Reciprocity.

The American press and people seem to be and resolved to make another struggle for the extent of the mission, and the divinity. No marvei after this if the prist-extending but in the service of the ly pretensions of these men are found to be alproceedings in abrogating the Reciprocity Treaty, and we meet with many intimations in the columns of the various United States journals as giving us to understand that a renewal of the Treaty upon the old basis would be acceptable to a majority of our neighbours on the other side of the lines. By the time, however, that they will have made up their minds to ask the people of British America for a renewal of the Treaty our position will have been in all probability, very considerably changed. Not only will a large intercolonial trade have sprung up between the confederate provinces, but wide spread commercial relations of a satisfactory character, will have come into existence between us and the West [India Islands and the countries of South America. These new channels of trade would never have been opened had it not been for the uureasonable temper into which our neighbors chose to put themselves about nothing ; and the result has been to place us in an independent position, no longer to be subjec to the caprices of American politicians. Still there is no reason why we should not be ready to trade with the people of the States whenever they feel disposed to do business with us on fair and equitable terms. It is not only natural but in the highest degree desirable for the prosperity of Canada and the States, that our trade relations should be of the most intimate character. The people of this country have always been able to see this. and it was only when the ordinary good sense of the Americans was blinded and obscured by passion and distorted by the ambitious dreams which such men as "Bowie knife" Potter suggested, that they failed to recognize how highly important it was that the true relations existing between us should be of the most unrestricted kind.

The White Baiment. BY HORATIO BONAR, D. D. The babe, the bride, the quiet dead, Clad in peculiar raiment all, Yet each puts on the spotless white Of cradle, shroud, and bridal hall.

The babe, the bride, the quiet dead, Each entering on an untried home, Wears the one badge, the one fair hue Of birth, of wedding, and of tomb,

Of death and life, of mirth and grief, We take it as the symbol true ; It suits the smile, it suits the sigh, That raiment of the stainless hue.

Not the rich rainbow a paried bloom, That diapasen of the light ; Not the soft sunset's silken glow, Or flush of gorgeous chrysolite ;

But purity of perfect light, Its native undivided ray, All that is best of moon and sup, The purest of the dawn of day.

O cradle of our youngest age ! Adorned with white, how fair art thou ! O robe of infancy, how bright ! Like light on the moorland snow

O bridal hall, and bridal robe ! How silver-bright your jeweled gleam. Like sunrise on the gentle face Of some translucent mountain stream

O shroud of death ! so soft and pure, Like starlight upon marble fair ; Ab, surely it is life, not death, That in still beauty sleepeth there.

Mine be a robe more spotless still, With lustre bright that cannot fade, Purer and whiter than the robe Of babe, or bride, or quiet dead.

Mine be the raiment given of God. Wrought of fine linen clean and white, Fit for the eye of God to see.

Meet for his home of holy light!

A Dream of the Heavenly City.

In the year 1814 three sisters resided in London, two of whom were pious, Christian women, while the third was wholly given up to worldly pleasures. She hated the piety of her sisters, and opposed it in many petty, spiteful ways, though they endeavored to accommodate themselves to her wishes and to render the differences of their opinion as little disagreeable to her as possible.
