two years ago almost—and now we are in one of the longest sessions in history—that we would implement changes in the procedures of the House of Commons, I dare say the atmosphere, the attitudes, and indeed this House itself, could have been profoundly moved in a different direction—had that promise been kept. I say as a parliamentarian that I regret—the strongest word I am going to use today—that the government has not seen fit to follow through with that proposal, which was welcomed by every member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, all of us here talk about short speeches or shortened speeches and it is probably a good thing that that should happen. But we have to make some changes in this House which are much more fundamental than that. And they are not just changes for the opposition. They are changes for Parliament. What has happened to this Parliament? Well, because of the onrush of business, because of the intervention more and more by government into the daily lives of Canadians, because of a whole host of things that we could number, each of us, on our fingers, government has come to assume and require a greater part of the parliamentary day in this House.

It follows from that that there has been a diminished role for the private member. The private member is sent here to represent his voters, whether they voted for him or not, for the time that he is here. This Parliament is more than just a rubber stamp, certainly, but it ought to be much more than what it is today. It is more than a place which by rote or by parade automatically supports every government measure on one side of the House and the other side of the House is opposed to every government measure.

The paper that I had the privilege to table in 1979 had as a fundamental principle that it was in keeping with the basic principles of parliamentary government to see in the House of Commons a more aggressive representation of the voters. That was the purpose of it. But while this process was going on over the years—and it was allowed to happen, and it was forced to happen in 1969 by the use of closure—governments occupied more and more of the time, and Parliament therefore came under the thumb of government to a greater and greater degree.

What these reforms are designed to do, and what is needed in this Parliament, is not to denude government of its power, enormous as it is, but to leaven that bread of power with the ability in this Parliament to hold government accountable, to provide the tools to Parliament, not just to the opposition, Mr. Speaker, but to Parliament, to hold the government accountable.

The government House leader said he would be prepared to throw a challenge out, to agree to 20-minute speeches. This is just not a House leaders' matter, but I imagine there would be general agreement in the House of Commons. I believe there would also be agreement in the House of Commons to a counter-challenge that I might throw to him: as an experiment, try the idea of independent references for committees that are set forth in this paper. If the House leaders are to discuss this—that is his suggestion—then let them discuss that as well, and I wager that there will be agreement among the private members of this House of Commons for that kind of change in our procedure.

You, Mr. Speaker, who occupy the chair now, chair the Standing Committee on Transport; and I say to you, Sir, that you are respected as the chairman of that committee. I will tell you the difference between our system and what should be in place in keeping with the parliamentary system, and it has to do with the tragedy of the Ocean Ranger. Parliament wanted to look at that matter. It was within the ambit of authority of the transport committee to look at it. Instead, a royal commission is looking at it. Yet I saw on public broadcasting in the United States the maritime committee of the Congress of the United States investigating a tragedy that occurred off the shores of Canada that involved to a greater part the loss of Canadians lives. And yet, if it wanted to, Parliament could not investigate that unless the government gave its go ahead to investigate.

I think it is a departure from what people think is the role of this place when that happens in our Parliament. As a member, I am prepared to trade the length of speeches as well as many other things if, on the other side of the scale, the government is prepared to make a trade with respect to accountability. I believe that this view is shared by all members in all parties of the House. We have been asking for that for years and that is the purpose of this motion.

Why do we ask the government to consider these reforms? Why do we ask the government to make a reference to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization? The reason is that Parliament is not just the place of House leaders, nor is it just the place of party leaders alone. It belongs to all members in the sense that here is where we function. The way in which members can express themselves on the operations of Parliament is through the work of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. It is made up of members from all parties.

We have proven in the House that committees will work when there is good will. I believe in this House when you cut through all the partisanship that exists here—even though it is legitimate in part—you find a feeling of frustration and anger among members on all sides of the House, anger and frustration that this place is not working as they thought it should when they came here as members.

As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said, there is very little opportunity for input into public policy. There seems to be a feeling that all the wisdom is with the government, regardless of its stripe, or with the bureaucracy, when we know that it is not. Elected politicians can bring an overlay of wisdom to government decisions. Certainly this place is not here for the convenience of the government. It is here to pry, probe and question the actions of a government regardless of what government is in office or whether the Member of Parliament who is questioning is a Liberal, Conservative or New Democrat.

The advantage of sending this proposal and all others which were mentioned by the government House leader to a committee is that it will become evident that this place is not just the preserve of the members. It is also the preserve of the public because it also has views to express on how this place performs and whether it is functioning as it expects. Members of the public cannot come to the bar of the House to speak or sit in these benches to speak, but they can come and speak to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. That is the reason for committees, and you will recall that one of the issues in the energy security matter was that the public should come to speak.

There are countless organizations, not all academic, which are concerned about the operation of this place. There are business organizations, such as the Business Council on National Issues, which are worried about how this place is operating. James Gillies, who was the member for Don Valley East, wrote a book about the involvement of business, and the private sector in the political process.

I suggest that it is time for the public to become involved in the political process. It will only get involved on a day to day basis if the balance changed—not the delicate balance referred to by the government House leader in his speech to the federal lawyers club in November, but the gross imbalance which exists in the House of Commons between the weight of the government on one side and the influence of the private member on the other.

Some say that my proposals will not work because there will always be a majority of government members on those committees. I say that is wrong. Many committees have proven in the House that they can work. For example, there was the subcommittee on prison reform which was chaired by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). There was the committee concerned with fiscal relationships between the provinces and the federal government chaired by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau). There was the committee on regulatory reform chaired by the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson). There was the committee on the National Trading Corporation, and the committee on the disabled which was chaired by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Smith). Finally, there is the committee which is chaired by my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty), co-chaired by Senator Godfrey, the Standing Committee on Regulations and Ohter Statutory Instruments, dealing with the whole matter of regulatory reform and the place of regulations in any system.

These examples have proven that from time to time, when faced with the appropriate issue, party labels can drop and we can begin to probe for the truth as we see it.

Another example is the Standing Committee on Public Accounts which has worked magnificently under the member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) and the member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke). That committee has worked diligently and has made some progress toward the improvement of the control of Parliament over expenditures and the reporting of the government with respect to estimates.

So the capability does exist. It requires good will, it takes trust as well as some initiative. It is no longer acceptable to me as a parliamentarian that this government does not bring forward the proposals which it had promised in the Speech from the Throne. It is not only unacceptable to me but it is so to many other Canadians. It is equally unacceptable to Canadians that parliamentary debate be overlaid with frivolous and vexatious matters. That is not to say that debates should not be partisan—certainly they should be partisan—but they should not be meanly partisan and they should be directed to the issues affecting Canadians.

When I talk to my constituents, they ask me what Parliament can do about the various issues facing them. I have to tell them that it cannot do very much. Do you know why? Two-hundred eighty two Members of Parliament cannot act on every issue in Parliament, but committees can act. However, they cannot take action immediately with respect to matters affecting Canadians unless the government says so. The government rarely agrees. That is the problem with our system, and I humbly and respecfully submit that this is what those reform proposals are there to remedy. I invite the government House leader to rise above some bitter experience and to review all the reports and documents which we have here—including those which he may be presenting before the government which so far have not seen the light of day—all the public, private and inside information that there is, and at least put it before the committee so that we may deal with it.

When the government House leader was referring to my proposals, he was quoted in an article in the Ottawa Citizen as saying in the House that they were interesting, had some possibilities but were incomplete. I want to say to the government House leader that, incomplete as they are, I have never said that they were the last word in proposals. Rather, I have taken the view that they are the first words. There is the problem. They are the first word. There has been no other word, and if there are proposals from the government that will help to make this place work, then we are prepared to look at them. But we want to see them. I think that outside there is a silent but large constituency in Canada which wants to see this place work. It is tired of pettiness. It wants us to rise above ourselves and engender some of the things we do with trust and honest partisanship.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I thank my colleagues. Let me finish now. There are some ministers in the House today. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) is here. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is here. There is a parliamentary secretary here too, and some former ministers are here. If those gentlemen want to do a service to this House, they will speak to the government House leader and ask him to make this reference, because the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party have given an undertaking that such a reference, assuming it is broad enough—and I am sure it would be—will go to the committee very, very quickly without prolonged or long debate. I think the time has come when every one of us must be concerned about this place and must agree that we should begin to look at it anew.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this motion today as a strong partisan of parliamentary institutions. Like that of most members of the chamber, my understanding of and feeling for Parliament has grown, I think greatly, since I was first elected. I was elected in 1968, and during the last 14 years I have witnessed all the great debates, the ones in which our great parliamentary colleagues have given strong institutional leadership to our democratic traditions.

I think Parliament has become a better place because of the MacEachens and the Baldwins and the Douglases and our very much missed friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). When we survey the history of Parliament over these past 14 years, I think we will credit these men and many others with advancing the cause of parliamentary democracy. The qualities they brought to Parliament, which have, in turn, nurtured Parliament, stem from a single belief in the sovereignty of the people as it is exercised through Parliament. Even in the most difficult moments they never lost sight of the fact that neither partisanship nor opportunism is sufficient justification for challenging the very sovereignty of the institution of Parliament.

Members of all parties over the years have understood that there are limits beyond which they can go only at peril to Parliament itself. I am sorry to say that I believe these limits have been exceeded in the last two weeks by the Conservative Party.

Mr. Greenaway: You guys too.

Mr. MacGuigan: While what I can only call the travesty of the Conservative behaviour was bad enough, what in a sense is even worse is the attempt now by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to endow their anti-democratic behaviour with a gloss of concern for Parliament. No one mindful of the history and traditions of this institution could close the doors of the House in the name of reform. This conduct speaks not of a party or group committed to parliamentary reform but of a party that is so thoroughly committed to power at any cost that it would force Parliament to cease functioning.

Have they not read history? Do they not know that our political ancestors fought kings to keep this institution functioning? Do they not know that our privileged tradition of democracy has been based on the notion that Parliament is the ultimate forum for discussion and debate? Do they not know that they have set an insidious precedent which brings no credit to them, and none to the institution?

Parliament offers ample opportunity for all sides to be heard, and even to be heard at some length. Filibustering, political manoeuvring and just plain politics have all been used by the opposition.

Mr. Taylor: And by you.

Mr. MacGuigan: And by us, I admit, when we have been in the opposition, and by the government, yes, when it feels keenly about issues. But in all cases parties have kept the House going in the search for solutions. Now my hon. friends opposite have established the precedent that an unruly opposition has the right to muzzle the very institution they were elected to support and to close down the debate on the nation's business which they were elected to discuss. Where are the democrats in the Conservative Party and their great tradition? If they are on the opposition benches today—and I am prepared to concede that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is very likely one of those—they must indeed be anguished by the events of the last two weeks.

Mr. Taylor: Why didn't you split the bill?

Mr. MacGuigan: They cannot be proud of muzzling Parliament and of creating a new and dangerous precedent which could be used by others again to thwart the will of the Canadian people.

Mr. Taylor: Why did it take you so long to split the bill?

Mr. MacGuigan: Surely what faith they had in their leader must by now have completely evaporated, because I find it hard to believe that the heirs of Macdonald, Cartier and Borden would gleefully and carelessly participate in such tactics.

Mr. Nowlan: What did you hear about the naval bill?

Mr. MacGuigan: The last two weeks cannot be conveniently explained away on the ground of concern for Parliament. It is like arguing that one should deliberately crash an aeroplane in order to advance transport safety.

We have learned much about the Leader of the Opposition and his House leader in the last fortnight. We never experienced events like this during the tenure of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. We have learned that the right hon. gentleman is prepared to sabotage the very institution he professes to love so much, if it will serve his immediate personal ambitions, ambitions which many of those seated closely around him seem very eager to truncate. We have learned that if respect for Parliament is not enough to give the right hon. gentleman second thoughts before he corrupts parliamentary traditions, then neither did respect for the Canadian public restrain the right hon. member in his public pronouncements.

Mr. Taylor: Get rid of your dictator, and it wouldn't happen.

Mr. MacGuigan: I have here a comment by Michael Valpy of The Globe and Mail, in which I believe he spoke for many Canadians. He wrote:

> The purpose behind—
> The recent parliamentary impasse.
> —has acquired more shadow with each increasingly dishonest and dangerous statement from Joe Clark—about Tories being barons confronting King John; about the omnibus bill being one more attempt by Mr. Trudeau to fundamentally change the structure of Canadian society and government.
> Does the man really have to go across the country milking hate and discord on, for heaven's sake, a Parliamentary issue, pandering to the basest and most unthinking political discontent in the country? Is that what has happened to the Conservative Party?

Mr. Nowlan: This is sick of you, Mark.

Mr. MacGuigan: I do not know the answer to this rhetorical question.

Mr. Taylor: Tell us about Forsey.

Mr. MacGuigan: However, I do know these comments represent widespread public opinion on the question and, as much as the right hon. gentleman opposite may pin his failing hopes on this soothing motion, I am afraid it will not be possible for him to use it to draw the wool over the eyes of the Canadian people as to the real motives behind his action.

Mr. Taylor: Remove your own leader before you start talking about ours.

• (1750)

Mr. MacGuigan: I do not think I have ever met a parliamentarian who was opposed to parliamentary reform. As this party's House leader said today, and I hope I quote him correctly:

[Translation]

That being said, Mr. Speaker, not only is parliamentary reform a necessity: it is also an urgency.

[English]

While I do not have the exact words of the leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), I know that he too spoke of the urgency of parliamentary reform. There is no disagreement among members about this.

In the 14 years that I have been in the House I have seen the role of the private member enormously enhanced. We now have a role in committees which did not formerly exist. We have changed some of the procedures of the House, and improved the lot of members through the provision of more adequate staff and research assistance for the parties as well as adequate remuneration for members and improved conditions of service involving such petty details as the use of telephones. So in the 14 years that I have been here I have seen the role of the private member spectacularly enhanced. Not enough has been accomplished, however. While the lot of the member has been improved in many ways, we have not yet dealt with many of the most crucial questions involving his or her role. I have written extensively on this subject myself and I do not propose to repeat views which I have expressed elsewhere.

The debate so far has shown that members have many ideas about how reform could be accomplished. The House leader of this party suggested some changes which could be made immediately to improve the institution. That does not exclude, of course, the more far-reaching changes that we would all like to see take place.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that Canada has been privileged to have a democracy which stretches back to the birth of the country 115 years ago. Parliament has served many generations of Canadians with fairness, tolerance, and, I believe, a certain amount of wisdom.

Within these walls Canadians, regardless of their partisan differences, have been able to bring their beliefs forward to discuss them. Every side of an issue is relevant here and the rules permit and encourage full debate. For this reason I regard the sorry events of the last two weeks as a grave breach of our traditions.

If it is parliamentary reform that the right hon. gentleman wants to effect, he will get a chance to air his views—as he has done today—and he will have the ear of every member of the House. But if his objectives are the darker ones implicit in the strangulation of the House in the last two weeks, then he will have perpetrated great harm on parliament and on our people.

The institution of Parliament is larger than all of us. It is more important than our careers. In the short time that we are privileged to be here as trustees and representatives of the Canadian people we must all remember that our first loyalty must be to Parliament and to the Canadian people.

It is in this spirit that we must approach parliamentary reform. Indeed, it is in this spirit that we must make parliament operate every day. That is the spirit of true parliamentary democracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Parliament didn't impose metric on the people.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to take part in this debate. I feel particularly honoured because I believe that of all the parliamentarians who have spoken, I am the one with least experience in the House. I intend to dwell on that point to a certain extent.

When I came here I brought with me a great amount of awe and enthusiasm. To demonstrate how naive I was about parliamentary rules and traditions, I will tell you that the first time I heard the bells ring, I was so concerned about not doing the right thing that I stayed in my seat until they stopped and the vote was taken. I did not want to do anything that was out of order. I am sure other hon. members have had similar experiences when they were new. None of us are born with 20 or 30 years' experience. We just have to acquire it. I believe many new members have insights and objective judgments about the place that may escape those who have been here for a long time.

I should like to deal with the parliamentary process itself, Mr. Speaker. The reason for a parliament in the first place was that there would be a forum in which the expenditure of money could be scrutinized. Its purpose was to look after the public purse. That is why it was established initially. In England, when King John got out of hand, the noblemen of the day were very concerned. They summoned him to Runnymede and said, "King John, we are not prepared continually to give you money from our estates unless we have a say about how the money is spent." We are really involved in the same process today because our main responsibility to our constituents is to see to it that the tax money collected by the treasury is spent in a proper fashion. It is a very, very important function.

It is in that context that we need to examine some of the budgetary processes, Mr. Speaker. I had the privilege to be a permanent member of a committee struck by my party which travelled for three weeks throughout the country, from coast to coast. It was a very interesting and rewarding experience. I had a chance to meet Canadians all over the country and hear their concerns about the budgetary process. This is a very, very important part of our parliamentary responsibility. I also had a chance to study some of the institutions that exist for scrutinizing the budgetary process in this country and compare that with what is done in the United States. It seems to me that in this country we have fewer checks and balances than are available in the United States, and I should like to compare the two systems to show how important scrutiny is.

In the United States there is the House of Representatives and the Senate, either of which may stop a budgetary measure. There is also the executive branch which is totally separate from the legislative branch. The executive branch would be similar to our cabinet. Each institution can act as a check and balance on the public purse and on the others. We do not have that system in this country, Mr. Speaker. To a large extent that responsibility lies with each individual member of the House of Commons. If its members are to exercise that responsibility, then they must have some authority—perhaps that is going too far, but at least they must have some input into the decision on how tax money is spent.

When we arrive here as new members I do not think any of us expect to make momentous decisions that will shape the course of history in any significant way, but I think it is fair to say that our constituents expect us to be able to ask some basic questions once in a while. They do not expect us simply to vote yea or nay on an issue but they expect us to make useful suggestions that will be heeded. They expect us to ask why something is happening or why it is not happening. I think we must ask these questions about the budgetary process and the expenditure of tax money by the government.

Just to give an example before I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) had a private member's bill—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was digressing somewhat to talk about some of the problems we encounter as individual members. The example I was attempting to use was one which referred to a private member's bill of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil). It dealt with taking some $9 million that had been collected from farmers during the life of the prairie farm administration act. When this act ceased to exist, the $9 million was held by the government on behalf of producers. It was not distributed. Everyone agreed the money should be distributed to the farmers, but it has been held since 1972 despite the fact that everyone agreed it should be distributed. Nothing has transpired, and almost ten years have passed since that time. I understand, however, the problem is to be solved soon. But in the meantime we have lost something like $4,000 a day in interest on the $9 million. When people outside of this institution see things like that going on about which everyone is agreed, it is small wonder people become concerned about the way this place functions.

I want to return now to the task before me tonight and that is to talk about the parliamentary process as it relates to the budgetary system. It seems to me there are three time frames surrounding a budget: the proposal stage of a budget, dealing with it in the House, and dealing with it after it is presented in the House on budget night. I refer first to pre-budget time during which the Department of Finance formulates a budget. There should be no reason why a minister of finance cannot let Canadian businessmen and taxpayers know what kind of tax changes are being proposed in an upcoming budget. If a minister of finance were to do that, it would be a signal to the taxpayers and to business people of Canada of what they might expect with regard to changes. This would also give people a chance for input into the budget. They could make submissions to the minister of finance. He would have the benefit of people's opinions as to how his proposed tax changes might affect the country. That would help the minister of finance prepare a better budget. There is not enough interaction in this country. There seems to be no reason to me why something like this should not take place, because it would benefit everyone.

A second concern many people have is with respect to budgetary secrecy. Admittedly, there are some legitimate concerns over budgetary secrecy having to do with people taking unfair advantage through prior knowledge of tax provisions or tax changes in a budget, for instance. That is understandable. But generally there are two concepts in the budget relating to secrecy.

I want to quote from a document entitled "Canadian Study of Parliament Group". In referring to the budget secrecy rule, we read with reference to budgetary secrecy:

> In theory, it would seem to rest on two premises. The first is that no one should be able to gain a private advantage by reason of advance information about matters to be dealt with in a budget;—

That seems to be obvious to all of us in the House. The paragraph continues:

> —the second is that all important statements of government policy ought to be announced first to the House of Commons.

Those are two general principles to do with the budget as it is prepared and presented in the House. I do not think many of us quarrel with that. But within those two premises, there is no reason why we could not open up the budgetary process considerably from what it has been in the past without calling into question or compromising those two basic premises. They should surround the budget in the way it is prepared and presented in the House.

If people were given the right to have input into a budget, it would be more readily acceptable. They would be aware of possible contents. For a country like Canada that is important. As far as I am concerned, Canada is the only country made up of five distinct geographic regions. When taxation or fiscal measures are brought down in a budget we should realize that those measures will not affect each geographic region in the same way. On that basis, it should be important for the government to give a signal to the country through all of its regions of what the government proposes to do in terms of budget changes. If that kind of a system were adopted, and once laws were passed, people would have more faith and trust in the changes. People would not feel set upon by a government. They would not be as frightened or alienated by a government because they would have had input into the budgetary process. This is very important because governments today, in one form or another, take a very large percentage of income from us.

For instance, if one were to look at the average taxes paid by an individual Canadian, most of us end up working from the beginning of the year until some time in June for one government or another, which is a tremendous amount of taxation imposed on individuals by governments. Therefore, on that basis it is very important that individual taxpayers have as much input into the budgetary process as possible. That conclusion was evident to the committee of our party on which I served as we travelled the country during the first few weeks of 1982. Three themes kept recurring.

First, taxpayers in general could not understand why governments did not trust them and why governments did not discuss with the people what was going to happen. This viewpoint was particularly brought out with respect to the budget of November 12, 1981, which proposed a major taxation change.

The second theme which cropped up in the hearings concerned the fact that many of the taxation measures of the last budget were put into effect retroactively. That was unfortunate. It called into question the very basis under which our taxation system has worked in this country. It has worked on the basis of voluntary compliance. If the government ever gets itself into a position whereby it changes the rules, as it has done in some cases, particularly having to do with life insurance in the last budget where retroactive changes were made, it will find that that type of move makes Canadians think that they do not necessarily want to play square with the government. Several people told us that if the government cannot respect laws it puts in place upon which people plan for their retirement, these people naturally feel they want to retaliate, and when the time comes to fill out taxation forms, they consider the possibility of devising their own forms. Those kinds of things were very disturbing to hear.

The third theme that kept cropping up before our budgetary committee was the fact that many provisions in the budget have not been clarified. That was in January, two months after the budget had been brought down. Since then two more months have passed and still many provisions have not been clarified. People do not know how to conduct their business affairs based on the November 12 budget because the government has not come forward with many of the changes in terms of legislation or regulation proposed in that budget. For instance, let us consider the change in the Excise Tax Act from the manufacturing to the wholesale level. There are many changes about which people are not yet familiar because the government has not fully established what it intends to do. Those are three areas that we need to address in terms of the budgetary process.

We need more input in the pre-budgetary process. I am not so sure there needs to be the total secrecy required now around the budget presentation itself. After the budget is brought down, the government should make every effort it possibly can to clarify what it intends to do with respect to tax changes proposed in the budget.

I intend to fulfil, at least in spirit, the suggestion made earlier by several members, namely to limit the time we take to make speeches in the House.

I want to close by referring to a couple of things the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said. This week in Toronto, he said:

—the way in which democracy was destroyed was closing down Parliament—

I want to suggest there is more than one way to close down Parliament. Simply because we are here does not mean that Parliament is working the way it should. In many ways there is a much more insidious way to close down Parliament; that is to have members here and have them do nothing. But I would challenge the Prime Minister. If he is serious at all in his statement, he should look at ways to make Parliament function, to make it more useful and more productive for members of the House and, as a result, for the constituents we represent. So, if Parliament closes down simply because it becomes irrelevant, the statement made by the Prime Minister is reprehensible. I would challenge him to see that Parliament is not closed down in terms of its ability to function. To me that is a lot more important than simply worrying about having people physically here. I would much sooner have people here doing something constructive rather than going on in the system we have now where, it seems to me, we become more and more irrelevant all the time.

The other point I would like to make has to do with what was said in the last page of the Speech from the Throne delivered here almost two years ago. It says:

• (2020)

Like all of your colleagues in the House of Commons, you who represent the people of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia—

And I can add to that the people of rural Manitoba where I come from:

—have a responsibility to represent your constituents to the nation. You also have an extra responsibility in the present circumstances to represent the nation to your constituents. It is a task no one else can fulfil.

I totally agree with that statement. If we are to fulfil that task, then we have to see that this institution functions in such a way that we can fulfil that task. Believe me, all those who come to this House do so with the utmost sincerity and integrity, and all of us have a certain amount of talent and special ability, and if individual members are prevented from seeing that kind of talent used, we will all be the poorer for it. So I would like to urge all of us in this House to take seriously the suggestions made here today and that we go forward in a spirit of good will to see that some of the useful and worth-while suggestions made here today do not end up as simple rhetoric to be referred to by future scholars, but rather that something very useful and worth while comes out of this debate today.

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate. It is a subject in which I am quite interested, and given the events of recent days I think we all feel it is quite timely and we hope we can come to some consensus on improvements which might be made with regard to parliamentary reform.

I think it is fair to say that in recent years the government has demonstrated a genuine interest in parliamentary reform in several ways. Such things as the introduction of television, the very active role which special committees have played in the last couple of years—and I will speak a little more about that later—and the facilities which are now available to members compared to what they were some years ago, I think indicate a genuine commitment on the part of the government to parliamentary reform. I remember that in the mid-1960s you would see a couple of members and a couple of secretaries jammed into one little room. The working environment was quite intolerable and the work output tended to reflect that. Now, however, we have well funded research staffs for the various parties, which I think has gone some way to improving the conditions under which Parliament operates.

I have to say that I have some doubt about the sincerity of some members opposite, and I say "some" because, for example, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has a genuine interest in and commitment to parliamentary reform. But because of some of the hijinks which have occurred here in the last couple of weeks, things that I can only describe as guerrilla tactics, we were prevented from doing what we were elected to do, that is to say debate, ask questions, answer questions, discuss legislation, move amendments and vote on them, and, in the final analysis, vote on the legislation. I am mystified as to how that blockade is somehow justified in the name of hoping to bring about parliamentary reform. I think that, coming hard on the heels of the hijacking we saw during the Constitution debate when we heard a hundred-odd spurious questions of privilege and points of order, it is a little difficult to accept as genuine the interest in parliamentary reform of everyone on the other side.

An hon. Member: You are perfect, aren't you.

Mr. Smith: I think it is very important that we all bear in mind the function and role of the opposition and the government in a parliamentary democracy. That is why we on this side of the House felt quite strongly that one principle on which we were not prepared to give in the recent war of wills, if you can call it that, is that it is the obligation and duty of the government to set the legislative priorities of the House. That is something on which we will have to go to the people to justify whether or not we have properly managed our mandate and whether we have set those legislative priorities in accordance with the wishes of the majority. If we have not, we know the political consequences which can flow from that when we have an election. However, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is a perversion of parliamentary democracy to suggest that somehow the opposition, which is in the minority, through an abuse of what is a tradition, not even a rule, can prevent Parliament from functioning in the way I think it is supposed to function.

I must say also that I regretted a couple of the references that were made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) today to things which I think really do not add a constructive tone to this debate. He referred, for example, to the emergency planning order. In recent days I think some people have tried to damage the integrity of the government by exploiting this and presenting a version of that order which is totally contrary to the facts. I regret to say that I think the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition did that today when he said the government had given itself the authority to set up internment camps. Nothing could be further from the truth. The only conclusion I can come to is that he has never read the emergency planning order because if he does he will see in Section 3 that it says:

> Every minister appointed to preside over a department or responsible for the administration of an agency of the Crown or a Crown corporation shall
> (a) be responsible for the identification of possible types of emergencies within or directly related to his area of responsibility and for the preparation, evaluation, testing and implementation, when required, of appropriate related emergency plans and arrangements;

Now, in a document prepared for me by the research branch of the Library of Parliament which is entitled "The Validity of the Emergency Planning Order" it states:

> The provisions of the order require the various ministries to develop plans which are to include methods of implementation. This includes preparation for implementation. The order does not purport to authorize the implementation of the plans so prepared.

Going on further, the document says:

> In summary, the order requires various government ministries to develop plans for emergencies and prepare for the implementation of such plans. However, there are no provisions which, properly characterized, amount to authorizing the implementation of the plans.

In order to implement these plans legislation would be required, and I would suggest the Leader of the Opposition knows that full well. I regret that he has chosen to paint a picture of what is happening here in Parliament which I suggest is, in fact, very misleading. He is doing it for political purposes, but I do not think it is constructive in a serious debate on parliamentary reform.

He referred today to the number of orders in council which this government has passed. To listen to him you would come to the conclusion that there is something inherently wrong with orders in council, that there is something evil about them. It should be pointed out that an order in council has to be issued pursuant to the authority of some act. Now, you would get the impression that the Conservatives, when they were in power, never issued an order in council. Well, we all know that they did, and I became so annoyed listening to the sanctimonious utterings of the Leader of the Opposition today that I checked with the Privy Council on the Clark government's record on orders in council. They have complained about the volume we have produced. Well, they were in for nine months and how many orders in council did they grind out? One thousand and fifty-one.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Smith: So, having listened to what they have had to say in recent days about orders in council, I think they should literally be ashamed to stand up on their feet and bring that up again. I hope it has now been laid to rest because they will not get off the hook with that red herring anymore.

Mr. Mayer: You guys had 3,700 last year.

• (2030)

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak very briefly about one aspect of parliamentary reform which I feel quite strongly about. There are two points I wish to make. If there were one quick change which I think would be legitimate, given the experience of the past couple of weeks, it would be that a motion to adjourn the House, once moved, if not voted on by the automatic adjournment hour of the day on which it is moved, should become void. This is because if an adjournment motion were carried, the work of the House would be terminated for that day only in any event. If the motion cannot be brought to a vote by virtue of the fact that one whip on one side of the House has decided to stay out and break the normal practice and tradition, putting the Speaker in an awkward position, as has been the case in recent days, I belive that that is really an abuse of the tradition. I do not think anyone would be ill served by a change which simply stated that if a motion to adjourn the House has not been voted on by the time of the automatic adjournment hour of the day in which it is moved, the motion should become void. I do not think anyone would consider such a change in the Standing Orders to be an abuse.

The tactic which was used in recent days could still be used. However, hon. members would have to get up and move that motion every day. If they did that, the scrutiny and the spotlight of public opinion would prevent them from doing this very often.

What I would really like to speak about is the whole subject of committees, particularly special committees. I have had the opportunity of chairing one of these committees, which I am still chairing. It is the Special Committee on the Disabled and Handicapped. We have a seven-member committee comprised of four government members, two Conservative members and one NDP member. First of all, I would like to say that I really believe there is a lot of merit in having smaller committees. I think that what happens is that a greater commitment to the subject matter is developed among the members. I think one agrees to serve on a special committee only if one has a genuine interest in the subject matter of that committee. As a matter of fact, when those six special committees were set up a couple of years ago, it was stated in the order of reference that the membership of the committee could not be changed without a House reference. This meant that there was no revolving door. In the larger standing committees, whenever a vote comes up, the troops from either side will come in and look to their leading spokesman to tell them which way to raise their hands.

I think there is much merit in the concept of a smaller committee. I suspect that if we had smaller committees around here, and if members served perhaps on just one or two committees at the most, we would find that members would develop a much greater commitment to participation in those committees.

Our particular committee travelled across the country. We held hearings in 18 different locations. We divided ourselves into two parts. We heard over 600 witnesses. I think that all of us who served on that particular committee have found a lifelong interest in and commitment to improving the lifestyle of the disabled in this country. It was a very moving experience. It would also be fair to say that it familiarized us with the subject in a way which has enabled us to make a contribution to Parliament, because we find that members from that committee tend to ask questions in Parliament and tend to oblige the government to continue to focus on our various recommendations. I think that all of that is a good thing. I personally feel, although not everyone is of this viewpoint, that the style and the format of report which we used was a welcome change. Quite frankly, many parliamentary reports published in the traditional way are about as interesting to look at as the phone book. They are deadly dull. We used a format which included a number of photographs, a headline style, a punchy style, with the result that many people wanted to read it.

I simply want to make those comments for the record to indicate my very strong support for the concept of special committees. One of the most enjoyable and satisfying things that I have ever done in my life was to become associated with the work of that committee. I am making this contribution as a private member in the hope that when the various aspects of parliamentary reform are reviewed by the House leaders, serious consideration will be given to continuing the opportunity for special committees to do the very fine work they have done in the last couple of years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to participate in this debate on the motion of my leader. I thought he gave one of the more constructive speeches of his career this afternoon when, in a very even way, he pointed out some of the problems of this institution and suggested some remedies. We have just come through a very difficult time in this institution. Frankly, I do not think there is one member on either side of the House who was very gleeful while listening to those bells. Other hon. members have spoken on parliamentary reform tonight. The hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) said that perhaps he was participating as one of the youngest and newest members of the House. I find it almost remarkable that I am likely the most veteran member to have participated in this debate, knowing that time is starting to move on and there will not be that many more hon. members who will be able to participate tonight.

However, once we get away from this particular period, and when we let the columnists and the commentators dissect the last 16 days when we all heard that clang of the bell, I am suggesting to Your Honour that Canadians away from this place will put different interpretations on why that bell rang for so long. I would venture to say that my friends on the government side were surprised as were we, frankly, on this side that the bell rang for so long. I will not go into all the reasons why it might have been possible to shorten the bell. However, I can tell Your Honour that in terms of the area that I know best, my own riding, and Altantic Canada to a point, many people phoned me who had never phoned a politician before. Certainly, in the first week, that was so. Admittedly, during the second week, the people who phoned were more partisan. The good Tories were phoning to give support, as well as people who took a position as good Liberals, if one can find them, and there are still some around.

Mr. Kempling: Name one.
